Encyclopedia of LATIN AMERICAN LITERATURE
Encyclopedia of LATIN AMERICAN LITERATURE

VERITY SMITH

Editor

LONDON • CHICAGO
The encyclopedia is dedicated to its contributors in the Americas, Europe, the Near East and the Antipodes. It is also dedicated to the following contributors who, alas, died before it was published: Pamela (Pam) Bacarisse, Sally Harvey, Robert Reis.

VERITY SMITH
CONTENTS

Editor’s Note page viii
Advisers and Contributors xiv
Alphabetical List of Entries xviii
Alphabetical List of Works xxviii
General Reading List xxx

Encyclopedia of Latin American Literature 1

Title Index 1591
General Index 1677
Notes on Advisers and Contributors 1728

La bibliografía enumeraba cuatro volúmenes que no hemos encontrado hasta ahora, aunque el tercero—Silas Haslam: Hystory of the Land Called Uqbar, 1874—figura en los catálogos de librería de Bernard Quaritch.

Jorge Luis Borges, “Tlön, Uqbar, Orbis Tertius” EDITOR’S NOTE

The Encyclopedia of Latin American Literature contains entries on writers, works and topics relating to the literature of Latin America, including survey articles on all the continent’s individual countries. The selection of entries was made by the editor in consultation with the Advisers (listed on page xiii).

The encyclopedia is quite large but consists of only one volume. Therefore the criteria used are of the utmost importance since there is very little room for mistakes. In undertaking this truly daunting task any editor who is also a Latin Americanist is forcefully reminded of Borges’s parable about cartographers and their successive maps of the same empire which grew and grew until the final version was the same size as the empire itself. It is not possible to provide a faithful synopsis of anything and certainly not of anything as vast, protean and contentious as the “literature” of an entire continent. Nevertheless since those who are new to the field must start somewhere, the task has to be undertaken, and in doing so the following points have been taken into account.

The first point an editor must note is the work of others in the same or related fields since there is now a proliferation of works of reference in English, Spanish and Portuguese on the literature and (increasingly) the culture of Latin America. Granted that this particular volume will not be sitting alone on a shelf, in constructing it the editor has had to bear in mind what has already been done, with a view to filling perceived gaps, noting new trends while avoiding fashionable ephemera, incorporating new areas of academic interest and reviving an interest in older ones, which for one reason or another have been neglected. And chiefly it is the past that has been neglected in the case of this continent, partly owing to a veritable fixation by publishers, critics and readers alike with the works of authors of the so-called Boom. Consequently this encyclopedia participates in the task of re-igniting an interest in the literature of the continent’s past and also in stimulating interest in that of some of the smaller countries of the region such as Ecuador and Bolivia. Other points that have been taken into consideration are 1) the increasing importance of writing by Hispanic minorities in the US, and 2) the literature of the Francophone Caribbean since, not before time, scholars are ignoring the diversity of language in the literary production of the Caribbean in order to explore those common features that are the legacy of European colonialism; also 3) the encyclopedia seeks, though this is now no novelty—even in the relatively staid world of works of reference—to give prominence to the work of women writers, of the past as well as contemporary ones. It should be remembered, however, in both this and other contexts, that this work is not a dictionary of writers, so the women authors included form a selection. Comprehensiveness lies beyond the scope of this volume, and to find it readers must consult more specialized works.

The entry for each writer consists of a signed critical overview of the writer’s literary work written by an expert in the field; a brief biographical sketch of the subject; a select list of the writer’s primary works in chronological order and grouped by genre where applicable; an annotated list of further reading; and, in some cases one or more essays on individual literary works, followed by a note of editions, translations and further reading.
The list of selected works includes separately published books, including translations into English. Under the heading Compilations and Anthologies we have listed the most recent collection of the complete works; only those collections that have some editorial authority are cited; on-going editions are indicated by a dash after the date of publication.
Dates refer to the first publication in book form unless indicated otherwise; we have attempted to list the actual year of publication, sometimes different from the date given on the title page. Reprints of works, including facsimilie editions are generally not listed unless a revision of a text or a change of title is involved. Titles are always in italic. The first mention of a title in the text is followed by an English translation in parenthesis. In cases where there are no published translations a literal translation is provided within square brackets. Topic entries include a signed critical essay and an annotated list of further reading.

The book concludes with a Title Index to the Selected Works, which contains titles in the original language and English translation, and a General Index.

It is to be hoped that since all the entries are in alphabetical order, readers will have no difficulty in finding the items of interest to them. An Alphabetical List of Entries is provided on page xv, followed by an Alphabetical List of Works (with relevant page numbers) on page xix. It should be noted that in the case of compound surnames in Spanish America, the rule is that they are entered under the first element. Thus Mario Vargas Llosa appears under Vargas Llosa. The rule is different in the case of Brazilian surnames which are generally entered under the last component. So João Ubaldo Ribeiro appears under Ribeiro. However, readers should be(a)ware of exceptions: Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis is known as Machado de Assis and therefore appears under Machado de Assis and not Assis. (Cross-references of names are provided in the body of the book.)
A further point to bear in mind is that the surveys of the literature of the various countries in the region do not include either dramatists or the literature of the Colonial period in Latin America. These have separate, long entries.

A word should be said also about the entries on individual writers. Where a writer’s output is prolific and there is no separate entry on a given text or texts by the writer, the entry may deal selectively rather than comprehensively with his or her production, focusing on a few major works. The idea is that the entry should consist of more than a string of titles and predictable phrases about every text the author every produced. In this way, the criteria used in this encyclopedia may seem to differ from that adopted in similar works: the emphasis here is placed squarely on quality rather than on comprehensiveness, since the latter, in any event, is impossible to achieve in a single volume. However, each author entry is accompanied by a list of publications by and about him or her and this is where readers will find information about lesser-known works.

Another point which, alas, must be made is that any editor of a work of reference learns very quickly that this type of book is either a transmitter or a veritable breeding ground of misinformation. I concur completely with the opinion expressed by David William Foster, at once the most productive and the most learned bibliographer in the field of Latin American literature, when he makes this statement in the introduction to one of his research guides:
Any residual errors are the combined responsibility of the compiler and the lamentably long-lived tradition in Hispanic bibliography of incomplete, confusing and inaccurate references. (my italics)

Foster adds, “I hope, however, that this compilation represents a step toward the sort of bibliographic control the several national literatures so clearly deserve.” I echo Foster’s hope, but readers should be aware that the epigraph from Borges that heads this encyclopedia serves as a warning and not as a decoration.

Finally, this encyclopedia has been assembled in a relatively brief period of time, something that it would not have been possible to achieve without the goodwill, enthusiasm, intelligence, learning and punctuality of all its contributors. It follows that there is one guaranteed zone of truth in this book and that is the sentiments behind the dedication.

Acknowledgments

Properly to acknowledge all the help I have received in putting together this encyclopedia would require a second volume of some four hundred entries. No project of this kind can be completed successfully without the academic freemasonry that turns it into a truly collaborative venture. Nevertheless, an attempt must be made in a few words. So I shall start with the Advisers, most of whom are also contributors but, then, they deserve to be thanked (at least) twice. My thanks also to scholars in the US who work in the Colonial period: Raquel Chang-Rodríguez, Margarita Zamora, Georgina Sabat de Rivers and Stacey Schlau. To Roberto Reis who helped with Brazil; to Maryse Condé for her assistance with the Francophone Caribbean; to Angela Dellepiane for hers with Argentina, and to Marjorie Agosín for her benevolent support of this project. should also be expressed to those university departments on both sides of the Atlantic which have made a sizeable contribution to this project: to David Foster and Emil Volek at Arizona State University, together with several junior members of staff in the same department; to staff and research students at King’s College, London, and to several members of staff at the University of Wisconsin (at both Madison and Eau Claire). My gratitude to Jim Higgins at Liverpool for allowing me to treat him as an encyclopedia of Peruvian literature (which, of course, he is) and also to my friend and former colleague at QMW, Omar García, for feeding me long, helpful lists of potential contributors. Jenny Shubow at Birkbeck (University of London), revised the information sections of the entry on Eduardo Galeano with the learned fastidiousness that editors dream about. Also within London University, my thanks, as ever, to the library staff at both the Institute of Latin American Studies and at the University of London Library for their unfailing efficiency and pleasantness. In this context, I am particularly indebted to Christine Anderson at ULL for her considerable help with “Melvyl.” Fortunate, indeed, is the editor of an encyclopedia of Latin American literature who has the resources of the University of London Library (virtually) on her doorstep. I would also like to express my gratitude to the two imported proof-readers, Marina Michalski, who checked the articles on Brazil, and Anthony Edkins who read everything. My particular thanks to him for his thoroughness and constructive suggestions.

Within “the company,” thanks are owed to Daniel Kirkpatrick, both for guiding my first steps and for fostering such a pleasant atmosphere in the workplace. However, at the London office of Fitzroy Dearborn, my particular thanks must go to Lesley Henderson, for her balanced judgment and sound sense, her skilful defusing of my (alas, several) temper tantrums and, above all, for her Pinocchio sense of humour. No encyclopedia can be assembled without its makers being possessed of a strong sense of the absurd. “Paris,” an idea she liked, is dedicated (sotto voce) to her.

VERITY SMITH
Honorary Research Fellow, Queen Mary and Westfield College (University of London) ADVISERS

Roy C. Boland
David Brookshaw
Catherine Davies
David William Foster
Stephen M. Hart
Peter T. Johnson
John King
Gerald Martin
Nélida Piñón
William Rowe
Vivian Schelling
Donald L. Shaw
Edwin Williamson
Jason Wilson
CONTRIBUTORS

Christopher Abel
Rolena Adorno
Marjorie Agosín
Severino J. Albuquerque
José B. Alvarez IV
Carmen S. Alverio
Fanny D. Arango-Ramos
Elia J. Armacanqui-Tipacti
Emilio de Armas
Melvin S. Arrington, Jr
Teresa R. Arrington
Pamela Bacarisse
Daniel Balderston
Heloísa Gonçalves Barbosa
Maurice Biriotti
Roy C. Boland
Steven Boldy
Paul W. Borgeson, Jr
Catherine Boyle
Sara Brandellero
Ana María Brenes-García
David Brookshaw
Nick Caistor
Mireya Camurati
Claudio Canaparo
Marie-Magdeleine Chirol
Francesca Colecchia
Jaime Concha
Linda Craig
Dermot Curley
Teresinha V. Zimbrão Da Silva
Mary L. Daniel
Catherine Davies
Lloyd Hughes Davies
Greg Dawes
Elena De Costa
Sabine Dedenbach-Salazar Sáenz
Francesca Denegri
Mark Dinneen
Soledad Acosta de Samper
Martín Adán
Jorge Enrique Adoum
Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda
African-American Literature
African-Brazilian Literature
African-Caribbean Literature
Demetrio Aguilera Malta
José Agustín
Delmira Agustini
“Íntima” and “Otra estirpe”
Claribel Alegría
José de Alencar
Jacques-Stéphen Alexis
José Américo de Almeida
Ignacio Manuel Altamirano
Jorge Amado
America, The Invention of…
Enrique Amorim
Carlos Drummond de Andrade
A rosa do povo
Mário de Andrade
Oswald de Andrade
“Manifesto antropófago”
José Pereira da Graça Aranha
Reinaldo Arenas
Arturo, la estrella más brillante
Rafael Arévalo Martínez
Argentina
José María Arguedas
Los ríos profundos
Manlio Argueta
Roberto Arlt
El juguete rabioso and Aguafuertes porteñas
Juan José Arreola
Miguel Ángel Asturias
El Señor Presidente
Autobiography
Avant-Garde
Aymara Literature
Aluísio Azevedo
Mariano Azuela
Los de abajo
Emilio Ballagas
Manuel Bandeira
Miguel Barnet
Afonso Henriques de Lima Barreto
Rafael Barrett
Lo que son los yerbales
Eduardo Barrios
Carlos Germán Belli
“En Bética no bella”
Gioconda Belli
Andrés Bello
Mario Benedetti
Best-Sellers
Olavo Bilac
Bildungsroman
Adolfo Bioy Casares
Augusto Boal
Bolivia
María Luisa Bombal
The Boom
Jorge Luis Borges
“Nueva refutación del tiempo”
“El jardín de senderos que se bifurcan”
Brazil
Alfredo Bryce Echenique
Un mundo para Julius
Fanny Buitrago
Lydia Cabrera
Guillermo Cabrera Infante
Caliban
Eugenio Cambaceres
Nellie Campobello
Canon
Ernesto Cardenal
Cántico cósmico
Alejo Carpentier
El reino de este mundo
El siglo de las luces
Tomás Carrasquilla
Jorge Carrera Andrade
“Cada objeto es un mundo”
Miguel de Carrión
Julián del Casal
Rosario Castellanos
Antônio de Castro Alves
Caudillismo and Dictatorship
Aimé Césaire
Une Tempête
Chicano Literature
Children’s Literature
Chile
Antonio Cisneros
Civilization and Barbarism
Colombia
Colonial Literature: New Granada
Colonial Literature: New Spain
Colonial Literature: Peru
Concrete Poetry
Maryse Condé
Conventual Writing
Julio Cortázar
Rayuela
Costa Rica
José de la Cuadra
Cuba
Cuban Writing in the United States
Cultural Dependency
Roque Dalton
Poems
Rubén Darío
“Nocturno XXXII”
René Depestre
Detective Fiction
Augusto D’Halmar
Eliseo Diego
Dominican Republic
José Donoso
Casa de campo
Ariel Dorfman
Autran Dourado
Oswald Durand
Esteban Echeverría
Ecuador
Jorge Edwards
José María Eguren
El Salvador
Salvador Elizondo
Diamela Eltit
Erotic and Homoerotic Writing
The Essay
Feminism
Feminist Literary Theory
Macedonio Fernández
José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi
Rosario Ferré
Adonias Filho
Film
Rubem Fonseca
Foundational Literature
Francophone West Indies
Gilberto Freyre
Casa grande e senzala
Carlos Fuentes
Agua quemada
Aura
La muerte de Artemio Cruz
Eduardo Galeano
Rómulo Gallegos
Doña Bárbara
Manuel Gálvez
Griselda Gambaro
Ventura García Calderón
Gabriel García Márquez
El amor en los tiempos del cólera
Cien años de soledad
El general en su laberinto
Fina García Marruz
Juan García Ponce
El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega
Comentarios reales de los Incas
Elena Garro
Juan Gelman
“Asomos”
Mempo Giardinelli
Oliverio Girondo
Alberto Girri
Margo Glantz
Edouard Glissant
Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda
Antônio Gonçalves Dias
Manuel González Prada
José Gorostiza
Juana Manuela Gorriti
Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala Guatemala Guerrilla Poetry
Nicolás Guillén
Sóngoro cosongo
Bernardo Guimarães
A escrava Isaura
João Guimarães Rosa
Grande sertão: veredas
Ricardo Güiraldes
Don Segundo Sombra
Ferreira Gullar
Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera
Martin Luis Guzmán
Felisberto Hernández
José Hernández
Martín Fierro
Julio Herrera y Reissig
Fernand Hibbert
The Historical Novel
Honduras
Vicente Huidobro
Juana de Ibarbourou
Jorge Ibarüengoitia
Jorge Icaza Identity
Indianism
Indigenism
Jorge Isaacs
Ricardo Jaimes Freyre
Jewish Writing Journals
Marcha
Mundo Nuevo
Orígenes
Plural
Punto de Vista
La Revue du Monde Noir
Sur
Tropiques
Vueltas
Juana Inés de la Cruz
Divino Narciso
Primero sueño
Respuesta a Sor Filotea
Land and Literature
Norah Lange
Enrique Larreta
José Lezama Lima
Justin Lhérisson
Libraries
Enrique Lihn
Baldomero Lillo
Clarice Lispector
A hora da estrela
Literacy Campaigns Literary Theory
Enrique López Albújar
Ramón López Velarde
Carlos Loveira
Dulce María Loynaz
Leopoldo Lugones
Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis
Dom Casmurro
Magical Realism
Eduardo Mallea
Leopoldo Marechal
Marianism
José Carlos Mariátegui
José Mármol
René Marqués
José Martí
“Nuestra América”
Versos sencillo
Ezequiel Martínez Estrada
Carlos Martínez Moreno
Marxism and Culture in Spanish America
Clorinda Matto de Turner
Mayan Literature
Cecília Meireles
João Cabral de Melo Neto
Murilo Mendes
Juan León Mera
Mestizo
Metafiction
Mexico
Gabriela Mistral
Modernismo: Brazil
Modernismo: Spanish America
Augusto Monterroso
Vinicius de Moraes
Nancy Morejón
Félix Morisseau-Leroy
César Moro
Mulatto
Álvaro Mutis
Mysticism
Myth
Náhuatl Literature Nationalism
Négritude
Pablo Neruda
“Alturas de Macchu Picchu” Nicaragua
Rafael Núñez
Silvina Ocampo
Victoria Ocampo
Juan Carlos Onetti
El astillero
Orality
Olga Orozco
Fernando Ortiz
Juan L.Ortiz
Miguel Otero Silva
José Emilio Pacheco
Ricardo Palma Panama
Paraguay
Para-Literature
Paris
Nicanor Parra
Teresa de la Parra
Las memorias de Mamá Blanca
Violeta Parra
Las décimas
Fernando del Paso
Octavio Paz
Poetry
Essays
El laberinto de la soledad
Cristina Peri Rossi
Peru
Ricardo Piglia
Virgilio Piñera
Nélida Piñón
Sergio Pitol
Alejandra Pizarnik
Elena Poniatowska
Hasta no verte Jesús mío
Popular Culture
Pornography
Positivism
Abel Posse
The Post-Boom
Postmodern Writing
Jean Price-Mars
Prison Writing
Prizes
Protest Literature
Puerto Rico
Puerto Rican Writing in the United States
Manuel Puig
El beso de la mujer araña
Quechua Literature
Rachel de Queiroz
Horacio Quiroga
Short Stories
Graciliano Ramos
Regionalism
José Lins do Rego Resistance Literature
Alfonso Reyes
João Ubaldo Ribeiro
José Eustasio Rivera
Augusto Roa Bastos
Yo el Supremo
José Enrique Rodó
Ariel
Gonzalo Rojas
Manuel Rojas
Romanticism
Sílvio Romero
Jacques Roumain
Juan Rulfo
Pedro Páramo
Ernesto Sábato
Abaddón, el exterminador
El túnel
Juan José Saer
Gustavo Sainz
Salarrué
Sebastián Salazar Bondy
Luis Rafael Sánchez
La guaracha del Macho Camacho
Severo Sarduy
Domingo Faustino Sarmiento
Simone Schwartz-Bart
Science
Science Fiction
Manuel Scorza
José Asunción Silva
Antonio Skármeta
_Ardiente paciencia_
Carlos Solórzano
Osvaldo Soriano
Sousãndrade
Alfonsina Storni
Surrealism
José Juan Tablada
Néstor Taboada Terán
Lygia Fagundes Telles
Testimonial Writing
Theatre
Transculturation
Translation
Travel Literature
Dalton Trevisan
José Triana
Uruguay
Rudolfo Usigli
Arturo Uslar Pietri
Luisa Valenzuela
César Vallejo
_Trilce_ XIX
Blanca Varela
Mario Vargas Llosa
La casa verde
_Historia de Mayta_
José Vasconcelos
Ana Lydia Vega
Venezuela
Érico Veríssimo
Xavier Villaurrutia
Cirilo Villaverde
_Cecilia Valdés_
David Viñas
María Elena Walsh
Emilio Adolfo Westphalen
Women’s Writing Workshops
Agustín Yáñez
Alicia Yánez Cossío
Juan Zorrilla de San Martín
ALPHABETICAL LIST OF WORKS

Abaddón, el exterminador by Ernesto Sábato, 739–41
Agua quemada by Carlos Fuentes, 330–31
Aguafuertes porteñas by Roberto Arlt, 72–73
“Alturas de Machu Picchu” by Pablo Neruda, 585–87
El amor en los tiempos del cólera by Gabriel García Márquez, 350–51
Ardiente paciencia by Antonio Skármeta, 767–68
Ariel by José Enrique Rodó, 721–22
Arturo, la estrella más brillante by Reinaldo Arenas, 49–52
“Asomos” by Juan Gelman, 365–66
El astillero by Juan Carlos Onetti, 598–99
Aura by Carlos Fuentes, 331–33
El beso de la mujer araña by Manuel Puig, 691–92
“En Bética no bella” by Carlos Germán Belli, 107–08
“Cada objeto es un mundo” by Jorge Carrera Andrade, 177–78
Cántico cósmico by Ernesto Cardenal, 166–68
Casa de campo by José Donoso, 269–70
Casa grande e senzala by Gilberto Freyre, 326–27
La casa verde by Mario Vargas Llosa, 831–33
Cecilia Valdés by Cirilo Villaverde, 846–47
Cien años de soledad by Gabriel García Márquez, 351–53
Comentarios reales de los Incas by El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega, 360–61
Las décimas by Violeta Parra, 634
Divino Narciso by Juana Inés de la Cruz, 458–59
Dom Casmurro by Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis, 505
Don Segundo Sombra by Ricardo Güiraldes, 403–05
Doña Bárbara by Rómulo Gallegos, 340–41
Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda by Jorge Enrique Adoum, 7–8
A escrava Isaura by Bernardo Guimarães, 396–97
El general en su laberinto by Gabriel García Márquez, 353–54
Grande sertão: veredas by João Guimarães Rosa, 400–01
La guaracha del Macho Camacho by Luis Rafael Sánchez, 751–53
Hasta no verte Jesús mío by Elena Poniatowska, 662–63
Historia de Mayta by Mario Vargas Llosa, 833–34
A hora da estrela by Clarice Lispector, 486–87
“Íntima” by Delmira Agustini, 19–20
“El jardín de senderos que se bifurcan” by Jorge Luis Borges, 138–39
El juguete rabioso by Roberto Arlt, 72–73
El laberinto de la soledad by Octavio Paz, 642–43
Lo que son los verbales by Rafael Barrett, 101–02
Los de abajo by Mariano Azuela, 91–92
“Manifesto antropófago” by Oswald de Andrade, 45–46
Martín Fierro by José Hernández, 416–18
Las memorias de Mamá Blanca by Teresa de la Parra, 631–32
La muerte de Artemio Cruz by Carlos Fuentes, 333–34
Un mundo para Julius by Alfredo Bryce Echenique, 150–51
“Nocturno XXXII” by Rubén Darío, 253–54
Nuestra América by José Martí, 521–23
“Nueva refutación del tiempo” by Jorge Luis Borges, 137–38
“Otra estirpe” by Delmira Agustini, 20
Pedro Páramo by Juan Rulfo, 733–35
Primero sueño by Juana Inés de la Cruz, 460–62.
Rayuela by Julio Cortázar, 227–29
El reino de este mundo by Alejo Carpentier, 171–72
Respuesta a Sor Filotea by Juana Inés de la Cruz, 462–63
Los ríos profundos by José María Arguedas, 66–67
A rosa do povo by Carlos Drummond de Andrade, 40–41
El Señor Presidente by José María Arguedas, 79–81
El siglo de las luces by Alejo Carpentier, 173–74
Sóngoro cosongo by Nicolás Guillén, 393–94
Une Tempête by Aimé Césaire, 188–90
“Trilce XIX” by César Vallejo, 823–26
El túnel by Ernesto Sábato, 741–42
Versos sencillos by José Martí, 523–25
Yo el Supremo by Augusto Roa Bastos, 718–19
GENERAL READING LIST

Literature of the Colonial Period
Chang-Rodríguez, Raquel, Violencia y subversion en la prosa colonial hispanoamericana, siglos XVI y XVII, Madrid: José Porrúa Turanzas, 1982
Chang-Rodríguez, Raquel and Gabriella de Beer (editors), La historia en la literatura iberoamericana: memorias del XXVI Congreso del Instituto Internacional de Literatura Iberoamericana, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1989
———Satire in Colonial Spanish America: Turning the New World Upside Down, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993

19th and 20th Centuries
Beverley, John, Against Literature, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993
Bloom, Harold (editor), Modern Latin American Fiction, New York: Chelsea House, 1990
Fernández Moreno, César, Julio Ortega and Ivan Schulman (editors), Latin America in Its Literature, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1971; translated by Mary G. Berg, New York: Holmes and Meier, 1980 [The quality of contributions remains outstanding]
Foster, David William and Virginia Ramos Foster (editors), Alternate Voices in the Contemporary Latin American Narrative, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1985
González Echevarría, Roberto, The Voice of the Masters: Writing and Authority in Modern Latin American Literature, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985

Kadir, Djelal, Questing Fictions: Latin America’s Family Romance, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1986

Losada, Alejandro, La literatura en la sociedad de America Latina: Perú y el Río de la Plata 1837–1880, Frankfurt: Vervuert Verlag, 1983

Ludmer, Josefina (editor), Las culturas de fin de siglo en America Latina, Rosario, Argentina: B. Viterbo, 1994

McGuirk, Bernard and Mark Millington (editors), Inequality and Difference in Hispanic and Latin American Cultures. Critical Theoretical Approaches, Lampeter, Wales: Edwin Mellen Press, 1995

Millington, Mark and Paul Julian Smith (editors), New Hispanisms: Literature, Culture, Theory, Ottawa: Dovehouse Editions, 1994

Picon Garfield, Evelyn and Ivan Schulman, “Las entrañas del vacío:” ensayos sobre la modernidad hispanoamericana, Mexico City: Cuadernos Americanos, 1984

Oviedo, José Miguel, Historia de la literatura hispanoamericana, vol. I, De los orígenes a la emancipación, Madrid: Alianza,

Rama, Ángel, Transculturación narrativa en America Latina, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1982

——La ciudad letrada, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1984

Ramos, Julio, Desencuentros de la modernidad en America Latina: literatura y política en el siglo XIX, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989

Rodríguez Monegal, Emir, Narradores de esta America, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1969

Rowe, William and Vivian Schelling, Memory and Modernity: Popular Culture in Latin America,

Yurkievich, Saúl, Fundadores de la nueva poesía latinoamericana: Vallejo, Huidobro, Borges, Girondo, Neruda, Paz, Lezama Lima, Barcelona: Ariel, 1984

——Identidad cultural de Iberoamérica en su literatura, Madrid: Alhambra, 1986
Zea, Leopoldo (editor), Fuentes de la cultura latinoamericana, 3 vols, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1993 [Important selection of essays by men of ideas. In the 3 volumes there is only one essay by a woman]

Bibliographies and Works of Reference

Brower, Keith H., Contemporary Latin American Fiction. An Annotated Bibliography, Pasadena, California: Salem Press, 1989 [Useful because it includes Brazilian writers and provides criticism on individual texts]

Gullón, Ricardo (editor), Diccionario de literatura española e hispanoamericana, 2 vols, Madrid: Alianza, 1993 [Entries generally very sketchy and information not necessarily reliable; selection of Spanish American topics extremely limited, but author coverage is comprehensive and, as generally applies to works of this type on “Latin America” published in Spain, authors from the Phillipines are included]

Standish, Peter (editor), Dictionary of Twentieth Century Culture, 2 vols, Detroit: Gale Research, 1996 [vol.1, Hispanic Culture of Mexico Central America and the Caribbean; vol.2, Hispanic Culture of South America]

Soledad Acosta de Samper 1833–1913

Colombian prose writer

Once obscure and long neglected, Soledad Acosta de Samper has come into her own as the most important woman writer of the 19th century in Colombia and an influential force in Spanish American letters. Her early travels caused her to question the status of women in her native country and her work constitutes a courageous yet subtle and non-confrontational advocacy of women’s issues. It is pioneering work in Spanish American feminism.

Women writers in Colombia were not uncommon, but it was unusual for a woman to publish, and to publish as profusely as did Acosta was indeed rare. Using a variety of pseudonyms she published novels, dramas, history, essays and translations. Between 1878 and 1881 she founded newspapers and magazines in Lima and Bogota such as La Mujer [Woman], which was written, edited and published by women—truly a woman’s enterprise. The astounding number of publications places her among the most prolific Colombian writers of the 19th century as well as making her the one who contributed most to the visibility of women as artists in their own right in Latin America. Unlike many of her contemporaries who were taken up with the then popular theories of social progress and Utopian constructs, Acosta in her fiction depicts the everyday reality of ordinary women and posits principles of change for women centered on the idea of education as a liberating force. Many of her works have stood the test of time but others are seriously marred by their heavy didacticism, while some are flawed because of their often hasty serial publication.

In her first published volume, a collection of novellas entitled Novelas y cuadros de la vida sur-americana, 1869 [Novellas and Sketches of Life in South America] each story describes problems that affect women such as illness, solitude and injustice. This volume carried a foreword by her husband, the noted politician and writer, José María Samper. In this foreword Samper endorses the moral posture and the literary qualities of his wife’s work. Whatever value Samper’s endorsement may have had at the time, Acosta was to be taken to task for including it because his support suggests women’s dependency on male approval of their literary efforts.

Soledad Acosta’s novels fall within the representational mimetic style of the 19th century. There is, at the same time, a clear attempt to draw her characters’ inner worlds and especially to develop the consciousness of the female characters. This is clear in her first full-length novel Dolores: cuadros de la vida de una mujer [Dolores: the Story of a Leper], originally published in 1867 and reprinted two years later as the the most important component of Novelas y cuadros. The title is a play on words; it is both the heroine’s name and a correlative of her sorrows and sufferings. Dolores (the name signifies pain), believing herself an orphan, learns that her father is not dead but suffers from leprosy and has been in hiding for years. Shortly before his death he returns and briefly meets his daughter. The meeting is fatal for Dolores. She realizes that she too has the disease and therefore must cancel her marriage plans. The novel traces the fragmentation of her conscience which arises from the vicissitudes of her now woeful life. Dolores withdraws from the world but not from her inner struggle wherein she simultaneously asserts and denies her essence as a woman. Stylistically, the fragmentation of her essential “I” is captured by a chaotic use of verbal tenses and by a wild blizzard of exclamation marks. Apart from the world, Dolores seeks salvation through her writing. Her diary, which serves as an epilogue to the novel, becomes a testimony of her search for a female identity. Alone, Dolores resists the ravages to her body and the social alienation brought by her disease. She resists by writing. That is, the creative act of writing brings salvation, for it allows Dolores to develop as a woman and thereby to gain a measure of victory over death and the limits it imposes.

A second novel of Acosta’s developing feminism is Teresa la limeña, páginas de la vida de una peruana, 1869 [Teresa of Lima: Pages from a Peruvian Woman’s Life]. The novel is a reaction to the contention that love had become an emotion “good only to fill the pages of a novel” and that “marriage is a form of business, good or bad, but still business.” The novel’s circular structure enhances the sense that a woman’s lot is unrewarding and repetitive. Acosta’s view is that romantic values of the heart have become alien in a world of acute mercantilism where women are little more that chattel to be bought and sold. In Teresa la limeña, Acosta denounces marriage as a commercial transaction that victimizes women and she condemns calculating fathers who give their daughters in marriage only to cement business transactions. Teresa, a motherless child, discovers that she is to be sent to a convent for a good education so that her ambitious father will be able to make a good match for her. In the convent she meets Lucila and the two girls are taken with notions of romantic idealism. Both young women see their ideals crushed when their fiancés abandon them to marry richer women who can save them from bankruptcy. Out of the convent Teresa learns to take charge of her own life in spite of the regulations imposed by a patriarchal society. Married, and widowed, Teresa leaves for Europe where she meets her convent friend Lucila again. Teresa begins to shed the social controls around her, while Lucila, trapped by her past and influenced by her time in the convent, remains totally dependent on others until her premature death. Teresa’s father, who is in fear of losing the inheritance from her dead husband, orchestrates a new exile for Teresa, this time in Chile. But Teresa is fatally ill. She retreats from society to live alone in a house by the sea and there resolves to leave a written memory of her life.

For the protagonist, writing is a way to revive happier days. It provides the path to self-knowledge and creates a kind of symbolic liberation from crass reality. Here, as in the case of Dolores, writing—that is recovering the past by reminiscing—is seen as the ultimate form of transcendence. It is noteworthy that neither Dolores nor Teresa has children—maternity not being important to them as women. But Teresa la limeña suggests alternative life choices for Latin American women in the example of the frail dying woman who asserts herself in the face of overwhelming social conventions. Feminine stereotypes are subverted and literature emerges as the realm that allows women to find self-fulfillment. In both novels, establishing one’s own autonomy is the important requisite for women writers who aspire to success as creators of literature in Latin America.

Acosta further developed this concept in her now famous essay “Aptitudes de la mujer para ejercer todas las profesiones,” 1893 [On the Ability of Women to Practice All Professions], which she read in Spain on the fourth centenary of the discovery of America. On that occasion she called for society to include women as equals in all spheres, especially the professions.

El corazón de la mujer (1869) [A Woman’s Heart], also included in Novelas y cuadros, presents the stories of half a dozen women of different ages whose common ground is suffering: “A woman’s heart has four ages: in childhood, it grows and suffers; in adolescence, it dreams and suffers; in youth, it loves and suffers; in old age, it understands and suffers.” Una holandesa en América, 1888 [A Dutch Woman in America] ostensibly a novela de costumbres interspersed with descriptions of events of Colombian history, is also important for its projection of the world of women and its progressive awareness of their condition. A travel narrative, it deviates from standard models in that the hero is a woman, Lucía, whose travels give her an awareness of things that are bigger than she, through which she finds a sense of the transcendent. The protagonist returns to her native Colombia after having grown up in the Netherlands. This Europe-to-America transition becomes crucial to her development as a woman as she confronts new realities that clash with the romantic fantasies of her youth. This literal discovery of a new world—America—is also the discovery of the self. Her idealism is tested. Meeting her father and brothers is a disappointment which demonstrates the insufficiency of romantic feelings in the real world. As she searches for an organizing principle to end her confusion she embraces Catholicism and, having decided to remain single, she enters a convent. Conversely, her friend Mercedes marries happily, and—in sharp contrast to Acosta’s other novels—the narrator indicates that marriage can be an important stabilizing factor in the lives of women. All ends well in the novel. Lucía establishes harmony in what was a chaotic world; she regenerates her family and becomes an agent of change and civilization. Her status as a woman is now of great importance in the lives of those around her.

Acosta’s work is seen today as a milestone in women’s writing in Latin America, and her contribution to the formation of a national literature in Colombia is being re-evaluated. Her fiction focuses on the role of women in society and issues of nationhood. It deals with women’s themes such as family, marriage and the domestic world, but it goes beyond to question the dominance of patriarchal values and the limitations they impose on women, rejecting the notion that being a wife was the only way for a woman to achieve self-realization. Instead, she sought alternatives for women such as their incorporation in the economy as equals, an idea that in retrospect can be seen as a radical position in spite of the subtlety of its formulation. It was not until the second half of the 20th century that other Colombian writers acquired an interest in women’s issues. The renewed interest in the work of Soledad Acosta, together with the re-issue of her work, will lead to a reassessment of one of Colombia’s major writers.

GILBERTO GÓMEZ OCAMPO

See also entries on Juana Manuela Gorriti, Clorinda Matto de Turner, Women’s Writing: 19th Century
Biography

Born in Bogota, Colombia, 5 May 1833, the daughter of General Joaquín Acosta and his English wife, Caroline Kemble. Parents moved to Halifax, Nova Scotia, in 1835 and shortly after to Paris where Soledad attended school. She returned to Bogota and married the writer José María Samper in 1855. Moved to Europe in 1857 where couple stayed until 1862. On returning to Colombia, after a brief period in Lima, they both wrote regularly for the press. Acosta de Samper founded several magazines for women and the family, among them La Mujer [Woman] and La Familia [The Family]. Her husband died in 1888 whereupon she moved to Paris with her mother and daughters in 1890. Represented Colombia at the Congress of Americanists that took place in Huelva in 1892 to mark the fourth centenary of the conquest of America. Also published fiction in French and translated works of literature from English. Died 17 March 1913.

Selected Works

Dolores: cuadros de la vida de una mujer, in El mensajero (1867)
Teresa la limeña: páginas de la vida de una peruana, in La Prensa (1868)
Novelas y cuadros de la vida sur-americana, Ghent: Vanderhaeghen, 1869 [Includes Dolores and El corazón de la mujer]
Biografías de hombres ilustres o notables, Bogota: Imprenta de La Luz, 1883
Los piratas en Cartagena, Bogotá: Imprenta de La Luz, 1886 [Has been reprinted several times this century, most recently in 1972]
Episodios novelescos de la historia patria, Bogotá: Imprenta de La Luz, 1887
Una holandesa en America, Curaçao: A.Bethencourt e Hijos, 1888
La mujer en la sociedad moderna, Paris: Garnier, 1895
Hidalgos de Zamora, Bogota: Imprenta de La Luz, 1898
Un hidalgo conquistador, Bogota: Imprenta de la Luz, 1907

Further Reading

A comprehensive primary bibliography by Daniel Samper Ortega is included in the volume Soledad Acosta de Samper: una nueva lectura, edited with an introduction by Montserrat Ordóñez, Bogota: Fondo Cultural Cafetero, 1988. Samper Ortega’s bibliography is most helpful because much of Acosta de Samper’s work appeared in a range of magazines and a selection in book form is yet to appear.

Martín Adán 1908–1985

Peruvian poet

Martín Adán, the pseudonym of Rafael de la Fuente y Benavides, began to publish his first poems in literary reviews during the late 1920s and the early 1930s. These early poems such as “Navidad,” [Nativity] “Gira” [Revolve] and “Sol” [Sun] are clearly influenced by the Spanish avant-garde, more specifically by ultraísmo. They illustrate the poet’s tendency to emphasize the images for their own sake, for engaging in an ingenious game of words, and reveal a deliberately cosmopolitan attitude. At this stage of his poetic career there is also a vacillation between traditional forms and the experimental range of the avant-garde. This latter direction is most evident in a short novel entitled La casa de cartón, 1928 (The Cardboard House), which explores the problematic relationship between the artistic self and a growing sense of national and cosmopolitan identity. This is a novel about a young man, his awakenings to the joys and traumas of love, and his observations of the society around him. However, the referential dimension of the work is frequently diminished and is overshadowed by the play of verbal images as the reader’s attention is directed less towards the events narrated and more to the level of language which thrusts itself to the fore. Hence, it concentrates on the aesthetic or poetic pattern rather than on the social dimension typical of the regionalist novels of this period.

In common with poets such as Jorge Eduardo Eielson and Emilio Adolfo Westphalen, Adán’s verses tend to be inward-looking and the themes of language and poetry itself play an important part in his work. The attempts to yoke together both transcendental experience and poetry is expressed in a series of conceptual balances and oppositions which appear throughout one of his most important collections Travesía de extramares, 1950 [Voyage Beyond the Oceans]. His adherence to the strictures of traditional verse forms and the use of epigraphs from classical Latin as well as from Spanish, French and Italian writers also implies that he is locating himself firmly within a European cultural tradition. Primary features of this poetry are paradox, conceptual complexity, and the use of archaisms and rare words taken from dictionaries. The principal attribute of these unusual, obsolete, or technical words is their focus inwards towards the poet’s own emotional state. A recurring symbol is that of the rose which is vitally important in these sonnets as well as in La rosa de la espinela, 1939 [The Rose of the Espinela], a collection of décimas or espinelas, a Spanish verse form consisting of ten octosyllabic lines. This symbol establishes both a sense of a perfect aesthetic beauty and a sublime manifestation of human spirituality. The use of suspension points, exclamation marks, and ellipses reflects the primary aim of calling into question the relation between language and silence, presence and absence, as he struggles to comprehend the emotional state in which he finds himself and the uncertainty of his ability to communicate it.

The next phase of his writing undergoes a reassessment as he moves away from the traditional verse forms and the earlier mobilization of a more portentous vocabulary. Thus Escrito a ciegas, 1961 [Written Blindly] represents the poet’s first attempts to express himself in free verse and seems to correspond to a more urgent need to inject a more personal note into his poetry. The poetic voice which emerges here is that of a tortured individual who puts everything into question as he attempts to explain the relationship between his poetry and life on a more general level. As the title itself suggests, he advances very tentatively to some sort of definition of himself and his role as poet. The contradictions which emerge are articulated through an admixture of the mundane and the sublime, the conceptually abstract and the very basic and concrete details of his environment.

The other long, rambling poems of this same period are La mano desasida (Canto a Macchu Picchu) 1964 [The Hand Let Go (Song to Macchu Picchu)] and *La piedra absoluta, 1966 [The Absolute Stone] in which he contrasts the duality of Machu Picchu with the duality and illusory nature of poetry and (by extension) of life itself. There is an internal dialogue carried on throughout these poems which is emphasized through the complex interrelation of pronouns and verb forms. These correspond to the manner in which the poet perceives various aspects of the self. Pablo Neruda begins his “Alturas de Macchu Picchu,” (The Heights of Macchu Picchu) with a physical approach, an encounter with a physical object and recognizes that through place he can be in contact with these human lives, with history, and with life itself. Adán refuses to construct any sense of the real physical Machu Picchu but rather addresses the self in terms of the “recondite, high stone.” There is a continual undermining of any sense of epistemological certainty, a splintering or fragmentation of the self, which all contribute to the undecidability of the text.

In the final stage of Adán’s writing there is a return to the sonnet form with the publication of Mi Darío, 1967 [My Darío] and Diario de poeta, 1975 [Diary of a Poet]. The opaqueness and density of the earlier sonnets gives way to much greater transparency of language and more simple, direct statements about himself. An effect of directness is achieved by the use of a vocabulary which stresses the more humble, often squalid details of everyday life. The relationship between poetry, the poet, and external reality are especially prominent as he continues to probe the limits of a particular technical form. A continual use of suspension points, a plethora of exclamations, and a frequently rhetorical tone permeate the collection. A familiar pattern consists of drifting thoughts punctuated by silences which brings out the discursive nature of some sonnets whilst yet others are more conversational, often more urgent, tense, and even violent. This all draws attention to the writing process itself and how this is inextricably bound up with the poet’s inner world, his “volume of agony.”

While earlier critical attention had focussed on anecdotes about the poet himself, more recent studies suggest serious efforts to come to terms with one of the most difficult and yet most important writers in Peruvian literature of the 20th century.

JOHN MYLES KINSELLA

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry
La rosa de la espinela, Lima: Cuadernos de Cocodrilo, 1939
Travesía de extramares, Lima: Dirección de Educación Artística y Extension Cultural del Ministerio de Educación Pública, 1950
Escrito a ciegas, Lima: Mejía Baca, 1961
La mano desasida (Canto a Macchu Picchu), Lima: Mejía Baca, 1964
La piedra absoluta, Lima: Mejía Baca, 1966
Diario de poeta, Lima: Inti-Sol, 1975

Novel
La casa de cartón, Lima: Talleres de Impresiones y Encuadernaciones, 1928; as The Cardboard House, translated by Katherine Silver, St Paul, Minnesota: Graywolf Press, 1990

Other Writings
De lo barroco en el Perú, Lima: Universidad de San Marcos, 1968

Compilations and Anthologies
Obra poética, edited by Ricardo Silva-Santisteban, Lima: Edubanco, 1980
Obras en prosa, edited by Ricardo Silva-Santisteban, Lima: Edubanco, 1982

Further Reading
Bendezú, Edmundo, La poética de Martin Adán, Lima: Villanueva, 1969
Higgins, James, The Poet in Peru, Liverpool: Liverpool Monographs in Hispanic Studies, 1982 [Devotes one chapter to the poetry of Adán] —Lo trágico y su consuelo: un estudio de la obra de Martin Adán, Lima: Mosca Azul, 1989 Lauer, Mirko, Los exilios interiores: una introducción a Martin Adán, Lima: Hueso Húmero, 1983
Loayza, Luis, “Martín Adán en La Casa de cartón,” Proceso, Lima (1964)
Ortega, Julio, Figuración de la persona, Barcelona: Edhasa, 1970 [short section on Adán]

Bibliographies
Weller, Hubert P., Bibliografia analítica y anotada de y sobre Martin Adán, Lima: Instituto Nacional de Cultura, 1975
Jorge Enrique Adoum 1926

Ecuadorian poet, novelist, dramatist and critic

Jorge Enrique Adoum is a Marxist intellectual and a committed revolutionary writer. His extensive literary production and his constant experimentation in various genres—poetry, narrative, essay and theater—place him among the Latin American literary avant-garde and establish him as a fundamental landmark in contemporary Ecuadorian letters.

Adoum’s work focuses on the literary amalgamation of the central motifs of his creation: Marxist and socialist ideology, its relationship with Ecuadorian and Latin American history from prehistoric times to the present, and an obsessive search for a new, original and raging language to convey the frustrations, conflicts and hopes of both Latin American people and society subordinated internally to the alienating pressures of an unjust social system and externally to the manipulation of capitalism and North American neocolonialism.

Culturally speaking, Adoum’s works illustrate a dual unity of political criticism and sociological aesthetics. Adoum is essentially a poet whose dialectical conception of poetry and the social genesis of the literary work are quite obvious in his first period, since Écuador amargo, 1949 [Bitter Ecuador], Relato del extranjero, 1953 [Foreigner’s Story], up to the substantial contribution to the Spanish American epic of the 20th century, the tetralogy Los cuadernos de la tierra [The Notebooks of the Earth], published in a single volume in 1963. In a second and mature period, the problems of denunciation and commitment become more subtle and their development more artistic, carefully avoiding the danger of falling into political propaganda and pamphleteering. Here the poet’s obsession becomes a struggle between words and world, language and popular languages, individual and society as presented in Yo me fui con tu nombre por la tierra, 1964 [I Went Away with Your Name Around the World], Curriculum mortis of 1968, Informe personal sobre la situación 1973 [Personal Report on the Situation] and Prepoemas en postespañol, 1979 [Prepoems in Post-Spanish]. This last work in particular is an unexpected and challenging tour de force in verbal and non-verbal experimentation because it combines philosophical and political reflections with linguistic economy and an aggressive style employing surprising neologisms, morphological disintegration, and unpredictable metaphors. A third period in the evolution towards a unique language, style, and aesthetically committed literature had a curious turn. Adoum, the poet in revolt, explored other territories, theater and novel, in an attempt to find new boundaries and channels of communication. Adoum’s theater belongs to popular and documentary drama. On the one hand, El sol bajo las patas de los caballos, 1972 (The Sun Trampled beneath the Horses’ Hooves) is a devastating attack on all forms of conquest, oppression, and colonization; on the other, La subida a los infiernos, 1976 [Ascent to Hell], is a satirical and grotesque plea against the shady business dealings of the bourgeoisie as it tramples upon religious beliefs and the human rights of the people.

Adoum’s successful incursion into narrative is a surprising case: a major poet becomes an influential novelist. His novel Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda: texto con personajes, 1976 [Between Marx and a Naked Woman: Text with Characters], winner of that year’s Xavier Villaurrutia prize for fiction, has come to be seen as the best and most complex “new novel” ever written in Ecuador. It is a work that relies on both the author’s literary theory—explicitly stated and developed in the fiction—and the narrative praxis of that theory. It is not only a text conveying cultural and political criticism but also a moving poetic and experimental novel whose content and structure surpasses by far the pioneering complexities of Cortázar’s Rayuela, 1963 (Hopscotch). The structural labyrinth of concentric circles allows Adoum to create an open novel whose interpretive possibilities are numerous. Even though the plot itself seems to be straightforward—a writer writes a book about a writer who is thinking of writing another book on another writer—the novel embodies, at complementary levels, all the obsessive themes Adoum has written about since 1944. Even more, the novel is the synthesis of the poetical, artistic and ideological themes of his writings, summarizing the complex evolution and powerful stylistic expression which shape Adoum’s aesthetics of violence, an effective artistic answer to the problems of underdevelopment and to the daily realities, in Ecuador and Latin America, of institutionalized violence, exploitation, cruelty, injustice, and death.

Thus Marxist ideology, aesthetics of violence and continental history may well summarize Adoum’s painful but nevertheless fruitful relationships with politics, and literature. These major themes reappear constantly in his later writings, which are an attempt to find “el realismo de la otra realidad” (the realism of the other reality) and “lo real espantoso” (the frightening experience) of Latin America, as described by Adoum himself in many of his essays. However it must be emphasized that Adoum—well distanced by the 1970s from any trace of Socialist Realism as practiced by many members of the Ecuadorian “Generation of 1930”—thought as follows: art is not a magical door that opens up to reality but rather constitutes an autonomous reality; neither a photograph nor a symbol of nature or society but, rather, a re-presentation of reality, parallel to some philosophical and even scientific forms of representation in a continuous exchange of meanings. His position has always been against “el sectarismo del realismo” (the sectarianism of realism). Therefore, those reading Adoum should consider that, as stated by Terry Eagleton in Literary Theory: an Introduction (1983), “You simply have to argue about politics. It is not a question of debating whether ‘literature’ should be related to ‘history’ or not: it is a question of different readings of history itself.”

Adoum’s career of over fifty years profiles a writer who has found, through political and artistic commitment, a key path to explore the past and future of his people. It is true that Adoum considers literature to be a weapon in the revolutionary struggle. However, he has also maintained that such a weapon, in order to be politically useful, must be artistically created. This position is the result of key experiences throughout his career: the early discovery of the writers of the Group of Guayaquil; his work as Pablo Neruda’s personal secretary in Chile and their longlasting friendship; the progressive and critical discovery of Vallejo, Rimbaud, Mallarmé, Apollinaire, Whitman, Cavafy, Pessoa, Joyce, Kafka, Mishima, Tanizaki, Kawabata; the close ties with the Cuban Revolution; and his personal voluntary exile of nearly twenty-five years in Europe, sixteen of which he spent in Paris working for UNESCO; his active participation, in Paris, in political and literary discussions with a group of Latin American writers and artists with whom he would maintain a long and mutually influential friendship: Alejo Carpentier, Julio Cortázar, Juan Rulfo, Eduardo Galeano, Gabriel García Márquez, Juan Gelman, Augusto Monterroso, René Depestre, Roberto Matta, Wilfredo Lam, Antonio Seguí, Edouard Glissant, and Antonio Saura, among others.
All Adoum’s works develop a general theme according to which Latin America is a subjugated, invaded, and raped continent. Predominating in these works are a dissatisfaction with the status quo, a corrosive doubt, and a defiant and combative attitude: that of historical optimism against geographical pessimism, in so far as violence is the result of negation of our own history. This reality frustrates the self-realization of Adoumian characters, narrators, and lyrical voices, torn between their individual inability to transform social reality, and the alienating pressures of physical and ideological mechanisms of power and manipulation of society.

In his poetic works Adoum assumes a collective rather than an individual lyrical voice. The writer witnesses the pervasive situation that needs to be deconstructed politically and artistically with the systematic innovation of language and expression. Thus official violence at the thematic level is met with formal, structural, and stylistic violence at the linguistic level. For instance, in 3,742 verses, Los cuadernos de la tierra deals with both prehistorical and historical forms of violence up to the 18th century in what is now Ecuador. With this work, Adoum ends his obsessive return to the past in search of identity and moves on to the 20th century, still plagued by violence and repression. Henceforth, Adoum’s poetry may be considered field reports by a war correspondent of society, in so far as his Latin American leitmotifs explore social, political, and economic fluctuations, the pressures of imperialism and neocolonialism, the proliferation of dictatorships both civilian and military, the despair of the lower classes, and the abuses of power. It is impossible to separate in Adoum’s extensive production art from politics or history, creative freedom from political freedom, theory from praxis. Everywhere in his poetical praxis, metaphors associated with death, suffering, and alienation are overwhelming; all of them challenge us one way or the other to face ourselves in somebody else’s mirror, to think and talk about personal and collective memories, to explore the past in order to understand the future. This piercing irony combined with caustic humor, the fluctuations between geographical pessimism and historical optimism, and a vigorous solidarity with the downtrodden are trademarks of Adoum’s style. It allows the poet to convey a plurality of meanings in his fight against all forms of social, political, linguistic and grammatical status quo. Thus, as stated in key poems like “Epitafio del extranjero vivo” [Epitaph of the Foreigner Alive], “Lo insólito cotidiano” [The Everyday Unusual], “Casi como Dios” [Almost Like God], “Pasadosología” [Past-ology], and “Surrealismo al aire libre” [Outdoor Surrealism], language breaks down as it goes beyond the limits of its own referentiality, creating and destroying meanings that end up in the vicious circle of life and death.

PABLO A. MARTÍNEZ

Biography

Born in Ambato, Ecuador, 1926. Studied for an arts degree at the University of Santiago de Chile. Private secretary to Pablo Neruda for about two years. Taught literature in Ecuador; head of the publishing department of the Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana; also headed section of National Culture at the Ministry of Education, 1961–63. In 1963 travelled to Egypt, India and Japan as part of UNESCO’s East/West cultural programme; lived in China from 1964 to 1966. Worked for French state radio up to 1968. From 1969 to 1986 he worked for the United Nations in Geneva and for UNESCO in Paris. Returned to Ecuador in 1987. Recipient of the following... awards: Ecuadorian National Prize for Poetry, 1952 for the first two volumes of Los cuadernos de la tierra; Casa de las Américas Prize, 1960 (the first year it was awarded) for Dios trajo la sombra; the Mexican Xavier Villaurrutia Prize, 1976 for Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda; the Ecuadorian Eugenio Espejo National Prize for Culture, 1989.

Selected Works

Poetry

Ecuador amargo, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1949
Carta para Alejandra, Quito: La Andariega, 1952
Los cuadernos de la tierra:
- I. Los orígenes, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1952
- II. El enemigo y la mañana, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1952
- III. Dios trajo la sombra, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1959
- IV. Eldorado y las ocupaciones nocturnas, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1961

Notas del hijo pródigo, Quito: Rumiñahui, 1953
Relato del extranjero: poesía, Quito: Ediciones del Ateneo Ecuatoriano, 1955
Yo me fui con tu nombre por la tierra, Quito: n.p., 1964 [clandestine edition]
Informe personal sobre la situación, Madrid: Aguariabay, 1973
Los 37 poemas de Mao Tsetung, Buenos Aires: Schapire, 1974
El amor desenterrado y otros poemas, Quito: El Conejo, 1993

Novels

Ciudad sin ángel, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1995

Plays

Essays

Poesía del siglo XX, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1957
La gran literatura ecuatoriana del 30, Quito: El Conejo, 1984
Sin ambages (textos y contextos), Quito: Planeta-Let ravi Guayasamín: el hombre, la obra, la crítica, Nuremberg: D.A. Verlag Das Andere, 1996

Compilations and Anthologies

Los cuadernos de la Tierra, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1963 [one-volume edition]
No son todos los que están: poemas, 1949–1979, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1979
Further Reading

Calderón Chico, Carlos, Jorge Enrique Adoum: entrevista en dos tiempos, Quito: Editorial Universitaria, 1988

Donoso Pareja, Miguel, “Adoum y sus texto con personajes,” in Nuevo realismo ecuatoriano. La novela después del 30, Quito: El Conejo, 1984

Hamilton, Carlos, “Jorge Enrique Adoum,” in Nuevo lenguaje poético (de Silva a Neruda), Bogota: Publicaciones del Instituto Caro y Cuervo, 1965

Rodríguez Ortíz, Oscar, “Jorge Enrique Adoum: por ambas partes (A propósito de Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda),” in Sobre narradores y heroes (A propósito de Arenas, Scorza y Adoum), Caracas: Monte Avila, 1981

Yurkievich, Saúl, “De lo lúcido a lo lúdico,” in La confabulación con la palabra, Madrid: Taurus, 1978

Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda: texto con personajes

Novel by Jorge Enrique Adoum

Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda is the most important, complex, and radically experimental new novel ever written in Ecuador and a representative example of the new Latin American novel. Its socialist ideology and its original, angry language highlight the powerful stylistic expression of Adoum’s aesthetics of violence. It conveys the conflicts and hopes of both Latin American people and society, subordinated to an unjust social system and to North American neocolonialism. The novel includes a literary theory of its own that challenges the reader systematically. The triple narrative structure of concentric circles and the wide variety of topics and styles deal with the contemporary tension between sociability and individualism, and the dismemberment of the writer, torn between political commitment and literary experimentation.

The novel is organized on three levels: textuality (the different narrative strata), intertextuality (the relationships between Adoum’s works and those of other writers), and visualization (first, through visual and textual devices; second, through images and symbols: Marx, a set of wheelchairs, a naked woman, the Centaur Joaco, the Man of Punin). These strategies develop key theoretical premises: the necessity of genre transformation, the shock value of art, the inevitable creation of new languages, the unavoidable destruction of the text, the freedom in fragmentation, and the consumption of aesthetics. We confront a text based on its own negation, that could be read in any order or even be left unfinished in order “poner a trabajar al lector acostumbrado a siglos de pereza” (to force the reader, accustomed to centuries of laziness, to work).

In the panorama of the new Ecuadorian novel, Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda stands out as one of the best. Adoum’s disintegrating aesthetics of violence combines linguistic renovation, situational parody, and corrosive irony. Its labyrinthine structure of concentric circles implies a critique of the politics, art and culture of Latin America and a devastating inquiry into society. However, Adoum’s text is also a historical novel, a political essay, a revolutionary manifesto, a prose poem, an autobiographical confession. It presents a period that begins in 1930 with the North American imposition of the dictator José Ubico in Guatemala and ends in 1973, with the assassination of Salvador Allende and the North American installation of the fascist dictatorship of Pinochet, in Chile. It also presents the idiosyncrasy, culture, and history of Ecuador vis-à-vis the sociopolitical reality of Latin America. In the process of writing his fiction, Adoum eliminates the strait-jacket of the plot and proposes instead the rejection of reality. He attacks the idealism underpinning Socialist Realism, the tyranny of the plot line, uni-dimensional characterization, literary determinism. Most importantly, Adoum includes himself in the work as a character insisting on artistic commitment. And because the self-questioning of the reader is the cathartic process that sets in motion this text, each reader becomes a character. The outcome is the aesthetic configuration of an original and violent “new novel” corresponding to the daily violence that goes unpunished all over Latin America and frustrates the self-realization of women and men. As a result, the characters, a motley assortment of divided, alienated beings, are trapped in the morass of an imposed ideology and a culture of violence. As a response, the novel (re)presents the underdevelopment of culture and the culture of underdevelopment in order to attack capitalism by using the fragmentation of the structure and language. Therefore, the title bespeaks crucial dualities—politics and ethics, Marxism and psychoanalysis, society and eroticism—which resolve themselves dialectically in a cultural and literary critique of capitalistic ideology. This criticism runs throughout the novel pointing out literary, social, and historical problems. Thus as cultural critique, it is a defiant and coherent text whose critical strategies reproduce themselves in the chaotic fictional world created and narrated in thirty-two long segments. Adoum disrupts the traditional codes of reading and narrative discourse by renovating language and technique, content and form, and transforming the reader into a consumer and producer of the text. However, textual power stems from the mythic/visual symbols generated by the leitmotifs in the narration: the naked woman, the Man of Punín, and the Centaur Joaco.

In this textual geography, Adoum’s characters live in an alienated world. The first narrative circle embraces the remaining ones. There we find the “Autor,” Jorge Enrique Adoum, in the process of writing Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda, and submerged in painful self-questioning. In the second circle, we find another writer, the “Narrador,” about whom the “Autor” of the first circle is writing his novel. This “Narrador” also writes another book about his problematic relationship with his lover Rosana, wife of landowner Fabián Golmés, el Cretino. Through the pretense of this love story he fictionalizes the contradictions and limitations of the bourgeoisie and internalizes his own isolation and conflicts.

Galo Gálvez, alias Joaco, a fictionalization of the Ecuadorian writer Joaquín Gallegos Lara, is the protagonist of the third and densest circle, consisting of the autobiography of the “Narrador” of the second circle. It focuses on Galo Gálvez, protagonist of the novel that the “Narrador” writes. Here we face a roman à clef that forces the reader to participate, for it interprets reality instead of imitating it. The complexity of Adoum’s narrative theory is also built upon the use of paraphrases and quotations, whose proliferation make the novel into a totalizing cultural and dialogical project.

Galo Gálvez is a progressive leftist intellectual who along with the “Autor/Adoum” shares the main role in the third narrative circle. Despite being paraplegic, he is the most dynamic and active character. A contemporary centaur and symbol of the frustrations and hopes of Latin American people, he traverses all circles of the novel. His model, as we learn in the Prologue, was the paraplegic writer Joaquín Gallegos Lara, a member of the circle of writers known as the Group of Guayaquil. Gálvez, like the “Autor,” is a stoic, an ironic intellectual, a challenger of the religious, military, and civil power, who always acts in solidarity with the people. His companion, Falcon de Aláquez, a popular character, lends him his legs and transports him everywhere on his shoulders. They form a metaphorical and mythological unit, the centaur Joaco/Gálvez/Falcon, a contemporary political allegory of the revolution.

The character called “Autor,” a figure for Jorge Enrique Adoum, is a type of demiurge. He has freedom of movement in the narrative circles. His devastating sociocultural criticism runs constantly throughout the novel. As a censor, a self-critic, the “Autor” transcends the cultural world of the novel and gives it a continental and universal dimension. With him we travel through the prehistory of violence, the conflictive origins of the mother country, and the contradictions and injustices of contemporary reality: from the Man of Punín through to the Man of Santiago. His language forms a poetic, demythologizing, and sarcastic discourse. He is the most polemical and honest character, the synthesis of Adoum/ Gálvez/Gallegos Lara.

The “Narrador,” another main character, is also an intellectual and a writer torn between his vocation and his sentimental conflicts. His vicissitudes show him as suffering the traumas, betrayals and “claudicaciones” (imperfections) which occur in the false and bourgeois world in which he lives. He is the protagonist of his own fiction and failure, something which is reflected in the characters he creates while narrating his autobiography in the third narrative circle.

In Adoum, aesthetic counterviolence aspires to the change implicit in the social dialectics and ideology that support the text. On one hand, Adoum destroys and demythologizes the history and culture of Ecuador; on the other, he places us at the core of Latin American reality, attacking violently North American imperialism and the instruments of its penetration. Through its thematic dispersion, Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda is reminiscent of Jorge Luis Borges’s “aleph.” In the continuous reading process each element comes out uninterruptedly in the reader’s mind by way of an analogical organization. Thus the narrative contents are presented by symbols (the naked woman, the Man of Punín, the centaur Joaco, Los Esdrújulos), by metaphors (of love, adolescence, friendship, politics, repression, sexuality, literature, the legal system), by anaphorical images (the father’s skull, the revolution, past, history, daily life, motherland). Adoum dramatizes the historical present by interspersing the leitmotif of the unending aggressions of North American imperialism. This chain of violent aggressions from the outside conditions the internal violence of the countries of Latin America and determines the alienation and frustration of Adoumian characters. The only way out of this oppressive situation is revolutionary change and armed struggle to which the novel only alludes but whose ideology it demands constantly.

The strategies of Adoum’s world are defiant, suggestive and complex. This “text with characters” invites intense debate and reflection and, once read, proves difficult, even impossible, to forget. As a fundamental novel of our time, Adoum’s text is a potent legacy. Ultimately, this quasi-jigsaw puzzle novel is a deliberately elusive text, an impassioned testimony, a thoughtful document of individual and collective memory, a scream of frustration and rage.

PABLO A. MARTÍNEZ

Editions

First edition: Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda: texto con personajes, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1976

Further Reading

Waag, C. Michael, “Frustration and Rage in Jorge Enrique Adoum’s ‘Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda,’” Perspectives on Contemporary Literature, vol. 10 (1984)

African-American Literature

Central and South America

The recent far-reaching developments in the field of Afrocentric studies have altered radically and irrevocably not just the entire range of “Afro”-disciplines, but the so-called “Western” academy itself. Cheikh Anta Diop’s challenge in The African Origin of Civilization: Myth or Reality (1975) is not mere academic speculation. There is an entire school of brilliant scholars and a rapidly expanding corpus of works that support his position. It is clear that the so-called “Moors” who gave definitive shape to Hispanicity were Africans plain and simple, as African as those ancients from the Nile Valley who first created a great human civilization, as African as the citizens of present-day Senegal, Nigeria, Kenya, etc. Furthermore, according to Ivan Van Sertima’s compellingly argued study of 1976, They Came before Columbus, Africans were a decisive shaping force in the development of high civilization in the Americas from as early as the 8th century BC. For practical purposes and as is also the case in the entry on African-Caribbean Literature, a new working definition of African-American Literature” is called for. It must be one with which every scholar can live, no matter her/his ideological orientation. It is simply that literature, emanating from Central and South America, in which the problematic African heritage is given overt focus. This literature will not, however, be viewed through the traditional Eurocentric prism.

Henry Louis Gates, Jr in The Signifying Monkey: a Theory of African-American Literary Criticism (1988) established parameters that are valid for the entire continent. The “Signifying Monkey” is a manifestation of Legba, the Yoruba Trickster “god,” Orisha, or Loa, the symbol of literariness, a West African version of Thoth of ancient...
Egypt, after whom, the Greco-Romans fashioned their Hermes and Mercury. In the Americas created by the 1492. process, the quest for liberation has to be close to the core of any African literary symbol. And certainly all over the Americas Tricksters like Brother Rabbit, Brother Anancy (the Spider), Brother Tortoise, and, of course, the Signifying Monkey himself have been an integral part of the people’s struggle. In this context the picaro of Peninsular literature can be considered a legitimate Trickster. Shango the great warrior, “god” of thunder, another “Orisha” from the Yoruba pantheon, has also been intimately connected with the liberation movement. The freedom fighter par excellence in the Americas has been the cimarrón (runaway slave) and the struggle itself can be labeled a cimarronaje. In a sui generis African Central and South American literary theory, then, such figures as the cimarrón, Legba, the picaro and Shango would play a central role.

Careful analysis reveals that Latin American fiction writers of the 20th century who can be deemed to be representative of those who have made an aesthetic issue of the Black presence have either consciously or unconsciously fashioned their protagonists on the picaresque model. Furthermore, in doing so it can be argued that they were guided by a cultural reflex that dates back to the dawn of human civilization, in Africa. In 1942, the Ecuadorian Adalberto Ortiz gave the world the first widely-read Latin American novel, Juyungo, with an uncompromisingly black protagonist, Ascensión Lastre. Lastre is in many respects a classic pícaro. He enters upon the scene as a young child cast adrift in a sea of adversity, and has to learn to swim immediately lest he drown. Like the original Peninsular picaro, Lazarillo de Tormes, at an early age he leaves what little shelter his “home” provides. Tutored by his own “smarts” and a series of contacts with others who served as his “masters” in a more or less formal way, he seeks to negotiate the perils of existence as a black man in a white man’s world.

The same picaresque paradigm is adopted by the Colombian Arnoldo Palacios in the development of his principal character, Irra, of the novel Las estrellas son negras [The Stars are Black]. (Richard L. Jackson, who has encyclopedic knowledge in these matters, gives 1949 as the date for this novel although the only edition extant was published in 1971). The young male confronts the desperate circumstances of poverty, hunger, and above all a pervasive racism. Although he realizes that the only road to liberation is that of a bold cimarronaje, he balks at employing what Frantz Fanon calls the “cleansing force” of armed revolt. An existential picaro, he opts for a most precarious liberation that the reader must deduce for her/himself to be either death by drowning or a life of complete abandonment to illusion. However, it might well be argued that Irra’s final solution, structurally parallels that of Lazarillo: it is an accommodation to the prevailing and ineluctable adversity.

The Venezuelan Ramón Díaz Sánchez authored in 1950 a novel about a rural Black community, Cumboto. The firstperson narrator, the anti-hero Natividad, expressly rejects the picaresque option: “Más de una vez había pensado en huir, emanciparme y forjarme mi propia vida. Pero no lo hice… la idea de partir sin rumbo, sin una brújula que orientase mis pasos me aterraba. ¡Me sentía tan débil e incapaz!” (On more than one occasion I had thought about running away, emancipating myself and forging my own life. But I didn’t do it …the thought of taking off without any direction, without a compass to guide my steps, terrified me. I felt so weak and inept).
José Antonio Pastrana is the protagonist of the Ecuadorian Nelson Estupiñán Bass’s 1966 novel, El último río [Pastrana’s Last River]. The burly black man takes charge of his life lifting himself from the ranks of the oppressed to those of the oppressor. His metamorphosis is achieved through trickery. He is not a classic picaro, however. He becomes far too powerful for that. Indeed, he is a cimarrón gone awry becoming worse than the slavemaster himself. Natividad presented an example of refusal to use the Trickster/picaro access to cimarronaje. Lastre and Irra followed a path that is closer to that of the original Lazarillo. Whereas Estupiñán appears not to have relied on the Trickster/piozo paradigm in the development of his Pastrana, the theme of cimarronaje seems to have been expressly evoked.

It is in Chango, el gran putas [Shango the Baddest SOB], the 1983 magnum opus by the Colombian Manuel Zapata Olivella, that the reader finds the clearest expression of the central relationship between the Trickster/picaro and liberation (cimarronaje). The title appears to reduce Shango, god of thunder, mighty warrior and liberator of his people to a mere trickster, albeit the “baddest” of them (el gran putas). Zapata means no irreverence. On the contrary, he displays the profoundest respect for traditional Yoruba theology, for he understands that Legba, the Trickster “god,” is as important a figure as Shango. In the novel it is only through Legba’s instrumentality that Shango can become “el gran putas,” who foretells and realizes the final liberation of his people.

The Costa Rican Quince Duncan born in 1940 is considered to be one of his country’s greatest authors. He comes from that nation’s “West Indian” province, Limón, and he traces his ancestry to West Africa via the island of Jamaica. The thrust to liberation is the fundamental motor of his fictive universe, and so the central protagonist is a liberator (cimarrón), like Shango. Duncan does not highlight the role played by Legba, rather the medium through which spiritual forces effect their inspiration is the samamfo (a concept explained below). His hero is more warrior than Trickster, and he is a fully New World Orisha, one, in fact, “made in the West Indies.” For Duncan has crafted a “god” called Cuminá from the tradition of African-Christian Jamaicans. In all but one of his novels the main character is a messianic African-ancestored young man fully committed to the struggle for liberation.

The concept of the samamfo has evolved over the development of Duncan’s fictional universe, a sure indicator of its fundamental importance. The definition proffered in the glossary of Kimbo, a later novel, that was finished in 1982, but reworked until 1985 to be finally published in 1990, is, then, the most appropriate: “Espíritu y herencia de los Ancestros. En el samamfo están los valores y tradiciones del pueblo. Es la memoria colectiva de la raza-cultura que pasa de generación a generación y que se actualiza en los ritos religioso-seculares del pueblo, en sus luchas, en sus experiencias. Los ancestros nunca han abandonado a sus herederos.” (The spirit and inheritance of the Ancestors. It is in the samamfo that the values and traditions of the people reside. It is the collective memory of the race-culture that passes from generation to generation and that is actualized in the religious/secular rites of the people, in their struggles, in their experiences. The Ancestors have never abandoned their heirs). The samamfo is but one of the four central tropes that constitute the neo-African core of Duncan’s creativity. The others are the cimarrón, the river, and laughter. Duncan might be considered the leader of a school of Central American writers who by building on all of the rich potential of their full cultural heritage have created one of the most vibrant literatures in the Americas. The others are his fellow Costa Rican Eulalia Bernard and the Panamanians Gerardo Maloney, Melvin Brown and Carlos Guillermo Wilson.

The Dialectical Theory of Identification inspired by Frantz Fanon and developed by Amilcar Cabral (this theory is explained in the entry on African-Caribbean literature) offers the most complete analytical framework for the material presented above. The representative works chosen for discussion in the present entry belong to the “Radicalization” phase. It is important, however, not to disparage in anyway the work of those who labored over the years when the night of racist oppression was darkest. In those days the relatively few men-of-words (and they were, in fact, mostly “men”) who might have had some interest in evoking the African heritage could barely emerge from the slumber of “Capitulation” to attain some measure of “Revitalization.” It is equally important, however, to recognize and support the contributions of the writers who have evolved to the “Radicalization” phase, for without vigilance there is real danger of regressing to the dark night of “Capitulation.”

IAN ISIDORE SMART

Further Reading

Gordon, Donald K., Lo jamaicano y lo universal en la obra del costarricense Quince Duncan, San José: Editorial Costa Rica, 1989

Jackson, Richard L., Black Writers in Latin America, Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1979

Prescott, Laurence E., Candelario Obeso y la iniciación de la poesía negra en Colombia, Bogota: Caro y Cuervo, 1985

Richards, Henry J., La jornada novelística de Nelson Estupiñán Bass: búsqueda de la perfección, Quito: El Conejo, 1989

African-Brazilian Literature

The term “African-Brazilian Literature” does not describe a literary movement as such, but rather a thematic tendency within modern Brazilian literature, sometimes also known in the 1920s as “Literatura Negra,” a term which is currently used to describe the literary expression of the black movement in Brazil. In discussing African-Brazilian literature, it is therefore important to be aware that it has two strands to it, one evoking the literary consciousness of a minority group, the other associated with a major movement of cultural nationalism. Modernism, which was to affect the course of mainstream Brazilian literature from the 1920s onwards.

Black literary aspirations began to find expression in the first black newspapers, which appeared in São Paulo, from 1915. By the 1930s, the black voice was being heard through newspapers such as Clarim d’Alvorada [Dawn Clarion] and Voz da Raça [Voice of the Race], which sought to inculcate middleclass values into their readership, in order to better prepare blacks for integration. Literary values were correspondingly conservative, usually taking the form of the Parnassian sonnet. The main poetic voice of the black movement in São Paulo was Lino Guedes who, in books such as Canto do cisne preto, 1927 [Song of the Black Swan], Urucungo (1936) and Negro preto cor da noite, 1938 [Jet Black Man Colour of Night], managed to reconcile erudite models, such as the sonnet, with popular themes and humour.

More or less at the same time, but within the mainstream of Brazilian literary life, the Modernist Movement was born in São Paulo in 1922. The Modernists belonged to the social elite, and sought to blend Amerindian and African-Brazilian folk motifs into a new expression of national identity. While this movement of cultural nationalism, whose main representatives were Oswald de Andrade, Mário de Andrade and Raul Bopp, exalted the mestizo character of Brazilian culture, it also generated a sentiment of regional consciousness in the Northeast of the country, where the influence of African culture was particularly marked. Its principal instigator was the Pernambuco sociologist Gilberto Freyre, author of the Manifesto regionalista (1926), and of the later classic of social history, Casa grande e senzala, 1933 (The Masters and the Slaves), in which he analysed in considerable detail and from a very positive viewpoint, the contribution of the black slave to the social and cultural life of the plantation belt during the colonial period. Freyre also organised the first African-Brazilian Congress in Recife, in 1934. In literature, Jorge Amado’s novel Jubiaubá (1935), was the first in a long line of novels by this author to focus on black life in Bahia, and to exploit “macumba” (African-Brazilian religious ritual) and slave folk history to underpin its social message. In the same year, José Lins do Rego published his novel, O moleque Ricardo [Richard the Street Kid], which detailed the experiences of a young black migrant from the plantation, in the city of Recife. In poetry, Jorge de Lima, in Poemas negros, 1947 [Black Poems] and Solano Trindade, in Poemas de uma vida simples, 1944 [Poems of a Simple Life], reflected in their work an African-Brazilian aesthetic: the cultivation of black rhythms and vocabulary, in a free verse form exalting the vitality of black culture and displaying an awareness of the social injustices to which blacks were subjected. As in Cuba, this strand of African-Brazilian literature implied, for some writers, a political militancy. Amado and Trindade joined the Brazilian Communist Party after 1945, both having explored in their work, the revolutionary possibilities of black culture, while at the same time identifying the black struggle as part of the universal struggle of the proletariat.

In the Brazil of the 1930s and 1940s, African-Brazilian literature was therefore not limited to black authors. Indeed, most authors were white and middle class. The black press occasionally included, with some pride, news of the activities of mestizo intellectuals such as Mário de Andrade, and from time to time published a “black” poem.
by a white author, such as Cecilia Meireles. The only writer who co-existed with both the world of black militancy and the artistic and literary elite, was the black poet and theatre director, Solano Trindade.

Since the 1950s, the two strands of African-Brazilian literature have continued to exist in apparent ignorance of each other. On the one hand, Jorge Amado has become the country’s most widely-known exponent in fiction of African-Brazilian culture. Contemporary classics such as Gabriela, cravo e canela, 1958 (Gabriela, Clove and Cinnamon), and Dona Flor e seus dois maridos, 1966 (Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands), both exploit to its fullest potential the rich vein of Bahian culture, frequently resorting to African-Brazilian magic for the resolution of their plots. Tenda dos milagres, 1969 (Tent of Miracles), however, is Amado’s main testimony to the struggle for black culture to be accepted nationally, and to the fight against racism, incorporating both the social and cultural themes visible in his earlier novels.

At the same time, an African-Brazilian literature has accompanied the fortunes of the black social and cultural movements, which have surfaced with some regularity, mainly in São Paulo, since the 1950s. Abdias do Nascimento, black polemicist, heavily influenced by the black experience in the United States, where he resided for many years, was instrumental in attempts to create a black theatre in the years after the war, which would more closely reflect the lives and aspirations of blacks in Brazil, as well as provide an outlet for black actors.

During the 1960s, a number of black poets were influenced by the Négritude aesthetic of the Francophone African poet and statesman, Léopold Senghor. Oswaldo Camargo’s Um homem tenta ser anjo, 1959 [A Man Attempts to Be an Angel], and Eduardo de Oliveira’s Gestas líricas da negritude, 1967 [Lyric Epics of Négritude], both focus on the inner experience of being black in a world which denies any value to the African contribution to the country. A poetry of rejection and exile seeks to rekindle the link with a distant and elusive mother continent. Camargo’s later collection of short stories, O carro do êxito, 1972 [The Gravy Train], focuses, with sometimes gently ironic humour, upon the contradictions of the black movements in São Paulo, in their struggle to express a black identity.

In the 1970s and 1980s the link with Mother Africa was revived with the emergence of Angola and Mozambique as independent Portuguese-speaking nations, whose revolutionary literatures coincided with the dynamization of the black movement in Brazil in the wake of the political opening of the late 1970s, and the centenary of Abolition in 1988. Poets in São Paulo, such as Cuti, in Rio, such as Ele Semog, Antônio Vieira, from Bahia, and Oliveira Silveira, from Porto Alegre, not to mention black women poets like Miriam Alves and Lourdes Teodoro, have redefined African-Brazilian literature in terms of their individual, regional, or socio-cultural predicament. What is apparent is that while established white writers, like Jorge Amado, continue to base their novels within an unchanging African-Brazilian setting, African-Brazilian literature as such, owes its evolution to the small but growing number of black writers in Brazil.

DAVID BROOKSHAW
Further Reading

African-Caribbean Literature

With the recent intensification in the quest for clarity on the part of numerous scholars of African ancestry, especially those based in the United States, some of the traditional terminology employed in our academy has been shown to be inadequate. Since the term “African Caribbean” assumes that “Caribbean” plain and simple is not necessarily “African,” it needs to be replaced, for the assumption is incorrect. On the other hand, however, because white supremacist ideology has taken firm root from the time of the so-called Enlightenment at least, there are many well-meaning scholars of all races who have absolutely no quarrel with the fundamentally flawed assumption. Indeed, it may well be the case that the majority of Caribbean artists and intellectuals, even at the present time the dawn of the second half of the millennium ushered in by Columbus—still labor under an essentially white supremacist approach.

What, then, is “African-Caribbean” literature? It is simply that literature, emanating from the Caribbean, in which the problematic African heritage is given overt focus. Cowed by white supremacy, writers from the region opted not to touch the Africa thing. This was and is especially the case for those who were most vulnerable, the ones whose external indicators of ethnicity linked them inextricably to Africa. To raise the question of Africa even indirectly was to court disaster, from physical death (see the case of Plácido discussed below) to economic and/or social death, as is more likely to be the case today. In these circumstances any writer from the region, no matter her/his ethnicity or even motivation, who overtly and with artistic consciousness focuses on any aspect of the African heritage, can be deemed to be working within the pale of “African-Caribbean literature.”

Frantz Fanon viewed the colonial world as an essentially polarized, “Manichean” universe. Amilcar Cabral developed this insight into the Dialectical Theory of Identification. It would be impossible to understand the evolution of literature in the Caribbean without these analytical tools. From the very beginning of brutal European presence in the region there had been two worlds, two cultures, two literatures, one scribal, the other oral, one proper to the dominant minority, the other emanating from the oppressed majority.

The letters and chronicles of the few literate among the marauding multitudes coming from Europe after 1492 constitute the first works of this New World literature. The Colombian man-of-words Manuel Zapata Olivella, Las claves mágicas de America: Raza, clase y cultura, 1989 [The Secrets to Understanding America: Race, Class, and...
Understandably it is this region, the very model after which every society in the Americas was fashioned, that has nurtured some of the best known Spanish American writers: Andrés Bello, José Martí, Rubén Dario, and Gabriel García Márquez.

So successful was the genocide initiated by Columbus that within one generation the new barbaric society had to meet its critical manpower needs with captive African labor. These Africans degraded to the utmost and unconscionably separated from a literary heritage that dated back to the third millennium BC had to content themselves with a merely oral literary practice. Afrocentric scholars continue to uncover the indisputable organic connection between the post-1492, Africans who came to America as cargo in the infamous slave ships and their ancestors who gave humankind the gift of civilization itself. The language of this oral literature was and still is Creole, a blend of a general West African syntax with a specific European lexicon. In the case of the Spanish Caribbean this lexicon would clearly be Spanish. Some of the few written samples of this literature can be found in Rosa E. Valdés Cruz’s La poesía negroida en América (1970).

Literature written in Spanish emanating from the privileged domains of the ruling minority was consciously derivative, a slavish imitation of the Old World models. Such was the literature of Bello, Dario, Martí, etc. Completely separated in the apartheid conditions of the “Manichean” colonial universe the new Caribbean natives, the transplanted Africans, graced their existence with the fervent practice of the literary arts, albeit exclusively oral. Their literary expression was also consciously rooted in the secular tradition of their Original World. Their imitation was, ironically, not slavish, for they did not enjoy the luxury of adjudication by the experts back home. True, the African artistic community in the Caribbean of colonial times was constantly invigorated by new entrants fresh from the source. The traffic was one way, however. There was no possibility of feedback from the literary elders resident in the Yoruba nation, or the Igbo nation, or the Ashante nation, etc.

Africans, the new Caribbean natives, then, created the most vibrant regional literature. This vibrancy could only inform the written literature of the region when the “Manichean” gap between native and colonizer, between “orature” and literature was closed. The “orature” was consciously African. And African-Caribbean literature is by the definition articulated for this essay a literary expression that consciously evokes some aspect of the African heritage. It follows, then, that unless and until the scribal literary expression of the dominant minority was touched in some way by the vibrant oral literary tradition it could not be Caribbean.

Gabriel de la Concepción Valdés, who wrote under the pseudonym Plácido, was an almost white Cuban Romantic poet born in 1809. There is little in his work to distinguish him from his Spanish (European) contemporaries and predecessors who were the main luminaries of Romanticism and pre-Romanticism: Manuel José Quintana, José Espronceda, José Zorilla and Francisco Martínez de la Rosa. There was in Plácido’s work no overt evocation of the “real” African cultural heritage. His Africans were “Moors,” straight from the pages of Eurocentric Spanish literature. The criminally repressive Cuban government of the time, however, saw some glimmer of reference in his work to the plight of the hundreds of thousands of real Africans who lived in Cuba. Poor Plácido, the Eurocentric Romantic poet, was executed in 1844 for alleged complicity in a slave uprising. In terms of Cabral’s Dialectical Theory of Identification, Plácido did not advance beyond the first phase, that of “Capitulation.” At this stage, in the words of Frantz Fanon, “the colonized artist’s writings correspond point by point with those of his opposite numbers in the mother country. His inspiration is European and we can easily link up these works with definite trends in the literature of the mother country.”

Scholars have given some attention to the Spanish American equivalent of the slave narrative and the anti-slavery novel. Lorna V. Williams has contributed significantly to our appreciation of this literature with The Representation of Slavery in Cuban Fiction, and Edward J. Mullen’s The Life and Poems of a Cuban Slave: Juan Francisco Manzano 1797–1854 is a useful tool for research on the topic. All of this literature by our broad definition is African-Caribbean, but, in the final analysis it belongs to the “Capitulation” phase. It was absolutely contemporaneous with a vibrant oral literature created by Africans who were slaves for the most part.

In the 1920s when an effete Europe sought renewal in things African; when Picasso and his school turned to and even plagiarized traditional West African principles of composition, when white folks went, as Nicolás Guillén put it, to Harlem and Havana to look for jazz and son, a white-skinned Puerto Rican by the name of Luis Palés Matos began to write a so-called poesía negrissa (focusing on Blacks). The female poetic personae were earthy, sensual, but stereotypically erotic. In his insensitive haste to recreate the spirit of the oral literature and its rhythmic use of repeated strange, non-Spanish words, Palés Matos and his followers (who were many, and almost all white) simply invented mumbo-jumbo sounds. The Cuban Alejo Carpentier is the most important of Palés Matos’s aesthetic progeny, but there were many others: Ramón Guirao, José Z. Tallet, and Emilio Ballagas being the best known. The literary expression of this “Afro-Antillean” school might be deemed to pertain to the second phase of Identification, the “Revitalization” phase.

Nicolás Guillén (see separate entry) took the African-American movement to its fullest potential. His art and that of other African-ancestored Cuban contemporaries, notably, Marcelino Arozarena and Regino Pedroso, attained the third phase, “Radicalization.” This, according to Cabral, is “the fighting phase [when] the native…turns himself into an awakener of the people; hence comes a fighting literature, a revolutionary literature.” The Fanonian model was, however, in Cuba preempted by the Marxist-Leninist revolutionary process in which race consciousness is subsumed under the class struggle. Essentially Guillén and Cuba returned to a version of Afro-Antillean “Revitalization.” Official Cuban culture is locked into this phase, and so even a singularly gifted poet like Nancy Morejón, who is of pronounced African ancestry, tends to eschew any vibrant race consciousness.

In his study Narciso descubre su trasero: el negro en la cultura puertorriqueña, the Puerto Rican scholar Isabelo Zenón Cruz has brilliantly demonstrated that the cultural establishment of his native land still slumbers in “Capitulation.” The same is true for the Dominican Republic. Indeed, it is in Panama and Costa Rica where the blossoms of Guillén’s art have evolved into real fruit. (Although these two countries are culturally Caribbean, they are geographically part of Central America and will be so considered for the purposes of this Encyclopedia). Fanon has argued compellingly that “Radicalization” is the sole route to liberation and hence artistic fullness. There is no reason to question the validity of his theory.

IAN ISIDORE SMART
Further Reading

—Hablen paleros y santeros, Havana: Ciencias Sociales, 1994

Demetrio Aguilera Malta 1909–1981

Ecuadorian prose writer

Demetrio Aguilera Malta brings to his production vast and varied experiences accumulated over the course of his long life. At one point he was a businessman in Guayaquil; at another he reported events of the Spanish Civil War from besieged Madrid; he held diplomatic posts in several Latin American countries and for a period during his youth he lived with the descendants of African and Native Americans on a remote island in the Gulf of Guayaquil. Aguilera Malta began to write and publish before he left high school and his works eventually included poetry, drama, short stories, novels, essays, screenplays and literary criticism. His plays and short stories are to be found in numerous anthologies published in various countries, four of his novels have been translated into several languages and the amount of critical attention his works have received surpasses that of any other Ecuadorian writer save Jorge Icaza, author of Huasipungo, 1934 (The Villagers). Among the claims of the extensive critical literature on Aguilera Malta is that he is one of the first practitioners of the magical realist mode in Latin American fiction.

Aguilera Malta first gained recognition in 1930 along with two other young writers from Ecuador’s coast, Enrique Gil Gilbert (1912–70), and Joaquin Gallegos Lara (1911–47). The three published a collection of short stories, Los que se van: cuentos del cholo i del montuvio [Those Who Go Away: Stories of the Cholo and the Montuvio]. The volume’s twenty-four stories of similar style scandalized Ecuador, while they drew accolades from the international literary community. Quasiethnic peoples of native American and African origin, montuvios, from the mountains, and coastal cholis are the protagonists of telluric incidents that often emphasize the brutal, the violent, and the crude, sometimes to the point of exaggeration. The language of the dialogue imitates coastal, Ecuadorian Spanish, and metaphors reflect the ambience and psychology of the characters. Most innovative at the time of writing is an objective narrative voice which refuses to patronize or denigrate the characters but simply implies that they are as they are. Downtrodden though they may be, the denizens of the Ecuadorian coast retain a vitality which inspires admiration. The volume marked the opening of Ecuador’s Social Realist period and its three authors, together with José de la Cuadra (1903–41) and Alfredo Pareja Diezcanseco (1908–93), came to be known as the Grupo de Guayaquil.

Aguilera Malta wrote about a dozen plays. Recently returned from the Spanish Civil War, he staged his first, España leal, 1938 [Loyal Spain], which was his effort to heighten awareness of the conflict and garner support for the Republican cause. It was followed by Lázaro, 1941 [Lazarus], the tragedy of an inspired school teacher who, for lack of funding for public education, is forced to abandon his calling and to waste his time and talent on petty economic pursuits. Significantly Aguilera Malta wrote the play to raise money for a Guayaquil high school. A job as a reporter in Panama and the Canal Zone heightened his awareness of racial prejudice against Blacks. Dientes blancos, 1956 [White Teeth], denounces racially motivated discrimination, a theme he took up again in Infierno negro, 1967 [Black Hell]. In his monographic study of Aguilera Malta’s dramatic works, Gerardo Luzuriaga demonstrates that Aguilera Malta’s plays can be grouped into three stages which move progressively toward and culminate in the expressionistic theatrical mode of Infierno negro. Aguilera Malta’s most anthologized play, El tigre, 1956 [The Jaguar], deals with a hapless peon obsessed with being devoured by a jaguar. It is developed from an incident in Aguilera Malta’s second novel and will be mentioned below.

Aguilera Malta is best known for his thirteen novels, which fall into four categories. The most important works of his career are two early narratives about people of the Ecuadorian coast, Don Goyo, 1933 and La isla virgen, 1942, [The Virgin Island]. They were followed by a group of three novels written in response to specific political situations and events, the Spanish Civil War, the US occupation of the Panama Canal Zone, and the Cuban Revolution. The third category comprises three biographical-historical novels about Manuela Sáenz, Vasco Núñez de Balboa, and Francisco de Orellana. The last consists of five novels written in the 1970s that are influenced by the Latin American New Novel: Siete lunas y siete serpientes, 1970 (Seven Serpents and Seven Moons); El secuestro del general, 1973 (Babelandia); Jaguar, 1977 [The Jaguar]; Réquiem para el diablo, 1978 [Requiem for the Devil]; and Una pelota, un sueño y diez centavos, 1988 [A Soccer Ball, a Dream, and Ten Cents]. The last novel was left unfinished and published posthumously.

Consistent with his experience, Aguilera Malta’s literary works vary widely in style, subject and theme. The last five are stylistically sophisticated and structurally complex. His first two novels are simple, but they retain greater narrative power and historical importance.

Don Goyo constitutes one of the earliest manifestations of the magical realist mode in Latin American fiction. The non-Western world view manifest in the action and attitude of the characters in Don Goyo sets it apart from earlier works, especially others set in the tropical forest. Don Goyo Químí is the one hundred and fifty-year-old patriarch of an island community in the mouth of the Guayas river. He lives in communion with the tropical forest and is a spiritual extension of it; he is the guardian of an ancient tropical forest culture, and his mission is to preserve the traditional way of life of the island people. Despite his near mythical status in the community, however, he fails to fend off the economic tentacles and cultural influences that emanate from the developed Western world through the Ecuadorian port city of Guayaquil. His death symbolizes the extinction of a tropical forest culture and it is magically marked by the simultaneous fall of the greatest mangrove tree on the island. Reality in the novel is viewed from a native American rather than from a Western perspective. For Don Goyo and the inhabitants of the island the magical incidents portrayed are not miraculous but real and even mundane. Don Goyo’s relationship with nature is symbiotic, not adversarial as it is in Western culture.

The distinct world views presented in Don Goyo are brought more sharply into focus in Aguilera Malta’s second novel, La isla virgen. Again, the action transpires on an island in the Guayas Estuary, but now the comparison of Western and the non-Western cosmovisions is emphasized by dual protagonists who represent contrasting attitudes toward the insular, tropical habitat. Guayamabe, like Don Goyo, is a knowledgeable native of the islands; Don Nestor is the white owner of the island property who has recently taken refuge there, the last of his land holdings, after suffering financial collapse in Guayaquil. At first Nestor presumptuously ignores Guayamabe’s advice and pursues schemes to exploit the Island. In time, however, he comes to recognize that he is dependent on Guayamabe for the cultural keys to adapt and live on the island, while in the process Guayamabe assumes the role of Nestor’s guru in a surprisingly egalitarian relationship between European and native American.

The episode from La isla virgen that is the basis for the play El tigre takes place in a remote area of the island tropical forest, Guayamabe tries to rescue a peon, Aguayo, who is pursued over the course of several days by a jaguar. Aguayo is not from the area and is overwhelmed by the alien ambiance. His generalized fear crystalizes in an obsession with being devoured by the jaguar, and the jaguar, magically attracted by Aguayo’s fear and disorientation, tenaciously stalks his victim. The fascinating episode was dramatized as El tigre and developed into a novel Jaguar.

Of the five novels written in the 1970s Siete lunas y siete serpientes is the most widely read. It is a parable about contemporary Latin America, cast in the archetypical framework of apocalyptic struggle, and set in a mythical town, Santorontón, similar to many towns on the Ecuadorian coast. The social, economic, political, and cultural problems that wrack Latin America are played out in microcosm by characters such as a stern but socially committed priest, a homicidal colonel, a partially burned, talking crucifix and a black shaman. The work’s sophisticated treatment of issues and its broad focus on Latin America create a distance that sets it apart from Don Goyo with its simple, intimate portrayal of life on a mangrove-laden island off the Ecuadorian coast. It is an irony of literary history that while Aguilera Malta’s last five novels are influenced by the technical innovations and success of the writers of the Boom in Latin American fiction, Don Goyo, with its magical vision of reality, was a corner-stone for what would eventually become the Latin American New Novel.

C.MICHAEL WAAG
Biography

Born in Guayaquil, Ecuador, 24 May 1909. Attended Colegio Rocafuerte, Guayaquil. Founder member of the Ecuadorian Socialist Party, 1926. Studied law for two years at University of Guayaquil. Spent five years living on an island in the Gulf of Guayaquil with the local inhabitants, of American Indian and African descent. Impact of this experience evident in his creative writing. In 1930s earned his living partly from journalism. Moved to Panama in 1932; editor of the review Hoy. Awarded studentship at University of Salamanca, 1936, but unable to take it up because of outbreak of Spanish Civil War. Joined Spanish Republican forces and worked as journalist. Returned to Ecuador in 1937 and appointed Under Secretary at Ministry of Education. Visiting Professor at universities in Guatemala, Mexico, Brazil and United States, 1939–43. Later cultural attaché in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Mexico and Uruguay. Invested all his money in a film, La cadena infinita [The Infinite Chain], which was a commercial failure. Returned to Ecuador where he made a film about the Salasaca Indians. Also made internationally acclaimed documentary film on the Rio de Janeiro carnival. Established publishing house in Quito to produce very cheap paperbacks, but this venture failed. Died in Mexico City, 29 December 1981.

Selected Works

Poetry
Primavera interior, in collaboration with Jorge Pérez Concha, Guayaquil, Ecuador: Imprenta de la Sociedad Filantrópica del Guayas, 1927
El libro de los mangleros, Guayaquil, Ecuador: n.p., 1929

Short Fiction
Los que se van: cuentos del cholo i del montuvio, in collaboration with Joaquín Gallegos Lara and Enrique Gil Gilbert, Guayaquil: Zea y Paladines, 1930
Hechos y leyendas de nuestra América: relatos hispánicos, Mexico City: Talleres Gráficos de la Nación, 1975

Novels
Don Goyo, Madrid: Cenit 1933; as Don Goyo, translated by John S.Brushwood and Carolyn Brushwood, Clifton, New Jersey: Humana Press, 1980
C.Z. (Canal Zone): los yanquis en Panamá, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1935
Madrid: reportaje novelado de una retaguardia heroica, Barcelona: Orion, 1936
La isla virgen, Guayaquil, Ecuador: Vera y Compañía, 1942
Una cruz en la Sierra Maestra, Buenos Aires: Sophos, 1960
El Quijote de El Dorado: Orellana y el Río de las Amazonas, Madrid: Ediciones Guadarrama, 1964
Un nuevo mar para el rey: Balboa, Anayansi y el Océano Pacífico, Madrid: Ediciones Guadarrama, 1965
Siete lunas y siete serpientes, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1970; as Seven Serpents and Seven Moons, translated by Gregory Rabassa, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1979
El secuestro del general, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1973; as Babelandia, translated by Peter G.Earle, Clifton, New Jersey: Humana Press, 1985
Jaguar, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1977 Réquiem para el diablo, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1978
Una pelota, un sueño y diez centavos, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1988

Plays
España leal: tragedia en un prólogo y tres actos, el último dividido en tres cuadros, Quito: Ministerio de Educación, 1938
“Lázaro: caricaturas; tres escenas y un prólogo,” Revista del Colegio Nacional Vicente Rocafuerte 2 (October 1941)
“Amor y vino,” in collaboration with Willis Knapp Jones, Revista de la Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, vol. 2/3 (1946)
Dos comedias fáciles, Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1950 [Includes Sangre azul and El pirata fantasma]
“No bastan los átomos” y “Dientes blancos,” Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1955
El tigre: pieza en un acto dividido en tres cuadros, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1956
Inferno negro: pieza en dos actos, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1967; as “Black Hell,” translated by Elizabeth Lowe, Modern International Drama 10 (Spring 1977)
“Una mujer para cada acto,” in collaboration with Velia Márquez in Tres comedias, Mexico City: Finisterre, 1970

Compilations and Anthologies
Trilogía ecuatoriana, teatro breve, Mexico City: Andrea, 1959 Teatro completo, Mexico City: Finisterre, 1970

Further Reading
Fama, Anthony, “Entrevista con Demetrio Aguilera Malta,” Chasqui 7 (May 1978)
——Realismo mágico en la narrativa de Aguilera Malta, Madrid: Playor, 1978
Fama, Michael H., “El secuestro del general, El pueblo soy yo y ‘La desmitificación del caudillo,’’ Revista Iberoamericana 10 (Summer 1980)
Heise, Karl H., El grupo de Guayaquil: arte y técnica de sus novelas sociales, Madrid: Playor, 1975
——Del realismo al expresionismo: el teatro de Aguilera Malta, Madrid: Ediciones Plaza Mayor, 1971
——“Absurdity, Hyperbole and the Grotesque in Demetrio Aguilera Malta’s Last Novel, Requiem para el diablo,” SECOLAS Annals 20 (March 1989)
José Agustín 1944–

Mexican prose writer and dramatist

José Agustín is one of the Mexican writers credited with creating the type of novel known as la Onda (New Wave or “Hip” writing), a form of literary expression that appeared in Mexico in the mid-1960s and continued up to the 1970s. La Onda established a new generation of Mexican authors characterized by rebellion against the status quo, an interest in rock and roll, jazz and street language, together with the influence of Sartrean Existentialism, and of European art movies, particularly by directors such as Fellini and Visconti.

Agustín’s first novel, La tumba, 1964 [The Tomb], is concerned with the lack of communication among parents and children, the overthrow of bourgeois values, and the disintegration of the nuclear family in contemporary urban society. The novel provides a negative vision of Mexican society through the eyes of an adolescent who could not care less about his life: “Porque no voy a ningún lado. Porque odio la vida” (Because I’m not going anywhere. Because I hate life). Agustín utilizes the speech of adolescents to criticize on the one hand, the upper middle class, and on the other, to provide a prophetic vision of events that will occur in Mexico four years later (the 1968 Tlatelolco massacre of students). If in 1964 adolescents in Mexico were hostile to the political system because of its corruption, conservative values and outdated traditions, they would exploit in 1968 the radical politics that united university-based adolescents in the Western world who were intent on transforming their societies. Thus La tumba gives voice to a young generation of Latin American adolescents who were seeking control over their own lives, access to freedom and power, and participation in the social, political, educational, and economic aspects of Third World countries. At the same time, Agustín is not averse to satirizing the antiEstablishment posturing of his own contemporaries and his early novels are not to be viewed simply as Mexico’s answer to James Dean in the field of letters.

La tumba shares with Ciudades desiertas, 1982 [Deserted Cities], the transgression of women in society, the quest for individual identity and the demystification of male chauvinism. The novel critiques machismo and foregrounds women’s feelings and beliefs together with their struggle for both power and the satisfaction of their sexual needs. The female character in this novel leaves everything behind: her home, her husband, her country, her work, and her academic career. Her quest involves a transgression of the status quo and the search for her own space.

In spite of the power that the female character wields in the specific contexts of family and class, she still wishes to achieve control over her husband through gender struggle. Agustín once more breaks with the gender hierarchy on two levels: by providing the feminine discourse with independence and power; and by demystifying the concept of the Mexican macho, something which is achieved by creating a male character who happens to be understanding and nice: “Jamás hiciste de comer ¿no? nunca quisiste tener un hijo” (You never cooked a meal right? You never wanted to have a child). Agustín uses the masculine discourse to make the feminine voice aware of her search: “Que huir de mí en realidad significa huir de ti” (That in fact by running away from me you are running away from yourself). Ciudades desiertas is the voice of a new generation of women in society, who wish not only to achieve a better position in the patriarchal structures, but also to obtain the freedom that will allow them to satisfy all their needs as human beings. The novel also represents an example of young Latin American couples who truly believe that communication and mutual respect will help to make the necessary transformation in their societies that are ruled by a male-dominated power structure.

Dos horas de sol, 1994 [Two Hours of Sun] shares with La tumba and Ciudades desiertas the search for identity, the use of humor, of popular speech, and of double meanings. In this work Agustín utilizes a journalistic report as a device to denounce the discrimination against minority groups (women, and the economically unprivileged), the controversies of The Free Trade Agreement among Mexico, Canada and the US (NAFTA), the denial of popular culture, the consequences of modernity, the corruption of Mexico’s Institutionalized Revolutionary Party (P.R.I), the silence of subalterns, the games of power and the ecological problem.

In Dos horas de sol, Acapulco represents the various strata of contemporary Mexican society and therefore the report is a mere excuse to provide the reader with a guided tour of an unjust society. The bad weather and the forecast of a hurricane clearly point to the country’s ailing economy, with the hurricane destroying the illusions of prosperity fostered by politicians.

Even though a feminine presence is established here through two American women, the gender struggle is overwhelmed by the masculine discourse that develops into a stronger bid for power. Agustín emphasizes authority over the petty bourgeoisie and the poor: “Para que notara quien era la autoridad, Tranquilo le indicó al Nigromante que no nada más grabara la conversación sino que también tomase notas” (Tranquilo, in order to show his friend who the boss was, asked him not only to record the interview, but also to take notes). The isolation (from Mexico City to Acapulco) and existentialist crisis function as a means of discovering personal identity and space: “Es mi vida la que se está yendo, fue lo único que pude pensar” (It’s my life that is ebbing away, that was all I could think of). Dos horas de sol is the voice of the masculine intellectual who rebels against oppression, questions the paradigms of obedience and power, and the avowed plans to preserve the natural resources of the nation.

In La tumba, Ciudades desiertas and Dos horas de sol, Agustín is revealed as an author who is committed to speak out for subaltern groups in Mexico, largely marginalized and ignored by those in authority.

JUAN ANTONIO SERNA

Biography

Born José Agustín Ramírez Gómez in Huatla, a small town in the state of Oaxaca, Mexico, 19 August 1944. Spent most of his childhood and adolescence in Acapulco, a city whose atmosphere made a considerable impact on him. Worked there in a travel agency and as a hotel clerk. Attended the prestigious Simón Bolivar school in Mexico City, a place that he detested.

Family settled in the Navarte district of Mexico City in 1955. At the age of sixteen married Margarita Dalton, political radical and sister of the poet Roque Dalton. Couple eloped to Cuba and participated in the literacy campaign of 1960–61. Later (in 1963) married, divorced and remarried Margarita Bermúdez. His works were best-sellers in the mid-1960s, but he could not handle the attendant publicity. Developed serious interest in film and adapted works by José Revueltas, Malcolm Lowry and Gabriel García Márquez. After the break up of his second marriage he turned to the study of psychoanalysis and to experimenting with drugs. Arrested on a drugs charge and spent seven months in Lecumberri prison. After his release he remarried Margarita Bermúdez and they had three sons, Andrés (1972), Jesús (1973) and Agustín (1975). Wrote a novel and a play (Círculo vicioso) based on his prison experiences: the authorities did not grant permission to have the play performed. Visiting Professor at universities in Irvine, Denver and New Mexico. Awarded the Juan Ruiz de Alarcón Prize, 1974, for Círculo vicioso; Colina Prize, 1982, for Ciudades desiertas.

Selected Works

Novels
- La tumba, Mexico City: Mester, 1964
- De perfil, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1966
- La nueva música clásica, Mexico City: Cuadernos de la Juventud, 1968
- Abolición de la propiedad, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1969
- Se está haciendo tarde, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1973
- Círculo vicioso, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1974
- La mirada en el centro, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1977
- Ciudades desiertas, Mexico City: Edivisión, 1982,
- Confrontaciones, Mexico City: UNAM, 1984
- Furor matutino, Mexico City: Diana, 1985
- Ahi viene la plaga, Mexico City: Diana, 1985
- El rock de la cárcel, Mexico City: Editores Mexicanos Unidos, 1985
- Cerca del fuego, Mexico City: Plaza y Janés, 1986
- No hay censura, Mexico City: Primera Narrativa Hispánica, 1988
- No pases esta puerta, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1992
- La miel derramada, Mexico City: Planeta, 1992
- Dos horas de sol, Mexico City: Seix Barral, 1994

Short Fiction
- Inventando que sueño, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1968
- El rey se acerca a su templo, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1978

Further Reading

Rojas, Mario, “José Agustín y el ‘rock’ como poética,” in Spanish American Literature and Popular Culture, edited by Rose S. Minc, Gaithersburg, Maryland: Hispamérica, 1981

Interviews

Teichmann, Reinhard, De la onda en adelante: conversaciones con 21 novelistas mexicanos, Mexico City: Posada, 1987

---

Delmira Agustini 1886–1914

Uruguayan poet

“Of all the women who today write poetry, none has moved me more than Delmira Agustini,” wrote Rubén Darío in 1912. More than eighty years after her tragic and premature death at the age of twenty eight, killed, perhaps, by her former husband who afterwards shot himself, Agustini’s poetry still “moves” all who read it. Agustini’s life and work are still shrouded in mystery. How could a young woman with little formal education (she was educated mostly at home) write such accomplished poems? How could such a woman—overprotected and smothered in the bosom of a traditional, upper-middle-class family—dare to write and publish some of the most erotic feminine poems of her time?

The central topic of Agustini’s poetry is love, and the desire to satisfy her spiritual and erotic needs; one recurring motif is the female subject lying in her bed, waiting for the visit of her nocturnal lover. In Agustini’s poems the delights of the body acquired independent value. Further, they became an art, spiritualized in powerful images, sprouting up when least expected like “gigantic mushrooms.”

Agustini wrote at a time when the Modernismo introduced by Darío had outmoded the Romantic movement; she carried the sensuality and eroticism expressed in some of Dario’s poems to new limits. The poems in El libro blanco, 1907 [The White Book], may still be considered Romantic. They express feelings of love in a sentimental and exalted manner, although the influence of the modernistas such as Rubén Darío, Julio Herrera y
Reissig, and Leopoldo Lugones can be recognized particularly in the images: the ivory tower, swans, statues, irises, precious stones, mythological flowers and animals, mysterious castles and even more mysterious princesses.

Although at this point Agustini had not yet perfected her poetic style, her preoccupation with language and form appealing directly to the senses and emotions is evident. For example, the first two lines of the sonnet “El intruso” [The Intruder] illustrate the emotions and suffering of her tortured and captive soul: “Amor, la noche estaba trágica y sollozante /cuando tu llave de oro entró en mi cerradura” (Love, the night was tragic and sobbing /When your gold key sang in my lock).

From her second collection, Cantos de la mañana, 1910 [Morning Songs], to the posthumous Los astros del abismo, 1924 [The Stars of the Abyss], Agustini’s poems became more passionate and sexually explicit; they also showed an increasing fixation with suffering, the passage of time and death. A reading of Agustini’s poems play a dual role; while they project feeling of love and wonder, they also elicit sensations of anguish; there are passionate odes that turn themselves into funereal songs. Two lines from “El rosario de Eros” [The Rosary of Eros] depict these themes: “Los lechos negros logran la más fuerte/Rosa de amor; arraigan en la muerte.” (Black beds bear the strongest/rose of love, they are rooted in death).

Agustini wrote during a period of profound historical, social, and cultural change in Uruguay. Intellectual and social life was characterized by openness to diverse positions and currents. Nevertheless, this turn-of-the-century openness did not necessarily mean more sexual freedom for women. It is not surprising, then, that Agustini’s poems were met with both admiration and astonishment in Montevideo’s intellectual community. Instead of rebuffing or admonishing the unusual eroticism in Agustini’s work, her male contemporaries referred to her as a “child prodigy,” even though she was twenty when she published her first collection.

Agustini’s poems expressed for the first time, and without modesty, woman’s desire for complete union (and parity) with man. Whether she intended to or not, she forged the path which would be followed by Alfonsina Storni of Argentina, Gabriela Mistral of Chile, her compatriot, Juana de Ibarbourou, and others who use sexual imagery to express their most intimate desires as women.

RENÉE SCOTT

Biography

Born in Montevideo, Uruguay, 24 October 1886. Daughter of members of the bourgeoisie. Protected by mother’s possessive love. Poetry developed from a distraction into a passion, but although well read she never had a library. Thus it is said that her poetry is not heavily influenced by the work of others. Using, perhaps not without irony, the pseudonym “joujou” (a French word for toy), she wrote about women intellectuals and artists of her time. Agustini developed something of a split personality: female intellectual and young lady. Married a horse trader, Enrique Job Reyes, 14 August 1913, but left her husband six weeks later and began divorce proceedings. However, the couple continued to meet in rooms furnished according to Delmira’s taste and their unusual, tormented relationship ended only when both died a violent death together. It is not known whether their death, on 6 July 1914, was the result of a suicide pact or whether Enrique Reyes first shot his wife and then himself.
Selected Works

Poetry

El libro blanco, Montevideo: O.M. Bertani, 1907 [With a prologue and illustrations] Cantos de la mañana, Montevideo: O.M. Bertani, 1910
Los cálices vacíos, Montevideo: O.M. Bertani, 1913
Los astros del abismo, Montevideo: M. García, 1924
El rosario de Eros, Montevideo: M. García, 1924

Compilations and Anthologies

Poesías completas, prologue by A. Zum Felde, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1944
Poesías completas, edited by Magdalena García Pinto, Madrid: Cátedra, 1993

Further Reading

The “tabloid” circumstances of Agustini’s death have tended to distract attention from her literary production and little serious criticism was produced before the 1980s.

García Pinto, Magdalena, “Eros in Reflection: the Poetry of Delmira Agustini,” Review 48 (Spring 1994) [Includes several of Agustini’s poems in translation]
Loynaz, Dulce María, “Delmira Agustini,” in her Ensayos literarios, Salamanca: Ediciones Universidad de Salamanca, 1993 [Dulce María Loynaz had an extremely high opinion of Agustini’s poetry, and says in this well-informed article that she would have liked to have written a study of her work]
Molloy, Sylvia, “Dos lecturas del cisne: Rubén Darío y Delmira Agustini,” in La sartén por el mango, edited by Patricia Elena González and Eliana Ortega, Rio Piedras, Puerto Rico: Huracán, 1985

Íntima

Poem from El Libro blanco by Delmira Agustini
As in most of Agustini’s poems, the subject of “Íntima” is love. The poetic voice addresses an ideal lover who will liberate her from a world in which she feels imprisoned. The poem is too long to be quoted in its entirety here:

¡Ah! tú sabrás mi amor. mas viajamos lejos

Íntima
a través de la noche florecida;
Acá lo humano asusta, acá se oye, se ve, se siente sin cesar la vida.

[Ah! You will know my love, but we travel far, /Across the flowering night; /Here what is human frightens, here life/Is endlessly heard, seen, felt].

The tone of the poem is pessimistic. The speaker in the poem feels alone, misunderstood, and yearns to satisfy her spiritual and carnal desires, something she realizes is impossible.

The poem contains erotically-charged images, uncommon at the time they were written:

Vamos más lejos en la noche, vamos
donde ni un eco repercuta en mí, como una flor nocturna allá en la sombra
Yo abriré dulcemente para tí.

[Let us go further into the night, let us go/where not even an echo rebounds within me, /Like a nocturnal flower over there in the shadows/I will sweetly open for you].

The spirit of the poem is still Romantic, although modernista undertones surface with the images of the ivory tower, the cross, icy tombs and Olympus. There is an evident search for musical forms in which to express ideas and states of mind. Also present are two constant themes in her poetry: tragic destiny and erotic desire.

Otra estirpe

Poem from Los cálices vacíos by Delmira Agustini
Here, the speaker in the poem no longer addresses a flesh and blood lover, but rather Eros, God of Love, to whom she offers Los cálices vacíos, recognizing that only a supreme force would be able to satisfy her most intimate yearnings and be worthy of her surrender.

Feminine sexuality is expressed openly in this poem. Eros is presented as a human being to whom the poet wishes to make love in order to satisfy her unlimited desire. The language and the images surge naturally throughout the poem to express an intense and pathetic eroticism. The poem is quoted in its entirety:
Eros, yo quiero guiarte, Padre ciego…
Pido a tus manos todopoderosas,
¡su cuerpo excels o derramado en fuego
Sobre mi cuerpo desmayado en rosas!
La eléctrica corola que hoy despliego
Brinda el nectar io de un jardín de Esposas; para sus buitres en mi carne entrego
Todo un enjambre de palomas rosas!
Da a las dos sierpes de su abrazo, crueles,
Mi gran tallo febril… Absintio, mieles,
Viérteme de sus venas, de su boca…
¡Así tendida soy un surco ardiente,
Donde puede nutrirse la simiente,
De otra Estirpe sublimamente loca!

[Eros, I wish to guide you, Blind father/I ask for your all-powerful hands,/His sublime body overflowing on fire/upon my body swooning among the roses!/The electric corola that I spread out today/Offers all the nectar of a Brides’ garden;/to its vultures I deliver with my flesh/An entire swarm of rose-coloured doves!/Give my great febrile stem to the cruel embrace of the two serpents…/Absinthe, honey,/Pour me out of his veins, his mouth…/Thus spread out I am a furrow on fire/Where the seed of sublimely mad new beings may be nourished!]

The erotic tension in the poem is constructed on opposite elements: fire/rose, vultures/doves, and as in other Agustini’s poems sexual desire is associated with death, as the final stanza makes clear.

Los cálices vacíos contains twelve poems, and each one, by virtue of images charged with mystery and beauty, is a small literary gem, the manifestations of a gifted woman whose extraordinary voluptuousness is sublimated in poetry.

RENÉE SCOTT
poems translated by Renée Scott and Verity Smith

Editions

First editions: El libro blanco, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1907
Los cálices vacíos, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1913
Claribel Alegría 1924

Salvadorean prose writer, poet and literary translator

The work of Claribel Alegría is finally attracting the critical attention it deserves after decades of relative obscurity. She is now being acknowledged as one of Central America’s foremost poetic voices. Much of this belated attention is the result of the formidable task undertaken by her translators (Darwin Flakoll, Amanda Hopkinson and Carolyn Forché among others) in bringing her work to the attention of an international English-speaking public. Alegría’s work encompasses a considerable range of genres, incorporating poetry, novels, novellas and short stories. Like many other women writers in Latin America, she has also published for children and displays a keen interest in literary translation. In collaboration with her husband, Darwin Flakoll, Claribel Alegría has translated (either into or from Spanish) the work of a range of writers, including Salman Rushdie, Robert Graves and Miguel Ángel Asturias.

There is an undoubted political resonance in Alegría’s work, articulated directly, but also ironically and allegorically in many of her poems and stories. Forceful too is the prevailing presence of women in Alegría’s work and her commitment to invest the voiceless with the power of the word. There is a palpable sense of solidarity throughout her work, though perhaps it is in her later prose works like Album familiar, 1982, (Family Album) and No me agarran viva, 1983 (They Won’t Take Me Alive) that this becomes more evident. Much of Alegría’s work is realist narrative, with straightforward plot lines invested with multiple layers of symbolic meaning. Luisa en el país de la realidad, 1987 (Luisa in Realityland), deviates most obviously from this path with its unusual structure of poems, vignettes and short stories.

Such a range of literary output renders any critical analysis challenging and, up to the mid-1990s, only one book—a collection of essays on her work—has been published (1994). It is rather useful for the purpose of analysis to employ her own terminology which she has devised to compartmentalise her work. She labels one strand of her work “crisis journalism;” her direct response to the political situation in Central America, which finds its best expression in her testimonial work. The second strand is better defined as literary poetics or the more lyrical subjective strand, and this one is manifested eloquently by her many collections of poetry.

Alegría is probably best known as a poet, and she has published fifteen collections of poetry since 1948. Her early poetry is lyrical, sensuous and introverted but the recurring motifs of her work—suffering, silence and death are all present in these collections; Anillo de silencio [Ring of Silence], Vigilias [Vigils], Acuario [Aquarium], and Huésped de mi tiempo [Guest of My Time]. The call at the end of one of her first poems “Aquí estoy” (Here I Am) for an island without protective walls, where all voices can be heard, is one which reverberates throughout her poetic career: “Y llévame a una isla sin murallas/donde lleguen a mí todas las voces.” (And take me to an island without stout walls/where every voice may reach me.)

Alegría isolates the Cuban Revolution of 1959 as a turning point in her literary trajectory and one which made her work overtly political. She has always distanced herself from any categorisation as a political poet saying: “I consider my poetry love poems to my people.” She defines Central America, however, as her major obsession, which she cannot help but confront in her poetry.

There are many notable influences on Alegría’s poetry, mainly Juan Ramón Jiménez with whom she studied in Washington, DC while pursuing a degree course in the Arts. Emily Dickinson is another poet to whom Alegría is much indebted, to the extent that she has even suggested that she could be accused of plagiarism. This influence is perhaps most noticeable in the 1978 collection Sobrevivo [I Survive] which won a Casa de las Américas prize, confirming Alegría as a poet of international stature.

Archbishop Romero’s assassination in San Salvador (1980) proved to be another decisive moment in Alegría’s career and the ensuing decade saw her interest in politics receive vivid expression in her work. The yearning to articulate the pain of her own exile from El Salvador (she returned only in 1991 and has chosen to live in Nicaragua and Mallorca since 1982) is fervently evoked in her poem “Mallorca—mi paraíso” [Majorca—My Paradise] in which she details the phantoms that crowd her thoughts and restrict her attempts to gain peace of mind. The 1980s saw a more sustained interest in fiction but she returned to what she terms her “pasión” in 1987 with the publication of Luisa en el país de la realidad, translated as Luisa in Realityland and published, interestingly, before the Spanish version. Luisa en el país de la realidad is a series of anecdotes, poems and vignettes that interweave to create a fragmented picture of its young protagonist Luisa. The autobiographical tone of the book is unmistakeable, a tone that permeates many other prose works by Alegría, for example El detén, 1977 [The Detainee] and Cenizas de Izalco, 1966 (Ashes of Izalco). Luisa en el país de la realidad is a complex portrait of female identity and is in many ways Alegría’s most mature work. The feminist concerns of her work are forcefully present but are couched in humorous and ironic terms, as in Luisa’s prayer at First Communion: “Niñito Jesús,” dijo Luisa en voz baja, “Yo no me quiero casar, no me gusta como son los hombres con las mujeres, pero quiero tener un hijo, niñito Jesús. La Chaba dice que sólo las mujeres casadas pueden tener hijos, por eso yo te pido con toda mi alma que me case y que cuando tenga el niño mi marido se muera. La hostia se le acabó de deshacer en la boca y Luisa levantó la mirada. Una sonrisa beatífica la iluminaba el rostro.” (“Dear Little Jesus,” Luisa said under her breath, “I don’t want to be married; I don’t like the way men treat women, but I do want to have a baby, Dear Jesus, and Chabe says that only married women can have babies. So that’s why I ask you with all my heart to let me get married, and as soon as I have my baby, to let my husband die.” The host dissolved in her mouth, and Luisa lifted her gaze, a beatific smile illuminating her features.)

Much of her other poetry is of the testimonial kind or the related “letras de emergencia” (emergency letters), in which the terror and the threat of successive political regimes in El Salvador are elegantly expressed, but indirectly and often ironically. Revealing examples of this are the poems “Pequeña patria” [Little Homeland] and “Mis adioses” [My Goodbyes] from the collection Aprendizaje, 1970 [Apprenticeship]. Alegría has definitively returned again to poetry and has been writing a long autobiographical poem entitled “Umbrales” [Thresholds], published in 1996.

Alegría’s earliest attempt at prose (with the exception of a book of children’s stories published in 1958) was a joint project with her husband Darwin Flakoll. The very successful Cenizas de Izalco details the events of the 1932 massacre (La Matanza) that took place when government troops brutally slaughtered over 30,000 peasants after a peaceful uprising. Alegría testified personally to these events and remained traumatized for many years afterwards by the tragic scenes witnessed in the aftermath of the uprising. Cenizas de Izalco, in common with her poetry, does not deal with the terror directly, but recounts the story of illicit love between the protagonist’s mother, Carmen, and her North American lover, Frank. The affair is recalled by his diaries, found many years after Carmen’s death, and read now by her daughter. Impeccably crafted, the diaries are a painful reconstruction of Carmen’s life and a cathartic method of release for the protagonist who is trying to come to terms with her mother’s death. They also bear eloquent testimony to the massacre; the violence erupts in the final section and has a catatonic effect that is savage and compelling. The book is a remarkable narrative skein that aims to excavate and recover El Salvador’s past. Ironically, Cenizas de Izalco has been a secondary school textbook in El Salvador since 1977, benefitting from some more progressive tendencies within the Ministry of Education. It successfully passed the government’s official censors due possibly to its subtle and often muted critical treatment of the political regime.

This joint project was the first of many undertaken with Darwin Flakoll and efforts to recreate parts of her country’s history were realized again in 1983 with the publication of No me agarran viva. This project was the first of two experiments with the testimonial form of the novel. No me agarran viva is a deftly constructed collage of interviews, observations and historical background that recounts the story of one of the guerrilleras during the struggle of the FMLN (Farabundo Martí Liberation Front). It is a powerful and sensitive portrait of Eugenia as revolutionary, leader, mother and political visionary. The English translation of No me agarran viva in 1987 ensured a greater reading public for Alegría and secured her reputation as a writer with major political concerns. The experiment with testimonio was repeated in 1984 with Para romper el silencio [To Break the Silence]. In this novel Alegría reconstructs a series of interviews with Salvadorean prisoners. The concern with the voiceless and the silenced of El Salvador’s society is again articulated.

Alegría continues to write, publishing On the Front Line (an anthology of guerilla poetry with Darwin Flakoll) in 1990 and has recently devoted much time to literary translation (a translation of thirty Irish poems is forthcoming). She continues to travel extensively in a bid to communicate part of her Central American heritage to a wider public. In her poetry, prose, translations and other work she has left a resounding legacy that poignantly captures the intersection of her private self with that of the social and historical dimension of her people.

Biography

Born in Esteli, Nicaragua, 12 May 1924, but grew up in El Salvador and considers herself Salvadorean. Family forced into political exile in El Salvador, 1925. Attended José Ingenieros school, El Salvador, 1929; finishing school, Hammond, Louisiana, 1943; won scholarship and spent summer term at Loyola University, New Orleans, 1944; George Washington University, Washington, DC, received B.A.in 1948. Married Darwin J.Flakoll in 1947; three daughters and one son. First poetry collection published, 1948. Moved to Mexico, 1951 and to Santiago de Chile, 1953 where she and her husband worked on an anthology of Latin American writers;

Selected Works

Poetry

Anillo de silencio, Mexico City: Botas, 1948
Suite de amor, angustia y soledad, San Rafael, Mendoza: Brigadas Líricas, 1951
Vigilias, Mexico City: Poesía de America, 1953
Acuario, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1955
Huésped de mi tiempo, Buenos Aires: Américalee, 1961
Vía única, Montevideo: Alfa, 1965
Aprendizaje, San Salvador: Editorial Universitaria, 1970
Pagaré a cobrar y otros poemas, Barcelona: Ocnos, 1973
Sobrevivo, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1978
Y este poema-rió, Managua: Nueva Nicaragua, 1988
Variaciones en clave de mí, Madrid: Libertarias/Prodhufi, 1993

Novels and Short Fiction

El detén, Barcelona: Lumen, 1977
Pueblo de Dios y de mandinga, Mexico City: Era, 1985
Despierta mi bien, despierta, San Salvador: UCA, 1986

Testimonial and Other Writings

Tres cuentos, San Salvador: Ministry of Culture, 1958 [for children]
Para romper el silencio, Mexico City: Era, 1984 [testimonial]
Somoza, expediente cerrado, la historia de un ajusticiamiento, in collaboration with Darwin J.Flakoll, Managua: Latino Editores, 1993
Further Reading

Arenal, Electra, “Two Poets of the Sandinista Struggle,” Feminist Studies, vol. 7/1 (1981) [Discussion of Sobrevivo and Línea de fuego by Gioconda Belli]
Beverley, John and Marc Zimmerman, Literature and Politics in the Central American Revolutions, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990 [Alegria is discussed in the chapter on Salvadoran revolutionary poetry]
——— “Remembering the Dead: Latin American Women’s ‘Testimonial’ Discourse,” Latin American Perspectives, vol. 18/3 (Summer 1991) [On No me agarran viva and Flowers from the Volcano]

Interviews

José de Alencar 1829–1877

Brazilian novelist

José de Alencar was not the first Brazilian novelist, but he did establish the genre as central to the nation’s literature. This was a more considerable accomplishment than it might appear today, when we take for granted the utility of prose fiction as a vehicle for communicating both emotions and ideas. In the 1850s, however, when Alencar began experimenting with the novel, Brazilian intellectuals generally viewed the novel with a combination of disdain and trepidation. The novel, in their eyes, was a very recent European invention, far inferior in literary quality and potential to poetry and didactic prose. It was seen as very much a popular genre, designed to appeal to the poorly-educated and unsophisticated. Moreover, the novel’s popularity among unsophisticated readers—a group defined, at this point, as including all of the nation’s very small number of female readers—made it appear particularly dangerous to the traditional values and social stability of Brazil. Such readers might not be able to distinguish between reality and fiction, and might come to believe that the social patterns reflected in contemporary European fiction—for example, the idea that true romantic love could overcome parental opposition and disparities of social class—could or should apply within the far more rigid and hierarchical context of Brazilian society, a society in which virtually all upper-class marriages were arranged.

Near the end of his life, Alencar claimed to have begun his career as a novelist with a master plan to produce a series of texts, a tapestry of all of Brazilian life and history from before the arrival of the Portuguese in 1500 to the second half of the 19th century; those texts would refine or initiate a set of subgenres of the novel—the indianist novel, the Brazilian historical novel, the regionalist novel, and the novel of urban life. The end result, as he very accurately described it, was the creation of an independent national literature in prose. He appears to have believed, moreover, that this goal was a natural extension of his family’s important role in the nation’s political independence during the 1820s.

In fact, however, there was no master plan; Alencar became a novelist almost by chance, and the fundamental changes he brought to the genre in Brazil were in large measure the result of circumstance and of his efforts to respond to the special challenges the novel confronted within the context of Brazilian society. In 1856, Alencar published a series of pseudonymous letters attacking the form and conception of an indianist epic by one of the founders of Brazilian romanticism, Domingos José Gonçalves de Magalhães (1811–82); these letters make it clear that Alencar, while unhappy with this particular text, still believed that epic poetry was the only genre suitable for the expression of national history and national pride. At the same time, eager to boost the circulation of the newspaper he edited in Rio de Janeiro, Alencar began serializing his first novel, Cinco minutos [Five Minutes]. This sentimental novel of mystery and passion was well-received by his readers, and he began a second serialization, A viuvinha [The Widow], early in 1857.

As Alencar wrote A viuvinha, however, he quite suddenly came to an important realization: Brazilian fiction was not necessarily limited to contemporary settings. He stopped the serialization of A viuvinha and began publishing O guarani [The Guarani
Indian], the first Indianist novel. O guarani’s 17th-century setting, Alencar discovered, allowed him to finesse the central problem of earlier Brazilian novels: the need to combine realistic descriptions of contemporary urban environments familiar to his readers with imported plot structures which were inherently unrealistic within the context of Brazilian society. Novels set in the national past or in the distant and unknown interior of Brazil could ignore reality or, more precisely, could create their own reality—and that created reality could be utilized to construct both a mythic national history and a national identity.

This concept of the novel as national mythology can be seen in O guarani and in Alencar’s historical novels about the colonial past, but is clearest in his 1865 masterpiece, Iracema (Iracema, the Honey-Lips, a Legend of Brazil), the most overtly mythical of all 19th-century novels of the Americas. This charming and deeply poetic tale of the beautiful Indian maiden Iracema and her Portuguese lover Martim Soares Moreno, set on the coast of Ceará in the early 16th century, remains the most popular of all Brazilian novels. At a deeper level, the relationship between Iracema, the “virgin of the forests” whose name is an anagram of “America,” and Martim, “the warrior of the sea,” is a national Genesis; Iracema dies at the novel’s end, symbolizing the inevitable destruction of the Indian world, but she first gives birth to their son Moacir, whose name means “child of pain.” Moacir, the fusion of the Indian and Portuguese pasts, the product of both the forests and the sea, is the first Brazilian.

Alencar and his readers viewed his regionalist novels—descriptions of the landscapes and customs of specific regions of the nation—as equally important in establishing a national identity. Alencar largely invented the regionalist sub-genre in his O gaúcho [The Gaucho] of 1870. It is one mark of the novelist’s enduring influence that subsequent writers, intimately familiar with the areas Alencar described in his regionalist fiction but which he, in most cases, had never actually visited, have frequently felt compelled to reproduce his quite inaccurate descriptions of those regions.

At the same time, Alencar continued to produce a few novels of contemporary Brazilian urban life. These texts have long been overshadowed by his Indianist and regionalist fiction, but have recently attracted considerable attention. It is increasingly clear that these works, beginning with Luciola, 1862 [Luciola], Alencar’s novel of prostitution, represent a conscious effort to move away from the tradition of the sentimental novel in Brazil, a tradition best represented by the texts of Joaquim Manuel de Macedo (182.0–82) and by Alencar’s own Cinco minutos and A viuvinha. These later urban novels, first, introduce a level of detail, in their descriptions of the artifacts of contemporary life, which is comparable to that of European and North American Realism; equally a part of the Realist tradition is Alencar’s evident belief in the novelist’s ability to represent the totality of reality through such detail, and to link both social class and individual personality to the artifacts which surround his characters. Second, these novels reflect an attempt to move away from earlier attempts to adapt European plots, to the Brazilian context; rather, Alencar is endeavoring, not always successfully, to utilize the specific social patterns of Brazilian society as integral components of the plot structure. And, finally, Alencar departs dramatically from the norm of the 19th-century Brazilian novel in his creation of strong and relatively independent female characters at the very center of his texts, a departure that can be seen in Iracema as well as in these urban novels. Alencar believed very strongly in the need to educate Brazilian women of all classes, something very close to heresy at the time, not just because he wanted to increase the market for fiction but because he held the very modern conviction that women were the key agents of social change and modernization. Traces of this conviction can be seen even in his earliest novels, but it is fully and remarkably developed in the best and most interesting of his urban texts, the overtly feminist Senhora (Senhora: Profile of a Woman) of 1875. It is one of the ironies of Alencar’s career that his efforts, in these later urban novels, to move the Brazilian novel towards Realism in both detail and plot and to encourage the modernization of Brazilian society were negated, a few years after the publication of Senhora, by the appearance of Naturalist novelists like Aluisio Azevedo, whose primary message was the danger of social change in general and, in particular, of female challenges to patriarchy.

DAVID T. HABERLY

Biography

Born José Mariniano de Alencar in Ceará, Brazil, 1 May 1829. Son of a prominent liberal politician (of the same name). Moved to Rio de Janeiro with family in 1838. Read law at São Paulo Law School, and later at Recife Law School, Pernambuco. Worked in law office, Rio de Janeiro, 1850. From 1853 began to contribute to newspapers in Rio de Janeiro (also published under the pseudonym “Ig”). Conservative deputy, Ceará, 1860; minister of justice, Imperial Cabinet, 1868–70 (resigned, and abandoned political career after conflict with the emperor). Intensely interested in Brazilian national literature, language of the aboriginal Indians, and interior regions of Brazil. Died in Rio de Janeiro, 12 December 1877.

Selected Works

Novels

As minas de prata, 1 vol., Rio de Janeiro: Biblioteca Brasileira, 1862.; complete work, 6 vols, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1865–66

Lucíola: um perfil de mulher, Rio de Janeiro: Biblioteca Brasileira, 1862

Divã: perfil de mulher, Rio de Janeiro: Biblioteca Brasileira, 1864

O gaúcho, 2 vols, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1870

A pata da gazila, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1870

O tronco do ipê, 2 vols, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1871

Til, 4 vols, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1872

Sonhos d’ouro, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1872

Alfarrábios: crônicas dos tempos coloniais

Further Reading

The listings below include both some standard critical studies and biographies, together with samples of recent criticism which has focused on comparative studies of indianism in the New World and on feminist readings of the novels.

* Ao correr da pena, São Paulo, 1874 [weekly chronicles published by the Correio Mercantil and Diário do Rio de Janeiro, 1854–55]

* Faria, João Roberto Gomes, “José de Alencar: a polêmica em torno da adaptação teatral de O guarani” Letras, Curitiba, Brasil, 31 (1972)

* —— Botânica cearense na obra de Alencar e caminhos de “Iracema,” Fortaleza, Brazil: Imprensa Universitária da Universidade Federal do Ceará, 1976

* Magalhães, Jr, Raimundo, José de Alencar e a sua época, São Paulo: Civilização Brasileira, 1971

* A perda das ilusões: o romance histórico de José de Alencar*, Campinas, São Paulo: Unicamp, 1993

* Proença, Manuel Cavalcanti, José de Alencar na literatura brasileira, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1966

Jacques-Stéphén Alexis 1922–1961(?)

Haitian novelist

Jacques-Stéphén Alexis’s place in the history of Haitian letters should remain secure for several reasons. Along with his contemporaries Jacques Roumain and René Depestre, he was one of the first Haitian writers to attain an international reputation: his works, recently published in popular collections by Gallimard, have remained in print for over thirty years and have been widely translated; further, they were seminal in indicating the directions that Haitian fiction was going to take; Alexis is also one of the very few of Haiti’s writers to have authored theoretical reflexions on the nation’s literature; finally, his death during the tyranny of François Duvalier added his name to the martyrology of writers who gave their lives in the cause of human dignity.

Alexis’s often quoted theoretical texts, especially “Du réalisme merveilleux des Haïtiens,” 1956 [On the Haitians’ Marvellous Realism] and “Débat autour des conditions d’un roman national chez les peuples noirs: où va le roman?” 1957 [Debate on the Conditions of a National Novel produced by Black Peoples: Where is the Novel Heading To?], actually did little more than elaborate upon the ideas regarding literary matters that his mentor Jean Price-Mars had outlined in the 1920s and 1930s in Ainsi parla l’Oncle, 1928 (So Spoke the Uncle) and other works. Both essayists stressed the definition and cultivation of national authenticity (as opposed to the imitation of Parisian models) and the adoption of popular (as opposed to aristocratic and middle-class) culture as a source of inspiration. They encouraged the judicious inclusion of Creole expressions in French texts, but never proposed the abandonment of French or the creation of a literature in the vernacular; neither man, for that matter, ever wrote in Creole. However, while Price-Mars, the “Father of Négritude,” saw the aesthetic celebration of what was national and popular as a form of collective therapy for the treatment of the class, color and cultural divisions which afflicted the Black Republic, Alexis saw them rather as an integral part and an important factor in the political struggle for the dictatorship of the proletariat and the subsequent advent of a classless society.

At the risk of over simplification, each of Alexis’s novels can be characterized by its principal theme. Compère Général Soleil [Comrade General Sun] is a proletarian novel with a Marxist perspective; it recounts the life of Hilarion, an illiterate petty thief, whose social conscience is awakened and developed in prison by his cell mate, the political prisoner Pierre Roumel (a transparent incarnation of Jacques Roumain). Les Arbres musiciens [The Music-Making Trees] can be considered as a peasant novel in so far as the action takes place in the lovingly evoked countryside. Peasant everyday life is described at length, and the struggle between a benevolent and a malevolent voodoo priest for the leadership of the rural community forms an important secondary plot. L’Espace d’un cillement [In the Space of a Blink] stresses Alexis’s preoccupation with Caribbean brotherhood: his main protagonist is La Niña (The Girl), a Cuban prostitute working in a Portau-Prince dive, and her redemption by a half-Haitian, half-Cuban ship’s mechanic. The stories included in the collection Romancero aux étoiles [Romancero with Stars] are further variations on these themes, as well as French adaptations of Creole traditional folk-tales, and a celebration of Anacaona, the Arawak queen traitorously put to death by the Conquistadors, whom Haitians have always considered their first national heroine.

Haitian history is a preoccupation Alexis shares with most of his fellow Haitian writers. In Compère Général Soleil, for example, he evokes the 1937 “Dominican Vespers,” as the massacre by Trujillo’s thugs of several thousand Haitians who had settled on the other side of the border with the Dominican Republic came to be known. The central plot of Les Arbres musiciens concerns the forced dispossession of peasants in 1941 by the American owners of SHADA (in English: Haitian-American society for the Development of Agriculture) and their Haitian upper-class allies. On a more mundane plane, Chronique d’un faux-amour [Chronicle of an Untrue Love], the interior monologue of a high society young woman who has been turned into a zombi, is based on a supposedly historic occurrence.

For evident reasons, most critics—and nearly all Haitian critics—have focussed their studies on the political convictions for which Alexis sacrificed his life, and which are manifest, sometimes in heavily didactic fashion, throughout his fiction. Yet, while Alexis never composed poetry, his obvious delight in linguistic effects may very well constitute his most lasting contribution to Haitian letters. He has frequent recourse to the technical vocabularies of seamanship, music, cooking, liturgy, medicine, flora and fauna and, of course, vodûn, not to mention English and Spanish words. Enumeration and repetition, as well as the proliferation of a great variety of metaphors, characterize his sui generis stylistic eloquence.

In L’Espace d’un cillement as well as in some Romancero stories, Alexis’s erotic descriptions are quite detailed and uninhibited. Some critics, who would have preferred a more allusive treatment, have accused Alexis of salaciousness, arguing that his tropical sensuality is in fact the expression of a traditional male chauvinist ideology.

Be that as it may, most of Alexis’s novels (as the critic Boadas has correctly observed) are characterized by the ambiguity, or even the absence of closure, both in individual chapters and in the whole work. The frequent use of suspension points is significant: it allows readers to supply their own conclusion and can also suggest the possibility of eventual further developments of the plot. This happens in six of the nine stories which make up the Romancero; in the same way, at the conclusion of Compère Général Soleil, Hilarion dies on the Dominican-Haitian border, which his wife Claire-Heureuse will cross to return home and take up his struggle. On the last page of L’Espace d’un cillement, while La Niña has disappeared, “El Caucho believes that he will find her, he believes it with all his heart…Perhaps…¡Quién sabe!”(…Who knows!). In the last paragraph of Les Arbres musiciens: “With his arm around her shoulder, Gonaïbo leads Harmonise away. Life is beginning.”

With his last published work, Jacques-Stéphen Alexis was well on the way to achieving a sustained tone, a metaphorical baroque no longer in danger of veering off into rococo excess. Just when his talent was reaching its full maturity, the writer’s voice was silenced by the dictatorship; thus was one more disaster inflicted upon the country he had so lovingly celebrated.

LÉON-FRANÇOIS HOFFMANN

Biography

Born in Gonaïves, Haiti, 22 April 1922. His father, Stephen Alexis, wrote a biography of Toussaint Louverture and the novel, Le Nègre masqué. Educated at Collège Stanislas, Paris; Collège Saint-Louis de Gonzague, Port-au-Prince. Studied medicine in Port-au-Prince and neurology in Paris. Joined the Haitian Communist Party in 1938. Co-founder, with René Depestre and other young intellectuals, of the important journal La Ruche and leader of the student strikes which forced President Lescot to resign in 1946. While in Paris, joined the French Communist Party and became a friend of Louis Aragon, Léopold Senghor and Aimé Césaire, as well as of Latin American writers, Nicolás Guillén, Pablo Neruda and Jorge Amado, among others. In 1959 he traveled to Moscow to attend the 30th Conference of the Union of Soviet Writers. On his way back he visited China, where he was received by Mao Tse Tung. With four comrades, he sailed from Cuba in April, 1961 in order to organize an uprising against the Duvalier dictatorship. On their landing on the north coast of Haiti, the five men were betrayed to the authorities by local peasants. It is almost certain that Alexis was taken to Port-au-Prince and savagely tortured before being executed. The regime never acknowledged his death, and his remains have never been located.

Selected Works

Novels

Compère Général Soleil, Paris: Gallimard, 1955
Les Arbres musiciens, Paris: Gallimard, 1957
L’Espace d’un cillement, Paris: Gallimard, 1959

Short Fiction

Romancero aux étoiles, Paris: Gallimard, 1960

Other Writings

“Du Réalisme merveilleux des Haïtiens”, Présence Africaine, Paris, 8–10 (June-November 1956)
“Débat autour des conditions d’un roman national chez les peuples noirs: où va le roman?”
Further Reading
Dash, J. Michael, Jacques-Stéphen Alexis, Toronto: Black Images, 1975 [An excellent, short (60 pages), comprehensive essay, which stresses Alexis’s ideology and his contributions to the Peasant Novel and to Marvellous Realism]
Depestre, René, “Parler de Jacques-Stéphen Alexis,” in Pour la Revolution, pour la poésie, Quebec: Léméac, 1974; reprinted in Bonjour et adieu a la negritude, Paris: Robert Laffont, 1980 [Personal reminiscences from a long-time friend and political companion, from whom Alexis broke off shortly before his death because of tactical disagreements]

Allende, Isabel

See Best-Sellers

José Américo de Almeida 1887–1980

Brazilian prose writer and politician
Following his graduation in law from the Recife Law School in 1908, José Américo de Almeida pursued a political career that saw him fulfil several important posts in regional and national government, but which would also impose considerable restrictions on his literary activities. He wrote three novels, and only the first, A bagaçeira (Trash), published in 1928, has received serious attention from scholars. Almeida’s reputation as a novelist rests almost entirely on this one work. Whilst recognising its clear limitations, most critics agree to its historical significance, arguing that it initiated a new phase in the development of Brazilian fiction, for through its approach and thematic content, it established the pattern for the series of regionalist social novels produced in the Brazilian northeast throughout the 1930s by such authors as Jorge Amado, José Lins do Rego and Graciliano Ramos.

Regionalism has been a major force in defining the historical development of literature in the northeast of Brazil, and it provided the vital stimulus for Almeida’s work. Whilst working as a young man for the state government of Paraíba, he wrote a series of essays studying the social and economic conditions of the state, entitled A Paraíba e seus problemas (Paraiba and its Problems), published in 1922, and he later participated in the Northeast Regionalist Movement. This was launched in Recife in 1926 by Gilberto Freyre, with the objective of promoting the cultural traditions of the region through a series of educational and artistic activities. Almeida’s subsequent novels were undoubtedly influenced by the ideas and aims of that movement. All of them are characterised by a strong inclination for the sociological study of local life and a broadly...
realist treatment of such northeast themes as the drought, life on the plantations and rural migration.

The heightened interest in regional issues in the northeast in the late 1920s, and the more general concern with social problems, provided a receptive environment for the publication of A bagaceira, and four editions of the work were printed within a year of its publication. Almeida’s knowledge of regional problems enabled him to debate a wide range of issues in the novel, which he used as a vehicle to denounce the poverty and injustice suffered by the majority of the inhabitants of the rural northeast. In many ways, Almeida continued the work of the earlier generation of Naturalist novelists of the northeast, who, turning away from Romanticism, sought to present a more realistic interpretation of regional life and environment through rigorous observation and description. The most significant difference was that whereas the Naturalist novelists, imbued with determinist philosophy, tended to highlight biological and environmental factors as explanations for the backwardness, poverty and suffering of the region, Almeida emphasised instead problems of social organization. However, his social criticism must not be overestimated, for it was by no means radical. A bagaceira does not penetrate to the fundamental socio-economic mechanisms underlying such conditions. That limitation diminishes the potential dramatic tension of the thematic material, where a family of drought victims, retirantes, flees from the misery of the backlands and seek refuge on the sugar estate of a wealthy landowner, only to suffer even greater degradation once immersed in the dehumanizing life of the plantation. The adverse social conditions of the region’s rural life are attributed to society’s negligence and disorganization, which is particularly exposed in the face of a natural disaster such as drought. All this blunts the sensibility of those in a position of power. The fundamental structures and processes of that society remain unquestioned. It falls to Lúcio, the landowner’s progressive, university-educated son, to condemn society’s shortcomings, and seek his own personal solution by taking over the plantation on the death of his father and initiating a series of reforms and technical innovations, which happily combine improved efficiency with the advancement of the welfare of the workers.

On the new model plantation, Lúcio not only improves the material conditions of the labourers, but also offers incentives to encourage them to take an active interest in the production process, and thereby break out of their previous state of inertia and apathy. It was this view of an enlightened, benevolent capitalism that orientated Almeida’s own liberal, reformist politics, first as an active supporter of the Revolution of 1930, then as a minister in the Vargas government that resulted, and finally as a candidate for the presidency in 1938. The result of this approach towards social criticism in A bagaceira can be seen in the tendency towards the picturesque, complemented by a very florid, lyrical prose style, and a somewhat sentimental treatment of the characters, who are generally presented as hapless, passive victims of the vicissitudes of the natural and social environment, a tendency that reduces the sense of conflict and tension. Almeida’s treatment of the rural poor is essentially paternalistic, a tendency shared by many of the northeastern social novelists who emerged during the same era. The peasants and plantation workers in A bagaceira are presented as stoic and fatalistic, devoid of the necessary initiative to alter their situation in any significant way. It is up to the more progressive and charitable members of the dominant classes, represented by Lúcio, to undertake the reforms needed to relieve their plight.
Significantly however, Almeida draws a distinction between the courageous and independent backlanders, or sertanejos, and the plantation workers who have been dehumanized by the work and conditions of the plantation. The backlanders are idealised, so that their own conditions of poverty and exploitation are covered by an abstract, bucolic vision of a haven, potentially self-sufficient if it were not for the periodic drought, where humans can live freely and independently, according to a strict code of honour. The contrast between the purity and dignity of the sertanejos and the degraded lives of the sugar workers is epitomized in the figure of Soledad, the sertaneja who arrives at the plantation innocent and dignified, only to be corrupted by the depravity of plantation life. This Utopian, pastoral vision, constructing a mythical realm uncontaminated by humans, is a legacy of Romanticism that recurs frequently in Brazilian regionalist fiction. Almeida’s eulogy of the traditional cultural values of the backlands, threatened perhaps, but surviving still, clearly reveals the influence of the regionalist thought of the time, with its sense of nostalgic longing for a past era.

The demands of public office fully occupied the latter part of his life, but Almeida continued his interest in regional social issues in his last two novels, O boqueirão, 1935 [The Gully] and Coiteiros, 1935 [Bandits’ Refuge] and his project of critical examination of northeast social structures and social relations was taken up by other, more talented regionalist writers who followed.

MARK DINNEEN

See also entries on Jorge Amado, Rachel de Queiroz

Biography

Born on a sugar mill owned by his parents at Areia in the state of Paraíba, Brazil, 10 January 1887. Spent childhood there. Father died when he was twelve and an uncle sent him to a seminary in 1901. Left the seminary in 1904 to study law at Recife University. Became interested in politics while still a student and published controversial articles in newspapers. Acquired important post in state administration by nepotism in 1911. Published his first work, Poetas da abolição in 1921. Appointed Secretary of the Interior in Paraíba state in 1928. Stood as deputy for national assembly in 1928 and won. Appointed minister of Communications in 1931; ambassador to the Vatican, 1934; senator for the state of Paraíba, 1935. Stood for the presidency in 1937, but was not elected. Governor of his state, 1951; retired from politics in 1956. Named Intellectual of the Year in 1977 by the Brazilian Union of Writers. Died on 10 March 1980.

Selected Works

Novels

O boqueirão, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1935

Other Writings

A Paraíba e seus problemas, n.p., 1922
Ocasos de sangue, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1954 [memoirs]
Compilations and Anthologies
Tres novelas de José Américo de Almeida, Rio de Janeiro: Leitura, 1971 [Contains O boqueirão, Coiteiros and Reflexões de uma cabra]

Further Reading

Américo de Almeida’s importance as a politician seems to have cast a shadow over his creative writing. Such interest as has been shown to date in the latter focuses exclusively on A bagaçeira.

Ignacio Manuel Altamirano

1834–1893

Mexican prose writer

Ignacio Manuel Altamirano was one of the most sophisticated Mexican intellectuals in the second half of the 19th century. Altamirano was the ideological founding father of Mexican culture, appearing at an unstable and chaotic time in the construction of the new Mexican state. His life’s work is part of Mexico’s most turbulent times when new republican institutions and political tolerance had to be learned; competing liberal and conservative ideologies provoked endless civil wars; and foreign interventions were cyclical catastrophes. Altamirano represents a turning-point in Mexican intellectual history at a moment when the nation oscillated between enthusiasm and despair.

Altamirano became the spiritual guide of the 1867 second Romantic generation, assumed the leadership of the most influential of literary societies, the Liceo Hidalgo, and founded the prestigious literary weekly, El Renacimiento [The Renaissance] which published the finest examples of Mexican writing of 1869. He explored various genres, poetry, costumbrist articles (feature articles on manners and customs), essays on cultural criticism and literary theory, short stories, and novels.

Altamirano felt that his mission was to contribute morally and aesthetically to the cultural development of Mexico and mainly he addressed the middle classes recently provided with access to education, who could be influenced about the value and richness of their native land. His best-known prose works are Clemencia, 1869 [Clemency], “La navidad en las montañas,” 1871 (Christmas in the Mountains), and El Zarco, 1901 (El Zarco: the Bandit). Clemencia is a sentimental novel set in and around Guadalajara, dealing with a tragic romance during the French invasion (1864–67). The four main characters, Fernando, Enrique, Clemencia and Isabel are almost geometrically contrasted through their physical appearance (blond/dark) moral character (frivolous/spiritual), social intentions (opportunistic/loyal), and their political and military participation (collaborationists/nationalists). “La navidad en las montañas” portrays the life of an army captain seeking asylum in a small town after being exiled from his state. As narrator the captain recounts his childhood, and how a priest on his way to the Christmas Eve festivities helped him to overcome his isolation in exile. The author uses the dual point of view provided by the captain and the priest to reconcile opposing political ideologies. In his narration, Altamirano includes history, religion, politics, manners and customs, allegorizing the reconciliation of political factions during the Guerra de la Reforma (Mexican Civil War).

El Zarco is a historical novel based on the criminal deeds carried out by El Zarco and his bandits, “los plateados” (the Silver Army) in the town of Yautepec. The story is about Nicolás, a blacksmith who is in love with an upper-middle-class woman named Manuela, but she does not return his love because, instead, she loves the bandit, El Zarco. Manuela elopes with El Zarco, thereby making her mother ill. Her goddaughter Pilar, an orphan girl, loves Nicolás deeply, and with time they fall in love and get married. On the way home, a band of highwaymen plan to kill him. A rural guard saves Nicolás and his bride, but kills El Zarco, and subsequently Manuela dies from grief. The novel thus seeks to promote the moral victory of the heroic characters in the face of societal disarray. Many characters are historical figures such as Benito Juárez, the rural guard (vigilante) Martin Sánchez, El Zarco, and some of the bandits. The situation he described included expressions of the social disorder of the times, such as abuses committed by both the military and civil authorities. He incorporates realism in the description of unpleasant scenes, the swearing and cursing of the bandits, their obscene songs, and their grotesque drunkenness. In general terms, one can say that his creative works centered on the representation of diverse national types, and the suffering of unrequited love.

Altamirano’s works focus on the concept of Nation through the experience of critical historical moments such as foreign interventions or civil wars. The Nation for Altamirano is the sum of legends, customs, habits, pious sentiments, love and prudent filial relationships. These convey harmony in the home, family, and society, thus reflecting his conceptualization of what a Nation should be. His feature articles on Mexican culture and civilization in El Renacimiento are indispensable to understand the Mexican history of the time. His Paisajes y leyendas [Landscapes and Legends] describes Holy Week in his hometown, his pride in his birthplace of Tixtla, and the sacred dances of the native population. In his essays and feature articles on manners and customs he passionately defended a nationalistic literary agenda, and a nationalistic culture that could express the originality and consciousness of the emerging national identity. In Revistas Literarias de Mexico, 1868 [Mexican Literary Journals], Altamirano states that writers are the most important creators of symbols of the Nation; their commitment to the formation of national identity should be unequivocal. He calls upon the writers to give themselves to the task of documenting the Nation, its traditions, its books, its habits and costumes, its psychological traits, and its landscape. For him, to write means literally to name, to originate, and to build a mirror that reflects an imaginary and emotional repertoire in which the people can recognize themselves. Altamirano’s literary agenda brings to the fore patriotism, religion and language, advocating an organic cultural expression which could give coherence to the Mexican experience of the time.

The fundamental concepts in Altamirano’s intellectual discourse are culture and national literature. His literary and cultural nationalism can be understood since national affirmation was the only way to avoid the complete disintegration of an already fragmented nation. Altamirano’s nationalistic agenda is a culmination of the Mexican liberal movement, its decades of struggle and political adjustment, and the desire to participate in Western civilization without surrendering national identity. What he demanded was a decolonizing process: to be part of the Universal culture, to use their repertoire of artistic models, while insisting on the right to use Mexican themes, landscape, language, history, and tradition. The literary nationalism that Altamirano advocated has a double function, arguing the need for internal political cohesiveness of the Nation as well as the defense against imperialism. Altamirano’s works reflect his desire for national unity as part of the political agenda of the emerging middle class liberalism. This class should strive to transform the country, to construct an enduring Mexican image and character, to understand its past and to remake history in order to achieve economic and political progress. He sought to compress his vision of Mexico, one of monumental proportions, into a single book. Thus most of his novels are a synthesis of the country, of its past, its present, its future.

Mexican nationalism in the 19th century demanded a writer able to develop a cultural consciousness to consolidate a historical destiny. The political situation demanded that literature reaffirm an educational system organized around a cult of symbols and heroes. The heroes were to be part of that educational, aesthetic and political agenda: their sacrifice and their genius had to be imitated. The Nation that Altamirano imagined was vital in the formation of a Mexican consciousness because it gave meaning and purpose to those aware of their place in history. For him culture is the fertile soil where the seeds of nationalism are to be planted; culture should be the frame of reference to oppose the chaos and anarchy of the times. The liberal cultural discourse incarnated in Altamirano’s quest for a nationalistic literature and culture as a symbolic force, established a repertoire of themes, mental and affective attitudes, heroes and legends, to be passed on to a later generation. All his writings aimed to build a common feeling of belonging to a singular historical destiny named Mexico. His attempts to create the symbolic profile of the national character, the construction of national symbols, and their elaboration in the expression of the national experience, synthesized in a dramatic way the baptism of a modern Nation.

LUIS H. PEÑA

Biography

Born in the village of Tixtla, Mexico, 13 November 1834, of Amerindian parents. Father became mayor of village. Able to attend primary school with children of European parents and thus learned Spanish. A scholarship for Indian children enabled him to study at the Literary Institute in Toluca, followed by law at the Colegio de Letrán. Fought against the Conservatives in the Reform War (Guerra de la Reforma). Congressman. Supported Benito Juárez in his struggle against the emperor Maximilian. Fought in several battles, including Querétaro. Held rank of colonel at end of war. Opposed Juárez’s policies during latter’s presidency because Altamirano demanded a closer adherence to Liberal Party ideology. Contributed to several newspapers and journals including El Correo de Mexico (1867), El Renacimiento (1869) and El Federalista (1871). Died in 1893 when on a consular mission to Europe.

Selected Works

Novels
- Clemencia, Mexico City: El Renacimiento, 1869

Poetry
- Rimas, Mexico City: Imprenta de F. Díaz de León y S. White, 1871

Compilations and Anthologies
- Obras literarias completas, edited by Salvador Reyes Nevares, Mexico City: Oasis, 1959

Other Writings
- Paisajes y leyendas, tradiciones y costumbres de Mexico, Mexico City: Imprenta Española, 1884; reprinted, Mexico City: Antigua Librería Robredo, 1949
- Biografía de Ignacio Ramírez, Mexico City: Oficina de Tipografía de la Secretaría de Fomento, 1889
- Aires de Mexico (Prosas), Mexico City: UNAM, 1940
- La literatura nacional, edited by José Luis Martínez, 3 vols, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1949

Further Reading

Batis’s study is indispensable. Brushwood’s book is valuable in terms of structural development, concepts, and an identification with Mexican reality in Altamirano’s works. However, to date the most important contribution to Altamirano studies is that made by José Luis Martínez. Altamirano’s notion of cultural nationalism is very well explained by Carlos Monsiváis and Nicole Girón.

Batis, Huberto, Indices de “El Renacimiento.” Semanario Literario Mexicano (1869), Mexico City: Centro de Estudios Literarios, 1963

Martínez, José Luis, La expresión nacional (Letras mexicanas del siglo XIX), Mexico City: Editorial Universitaria, 1955

La emancipación literaria de Mexico, Mexico City: Antigua Librería Robredo, 1955

Alves, Antônio de Castro

See Castro Alves

Jorge Amado 1912–

Brazilian novelist

Jorge Amado is without doubt the best-known and most widely read Brazilian novelist of the 20th century. He is also a prolific writer, who, having published his first novel at the age of nineteen, has now produced over thirty literary works. Several of those have been best-sellers, and none of his compatriots has achieved such wide acclaim abroad. However, his work has generated much controversy among critics, some of whom argue that the effort to produce commercially successful novels has resulted in a form of literary populism, in which regional exoticism and intense sentimentalism have come to prevail over the critical exploration of society which orientated his early writing.

He established his career in the 1930s, with the development of his so-called “proletarian novel,” dealing essentially with the development of political consciousness among the poorest sectors of his native state of Bahia: rural in the case of Cacau, 1933 [Cocoa], and urban in Suor, 1934 [Sweat]. In these novels, Amado, armed with a simplified breakdown of Soviet Union ideology of the time, employs a very stark, simple documentary style in order to convey the misery and exploitation of the working poor and their struggle to free themselves from those circumstances. In its compilation of snippets of descriptive detail, this realist style succeeds in providing some earthy images of the squalid living conditions of the poor, but there are also signs of the sentimentality and romanticism that would become prevalent in Amado’s later works. Cacau, for example, ends with the hero, a young plantation worker who gradually develops his sense of solidarity with his fellow-workers, finally renouncing the opportunity of marrying the landowner’s daughter and becoming a landowner himself, and setting off to join the class-struggle in Rio. Amado attempts to avoid the sense of fatalism detectable in other Social Realist novelists of the Brazilian northeast, and lend a more optimistic note to the class-struggle in his country. Yet by reducing his social criticism to a framework of dogmatic formulas he tends to dissipate the potential power of the content of this early work.

Escaping from those restrictions enabled Amado to write what is considered by many to be his most powerful novel, Terras do sem fim, 1942. (The Violent Land), documenting the struggle that developed between rival planters in the south of Bahia in an effort to secure for themselves a privileged position in the increasingly prosperous cocoa trade. That environment is the centre of attention, rather than individual characters. Cocoa is shown to determine the life of everybody in the region, and they are all dehumanized by the values and conflicts it generates.
Of all the Social Realist novelists who emerged in the northeast of Brazil in the 1930s, the so-called “Generation of 1930,” it is Amado who has made the greatest use of popular cultural expressions in his work. Popular songs are occasionally incorporated into Terras do sem fim to give the struggle taking place an epic, legendary quality, and to emphasize the suffering of the exploited workers, who express their anguish through song, and their hopes for an alternative existence. Amado had already developed the use of regional popular culture in earlier works. Jubiabá, 1935, for example, examines the African-Brazilian culture of Bahia, and continues the theme of development of political consciousness among the working class. Again, however, the tension generated by the political content tends to be diluted by the sentimental way in which the lives of the poor are narrated. In addition, the popular cultural expressions are described in such a way that the attempt to demonstrate the creativity and rebelliousness of the poor often results in exoticism. Other novels of the period, namely Mar morto, 1936 (Sea of Death) and Capitães da areia, 1937 (Captains of the Sands), follow a similar pattern, with colourful stories idealizing the struggle of the poor developed from popular materials.

An active member of the Communist Party, Amado went into exile when the Party was outlawed in 1947. The award of the Stalin Prize for literature three years later confirmed his standing in the Eastern bloc countries, but Amado then began a new phase of his literary career, which would see him obtain equal acclaim in the West, with the publication of his most commercially successful novels. Gabriela, cravo e canela, 1958 (Gabriela, Clove and Cinnamon), Os velhos marinheiros, 1961 (Home is the Sailor) and Dona Flor e seus dois maridos, 1967 (Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands) are representative of this phase, dominated by colourful tales and anecdotes of regional life, without any of the ideological orientation of his earlier writing. Instead of overt political protest these works centre on criticism, frequently conveyed through satire, of the petty and hollow world of the bourgeoisie, against which his protagonists rebel and seek fulfilment in an alternative lifestyle, with alternative values. They are novels which focus on the desires of the individual rather than on collective struggle. As a result, Amado creates some of his most colourful and distinctive characters, though it is doubtless true that the liberal measures of picturesque description, sex and humour which characterize these works considerably helped to widen their appeal both at home and abroad. Indeed, Dona Flor e seus dois maridos, made into one of the most successful films in the history of the Brazilian cinema, in 1976, has been heralded as a comic masterpiece by some critics. It is far removed from his early political novels.

The greater individualization of characters in these more light-hearted stories gave Amado the opportunity to develop his penchant for strong, exuberant female protagonists, determined to assert their independence, such as Gabriela, Flor and Tereza, from Tereza Batista, cansada de guerra, 1972 (Tereza Batista, Home from the Wars), a prostitute whose battle to overcome hardship and adversity comes to symbolize the courage and unbreakable resolution of the people. If, on the one hand these characters broke from the more passive and meek representations of women commonly found in earlier Brazilian fiction, on the other some feminist critics argued that one stereotype had simply taken the place of another, and that Amado’s bold and voluptuous females essentially served to satisfy male fantasy.

However, perhaps the most striking feature of Amado’s novels of the 1970s is the more direct use they make of northeast popular culture. Through such works Amado aimed to express once more his solidarity with the struggle of the poor and oppressed by highlighting the strength, defiance and creativity embodied in their various forms of cultural expression. Recreating popular forms that recount the experience of the poor, Amado argued, permitted him to analyze that experience from the inside, rather than observing and documenting it from afar and making his own condemnations, as in his first political novels. All the resulting works, however, undoubtedly convey Amado’s own idealised vision of a pure and gallant people heroically battling against adverse social conditions. In the romanticized atmosphere created in such novels, the creativity of the people is ingenuously, and at times sentimentally, extolled. In Tenda dos milagres, 1969 (Tent of Miracles) for example, Amado, with vivid description of popular music, dance and ritual, attempts to trace the struggle of the people of Bahia through the life of the main character, Pedro Arcanjo, who begins composing popular poetry, and then writes erudite literature, but always uses his literary skills and intellectual abilities to defend the rights of the poor. He becomes a popular hero, and the result is a romantic view of the writer at one with the people, sharing their vision of the world and serving their interests. Teresa Batista, cansada de guerra, already mentioned, goes even further, for its structure, tone and characterization are all drawn directly from the traditional popular poetry of the Brazilian northeast (literatura de cordel). Again, popular material is adapted to convey Amado’s personal vision of Bahian society and culture.

Amado’s success lies in the ability he has persistently shown to combine the required ingredients in his work so as to continue producing novels of popular appeal throughout a literary career of over sixty years. His more recent work has not provided his readers with anything new, but essentially repeats the tried and tested formula that brought success throughout the 1960s and 1970s. Tocaia grande (Showdown), a novel published in 1984, is another re-examination of Brazilian history, with the familiar Bahian characters and world of voodoo ritual encountered in previous novels. Film and television adaptations of his work have helped to widen his appeal, and his novels have now been translated into many different languages, enhancing his international popularity. However, the production of such marketable novels has undoubtedly compromised the quality and value of his writing.

MARK DINNEEN

See also the Brazilian sections of the following entries: Film, Popular Culture, Regionalism

Biography

Selected Works

Novels

O país do carnaval, Rio de Janeiro: Schmidt, 1931
Cacau, Rio de Janeiro: Ariel, 1933
Suor, Rio de Janeiro: Ariel, 1934
Farda, fardão, camisola de dormir, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1979; as Pen, Sword, Camisole: a Fable to Kindle a Hope, translated by Helen Lane, Boston: Godine, 1985

Poetry
A estrada do mar, Estância: Tipografia Popular, 1938

Other Writings
ABC de Castro Alves, São Paulo: Martins, 1941 [biography]
Bahia de todos os santos: guia das ruas e dos mistérios de cidade do Salvador, São Paulo: Martins, 1945 [travel writing]
O mundo da paz, Rio de Janeiro: Vitória, 1951 [travel writing]

Further Reading
Batista, Juarez da Gama, O barroco e o maravilhoso no romance de Jorge Amado, João Pessoa: Tipografia Chaves, 1973
Brookshaw, David, Race and Color in Brazilian Literature, Metuchen, New Jersey: Scarecrow Press, 1986
Chamberlain, Bobby J., Jorge Amado, Boston: Twayne, 1990
Paes, José Paulo, De “Cacau” a “Gabriela”: um percurso pastoral, Salvador, Brazil: Fundação Casa de Jorge Amado, 1991
Rabassa, Gregory, O negro na ficção brasileira: meio século de história literária, Rio de Janeiro: Tempo Brasileiro, 1965
Rubim, Rosane and Maried Carneiro (editors), Jorge Amado, oitenta anos de vida e obra: subsídios para pesquisa, Salvador, Brazil: Fundação Casa de Jorge Amado, 1992
Tavares, Paulo, O baiano Jorge Amado e sua obra, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1980
The Invention of America

When Columbus espied land on 12 October 1492, he announced to his travelling companions the “discovery” of a new world. What he found, of course, was not an empty space, but a place unknown to Europe. The inhabitants of the Caribbean islands met him and his crews with curiosity but without excess of suspicion; as Columbus himself noted in his first accounts with a degree of puzzlement, “they were so liberal with what they possessed that it would not be believed by those who had not seen it.” The compelling search for gold led the new colonisers to torture and murder many of those original inhabitants. Yet Columbus was impressed, albeit briefly, by their egalitarian societies, their lack of property laws, their readiness to share what they had among themselves and even with strangers. His accounts of their ways of living, sketchy though they were, provided an important source of a multiple—and contradictory—mythical America. Peter Martyr reported Columbus’s words: “the land among these people is as common as sun or water, and that ‘mine or thine,’ the seeds of all mischief, have no place with them”.

These first impressions of the “new world” reinforced the medieval vision of a community of perfect order and moral construction such as Sir Thomas More idealized in his Utopia (1516). In fact the myths of perfect places had long been circulating—from the Land of Cockaigne, through the Travels of Sir John Mandeville to the land of Prester John. So at first sight the island communities did seem to confirm an anticipated utopia. For here was an actual society without property or hierarchy. The problem was that while it displayed the qualities of good order, it was disturbingly free of hierarchy. The Reformation continued to see order and authority as indivisible. Subsequent attacks on these communities, like Hobbes’s description of their life as “nasty, brutish and short,” focused on the perils of a moral and social order without a designated authority—in a word, anarchy—with a tendency towards an excess of personal and sexual freedom. But for much of the 16th century, and repeatedly after that, those who yearned for a world without exploitation or inequality would find here a validation of their vision—and condemn its destruction. It was a reassurance of continuity at a time of change and upheaval.

The “discovery” of America itself was a factor in that instability. The paintings of Hieronymous Bosch showed clearly a world so corrupt and hypocritical (Garden of Earthly Delights) that it was inexorably rushing towards its own destruction. One corner of that famous painting shows a perfect world of beings naked and innocent amid a lush and protective nature. And this corresponded quite closely to what the colonisers had found in the Caribbean, according to their rather sketchy reports, upon which the European mind enthusiastically elaborated. The paradox, however, was that the driving force behind colonization and conquest was the search for gold and silver. For Spain, in particular, the discovery of sources of precious metal was a matter of urgency. A latecomer to the race for control of world trade and possession of overseas colonies, Spain was at a disadvantage compared to Portugal. If the newly unified kingdom of Castile was to survive, it must find a route to the spice routes of the East—or an alternative source of wealth. Internally, the crown faced resistance and discontent as the currents of Reformation flowed through the Iberian Peninsula. The ideas of Erasmus, with their humanist emphasis on religion as a code of ethics, focused public debate on the venality of the feudal classes and the sham nature of much religious observance. Furthermore, a restive merchant class (the comuneros) was balking at the impositions of the Crown.

In making sense of this “new world,” then, Europe faced a challenge to many of its assumptions about itself, its authority and its place at the centre of a universal (Catholic) system. Two contradictory imperatives struggled for the dominant voice in explaining this monumental event—this “Discovery” of a new world. On the one hand, there was the demand that his event be used to demonstrate the moral authority of the Old World, its unimpeachable sense of justice. On the other, the impulse for Columbus’s exploration was less humane. Columbus’s own journals show a fixation with gold, and the tempting rewards offered to him by Queen Isabella of Spain were all conditional upon him returning with gold aplenty. That it why his journals make so many exaggerated claims and why his desperation to win the glittering prizes led him to treat the indigenous populations of the Caribbean with such bestial cruelty.

The paradox was made manifest in the “Requerimiento,” a complex legal undertaking to be given by all recently invaded peoples to their conquerors that they accepted the justice of Spanish imperial dominion. Any reluctance to swear the oath, or indeed any failure to comprehend it, was deemed to be wilful rejection of the precepts of universal justice, and thus a legitimation of war against the errant subject peoples.

Those who followed Columbus saw, as he never did (though he retired a very wealthy man), the true quantities of precious metal that the Conquest of America put at Spain’s disposal. Spain’s “golden century” of culture, as well as the Emperor Charles V’s expansion into Europe floated on a sea of American gold—a treasure that also ensured the allegiance to absolutism of an unproductive aristocracy. It was also the certainty of that gold supply that gave Charles the confidence to take on and to crush the rebellious merchant classes in 1521. While the rest of Europe was experiencing the beginnings of a mercantile revolution, Spain was progressively immured in a recalcitrant feudal absolutism.

The mining of gold and silver required that the new colonial rulers of Latin America had at their disposal a large and passive labour force. This relationship of exploitation, however, was difficult to reconcile with the evangelical purposes which legitimated Conquest. The Laws of the Indies of 1512. (and the later ones of 1546 and 1571) enshrined the elevated objectives of protection and education of the Indians and the winning of their souls. Yet those purposes sat ill with the insatiable appetite for gold and silver of Charles’s European armies and the unproductive Spanish land-owning class which relied on American wealth. In the debates that arose in an effort to reconcile the irreconcilable, the figure of Bartolomé de Las Casas, Dominican friar, later Bishop of Chiapas, and Defender of the Indians, occupied a central place for most of the 16th century. He was instrumental in framing all the laws regarding the Indies, and was an indomitable fighter for the rights of Indians whose protection was a moral obligation upon the colonial authorities.

Later, in 1548, Las Casas was to debate these matters with Archbishop Sepúlveda, who insisted that the original inhabitants of America were “barbarians”, whose lack of understanding of concepts of law and morality made any war against them “just” in a sense derived from Aristotle. Las Casas, by contrast, insisted that the Conquest of America was justified as an act of evangelization only—and that the relation between Spain and America must be that of Father and Protector of his children.

There were those, like Father Montesinos (in 1511), who asked: “By what right and by what justice do you hold the Indians in such cruel and horrible bondage? Aren’t they dying, or rather aren’t you killing them to get gold every day? Aren’t you obliged to love them as yourselves?” But their voices soon fell silent. America was about to be invented, and it would form part of the history of Spain—and provide the justification for Conquest and its depredations. The key to this new invention was the replacement of that Innocent America born of the first encounter with a Barbarous America inimical to Civilization.

The discovery of the Aztec empire (in 1519) and of the Incas (in 1532.) posed difficult questions. These were complex and structured societies; indeed (as Inca Garcilaso de la Vega would comment later in his description of Inca society, the Comentarios reales of 1609) they may have experienced a very similar intellectual and social development to Spain itself, having themselves reached a concept of an Omnipotent Deity and a Moral law. How was it possible for such societies to have emerged in parallel with Europe; and how could Europe’s Universal Catholic Church and its powerful Spanish representatives lay claim to Divine Will if such they were?

Later it became very clear that the American empires of Anáhuac and Tahuantinsuyu were in a sense authoritarian societies bound by the cement of state religion. If they fell to Spain’s advances it was due in major part to a combination of Spanish technological superiority and the internal rifts that weakened each empire at this crucial time. But that is not how the history was told. Instead, America was invented for a second time—this time as a cruel and godless barbarism prone to human sacrifice on a massive scale. Thus all war against it was “just” and the fundamentally material dynamic of conquest skilfully relegated to a subordinate role. The laws of the Indies, especially their most liberal version of 1542–43, were thus more notable in their omission than their commission—as the suppressed chronicles of Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala would later show.

There now occurred a curious process whereby Spain became the engine of the emergence of a “modern” mercantile economy fuelled by American gold (whatever disputes may still remain to be resolved about the exact degree of inflation it encouraged). By dint of its conquest and control of America, Spain also became the heartland of absolutism in Europe, its grand purpose the restoration of a feudal empire. The impact of America on Spain, indeed on Europe in general, was to create a crisis in Europe’s idea of its centrality in world history -Europe at the centre of the world just as planet earth lay at the heart of the solar system in the orchestration of the spheres. It responded, in J.H.Elliott’s words, by “bringing down the mental shutters” and reinventing a Renaissance Europe at grips with barbarism. And the medieval myths resurfaced again and again as travellers continued to search for the Golden Man (El Dorado), the Seven Cities of Cíbola, and the Amazons.

In the greater purposes of Conquest and Exploitation, the other America, Utopian America, was largely—but not entirely -forgotten. At the outer edges of empire, the missions set out to recreate the ordered moral community envisaged in the commentaries upon the first discoveries, in Paraguay, in California, on the island of Janitzio in Mexico. In his reflections at the century’s end, the great French essayist Montaigne noted how little credit civilization had brought upon itself by its conduct of the Conquest of America. “I do not find that there is anything barbarous or wild in this nation, excepting that everyone gives the denomination barbarism to what is not the custom of this country. There the people are wild, just as we call fruits wild which nature produces of itself...whereas in truth we ought to call those wild whose natures we have changed by our artifice and diverted from the common order ...” It was this America that was rediscovered by Rousseau and the Enlightenment, and even, to some extent, by the ecological movements of the 20th century. The Inca and Aztec empires have been seen, in recent years, as contradictory sources of an alternative history—both absolutist empires and sources of ideas and structures of common ownership and shared responsibility.

In some ways, then, the invention of America is not a moment but a continuous activity in which this act of Conquest, what Gómez called “the greatest event in the world since the Creation,” is assessed and reassessed by those who have need to rewrite their history, to understand the laws and dynamics that move their own world, and to find evidence there of all that humanity is capable of—for good and for ill.

MIKE GONZALEZ

See also entries on Caliban, Civilization and Barbarism, Magical Realism

Further Reading

O’Gorman, Edmundo, La invenzione de América; el universalismo de la cultura de Occidente, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1950; as The Invention of America; an Inquiry into the Historical Nature of the New World and the Meaning of Its History, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1961

Américo de Almeida, José

See Almeida

Enrique Amorim 1900–1960

Uruguayan prose writer and poet

Enrique Amorim was many things at once: dandy, novelist, poet, wealthy man, traveller, film maker, landowner, writer of detective stories, Communist Party intellectual (from 1947). His complex and contradictory personality made him one of the most dynamic and interesting men of his time, friend of famous European figures because of his frequent trips, especially to Paris. Amorim started his literary career in 1920 with a book of poems, Veinte años [At Twenty], which made him part of the avant-garde movement. He nevertheless had a rather ambiguous association with cultural movements, switching back and forth from the avant-garde to Realism as often as he wished.

Only one of Amorim’s short stories, “Las Quitanderas” [The Travelling Whores] can be considered “realist.” His short novel Tangarupá (1925) was also classed as “rural” literature but had a flavour of the aesthetic. The following year, Horizontes y bocacalles [Horizons and Street Corners] compared countryside and city, the two settings in which the rest of his work would be set, without settling for one of them. Six years later, he developed the theme of “the travelling whores” in his novel La carreta, 1932 [The Wagon], and explored a new aspect of novels of the Uruguayan countryside: sexuality. La carreta tells the story of a group of ambulant whores who travelled the pampas selling love. Amorim said: “In La carreta I have examined from one particular angle the sexual mores of people living in northern Uruguay, on the frontier with Brazil. It is a region where women are notable by their absence, and this particular shortage is no doubt what roused in me the painful bitter image of the travelling whore.”

In 1934, the novelist’s eye probed deeper and alighted deliberately on a historical figure, the gaucho, who had disappeared by then in real life (although not from literature) to be replaced by the “paisano,” the rural labourer. The result was the novel El paisano Aguilar [Aguilar the Countryman]. Amorim wanted to refute Ricardo Güiraldes’s portrait of the mythical gaúcho in Don Segundo Sombra. He wanted to show instead the “real” gaucho, without make-up or “literature.” As Borges said: “Enrique Amorim works in the present. His novels show the Uruguayan countryside as it is now. He doesn’t write to serve a myth or to deny it. He, like all true novelists, is interested in people, things, motives, and not generic symbols.” Nevertheless, Amorim described a “type” through one particular character, something he would do again in El caballo y su sombra (The Horse and His Shadow). In El paisano Aguilar he emphasized the idiosyncrasies of the typical countryman whom modern life had transformed from nomadic (gaucho) to settled (paisano). While the gaucho was still seen as a rebel, the paisano personified patience, calm, peace, and mediocrity.
In El caballo y su sombra, Amorim provided a clear portrayal of the two poles of the social equation. On the one side, the landowner Nicolás Azara, who represented the ranchowning bourgeoisie. And on the other, the immigrants herded together in their camps, with no land to cultivate, overcrowded and despised by the criollos. The novel’s sympathies lie with the immigrant but it offers no real life answers to the social and economic divisions. Criticism of the latifundistas, for example, does not stem from ownership of the land itself but from the inefficient use of the land. For Amorim, the evil was not that some owned land and others did not, but that the former did not comply with their paternalistic duties: creating schools, building roads, allowing mobility of labour, and even giving up part (the uncultivated part) of his land. The principle of property was not questioned.

Realism, nourished by a growing social concern, continued in books like La victoria no viene sola, 1952 [Victory Does not Come by Itself], a failed exercise in “socialist realism” and Nueve lunas sobre Neuquén, 1946 [Nine Moons over Neuquen], which dealt with Fascists in post-war Argentina. The former, although flawed, is interesting for the description of the forces that were operating during that period and which, basically, is anecdote transferred to text. As Stalin said “Victory doesn’t come by itself, you have to organize it”. Behind this slogan is a whole plan of action. Two characters of different social background and position—a worker and a lawyer represent the struggle of the proletariat and its fellow traveller, liberalism, to change the structure of an unjust world. Although the characters are comrades, the author sees them quite differently. The lawyer makes his classmates sign petitions and declarations of support for the workers, while the worker takes more direct action like helping a colony of immigrants occupy a latifundio. They work towards the same end in two different ways, since these are the means of struggle traditionally conceived and carried out by their respective social classes. This demonstrates both Amorim’s militancy and, at the same time, its limitations. He belonged to the bourgeoisie and sympathized with the proletariat.

Apart from a few subsequent minor novels, Amorim finished his productive period with three of his best novels towards the end of the 1950s: Corral abierto [Open Corral], Los montaraces [The Backwoods Men], La desembocadura [The River Mouth]. They demonstrate a combination of narrative skill and freedom of fantasy. In Corral abierto, Amorim selected Montevideo and a town in the interior of Uruguay as a backdrop, and dealt with contemporary themes: juvenile delinquency, life in children’s hostels, and also the famous “rats’ towns”—the rings of shanty towns round the big cities. Los montaraces, penetrating the “Goddess Fantasy” he talks about in La desembocadura, invented a world of nature, inspired by the problems and characters created by Horacio Quiroga in the province of Misiones. His hero reaches “the accursed island,” protected from curious eyes by legends of fear and death. His deed acts as a cathartic example for a group of men—forest wardens and lumberjacks—who through courage and desperation throw off both their wall of superstition and their exploitation by the lumber company. Finally, in La desembocadura, Amorim attempted a summary of his world, looking back over the years since the turn of the century. Despite covering barely a hundred pages, it spans the different periods described in his novels, and makes direct allusions to them. The book has a particular structure which demonstrates what has been the central feature of Amorim’s work. It recreates almost a century of history, from the invasion of Indian land (the infamous “conquest of the desert”), to the war with the English in the River
Plate, passing through world revolutions, influences on daily life in the modern cities, and social changes in the countryside.

These three works are the pinnacle of Amorim’s intellectual development. From concern for society, he passed to concern for humanity with its principle of responsibility. His total commitment to a political and ideological line was not exclusively due to belonging to a body of ideas but rather to an awareness of the futility of solitary literary output and the need to join forces to fight for man’s freedom. This is where the Amorim of 1930 differs from the Amorim of 1940 and the Amorim of 1950, although, as the whole body of his work demonstrates, he followed the normal path of a man wanting to participate actively in the world around him.

JORGE RUFFINELLI
translated by Ann Wright

Biography

Born in Salto, a provincial town in northern Uruguay, 25 July 1900. First-born of seven brothers. His mother, Doña Candelaria, was something of a feminist and had thwarted literary aspirations. She wrote for the local press and saw in Enrique the extension of her literary self. His secondary education was completed in Buenos Aires. Studied law at the University of La Plata, but dropped out. Published collection of poems, Veinte años [At Twenty], in 1920. Associated with the politically radical “Boedo” group of writers. Their publishing house, Claridad, brought out his short novel, Tangarupá (1925). Married Esther Haedo in 1928. Represented Argentina at PEN Club congress in 1931. Mother died in 1935, the year in which his only child, Liliana, was born. Although he loved the good life when he was young and travelled frequently to Europe, he joined the Communist Party in 1947. Forced to leave Argentina in 1950 because of his politics. Returned to Salto. Developed heart condition but continued to write prolifically until his death. Died in Buenos Aires, 28 July 1960.

Selected Works

Novels
Las quitanderas, Buenos Aires: Latina, 1924
La carreta: novela de quitanderas y vagabundos, Buenos Aires: Claridad, 1932
El paisano Aguilar, Montevideo: Amigos del Libro Río Platense, 1934
La edad despareja, Buenos Aires: Claridad, 1938
La luna se hizo con agua, Buenos Aires: Claridad, 1944
El asesino desvelado, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1945
Nueve lunas sobre Neuquén, Buenos Aires: Lautaro, 1946
La victoria no viene sola, Montevideo: Bolsa de los Libros, 1952
Feria de farsantes, Buenos Aires: Futuro, 1952
Todo puede suceder, Montevideo: Vir, 1955
Corral abierto, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1956
Los montaraces, Buenos Aires: Goyanarte, 1957
La desembocadura, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1958
Eva Burgos, Montevideo: Alfa, 1960

Short Fiction
Amorim, Montevideo: Editorial Pegaso, 1923
Tangarupá, Buenos Aires: Claridad, 1925 [novella]
Horizontes y bocacalles, Buenos Aires: El Inca, 1926
La trampa del pajonal: cuentos y novelas, Buenos Aires: L.J. Rosso, 1928
Del uno al seis, Montevideo: Impresora Uruguaya, 1932
Presentación de Buenos Aires, Buenos Aires: Triángulo, 1936
La plaza de las carretas, Buenos Aires: Vial, 1937
Cuentos de amor, Santiago de Chile: Erälle, 1938; as Historias de amor, Santiago de Chile: Erälle, 1938
Después del temporal, Buenos Aires: Quetzal, 1953
Temas de amor, Buenos Aires: Instituto Amigos del Libro Argentino, 1960
Los pájaros y los hombres, Montevideo: Galería Libertad, 1960
Prostitubulario, with others, Buenos Aires: Merlin, 1967
Miel para la luna, y otros relatos, Paysandú, Uruguay: Cerno, 1969

Poetry
Veinte años, versos, Buenos Aires: Imprenta Mercatali, 1920
Un sobre con versos, privately printed, 1925
Visitas al cielo, Buenos Aires: Manuel Gleizer, 1929
Cinco poemas uruguayos, Salto, Uruguay: Magall, 1935
Dos poemas, Salto, Uruguay: Ediciones Populares, 1940
Cuaderno salteño, Montevideo: Impresora Uruguay, 1942
Primero de mayo, Montevideo: Adelante, 1949
Quiero, Montevideo: Impresora Uruguay, 1954
Sonetos del amor en octubre, Buenos Aires: Botella al Mar, 1954
Mi patria: poemas, Montevideo: Ediciones Papel de Poesía, 1960

Other Writings
Juan Carlos Castagnino, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1945 [monograph]
La segunda sangre, Pausa en la selva, Yo voy más lejos, Buenos Aires: Conducta, 1950 [plays]
Don Juan 38: pasatiempo en tres actos, Montevideo: Ediciones del Autor, 1959 [play]
El Quiroga que yo conoci, Montevideo: Arca, 1983 [biography of Horacio Quiroga]

Further Reading
Ainsa, Fernando (editor), La carreta, Madrid: UNESCO, Colección Archivos, 1988 [Critical edition; contains a range of articles on this novel by important scholars]
Buranelli, Álvaro Miranda and Carlos Nodar Freire, Enrique Amorim: enfoques críticos, Montevideo: Editores Asociados, 1990 [Includes contributions by Mario Benedetti, Ángel Rama and Emir Rodríguez Monegal]
Garet, Leonardo, La pasión creadora de Enrique Amorim, Montevideo: Editorial Asociados, 1990
Carlos Drummond de Andrade 1902–1987

Brazilian poet

Carlos Drummond de Andrade was born in 1902, in Itabira do Mato Dentro, Minas Gerais, about three hundred miles from Rio de Janeiro. He is widely considered to be his country’s foremost poet, and there have been a number of translations of his work into English. In his poetry there is a tension between a deep sense of introspection and a desire to reach some form of dialogue with the world. He expresses this in a range of often conflicting tones of voice as he moves through a wide span of themes. These include the multifold dimensions of love, his awareness of the social and political problems of the modern age, and poetry and language themselves.

This latter concern and the crisis which surrounds it in the Brazil of the 1920s is apparent in his very first writings. In his first collection of poetry, Alguma poesia, 1930 [Some Poetry], a significant manifestation of this crisis is to be found in his little masterpiece “No meio do caminho” where the poet’s attention is obsessively focussed on the memory of a stone in the middle of the road. He cannot seem to translate this basic experience into discursive language, and it just goes round and round in his mind. Inert and unyielding, the stone is both external to him and yet it transfuses his inner world as all physical activity is reduced to the operation of his “fatigued retinas” and the repetition of the almost meaningless statement -“in the middle of the road there was a stone.” This poem encapsulates the crisis facing the poet as he moves away from the fading conventional literary forms towards Modernism and its new challenges. This whole problem of literary expression is indeed the subject of a series of articles written by Drummond during this period.

On the other hand, the poet is able to cultivate an ironic and natural response to the contradictions of poetry and of the world. One of the important stylistic devices that shape his poetry is the assembling of refined and banal imagery, elevated and prosaic experience with shifting and ironic points of view. It is undoubtedly the case that these profound internal dissonances and reassessments subvert of all that constitutes conventional poetry and call into question the relation between the poet and the world. There is a homology between the contradictions and paradoxes of the poem and the human condition as he takes us through assorted changes of direction in his suppositions.

One of the most pervasive themes is that of love as he shifts back and forth, frequently sabotaging the feeling from inside. Features of such poems include a chaotic enumeration in the listing of words for humorous effect, quirky and contradictory points of view, and a tentative sense of groping his way through the syntax. In “Aurora” he makes the claim that love is a wonderful thing and then immediately subverts this with the parenthetical inclusion of “(love and other products).” In “Necrológio dos desiludidos do amor” a mocking tone is emphasized in relation to those disillusioned in love with their “stomachs full of poetry.” Irony is present in the way perspectives are inverted and matters of intense human interiority are flaunted and treated in a manner which appears to diminish and devitalize them. However, this use of irony emphatically draws the reader towards the acceptance of a tone of voice which is not normally associated with the love experience.
The same contrasts, the continual references to the ambiguous and discordant nature of poetry become particularly prominent as the poet struggles to come to terms with what is also a very personal matter. Poetry and expression are frequently contrasted with conflicting images of silence as in “Secreto” or “Poema patético” in Brejo das almas, 1934 [Morass of Souls]. The long poem “Procura da poesia” [The Search for Poetry] from the collection A rosa do povo, 1945 [The Rose of the People] introduces a whole gamut of contradictory precepts. It is difficult to locate the identity of the speaker in this poem, a strategy which further subverts the reader’s grasp of the speech situation. “Nosso tempo” [Our Time] is another long poem from this collection which this time addresses the problem of alienation in modern society, a condition characterized by “a time of splintering, /a time of split men.” The poet reacts against this but finds in his efforts to resist that the words “have lost their meaning.” In the final climactic lines of the poem, he poses the controversial question of the poet’s social effectiveness, a liberation based on words and symbols. The poet has been powerless to withstand the historic forces which are responsible for the current state of affairs and the promise of future help is summed up in the final image of the “worm.”

Another integral component of his poetry is the attempt to recreate his childhood world in the state of Minas Gerais. However, whilst poems such as “Viagem na família” [Journey with the Family] and “Retrato de família” [Family Portrait] do of course incorporate the theme of the family and of Itabira, there is also present the depressing reality of the present and the challenge of what this past really represents to him now. Yet again in “Nos àureos tempos” [Our Golden Times], childhood is linked with a utopian quest for a reconstituted world as he painfully recognizes that such a reconstruction is no more than a distant ideal. In this way, Drummond takes the world of family and childhood beyond their narrower periphery and in the direction of issues of more universal import. He explores the intricate network of family and self, imagination and reality, the utopian aspirations blocked by the diminished spaces and debased values of a world of surplus accumulation characterized by “gardens of sickness” and “stores of tears.”

Drummond’s poetry moves through successive stages from the earlier Modernist collections of Alguma poesia and Brejo das almas to the social and political notes of Sentimento do mundo, 1940 [Feeling about the World] and A rosa do povo, and the broader sweeps of Claro enigma, 1951 [Clear Enigma]. However, throughout his work there is a strong current that encompasses the dialectical admixture of contraries and his engagement with his own personal and national origins. There is a struggle to mediate between the “big world” and the “little heart” and, furthermore, to reconcile to some degree the conflictual nature of existence. This carries over from one collection to another and forms a complex web of continuity which transcends the changes and transitions of his work.

JOHN MYLES KINSELLA

Biography

Born in Itabira do Mato Dentro, Minas Gerais, Brazil, 31 October 1902. Educated at Arnaodo College, Belo Horizonte, 1910–13; obliged to return home because of poor health, where he was educated privately. Attended Jesuit Anchieta College, Nova Friburgo, 1916–18 (expelled);

Selected Works

Poetry
Alguma poesia, Belo Horizonte, Brazil: Pindorama, 1930
Brejo das almas, Belo Horizonte, Brazil: Os Amigos da Poesia, 1934
Sentimento do mundo, Rio de Janeiro: Poggetti, 1940
A rosa do povo, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1945
Poesia até agora, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1948 [Includes previous collections and Novos poemas]
Claro enigma, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1951
Viola de bolso, Rio de Janeiro: Serviço de documentação do MEC, 1952
Fazendeiro do ar e poesia até agora, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1953 [Includes previous collections and Fazendeiro do ar]
Poemas, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1959 [Includes previous collections and A vida passada a limpo]
Lição de coisas, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1962
Versíprosa, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1967
Boitempo e A falta que ama, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1969
Reunião, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1969 [Includes collections published between 1930 and 1962, except Viola de bolso]
Menino antigo, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1973
As impurezas do branco, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1974
Amor, amores, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1975
Esquecer para lembrar, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1979
A paixão medida, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1980
Nova reunião, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1983
Corpo, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1984
Amar se aprende amando, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1985
Poesia errante: derrames líricos (e outros, nem tanto, ou nada), Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1988

Other Writings
De notícias e não notícias faz-se a crônica, histórias, diálogos, divagações, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1974
Os dias lindos: crônicas, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1977
Moça deitada na grama, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1987
Auto-retrato e outras crônicas, edited by Fernando Py, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1989
Anthologies in Translation

An Anthology of Twentieth-Century Brazilian Poetry, translated by Elizabeth Bishop and Emanuel Brasil, Middletown, Connecticut: Wesleyan University Press, 1972

The Minus Sign: a Selection from the Poetic Anthology, translated by Vergínia a de Araújo, Manchester

Further Reading

Brasil, Assis, Carlos Drummond de Andrade, Rio de Janeiro: Livros do Mundo Inteiro, 1971

Brayner, Sonia (editor), Carlos Drummond de Andrade: fortuna crítica, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1977

Coelho, Joaquim-Francisco Mártires, Terra e família na poesia de Carlos Drummond de Andrade, Belém do Pará: Universidade Federal do Pará, 1973

Fonseca, José Eduardo da, O telurismo na literatura brasileira e na obra de Carlos Drummond de Andrade, Belo Horizonte, Brazil: Seção de Publicações do Departamento de Letras Vernáculos da Faculdade de Letras da Universidade de Minas Gerais, 1970

Gledson, John, Poesia e poética de Carlos Drummond de Andrade, São Paulo: Duas Cidades, 1981

Houaiss, Antônio, Drummond: mais seis poetas e um problema, Rio de Janeiro: Imago, 1976

Kinsella, John Myles, “Colliding Discourses: a Reading of Drummond’s Brejo das almas” Brasil/Brazil 8 (1992)

Merquior, José Guilherme, Verso e universo em Drummond, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1975

Sant’Anna, Affonso Romano de, Drummond, Rio de Janeiro: Lia, 1972

Simon, Lumna Maria, Drummond: uma poética do risco, São Paulo: Ática, 1978

Teles, Gilberto Mendonço, Drummond: a estilística da repetição, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1970

Williams, Frederick G., Carlos Drummond de Andrade and His Generation, Santa Barbara: University of California, 1986
A rosa do povo

Collection of poems by Carlos Drummond de Andrade

A rosa do povo, published in 1945, consists of the poems written during the years of World War II. Critics are unanimous in declaring this to be an outstanding collection by Drummond de Andrade. The poems of A rosa do povo reveal the spirit of a mature writer, one who acknowledges straightforwardly his own responsibility both as a craftsman of language and as a member of society. In his 1945 book, Drummond indicates that he is still pursuing the objectives he had devised in Sentimento do mundo, 1940 ([Feeling about the World]) and which are defined in the final verses of the poem “Mãos dadas” ([Holding Hands]): “O tempo e a minha matéria, o tempo presente, os homens presentes, /a vida presente” (Time is my matter, present time, present men, /present life). The problem of time, of our human inability to comprehend fully and accept its position within the inexorable flowing of the hours is one of the main themes of A rosa do povo. However, besides the metaphysical approach, Drummond deals with time in its present dimension and adopts a critical posture towards the world around him, with its social injustices and the everyday struggle of men and women in 20th-century society.

The two opening poems of A rosa do povo, “Consideração do poema” ([Considering the Poem]) and “Procura da poesia” ([The Search for Poetry]), draw attention to the question of poetic composition and its role within human existence. They reveal the two leading concerns in Drummond’s poetry: to take part in a programme of social reform and to explore the full potential of language, in the pursuit of verbal art. “Consideração do poema” illustrates Drummond’s commitment to social matters, his rejection of traditional notions of poetic excellence, in favour of the Brazilian Modernists’ aspiration to create a type of poetry congenial to life in the modern age. As he announces his aversion to uncontrolled sentimentality, “Poeta do finito e da matéria, /cantor sem piedade, sim, sem frágeis lágrimas” (Poet of the finite and of matter, / poet without pity, yes, without easy tears), Drummond ends his first poem by summarising his commitment in some of the most important verses in the book: “Tal uma lâmina, /o povo, meu poema, te atravessa.” (Just like a blade, /the people, my poem, cuts through you.) The confident tone of the first poem does not match that of the exordial verses of the following, “Procura da poesia.” Here Drummond appears more interested in admonishing than in asserting: “Não façais versos sobre acontecimentos. /Não há criação nem morte perante a poesia.” (Do not write verses on events. /There is no creation or death before poetry). What may seem openly supportive of the cult of beauty is in fact the declaration of the poet’s other primary task: to dive into the mysteries of language and the secret forces of words to unveil the poetry they hold.

In the third poem in the book, “A flor e a náusea” ([The Flower and Nausea]), Drummond leads the reader to the greyness of modern urban life. The focus is on the poet’s critical posture towards the contemporary world, with which he identifies himself in extremely negative terms when he says: “O tempo pobre, o poeta pobre/fundem-se no mesmo impasse.” (Poor time, and the poor poet/are cast as one in the same impasse). The poet declares his failure as a magician of language and feels part of the world’s inadequacy, with its tedium and lack of justice. But as the poet observes the world around him and despairs of hope, a flower makes its appearance and restores his confidence in the future. The flower without a name, which seems to be a sign of the rose of the people, can overturn the status quo: “É feia. Mas é uma flor. Furou o asfalto, o tédio, o nojo e o ódio.” (It is ugly. But it is a flower. It pierced the asphalt, the boredom, the nausea and the hatred).

“Nosso tempo” [Our Time], is a long poem divided in eight parts that also touches upon the theme of industrial society. Drummond focuses on the alienation of men and women, the mechanisation of life and the process of reification it suffers under the capitalist system, and in part V of the poem creates what is one of the most dramatic pictures of daily existence in the big city. The subject here is the hurried lunch hour in town and the opulent classes of society are portrayed by grotesque imagery of fragmented bodies, such as mouths avidly sucking up the soup or arms mechanically engaged in the act of eating. Drummond also depicts the plight of those who are excluded by the system: “Os subterrâneos da fome choram caldo de sopa, olhos líquidos de cão através do vidro devoram teu osso.” (The underground of hunger pleads for some broth, a dog’s watery eyes devour your bone through the window).

Drummond’s political thought at the time of writing comes through clearly in A rosa do povo. Several poems in the book are in praise of communism, such as “Carta a Stalingrado” [Letter to Stalingrad] and “Telegrama de Moscou” [Telegram from Moscow]. The horrors of war constitute an important theme in the book, and the poem “Visão de 1944” [Vision of 1944] expresses the poet’s anguish as he witnesses the destruction of the world and the debasement of the human race.

But apart from events of world repercussion, Drummond finds inspiration in the daily life of ordinary people in urban and rural surroundings. Drummond exploits popular idioms and colloquialisms to create a realistic picture of his time. “Caso do vestido” [The Dress Episode] is a narrative poem with a distinct dramatic character which tells a story of marital infidelity and the suffering of a woman, whose love for her husband leads her to sacrifice her self-respect and to intercede before the “other” woman in order to help her partner in his escapade. The poem revolves around the conversation of the wife and her daughters, who insist on knowing the full details of the story, which results in a true sociological account of the condition of women in Brazil’s patriarchal society. The popular mood of the composition is emphasised by the metre Drummond chose to employ, which is that of the popular ballads of Brazil, known as romances. “Morte do leiteiro” [The Milkman’s Death] also centres on the struggle of everyday life. The poem creates an intensely dramatic atmosphere as it focuses on one of the many anonymous victims of urban violence. “O mito” [The Myth] is a poem on unrequited love and a further example of Drummond’s ability to extract his material from contemporary society. Traditional lyricism is rejected since the author refuses to apply a “poetic” name to his muse, identifying her instead as fulana, the feminine form of a Brazilian colloquialism for “so-and-so.”

Reminiscence of the past also represents an important theme within the book. The memory of Itabira, the poet’s birthplace, and the motif of ubi sunt are ever recurring in Drummond’s work. His father’s stern figure stands out among the other characters of time revisited, and with him Drummond brings to light the ruthless world of the all-powerful landowners of Brazil. Drummond’s preoccupation with the question of time includes his reflection on the inexorable fate of all human beings. Death is in the foreground in “Os últimos dias” [The Final Days], in which the poet expresses his anguish over the approach of death and his hope that he will have the necessary strength to confront the truth. At the end of the poem Drummond refers explicitly to himself, in these terms: “E a matéria se veja acabar: adeus, composição/que um dia se chamou Carlos Drummond de Andrade.” (May matter come to an end: farewell, composition/which was once called Carlos Drummond de Andrade). The ambiguity perceived within the word “composition,” which is suggested in these verses—that of a piece of poetic creation as well as of a physical and material reality—is an indication of Drummond’s views on art as an integral part of the world with which it should be strongly engaged. This is undoubtedly one of the key ideas expressed in A rosa do povo. The homage to Mário de Andrade, in the book’s penultimate poem, is proof of Drummond’s recognition of the power of art within the boundaries of his country. Charlie Chaplin, celebrated in the closing poem, embodies the universal power of communication that art is endowed with, in all its forms, and its capacity to unite people from different worlds.

SARA BRANDELLERO

Editions

First edition: A rosa do povo, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1945

Further Reading

Mário de Andrade

1893–1945

Brazilian prose writer and poet

It is common in many critical writings on Mário de Andrade to introduce the discussion of his work by referring to a wellknown poem of his entitled “Eu sou trezentos” [I am Three Hundred]. In this poem Mário, as he is informally known in the Brazilian literary world, expresses his painful sense of being torn between many identities, in particular between Europe and Brazil. And indeed, this is a fruitful way of approaching his work since it is the extraordinary manifoldness of his preoccupations which is the hallmark of his life’s work, dedicated not only to the writing of poetry and novels but also to the renewal of Brazilian culture and its emancipation from the legacy of colonialism and dependence on Europe.

Mário de Andrade was one of the leaders of the Brazilian Modernist movement of the 1920s, and his work spanned an intense involvement with the aesthetic preoccupations of the avant-garde, exploration of the role of the intellectual in an undeveloped country, research into popular culture, and practical endeavours to promote the growth of a national and democratised culture. However, in order to understand how Mário’s concerns—his three hundred selves as it were—were related to each other and to his literary work it is necessary to contextualize them within the Modernist movement.

In the 1920s Brazil was undergoing a process of industrialisation which, it seemed, was enabling the country to break with its dependence on the export of primary products, a legacy inherited from the colonial period. At a cultural level, a parallel attempt to renew elite culture in accordance with the social and economic modernisation of Brazil was being formulated by the Modernist movement. This was reflected in the Modernists’ use of the revolutionary aesthetic theories of the European avant-garde. The aspiration to modernity however also contained a strong nationalist element expressed in the Modernists’ attack on the subservient attitude towards European culture, which characterised the conservative cultural establishment of the period, in particular the Parnassian school of poetry with its predilection for themes from Classical antiquity.

Brazilian Modernism was thus characterised by two interrelated tendencies: first, aesthetic experimentation as a way of creating new forms and significations, and second, the search for a national identity through the use of popular culture and analysis of the role of the intellectual and art in the development of an autonomous national culture.

Mário de Andrade’s life and work could be seen as a synthesis of these two tendencies within the Modernist movement. Several of Mário’s early writings are considered seminal in that in many ways they defined the character of the early “heroic” period of Modernism. In “Mestres do passado,” 1921 [Past Masters], Mário fiercely attacks the narrow formalism of Parnassianism while in A escrava que não é Isaura, 1923 [The Slave Who is not Isaura] and in the “Prefácio interessantíssimo” [Riveting Preface], introducing Paulicéia desvairada, 1922 (Hallucinated City), a collage-like poetic evocation of São Paulo, he sets out the precepts and objectives which characterised the Modernist movement. He champions the use of free verse, experimentalism, nonrepresentational art, the incorporation of spoken Portuguese into literature and the importance of the unconscious as a source of lyrical inspiration. Of particular interest in these early writings, in addition to their value as documents of Brazilian Modernism, is Mário’s conception of his role as an artist working in the context of an undeveloped society marked by the colonial legacy. The aesthetics of the avant-garde, in their attack on artistic convention, enabled the subjective truth of the artist, imprisoned in the alienating language of established elite culture, to be recovered. This act of liberation was at the same time a means through which inherited European traditions were to be remade or discarded in the search for forms which were expressive and representative of Brazil. What this commitment to cultural “brazilianisation” (abrasileiramento), as it was defined, entailed is set out in numerous letters to Mário’s friends, in critical articles on Brazilian music and musicians, and it is exemplified in his poetic and literary work. In Mário’s collected letters to the poets Manuel Bandeira and Carlos Drummond de Andrade he emphasizes that while artists from cultures with secure and established traditions could afford to be solely preoccupied with aesthetic perfection, the contemporary period of national construction and self-definition demanded that he devote himself to writing what Mário defined as “circumstantial literature” (literatura de circunstância), that is, literary and critical work which advanced the growth of an autonomous national culture.

With this purpose in mind Mário developed some extremely interesting ideas on the relationship between language, national identity and popular culture. In order to develop a national literary culture, he argued, it was necessary to draw on popular sources, however not in a populist or arbitrary manner, thus giving the work of art a superficially folkloristic flavour, but through systematic research into the popular use of language and the compositional principles of popular music and poetry. Only this immersion in local traditions would enable Brazil to produce independent and original contributions to the Western culture of which it was after all part. Mário’s nationalism was thus not isolationist or xenophobic; it was conceived primarily as a cultural practice through which the discrepancy between “Brazilian reality” and artistic forms uncritically adopted from other, European contexts might be transcended. Several works produced in the 1920s illustrate what this entailed in terms of his own literary and artistic output.

Mário’s sense of his own identity was intimately connected with his conception of Brazilian identity; both were riven contradictions and dualities. In Paulicéia desvairada, for example, it is symbolised in the image of an Indian playing a European instrument; “Sou um tupi tangendo um alaúde!” (I am a Tupi Indian strumming a lute!) he exclaims. To this feeling of inner fragmentation and ambiguity, he counterposes the possibility of human solidarity in a spiritually unified Brazil. Thus, in “O poeta come amendoim,” 1926 [The Peanut-eating Poet], he elaborates on the sensual and intimate nature of this spiritual fusion: “Brasil…/Mastigado na gostosura quente do amendoim…/falado numa língua a curum /De palavras incertas num remeleixo melancólico/…Brasil que eu sou porque é minha expressão muito engraçada/ Porque é meu sentimento pachorrento/Porque é meu jeito de ganhar dinheiro, de comer e de dormir. (Brazil…/chewed in the warm deliciousness of peanuts/spoken in a child-like tongue/of vague words in a melancholic sweet swinging gait /…Brazil, that is me because it is my funny expression/ because it is my unhurried feeling/because it is my way of earning a living, of eating and sleeping.) It is however in the novel Macunaima, o herói sem nem caráter, 1928 (Macunaima) that the many facets of Mário’s preoccupations with national identity and the relationship between high and popular culture are articulated in their full complexity and richness.

Macunaima is a mercurial trickster figure, discovered by Mário in his readings of the work of a German anthropologist on the Venezuelan Indians. He is depicted as having no character, an idea which Mário uses as a metaphor for Brazil. A mythical tribal Indian from the Amazon, Macunaima is given a magical amulet by his lover, Cí, the Empress of the Amazon which unwittingly lands in the hands of a wealthy cannibalist/giant/industrialist in São Paulo. In order to retrieve it, Macunaima must visit São Paulo, but his encounter with “civilisation” in the modern city leads him to betray his Amazonic origin and his eventual return to the tropical forest is marked by death and defeat. Anarchic and proficient in the use of magic to attain his ends, Macunaima is like Brazil: multiple and full of possibility. However, his melancholy end is also a commentary on the dire consequences of not being grounded in a solid identity, of being “characterless.” In its surreal construction and incorporation of elements from popular culture, this novel exemplifies perhaps most clearly the synthesis between avant-garde techniques and “the national” which the Modernists advocated.

In the late 1920s and 1930s Mário’s concern with literary nationalism is broadened to include ethnographic studies of popular culture, carried out during two journeys to the Amazon and the northeast of Brazil, as well as practical experiments in cultural politics. This is accompanied by a gradual commitment to socialism, a critique of civilisation and a rearticulation of his views on the role of art, which in the context of the rise of fascism in Europe and the dictatorial state of Brazil in 1937, become increasingly critical of those who claim that art should exist only for its own sake.

Mário’s journeys to the north of Brazil, informed by his readings of Freud and Keyserling, and on Surrealism and the anthropological work of Frazer, Levy-Brühl and Tyler, documented in his witty travel journals “O turista aprendiz,” 1929 [An Apprentice in Tourism], led Mário to elaborate an interesting theory, first set out in “A divina preguiça,” 1918 [Divine Idleness], on the importance of idleness and the principle of Being in the development of a genuine Brazilian identity. Macunaíma and the Amazon typify this quality of Being and Macunaíma’s defeat after his encounter with “civilisation” encapsulates Mário’s critical stance towards the instrumental rationality of Western civilisation and his growing ambivalence towards Modernity.

The 1930s was a period of political radicalisation, in which the Modernists split into right and left-wing tendencies. As a supporter of the liberal Democratic Party, Mário wrote copiously for its daily paper, the Diário Nacional on the relationship between art and politics. Brought together in the volume Taxi e crônicas no Diário Nacional [Taxi and Chronicles in the National Daily], these writings prefigure his activities as director of the Municipal Department of Culture in São Paulo in the mid 1930s.

Overviews of Mário’s work rarely discuss his achievements in the Department of Culture in any great depth. They are however an important testimony of his conviction that culture, understood as a process of the spiritual growth of a people, was equally essential to the development of Brazil as economic growth. The overall aim of the Department of Culture was to disseminate both high and popular culture. This included the promotion of drama, cinema and music, research and archival work, the creation of a Museum of Ethnography and Folklore and of several music and book libraries.

Among his late essays the collections O baile das quatro artes [The Ball of the Four Arts] and Aspectos da literatura brasileira [Aspects of Brazilian Literature] contain some of his most interesting reflections on art and society; in a re-creation of Plato’s Symposium, O banquete [The Banquet], they are placed in the mouths of several characters seated around a sumptuous dinner-table. At a different level, Mário’s anguish about the state of the world is expressed in two major poetic works Costela do grão cão, 1937 [Great Hell Hound of October] and Carro da miséria, 1943 [Wagon of Misery]. “Meditação sobre o Tietê” [Meditation on the Tietê], written shortly before his death in 1945, could perhaps be considered his most poetically dense reflection on the human condition and the power of art to act as a humanising force.

VIVIAN SCHELLING
Biography

Born in São Paulo, Brazil, 9 October 1893. Attended the Escola de Nossa Senhora do Carmo from 1905 to 1909, the Álvares Penteado Commercial School in 1910 and studied piano at the Musical and Dramatic Conservatory, 1911–17, all in São Paulo. During the 1920s he was a member of avant-garde artistic circles: co-organizer of the Modern Art Week at the Teatro Municipal, São Paulo in 1922. Professor of the History of Music and Aesthetics, São Paulo Conservatory, 1925. From 1928 Andrade wrote the “Taxi” column for Diário Nacional. Worked for the Ministry of Educations’s schools’ music reform programme in 1930. With Paulo Duarte he co-founded and became the director of the Municipal Department of Culture, 1934–37. During this period he founded the Municipal Library, the Department of National Heritage, the journal Revista do Arquivo Municipal de São Paulo and São Paulo’s Ethnography and Folklore Society (of which he became the first president). In 1937 he moved to Rio de Janeiro and in the following year became the director of the Federal University Institute of Arts. He held the Chair of Philosophy and History of Art, and headed the Enciclopédia brasileira project for the National Book Institute in 1939. In 1941, under commission from the Department of National Heritage, Andrade made anthropological research trips to northern Brazil. Co-founder of the Brazilian Society of Writers in 1942. Died in São Paulo, 25 February 1945.

Selected Works

Poetry
Há uma gota de sangue em cada poema, São Paulo: Pocai, 1917 [Published under the pseudonym Mário Sobral]

Clã do jaboti, São Paulo: Eugênio Cupolo, 1927

Remate de males, São Paulo: Eugênio Cupolo, 1930

Lira paulistana, São Paulo: Martins, 1946

Novels
Amar, verbo intransitivo, São Paulo, Antônio Tisi, 1927; as Fräulein, translated by Margaret Richardson Hollingsworth, New York: Macaulay, 1933

Belazart, São Paulo: Pitatininga, 1934

Short Fiction
Primeiro andar, São Paulo: Antônio Tisi, 1926

Essays
A escrava que não é Isaura, São Paulo: Lealdade, 1925

O movimento modernista, Rio de Janeiro: Casa do Estudante, 1942

Aspectos da literatura brasileira, Rio de Janeiro: America-Edit, 1943

O baile das quarto artes, São Paulo: Martins, 1943

Os filhos da Candinha, São Paulo: Martins, 1943

Other Writings
Oswald de Andrade 1890–1954

Brazilian poet and prose writer

One of the most expressive writers of the first moment of Brazilian Modernism, both in the field of poetry and prose, Oswald de Andrade was also the author of two of the principal manifestos of the movement: “Poesia pau-brasil” [BrazilWood Poetry] and “Antropófago” [Cannibal]. The “Manifesto da poesia pau-brasil,” which would be later rescued and deepened by “Antropófago,” was conceived in Paris on the occasion of one of his recurrent trips to Europe. Oswald then kept in fruitful contact with representatives of the European avantgarde, allowing himself to be influenced, among all the “isms” that abounded, especially by Futurism and Primitivism (generally one can say that the former proposed to experiment with language from elements related to modern civilization, while the latter used exactly the elements repressed by it). This influence can be felt throughout his works and is evident in this first manifesto, where the writer defined the programme for his literature, i.e., a satire on the previous literary style and the class that sponsored it (of which he was the prodigal son): the “erudite” and “graduate” Brazil of the coffee aristocracy became bourgeoisie in the big cities.

He would immediately exemplify his poetry with the publication of Pau-brasil and Primeiro caderno do aluno de poesia Oswald de Andrade [The Poetry Apprentice...
Oswald de Andrade’s First Notebook]. Both works consist of poems that are extremely short, anti-metric, anti-rhetoric, where the colloquial intervenes all the time, immediately revealing the “futurist” preoccupation with maximum conciseness in addition to the “primitivist” quest for expression free of literary prejudice, above all, the prejudice against the spontaneity of the spoken language that in his writings appears “with the millionfold contribution of all mistakes”. Oswald was most successful in extracting poetry from what was previously considered apothegmatic. Another means invoked by him to fight the seriousness, grandiloquence, and “scholarliness” until then predominant in Brazilian literature was humour, especially parody, e.g., the poem made of fragments of the historic first letter informing Portugal of the newly found land, or the ones made of “anthological” poems such as Goncalves Dias’s “Canção do Exílio”[Exile’s Song].

Oswald aimed at freeing himself from the prejudice of the “erudite” and “graduate” Brazil by incorporating the primitive purity of the indigenous in Pau brasil, and of the child in Primeiro caderno, only then the poetic experience would be rediscovered: “A poesia pau-brasil. Ágil e cândida. Como uma criança” [Brazil-Wood Poetry. Agile and pure. Like a child]. To this primitivism corresponded an equivalent futurism in that this “agile” and “pure” poetry, in its economy and simplicity, dismantled the complex logical structure of the language, substituting for the old order the modern ideas of discontinuity, fragmentation, simultaneity and juxtaposition of “words in freedom.” Hence the curious coexistence between the primitivism of the “pure” intuition of the child and the indian, and the modernity of the spirit of conciseness animated by the pragmatism inherent in the civilization of technique and speed.

The translation of his poetry into prose produced two (equally dismantling) novels—or inventions, as he preferred to call them: Memórias sentimentais de João Miramar (The Sentimental Memoirs of John Seaborne) and Serafim Ponte Grande (Serafim grosse Pointe). Deeply influenced, as a reader of the futurists, by the technique of cinematographic montage, Oswald inaugurated in Brazilian literature, with the publication of Miramar, what became known as the “aesthetics of the fragmented.” Just as the rapid collage of many stills produces a film, his novel would be created from the montage of diverse text fragments, more precisely 163 fleeting chapters, displayed in blocks in a non-sequential way, juxtaposed with telegraphic conciseness, the only common axis being the character João Miramar. So in 1924 the linearity of the novel was ruptured in Brazil, through Miramar in which the traditional order was subverted in favour of a revolutionary one marked by the discontinuous rhythms of modern life. With Serafim Ponte Grande, published almost a decade later, Oswald further developed the modern technique of producing a novel by the montage of fragments, their rapid collage without supporting comparisons suggesting at the same time the primitivism of seeing with “free eyes.” This time he also mixed styles, such as narrative in the first and third person and also narrative in the form of a diary. Thus, as predicted in the manifesto, his prose would be “agile” and “pure,” like a child.

In the 1930s Oswald ventured into making theatre concerning social issues, O homem e o cavalo [The Man and the Horse], O rei da vela [The Candle Baron], plays that would later be acknowledged as the beginning of modern Brazilian theatre. He returned to poetry in the 1940s, and even though by then he had reached a happy combination of experimental and politically engaged literature, mainly with “Cântico dos cânticos para flauta e violão” [The Chant of Chants for Flute and Guitar] and “O escaravelho de ouro”
[The Golden Beetle], the image of him that remains as the most remarkable is the one framed by the constant anarchic Primitivism of his first creations.

TERESINHA V. ZIMBRÃO DA SILVA

Biography

Selected Works

Novels
A trilogia do exílio, 3 vols, 1917–21: Alma, A estrela de absinto, A escada; in 1 volume, as Os condenados, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1941
Marco zero, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1943
Um homem sem profissão: sob as ordens de mamãe, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1953

Plays
Teatro: A morta; O rei da vela, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1937

Other Writings
Primeiro caderno do aluno de poesia Oswald de Andrade, São Paulo: privately printed, 1927

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading

Only after the publication of the monograph by Haroldo de Campos was critical interest awakened in Oswald de Andrade’s works.
Brito, Mário da Silva, As metamorfoses de Oswald de Andrade, São Paulo: Conselho Estadual de Cultura, Comissão de Literatura, 1972
Campos, Haroldo de, Oswald de Andrade, Rio de Janeiro: Agir, 1967
manifesto antropófago

Manifesto by Oswald de Andrade

Published in 1928, the “Manifesto antropófago” consolidated the cultural and poetic vision of Modernist writer Oswald de Andrade, which is here made explicit through praising the “evil” wild man, the cannibal devourer of the white European. Oswald thus abandoned the submissive image of “the noble savage”—defined by an idealization of the wild—in favour of an immaculate perspective of the opposite, to be admired in its difference, i.e., not in spite of, but because of cannibalism. Whereupon this stifled root—a taboo of the Brazilian national identity—was daringly proclaimed a legitimate expression of culture (totem). And so immediately one of the main principles of the manifesto came of age: “A transformação permanente do Tabu em totem” (The permanent transformation of the taboo into totem). The principle had important consequences for Brazilian literature since it entailed proclaiming that the country’s barbarism—taboo because until then it was a cause for embarrassment (or at best romantic idealization) when compared to the civilized metropolis, the mirror in which the colony was always contemplating itself—should therefore be seen as a source of inspiration, and not any more as a hindrance in the production of culture. And a most original source of inspiration since it represented the native element in all its rusticity, radically modifying the foreign model.

So, if on the one hand it is true that the poetic and cultural vision of Oswald de Andrade was inspired by European Primitivism (in the sense that the latter proposed experimentation with language from elements repressed by modern society), on the other hand it is no less true that this primitivism underwent a radical modification when it was itself “digested” by the cannibalism of the “Brasil Caraíba.” Hence it was primarily cannibalism, persistent instinct: “Nunca fomos catequisados” (We have never been catechized) inherited from the indigenous, intended as the major source of inspiration for the Cannibal movement. The movement, in the spirit of the metaphor after which it was named, then proposed the critical devouring of the European contribution—to the point of transforming the latter into some other product, with its own characteristics—instead of the previous passive acceptance predominant in the country’s literary media. In other words, just like the cannibal who critically devoured his enemies, thus incorporating the Other, though only to obtain his “essence” necessary for the renewal of his or her forces; in the same way, Brazilian literature in order to obtain what it needed—originality—should in its turn critically devour foreign models: “Antropofagia. Absorção do inimigo sacro. Para transformá-lo em totem” (Cannibalism. Absorption of the sacred enemy to transform it into totem). In brief, in this process of incorporation the foreign models in contact with the “native enzymes” during “digestion” would be radically modified, to the point of being transformed into something original.

Oswald symbolically dates his “Manifesto antropófago” from the day the indigenous people devoured Dom Pedro Sardinha, the first bishop in Brazil: “Ano 374 da Deglutição do Bispo Sardinha” (Year 374 after the Swallowing of Bishop Sardinha). This event could be claimed to be the first of the most expressive ones that have been taking place in the country in a cannibalistic process of assimilation of European culture: the cannibals were in their own way assimilating the supposed religious virtues (totem) of the missionary enemy (taboo), sent from Europe to catechize them. More than three hundred years later, one could add to that one another major event, the original Oswaldian ingestion of European Primitivism, and the further ingestion of Shakespeare who, after being critically “digested” by the Brazilian became: “Tupi or not Tupi, that is the question”.

The Cannibalist movement was one of the most important aspects of Brazilian Modernism, contributing to the definitive liberation of Brazilian literature from historic and ethnic repression. In addition, from the 1920s, it created a daring programme of literary autonomy that today is considered to be one of the most coherent ever.

TERESINHA V. ZIMBRÃO DA SILVA

See also entries on Caliban, Civilization and Barbarism

Editions

Further Reading

Campos, Haroldo de, Oswald de Andrade, Rio de Janeiro: Agir, 1967
——“Da razão antropofágica: a Europa sob o signo da devoração” in Colóquio/Letras 62, (July 1981)
Johnson, Randal, “Tupy or not Tupy: Cannibalism and Nationalism in Contemporary Brazilian Literature and Culture,” in Modern Latin American Fiction: a Survey, edited by John King, London: Faber and Faber, 1987 [Chapter 3 has section on this manifesto]
Nunes, Benedito, “Antropofagia ao alcance de todos,” in Do Pau Brasil a antropofagia e as utopias: manifestos, teses de concursos e ensaios, Obras completas, vol. 6, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1978
José Pereira da Graça Aranha

1868–1931

Brazilian prose writer

This lawyer-diplomat-judge from the northern Brazilian state of Maranhão became, almost in spite of himself, one of Brazil’s best known turn-of-the-century fiction writers. His literary output is small in quantity, consisting of a half-dozen works; one of these, however—the novel Canaã (originally published as Chanaân), 1902 (Canaan), based on a legal case over which he had presided—served to guarantee his fame as a writer thoroughly imbued with a heightened sense of national consciousness, great aesthetic appreciation, and an awareness of the problems of his place and time in history.

A precocious graduate of the College of Law of Recife, and disciple of Professor Tobias Barreto in particular, Graça Aranha combined an illustrious career of public service with continuous personal dedication to the creation of aesthetic beauty and the stimulation of cultural and political movements or tendencies which he perceived to be imaginative or constructive in a broad or global sense. It was the latter commitment which inspired his enthusiastic support of, and participation in, the “Semana de Arte Moderna,” a multimedia inaugural manifestation of the nascent Brazilian Modernist movement in 1922.

Graça Aranha burst on the Brazilian literary scene in 1902 with his best fictional work, Canaã, a thesis novel dealing with German immigration to the central coastal area of Brazil during the decade of the 1890s. Though the novel espouses no fixed philosophical system, it is in large part a dialogue between two German immigrants of widely divergent persuasions and life experiences: Lentz, a Prussian racist convinced that Brazil needs strong Aryan blood to set it on a positive future course, and Milkau, an idealistic altruist dedicated to racial harmony and miscegenation. The lengthy rhetorical dialogues, or “position statements,” are interspersed among narrative segments depicting the relations of the new immigrants, older groups of Germanic colonos, and the Portuguesespeaking mixed-race rural population, along with vividly drawn descriptions of the natural environment of the state of Espírito Santo. In the midst of this lyric prose flow (described by some anthological histories as “symbolist”) falls a pathologically naturalistic episode in which a single mother of Germanic descent, expelled from home because of her pregnancy and rejected by all the other families of the immigrant colony, gives birth in the open country to a child who is almost immediately devoured by a rampaging herd of wild pigs. Justice is quick to condemn and sentence young Maria Perutz to jail, but eventually Milkau manages to liberate her and flees with her in search of an elusive Edenic future as the novel ends. “Canaã,” the work’s title, denotes diverse and contradictory things to the several principal actors of this dramatic novel, which in spite of its unevenness of style communicates a lasting and thought-provoking impression of a Brazil seeking its 20th-century destiny in a pluralistic world fraught with ethnic strife.

While serving as a diplomat in western Europe, Graça Aranha composed and staged (in Paris) the play Malazarte (1911), in which the Brazilian folkloric figure of the same name appears, along with the symbolic character Dionisia, opposite a realistic family in the throes of economic straits. Reality and fantasy intermix in Graça Aranha’s only full-fledged stage play, which privileges a philosophically pantheistic view of nature as an ideally atemporal and lyric refuge for those burdened by life.

The author’s 1930 novel, A viagem maravilhosa [The Marvelous Journey], focuses on love and revolutionary activity as the two essential pillars of life for a modern couple (Filipe and Teresa), with love winning out as the ultimate solution for all ills. As a fictional work it lacks the impact of Canaã.

Graça Aranha’s most noteworthy non-fictional prose work is his 1921 philosophical essay, A estética da vida [The Aesthetics of Life]. Although it espouses no systematic body of beliefs, the book is relevant to the cultural ferment operating in western Europe and the Americas (especially Brazil) in the post-World War I period and about to explode in the advent of Modernism. Starting with an intuitive, anti-scientific view of the universe, this essay attempts to fuse the individual and the cosmic into an infinite, integrated and creative whole. Four paths to such an integration are discerned by Graça Aranha: art, philosophy, religion and love, with feeling rather than thinking serving as the best human method of achievement of the goal of transcendental happiness. Such is the author’s definition of what he calls the “Metafísica brasileira.” Graça Aranha’s eclectic predisposition to all that might be considered culturally creative led to his involvement in the organization and coordination of the “Semana de Arte Moderna” soon after the publication of A estética da vida. He was a “cultural cannibal” several years before Oswaldo de Andrade coined the term in 1928, and in 1924 hotly defended the young Modernist writers, musicians, and artists in a speech (“O espírito moderno”) before the Academia Brasileira de Letras, of which he had been a member since its founding in 1896. In the face of incomprehension and outright hostility from the majority in the traditional Academia, he severed relations with the prestigious entity and threw in his lot with the “Young Turks,” for whom he served as moral support and galvanizing force.

Graça Aranha was a fairly prolific public speaker and author of newspaper articles. As editor of the works of others, he published in 1923 an annotated edition of the Correspondencia de Machado de Assis e Joaquim Nabuco [Correspondence between Machado de Assis and Joaquim Nabuco]. Though not an original philosophical mind, he was successful in synthesizing currents of contemporary thought and communicating them in essay form and through the dialogues of his rather abstract fictional characters. His literary/cultural role in turn-of-the-century Brazil may be described as that of catalyst and “antenna” of the contradictory voices of tradition and innovation in multiple facets of national life.

MARY L. DANIEL

Biography

Born in Maranhão State, Brazil, 21 June 1868. Studied law at the University of Recife. Awarded degree, 1886. Entered diplomatic corps and worked in several countries of northern Europe. Among the founding members of the Brazilian Academy of Letters, 1896; resigned 1924. Returned to Brazil on permanent basis, 1921. Supported Brazilian Modernismo. Died in 1931.
Selected Works

Novels

Canaã [originally published as Chanaãn], Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1902.; as Canaan, translated by Mariano Joaquín Lorente, Boston: Four Seas Company, and London: Allen and Unwin, 1911

A viagem maravilhosa, Rio de Janeiro and Paris: Garnier, 1929

Play

Malazarte, Rio de Janeiro: F.Briquet, 1911

Other Writings

A estética da vida, Rio de Janeiro and Paris: Garnier, 1921

O meu próprio romance, São Paulo: Companhia Editora Nacional, 1931 [autobiography]

Compilations and Anthologies

Trechos escolhidos, selected by Renato Almeida, Rio de Janeiro: Livraria AGIR, 1970

Further Reading

Pacheco, Armando Correia, Graça Aranha—La obra y el hombre (Escritores de America)

Washington, DC: n.p., 1951

Reinaldo Arenas 1943–1990

Cuban prose writer, poet and dramatist

The relationship between this Cuban writer’s life and work is almost symbiotic. As a son abandoned by a father he never knew, as a homosexual rejected by a repressive society, as an intellectual who criticized repression in all its forms, Reinaldo Arenas’s work is a cry for freedom which reaches across the frontiers of his island and takes on a universal dimension. His writing if often called the literature of exile, but it also has all the characteristics of postmodernity.

Arenas is noted for his re-writing: time and time again he had to remake stolen, confiscated, or lost novels. He devoted a large part of his life to writing what he called a pentagony, a series of five novels which recount the life of Cuba from the point of view of an almost always marginal character who dies and is reborn in the next novel to tell of some new horror. The novels are based on the historical and political cycle of Cuba over the last forty years, and begin with the publication in 1967 of Celestino antes del alba (Singing from the Well). In this novel, the narrator is a country boy who, now dead, tells of a childhood of domestic violence, wives abandoned by their husbands, children without fathers. Celestino comes back to life in El palacio de las blanquisimas mofetas (The Palace of the White Skunks). The narrator, an adolescent, also dead, tells of life under the Batista dictatorship. Otra vez el mar (Farewell to the Sea) denounces the tyranny and repression of the revolutionary regime which followed Batista to power in 1959. El color del verano [The Color of Summer] takes place at the end of the 20th century. It is a cruel carnavalesque parody in which the island sinks into the sea, destroyed by a people incapable of governing her. This novel also rewrites Arenas’s own life story in that some chapters are a fictional version of events recounted in his autobiography. El asalto (The Assault) is Orwellian in tone in that it deals with the decomposition of a being who, under a terrible dictatorship loses his humanity and becomes, in turn, just another repressor. This novel brings together all the Arenian themes and sources of anger. In a kind of catharsis, the author through his main character manages to destroy his mother who in turn the great dictator, the origin and symbol of all repression. El mundo alucinante (Hallucinations) is based on the memory of the Mexican Friar Servando Teresa de Mier (1765–1827). It has a double historical plot and raises the issue of the human being’s need of liberty. The entire narrative, which involves a continual switch from character to author, develops from a sentence in the prologue, presented as a letter: “The most useful thing was to discover that you and I are the same person.” This sentence prefigures the novel since the fictionalized version of Fray Servando’s life is mixed up with an account of the author’s own life. They share repression, marginalization, prison, constant flight and exile. Aside from the autobiographical element common to all Arenas’s works, El mundo alucinante also resembles other fictions by this author through the themes of homosexuality, eroticism, violence, death, the sea (which he loved) as a recurrent symbol, and the play of doubles. To some extent the friar’s exile anticipates that of the author: “Viene de una isla salvaje a tratar con salvajes desconocidos. Se inicia en el destierro. Debo ser más piadoso” (He comes from a savage island to deal with unknown savages. He is learning about exile. I must be more compassionate). Unfortunately, at the time of writing El mundo alucinante the writer was totally ostracized in his own country, where by this time (early 1970s) he was not allowed to publish. This, however, did not stop him writing. Arturo, la estrella más brillante (Arthur the Brightest Star) and Que Eva trine, 1971 [Let Eva Fume], together with La vieja Rosa (Old Rosa) written a few years earlier, form the first cycle of his short novels. The three are part of this total all-encompassing work he wanted to write.

When Arenas finally managed to escape to the United States in 1980, he recomposed and published his unpublished works. His novels written in exile began dealing with new themes. The verbal violence, suicide, death and despair, and the cruel parody of the pentagon cycle and some other short novels and stories, were abandoned. The work he wrote abroad suggests that Arenas’s untimely death interrupted a possible new cycle. It shows a less brutal type of humour and a glimmer of hope. El portero (The Doorman) and Viaje a La Habana [Journey to Havana] demonstrate this type. The more mature writer abandons the structure of a closed circle, which we saw in the pentagon, and leaves the reader to recreate the ending. The end is not determined at the beginning. Arenas takes the anguish of all human life and suggests possible relief, which in El portero seems to be the door that the hero seeks tirelessly. This door represents another dimension, perhaps spiritual, which the characters, like the author, seem to welcome.

Arenas’s poetry is to a large extent part of this total work he was trying to write. It is in his poetry that art demonstrates the power to make human beings transcend their own limitations, because as he says in El color del verano, poetry envelops him in “el éxtasis de la belleza” (the ecstasy of beauty). Leprosorio [The Leper Colony] combines the themes found in most of his other work. This long poem unearths fifty years of continual slavery and pain under different oppressive systems. Like the French philosopher, Michel Foucault, Reinaldo Arenas mentioned on various occasions the possibility of transcendence through words, through creation. In the work which closes the cycle of his life, his highly coloured autobiography Antes que anochezca (Before Night Falls), he affirms, talking about José Lezama Lima: “la ratificación de la labor creadora, del amor a la palabra, de la lucha por la imagen completa contra todos los que se oponía n a ell a” (the urge, the love of words, the struggle for imagination against those who oppose it). The very title of this book draws to a close Arenas’s literary cycle: from the initial dawn of his first novel, he moves on to the night of his autobiography which presages his own end. Necesidad de libertad [Need for Freedom], a collection of his essays, repeatedly affirms transcendence through art. He states that “la verdadera patria de un autor es la hoja en blanco” (the writer’s real country is the blank page). Both these books are indispensable if we are to understand the fusion of life and art in this Cuban artist, to understand his recurring themes and symbols, and above all understand the heartrending anguish of each one of the exiles that produces his literature.

MARÍA L. NEGRÍN
translated by Ann Wright

Biography

Born in the province of Holguín, Cuba, 16 July 1943. His formal education was sketchy and he was largely self-taught. Researcher at José Martí National Library in Havana, 1963–68. Befriended by Eliseo Diego, Cintio Vitier and other intellectuals who worked at the José Martí National Library in 1960s. Repaid them by running them down in his autobiography. Editor of La Gaceta de Cuba, 1968–74. Deeply rebellious by nature, it was inevitable that he would clash with an authoritarian government. Had manuscripts confiscated and was denied access to employment. From 1974 to 1976 he was in prison in El Morro, Havana. Left Cuba during the Mariel exodus in 1980. Professor of Cuban literature, University of Florida, 1980; Professor of literature, Cornell University, 1985. Awarded the French prize for the best foreign novel in 1969 for El mundo alucinante. In the United States he was awarded Cintas (1982) and Guggenheim grants (1983). Terminally ill with AIDS, he committed suicide in New York, 7 December 1990.

Selected Works

Novels

Otra vez el mar, Barcelona: Arcos Vergara, 1982; as Farewell to the Sea, translated by Andrew Hurley, New York: Viking, 1986

Cantando en el pozo, Barcelona: Arcos Vergara, 1982

Viaje a La Habana (novela en tres viajes), Madrid: Mondadori, 1990

El color del verano, Miami: Universal, 1991

Adiós a mamá (de La Habana a Nueva York), Barcelona: Altera, 1995

Novellas and Short Fiction

La vieja Rosa, Caracas: Librería Cruz del Sur, 1980; as Old Rosa: a Novel in Two Stories, translated by Andrew Hurley and Ann Tashi Slater, New York: Grove Press, 1989 [This volume contains also a translation of Arturo, la estrella más brillante]

Termina el desfile, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1981 Arturo, la estrella más brillante, Barcelona: Montesinos, 1984

Play

Persecución: cinco piezas de teatro experimental, Miami: Universal, 1986

Poetry

Leprosorio, trilogía poética, Madrid: Betania, 1989

Mixed Genre and Non-Fiction

Homenaje a Ángel Cuadra, Miami: Solar, 1981 [Cuadra is a Cuban poet who spent many years in prison after Castro came to power]

Necesidad de libertad, Mexico City: Kosmos, 1986 [essays]

Voluntad de vivir manifestándose, Madrid: Betania, 1989

Un plebiscito a Fidel Castro, Madrid: Betania, 1990

Antes que anochezca, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1992; as Before Night Falls, translated by Dolores Koch, London: Viking, 1993
Further Reading

Diego, Eliseo, “Sobre Celestino antes del alba” Casa de las Américas 45 (1967)
Lugo Nazario, Felix, La alucinación y los recursos literarios en las novelas de Reinaldo Arenas, Miami: Universal, 1995
Rodríguez Ortiz, Oscar, Sobre narradores y heroes: a propósito de Arenas, Scorza y Adoum, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1980
Sánchez, Reinaldo (editor), Reinaldo Arenas: recuerdo y presencia, Miami: Universal, 1994
Solotorevsky, Myrna, La relación mundo-escritura en textos de Reinaldo Arenas, Juan José Saer y Juan Carlos Martínez Gaithersburg, Maryland: Hispamérica, 1993
Soto, Francisco, Conversación con Reinaldo Arenas, Madrid: Betania, 1990
Tomás, Lourdes, Fray Servando alucinado, Miami: Iberian Studies Institute, University of Miami, 1994
Valero, Roberto, El desamparado humor de Reinaldo Arenas, Miami: Iberian Studies Institute, University of Miami, 1991

Arturo, la estrella más brillante

Novella by Reinaldo Arenas
This text by Arenas presents the relationship between the depicted world and writing, the deception of writing being the attitude which imposes itself on this depicted world. The work opens by making writing evident, through the following quote: “He visto un lugar remotísimo habitado por elefantes regios” (I have seen a most remote place inhabited by regal elephants) and the nature of writing is immediately explained: “había escrito hacía unos años” (He had written a few years ago).
Right from the beginning, the novella introduces a skeptical perspective on language, negating a relationship—previously postulated by the protagonist—between writing and salvation: “cuando aún pensaba que un grupo de signos, que la cadencia de unas imágenes adecuadamente descritas, que las palabras, podrían salvarlo…” (when he still thought that a group of signs, the cadence of some adequately described images, the words, could save him…). Analeptically, that is to say, by moving backwards in time, the text focuses on the moment in which the act of writing begins, as though this act were the only means the character has of defending himself from an oppressive and hostile world: “esa misma noche decidió que para salvarse tenía que comenzar a escribir inmediatamente, e inmediatamente comenzó (that same night he decided that in order to save himself he had to begin writing immediately, and he began at once).
Writing is conceived as a testimony and an instrument of rebellion: “porque él se iba a rebelar, dando testimonio de todo el horror, comunicándole a alguien, a muchos, al mundo, o aunque fuese a una sola persona que aún conservara incorruptible su capacidad de pensar, la realidad; y las libretas traídas por Rosa se fueron saturando de una letra mínima, veloz, casi ilegible, había que darse prisa, había que seguir rápido, y tomando precauciones” (because he was going to rebel, attesting to all the horror, communicating to someone, to many people, to the world, even to one single person whose capacity to think still remains incorruptible: reality; and the notebooks brought by Rosa were becoming glutted with a tiny, rapid, almost illegible script; he had to hurry, he had to act quickly and take precautions).

In this text, the author and the reader are configured merely as the means by which what happens in the work takes place: “y tuvo casi terror al pensar que también él podría ser un instrumento, un simple artefacto, y que la gran melodía, la gran creación, la obra, surgía, surgiría, estaba allí, inexorable, y que sencillamente lo utilizaba, como pudo haber utilizado a cualquier otro, como utilizaba también a sus intérpretes” (and he was almost seized by terror at the thought that he, too, could be an instrument, a mere artefact, and that the grand melody, the grand creation, the work, was issuing forth, would issue forth, was there, relentless, and that it was simply using him, just as it could have used anyone else, just as it was also using its interpreters).

Arthur’s mistrust of language is a consequence of the character becoming aware of his physical perfection and its ephemeral nature: “fué por entonces cuando por primera vez comenzó a temerle a la muerte y a dudar de la efectividad de las palabras” (it was then for the first time that he began to fear death and to entertain doubts about the effectiveness of words).

Arthur will substitute the act of writing for a mere unfolding of images, which cannot do without—unbeknownst to the character—language or writing as a model. The lack of distinction between writing and images is shown by the text itself, in repeating the images “jacintos, turquesas, ónix, ópalos, calcedonías, jades” (hyacinths, turquoises, onyxes, opals, chalcedonies, jades), which correspond to the words previously written by Arthur—“jacintos, turquesas, ónix, ópalos, calcedonias, jades” (hyacinths, turquoises, onyxes, opals, chalcedonies, jades). The images emphasize the “impression of reality,” which is so necessary to the character.

The construction to which Arthur devotes himself and which will culminate in the “magnum opus” is certainly an analogon of the act of writing. The state of creation, according to Arthur, corresponds to an aerial situation of ascension and weightlessness, related to the title, Arturo, la estrella más brillante, and to the dedication: “A Nelson, en el aire” (To Nelson, in the Air):

era como si de pronto lo estuviesen levantando, lo alzasen, flotase (otra vez, otra vez), y en ese espacio sin atmósfera, él ascendía, ascendía, ascendía

[it was as though they were suddenly raising him, lifting him up and he was floating (again and again); and in this atmosphere-less space he ascended—up and up and up]
In the Notes at the very end of the text, Arenas states: “Pienso en ese momento en que, granada en mano, sobrevolando la isla con sus campos de trabajo y sus cárcceles, Nelson se sintió libre, en el aire.” (I think of that moment when, with the grenade in his hand, while flying over the island with its labor camps and prisons, Nelson felt free, in the air). The references to Nelson are specularly related to a poem titled “Si te llamaras Nelson” [If You Were Called Nelson] in which are found motifs that persist in Arenas’s work: clandestine writing, transport to a forced labor camp, denunciation by one’s best friend, the sight of one’s own brothers taking aim to kill. (It should be noted that Nelson Rodríguez Leyva was the name of a friend of Arenas who died in an attempt to escape from Cuba by plane).

The plot justifies the protagonist’s skepticism—a skepticism which turns out to be valid not only with regard to writing but also with regard to its analogon, the imaginative creation: the “real” world is fatally imposed onto the construction effected by the character: “fue entonces cuando la gran música, el canto coral de los ángeles, se apagó y Arturo se vio corriendo hacia una tropa de soldados que, arma al pecho avanzaban también hacia él” (it was then when the great music, the choral chant of the angels, was extinguished and Arthur saw himself running toward a band of soldiers who, their weapons held chest high, were also advancing towards him). Starting with the title and the dedication and continuing until the end of the text, a fatal movement has been sketched—from ascension to descent, from air to earth.

The dominant actor in the imposition of the “real” world which will affect the protagonist, is his mother, her dominance being psychologically understandable given Arthur’s homosexuality; in his view, his mother, “enfurecida y vestida de militar” (furious and dressed like a soldier) appears at the head of a band of soldiers which will liquidate him.

The mother’s dominance can also be estimated from the text’s title: the protagonist feels repugnance for the coincidence rightly discovered in Astronomía para las damas (Astronomy for Ladies), between his name and that of a star “que su madre llamaba el lucero de la tarde, o por otro nombre parecido” (which his mother called the evening star, or by some similar name). It is interesting to note that “la estrella vespertina” (the evening star) is another name for Venus, the goddess of Love. In Arthur’s view, his mother points to this star threateningly as a contrast to his hand on his penis; his mother’s gesture is imposed while “Arturo, la estrella más brillante” becomes the title of the novella, but the character’s hand remains fixed on his penis, his sexual problems unresolved.

As a supreme annihilation of his creation, the addressee of Arthur’s creation, who is also the culmination of that same creation, he, the god, his god—in a repeated inversion in Arenas’s works—has joined the contingent of his adversaries:

y entre los anónimos y sonrientes soldados de rostros impenetrables vio también al divino muchacho para quien había construido aquel castillo, radiante dentro del uniforme ceñido, también enarbolando el arma y apuntándole…

[and among the anonymous and smiling soldiers with impenetrable faces he also saw the divine boy for whom he had constructed that castle, radian in his tight-fitting uniform, who was also raising his weapon and aiming it at him…] Arturo, la estrella más brillante is a prolongation of a plot found in another work by Arenas: La vieja Rosa (Old Rosa); the latter work ends with the protagonist being consumed by fire and our novel analeptically depicts—through an evocation by Arthur—his mother’s funeral and Arthur’s ultimate fate, from the moment Old Rosa discovers he is a homosexual. A knowledge of La vieja Rosa is necessary to understand completely what is simply alluded to in Arturo, la estrella más brillante, e.g., the following phrases from the latter text: “la única persona que lo había querido hasta el punto de haberle dado muerte de no haber sido por un error de cálculo y el mal estado del arma” (the only person who had loved him to the point of killing him had it not been for an error of judgement and the disrepair of the weapon) recall a scene from La vieja Rosa, in which his mother surprises Arthur in an embrace with another boy: “Con gran precision se llevó el arma hasta la altura de los hombros e hizo fuego. La primera descarga resonó en el cuarto cerrado, pasó por sobre los muchachos y fue a dar en la radio que saltó en pedazos.” (With great precision, she raised the weapon to shoulder height and fired. The first shot resounded in the closed room, went over the boys’ heads and hit the radio, smashing it to bits).

This novella includes a work: “la gran obra” (the magnum opus), “la gran melodía,” “la gran creación” (the great melody, the great creation), “la gran construcción” (the great construction), which Arthur performs; thus, a mise en abyme is configured (a specular presence of a microtext within a macrotext).

The work thus constructed depicts a world which maintains an antithetical relationship to that which is represented in the novella; this antithesis corresponds to the terms “paradisehell.” On the linguistic level, both texts coincide—which is understandable because most of the text is referred to by a narrator from the protagonist’s perspective (free indirect style) and in this way, the narrator’s language and Arthur’s writing, which is also presented by the said narrator by means of a free indirect style, become homogeneous.

A free indirect style does not appear in the text for those instances in which what is referred to escapes Arthur’s notice, e.g., the moment in which the order to pursue and capture him is granted or the one in which his belongings are listed. Worthy of note, however, is the fact that the mood infusing the discourse is always uniform, one of exaltation starting at the beginning of the text, resulting from the existence, for Arthur, of the desired lover.

The entire text and Arthur’s “construction” are delivered in an overflowing torrent of language, which imposes on the reading a veritable struggle for breath to adjust to a rhythm which proceeds uninterrupted from the first line to the last of the text, from the construction (the writing and its prolongation) until the destruction by Arthur of his own work (“se lanzó hacia el horizonte, destruyendo arbolarios, kioskos y parasoles, invernaderos, camafeos, aljives y hasta el solitario pluviómetro sobre el cual el desconcertado lofororo, que allí se había posado, miraba avanzar la tropa…” (he hurtled towards the horizon, destroying herbariums, stands and parasols, hothouses, cameos, cisterns and even the solitary rain gauge on top of which the baffled lophophore, which had perched there, watched the troops advance…); this destruction coincides as is to be expected—with the conclusion of the text. The homogeneous mood of exaltation contributes to this effect of uninterrupted writing-reading, which expends itself only with the final term; the intensification of the poetic function—noticeable at the given moment—creates a lyrical effect.

The world thus depicted appears to constitute very clear-cut categories: [he] (the desired lover), ellos [they] (homosexuals confined like him in a labor camp), los otros [the others] (the guards), los demás [the rest]; the language, employing the sign of three leader dots, transports us clearly away from present reality (A) to past sequences (B) and to imaginary constructions (C), thus creating in the following moment, the configuration B//A //C:

pero aún entonces, quedaban los árboles, algún refugio, los demás, y, luego, estar solo, disfrutar de la soledad, aunque ya supiera, aunque ya supiera …/el soldado, como siempre, culminó con un resoplido, y como siempre, retirando el cuerpo le dijo espera, no salgas hasta que yo no haya entrado en el campamento…/ parques, tení a q ue ha ber parq ues, pa rques in m sombreados replegándose hasta el horizonte

[but even then, there remained the trees, some shelter, the rest, and then, to be alone, to enjoy the solitude, even though he already knew, even though he already knew…/the soldier, as always, climaxed with a snort, and, as always, withdrawing, he said to him: ‘Stay; don’t go out until I have entered the encampment…/parks, there had to be parks, huge shady parks stretching back to the horizon]

The textual plot is easily constructible once one focuses on certain moments of flashback or analepsis, which assists in the text’s intelligibility despite the persistent gush of language, thus establishing a successful balance between the depicted world and writing.

MYRNA SOLOTOREVSKY

Editions

First edition: Arturo, la estrella más brillante, Barcelona: Montesinos, 1984

Note: To date there are no specific studies on Arturo, la estrella más brillante, thus readers should consult the Further Reading section at the end of the general entry on Arenas.
Rafael Arévalo Martínez 1884–1975

Guatemalan poet and prose writer

The so-called Generation of 192,0, which includes Miguel Ángel Asturias and Luis Cardoza y Aragón, is generally considered the outstanding group of writers and intellectuals to have emerged in Guatemala this century. The most important of their predecessors, though perhaps the least threatening, was Rafael Arévalo Martínez, whose early story, “El hombre que parecía un caballo,” 1914 [The Man Who Looked Like a Horse], has become a classic point of reference in the development of Latin American fiction and for many critics one of the distant precursors of the linguistically sophisticated Boom of the 1960s, fully half a century later. Earlier than other frequently mentioned precursors—Felisberto Hernández of Uruguay or Macedonio Fernández of Argentina, for example—Arévalo invented a literary mode, which to some seems to anticipate the magical realism of his compatriot Asturias, and to others the fantastical “fictions” of Jorge Luis Borges. (Like Borges, Arévalo became director of his country’s national library, 1926–45).

Arévalo was a physically slight, shy and hopelessly myopic character, a poet as well as a novelist and short-story writer. None of his later works was ever as successful as that famous early story—inspired, it seems, by Arevalo’s repressed desire for the legendary homosexual poet from Colombia, Porfirio Barba-Jacob (el señor de Aretal in the story), who made several extended visits to Guatemala. Arévalo never acknowledged indeed, he denied—this submerged motivation, but his story speaks, one might say, for him and remains a fascinating and indeed arousing study in ambivalence with a magical radiance all of its own. His novella Las noches en el Palacio de la Nunciatura, 1927 [Nights in the Nunciature Palace] returns to the subject of Barba-Jacob, but to less stirring effect. His early stories appeared in El hombre que parecía un caballo y otros cuentos, a title used later until the end of his life as an umbrella to incorporate new stories as they appeared, and in El señor Monitot [Mr Monitot].

Two early novels, Una vida [A Life] and Manuel Aldano, were largely autobiographical works tracing his difficult child-hood and painful adolescence, when he had to work at a series of menial occupations in stores and offices. There are parallels with the experience of Britain’s H.G.Wells, except that Arévalo was unable to develop Wells’s aggressive self-confidence; but he did follow him in one respect, for Arévalo later produced works of fantasy which were very close to science fiction, with novels like El mundo de los maharachías [The World of the Maharachías] and Viaje a Ipanda [Journey to Ipanda].

Whilst never actively political in any way, Arévalo’s work did deal occasionally with political issues. La oficina de la paz de Orolandia [The Office for Peace in Goldland] has a Candide character called Felix Buendía, who innocently discovers the imperialist cynicism of the North Americans, the corrupt passivity of the Central Americans and the farcical nature of Pan-Americanism. In 1945 he published ¡Ecce Pericles! [Behold Pericles!], a history of the dictatorship of Estrada Cabrera (1898–1920) full of the same bitter indignation which would characterize Miguel Ángel Asturias’s El señor Presidente, published the following year.
Arévalo presents the curious picture of a writer who lived an immensely long life, became the grand old man of Guatemalan letters and yet never again wrote anything remotely as interesting as that strange early story composed in a rapture sixty years before his death. Honduras [Depth] is another semi-autobiographical novel about his youth and about student life during the Estrada Cabrera era. In addition Arévalo continued to write simple lyrical poems until the end of his days, but these belied the attractions of the best of his stories: in them the central themes were the contradiction between the essential simplicity and the endless mystery of life, the question of doubles and doubling of every kind, and the equivocal relations between the sexes and between gender and sexuality. More interesting as a precursor than as an outstanding creator, Arévalo’s work nevertheless undoubtedly deserves attention in its own right.

GERALD MARTIN

Biography

Selected Works

Novels and Novellas

Una vida, Guatemala City: Electra, 1914
Manuel Aldano, Guatemala City: Gutenberg, 1922
La oficina de la paz de Orolandia: novela del imperialismo yanqui, Guatemala City: Sánchez y de Guise, 1925
Las noches en el Palacio de la Nunciatura, Guatemala City: Sánchez y de Guise, 1927
El mundo de los maharachías, Guatemala City: Muño Plaza, 1939
Viaje a Ipanda, Guatemala City: Centro Editorial, 1939 [Sequel to El mundo de los maharachías]
Hondura, Guatemala City: Centro Editorial, 1947
El embajador de Torlania, Guatemala City: Landívar, 1960

Short Fiction

El hombre que parecía un caballo, Quezaltenango, Guatemala City: Arte Nuevo, 1915
El hombre que parecía un caballo; El ángel, Guatemala City: Ayestas, 1920
El señor Monitot, Guatemala City: Sánchez y de Guise, 1922
La signatura de la esfinge, Guatemala City: Electra, G.M. Stabler, 1933
Cratilo y los otros cuentos, Guatemala City: Universidad de San Carlos de Guatemala, 1968
Cuatro contactos con lo sobrenatural y otros relatos, Guatemala City: Landívar, 1971

Poetry

Los atormentados, Guatemala City: Union Tipográfica, 1914
Las rosas de Engaddi, Guatemala City: Sánchez y de Guise, 1923
Llama, Guatemala City: Renacimiento, 1934
Por un caminito así, Guatemala City: Union Tipográfica, 1947 Poemas, 1901–1959, Guatemala City: Landívar, 1958
Poemas, Guatemala City: Nacional, 1965

Other Writings
Los duques de Endor: drama en tres actos y en verso, Guatemala City: Centro, 1940
Influencia de España en la formación de la nacionalidad centroamericana, Guatemala City: Nacional, 1943
Nietzsche el conquistador: la doctrina que engendró la segunda guerra mundial, Guatemala City: Sánchez y de Guise, 1943
¡Ecce Pericles!, Guatemala City: Nacional, 1945 [biography]
Concepción del cosmos, Guatemala City: Landívar, 1954; revised edition, 1956
El hijo pródigo: drama en tres actos y en verso, Guatemala City: Tipografía Nacional, 1956
Narración sumaria de mi vida, Guatemala City: Landívar, 1968

Compilations and Anthologies
Selección poética, Guatemala City: José de Pineda Ibarra, 1944
El hombre que parecía un caballo, y otros cuentos, Guatemala City: Universitaria, 1951
Obras escogidas, Guatemala City: Universitaria, 1959 [poetry and prose] Cuentos y poesías, edited by Carlos García Prada, Madrid: Iberoamericana, 1961

Further Reading
Carrera, Mario Alberto, Las ocho novelas de Rafael Arévalo Martínez, Guatemala City: Ediciones de la Casa de la Cultura Flavio Herrera de la Universidad de San Carlos, 1975
Foster, David William, Gay and Lesbian Themes in Latin American Writing, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1991 [Contains analysis of “El hombre que parecía un caballo”]
Homenaje del Instituto Guatemalteco-americano al cumplirse cincuenta años de vida literaria de este gran escritor guatemalteco, Guatemala City, 1959
Liano, Dante, Rafael Arévalo Martínez, fuentes europeas, lengua y estilo, Rome: Bulzoni, 1992,

Argentina

19th-Century Prose and Poetry
The movement for independence from Spain, the subsequent period of fierce civil wars, the dictatorship of Buenos Aires strongman, Juan Manuel de Rosas, and then the trying struggle for supremacy between Buenos Aires and the Confederacy of internal provinces, constitute the historical backdrop for Argentine literature during the greater part of the 19th century. The country’s literature provides a testimony of this period of social turbulence and change.

Buenos Aires’s urban society, having experienced rapid demographic and commercial growth since the middle decades of the 18th century, possessed a predominantly aristocratic spirit, and emulated the cultural and literary forms of European centers. It was here that the struggle for independence from Spain found its center. In 1813, the poem, “Marcha patriótica” by Vicente López y Planes (1785–1856) was officially sanctioned as the Argentine national anthem. This poem and others of the period were heavily influenced by the European Enlightenment, with the Neoclassical predication of patriotic themes and with pastoral treatment of the American republic’s natural beauty. An early anthology, La lira argentina, 1824 [The Argentine Lyre] collected the most notable of this poetic production, headed by the names of Esteban de Luca (1786–1824), Cayetano Rodriguez (1761–1823), Juan Crisóstomo Lafinur (1797–1824), and Juan Cruz Varela (1794–1839).

In contrast to the new urban center, the provincial society of the interior provinces, constituted by caudillos (individuals wielding economic, social, and political power) leading an essentially populist rural population, valued the forms and structures prevalent during the colonial past, and honored the region’s distinctly rural art forms. The unsettled regions of the north, in addition to the area of the humid pampas inland from Buenos Aires, with their plentiful cattle and wide expanses of open ranges, gave rise to the voluntarily, marginalized society of gauchos (stemming from “orphan” in Quechua, the River Plate cowboys). While the more organized and better educated society of Argentina’s north continued singing the religious, chivalresque, and burlesque ballads that had direct links with the oral tradition of the Spanish peninsula, the gaucho’s expression featured narrative ballads that exaggerated the power and ferocity of brave and clever heroes. Itinerant gaucho poets, comparable to medieval bards or minstrel singers, endlessly traveled from region to region, singing or reciting verses accompanied by the primitive music of the guitar or the more primitive vihuela at cattle round-ups or in rural stores cum bars termed pulperías. Especially popular was the cielito (creole tune), with intentionally archaic language and monotonous beat, through which gaucho poets chronicled customs, history, and biography, and shared their misery over abuses of urban authority. These folk poets also possessed a repertoire of intensely lyrical poems highlighting a colorful rural imagery, that were recited in octosyllabic lines variously combined into stanzas of five, eight, or ten lines. However, the most original of the gaucho poet’s craft was the payada, or improvised duels in verse which, according to the wildly romanticized version, often concluded in combat with knives. A payada could be a monologue, but it was best when two versatile singers pitted against each other, would improvise verses in cifra or milonga forms in counterpoint fashion. Today, scant written traces survive of this orally transmitted poetry.

With the advent of the independence struggle less than a decade into the new century, there emerged a new literary practice that took its inspiration from the oral tradition of the gaucho: the gauchesque. The first important protagonist of this essentially cultured, urban stylization of gaucho literature, was Bartolomé Hidalgo (1788–1822), a soldier-poet serving the populist revolutionary movement originating in the Banda Oriental (literally the “East Bank,” or today’s Uruguay), who composed and then distributed one-page broadsides of patriotic verses using the gaucho idiom. Hidalgo’s intention was to have his poems circulate, first in written form, then orally, in order to “teach by entertaining,” with the desired results of instilling in the illiterate popular classes a sense of patriotism and integrating them into the emancipation cause against Spain. But his well-crafted, witty verses also attracted an urban readership that was entertained by exotic gaucho protagonists with their heavy rural dialect.

Most exceptional was Hidalgo’s treatment of the Río de la Plata gaucho, which went hand in hand with his fervid support for the struggles of Uruguay-born leader, José Gervasio Artigas, whom he served as a soldier against the English in 1811. Hidalgo’s cielitos, written in the gaucho idiom between 1812 and 1814, during the siege of Montevideo, were regarded highly for their faithful rendering of the uneducated soldiers’ love of freedom and justice, their antipathy towards the English and Spanish, and their wry humor. While modern readers may find these early verses often dry and overly didactic, the three “Diálogos” [Dialogues] written in Buenos Aires between 1821 and 1822, are considered among the best of the gauchesque genre. Their genuinely popular flavor and the playful portraits of customs, sentiments and social types account for the immense acclaim that they enjoyed in Hidalgo’s day. Later gauchesque poets would find a worthy model in his mistrust, typical of the creole population, toward the “cultured” minorities of the metropolis, the rhymed dialogue between two rural protagonists, and his example of representing the perplexed gaucho’s first contact with the modern city.

Most gauchesque poets following Hidalgo continued with the practice of placing their art at the service of politics. After 1829, Juan Gualberto Godoy (1793–1864) circulated his compositions of “gauchi-political poetry” that were flavored by his militant opposition to Rosas. For the next thirty years the inspired poetry of Hilario Ascasubi (1807–71) dominated the literary scene: his most famous gauchesque poems, Paulino Lucero (1839–51) and Aniceto el Gallo (1854), although literary masterpieces in their own right, also served in that poet’s objective of promoting progressive values and discrediting the principles of federalism (that is the political system based on regional separatism and caudillo personalism) among the gaucho masses.

The region’s first poetry of overtly Romantic orientation was Los consuelos, 1834 [Consolations] by Esteban Echeverría (1805–51), who had recently returned from nearly a decade of study in Paris. Under the influence of Byron, Goethe, Chateaubriand, and Ausias March, his “lugubrious tone” and the “fleeting melodies” of his poetic lyre consoled the sad or suffering reader. In the critical note accompanying this collection, he implicitly embraced the ideals of his country’s independence movement by calling for the creation of a national literature based on the country’s unique customs, predominant ideas, and social types. In 1837, he published Rimas [Rhymes], which contained, among other pieces, “La cautiva” [The Captive] and several important essays on literary theory.
This long narrative poem, perhaps the best that he would write during his short but intense career, passionately depicted the country’s wild natural setting as a backdrop for the drama of the Europeanized Brian and his virginal companion, Maria, in their near tragic confrontation with uncivilized Amerindian hordes. Future president, Bartolomé Mitre, at the age of sixteen, wrote in the Montevidean press that this exemplary model of national literature would inspire a “literary revolution.”

Indeed, this poem was conceived in large part out of Echeverría’s awareness of the need to direct the energies of the country’s writers and thinkers to the urgent task of constructing an independent, national culture that would better respond to the needs of their society, already two decades after gaining independence from Spain. Present-day literary historians associate this poem and similar writings with the Romantic movement.
In truth, Echeverría and the young men of 1837 were attracted to European Romanticism’s rebellion against Neoclassical norms, which they compared to their own struggle against the decrepit colonial (Hispanic) legacy and on behalf of liberal orientations more conducive to progress. In apparent contradiction, their mission received its primary inspiration from the advanced thought emanating primarily from France, while it simultaneously aimed toward the foundation of an original, local culture and literature. Yet, for them literary and cultural renovation were merely the means for a far wider transformation in economics, politics, and customs. Primarily for that reason they rejected for themselves the label of Romantics, and initially embraced instead the name of “socialistas” (no relationship to the socialism of later decades), which they borrowed from their primary influence for liberal renovation, Claude Henri de Rouvroy, comte de Saint-Simon.

A most important milestone in the region’s cultural history was the foundation of the short-lived Salón Literario (Literary Salon) that met in the bookstore owned by Marcos Sastre (1808–87) during the early months of 1837. While Sastre and the other two founders, Juan Bautista Alberdi (1810–84), and Juan María Gutiérrez (1809–78) articulated a moral and pedagogical function for the group’s young membership, the Salon was quickly perceived as a focus of opposition to the growing authoritarianism of the Rosas regime. This was especially so in light of Echeverría’s two addresses to that group, which discussed the region’s political economy and did not stop short of criticizing the Rosas government.

In June 1838, months after the Salon’s forced closure, Echeverría called a secret meeting of some of its more militant youths in order to form what would later be known as the Asociación de Mayo (May Association). It was modeled on similar groups of that period in France and Italy and had as its goal the formation of a tight cadre of individuals who would dedicate themselves to the social, cultural, and intellectual renovation of the country. Within months, most of its members would be driven into exile in neighboring Chile and Uruguay, and their activities would expand to include the organization of a military invasion against the Rosas tyranny.

The manifesto of the Association was the Creencia, 1838 [Creed], authored by Echeverría with key paragraphs written by Alberdi. This document was later revised and preceded by a long introduction, Ojeada retrospectiva sobre el movimiento intelectual en el Río de la Plata desde el año 37 [A Brief Retrospective Consideration of Intellectual Activity in the Río de la Plata since 1837] and then renamed Dogma socialista, 1846 [Socialist Dogma]. Several of the symbolic words reveal Echeverría’s primarily moral and spiritual orientation for the young militants: Association, Progress, Fraternity, Equality, Liberty, Honor and Sacrifice, Compatibility of Principles, etc. This “utopian socialist” emphasis reflected Echeverría’s varied readings of works by Giuseppe Mazzini, Félicité de Lamennais, Charles Fourier, Charles Augustin Sainte-Beuve and Pierre Leroux. However, the second half of the document addressed specifically Argentine imperatives: re-embrace the social, political, and cultural goals articulated by the leaders of the country’s independence movement, reject the retrograde influences of the colonial regime, promote democratic institutions and cultivate a national, American culture. The document’s heavy, dramatic language and quasi-”religious” tone were modeled on creeds of similar secret societies that were then organizing in Europe’s revolutionary circles—and they would reappear in documents by the transcendentalist followers of Ralph Waldo Emerson in the United States. For these reasons, contemporary readers often overlook the Dogma’s importance in calling to action the idealistic youth of the country and unifying them under a common banner in the struggles that awaited them.

The young exiles’ passionate opposition to Rosas inspired the most creative and original of writings that they were to produce. The first of these widely-read propagandistic works was Rosas y sus opositores, 1843 [Rosas and his Detractors] by José Rivera Indarte (1814?–45), that enumerated the crimes committed by the porteño (port, that is Buenos Aires) dictator in the first fourteen years of his government, and ended with a long pseudo-philosophical essay that called for his assassination. La gloria del tirano Rosas, 1847 [The Glory of the Tyrant Rosas] by Felix Frías (1816–81), also featured the abuses of the Rosas regime. This work anticipated the fertile ideas of Alberdi and Sarmiento in promoting an influx of North European immigrants whose superior culture (as they saw it) would displace that of the country’s Spanish descendants, gaucho half-breeds, and Amerindians. Two other ideas strenuously argued by Frías were the danger to society of revolutionary change and the indispensable role of religious instruction in educating citizens for a responsible role in democratic societies.

Many readers at the time had theorized about the desirability of a national literature in the form of poetry, drama, and the novel, but they hardly knew how to respond when they first confronted Civilización y barbarie. La vida de Juan Facundo Quiroga, 1846 (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants, or Civilization and Barbarism), by Domingo Faustino Sarmiento (1811–88), the work that posterity has unanimously recognized as the “foundation book” for not only Argentina’s literary and cultural tradition, but also Latin America’s Romantic canon. The work, composed in a “rapture of lyricism” during a few intense weeks and published in instalments in Santiago de Chile’s daily newspaper, El Progreso, has confounded readers with its juxtaposition of imaginative and socio-scientific discourses. The work unites three highly contrasting sections. The first, which was inspired by sociological or ethnographic theory rendered through the idiosyncratic beliefs of the author, attempted to account for the present state of Argentine society as it existed after twenty years of devastating civil skirmishes. Within these pages Sarmiento did not fail to include memorable costumbrista passages (sketches of local customs) that portrayed in a Romantic fashion character types of the Argentine pampas: the pathfinder, the cattle hand, the gaucho outlaw, and the gaucho singer.

The work’s second section, which was Sarmiento’s subjective incursion into biography and romantically rendered history, recreated the events surrounding the life and exploits of the Promethean caudillo from the province of La Rioja, Juan Facundo Quiroga, whose assassination had sent the whole country into turmoil eleven years earlier. Sarmiento’s own origins in the neighboring province of San Juan gave him access to first-hand data that provided a semblance of authenticity to his historical and literary portrait. However, his skewed selection and presentation of that data largely followed from his political objective of attacking Facundo—and by extension, Rosas. The third section, which was excluded entirely from later editions, analyzed Rosas’s tyrannical practices and denounced the dictator’s ideas and record in power.

The conceptual axis of the entire work, which has wielded enormous influence over subsequent writers and students of Argentine society, is the dichotomy between civilization and barbarism. His arguments in that work in favor of civilization (that is, Buenos Aires, the city, liberal ideals, and European influences), and his corresponding condemnation of barbarism (that is, the gaucho, the caudillo, and many aspects of rural life), anticipated Sarmiento’s emerging political agenda that largely favored Buenos Aires at the expense of the country’s interior provinces.

Among the several polemics on literature and language that involved members of the 1837 generation, the most important took place between 1841 and 1842 in several daily and weekly newspapers of Santiago and Valparaíso, Chile. The ambitious Argentine youths, imbued with the latest Romantic ideas of the century, pitted their militant perspectives against the more conservative tendencies of Santiago’s cultural elite, headed by Andrés Bello (1781–1865), a native of present-day Venezuela and the continent’s most distinguished legal expert, literary scholar, and philosopher. In frank contrast to Bello’s ideas of a decorous language and normative literature, Sarmiento argued that a writing practice based on spontaneity and emotion most effectively promoted social and material progress.

The exiled militants, weighed down by the imperatives and privations of exile, found in journalism their most effective means for organizing a resistance to the hated Rosas regime. Superior to the sometimes tendentious propaganda of their companions in exile, were excellent essays analyzing national and regional affairs. Most outstanding was the writing by Sarmiento in Santiago de Chile’s El Progreso, and Florencio Varela (1807–48) in Montevideo’s El Comercio del Plata.

Echeverría, with deteriorating health, could not take an active part in the military or propagandistic struggle against Rosas, but instead lent his creative energies to literary and pedagogical pursuits. Before his early death in 1851 he concluded several long narrative poems that contemporary readers appraise more for historical than literary merits, among them La guitarra [The Guitar] and Insurrección del sur de la Provincia de Buenos Aires [Insurrection of the South of the Province of Buenos Aires]. An essay, Manual de enseñanza moral, 1846 [Manual for Moral Instruction] advocated the fortification of traditional moral values among the youth as a prerequisite for the spread of practices related to liberty and democracy.

Echeverría perceived himself primarily as a poet and a thinker, yet the short story, El matadero (The Slaughter House), published posthumously in 1871, has done most to immortalize his name in the canon of Argentine and Hispanic American literature. The style of this Romantic classic combines crude realism, political satire, and vivid chiaroscuro symbolism. The story features the brutal lower-class society frequenting the outskirts of Buenos Aires, where cattle were slaughtered for local meat consumption. The central event is the chance arrival of the rain-muddied slaughterhouse grounds of a proud, refined gentlemen. His taunting and then humiliation at the hands of the unsavory lower-class mob was intended as an allegory of how Rosas’s barbarism had put asunder the vestiges of refinement and civilization. Socio-political readings have highlighted the author’s affective pact with the latter, as well as the story’s innuendos against people of color or of lower-class extraction. Although it is undeniable that Echeverría disdained the behavior of the brutish masses obedient to the Rosas regime, it is also true that no other individual of his generation demonstrated as high a degree of confidence in the popular classes and the role they would play in a modern Argentina.

Essays written during the exile period had already won Alberdi the distinction of the clearest and most profound thinker of his generation. With the fall of Rosas, no individual was better qualified than him to guide the provincial representatives in formulating a new constitution for the future governance of the country. Such was the origin of Bases y puntos de partida para la organización política de la República Argentina, 1852, [Bases and Points of Departure for the Political Organization of the Argentine Republic] known more simply as Bases. The work’s primary thesis was the need for an original constitution that addressed the reality, beliefs, and past history of the inhabitants of the country. More important, however, was Alberdi’s reiteration of the need for the framers of the constitution to provide the legal means for attracting an immigrant population, encouraging capital investments, and fomenting free trade practices to increase the material wealth of all. Noteworthy was Alberdi’s catch-phrase, “Gobernar es poblar” [To Govern is to Populate], which summarized his generation’s push to increase North European immigration in the region—and their implicit disdain for the indigenous, gaucho, and Hispanic descendants of the region. The work as a whole was Alberdi’s means for promoting a conservative brand of progress that would not endanger the country’s painfully achieved stability and order.

For Sarmiento, as for Alberdi, writing came as naturally as public service, the two great passions in his life. Viajes por Europa, Africa y America [Journeys through Europe, Africa and the United States] contains Sarmiento’s penetrating observations of customs and practices observed during a two-year visit to Europe and the United States. Noteworthy was his light but fascinating style; his buoyant descriptions of progressive and democratic practices in North America make this—along with the next work to be considered—the most “utopian” of his entire written output. This trip had been commissioned by the Chilean government with the express purpose of observing and studying the systems of public education then existing in those lands. Much of these conclusions and observations were published separately in De la educación común, 1849 [About Public Education], the first of many studies he would publish in the next two decades to promote the free and universal schooling for the masses of the continent. He was a precursor in his promotion of education for women, especially to prepare them as school teachers. However, he was less than optimistic about the receptivity of the continent’s Amerindians and the “barbaric” gauchos for learning progressive ideas and practices.

General José María Paz and other public figures published important memoirs of their participation in the historical events of their time, but it is Sarmiento’s autobiographical work that has proven most memorable. Recuerdos de provincia, 1850 [Memoirs of Provincial Life] demonstrated Sarmiento’s considerable talents as historian and costumbrista writer—although the work also betrays his political objective of projecting a favorable public image that would be advantageous for future political ambitions. The work, a hymn of veneration for the progressive patriarchal society that existed in San Juan during Sarmiento’s youth, revealed the provincial core of the author’s increasingly accentuated cosmopolitanism. He traces his lineage to the oldest families of the region and describes in personal terms the region’s social and political turmoil that had been unleashed by the independence struggle. Sarmiento, usually demonstrating in idea and act an unbridled egotism and confidence in his own advanced ideas, here uncharacteristically demonstrates humility and deference to respected opinion. The work provides an explanation for the conservative character and thought of this man who was emerging as protagonist in the region’s struggle on behalf of liberal institutions and an open-ended progress.

During the exile years, José Mármol (1818–71) earned the distinction of being the most versatile writer of his generation. To his credit are the patriotic poem, “Al 25 de mayo” [To the 25th of May] and Cantos del peregrino [Pilgrim’s Songs], the latter being one of the finest Romantic poems in the Hispanic American canon; plays El poeta, 1842 [The Poet] and El cruzado, 1851 [The Crusader]; and political essays such as “Asesinato del S. Dr D.Florencio Varela, Redactor del Comercio del Plata,” 1849 [Assassination of Dr Don Florencio Varela, editor of Comercio del Plata and “Manuela Rosas” (1850); and the regular flow of articles that were published in the most reputable organs of the Montevidean press: El Nacional, Muera Rosas, El Conservador and especially, El Comercio del Plata (respectively: The National, Death to Rosas, The Conservative and Commerce of the River Plate).

Several writers attempted the novel, but none with the success of Mármol in Amalia (1855). Juana Manuela Gorriti (1818–92) and Juana Manso (1819–75) published, respectively, La quena, 1845 [The Indian Flute] and Los misterios del Plata, 1846 [The Mysteries of the River Plate Region], historical novels of romantic inspiration; also of note was Soledad, 1847 [Solitude] by Bartolomé Mitre (1821–1906), of sentimental theme. More successful was Vicente Fidel López (1815–1903), in whose novel, La novia del hereje, 1846 [The Heretic’s Bride] the action takes place within Peru’s colonial society; the novel, for López, was, above all, a pedagogical instrument that served the objective of fomenting strong family and affective values which would, in their turn, provide a foundation for the individual’s participation in public life in the coming democratic age.

All these other efforts are dwarfed by Mármol’s achievement in Amalia, a work that is only rivaled by Sarmiento’s Facundo in its sociological, historical, and ideological value in interpreting Argentine politics and society. The novel provides literary portraits of individuals active in the Rosas regime, and explains key aspects of the regime in several lengthy essayistic passages. The action revolves around a pair of young lovers with political ideals that pit them against the Rosas tyranny. When their clandestine activities are discovered, they attempt to flee to exile in Montevideo, but are discovered and then executed. This melodramatic tragedy, with the Argentine political scene reduced to the Romantic opposition between spirit and body, Good and Evil, civilization and barbarism, was a tool in Mármol’s ideological campaign to discredit Rosas, the federalist creed, and the league of barbarous caudillos exercising power across the interior. The novel did not fail to indicate a path out of the social and political chaos: it certified Mármol’s generational cohorts as those most indicated for leading the nation toward regeneration in the post-Rosas period.

A result of Rosas losing power in 1852 was the outbreak of long repressed regional passions, and a new cycle of conflict that would last another thirty years. The country’s foremost writers were divided in their loyalties: of the 1837 generation, Alberdi and Gutiérrez initially supported the Confederation uniting the provinces of the interior, while Sarmiento, Mármol, and others placed their intellectual and writing talents at the service of Buenos Aires. José Hernández (1834–86), the most talented of a new generation of writer/militants, first gained national attention as the author of a series of articles that passionately denounced the brutal slaying of the beloved caudillo patriarch of the Province of La Rioja, Ángel “El Chacho” Peñaloza. These articles, immensely popular across the country’s interior provinces, were immediately united in the form of a short book, Vida del Chacho, 1872 [Life of the “Chacho”]. Because of the fierce repression unleashed by Buenos Aires armies across that interior in the previous months, the book was received enthusiastically by readers in the interior who quickly canonized it in their elevation of Peñaloza to the status of martyr for the fallen federalist cause.

Sarmiento, temporarily discredited in Argentina for his complicity in El Chacho’s death, eloquently defended his actions in the biographical-political essay, El Chacho:
El último caudillo de la montonera de los llanos, 1866 [The Chacho: Last Caudillo of the Plains’ Gaucho Soldiers]. The work was vintage Sarmiento in its presentation of biographical, ethnographic, and sociological information, as well as correspondence and historical documents, as a means of substantiating his politicized thesis that the caudillo protagonist represented the most retrograde of tendencies. In re-elaborating the civilization versus barbarism thesis that reduced his protagonist to a single dimension, he revealed the Romantic, literary quality of his thought.

Alberdi was to leave an indelible mark on the conscience of his compatriots in a related area: his anti-war sentiment, that flowered into the most eloquent statement of Argentine pacifism of all times: El crimen de la guerra, 1870 [The Crime of War]. Although the work remained unpublished in his own lifetime, it is this Alberdian work that, after Bases, has seen the greatest number of reprintings and has been circulated most widely.

Of an entirely different character was Alberdi’s historicphilosophical fictional work, Peregrinación de Luz del Día o viajes y aventuras de la verdad en el Nuevo Mundo, 1874 [Pilgrimage of Light of Day, or Trips and Adventures of Truth in the New World]. Here, the thin facade of allegory hardly masked Alberdi’s primary objective of debunking his political enemies through caricature and satire. The identity of Sarmiento and Mitre was barely hidden—Alberdi’s two nemeses—in fictional garb, and his condemnation of Buenos Aires’s corrupt and oligarchical Liberal Party. Slightly less crude was Alberdi’s Grandes y pequeños hombres del Plata [Great and Small Men of the Plate Region], which first appeared posthumously in Escritos póstumos (1895–1901) and then under separate title in 1912. The overriding objective of this work, as in Luz del día, was to lambast both Mitre and Sarmiento and to denounce the ruling class that was cementing its power throughout the country.

Gauchesque poetry continued to be practiced through the end of the century. Most worthy of mention during this later period is Estanislao del Campo (1834–80), whose Fausto, 1866 [Faust] further popularized the genre, but this time among primarily an urban reading public. This poem mines humor in depicting how one “country bumpkin” gaucho translates to an even more unsophisticated companion his recent experiences in the large city. The climax to his misadventures was when he stumbled into one of Buenos Aires’s finest highbrow theaters and witnessed a production of Goethe’s Faust. The poem, as such, expertly exploits multiple possibilities of literary translation and creative mis-interpretation. For the public of the 1860s, when the city more and more dominated the social, political, and cultural life of the entire country, the poem was generally interpreted as a criticism of the inadequate cultural baggage of the unprogressive rural sector. Yet the debunking was two-edged: transparent also is the author’s portrayal of an urban culture caught up in the pretension of its own importance and flaunting imported cultural norms.

The culmination of the gauchesque was José Hernández’s long narrative poem, El gaucho Martín Fierro (1872, contin in La vuelta de Martin Fierro, 1879), the first part of which was born of anger and political passion. After the defeat of the federalist uprising led by his friend and cohort, Ricardo López Jordan, Hernández’s suffering found an outlet in his poetic defense of the traditional rural society and its gaucho population that were threatened by an encroaching modernity. The second part was a poetic gesture intended to mend fences with the liberal regime that was now in the ascendant throughout the country. Seen in its entirety, this poem combines two artistically similar, but ideologically dissimilar parts. Nevertheless, it succeeded like no previous literary work in straddling Argentina’s traditional and cultured literary traditions and in appealing to both the unschooled or semi-literate rural society and an educated, urban reading public. The poem masterfully reproduced the archaic variant of the Spanish spoken in the Buenos Aires countryside several decades earlier, without exaggerating that dialect’s deforming characteristics. Its superb verses build upon the themes and forms of the region’s fertile oral tradition, and steer clear of theatricalized, picturesque descriptions that marred most other literary incursions by educated poets into the gaucho world. The poem’s reception by the region’s rural population was instantaneous and fervid, and its popularity continues unchallenged even today. But three decades would have to pass after its publication before the educated groups of the region’s cities would, first belatedly then enthusiastically, embrace this work as the highest expression of Argentine—and more broadly Rio de la Plata—society.

Ricardo V. Gutiérrez (1838–96), Carlos Guido y Spano (1827–1918), and Olegario V. Andrade (1839–82) constitute the nucleus of Argentina’s “second Romantic generation,” a label which hardly suggests the polemical nature of their literary and political initiation. During the 1860s and 1870s the mission fell to them of recording the tragic struggles of federalist militants across Argentina’s interior provinces as they beat a steady retreat before the advance of Buenos Aires’s armies. Theirs was the task of combatting the official histories emanating from Buenos Aires with their own, sometimes lyrical, testimonies of federalism’s final tragic days.

This group’s primary contribution was in the field of poetry. Gutiérrez’s early poem, “La fiebre salvaje,” 1860 [The Savage Fever], modeled after the exalted Romantic verses of Byron, united a series of lyrical laments over the unfortunate destiny of a suffering hero. Of historical resonance was “La victoria,” a poem inspired by his painful participation as a doctor in the tragic Triple Alliance War with Paraguay (1866–70). The poem, which laments the war’s destruction and terrible cost in human lives, reveals the pacifist orientation of Gutiérrez, whose tender, humanitarian feelings clashed violently with the horrors he witnessed.

The war with Paraguay also left an indelible mark on the sensitivities of Guido y Spano. His essay, El gobierno y la alianza, 1866 [The Government and the Alliance] was a strong indictment of the Mitre administration’s dishonorable maneuverings that contributed to igniting the destructive conflict. In the poem “Nenia,” one of the most memorable of the period, he offered a funeral lament over the death and destruction of Paraguay by the armies of Argentina and Brazil. A decade later, however, Guido would shelve his anti-porteño militancy. His Autobiografía, 1879 [Autobiography] revealed a newly positive assessment of national reality that announced the voluntary forgetfulness of the bitter past. Having made peace with the new coalition of social and political forces that now predominated, his poetic trajectory in works like Ráfagas, 1879 [Gusts of Wind] focused on domestic or civic themes, sometimes with deep emotion, that totally avoided political issues. These were the celebratory verses that subsequently earned him recognition as the country’s poet laureate.

A similar ideological trajectory was that of Andrade, whose poetic initiation was also in response to the tragic social and political turmoil of his youth. An early poem, “Canto a Paysandú” [Song for Paysandú], which lamented the tragic destruction of that Uruguayan city by Brazilian forces—the act that helped to ignite the Paraguayan War—communicated his strong identification with the federalist cause and opposition to Mitre’s liberal politics. However, by the 1870s, Andrade’s politics yielded to moderation, and his poetry now exalted national values and sang the hymn of liberty. His patriotic poetry henceforth spoke to an optimism for Argentina’s “Promethean race” and the brilliant future awaiting his country in the coming positivist age. Official recognition soon followed: he was called “Poet of the the New Democracy” for his Romantic exaltation of collective values and profound faith in the young nation with its doors open to the future.

1880 marks the year when the porteño brand of liberalism reigned supreme and the country initiated a period of dramatic progress whose benefits were shared by all classes to some degree. The political and material successes of the regime were reflected in the country’s literature, which communicated a new and wide-spread optimism. A young generation of writersthose of 1880—now dominated the literary scene. These, in contrast to the previous generation, had received the best education that their elitist circle was able to offer. Thus they accepted without question the prevailing liberal values, supported the law and order of the newly hegemonic state, and mythified the life and rigors of the countryside. These writers, who were at the same time leading participants in the most important social and political events of their time, produced a literature typified by brief sketches and a conversational tone that were first published in newspapers and only later collected in book form.

Heading the list of 1880 writers was Lucio Victorio Mansilla (1831–1913), whose Una excursion a los indios ranqueles, 1870 [An Excursion to the Ranquel Indian Nation] combines personal memoir and ethnology in its unsurpassed considerations of indigenous culture and its relationship to white, urban society. Mansilla, a nephew of the dictator Rosas, had already distinguished himself in a military career on the frontier, and was to play an important role in the future politics of the country. The predominance of the author’s personal commentary and its “personalization” of an important aspect of Argentine political history account for the work’s “novelistic” nature. Early European settlers in the region found only impoverished, nomadic groups of native American people, in contrast to the more developed civilizations of Peru and Mexico. Since colonial days, relations between the whites and the Indians were characterized by continual conflict. The country’s literature, with few exceptions, records an image of the Indians as a cruel, barbaric people. Mansilla’s work is important because it stands almost alone in projecting a humanistic vision of a place for the Indian in the modern culture that was evolving. This optimism was short-lived, however, since only a few years later the future president, Julio A. Roca, would lead a military expedition into the unsettled regions of the country that culminated with the massive destruction of Indian lives and livelihood, and the abrupt closure to a century of frontier conflict.

The only important publication of Miguel Cané (1852–1905) was Juvenilia (1884), a minor classic of autobiographical literature. In anecdotal fashion, Cané records the intimate experiences of his cadre of privileged students during their years of internship in the Colegio Nacional. In doing so, he presents a most memorable microscopic view of the disputes dividing the Argentine society of the time.

Outside the 1880 group was Eduardo Gutiérrez (1851–89), whose serial novel, Juan Moreira (1879–80), was to eternalize the literary figure of the honorable gaucho rebel who is able to outwit his more “civilized” antagonists. The popularization of this literary folk hero through sequels written, performed, or sung by many imitators, testifies to the continuing attraction of rural themes and the enduring importance of the urban-rural conflict in the nation’s consciousness. Gutiérrez, by transforming Juan Moreira into the mimodramatic production of 1884, initiated what was to become a theatrical revolution. Until about 1870 dramatic activity sporadically manifested itself in the country’s larger cities, but primarily with translated works or those written about “universal” themes by national writers. However, the burgeoning urban public—swollen by European immigrants and migrants from rural areas—now enjoyed peace accompanying the end to the country’s long civil struggles. The new public, without class distinction, found aesthetic enjoyment in scenes of legendary gaucho heroes and outlaws. This would culminate with itinerant “drama criollo” (creole theater) of the Podestá family, whose talented actors and impresario-producers would mesmerize audiences all over the region. Before the end of the century, the dramas of Abdón Arósteguy, Vicente Pérez Petit—and then the immensely popular Calandria (1896), by Martiniano Leguizamón (1858–1935), would follow.

If the literature of the 1880s reflected optimism in the country’s present and future, that of the 1890s revealed greater pessimism—especially after the 1890 stock market crash and an aborted coup. La bolsa, 1891 [The Stock Market] by Julián Martel (real name, José Miró, 1867–96) communicated cynicism over the country’s boom-bust prosperity gained through indebtedness to European financial interests, in which wealth was measured by one’s conspicuous consumption and not by productive capacity. Implicit was the condemnation of past immigration policies, which had resulted in the passing of control to a new group of Argentines, represented in the novel by Dr Glow. This figure is an intelligent Jewish lawyer who progressively becomes sucked into the immoral practices of the commercial world. The novel’s rather fanciful solution for contemporary ills seems to be the return to less complicated times, when the country’s institutions had been managed by more down-to-earth Argentines of Spanish descent.

Sin rumbo, 1885 [Aimless] by Eugenio Cambaceres (1843-1889), is the nadir of this literary descent into despair. In keeping with the Naturalist school of Émile Zola, the author sets out to depict the degrading aspects of character and scene in a supposed “scientific” attempt to understand society’s ills in general. In the novel, a rootless young Argentine protagonist grows to despise the routine aspects of ranch living that he had experienced as a child and that make possible his sumptuous lifestyle in the capital city. Like other members of the country’s ruling class, his excessive refinement breeds contempt, and perversion, and leads to exploitation of others. Displaying at times a lucid understanding of the psychological, social, and moral malaise afflicting him, nevertheless he is unable to muster the will necessary to return to a more stable universe.

WILLIAM H. KATRA

See also entries on Eugenio Cambaceres, Caudillismo and Dictatorship, Esteban Echeverría, José Hernández and Martin Fierro, José Mármol, Nationalism

20th-Century Prose and Poetry

Latin American countries have similar forms of literary expression, stemming originally from their Hispanic roots and, from the 19th century onwards, a common acceptance of cultural models—especially those of French origin. Nevertheless, each region has particular characteristics which have been accentuated over the years. Specific to Argentine literature is the importance of the city as a theme, due to its being a predominantly urban society. Buenos Aires, which developed differently from its surrounding rural environment, manifested increasingly strong ties with Europe and subsequently absorbed influences from the United States.

Another characteristic is the absence of autochthonous literature, since the indigenous people of the Southern Cone did not have an advanced culture. Nor are influences from the rest of Hispanic America particularly strong. In fact, the opposite is the case: Argentine publishers sold books throughout the continent; magazines and newspapers with (literary) supplements were read in the most diverse places. Add to this the prestige of Buenos Aires, a cosmopolitan city, always open to the newest trends.

The early decades of the 20th century saw important changes in the country’s social structure. A large middle class was formed, sustained by continuous waves of immigration which improved both the economy and the level of intellectual attainment. Far removed from the solitary artistic activity and extreme individualism of the Romantic period, the writer began to see himself as part of a profession and established contact with his fellow writers through artistic and literary institutions which identified with the current aesthetic trends.

Realism persisted in the early years of the 20th century. Unlike the writers of the 1880s—characterized as fragmentary—certain novelists of this period attempted to paint a vast panorama of contemporary society. A certain analytical zeal took over and in its better Argentine exponents—Carlos María Ocntos, Francisco Sicardi, Robert J. Payró, Manuel Gálvez and Hugo Wast—this went beyond mere costumbrista attention to detail, to capture something that was authentically Argentine.

Applying the rules of European Realism to the Argentine environment, these writers managed to capture its own specific circumstances. In an organic and organized way, they undertook to explain current situations through a reconstruction of the past. This meant focusing on several different areas of the surrounding environment—urban, suburban, rural—and adopting linguistic modes which reflected regional forms of speech. The organization of the story remained traditional; linear development, descriptive devices, and moral conclusions, turned out to be almost always—in the novels of Payró, for instance—the most effective way of representing daily life.

The modernista movement developed simultaneously, as a vehicle for a new expressive impulse, and a continual generational polemic began with Realism and subsequently with the avant-garde. The presence of Rubén Darío in Buenos Aires (1897) and the circulation of his work deeply influenced the development of Argentine poetry at the turn of the century. It is worth remembering that when Leopoldo Lugones published his first books and became the foremost exponent of Modernismo in the River Plate area, there were still echoes of Romantic poetry in the work of Olegario Victor Andrade, Rafael Obligado and Almafuerte (pseudonym of Pedro Bonifacio Palacios). Lugones’s vigorous personality brought criticism as well as admiration, but many followed his rigorous style and verbal preciousness. His multifarious activities as poet, story-teller and essayist opened up new perspectives for writers of the time. The quality of his prose in La guerra gaucha, 1905 [The Gaucho War] and his collection of stories of the fantastic are only equalled by the work of Enrique Larreta who, in La gloria de don Ramiro, 1908 (The Glory of Don Ramiro) produced an exemplar of the Modernis The cosmopolitanism and aestheticism characteristic of this genre, not widely cultivated in Argentine literature, were succesfully displayed in Larreta’s recreation of the Spain of Phillip II.
The centenary celebrations of Argentine Independence heralded a decade of transition in which there were no major aesthetic changes nor outstanding literary figures. It was a period reaffirming the Realism which had dominated the novel and short story since the beginning of the century. While the major writers, Payró, Ocantos, and Wast, continued in their same style, others revived a costumbrismo rooted in local life. The novels of Manuel Gálvez, La maestra normal, 1914 [The Training School Teacher], El mal metafísico, 1916 [The Metaphysical Ill]—are set in the city; those of Benito Lynch in the province of Buenos Aires; Horacio Quiroga’s short stories in the jungle of Misiones. Meanwhile, the status of literature itself received a boost. In 1913 a Department of Argentine Literature was created in the University of Buenos Aires under Ricardo Rojas. Ambitious collections dedicated to disseminating the work of Argentine writers were planned. Among them was La cultura argentina [Argentine Culture], edited by José Ingenieros. In 1919, Manuel Gálvez edited the anthology Los mejores cuentos argentinos [The Best Argentine Short Stories], with a prologue stressing the importance, not as yet recognized, of that narrative form. Now, such collections provide excellent examples of the canon prevailing at the time.

There was an expansion of literary journals, formed around small groups of writers. Nosotros [Ourselves] founded in 1907 by Alfredo Bianchi and Roberto F. Giusti, was notable for its range of views and the quality of its contributors over several decades. First seen in its pages were works of the postmodernista group: Rafael A. Arrieta, Arturo Capdevila, Alfredo R. Bufano, Carlos Obligado and Arturo Marasso, among others, characterized, despite the diversity of themes, by a refinement of expression and formal cohesion.

Although they had markedly different features, other writers can also be linked with this group: Enrique Banchs, undisputed master of verse culminating in La urna, 1911 [The Urn] his stylised lyrical work; Baldomero Fernández Moreno, founder of sencillismo (emphasis on simplicity), projected an emotive and ironic view of daily life harking back to Evaristo Carriego; and the early work of Alfonsina Storni. Storni, however, transcend the limits of this trend both through the bitter mocking tone, which added an edge to her writing, and her intellectual treatment of social problems.

The 1920s announced a period of innovation in Argentine literature; its iconoclasm coincided with that of other European and Latin America countries (Brazil is a case in point). This process of transformation developed during the declining years of Modernismo and when Realism was still a respectable option. Isolated works like Lunario sentimental, 1909 [Sentimental Lunar Calendar] by Leopoldo Lugones or El cencerro de cristal, 1915 [The Crystal Cowbell] by Ricardo Güiraldes were clear forerunners of an unprecedented break with tradition.

During the avant-garde period, Jorge Luis Borges stood out as the principal theorist and disseminator of ultraísmo. Borges came back to Buenos Aires in 1921 after a stay in Europe where he was in contact with all the main postwar literary movements. Shortly afterwards he and a group of fellow writers founded a highly experimental wall magazine, Prisma [Prism] and the journal Proa [Prow]) which despite their brief existence succeeded in establishing their innovatory aims. They sought a different vision, ridding language of conventional formulae, extracting from it its most lucid power of suggestion. These were ultraísmo’s guiding principles and the movement confronted head on the Realism still in vogue at the time. The ultraísts also attacked Spanish American Modernismo, criticising a rhetoric which until then had seemed synonymous with literature. Its innovations influenced poetry more than prose. Poets rejected anecdote and rhyme, concentrated on liberating metaphor, combined the sublime and the ordinary, mixed prose and verse. They composed short, almost rhythmless poems and preferred descriptive fragments to the set pattern of verse.

These innovations increased with the appearance of Martin Fierro, a journal which brought other poets into the original group. The Manifesto, written by Oliverio Girondo, stated “the need to define and explore a new sensitivity which is able to open up unexpected horizons and discover new means and forms of expression.” Although this statement of intent was not fully realized, they did find different thematic approaches and achieved greater technical freedom. Fantasy opened up completely new perspectives for them.

Girondo’s Veinte poemas para ser leídos en el tranvía [Twenty Poems to be Read in the Tram], Borges’s Luna de enfrente [Moon Opposite], González Lanuza’s Prismas [Prisms], Marechal’s Días como flechas [Days Like Arrows] and Ricardo Molinari’s Fábula del pez [Fable of the Fish], in rapid succession consolidated the heralded anti-formalism and use of metaphor. Córdova Iturburu, González Tuñón, Norah Lange and, a little later, Petit de Murat, intensified the search for new themes and rhythm effects and deepened the split between traditional and experimental approaches to literature.

Contrasting with the bold slogans of this group—which called itself Florida—was the Boedo group, more interested in political statements than stylistic definitions. In the footsteps of French Naturalism and Russian Realism, these writers expounded their own particular historical and ideological interpretation in their novels and short stories. Leónidas Barletta, Roberto Mariani, Elías Castelnuovo, Aristóbulo de Echegaray were renowned both for the quality of their prose and militant defence of the 1917 Russian Revolution in the pages of their journals Los Pensadores [Men of Ideas] and Claridad [Clarity].

In 1926, two important novels appeared: Don Segundo Sombra by Ricardo Güiraldes and El juguete rabioso [The Rabid Toy] by Roberto Arlt. Both initiated, in different ways, the break with traditional Realism and the intertwining of planes of narrative which, decades later, would characterize the postmodern novel. There were contrasting tendencies in both these writers which adapted the prevailing techniques to their own personal, creative needs.

During this period, Macedonio Fernández’s humorous reflective tales, which so influenced Borges and other members of the Martin Fierro group, heralded the fragmentation and discontinuity of experimental writing which exploded in the 1960s throughout Latin America. This role of precursor separated, and to a large extent, isolated him from the regional costumbrismo still in vogue at the time.

The disappearance of the journal Martin Fierro at the end of 1927 marked the end of a stage of cultural activity, begun in 1920, which was concerned with spreading avantgarde aesthetics. From then on the members of the Florida group started to disperse and channelled their energies in diverse directions, only occasionally coming together in certain publishing projects or some other late resurgence which fizzled out.

More or less the same applied to the members of the Boedo group, which gradually lost its fighting spirit despite the prolonged life of Claridad and some later publications. They directed their concerns towards political activity so that by around 1930 we can consider this important innovative movement at an end. It was a movement which produced a profound change in the perspective of the artistic-literary concepts of the time.

As the critic Luis Emilio Soto pointed out in an appreciation of this period written in 1938, it was not easy to evaluate the real achievements of the aesthetic transformation brought about by the Martín Fierro group. “One day,” he wrote, “someone will chronicle the intellectual movement which began in 1920. Among other phenomena which we don’t yet fully appreciate, it will show how Argentine writers discovered the virtues of apprenticeship, how the nobility of the profession was established by imposing obligations, how writers acquired a new awareness of their social function as they exchanged a sense of the international for the universal.”

This new professional attitude adopted by Argentine writers, a sign of maturity and self—critical responsibility towards their own work, was demonstrated most clearly by the wide variety of programmes and projects undertaken by the literary reviews. Although many of them initially continued the polarity of the Florida and Boedo groups, they gradually outlined wider criteria which no longer conformed to generational splits or ideological battles, but sought to improve the status of creativity over and above incidental controversies.

The polemical tensions of the avant-garde gave way to a decade of transition in which a few belated echoes still resounded while isolated ideas cropped up in response to disparate impulses. The founding of Sur [South] in 1931 by Victoria Ocampo and the reappearance of Nosotros, were two notable events in the evolution of Argentine literature, important because of their eclecticism and enthusiasm for the most up-to-date cultural output.

Sur was noted for its prestigious contributors and its spirit of innovation which helped to disseminate the latest literary ideas and introduced a new wave of young writers. This was the so-called Generation of 1940. Foremost among them were Juan Rodolfo Wilcock, Vicente Barbieri, César Rosales, León Benaros and Alfonso Sola González, who at this stage expressed in Sur early signs of their poetic concerns. Both the literary output and the process of transformation between modernity and the postmodern era are to be found in the pages of this journal.

When the first issue of this publication appeared, Argentine politics and society were going through a period of acute turmoil. After the fall of Yrigoyen (1930), the right wing had imposed a very narrow framework of reference into which Sur burst, as a bold unexpected attempt to gain access to a less rigid intellectual dimension. The journal continually reiterated its desire to identify with Latin American reality, but relating it to the fundamentals of European culture. It maintained this stance throughout its existence.

Political events like the Spanish Civil War and World War II influenced the journal’s activities. Its emphasis on disseminating aspects of art, science and sociology gradually changed the physiognomy of the journal. Issues devoted to criticism, the essay, poetry and fiction, meant that it published all the major intellectuals of the day. Jorge Luis Borges, Eduardo González Lanuza, Oliverio Girondo, Ricardo Molinari, Guillermo de Torre, all exponents of the avant-garde, figured among its most prolific contributors. Joining them later were Eduardo Mallea, Silvina Ocampo, Ernesto Sábato, Ezequiel Martínez Estrada, Adolfo Bioy Casares and Manuel Mujica Láinez, who marked out incontrovertible aesthetic routes from then on.
In contrast to previous stages where we can clearly see Realism confronting the distortion of reality expressed by the new currents, both these approaches fused in the literature which emerged after 1930. The novella and the short story, genres skilfully employed by numerous writers like Lugones, Quiroga, Güiraldes, Mariani and Cancela, were now the most obvious conduits of the referential change which introduced the fantastic into post-avant-garde Argentine literature. Macedonio Fernández and Oliverio Girondo had experimented with very similar forms before. Borges would become a past master of this form of literary creation. From 1935 onwards, Historia universal de la infamia (A Universal History of Infamy) and “El jardín de senderos que se bifurcan” (included in Ficciones), demonstrated a total sustained dedication to the literature of the fantastic. Cohesion of expression, skilled handling of writing techniques, and above all a powerful imagination which allowed him to combine the most absurd circumstances with absolute normality, made Borges’s narrative style unmistakable.

At the same time Borges also tackled other areas. The singular critical wit of Inquisiciones [Inquisitions], Discusión [Discussion] and Historia de la eternidad [History of Eternity] made Borges one of the most remarkable essayists of the time. His work already showed the aesthetic and philosophical concerns which were to become the keys to his writing. Controversial articles were often merely a pretext for asking himself fundamental questions which attempted to define the relationship between beings and things.

Others essays which sought to establish national identity and the way in which telluric conditions effected it, stemmed from sociological concerns, like Ezequiel Martínez Estrada Radiografía de la pampa (X-Ray of the Pampa) and La cabeza de Goliat [Goliath’s Head], or from philosophical or even metaphysical approaches in the case of Raúl Scalabrini Ortiz, Carlos Alberto Erro or Bernardo Canal Feijóo. Subsequently, Argentina’s political evolution would come under the intensely critical gaze of Juan José Sebreli, Julio Mafud, Ismael Viñas, and the rigorous pithy approach of Héctor A.Murena.

The destruction of the rigid divide between truth and fiction was accentuated throughout this period and literature became testimonial, incorporating historical evaluation and biography in its discourse. This was certainly the case with the novels of Eduardo Mallea: La bahía de silencio (The Bay of Silence), Todo verde perecerá (All Green Shall Perish), Fiesta en noviembre (Fiesta in November), La torre (The Tower). Many of his characters’ concerns, expressed in clear, refined prose, reflected the basic premises in his essays.

The work of Ernesto Sábato, from Sobre heroes y tumbas (On Heroes and Tombs) to Abaddón, el exterminador (The Angel of Darkness), also employed a fusion of the reflective and the imaginary and stemmed from his meditations in Uno y el universo [One and the Universe] and Hombres y engranajes [Men and Gears]. The same thing occurred in Leopoldo Marechal’s Adán Buenosayres: the multifaceted plot made up of constant textual interlacing paradoxically allowed him to reconstruct the avant-garde scene in which he was an active participant. For his part, Manuel Mujica Láinez’s brilliant evocation of the past in Aquí vivieron [They Lived Here], Misterioso Buenos Aires and Bomarzo (Bomarzo, a Novel), succeeded in combining artistic and historical erudition with stylistic elegance.

The use of the fantastic reached extraordinary heights during this decade, beginning with the original exponents of the genre: Adolfo Bioy Casares in La invención de Morel.
and Silvina Ocampo in several collections of short stories such as La furia (included in Leopoldina’s Dream) and Autobiografía de Irene (also in Leopoldina’s Dream), the latter being a work of singular construction. In 1940, in collaboration with Jorge Luis Borges, they brought out the Antología de la literatura fantástica (The Book of Fantasy), which systematically displayed the diverse forms of this kind of narrative.

Julio Cortázar, who began his literary career with a collection of poems, devoted himself exclusively to prose writing from 1950. His short stories and tales, Bestiario (Bestiary, in End of the Game and Other Stories), Las armas secretas (Secret Weapons, also in End of the Game ...), Historias de cronopios y de famas (Cronopios and Famas), transfigure ordinary every day things into magical distortions where fate acts as an unpredictable element. His close attention to form and constant experimentation with technique reached a peak in 1963 with Rayuela (Hopscotch), one of the most important novels of the time and one which would become a model for later generations.

After World War II, publishing output in Argentina increased with a large number of writers producing many different types of literature. The influence of French Existentialism was seen in certain writers—Antonio Di Benedetto, Abelardo Arias, Jorge Macciángoli, Mario A.Lancelotti—where an obsessive intellectual atmosphere prevailed. Other writers such as Manuel Peyrou, María Angélica Bosco, and Marco Denevi, skilfully cultivated the detective story.

At the beginning of the 1960s, women entered the literary arena in greater numbers and with unusual intensity and rigour. The questioning of inherited values and the norms of behaviour which the patriarchal society had taught them became a constant theme in the novels of Beatriz Guido, Silvina Bullrich, Marta Lynch, Griselda Gambaro, Jorgelina Loubet, María Esther de Miguel and Elvira Orphée.

The critical rigour which the journal Contorno, 1953–59 [Outline] imposed on literary circles for several years meant that that generation of writers had to re-evaluate attitudes and criteria of expression. David Viñas, Haroldo Conti, Rodolfo Walsh, Daniel Moyano and Germán Rozenmacher state clearly their intention to confront the country’s political problems, especially from 1966 onwards. This was a foretaste of the reaction which was to come after 1970 with the crisis of Peronism and the military coup of 1976.

From 1976 until 1983, Argentine intellectuals fled to other countries, some for ideological reasons, others to improve their financial situation. In exile, they assumed the task of keeping alive cultural continuity during those years. Cases in point are Antonio Di Benedetto, David Viñas, Daniel Moyano, Manuel Puig, Juan José Saer and Carlos Soriano. Despite the emotional break imposed by exile, they were able to express the trauma of that era with greater freedom. Each used his own particular criteria and was conditioned by his chosen form of expression and the circumstances under which he left Argentina.

The authors who stayed in Argentina writing subversive literature reflected on historical or symbolic themes which masked the truth of their discourse. These hidden meanings are most interestingly expressed in Respiración artificial, 1980 (Artificial Respiration) by Ricardo Piglia, En el corazón de junio, 1983 [In the Heart of June] by Luis Gusman, Nada que perder, 1982 [Nothing to Lose] and La vida entera, 1981 [The Whole of Life] by Juan Carlos Martini.
In addition to this combative attitude which modified the Argentine novel thematically, there was a change in form which sometimes resorted to intertextuality, parody and historical reconstruction through memoirs, letters and documents. The narrative style initiated by Manuel Puig in the 1960s found adherents in this decade, especially the juxtaposition of elite culture and mass culture seen in his novels La traición de Rita Hayworth, 1968 (Betrayed by Rita Hayworth) and Boquitas pintadas, 1969 (Heartbreak Tango).

Other writers, like Enrique Medina in Las tumbas [The Tombs] and Las muecas del miedo [Grimaces of Fear], Jorge Asís in Flores robadas en los jardines de Quilmes [Flowers Stolen from Gardens in Quilmes], Geno Díaz in Kermesse, Carlos Dámaso Martínez in Hay cenizas en el viento [There Are Ashes in the Wind], were increasingly preoccupied with the themes of death, persecution and fear. This discourse of evasion, otherness and concealment generated forms of resistance which characterized this literary period and which continue in different forms of expression to this day.

Around 1960, Argentine poetry developed new trends which resulted from a new aesthetics. The new generation of poets needed to identify with their own age and consciously assumed the responsibility of being the protagonists in a world going through a period of rapid change. The aestheticism which characterized Argentine verse until the mid-20th century would be replaced by numerous individual manifestations which contributed to diversifying the complex panorama of poetry at the time.

What prompted these new approaches most directly could be the desire to get closer to the earth, something which was felt by writers in the 1940s. This idea, only partially achieved by the elegiac intimate lyricism of the Neoromantics, would be expressed in the work of this generation’s Neopopulist group, involved in social problems and themes specific to the world around them.

The avant-garde forms which surfaced around 1950 finally channelled their rejection of form into a hermetic style, coded in the techniques of verbal automatism which did not always achieve the all-encompassing vision or the ambitious plan to transform the world so often reiterated in their journal Poesía de Buenos Aires [Buenos Aires Poetry]. Apart from a few isolated exceptions such as Rodolfo Alonso and Raúl Gustavo Aguirre, an escapist attitude, provoked by instability, disorientation and personal tragedy, prevailed at this time.

The work of Alberto Girri, governed from his very first books by intellectual rigour and analysis, proved an important experience within this lyrical search to affirm one’s identity. Exponents of this investigative approach, which sought to demonstrate their contact with things through purgative, often conversational, language, were H.A. Murena, Betina Edelberg, Juan L. Ortiz, Amelia Biagiioni and Roberto Juarroz. They sought to decipher problems and examine the human condition from their own particular vision of the cosmos.

Towards the end of the 1960s, the confrontation with society and historical events intensified and diversified. External influences combined with local circumstances to change fundamentally contemporary literature. The influence of Existentialism, a strong gravitational pull in those days, forced poets to identify with their age in more important ways than through exclusively aesthetic approaches.

The dialogue that was initiated turned into a polemical search and a strong commitment to reality. The poems of Joaquín O. Gianuzzi, Elizabeth Azcona de Cranwell, Alfredo Veiravé, María Elena Walsh and, in a very personal way, Alejandra Pizarnik, were totally devoted to the task of meshing with their own time and space. With a Neoromantic past behind them, Olga Orozco, Enrique Molina, Manuel J. Castilla, César Fernández Moreno and other avant-garde poets like Juan José Ceselli, Edgar Bayley or Francisco Madariaga, now tackled the complex experiences of modern humankind more incisively.

After 1970, the country’s progressive political disintegration—starting with the military coups of 1966 and 1976—resulted in the younger generation’s disenchantment with both the historical past and the social present. The lyrical discourse masked critical positions which could not be openly expressed. Protest was sometimes translated into parody or a symbolic representation of persecution and authoritarianism. Juan Gelman, Máximo Simpson, Alberto Szpunberg, Susana Thénon and Rubén Vela are all examples of this questioning, intensely dramatic attitude to the reality of their time.

The persistence of this anti-formal and testimonial position—made up of emphatic adhesions and rejections—typifies the work of Argentine poets in recent years, combining very diverse aesthetic and ideological perspectives. Since 1984, literary workshops, colloquia, and poetry readings have brought together very personal voices: Leonidas Lamborghini, Diana Bellesi, Daniel Freidemberg, Arturo Carrera, Tamara Kamenszain and Dolores Etchecopar. Diario de Poesía [Poetry Daily] and El último reino [Last Kingdom] keep alive a combative, rebellious attitude which justifies the presence of this genre in Argentine literature.

NÉLIDA SALVADOR
translated by Ann Wright

Further Reading

General
Viñas, David and Eva Tabakián (general editors), Historia social de la literatura argentina, vol. 7, Buenos Aires: Contrapunto, 1989

19th Century
Masiello, Francine, Between Civilization and Barbarism: Women, Nation and Literary Culture in Modern Argentina, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992

Meyer-Minneman, Klaus, La novela hispanoamericana del “fin de siècle,” Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1991 [Chapter 5 is on Naturalism in the River Plate]

20th Century

Sosnowski, Saúl (editor), Represión y reconstrucción de una cultura: el caso argentino, Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1988

Bibliographies

Special Issues of Journals

Revista Iberoamericana 142 and 143 (1988)
Jose Maria 1Arguedas 1911–1969

Peruvian prose writer and ethnographer

The political upheaval of the first two decades of the 20th century in Latin America, and particularly in Peru, promoted an intense movement on behalf of indigenous populations, a campaign that intended to vindicate native culture as well as to improve the social status of the Indian. The early fictional expressions of indigenism (as this social and intellectual project is usually called) were limited to a crude realism denouncing the oppression of the Indian, portrayed primarily as the victim of institutionalized injustice in contrast to the idealized and exotic image of the “noble savage” projected by European Romanticism. Such is the case of works like the Peruvian Clorinda Matto de Turner’s Aves sin nido, 1889 (Birds without a Nest), the Ecuadorian Jorge Icaza’s Huasipungo, 1934 (The Villagers), the Bolivian Alcides Arguedas’s Raza de bronce, 1919 (Race of Bronze), and the Mexican Gregorio López y Fuentes’s El indio, 1935 (They That Reap).

The publication in 1941 of Yawar fiesta (Yawar Fiesta) by José María Arguedas signified the end of indigenism and the emergence of neoindigenism. Neoindigenism, an ideological and esthetic position adopted by Arguedas, goes beyond the exaltation of Andean culture; it proposes an internal view of indigenous values with the purpose of legitimizing and preserving their intrinsic features. The hallmark of Arguedas’s fiction is his intimate knowledge of the Indian mind and his thorough identification with autochthonous cultures. Arguedas’s works of fiction include Agua [Water], Yawar fiesta, Diamantes y pedernales [Diamonds and Quartz], Los ríos profundos [Deep Rivers]; his account of life in a Lima prison, El Sexto, La agonía de “R Ñiti” [The Agony of Rasu Ñiti], and Todas las sangres [Everyone’s Blood]. Lastly, there is the novel that was published posthumously, El zorro de arriba y el zorro de abajo [The Fox from the Mountains and the Fox from the Coast].

Born in an Andean community of a white father and an Indian mother, Arguedas spent his youth among Indians and learned Quechua as his first language. His training in anthropology allowed him to study Quechua folklore and to publish translations of Quechua poetry as well as essays on Andean myths, legends, customs and traditions. In his fiction he took up the task of correcting the distorted image of the Indian as portrayed previously in indigenist literature, a movement whose expressions had essentially revolved around themes centered predominantly on the conflict between Western civilization and indigenous culture. Arguedas moves beyond this limited vision and uses his fiction to explore vast social processes that include not only Indians and whites, but also mestizos, and the very complex ethnic, political and economic relationships among these groups, as in the case of Agua and Yawar fiesta. Also in Yawar fiesta, and later in Los ríos profundos, Arguedas examines regional cultural conflicts between Andean and coastal communities. In his two last major novels, Todas las sangres and El zorro de arriba y el zorro de abajo, Arguedas deals with the encroachment of multinational... companies on incipient Third World economies, and also with the subject of massive migrations from the Andes to industrial urban centers.

One of Arguedas’s major artistic accomplishments was the creation of a special language that would express Indian attitudes and intimate feelings without resorting to linguistic distortions, a technique that had been the norm in more traditional indigenist literature. From the very beginning of his literary career, Arguedas faced the enormous task of writing for Spanish-speaking readers about the affective relationships of peoples whose native language is Quechua. The core of the problem was how to capture the subjectivity of the Andean Indian, but also, how to represent in correct written Spanish the nuances of Quechua orality. His first attempts, as in Agua and Yawar fiesta, were not entirely successful as they still relied on structural changes that rendered the language artificial. It was only with Los ríos profundos that Arguedas was able to weave basic structures of Quechua speech syntax within the framework of Spanish, thus creating a language that more authentically reflected not only Indian sensibilities but their magical-religious concept of the universe. Arguedas’s place in literary history goes beyond his immense contribution to indigenism, and its variant neoindigenism, considered as ideologies and as aesthetic movements. The undisputed quality of his works puts him solidly in the top rank of Latin American writers, and at the same level as the more visible writers of the so-called Boom of Spanish American fiction, such as his compatriot Mario Vargas Llosa, or the Colombian Nobel Laureate Gabriel García Márquez.

Indigenism, contrary to statements claiming its demise, still continues to flourish in the works of a new generation of writers dedicated to the preservation of José María Arguedas’s legacy.

ISMAEL P. MÁRQUEZ

Biography

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction

Agua, Lima: Talleres de la CIP, 1935
Runa yuy way, Lima: Comisión Central del Censo, 1939 [novel]
El Sexto, Lima: Mejía Baca, 1961
La agonia de “Rasu-ñiti,” Lima: Talleres Gráficos Ícaro, 1962
Las sangres, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1964
El zorro de arriba y el zorro de abajo (unfinished), Buenos Aires: Losada, 1971; critical edition, edited by Eve Marie Fell, Madrid: Archivos, 1990 [Contains articles on this novel by leading specialists on the work of Arguedas]

Other Writings (including works on Quechua culture)

Canto kechwa, Lima: Club del Libro Peruano, 1938; translated in The Singing Mountaineers, 1957 [songs in Spanish and Quechua]
Canciones y cuentos del pueblo quechua, in collaboration with Jorge A. Lira, Lima: Huascarán, 1949; translated in The Singing Mountaineers, 1957
Mesa redonda sobre el monolingüismo quechua y aymara y la educación en el Perú, Lima: Casa de la Cultura del Perú, 1966
Las comunidades de España y del Peru Lima: Universidad Mayor de San Marcos, 1968
Temblar Katatay y otros poemas, Lima: Instituto Nacional de Cultura, 1972 [Spanish and Quechua]
Formación de una cultura nacional indoamericana, edited by Angel Rama, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1975
Señores e indios: acerca de la cultura quechua, edited by Angel Rama, Buenos Aires: Era, 1976 [essays and lectures]
Compilations and Anthologies

Translations

Further Reading

Columbus, Claudette Kemper, Mythological Consciousness and the Future: José María Arguedas, New York: Peter Lang, 1986
Fell, Eve Marie (editor), El zorro de arriba y el zorro de abajo, Madrid: Archivos, 1990 [Critical edition with essays by Cornejo Polar, Martin Lienhard, William Rowe and others]
Harrison, Regina, “José María Arguedas: el substrato quechua,” Revista Iberoamericana 49 (January-March 1983)
Larco, Juan (editor), Recopilación de textos sobre José María Arguedas, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1976
Rowe, William, Mito e ideología en la obra de José María Arguedas, Lima: Instituto Nacional de Cultura, 1979

Bibliographies

Special Issues of Journals

Revista Iberoamericana 122 (January-March 1983)

Los ríos profundos

Novel by José María Arguedas

Los ríos profundos, without doubt José María Arguedas’s most popular novel, is also generally considered his masterpiece. By far the most genuine representation of Andean culture in Peruvian indigenist fiction, this novel is not only rich in its portrayal of Quechua folklore, music and language, but in the careful treatment of the Indian magical-religious vision of the world. Arguedas’s linguistic innovations in this novel are a critical element in the representation of a more authentic and convincing image of the Indian. Rather than resorting to the stylistic experiments found in his early works, techniques that relied on structural distortions which rendered the language artificial, Arguedas succeeds in creating a new language that skilfully incorporates Quechua syntax and oral qualities into a carefully crafted, correct Spanish.

Narrated in the first person by a mature, well-educated man, the novel is a recollection of the predicaments of the fourteen-year-old boy Ernesto as he struggles to cope with life in a religious boarding school in the Andean town of Abancay where he had been left by his father, an itinerant lawyer. Generally viewed as autobiographical because of the similarities with Arguedas’s own upbringing, the novel consists of a series of episodes in which Ernesto, who has been brought up in an Indian rural community, suddenly finds himself in the alien and hostile environment of the school. There he meets with rampant violence and oppression, an endemic condition resulting from ethnic, cultural and racial differences. Ernesto’s life with the Indians before he was brought to Abancay had been full of wonderful nurturing experiences, in close contact with nature, immersed in myths and legends, and in an intimate, spiritual relationship with the universe. In sharp and painful contrast, his life at the boarding school was dominated by violence, sexual debasement and repression, psychological and physical abuse, all promoted and condoned by the school’s director and staff.

The closed universe of the school is in itself a microcosm reflecting the same values of the society to which it belongs. The town of Abancay is totally surrounded by large haciendas or estates, where the landowners are all-powerful and undisputed masters over the lives and destinies of every living creature. Overwhelmed by this suffocating and dehumanizing environment, Ernesto seeks refuge in the chicherías (taverns) where he can mingle with Indians and mestizos, but where he can also listen to huaynos, Andean songs which bring him spiritual solace and mitigate his nostalgia for a paradise lost. In his quest for a closer communion with nature, Ernesto appeals to the supernatural powers of the zumbayllu, a spinning top that can conjure up magical experiences and visions of the idyllic world for which he yearns.

The violence that permeates the novel is a direct reflection of the oppressive structures and feudal nature of the society it depicts. It is essentially a violence that emerges from socioeconomic, cultural and religious domination, a condition that, from the point of view of the subject classes, implies the total collapse of the world’s natural order. Constantly exacerbated by a powerful landowning class supported by civil, military and ecclesiastic authorities, this violation results in a subversive reaction of unforeseen magnitude and consequences against the established social order. Ernesto, who at first has been a passive witness to the rapidly unfolding events, is caught up in the euphoria and determination of the insurgents and participates enthusiastically in the ensuing riots. The first of such incidents is the revolt of the chicheras (waitresses in the tavern) against the landowners to protest the rationing of salt to the peasants. Led by the charismatic doña Felipa, the women defy the authorities, confront the town’s priest, break into the government warehouses and distribute the salt among the poor. The reprisal by the army is swift and brutal; doña Felipa is hunted down by the troops but manages to escape in an episode of epic proportions that transforms her into a mythical figure in the eyes of Ernesto and of her followers. The second subversive event is the uprising of the colonos (peasants belonging to the haciendas), who flee to Abancay from the plague that has erupted among them, demanding that a special mass be said on their behalf to eradicate the evil spirit that is destroying them. The revolt is successful and forces the authorities to accede to their demands. The novel brings to a head not only the conflict between two different social orders, but between two diverging views of the world. Ernesto’s identification with the poor and the downtrodden is more than an expression of his social conscience, it represents his total embrace of Quechua cultural values with full confidence in its virtues and powers. The victory of the colonos reaffirms and vindicates his faith, and helps him resolve his conflictive feelings of identity.

There is throughout this novel an underlying ideological component that closely reflects Arguedas’s well-known sociopolitical inclinations. The sudden turn half-way through the novel from the narration of Ernesto’s vicissitudes in the boarding school to the account of the momentous events of the revolts of the chicheras and the colonos would at first seem like a break in the book’s unity. Taken as a whole, however, the novel offers a comprehensive view of Arguedas’s vision of the Indian and its role in Peruvian society. Arguedas’s literary and ideological projects go hand in hand in portraying Andean culture as a self-sufficient alternate to Occidental culture. Furthermore, Arguedas uses the Spanish language, and the novel itself, a genre totally identified with European cultural values, to subvert from the inside the hegemony of the dominant social classes. If, in the novel there appears to be a disproportion between the awesome power of the colonos and the apparently modest results of their challenge to the established order, the implication remains that, properly channeled, this power could be used to bring about social and political change of unprecedented magnitude. Arguedas himself would claim several years after the publication of the novel that the episode of the revolt by the colonos had been the prelude to the bloody uprisings of the Andean campesinos that brought to an end the feudal system of land ownership in Peru, a traumatic episode that permanently changed the nature of Peruvian society as a whole.

Whether in fact Los ríos profundos was instrumental in the social changes brought about by the peasants’ armed struggle is highly debatable. What is certain is that Arguedas’s novel remains as one of the greatest works of Peruvian literature, representing the standard against which all future indigenist fiction would have to be measured.

ISMAEL P. MÁRQUEZ

Editions

Further Reading

Larco, Juan (editor), Recopilación de textos sobre José María Arguedas, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1976 [Contains several worthwhile articles on this novel]

Manlio Argueta 1935–

Salvadorean prose writer and poet

Although also an accomplished poet of social and political commitment, Manlio Argueta has made his mark primarily as a novelist, earning the Casa de las Américas prize in 1977 for Caperucita en la zona roja [Little Red Riding Hood in the Red Zone]. In general terms Argueta has evolved from being the sophisticated, occasionally self-indulgent spokesman of the dissident intellectual elite of urban San Salvador, to the mature, disciplined craftsman of testimonial fiction recording the collective voice of El Salvador’s forgotten people: its long-suffering peasantry.

Begun originally as a poem, Argueta’s first novel, El valle de las hamacas, 1970 [The Valley of the Hammocks], sets the tone for his subsequent fiction, which ranges from passages of lyrical beauty and simplicity, on the one hand, to passages of grotesque coprology or baffling complexity, on the other. His first novel betrays the keenness for experimentation of a raw talent striving to find an original voice amidst the polyphony of the Latin American Boom. Divided into three parts, El valle de las hamacas (the indigenous name for the site of earthquakeprone San Salvador), moves back and forth between past, present and future and switches, sometimes disconcertingly so, from first- to third-person narrative, with the occasional foray into second person singular or plural. The novel could well be described as a Salvadorean nouveau roman, with its quick-fire sequence of flashbacks, interior monologues, speeches, radio transcripts, police reports, prose poems and contrapuntal chronicles of the conquest by both conqueror and conquered. In the midst of such formal pyrotechnics, the reader runs the risk of losing track of the novel’s basic plot: the ill-fated search by a group of inexperienced guerrillas for a Sandinista cache in a remote area of Central America.

The name of the god-forsaken valley where the wretched storehouse of arms is hidden—“El Encanto,” meaning “the Charm” or “the Spell”—is an ironic reference to the legendary “El Dorado,” Argueta’s point being that everything in postconquest El Salvador and Central America, even its legends and heroes, are more ignominious than in the rest of Latin America. Infusing the milieu of would-be student conspirators and guerrillas with a spirit of Sartrean nausea and bad faith, Argueta succeeds in depicting El Salvador during the regime of Colonel Lemus in the mid-1950s as the “arsehole of the world” governed by “a little shit who thinks he is God.”
Caperucita en la zona roja (1977), is, on the surface, Argueta’s most cryptic and challenging novel. Set principally in the urban jungle of San Salvador, this time in the 1970s during the regime of the simian Colonel Molina, Argueta mockingly subverts the story of Little Red Riding Hood, transposing it to the suburb of El Bosque (The Woods), where two anguished characters (Al and Horm) live out their existential frustrations and sexual fantasies. Once again Argueta indulges his penchant for technical experimentation, but with a sense of fun absent from his first novel. Al’s delirious monologues and his passionate dialogues with Horm tell a melodramatic tale reminiscent of a Mexican bolero, while parodies of political speeches and sermons, a blasphemous rendition of the national anthem, a farcical cuckolding scene, fables, wordplay and particularly humorous usage of Salvadorean sayings help turn the novel into a burlesque vision of love and politics in El Salvador.

Simultaneously, however, another story is told; that of the sordid betrayal and execution of Al, a poet-revolutionary, by his fellow-guerrillas. For all his hypochondria, maudlin sentimentality, intellectual arrogance and chauvinism, Al is committed to the ideal of a “cerebral” revolution infused with the “beautiful” and “honest” spirit of poetry. His dream is to liberate his country from a fascist regime that quashes spiritual life, tortures dissidents and massacres students. As the creative reader strives to reconstruct this novelistic jigsaw puzzle, s/he cannot help but recall an early description of Al as a “pobrecito poeta” (a dud little poet), an intertextual clue that, among a series of others, helps to identify Al as none other than Roque Dalton, El Salvador’s tragic left-wing literary and political icon and the writer of the celebrated mock-biography ¡Pobrecito poeta que era yo! [What a Dud Poet I Was!]. Indeed, the very collage technique employed by Argueta in his novel may be seen as a teasing emulation of the poetic technique favoured by Dalton in Las historias prohibidas del Pulgarcito, 1974 [The Forbidden Stories of Tom Thumb]. Ultimately, therefore, Argueta’s novel may be read as a homage to his illustrious comrade, a revolutionary poet and poet-revolutionary, a complex, flawed but good human being whose flame was prematurely extinguished by murderers who betrayed everything he stood for.

In his third novel, Un día en la vida, 1980 (One Day of Life), Argueta leaves the urban milieu of San Salvador and turns to the forgotten rural provinces of his perpetually convulsed republic. Most significantly, for the first time he allows his text to speak consistently and simply in the voice(s) of the marginalized campesinos (peasants), the subaltern community in a country despoiled since independence by an oligarchical network of “fourteen families” and their military and imperialistic allies. In this short novel, Argueta utilises an alternating sequence of interior monologues and first-person testimonies to convey the nightmarish violence that has racked El Salvador since the Great Slaughter of 1932, when “dogs used to eat corpses.” The country’s bloody history is compressed into one day in the life of Lupe Fuentes, a peasant woman haunted by the memory of how her son had his head “chopped off” with a machete and how her husband was reduced to a bruised “piece of meat” before he was fed to the worms and vultures. Both men in her life were peasant leaders involved in a peaceful struggle to obtain better prices for their eggs, chickens and pigs, and the right to health care, to food and to schooling for their children. As far as the shocked, bewildered but stoic Lupe can tell, the National Guard killed them for the crime of possessing a conscience.
Interestingly, for the first time Argueta leaves an imprint, however subtle, of “magical realism” in the pages of this novel, as the peasants’ ancestral gods fill the sky with bloody wounds in angry response to the bloodbath in the countryside below. Ghosts and gremlins materialise before Lupe’s eyes and a mixture of pagan and Catholic superstition shapes her vision of life. In this case, however, the spirit of magic is overwhelmed by the sheer horror of human reality as conveyed by such images of children eaten from within by worms that have been expelled through their noses and mouths, and a naked priest lying on a road with a stick up his anus. Published just as the civil war of the 1980s was about to flare, Un día en la vida can now be interpreted as a lugubrious prophesy of the orgy of violence that was soon to descend upon the country.

In Cuzcatlán: donde bate la mar del sur, 1986 (Cuzcatlán: Where the Southern Sea Beats), Argueta applies pervious devices and motifs to narrate a syncopated history of Cuzcatlán, the indigenous name for El Salvador. A bus trip to San Salvador by Beatriz Martínez (alias Lucía, a guerr comprises the frame within which four generations of the Martínez clan provide their personal testimonies. By adroit exploitation of his preferred technique of yoking together a variety of styles, voices and registers (flashbacks, interior monologues, prose poems, dramatic dialogue, proverbs, songs, repetition of the same episode from different points of view and even instances of telepathic communication) Argueta manages to impart to his narrative a ritualistic tone reminiscent of that of tribal storytellers. The stories told by the various characters throb with the wisdom, poetry, physical courage and spiritual strength of the náhuatl, the pre-Columbian inhabitants of Cuzcatlán, whose “flying princes” were shot down by the conquering Spaniards.

Probably no other writer, apart from Salarrué in Cuentos de barro, 1933 [Clay Stories], has succeeded in humanising the Salvadorean peasant so movingly and persuasively as Argueta in this novel. Particularly impressive is his representation of the female members of the Martínez dynasty, with Beatriz/Lucía, in her function as the “collective voice of her race,” eulogising them as “the centre of the household, the sun round which revolved the twin planets of poverty and hope.” In the midst of the devastations wrought upon the countryside by political massacres and volcanic eruptions, the indomitable spirit of the Salvadorean woman is symbolised by the “metate,” the volcanic stone utilized since time immemorial to grind the corn to make the tortilla, the peasants’ principal sustenance to fend off rickets, diarrhoea or starvation. The antithetical symbol to the metate is the helicopter, a dark, foreboding agent of evil sent by a foreign power to scorch the earth in order to destroy the peasant’s spirit, for maize is a sacred crop which refuses to grow when burnt. Through this dramatic juxtaposition of symbols—the natural against the artificial, the autochthonous against the foreign, primordial lava against the military-industrial complex—Argueta pointedly denounces North American imperialism in Central America.

Scenes of military butchery and passages plumbing the psychology of paternalism and racism in El Salvador stay in the reader’s mind as the novel moves towards its dramatic dénouement. Ultimately, however, it is Beatriz/Lucía’s female voice of compassion and reconciliation that prevails, as she forgives the murderous blood-relative who has been poisoned against his own kind by the gringos. Published six years before the peace accords of 1992, Cuzcatlán finishes on a message of hope that anticipates Manlio Argueta’s own clarion call in July 1993 for “la necesaria cultura por la paz” (the necessary culture for peace). It is with considerable expectation that readers await his next novel, Milagro de la paz [The Miracle of Peace].

ROY C. BOLAND

See also entry on Roque Dalton

Biography

Born in San Miguel, El Salvador, 24 November 1935. Studied law briefly. Member of group of angry young writers known as Círculo Universitario de Escritores. Director of University of El Salvador’s publishing house until the storming of the university by the military in 1972. Suffered imprisonment and was in exile for over twenty years in Costa Rica, where he taught Central American literature and established the Salvadorean-Costa Rican Cultural Centre. In the mid 1990s resides in San Salvador, where he is director of the University of El Salvador’s bookshop. Recipient of many literary awards, including the Casa de las Américas Prize, 1977, for Caperucita en la zona roja, and the University of Central America Editores Prize in 1980.

Selected Works

Novels

El valle de las hamacas, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1970

Caperucita en la zona roja, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1977

Poetry

Poemas, San Salvador: n.p., 1967

Las bellas armas reales, Costa Rica: EDUCA, 1979

Further Reading

For a writer of Manlio Argueta’s achievement and reputation, there is very little critical commentary or analysis worthy of note on his work. This may be attributed to the fact that he comes from a very small country not generally given prominence in courses on Latin American literature taught in the North. Histories of modern Latin American literature (e.g., Fernando Alegría’s Nueva historia de la novela hispanoamericana, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1986) tend to concentrate on his best known novel, Un día en la vida, and pay lip-service to his poetry and other novels. The

Martínez, J., “Manlio Argueta,” Hispamérica, vol. 15/42 (December 1985)

Interviews

Roberto Arlt 1900–1942

Argentine prose writer, journalist and dramatist

A first-generation Argentine, and native of Buenos Aires, Roberto Arlt was virtually an autodidact, acquiring most of his education in the libraries of religious and political organisations. While he certainly knew well the members of the Boedo group, a loose association of left-wing writers, he belonged to no established social group or party, and in his writing principally sought to articulate the little person’s struggle to survive in the expanding, alienating metropolis of the 1920s and 1930s. He consistently denounced exploitation, particularly under capitalism, and pointed out the ways in which the petit bourgeois, especially, collaborated in their own exploitation. In 1932 he was involved in a bitter dispute with the Communist Party, which he had considered joining, but then rejected as authoritarian.

Best known of Arlt’s prolific and varied journalism are the sketches about Buenos Aires life and issues of the day, which appeared from 1928 in the newspaper, El Mundo. In 1933 Arlt published a selection of these as the Aguafuertes porteñas [Buenos Aires Sketches], and many more have been collected posthumously.

However, it is Arlt’s novels that have generated most critical interest. Arlt’s political independence, his contempt for what passed for good taste, for verisimilitude and generic continuity—as well as some eccentricities of orthography and syntax - have traditionally caused his long fiction to be recognised more for its destruction of the essentially Realist models employed by contemporary Argentine novelists, whether elitist or popular, than for its constructive achievements.

In his first major fiction work, El juguete rabioso [The Rabid Toy], Arlt for the first time engages with problems of identity, and survival in the city, and uses extensively the colloquial language of Buenos Aires (lunfardo). The frustrated progress of his impoverished urban protagonist, Silvio, seems to be a riposte to the journey towards integration of Fabio, the rural protagonist of the patrician Ricardo Güiraldes’s Don Segundo Sombra. (Both novels were published in 1926, and both were completed while Arlt was working with Güiraldes).

The most discussed of Arlt’s long fiction is the double novel Los siete locos (The Seven Madmen), and Los lanzallamas [The Flamethrowers], published respectively in 1929 and 1931. Here, alienation and fragmentation are most intensely expressed, through stark and bizarre inner states, and through the absurd, melodramatic events of the life of the protagonist, Erdosain. The novel opens with Erdosain, a lowly salesman, caught defrauding his employer. From this, two narrative branches develop. In the emotional sphere, Erdosain’s wife, Elsa, leaves him, eventually to be replaced by a teenage girl, purchased from her mother, whom subsequently Erdosain gratuitously murders, before committing suicide. Secondly, Erdosain’s quest for money to repay his employer leads him to a group of bizarre conspirators, led by the Astrologer, who plan to take over the state, and instal a tyranny based on a new religion. Arlt uses the obviously fictional, melodramatic framework and caricatured characters to present numerous observations (but no analysis) about the life of Buenos Aires’s less affluent inhabitants, and about the dreams (riches, Hollywood films, mass ideologies, novels with happy endings) which sustain them. Techniques which prevent the novel being read passively as the image of a coherent reality, encourage the reader to question and assemble meaning. The individuality of the already marginal, caricatured figures is further dismantled through the use of shared turns of phrase, or similar dreams. The clearest example is that of Erdosain, and Elsa’s cousin Barsut, in which the two can be seen as alternative versions of the same character. A second important case is the partial merging of Erdosain and the narrator, which calls into question the assumed relationship between narrator, character and reader. The novel is criss-crossed by a surreal network of identical or slowly—evolving images and phrases, and by repeated events, in which the reader may discover/create thematic patterns of association. There are also experiments with the imaging of the experience of time and space: boundaries between wakefulness and dream, sanity and madness, present, past and future become uncertain, while diverse elements, such as geometrical and other mechanical imagery from the modern city, film scenes, memories, contribute to a mental labyrinth.

El amor brujo [Love the Magician], published in 1932, is very different. Set shortly before the 1930 military coup, in the city centre, the suburb of Tigre, and in the train that links the two, it is a naturalistic account of an affair between a young music student, Irene, and a married engineer, Balder. In it are juxtaposed the individual cynicism of the characters, the mechanical inevitability of their behaviour as members of their social groups, and the dreams and myths in which individuals and society wrap sexuality. Like Erdosain, Balder is an alienated figure (he has a failed marriage and an unsatisfying career) and a dreamer, but unlike Erdosain he is an educated figure who analyses and denounces a clearly identifiable society. As well as using a protagonist who controls the narrative (here the chronicler figure is simply a disguise), Arlt also introduces direct presentation of modern elements like flashing neon signs, whose immediacy collapses the distinction between perception and thought. Although El amor brujo has found little favour with readers and critics, the Uruguayan novelist Juan Carlos Onetti was influenced by Arlt’s work at this period.
Aguafuertes españolas [Spanish Sketches], the fruit of Arlt’s time as correspondent for El Mundo in Spain just before the outbreak of the Civil War, and published in 1936, continues from El amor brujo, and reflects on the novel cycle. The sketches are set in Spain and North Africa, but make surprisingly few allusions to the political situation; rather, they explore the imaginary nature of the Spain seen from Argentina—the Spain to which the characters of El amor brujo nostalgically looked. (There is even a scene in which some Sacro Monte gypsies perform a song from Falla’s ballet of the same name). A striking feature is the grouping of the sketches into a journey structure which shows many similarities of incident - and divergence of conclusions drawn—to the Viajes por Europa, Africa y America [Journeys through Europe, Af and the United States] of the 19th-century Argentine educator and statesman, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento. It is as if Arlt the authorised journalist, reporting the “reality” of Spain, partially emulates his prestigious predecessor, while the novelist undermines his cultural authority.

Arlt’s plays, most of which were written for Leónidas Barletta’s Teatro del Pueblo, and which date from 1932 onwards, generally intensify elements from his fiction: interiors were already described as if they were stage sets, and many characters voluntarily or involuntarily played artificial roles. A third feature from the novels, dramatised dialogues between real and imaginary characters, occurs extensively in the early Trescientos millones [Three Hundred Million], and El fabricante de fantasmas [The Creator of Phantoms]. The most accomplished drama is Saverio el cruel [Saverio the Cruel], a tragic farce about a demented butter salesman whose alter ego is a pantomime colonel. Here Arlt combines elements from contemporary Buenos Aires with implicit and explicit references to Don Quixote, in an ambiguous exploration of individual and social insanity. In later plays Arlt continues to use the exaggerated, the insane and the absurd, although usually ambiguity is replaced by clearer messages, often about militarism or commercial exploitation. A similar tendency towards direct statement is observed in Arlt’s late journalism, and can be attributed, at least in part, to a change in priorities occasioned by World War II.

His finest short stories date from around 1930 and were collected, in 1933, in El jorobadito [The Hunchbacked Dwarf]. They are generally caricatured but plausible accounts of episodes from the city, such as a bridegroom’s flight to Uruguay on the night before the wedding: (“Noche terrible”) [A Terrible Night]; or the comic competitive behaviour of two married couples: (“Pequeños propietarios”) [Small Property-owners]. Later stories are set in more exotic locations, and rely for their effect on artificial elements such as mysterious psychological and natural phenomena, and unexpected endings.

PAUL JORDAN

See also entry on Ricardo Piglia

Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 7 April 1900. His father was Prussian and his mother from the South Tyrol. Arlt’s first language was German. He had little formal education and worked at a variety of menial jobs including docker, factory worker and travelling salesman. Moved to Córdoba in 192.0 returning to Buenos Aires four years later. Married

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction

El juguete rabioso, Buenos Aires: Latina, 1926

Los lanzallamas, Buenos Aires: Claridad, 1931

El amor brujo, Buenos Aires: Victoria, 1932

El jorobadito, Buenos Aires: Anaconda, 1933

El criador de gorilas, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1941

Plays

Trescientos millones, Buenos Aires: Victoria, 1932

El fabricante de fantasmas, Buenos Aires: Futuro, 1950

Saverio el cruel, Buenos Aires: Futuro, 1950

El desierto entra en la ciudad, Buenos Aires: Futuro, 1950

La isla desierta, Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1965

Journalism

Aguafuertes porteñas, Buenos Aires: Victoria, 1933

Aguafuertes españolas, Buenos Aires: Rosso, 1936

Nuevas aguafuertes porteñas, Buenos Aires: Hachette, 1960

Cronicient de si mismo: el idioma de los argentinos, Buenos Aires: Edicom, 1969

Entre erotos y sabihondos, Buenos Aires: Edicom, 1969

Las muchachas de Buenos Aires, Buenos Aires: Edicom, 1969

El traje del fantasma, Buenos Aires: Edicom, 1969

Compilations and Anthologies

Novelas completas y cuentos, edited by Mirta Arlt, 3 vols, Buenos Aires: Fabril, 1963

1. El juguete rabioso, Los siete locos, Los lanzallamas and Las ciencias ocultas en Buenos Aires

2. El amor brujo, El jorobadito, Dos relatos, Aguafuertes porteñas

Further Reading

Amícola, José, Astrología y fascismo en la obra de Arlt, Buenos Aires: Weimar, 1984
Arlt, Mirta, Prólogo a la obra de mi padre, Buenos Aires: Torres Agüero, 1985

Larra, Raúl, Roberto Arlt; el torturado, Buenos Aires: Alpe, 1951

Pastor, Beatriz, Roberto Arlt y la rebelión alienada, Gaithersburg, Maryland: Hispamérica, 1980

Viñas, David, De Sarmiento a Cortázar: literatura argentina y realidad política, Buenos Aires: Siglo XX, 1971 [Includes material on Arlt]

El juguete rabioso

(novel) and

Aguafuertes porteñas

(sketches)

By Roberto Arlt

Roberto Arlt published his first novel, El juguete rabioso, in 1926 while he was working as a journalist, and the selection of articles titled Aguafuertes porteñas are inspired by his work. Most of them were published in the newspaper El Mundo in Buenos Aires around 1930 and a selection first appeared in book form in 1933. The treatment of time in these two works by Roberto Arlt is not only chronological but also thematic. Aguafuertes porteñas consists of around 100 articles giving views on daily life in Buenos Aires and, on more than one occasion, commenting on the work of the writer and the journalist. A wide variety of issues are dealt with: customs, social types, events in the city, political opinions, etc. Aguafuertes porteñas constitutes without doubt a snapshot of Buenos Aires in 1930. However, the value of these texts lies not only in the sensitivity and intuition with which Arlt successfully captures the spirit of the era but also in the style in which they were written.

Lunfardo was the term applied at that time to the sociolect which the working class and marginalized sectors of Buenos Aires spoke: the language of the street. And it is in just this slang—with a few concessions to more classical and less colloquial words—that Arlt wrote Aguafuertes. In this sense, Aguafuertes porteñas constitutes a landmark in Argentine literature because these sketches were daily speech turned into writing, that is a colloquial or “street” form of the language brought into a medium with a massive readership: the newspaper. And from then on the language was legitimized as a means of daily communication. Arlt gave this colloquial language of Buenos Aires, seen by many as the language of the underclass, rights of citizenship. Through its format (each article was about 800 words long) as well as its content and style (Buenos Aires life told in an understandable and purified lunfardo) Aguafuertes has become a model in the history of Argentine journalism.

El juguete rabioso, Arlt’s first and also his most intuitive novel, tells the story of Silvio Astier, a hot-headed and conceited young man of humble origins who has to face up to earning his living at a young age. He is pushed on above all by his mother who represents both the moral aspect of the story and the reality of it. Her reality is one of poverty and a social situation difficult to alter by means of work.

Initiation—a theme taken from the picaresque genre that Arlt was to use with frequency in his work—comes about when Silvio starts to work in various different jobs where he is badly treated and underpaid and thus becomes increasingly resentful. Arlt, through the figure of Silvio Astier, achieves two simultaneous narrative goals. On the one hand he describes the life of a social sector of Buenos Aires: humble people and petty proprietors, their taste and behaviour. On the other hand, he narrates the psychological and material struggles of the characters in their social context.

Throughout the novel these two aspects lead to a common theme: the fatality of poverty is accompanied by the fatality of all the feelings and desires of the characters. The condition of this fatality—as Oscar Masotta has correctly observed—is resolved through the theme of betrayal. Through various actions—leaving the school of aviation, to pick one example among many—Silvio Astier betrays his sister and mother since, to continue with the example, they had both pinned all their material hopes and social aspirations on Silvio’s possible future as an aeroplane mechanic. Through the denunciation of Rengo, Silvio Astier betrays his best friend and himself. And it is this last betrayal that defines the whole novel.

Silvio Astier’s self-betrayal comes about principally in two ways. Firstly, in order to denounce Rengo (the Limping Man) who belongs to the same social class as he and is poor and unhappy, Silvio has to collude with a character of a wealthy class, different from his own. This character, the owner of the house they had both planned to rob, seems to confirm their class difference by never ceasing to treat Silvio as a young product of the misery and poverty of Buenos Aires. This social distance—essential to understand the vileness of Astier’s action—can be observed in the story not only when the architect Arsenio Vitri offers Silvio money for having denounced his friend (deep down Vitri himself disapproves of this betrayal) but also when he offers to find Silvio a “good job” through his own social contacts. This is, to give it a label, the “social betrayal” of Silvio Astier.

Silvio Astier’s self-betrayal has another side. It is this that Oscar Masotta has dealt with: he focuses on the apathy and sterility into which Astier’s existence is plunged towards the end of the novel as a consequence of his unfortunate social initiation. It is through the betrayal, and the stigma that the betrayal of his best friend constitutes (denouncing him to Vitri) that Silvio Astier finds his “salvation.” The inevitable derision that follows the betrayal is the only way Silvio Astier can take a step forward to overcome the apathy into which he has sunk. And it is when his attempted suicide fails that the psycho-logical route of this betrayal—as the only means of escape—gathers significance.

Finally, the very title of the novel, El juguete rabioso, brilliantly defines the two sides of Silvio Astier. On the one hand he is a young man who, owing to his poverty and with terrible consequences, has to face up to “earning his living” at a very young age. This is how his own mother refers to the act of going out to work and bringing home money. On the other hand he is a young man who, after a failed attempt at suicide, chooses betrayal and derision as a means of social survival. In a way, Silvio Astier is a child who hangs on to his childhood toys—the fatality of the time and social circumstance chance assigned to him—but turns them into dangerous sentimental machines.

The thematic similarity of these two works that was mentioned at the beginning of this article lies in their defining of Arlt’s favourite motif and an ongoing controversy of his time: the language of the Argentines. In this sense and in the words of Arlt, Aguafuertes porteñas expresses the language of the Argentines described in its social and collective context, while El juguete rabioso expresses an intimate psychological language of the people of Buenos Aires. It is as if Arlt in these two works (and later in Los siete locos which reached a wider readership) has handed us one work which is at the same time specific, personal and social, and which speaks of an era, a time and a place which we can call “Buenos Aires, around 1930.”

CLAUDIO CANAPARO
translated by Jo Glen

Editions

Further Reading

---

Juan José Arreola 1918–

Mexican prose writer

In the late 1940s, seemingly from nowhere, the work of Juan José Arreola burst onto the Mexican literary scene. The stories collected in Varia invención, 1949 [Varied Inventions], innovative, entertaining, displaying a considerable narrative skill, mark an important moment in the development of Mexican fiction. An instant hit with a Mexican readership accustomed mainly to European texts, these stories enjoyed a brief period of fame and have certainly had a great influence. Their success, however, was soon overshadowed by that of Arreola’s more sombre and laconic contemporary, Juan Rulfo.

Arreola’s literary output is confined to a few collections of short pieces and a novel, and his list of publications tailed off in the 1960s and 1970s. Increasingly obsessed with the musicality and rhythm of the spoken word, most of his later work has consisted of public speaking and television appearances. In a sense most of the literary work of his maturity can be said to be his spoken output. His prodigious memory, engaging wit and tendency towards frank, personal confession have made him a highly popular performer, but also a self-avowed figure of fun. Perhaps for this reason, his work, always honourably mentioned in surveys of Mexican literature, has not received the critical attention and acclaim it deserves.

Arreola’s written output is something of an oddity. For one thing, among Mexican writers he stands out as one of the very few who place a high premium on humour. His prose style—precious, lapidary, rhythmical—is characterised by a subtle and assured mastery of the minutiae of irony. It is suffused with contradictions: ostentatiously erudite, and yet demonstrating an autodidact’s anxiety of literary influence; pyrotechnic in its verbal sophistication, and yet betraying a predilection for the unpretentiousness of rural simplicity; selfconsciously striving for the so—called universality of the European literary canon, and yet resolutely Mexican in its themes, its images and its most immediate preoccupations.

Arreola’s reputation, rightly, rests on his short prose pieces, particularly the texts contained in Confabulario, 1952 (Confabulario and Other Inventions), later updated in various editions with selections of the best of other volumes too. Profoundly influenced by European writers such as Claudel, Schwob and Papini, Arreola’s interests are strictly humanist in these texts. As one of the last surviving heirs of the tradition of Mexican scholars and writers which includes the Ateneo de la Juventud (especially Reyes and Torri) and, more specifically, the Contemporáneos of the 1930s, Arreola maintains a principled adherence to the aesthetics of language, shunning direct political references or nationalist bandwagons. The result is a literary output which often seems at odds with the technocratic realities of late 20th-century Mexico. Some of the stories: “En verdad os digo,” “Anuncio,” “Baby HP” (I’m Telling You Truth, Announcement and Baby HP) indeed take on the technological innovation of the contemporary world with wry sarcasm, mocking both the project of modernity and the glibness and corruption of its linguistic abuses. Others, such as “El discípulo” (The Disciple), offer profound philosophical insights into the nature of aesthetics.

Many of Arreola’s most famous stories have a timeless and inscrutable quality, recalling the angst-ridden emptiness of the work of Franz Kafka, Arreola’s greatest literary hero. Narratives such as “El guardagujas” (The Switchman) and “El prodigioso miligramo” (The Prodigious Milligram) are complex, ambitious fables, which reward careful reading with their rich ironies and barely perceptible inconsistencies. Critics who have attempted to unravel them have often struggled to ascribe definitive meanings to these texts. But the texts seem destined to elude them, their slipperiness belied by the apparent lucidity of their prose and the deceptively child-like simplicity of their narrative strategies.

This interest in the vast intricacies made possible by the written word has led to Arreola’s being dubbed the Mexican Borges, a comparison which is as misleading as it is understandable. The affinity for writing in Arreola may be reminiscent of the impossible labyrinthine libraries of Borges, but in the mocking tones at which the Mexican excels, the arid precision of scholarship is savagely debunked in stories such as “De balística” (About Ballistics).

Above all, however, Arreola’s texts are far more involved with the weaknesses and vagaries of the human spirit than those of his more rigorous, more intellectual Argentine counterpart. In particular this is manifested in a discussion of the relationship between the sexes that runs through his work, drawing on the vitriolic misogyny of Otto Weininger on the one hand and studies on matriarchal culture by J.J.Bachofen on the other. Hovering between these two erudite poles, many of his texts are clever satires on the nature and frailty of human sexuality, denouncing both femininity and machismo in outstanding examples of biting observation. Often accused of sexism, these stories deserve to be read again in the light of contemporary criticism’s more sophisticated attitude towards the deconstructive qualities of irony.

Arreola’s two later collections of texts, Bestiario, 1958 [Bestiary] and Palindroma, 1964 [Palindrome], confirmed his profound interest in the possibilities and the incongruities of language. The texts in Bestiario are short, considered pieces which play with and confound traditional notions of metaphor, developing a dense, enigmatic linguistic texture suspended between the spirituality of poetic discourse and the sharp profanities of satirical prose. In Palindroma, there is a mixture of texts: an absurdist play, a couple of problematic narratives reminiscent of his earlier style and some short pieces which deal with the relationship between words and meaning.

Even more important than the themes developed by Arreola is the contribution he has made to Mexican prose style. Writing for him is akin to the artisan’s labour of meticulous creation, and his generosity in passing on his experience and skill to younger writers is almost legendary. Two related ingredients make up Arreola’s distinctive voice: the first is an almost religious reverence for the rhythm of spoken language. Arreola trained as an actor and wrote two plays, each of which is redolent with subtle, almost musical, ironies in the details of its prose. Much of the humour generated by Arreola’s stories lies in the disparity between the pompous construction of the rhetoric and the bathos provided by the sense—often rude, hypocritical or simply foolish—of what his characters and narrators have to say. The second ingredient is his belief in the power of the written word to manifest something beyond the contingencies of everyday experience. Although Arreola has published no verse, some of his prose has been anthologised in collections of poetry. He is the author of astonishing short pieces, reminiscent of Baudelaire’s prose poems.

Arreola’s only novel, La feria, 1963 (The Fair), has not been taken up as a key text in the Latin American novelistic Boom. This is regrettable, as it is certainly worthy of more consideration and attention. Its subject is Arreola’s rural home in Jalisco, and it develops its narrative through a fragmentary series of documents, diaries and dialogues spanning several generations. The wit of his shorter pieces is there in abundance, as is a fond but devastating critique of Mexican rural attitudes; the novel’s main innovation lies in its contrapuntal technique.

Since Arreola stopped writing, two collections of epigrammatic quotations from his spoken output have appeared: La palabra educación, 1973 [The Word Education] and Inventario, 1976 [Inventory]. At worst, these pieces are bland and sententious, but at best they combine the enigmatic wit of his finest written work with the freshness and intimacy of conversation.

Arreola will be remembered both as a brilliant prose stylist and as a champion of young writers.

MAURICE BIRIOTTI

Biography

Born in Ciudad Guzmán, Jalisco, Mexico, 12 September 1918. Studied drama at the Instituto de Bellas Artes in Mexico City, 1939 and on a French government scholarship, in Paris: returned to Mexico City because of poor health. Teacher in Ciudad Guzmán, from 1941. Worked on a newspaper in Guadalajara, 1943–45; coeditor, with Juan Rulfo, Pan and Eos magazines, 1940s; proofreader and translator, Fondo de Cultura Económica publishing house, Mexico City, 1946; director of creative writing workshop, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM), Mexico City, 1958, host of television program; founding member and actor, Poesíaen Voz Alta group. Awarded the Institute of Fine Arts Drama Festival Prize, and El Colegio de Mexico Fellowship, late 1940s; Xavier Villaurrutia Prize, 1963.

Selected Works

Short Fiction
Varia invención, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1949; augmented edition, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1971
Cinco cuentos, Mexico City: Los Presentes, 1951
Punta de plata, Mexico City: n.p., 1958; published with Confabulario and Bestiario, as Confabulario total, 1941–61, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1962.
Cuentos, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1969
Antología de Juan José Arreola, edited by Jorge Arturo Ojeda, Mexico City: Oasis, 1969
Palindroma (includes play), Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1971
Mujeres, animales, y fantasías mecánicas, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1972
Confabulario antológico, Madrid: Círculo de Lectores, 1973
Mi confabulario, Mexico City: Promexa, 1979
Confabulario personal, Barcelona: Bruguera, 1980
Imagen y obra escogida, Mexico City: UNAM, 1984
Estas páginas mías, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1985

Novel
La feria, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1963; as The Fair, translated by John Upton, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1977

Play
La hora de todos: juguete cómico en un acto, Mexico City: Los Presentes, 1954

Other Writings
La palabra educación, edited by Jorge Arturo Ojeola, Mexico City: Secretaria de Educación Pública, 1973
Y ahora, la mujer, edited by Jorge Arturo Ojeola, Mexico City: Utopía, 1975
Inventario, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1976
Ramón López Velarde: una lectura parcial, Mexico City: Cultural Bancen, 1988
El arte de Nicolás Moreno, in collaboration with Carlos Pellicer and Elisa García Barragán, Mexico City: Banco Nacional de Obras y Servicios Públicos, 1990
Further Reading

Burt, John R., “This Is No Way to Run a Railroad: Arreola’s Allegorical Railroad and a Possible Source,” Hispania, vol. 71 (1988)

Castellanos, Rosario, “Tendencias de la narrativa mexicana contemporánea,” in her El mar y sus pescaditos, Mexico City: Secretaria de Educación Pública, 1975

Herz, Theda Mary, “Continuity in Evolution: Juan José Arreola as Dramatist,” Latin American Theatre Review, vol. 8/2 (1975)

McMurray, George R., “Albert Camus’s Concept of the Absurd and Juan José Arreola’s ‘The Switchman,’” Latin American Literary Review, vol. 6/11 (1977)

Menton, Seymour, “Juan José Arreola and the Twentieth-Century Short Story,” Hispania, vol. 42/3 (1959)

—— Juan José Arreola, Boston: Twayne, 1983

Assis, Joaquim Maria Machado de

See Machado de Assis

Miguel Ángel Asturias 1899–1974

Guatemalan novelist

From first to last, the works of Miguel Ángel Asturias manifest his deep and abiding interest in the beliefs and worldview of the indigenous peoples of Central America. His early Leyendas de Guatemala [Legends of Guatemala] retell traditional myths and folk-tales, and the first drafts of El Señor Presidente (The President) at times adopt points of view and narrative modes akin to those of the pre-Columbian myths with which he was becoming increasingly familiar through his studies. From Hombres de maíz (Men of Maize) through to the end of the Banana Trilogy this style is adapted to express socio-economic and political themes. El alhajadito (The Befeweled Boy) inaugurates the final period, in which the mythopoeic element and fantasy again dominate Asturias’s work, as he strives to fashion new legends and tales in the traditional manner.

Like many others of his generation, Asturias was living in Paris when Surrealism was at its height, artistically and politically, and its impact was strong, though its concerns with the unconscious led towards Jung’s work on myth rather than Freudian analysis of human personality. Few of Asturias’s characters have much psychological depth; their inner conflicts tend to be externalised and played out at the archetypal level, in reenactments of mythical events. At the same time, an animistic treatment of the environment creates a powerful interplay between people and the natural world. Insofar as Jung and Asturias, from their different perspectives, develop similar interpretations of myth, Asturias may be said to be Jungian, though the expression of myth in his fiction is distinctly local. In his vision of a magical world in which humans have their animal counterpart (nahual) and in which a supernatural dimension is part and parcel of everyday life, the animals and plants are distinctly Central American and the people are engaged in activities typical of the region.

Asturias’s early work is generally held to introduce magical realism (realismo mágico) as a literary mode. While most of the tales in Leyendas de Guatemala are conventional in form, in “Cuculcán” Asturias presents the myth as a sequence of stylised balletic/dramatic scenes, written in lyrical prose, in which birds and animals mingle with archetypal human figures. Gaspar Ilóm’s vision of his world opens Hombres de maíz, as landscape and natural phenomena are described in terms of their mythical correlates; his defence of tradition, his betrayal and his death themselves pass into legend and are seen to determine and explain the fate of his enemies, as the corn-people attempt to defend their land and way of life against newcomers who seek to grow maize for profit by methods which destroy the land. The second half of the novel introduces new characters, from a later generation, coming into contact with these figures from the past as they in turn achieve legendary status; the maintenance of ancestral traditions is revealed as vital for the survival of Guatemalan culture. Though less immediately evident in El Señor Presidente, animistic elements surface occasionally in the characters’ streams of consciousness. Thus the dance of Tohil, a Mayan god who demanded human sacrifice, glimpsed as Cara de Ángel is sent on the mission which ends in his death, is a powerful sign of the President’s evil nature and purposes. In Mulata de tal (Mulatta), the major novel of the final period, an equivalent of the Faust legend provides the framework for the story of a battle for control of Yumí between his wife Catalina and Mulata, a moon-spirit. Yumí and Catalina become adepts in sorcery and for a time come into conflict with a Church which has itself absorbed traditional, non-Christian elements.

The revolutionary aspect of Surrealism also finds a place in Asturias’s fiction, most specifically in the final novel of the Banana Trilogy, Los ojos de los enterrados (The Eyes of the Interred), which ends with the collapse of the regime after a general strike. The exploitation of small Central American nations by US interests controlling plantation economies dominates the first two novels of the trilogy. Viento fuerte (Strong Wind) relates the setting up of the Pacific coast plantations and the installation of necessary infrastructure, leading to struggles between local growers and the foreign enterprise (a fictional representation of the United Fruit Company). The creation of a growers’ cooperative under the direction of Lester Mead merely provokes Chicago to exert greater pressure. El papa verde (The Green Pope) tells how Geo Maker Thompson built up the company’s operations on the Atlantic side, ruthlessly seizing land and burning villages. Many years later, when the members of the cooperative inherit Lester Mead’s fortune, they transfer their allegiance to the company, won over by their new wealth; in return, Maker Thompson uses them and their holding to win control of the company through its Guatemalan operation. The intervention of the United States against the Arbenz government in 1954 provided the setting for Asturias’s next work of fiction, Week-end en Guatemala, a collection of short stories on aspects of the operation: bungling on the ground, propaganda designed to win support in the United States, anti-communist witch-hunts, a sense of betrayal among some Americanised Guatemalans. Writing this work held up completion of Los ojos de los enterrados, by far the longest of Asturias’s novels, set principally in the years immediately before Arbenz assumed power. The central action concerns the efforts of Octavio Sansur to build support among plantation workers for a general strike planned by industrial and transport workers. The younger generation of the original cooperative members is now thoroughly americanised, but Juambo, Geo Maker Thompson’s former driver, is torn between loyalty to his master and respect for his father’s bones, i.e. between the material benefits of a foreign culture and the spiritual power of native tradition. In another subplot Sansur’s relationship with the schoolmistress Milena Tabay connects the workers’ movements to intellectual dissent: Milena was active in developing education for workers, and schoolteachers eventually join the strike. In the end, both peasant/worker cooperatives and labour unionism are faced with formidable obstacles, erected by external forces, in the struggle to achieve a just society. Taken as a whole, these works present powerful criticism of the degree and manner of US control of the Guatemalan economy and of US political intervention in Guatemalan affairs.

The novel on which Asturias’s reputation was founded was completed in 1933, though not published until 1946. The society of El Señor Presidente is one where evil has triumphed and corruption has spread downwards from its ruler, a creature lacking self-control and activated by cruelty, spite and malice. Justice is a mockery, with a corrupt judiciary and venial police using torture as normal practice; every member of society is prepared to inform against his or her neighbours. Army officers spend their time plotting or in brothels. Love is a tool of destruction, and the word “madre” (mother) can provoke a man to murder. At the other end of Asturias’s career, Viernes de Dolores [Good Friday] shows how popular customs and a student prank, when enlisted in the cause of political protest, however justified, come into conflict with family loyalties and damages relationships. Worse still, corruption in the police and the bureaucracy convert an accident and a few careless words into sufficient cause for the arrest, torture and execution of the innocent, repeating, nearly forty years later, many elements of El Señor Presidente.

Asturias’s unsubtle presentation of political corruption and foreign economic exploitation is lifted out of the rut by his use of myth. A deeper appreciation of all of his fiction, especially Hombres de maíz and Mulata de tal, can be achieved through a knowledge of the themes and modes of thought of Central American mythology, dominant in Asturias’s mind from his earliest writings, and most of the advances in recent criticism have followed that path.

RON KEIGHTLEY

Biography

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction

Week-end en Guatemala, Buenos Aires: Goyanarte, 1956 [short fiction]

El espejo de Lida Sal, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1967
Maladrón: epopeya de los Andes verdes, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1969
Novelas y cuentos de juventud, edited by Claude Couffon, Paris: Centre de Recherches de L’Institut d’Études Hispaniques, 1971
Viernes de Dolores, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1972

Poetry
Rayito de estrella, Paris: n.p., 1925
Emulo lipolidón, Guatemala City: Tipografía America, 1935
Sonetos, Guatemala City: Tipografía América, 1937
Alclasán: fantomina, Guatemala City: Tipografía America, 1939
Anoche, 10 de marzo de 1543, Guatemala City: Talleres Tipográficos de Cordón, 1943
Ejercicios poéticos en forma de soneto sobre temas de Horacio, Buenos Aires: Botella al Mar, 1951
Alto es el sur, La Plata: Talleres Gráficos Moreno, 1952
Bolívar, San Salvador: Ministerio de Cultura, 1955
Nombre custodio, e Imagen pasajera, Havana: Úcar, 1959
Clartivigilia primaveral, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1965
Sonetos de Italia, Milan: Instituto Editoriale Cisalpino, 1965
Tres de cuatro soles, edited by Dorita Nouhaud, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1977 [prose poem]

Plays
La audiencia de los confines: crónica en tres andanzas, Buenos Aires: Ariadna, 1957
Teatro: Chantaje; Dique seco; Soluna; La audiencia de los confines, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1964
Juárez, Mexico City: Comisión Nacional para la conmemoración del centenario del Fallecimiento de don Benito Juárez, 1972

Other Writings
La arquitectura de la vida nueva, Guatemala City: Goubaud, 1928 [essays and lectures]
Carta aérea a mis amigos de America, Buenos Aires: Francisco A. Colombo, 1952
Rumanía, su nueva imagen, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1964
Juan Girador, Paris: Centre de Recherches de l’Institut d’Études Hispaniques, 1964
Torotumbo; La audiencia de los confines; Mensajes indios, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1967
Latinoamérica y otros ensayos, Madrid: Guadiana de Publicaciones, 1968
Comiendo en Hungria, with Pablo Neruda, Barcelona: Lumen, 1969; as Sentimental Journey around the Hungarian Cuisine, translated by Barna Balogh, 1969 [verse and illustrations]
El novelista en la universidad, Santander: Universidad Internacional Menéndez Pelayo, 1971
Amerika, fábula de fábulas y otros ensayos, Caracas: Monte Ávila, 1972
Mi mejor obra, Mexico City: Novaro, 1973; as Lo mejor de mi obra, Barcelona: Novaro, 1974
Sinceridades, edited by Epaminondas Quintana, Guatemala City: Académica Centroamericana, 1980 [essays]
Actos de fe en Guatemala, photographs by Sara Facio and María Cristina Orive, Buenos Aires: La Azotea, 1980
El hombre que lo tenía todo, todo, todo, illustrated by Jacqueline Duheme, Barcelona: Bruguera, 1981
Compilations and Anthologies

Obras escogidas, 3 vols, Madrid: Aguilar, 1955

Obras escogidas, 2 vols, Madrid: Aguilar, 1964

Obras completas, introduction by José María Souviron, 3 vols, Madrid: Aguilar, 1968

Antología, edited by Pablo Palomina, Mexico City: Costa-Amic, 1968

Tres obras, edited by Giuseppe Bellini, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1977 [Contains Leyendas de Guatemala; El Alhajadito; El Señor Presidente]

Edición crítica de las obras completas, 24 vols, Madrid: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1977

Cartas de amor, with Blanca de Mora y Araujo, edited by Felipe Mellizo, Madrid: Cultura Hispánica, 1989

Further Reading

Andrea, Pedro F. de, Miguel Ángel Asturias. Anticipo bibliográfico, Mexico City: Libros de Mexico, 1969

Bellini, Giuseppe, De tiranos, heroes y brujos: estudios sobre la obra de Miguel Ángel Asturias, Rome: Bulzoni, 1982

Callan, Richard J., Miguel Ángel Asturias, New York: Twayne, 1970

Cardoza y Aragón, Luis, Miguel Ángel Asturias: casi novela, Mexico City: Era, 1991

Castelpoggi, Attilio Jorge, Miguel Ángel Asturias, Buenos Aires: La Mandrágora, 1961

Giacoman, Helmy F. (editor), Homenaje a Miguel Ángel Asturias: variaciones interpretativas en torno a su obra, New York: Las Américas, 1971

Hill, Eladia León, Miguel Ángel Asturias. Lo ancestral en su obra literaria, New York: Eliseo Torres, 1972

Leal, Luis, Myth and Social Realism in Miguel Ángel Asturias, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1968

Olivero, Juan, El Miguel Ángel Asturias que yo conoci: relato anecdótico, Guatemala City: Cultural Centroamericana, 1980

Pilón, Marta, Miguel Ángel Asturias: semblanza pararel estudio de su vida y obra, Guatemala City: Cultural Centroamericana, 1968

Prieto, René, Miguel Ángel Asturias’s Archaeology of Return, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1990

Rodríguez, Teresita, La problemática de la identidad en “El Señor Presidente” de Miguel Ángel Asturias, Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1989

Royano Gutiérrez, Lourdes, Las novelas de Miguel Ángel Asturias desde la teoría de la recepción, Valladolid: Universidad de Valladolid, 1993

Sáenz, Jimena, Genio y figura de Miguel Ángel Asturias, Buenos Aires: Editorial Universitaria, 1974

Terry, Edward D. (editor), Artists and Writers in the Evolution of Latin America, University of Alabama, 1969

Verdugo, Iber, El carácter de la literatura hispanoamericana y la novelística de Miguel Ángel Asturias, Guatemala City: Editorial Universitaria, 1968

Bibliographies

El Señor Presidente

Novel by Miguel Ángel Asturias

El Señor Presidente (The President) published in 1946—though written between 1922 and 1933—is a landmark text since it is both Latin America’s most notable dictator novel and the first to exploit the literary potentialities of Surrealism. These factors are not unconnected since the force of the narrative derives largely from Asturias’s innovative use of dream imagery, his emphasis on the irrational, his frequent appeal to the senses (particularly the auditory) and his often incantatory style. The bounds of normality quickly recede as the reader is plunged into the physical and psychological horrors of human life under dictatorship.

Although the figure of the dictator stands behind the gruesome episodes of torture and assassination, the novel’s chief concern is not with one individual but rather with the reality of his barbarous rule. It is set in the unnamed capital of an unnamed state and begins with the description of a group of beggars preparing to settle down for the night on the Cathedral steps. One of them, the half-crazed and mother-fixated Pelele is provoked by the President’s henchman, Colonel Parrales Sonriente, whom the idiot kills. The dictator uses this incident to eliminate two unreliable supporters and suspected enemies, General Canales and the lawyer, Carvajal, who are accused of the killing: in Latin America both the “honourable soldier,” sometimes, and the intellectual, more commonly, have long been associated with resistance to tyranny. The beggars are tortured into acting as false witnesses against them; the one who insists on telling the truth, El Mosco, is put to death as Carvajal following a stage-managed trial. The fate of the General, however, relates to the main plot and so his elimination is delayed: the President’s favourite, Miguel Cara de Ángel, is ordered to fake an escape for him so that he can be shot under the “ley de fuga” (that is, supposedly when attempting to escape); but the General contrives a genuine escape while Cara de Ángel concentrates on abducting his daughter, Camila. He subsequently falls in love with her and his marriage—to the daughter of the President’s enemy—inevitably marks his fall from grace. General Canales dies of heart failure on reading a false newspaper report that the President had attended his daughter’s wedding and given the bride away. The President’s will is served with more systematic brutality in the case of Cara de Ángel: told he is being assigned to a government position in Washington, he is in fact arrested following a train journey to the coast. Tortured and imprisoned, the cause of his eventual demise recalls the circumstances of Canales’s: a false report that Camila had become the President’s mistress.

This is a historical novel inspired by a specific set of political circumstances: Estrada Cabrera’s dictatorship in Guatemala (1898–1920) which impinged directly on Asturias’s family. Estrada Cabrera’s torture of a political adversary, Manuel Paz, included deceiving the latter into believing that his innocent wife had been unfaithful to him—an episode clearly reworked in El Señor Presidente.
Despite these clear links with the Guatemalan context, however, the novel’s import extends to the entire Hispanic world and beyond to suggest the essential mechanics of a police state wherever it be found. Chapter 23 consists of spies’ reports addressed to the President while the image of invisible threads linking each leaf of the trees in his monstrous forest (chapter 6) suggests the frightening capabilities of modern surveillance techniques.

Asturias seems on occasion to revel in the explicitly negative and debased: human degeneracy, for example, ranges from the enmity which characterizes relations among the beggars—described as “animales con moquillo” (diseased animals)—who would favour dogs above their fellow sufferers (chapter I) to the children who delight in the sufferings of the puppets of don Benjamín’s Punch and Judy show (chapter 10). Ne the reader spared sordid physical details, for example, the disgusting conditions attending Carvajal’s imprisonment (chapter 29) and especially Cara de Ángel’s (chapter 41). Prospects of change appear to be stifled by a pervasive sense of futility. Images of thwarted progress recur: Carvajal’s wife, for example, desperate to intercede with the President on her husband’s behalf, feels that her carriage is going round in circles (chapter 31). Hope is constantly frustrated—the expectant Camila is spurned by her uncle, Juan Canales; premonitions of entrapment extinguish any glimmerings of happiness and freedom (Cara de Ángel and Camila cannot avoid the President’s country—house party despite their awareness of danger, chapter 25). Explicit too is the allusion to economic injustice whereby some people (including the president’s friends) have what they do not need while others go without basic necessities (chapter 3). The regime is said to be dependent on “oro norteamericano” (North American gold) and the President is anxious to retain US support (chapters 33 and 37). That the merciless Judge Advocate is a devout Catholic suggests Church complicity with the regime as does the ominous sound of the church bells, representing an incantation to evil, in the opening lines; on the other hand, the sacristan’s imprisonment for the inadvertent removal of a notice relating to the President’s mother indicates the paranoid excesses of a government which respects no authority other than its own.

In many of these instances the realities of dictatorship are conveyed with documentary plainness. But Asturias’s portrait would not be nearly as powerful had his dependence on realist procedures been total. The President obviously represents political corruption but his presentation as an evil deity who is worshipped in terms that mockingly echo religious ritual (chapter 14) elevates him to a mythical plane. This status is confirmed through his implicit association with Tohil, the Maya deity of fire and water, seen in a vision by Cara de Ángel. Tohil’s favours were obtained only in exchange for human sacrifice. Here Asturias returns us to the pre-Hispanic tradition of a people for whom the spilling of blood was regarded as the spring which renewed life. The President is an inverted image of both the Christian and Mayan deities since he is the source only of death. Though his mythical aura may appear to remove him from concrete reality, it is well to remember that his real life model, Estrada Cabrera, himself achieved mythical status.

The novel is marked by its abrupt changes of style and viewpoint which recall the techniques of cinema. At the end of chapter 7, Vásquez’s boisterous laughter becomes an ominous silence prior to his killing of Pelele; sudden changes of perspective disorientate the reader as the narrative shifts from Pelele’s point of view to that of Vásquez’s accomplice, Rodas, finally jumping to the Archbishop’s view of the episode which closes the chapter. The tempo accelerates at the beginning of chapter 8 with the focus on the killers’ dash through the narrow streets switching to the streets themselves which—personified now—rush hither and thither in a frantic search for details of the horrific event. Then the mood and rhythm lighten with the shift to the puppeteer, Don Benjamín, and his wife who introduce a note of comedy. But the overwhelming impression left by the novel—that of pervasive evil transcending normal boundaries—is reinforced by the surreal dream sequences in which logic is overshadowed by unreason. Pelele’s nightmare (chapter 3), which springs from his physical and mental suffering, is described in terms of grotesque configuration and uncontrollable movement:

Las uñas aceradas de la fiebre le aserraban la frente. Disociación de ideas. Elasticidad del mundo en los espejos. Desproporción fantástica. Huracán delirante. Fuga vertiginosa, horizontal, vertical, oblicua, recién nacida y muerta en espiral…

[The steel finger-nails of fever were clawing at his forehead. Disassociation of ideas. A fluctuating world seen in a mirror. Fantastic disproportion. Hurricane of delirium. Vertiginous flight, horizontal, vertical, oblique, newly-born and dead in a spiral…]

Chapter 38 describes Cara de Ángel’s journey to the coast: the insistent and accelerating rhythm of the prose suggests both the train’s movement and Cara de Ángel’s state of mind. The succession of images is also notable for its cinematic immediacy and flow:

Uno tras otro, uno tras otro, uno tras otro…La casa perseguiía al árbol, el árbol a la cerca, la cerca al puente, el puente al camino, el camino al río…

[One behind the other, one behind the other, one behind the other. The house chased the tree, the tree chased the fence, the fence the bridge, the bridge the road, the road the river…]

The rhythm assumes a more noticeably ominous quality when Cara de Ángel himself returns to focus and lapses into a somniferous though restless state of mind in which he experiences:

la sensación confusa de ir en el tren, de no ir en el tren, de irse quedando atrás del tren, cada vez más atrás del tren, más atrás del tren, más atrás del tren, más atrás del tren, cada vez más atrás, cada vez más atrás, más y más cada vez, cada vez cada vez, cada ver cada vez, cada ver cada vez, cada ver cada vez, cada ver cada vez, cada ver cada vez, cada ver cada vez, cada ver cada vez, cada ver cada vez, cada ver cada vez…

[a confused feeling of being in the train, of not being in the train, of lagging behind the train, further behind the train, further behind, still further behind, still further behind, further, further, further, further…]
The sinister import of the word play in the original (cadáver = body) is unmistakable. Stylistic techniques such as onomatopeia, simile and repetition, together with a discontinuous structure give the text its Surrealistic and nightmarish atmosphere.

The discussion thus far may suggest that the gloom of the novel is unbroken. But there are several moments of relief, one being the narrative of Camila’s childhood and, in particular, the inspirational effect of her first visit to the seaside. The cinematic flux of her experience in chapter 12—“La inmensidad en movimiento. Ella en movimiento. Todo lo que en ella estaba inmóvil, en movimiento…” (Immensity in motion. Herself in motion. Everything in her that was by nature still was in motion)—suggests the fluid quality of the novel whose everchanging form itself suggests the transience of an apparently static dictatorship.

Relief from general gloom is also provided by frequent touches of humour: thus on the Day of National Celebrations, just after the President has left the balcony to the acclaim of the adoring crowd, panic spreads when what appears to be a series of explosions is heard and the President disappears. The noise turns out to have been produced by a military drummer (and drum) falling down a flight of steps. This episode belongs to the slapstick humour of the silent movie era and serves to indicate a tangible though less obvious aspect of this barbarous dictatorship, namely its comic and ridiculous side.

The novel by no means excludes the positive elements of human existence which are shown to survive even under conditions of dictatorship. Asturias maintains a play of sombra (darkness) and luz (light) with human generosity and goodness never being totally extinguished by evil. Thus the woodcutter takes pity on Pelele when he flees from the police (chapter 4) and when he is finally gunned down by police on the Cathedral steps, the Archbishop who has observed the scene gives him absolution (chapter 7). Neither is the future entirely bleak: following the disappearance of her husband (Cara de Ángel), Camila has her baby to console her and, on a broader level, the vision of the puppeteer, Don Benjamin, of the city in may be seen positively since Estrada Cabrera’s regime was undermined as the result of a disastrous earthquake which demolished Guatemala City on Christmas Day, 1917; a brief reference to a newspaper article on the battle between the French and German armies at Verdun (chapter 32) suggests that the action of the novel takes place in 1916 or thereabouts. The implication seems to be that the President’s days are numbered. The novel closes to the sound of bells, which recalls the opening; but now they strike a more cheerful note and the initial incantation to evil seems far removed from the peaceful evening prayer recited by the mother of the newly released student.

Despite its lighter and more positive moments, however, El Señor Presidente is open to charges of over-explicitness, of wearisome emphasis on human depravity which, of course, diminish rather than enhance the novel’s impact: understatement, a technique used to great effect by other writers—such as García Márquez in El coronel no tiene quien le escriba (No One Writes to the Colonel)—would undoubtedly have given Asturias’s message greater force.

The novel has also been seen as ideologically suspect: while it can be read in general as a critique of Positivism—whose Latin American adherents frequently subordinated political freedom to the pursuit of material wealth—Asturias seems at times to subscribe to Positivist class and racial prejudices. The masses are depicted in the main as hopelessly passive, mere puppets manipulated at will by the President; the treatment of the Indian can also appear dubious—following his visit to Cara de Ángel’s house (chapter 10), General Canales’s military bearing “se licuó en carrerita de indio que va al mercado a vender una gallina” (degenerated into the scuttling run of an Indian going to market to sell a hen). It is not perhaps insignificant that opponents of the regime—Cara de Ángel, General Canales, the lawyer Carvajal and the student—are drawn from the upper classes. A more serious literary objection is that Cara de Ángel’s “redemption” and the sentimental aspect of his relationship with Camila detract from the force of the novel’ opening episodes (particularly Pelele’s flight) and compounds a subsequent note of anti-climax. It is important to remember however that Cara de Ángel, though a reformed character, is motivated by a basically selfish love for Camila and settles for personal salvation (as it seemed) rather than engage in more meaningful collective opposition.

The plainly documentary aspects of this novel are obvious and their rawness occasionally appears obtrusive. But El Señor Presidente is redeemed as a literary text by the universality of its appeal, its highly original style and telling deployment of Surrealist techniques which both challenge passive “consumption” by the reader and also sweep him along in their compulsive ebb and flow. It is such qualities which confirm Asturias’s status as the major precursor of the new Latin American novel of the 1950s and 1960s.

LLOYD HUGHES DAVIES

Editions

Translation: The President, by Frances Partridge, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1972

Further Reading

Giacoman, Helmy F. (editor), Homenaje a Miguel Ángel Asturias: variaciones interpretativas en torno a su obra, New York: Las Américas, 1971 [See in particular the articles by Carlos Navarro]
Harss, Luis, Los nuestros, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1968 [Critical comments are supplemented by Asturias’s own remarks on his major literary preoccupations]
Autobiography

Autobiographical writing is an account of a person’s life written by the subject, marked or dealing with his/her own experiences or life history. An account of a life is to be distinguished from the memoir—in which the emphasis is not so much on the author’s developing self, but on the people s/he has known and the events s/he has witnessed. It must also be distinguished from the private diary or journal, which is a day-to-day record of the events in a person’s life, written for private use and pleasure and often with little or no thought of publication.

Autobiography is not a literary genre in the traditional sense, since autobiographical writings, particularly in Latin America, demonstrate a protean character, and are devoid of a definitive set of coherent principles and rules, save the unwritten creed of writing in retrospect about the author’s own life.

Autobiographical writing has a long history, all forms having in common the authors’ need to give to the world their version of the events and personalities involved in their life. The autobiographical genre in Latin America, however, presents unique canonical problems of classification due to the rise of subgenres (testimonial and documentary narratives) in recent years. A growing interest in Latin American writing has contributed in the past twenty years to the discovery and expansion of a corpus that had remained, until then, in obscurity. While first-person narratives abound in Colonial literature (Cabeza de Vaca’s Naufragios [Shipwrecks] and Garcilaso de la Vega’s Comentarios reales [Royal Commentaries] are but two prime examples), such texts are only tangentially autobiographical, since the narration of self is more a means to achieve a public goal than to reveal the personal self. Scholars have routinely characterized contemporary Latin American fiction as predominantly a social testimonial. But social struggles invariably give rise to new forms of literature. While the documentary imperative will never quite disappear from Spanish American selfwriting, it will continue to take on more varied and more subtle literary forms. Indeed, a strong testimonial stance informs much of autobiographical writing in Spanish America today, with the autobiographers seeing themselves as witnesses to collective memory. The phenomenon of a collective subject of the testimonial is hardly the result of a personal style on the part of the writer who testifies. The tradition assumes that the autobiographer is continuous with his community, as opposed to assuming the radical individualism that we associate with, say, some European writers of the genre. After all, the testimonial is not usually produced by great writers, and often not by writers at all—in many instances. This is so, in part, due to the illiteracy or low-literacy levels of the testimonial’s often peasant informant, who conveys orally his/her story to a journalist or sociologist, who, in their turn, organize the narrative in written form. For this reason, it has always been seen as a kind of writing from the margins and, by many critics, may not even be considered as autobiography at all due to the conditions which govern its production and the unwritten rules which give it shape, making it a genre in itself in their view. So it is that Spanish American autobiographies are fascinating hybrids, often involving several discourses and purposes at once. They aspire to the aforementioned documentary status while unabashedly exalting the self as they dwell on personal experience while purporting to be exercises in historiography.
Yet, in the early period of Spanish American letters, a more personal note predominated in the prolific production of autobiographical narratives. Domingo Faustino Sarmiento’s Facundo (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants) about the Rosas dictatorship in Argentina, creates, as Sylvia Molloy notes, intimacy and complicity with the Argentine ideal reader, as a result of excluding others. In fact, Sarmiento himself dedicates his Recuerdos de provincia, 1850 [Memoirs of Provincial Life] “to my compatriots only”—those who will truly understand him and give him being. In this work, Sarmiento’s account of his youth written while in exile in Chile, a gentle, romantic nostalgia for times past is apparent. But the aim of the work was chiefly polemical. Sarmiento’s attacks on the dictator Rosas had caused his name to be reviled in official Argentine circles, and Recuerdos was composed as a defense of himself, his ancestry, and his active life; “a patriot’s desire to preserve the esteem of his fellow citizens,” as he said.

Many recent novels have a subtext that reveals this interplay between autobiographical documentation and social narrative, and, as such, may be considered to be as politically motivated as Sarmiento’s writings. The narrating “I” often takes the form of an oppressor, most often a dictator, (Paraguay’s Augusto Roa Bastos’s Yo el Supremo (I the Supreme), Guatemala’s Miguel Ángel Asturias’s El Señor Presidente (The President)) or an individual who represents the interests of a jeopardized social group (Cuba’s Edmundo Desnoes’s Memorias del subdesarrollo (Memories of Underdevelopment), or a marginalized group of the population as in Miguel Barnet’s Memorias del subdesarrollo (Memories of Underdevelopment), or a marginalized group of the population as in Miguel Barnet’s Biografía de un cimarrón (Autobiography of a Run Slave), in order to portray sociohistorical events of a specific period. In other instances the author/narrator himself recreates a particular experience through personal testimonial accounts for the purpose of denunciation of a political figure or system (Hernán Valdés’s Tejas Verdes, subtitled Diario de un campo de concentración en Chile (Diary of a Concentration Camp in Chile) and the personal testimony of the Chilean Jacobo Timerman, Preso sin nombre, celda sin número (Prisoner without a Name, Cell without a Name)). Although such works have the life of the first-person narrator as an organizing point of reference, the narrative deliberately relates the author to historically “real” individuals. Sociopolitical continuity links Latin American novels from their origins in the late Renaissance chronicles of the Conquest, together with a testimonial quality which is one of the dominant strands of contemporary writing in the continent. Such autobiographical accounts may often fictionalize and allegorize recognizable individuals and events in Latin American society and politics. By using strategies of narrative discourse reminiscent of mainstream contemporary novels, the writer of autobiographical narratives underscores the continuity between imaginative literature and documentary history in Latin American culture. Such is the case of Gabriel García Márquez in many of his works, particularly Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude).

It will be clear by now that representativeness and identity are closely linked in Spanish American self-writing. This tension between consolidation and individuation is most keenly mirrored in particular post-1960s testimonials by Latin American women. Arguably the social tradition of Latin American autobiography had anticipated the 1992, Nobel Peace Prize winner, Rigoberta Menchú’s book, Me llamo Rigoberta Menchú y así me nació la conciencia (I, Rogoberta Menchi an Indian Woman in Guatemala) and the Bolivian Domitila Barrios de Chungara’s ¡Si me permiten hablar! Testimonio de Domitila, una mujer de las minas de Bolivia (Let Me Speak! Testimony of Domitila, a Woman of the Bolivian Mines). Such works are examples of non-fictional Bildungsromans or testimonials in which the autobiographical voice of each text, during the course of the life-telling narration, identifies with a cultural group outside of which the text would be misread. Yet, despite its current popularity as a recognized literary form, the testimonial almost always raises issues about genre which remain irresolvable due to its protean nature. In the volume Testimonio y literatura (1986), edited by René Jara and Hernán Vidal, seventeen essays represent the testimonial as sharing significant territory with autobiography, ethnography, biography, history, fiction, oral literature, documentary, journalism, and even photo-journalism. Despite problems of generic classification of the interesting variations that testimonial narration presents, it is undeniably an autobiographical life history narration in a first-person voice that stresses development and continuity.

First-person accounts of various types, travelogues, testimonios (testimonials or eye-witness accounts), diaries, autobiographies, and other hybrid modes of self-representation from the 19th century onward reflect on individual and national identity, thus demonstrating the complexity of forms to which the autobiography may be ascribed. Such texts not only inform us about the autobiographical voice’s life, but, in addition, may also provide us with equally significant information about the community, traditional practices, armed political struggles, and strategic decisions in the life of the author and his people. The testimonial constructs a collective self. And, unlike the private and even lonely moment of autobiographical writing, the testimonial “subgenre” and its basis in orality (testimonies) becomes a series of public events. As a consequence, the testimonial “I” in such narratives neither presumes nor even invites us to identify with it. In the very convention of autobiographical form, there is implicit an ideology of individualism that, as John Beverley asserts in an article of 1989, is “built on the notion of a coherent, self-evident, self-conscious, commanding subject that appropriates literature precisely as a means of ‘self-expression’ and that in turn constructs textually for the reader the liberal imagery of a unique, ‘free,’ autonomous ego as the natural form of being and public achievement.”

A broad definition of the genre encompasses all these forms of autobiographical narration. In Philippe Lejeune’s On Autobiography, the critic, while recognizing autobiography to be a complex and unstable literary category, historically speaking, proposes the following working definition of the genre: “we shall define autobiography as the retrospective prose narrative that someone writes concerning his own existence, where the focus is his individual life, in particular the story of his personality.” It might be noted that Latin American critics have begun to confront the fact that when elite criteria are applied to some works, all too often they are attempting to make them fit canons and categories of dominant Western models, which, inevitably, do not apply wholly to literary works of underdeveloped countries.

ELENA DE COSTA

Further Reading

Avant-Garde

The avant-garde movements in Latin America sprang up throughout the continent in the 1920s as manifestations of rebellion against 19th-century literary and artistic tradition, with the intention of breaking away, of antagonizing, and of creating and promoting innovative artistic concepts that defied and revised the very tradition in which these artists and writers had learned their craft. “Martinierrismo”, atalayismo, diepalismo, euforismo, integralismo, avancismo, estridentismo, auguralismo, creacionismo, runrunismo, ultrasismo are some of the names of these manifestations. Art was conceived as an unmediated expression of the genius and singularity of its creator: “el poeta es un pequeño dios” (the poet is a small god). The avant-garde was an attempt to free art from having to respond to needs other than those of artistic creation and expression. These movements advocated stripping poetic language of ornamental devices, confessional tones or any other linguistic or conceptual debris that intercepted the innovative spirit of renewal that sustained these various and somewhat ephemeral movements. Emphasis was on the power of newly created imagery; to create from scratch was the main thrust: “la primera condición del poeta es crear, la segunda crear, y la tercera, crear” (it is in the poet’s nature, firstly, secondly and thirdly to create), proclaimed the Chilean vanguardist poet Vicente Huidobro in his essay “El creacionismo” of 1925, one of his influential manifestos.

The avant-garde groups were also connected to social and political antagonism against the political trends of the time, between World War I and World War II, and in many instances, against the racist appeal on both sides of the Atlantic. Thus, it should be viewed as an international movement that reached Eastern and Western Europe, the United States and Latin America.

The merging of the arts was of great interest to these artists, many of whom practised painting, visual or Cubist poetry, pure poetry, even embroidered poetry. Among these artists and writers were some of the most important innovators of poetic language in 20th-century Latin American literature, the framers of vanguard and Surrealist conceptions of art that were to have a major impact on most writers of the continent during the decades that followed, both in Spanish and Portuguese.
The various manifestations of the avant-garde evolved throughout the subcontinent during the first thirty years of the 20th century, and their impact on cultural and literary production was most strongly felt in Argentina, Chile, Peru, Cuba and Mexico.

In Buenos Aires, vanguard movements had strong links with European cultural forms such as the music of trains presented by Honegger in the Colón Theatre. Also the prestigious Witcomb Gallery in fashionable Florida Street sponsored an exhibition of early Cubist painting. Cosmopolitanism and the exuberance of the belle époque and Art Deco contributed to the embellishment of downtown areas of the city of Buenos Aires sponsored by the then President Marcelo T.de Alvear, following the architectural planning of the remodelling of Paris under Haussmann. The project intended to make of Buenos Aires the cosmopolis envisioned by the dominant political class well represented by Alvear himself.

The two most representative artistic groups that championed opposing philosophies or aesthetics in this city were those of Boedo and of Florida: they positioned themselves in a struggle for the power to control cultural forms and the signs governing society.

In Chile the movement was initiated by two young poets who were to become major cultural figures in Latin American literary history: Vicente Huidobro (1895–1948) and Pablo Neruda (1904–73). Huidobro wrote manifestos that circulated inside and outside of Chile; they had considerable impact in the Hispanic literary world. Huidobro’s major books of poems are El espejo de agua, 1916 [The Mirror of Water], the Cubist poems written in French, Horizon carré, 1917 [Square Horizon], Poemas árticos, 1918 (Arctic Poems), and a major poetic text, the long poem Altazor (1931) in seven cantos. Pablo Neruda, less flamboyant at first, soon emerged as the other innovative voice with one of the most, if not the most, popular collection of poems written in the subcontinent, Veinte poemas de amor y una canción desesperada, 1924 (Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair). The youth of Latin America learned these poems by heart and in the 1960s they were incorporated into folk music. This collection of poems sold the largest number of copies ever in the continent. The second book of poems is more vanguardist and hermetic, Tentativa del hombre infinito, 1926 [Attempt of the Infinite Man]. Of Neruda’s major works, his most important vanguardist poetic contribution are the hermetic poems of Residencia en la tierra, 1933–35 (Residence on Earth).

In Mexico, the vanguard movement was best represented by poets gathered around two different groups: the estridentismo movement and the group known as Contemporáneos, the latter constituted by Gorostiza, Carlos Pellicer, Roberto Owen, Salvador Novo, Xavier Villaurrutia and Ortiz de Montellano.

In Cuba Revista de Avance (1927–30) gave vanguard artists a successful outlet to publish their work and to voice their concern. In Peru, Amauta (1928–30), a magazine founded by the influential thinker José Carlos Mariátegui, attempted to synthesize Marxist theory as a tool for analyzing Peru’s reality. The most prominent figure of Peruvian letters is César Vallejo, who developed an uncommonly original system of poetic expression with no predecessors or followers. The first work contains the remarkable and hermetic poems of Los heraldos negros, 1919 [The Black Heralds]. His most innovative poetic language is displayed in the still enigmatic poems of Trilce (1922).)

In Puerto Rico, Luis Palés Matos, Ildefonso Pereda Valdés and Ramón Guirao are the creators of the vanguard poems that integrated their vision of Négritude with these movements, an important contribution that incorporates African-Hispanic literary works into Latin American literature.

MAGDALENA GARCÍA PINTO

Further Reading

Córdova Iturburu, Cayetano, La revolución martinfierrista, Buenos Aires: Ediciones Culturales Argentinas, 1962
Jackson, K. David (editor), Transformations of Literary Language in Latin American Literature: from Machado de Assis to the Vanguards, Austin, Texas: Abaporu Press, 1987
Masiello, Francine, Lenguaje e ideología. Las escuelas argentinas de vanguardia, Buenos Aires: Hachette, 1986
Osorio, Nelson (editor), Manifiestos, proclamas y polémica de la vanguardia literaria, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1988
Teles, Gilberto Mendoça, Vanguarda européia e Modernismo brasileiro, Rio de Janeiro: Vozes, 1972 [A collection of European and Brazilian manifestos, each preceded by an introductory note]
Torre, Guillermo de, Historia de las literaturas de vanguardia, Madrid: Guadarrama, 1965, 3rd edition, 1974

Bibliographies

Special Issues of Journals
Revista Iberoamericana 106–07 (January-June 1979) [A special issue on “Vicente Huidobro y la vanguardia,” with René De Costa as guest editor]

Aymara Literature

The following Aymara song, quoted by Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala at the beginning of the 17th century, acts as a fitting introduction to this subject:

el havlli avmarana dize aci
The Aymara language is spoken in southern Peru, northwest Bolivia, and northern Chile, with most of the speakers living on the shores of Lake Titicaca and in the Bolivian departamentos or administrative districts of La Paz and Potosí. Aymara shares many words with Quechua because both languages have been in close geographical contact for many centuries; and although typologically they are very similar, a genetic relationship has not been proved conclusively. There are more than two million Aymara speakers today living in the Andean countries, and about a third of the Bolivian population are considered Aymara, a term which does not only imply the language, but also a culture different from mestizo and criollo culture. Traditionally, the Aymara population has been related to a high altitude herding and peasant economy, but with a strong migratory movement to the cities, La Paz in particular has become a stronghold of Aymara speaking people.

The Andean peoples did not have writing systems in pre-European times, but there were other forms of artistic expression, such as the designs on pottery and textiles. Moreover, there is clear evidence, from historical sources as well as from contemporary traditions, that the Aymara used music, dance and verbal art as oral tradition long before the European invasion, although there are obviously no direct and untouched traces left of such an original Aymara literary tradition. In this context mention should be made of the quipu, knotted cords representing a complex counting system as mnemonic technical device, also used in the memorization of oral traditions.

As in other Amerindian languages, the oldest known testimonials of their literature date back to the 16th century and were written by Europeans in their zeal to Christianise the indigenous American cultures. By 1584 the Third Lima Council had published a voluminous book containing the Christian doctrine (Doctrina Christiana) and a collection of sermons, translated from Spanish into Aymara (and Quechua), probably with the help of native speakers. Of course, this kind of literature is not the original expression of the people themselves, and the contents are not those of Aymara culture. Rather, these texts reflect the immediate attempt to colonise Andean language and thought by re-interpreting indigenous concepts of, for example, the sacred, providing them with new, additional Christian meanings. The missionary efforts of the colonial church also produced dictionaries and grammars of Aymara which codified the language in European terms and served for centuries as the basis for teaching Aymara (Bertonio 1603, 1612). During the centuries which followed different editions and versions of Christian religious didactic texts were published. The only Aymara texts written at the beginning of the 17th century with a cultural content which actually referred to Aymara life are the ones written down, or “quoted” by the native Quechua speaker Guaman Poma de Ayala in his chronicle. As Xavier Albó and Felix Layme have noted, owing to Guaman’s competence in Aymara the texts are not easily understandable. Until well into the 18th century all known texts were written by non-Aymara speakers or bilinguals dominant in Spanish, resulting in a form of Aymara which has been called missionary or patron Aymara. A remarkable collection of texts of that period is an anonymous phrase book, the first one entirely secular in character, which deals with different topics, such as writing a letter or buying and selling animals, written in Aymara and Spanish, with each language showing influence of the other.

In the period of independence, the leaders of the new American states became aware of the importance of the support by the indigenous population for their cause, and this resulted in the translation of some political documents into Aymara, e.g., on tribute or the declaration of independence.

It is only in the 20th century, with anthropologists and linguists becoming interested in Aymara culture and language, that texts have been published which were narrated by Aymara native speakers and written down, “transcribed” by the researchers. They are mainly stories (cuentos) which deal with Aymara cultural values in a symbolic way, and they reflect a complex and often artistically elaborate language.

Recently, texts containing cultural information began to be collected; these include material on matrimonial rites and agricultural cultivation as well as ritual texts. Members of the Workshop of Andean Oral History (THOA) are developing new methods of historical research and gathering testimonials by native speakers in their own language.

An altogether different genre of Aymara literature consists of numerous collections of poetry, written directly in Aymara by native speakers or translated from Spanish into Aymara. The latter display the characteristics of modern Spanish language lyrics and are yet another example of translation, whereas the former are often characterised by their authors’ participation in two worlds: the modern, westernised world, and the more traditional Andean one.

Just as written poetry has become a means of artistic expression for Andean authors themselves, methods for the analysis of Aymara art are now not only being developed by European and US anthropologists and linguists, but also by Aymara researchers who analyse Aymara traditional literature according to culture-internal criteria and discover more and more about an Aymara way of producing and classifying literature. Parallel semantic structures, often binary or triple expressions, as well as juxtapositions and repetitions such as recurrent expressions of lexical, semantic and syntactic type, are means of structuring a text. An important stylistic device is the interlacing of topics: in song performances verses are sung alternatingly (“topic braiding”); in prose texts a topic can be introduced by a single word or expression—seemingly “out of context”—which is taken up again much later (“interlaced sentences”). In Aymara, the speaker or narrator has to mark grammatically his/her source of knowledge so that a story can have a rather complex structure of different levels of reported speech and an elaborate intercalation of narrative and dialogue, which may give the impression of several voices present in the text. Stories are narrated as cycles and in a certain order within those cycles; for example, the first stories to be told will deal with big animals, moving on to those about smaller animals. Aymara speakers compare the learning of story—telling and story—telling itself to the rhythm of spinning; and stories are seen as moving downwards in that they are handed down from a knowledgeable person to a learner.

In addition to this rich literary production, modern media have produced a quantity of radio editorials, novels and dramas as well as films.

Thus the last 400 documented years of Aymara literature have seen a shift from an initially European and mission dominated literature to a literature created by those members of the national states Peru, Bolivia and Chile who consider themselves Aymara and who wish to express themselves artistically or to contribute to setting down the history, documentation and analysis of their own cultural traditions. With an increasing number of projects on bilingual education, in which framework oral literature is also being edited, more individuals will be able to guarantee the future of the Aymara language and its literature in both traditional and modern forms. To round off this introduction to the subject, here is an Aymara poem with accompanying Spanish and English versions:

Aynachajjaru

Qhitiraqui inti jalanta chhakaypacha llamt’ataro samanaruw tucusi kotapampas yatituwa
acjan sarnakascäwsin jan acanquirjamaw uñjasta Yatipachasana nän cancañajajj janiw nampïquiti
Pachpa Marcajan jaya jakëtwa uqhampachasa janiwa pä chuymaniicti janiw / janiw / janiw jawirijja asirasa siqhasica punniniwa apunacan arupajja wiñayataquiw
iyaw sañaquiscaniwa

Latitud Sur

Alguien borra el horizonte todo se desvanece al tocarlo El altiplano adivina que estando aquí no estoy Aunque reconozca
mi persona no está conmigo Extranjero en mi propio Continente mas nunca aculturado
Jamás / jamás / jamás el río dejará de ser serpiente eterna la cosmogonía
el mito realidad

(Poem in Aymara and Spanish by Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala)

Downwards

Somebody must be causing the west to disappear when touched it evaporates and the altiplano prophesies to me that living here I am as if not being here
Although I know of my being
I am not with myself
In my own Country I am from far away thus ever am I not of two hearts never / never / never the river being like a serpent will flow in a line the forefathers’ words forever will be accepted

(English versions of Aymara poems by Sabine Dedenbach-Salazar Sáenz)

SABINE DEDENBACH—SALAZAR SÁENZ

See also entries on Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala, Mayan Literature, Náhuatl Literature, Quechua Literature

Further Reading

Albó, Xavier (editor), Raíces de America: el mundo aymara, Madrid: Alianza, 1988 [This collection of essays on all important aspects of Aymara culture is a valuable introduction. It also contains brief Aymara texts of different genres]
Albó, Xavier and Felix Layme, Literatura aymara. Antología. I. Prosa, La Paz: CIPCA/Hisbol/JAYMA, 1992 [In this anthology, the editors have assembled Aymara texts which include, chronologically and thematically ordered samples of all periods and different topics and genres]
Aluísio Azevedo 1857–1913

Brazilian novelist

Aluísio Azevedo is generally described by critics and literary historians as Brazil’s most important Naturalist novelist. This reputation, however, is based upon only four of the eleven novels Azevedo produced during the sixteen years of his life (1879–95) that he devoted to fiction. Only those four—O mulato (Mulatto) of 1881; Casa de pensão, 1884
Boarding House; O homem, 1887 [The Man], and O cortiço (A Brazilian Tenement) of 1890—attempt to follow the stylistic and thematic precepts of French Naturalism and its leading exponent, Émile Zola. The other seven novels are, in general, pedestrian romantic pot-boilers, with titles like O mistério da Tijuca [The Mystery of Tijuca], or A mortalha de Alzira [Alzira’s Shroud], many of which first appeared serialized in newspapers. Nor is there any clear progression in Azevedo’s literary career; he simultaneously produced both Naturalist and Romantic texts, and A mortalha de Alzira, a simply ludicrous novel, appeared four years after O cortiço—Azevedo’s masterpiece and one of the greatest novels of 19th-century Brazilian literature.

These anomalies are significant for understanding Azevedo’s view of literature in general and of the Naturalist novel in particular. Azevedo occasionally claimed that destiny had forced him to become a writer, but it is clear that he was always extremely conscious of the economic and social benefits literary success could bring. One of the ironies of Azevedo’s career is that his Naturalist novels frequently attack capitalism, commerce, and even the profit motive itself, but he argued with his publishers over contractual details and aggressively pushed the sales of his novels—even putting up advertising posters himself. When he was thirty-eight years old, Azevedo obtained a position in Brazil’s diplomatic service, and gave up writing for good; he later told a friend that “the only books that count are checkbooks.”

Azevedo’s determination to use fiction to earn money and gain a government job helps to explain his simultaneous production of both Naturalist and Romantic novels. He recognized the fact that two quite separate audiences for fiction had developed by the last years of the Brazilian Empire: a small but influential group of sophisticated, highly-educated upperclass readers, largely male, who were aware of the latest trends in European literature; and a much larger group of readers, primarily composed of upper-class women and less educated men, who were not interested in literary innovation but simply enjoyed traditional and highly melodramatic tales of romance and mystery. Azevedo managed to satisfy these two audiences from the very beginning of his literary career. His first novel, Uma lágrima de mulher, 1879 [A Woman’s Tear], was, as its title suggests, a romantic tear-jerker; his second, O mulato (written in 1880 and published in 1881), was one of the first Brazilian Naturalist novels to appear, and was unquestionably the most influential of those early texts.

Azevedo’s leap from full-blown Romanticism to something very close to standard French Naturalism is symbolic of the whole development of Brazilian fiction in the second half of the 19th century. The novel in Brazil similarly moved directly from Romanticism to Naturalism—almost entirely skipping Realism, the central movement in European fiction after Flaubert. While some Brazilian Naturalists trumpeted their movement as a revolution against Romanticism, in practice it is evident that their novels endeavored to reformulate Romanticism through a surface texture of detailed observation and references to what the Naturalists viewed as science; beneath that surface texture, the Naturalists, like their predecessors, sought to use literature to communicate universal truths rather than simply to describe reality. But while the truths of Brazilian Romanticism were generally positive-national pride and optimism about the future, the inherent goodness of most of humanity, the saving power of true love—those of Naturalism were darkly pessimistic: social change is painfully difficult, and its consequences are invariably negative; most individuals, their behavior totally determined by genetics and by their environment, are deeply flawed; sexual desire the engine that drives human existence. These ideas, moreover, were communicated through plot structures, relying heavily upon mystery and melodrama, which were virtually indistinguishable from those of the Brazilian Romantic novel.

Azevedo and other Brazilian Naturalists claimed to be disciples of Zola, and their works contain both stylistic and thematic elements which support that claim: the use of scientific language to establish the validity of the narrative; detailed descriptions of the artifacts and routines of daily life at various social and economic levels; the frank portrayal of sexuality; the creation of characters largely devoid of complexity or ambiguity because they are defined in terms of social or biological pathologies (avarice, hysteria, nymphomania, homosexuality, and so on), pathologies which determine their actions; a strongly anti-clerical and anti-capitalist stance; the focus on enclosed physical spaces (the small provincial city of São Luís do Maranhão in O mulato, the urban slum in O cortiço) within which, as in Zola’s theoretical model of the laboratory test tube, the assorted pathologies of the characters interact.

None the less, the Naturalism of Azevedo and his contemporaries departed from their European models in significant ways. Because the audience for their fiction was overwhelmingly male, the sexual content of their novels went far beyond anything found in Zola. Nothing comparable to the most extreme examples of Brazilian Naturalism, Júlio Ribeiro’s A carne, 1888 [Flesh] or Adolfo Caminha’s 1895 novel of interracial homosexuality Bom crioulo (The Black Man and the Cabin Boy), could have been published and marketed in England or the United States before the middle of the 20th century. Even the 1926 English translation of Azevedo’s much tamer O cortiço had to be extensively cut before publication.

There are, however, other even more fundamental differences between Brazilian and European Naturalism. Zola and his French followers described the human suffering and degradation caused by an unjust social and economic system in order to create support among bourgeois readers for fundamental changes in that system. In Brazil, Naturalism flourished at a time of enormous changes in Brazilian society—the abolition of African slavery in 1888, the end of the Empire and the proclamation of the Republic in 1889, the rise of European-style capitalism, and the start of large-scale European immigration. Azevedo, like the other members of the Brazilian movement, used fiction as a means to explore and to warn against what he viewed as the potentially destructive consequences of these changes for the traditional structures of Brazilian society, structures dominated by the elite male readers for whom he wrote. The great dangers, for Azevedo, included potential competition from educated and ambitious mulattos, the upward mobility of European immigrants whose prosperity, the result of their domination of commerce and capital, threatened an agriculture—based economy and aristocracy, and the challenge to patriarchal society posed by the education of women and by any free expression of female sexuality. In Azevedo’s Naturalist novels, something approaching order is restored at the end of the text—but that order is fragile, artificial, and very often ironic, reflecting his own deep pessimism about the future of traditional Brazilian society.

DAVID T. HABERLY
Biography

Born Aluísio Tancredo Gonçalves de Azevedo in the northeastern coastal city of São Luís in the province of Maranhão, Brazil, 14 April 1857. His brother Artur, with whom Aluísio would sometimes collaborate, became a leading playwright of the day. Neither brother was successful at school and they both began to work as warehouse clerks when they reached the age of thirteen. Aluísio went to Rio in 1876 but returned to Maranhão on his father’s death in 1878 and began a career in journalism. Earned a reputation as a radical with anti-Establishment and anti-clerical ideas. Returned to Rio in 1881 and led a comfortable life in café society. Appointed to Brasil’ consular service in 1895 at which point he gave up writing for good. Travelled widely. Died of a heart attack in Buenos Aires, 21 January 1913.

Selected Works

Novels

Uma lágrima de mulher, São Luís do Maranhão: Tipografia do Frias, 1879

O mistério da Tijuca, in Folha Nova (Rio de Janeiro), 1883 [retitled as Girândola de amores in all subsequent editions]

Casa de pensão, Rio de Janeiro: Militar de Santos e Companhia, 1884

Filomena Borges, in Gazeta de Noticías (Rio de Janeiro), 1884

Memórias de um condenado, Ouro Preto: Liberal Mineiro, 1886 [retitled as A Condessa Vésper, Rio de Janeiro, 1901]

O homem, Rio de Janeiro: Afonso de Castro e Silva, 1887

O coruja, Rio de Janeiro: Montalverne, 1890

Demônios, São Paulo: Teixeim e Irmãos, 1893 [novella]

Pegadas, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier Livreiro, 1897 [novella]

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading

—Labirinto do espaço romanesco, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1979

Loos, Dorothy Scott, The Naturalistic Novel of Brazil, New York: Hispanic Institute, 1963

Mariano Azuela 1873–1952

Mexican prose writer, dramatist and critic

Known primarily for his novels, Mariano Azuela was a medical doctor and an officer in Pancho Villa’s army during the Mexican Revolution (1910–20). His early novels, written in the naturalistic vein before the Revolution, reflect the influence of Zola. The best of these is Mala yerba (Marcela), which exposes the corruption of wealthy hacendados (landowners) and the judicial system. Marcela, the protagonist, is a peasant girl whose lover is murdered by Julián Andrade, the local hacendado, because he himself desires her. Marcela, too, dies in the end, victimized by both Andrade and her oppressive environment. Perhaps Azuela’s most popular novel after Los de abajo (The Underdogs), Mala yerba not only attacks social injustice, but also describes scenes of country life such as horse races and bull fights. In his dialogues Azuela displays a sharp ear for rural speech patterns, which he observed as a youth on the haciendas of his native state of Jalisco.

The next cycle of Azuela’s novels depicts the Revolution, initiating the type of fiction that would predominate in Mexico until approximately 1945. The most widely acclaimed of these works is Los de abajo, but others include Andrés Pérez, maderista [Andrés Pérez, Supporter of Madero]; Los caciques (The Bosses); Las moscas (The Flies); and Las tribulaciones de una familia decente (The Trials of a Respectable Family). The first Mexican novel of the Revolution, Andrés Pérez, maderista portrays a youth who, at the outbreak of the Revolution, pretends to support Francisco Madero, but who ultimately betrays the revolutionary leader as well as his best friend. Los caciques takes place during Madero’s presidency (1911–13), its principal theme being the exploitation by unscrupulous caciques (political bosses), a major cause of the civil conflict. In this novel Don Juanito, an honest but naive businessman, is robbed of his livelihood by the caciques, while Rodríguez an outspoken, idealistic store clerk, pays with his life for criticizing them. Las moscas consists of a series of brief scenes on a train carrying followers of Pancho Villa to northern Mexico after his defeat by General Obregón at Celaya. Without a true protagonist, this novel has as its central theme the reactions of individuals to the danger and confusion wrought by the Revolution. Other unifying aspects of the work are its flashes of humor and its mordant satire of human weaknesses that surface under stress.

Las tribulaciones de una familia decente is Azuela’s most important novel of the Revolution after Los de abajo. In this bitter, humorless saga, the author portrays the Vázquez Prados, an upper-middle-class family from Zacatecas that seeks refuge in Mexico City during a time of social and political turmoil (1916–17). Here in the capital, however, the family is again engulfed by the Revolution and forced to adapt to a dog-eat-dog environment in which corrupt opportunists are awarded political plums and soldiers are permitted to roam the streets robbing and terrorizing civilians. Azuela strongly condemns the regime of President Venustiano Carranza, known in the novel as “el Primer Jefe” (the Number-One Boss). The most memorable characters include Procopio Vázquez, the family patriarch, who loses his fortune and ultimately comes to terms with his situation when he finds work as an office employee, a fate he could never have accepted in Zacatecas; Agustinita, Procopio’s proud and less adaptable wife; and Pascual, their unscrupulous son-in-law, who robs them of their wealth and cavorts with venal government officials. Although two of the themes (the betrayal of the Revolution and the virtue of honest work) are set forth perhaps too explicitly, this remains one of Azuela’s three or four most successful endeavors.

Between 1918 and 1923 Azuela did not publish any novels, in part because he felt discouraged over the lack of attention accorded him by critics and readers. (Los de abajo, which had been published in El Paso, Texas in 1916, was not acclaimed in Mexico City as a major achievement until 1924.) So, in an effort to elicit recognition, he resorted to the use of avantgarde techniques in his next three novels, the most successful of which is La luciérnaga (The Firefly). In this novel, which shares the same theme as Las tribulaciones de una familia decente (the problems experienced by a provincial middle-class family in adjusting to life in Mexico City), chronological time is disrupted and, instead of an omniscient or first-person narrator, interior monologues convey much of the plot.

A psychological as well as a social-protest novel, La luciérnaga portrays three major characters: Dionisio, his wife Conchita (La Luciérnaga), and his brother José María. Dionisio decides to move his family from Cieneguilla to Mexico City, where he plans to invest Conchita’s inheritance and make a better life for all of them. However, once in the capital he soon loses their fortune to unscrupulous, would-be business partners and succumbs to alcoholism. Meanwhile, his daughter is killed, his son dies of tuberculosis, and his miserly brother, who has remained in Cieneguilla to die, also of tuberculosis, refuses to save him from financial ruin. Conchita returns to Cieneguilla but, in the final pages, reappears in Mexico City to rescue her bedridden husband from physical, moral, and spiritual degradation.

Some critics have proclaimed La luciérnaga Azuela’s best work, primarily because of his adept manipulation of stylistic and structural techniques that were seldom seen in Mexican fiction before 1932. Thus, presented from within by means of their unarticulated thoughts, Dionisio, José María, and Conchita emerge as vivid, well-rounded characters whose tragic fate elicits the reader’s interest and sympathy. The temporal and spatial shifts from the capital to the family’s home town, moreover, inject dynamic momentum and challenge the reader to reorganize events in chronological order. Finally, the eponymous Firefly (Conchita) symbolizes the ideal Mexican wife, whose virtues sparkle silently in the blackness of adversity.

Although during the last twenty years of his life Azuela published eight novels (plus two posthumously), none of these is ranked among his best. The majority deal with political issues and, in their technique, mark a return to Naturalism. Perhaps the most notable is Nueva burguesía [New Bourgeoisie], consisting of a series of cinematographic close-ups of the new middle-class that seized political and economic power after the Revolution. Reminiscent of Las moscas in its technique and in its lack of a true protagonist, this novel attacks once again the failure to enact the reforms promised by Mexico’s revolutionary leaders.

As the initiator of the novel of the Mexican Revolution, Azuela set his nation’s literature on an entirely new course. He broke with European models and Spanish American Modernismo in order to forge a different type of fiction, one dealing with real social issues from the point of view of the common man. Thus his heroes are either the exploited and downtrodden or those of the upper classes who, as a result of the Revolution, come to realize the value of hard work and social justice. In his better novels, instead of the verbose style of the Naturalists (who influenced him most in his early years), Azuela used a terse, elliptical prose designed to profile a nation in the throes of dramatic change. Also new in his works is the adroit recording of colloquial Mexican Spanish, especially in the dialogues between illiterate peasants. Major themes running throughout his oeuvre are the betrayal of the Revolution and the corrupting influence of city life. An unyielding idealist, Azuela never declared a truce in his attacks on Mexico’s nouveaux riches. He has been overshadowed in recent years by younger, more experimental writers, but he remains a beacon of both Mexican and Spanish American fiction.

GEORGE R.MCMURRAY

Biography

Born in Lagos de Moreno in the state of Jalisco, Mexico, 1 January 1873, of middle-class parents. After completing his secondary education he was sent in 1887 to Guadalajara to study for the priesthood. Left seminary in 1889. In 1892, he registered in the School of Medicine at the University of Guadalajara; awarded degree in 1899. Returned to Lagos de Moreno to practice medicine there but unable to re-adjust to small town life. Married Carmen Rivera in 1900; ten children. Witnessed action described in Los de abajo (The Underdogs) when working as a surgeon in the army of Pancho Villa. After the latter’s Division del Norte was routed, Azuela took refuge in El Paso, Texas, where he completed and published Los de abajo in 1915. By 1916 he was in Mexico City, practising medicine among the poorest members of the community. Honours rained on him in later life: awarded the Premio de Letras by the Ateneo Nacional de Ciencias y Artes in 1940. Became member of the Seminario de Cultura Mexicana and of the Academia de la Lengua in 1942. Assisted in foundation of the Colegio Nacional in 1943, and became one of its founding members. Died in Mexico City, 1 March 1952.
Selected Works

Novels and Novellas

Maria Luisa, Lagos de Moreno, Jalisco: Imprenta López Arce, 1907

Los fracasados, Mexico City: Tipografía y Litografía de Müller Hermanos, 1908

Andrés Pérez, maderista, Mexico City: Imprenta de Blanco y Botas, 1911

Sin amor, Mexico City: Tipografía y Litografía de Müller Hermanos, 1912.

Domitilo quiere ser diputado, Mexico City: Tipografía A. Carranza e Hijos, 1918

Las tribulaciones de una familia decente, Tampico: Biblioteca de El Mundo, 1918; as The Trials of a Respectable Family, in Three Novels, 1979

La malhora, Mexico City: Rosendo Terrazas, 1923

La luciérnaga, Madrid and Barcelona: Espasa Calpé, 1932; as The Firefly, in Three Novels, 1979

San Gabriel de Valdivias, comunidad indígena, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1938

Regina Landa, Mexico City: Botas, 1939

Avanzada, Mexico City: Botas, 1940

El desquie, Mexico City: Botas, 1941 [First published in La novela semanal, 1925]

Nueva burguesía, Buenos Aires: Club del Libro, 1941

La marchanta, Mexico City: Ediciones del Seminario de Cultura Mexicana, 1944

La mujer domada, Mexico City: El Colegio Nacional, 1946

Sendas perdidas, Mexico City: Botas, 1949 [Limited edition of 2.00 copies]

La maldición, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1955

Esa sangre, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1956

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras completas, 3 vols, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1958–60

Translations

Two Novels of the Mexican Revolution [Includes The Trials of a Respectable Family and The Underdogs], translated by Frances Kellam Hendricks and Beatrice Berler, San Antonio, Texas: Trinity University Press, 1963; revised and augmented edition as Three Novels: The Trials of a Respectable Family; The Underdogs; The Firefly, 1979
Further Reading

A cursory look at the bibliography on Azuela reveals that the majority of the studies deal with Los de abajo and were published before 1975. Thus, the criticism of Azuela’s work is mostly traditional, treating themes, stylistic devices, and structure.

Los de abajo

Novel by Mariano Azuela

A classic in Spanish American literature, Los de abajo was written while its author, Mariano Azuela, was serving as a medical officer in Pancho Villa’s army in northern Mexico. After Villa was defeated by Álvaro Obregón in the battle of Celaya in April 1915, Azuela crossed the border into El Paso, Texas, where he published his recently completed manuscript as a weekly serial in the local newspaper, El Paso del Norte. In this novel Azuela strove to capture the passions and the immediacy of the cataclysmic events he had just witnessed.

Los de abajo dramatizes the second phase of the Mexican Revolution, that is, the time frame between the assassination of Francisco Madero by Victoriano Huerta in February 1913 and the above-mentioned battle of Celaya. Divided into three parts, the novel first introduces Demetrio Macías, an illiterate peasant who leads a ragtag band of revolutionaries against federal troops, defeating them in a series of skirmishes and then joining Pánfilo Natera’s division. Part I also introduces the opportunist Luis Cervantes, an educated youth who becomes Demetrio’s secretary (Demetrio soon attains the rank of colonel) and contrasts sharply with the rustic men under Demetrio’s command. Part I ends with Demetrio’s heroic exploits during the battle of Zacatecas, which signals the triumph of the Revolution, but this section also concludes with the death of Captain Alberto Solís, the only true idealist of the novel. Thus, whereas Part I dramatizes the enthusiasm and idealism of the Revolution, Part II depicts the looting and brutality of the conflict, in addition to its division into factions interested solely in seizing power. Two characters best typifying the bestiality of Part II are Margarito (Blondie), who tortures a federalist soldier before hacking him to death with a saber, and La Pintada, a campfollower who out of jealousy stabs Camila after the latter confesses her affection for Demetrio. Animal imagery in this part also conveys the dehumanizing influence of the war: “They [Demetrio and La Pintada] stared at each other face to face like two strange dogs smelling one another with suspicion.” The final pages of Part II describe the chaotic atmosphere of Aguascalientes (October-November 1914), where attempts to unify the various revolutionary factions fail. Part III represents the disillusion and defeat of Demetrio’s men in Juchipila Canyon, the location of their first triumphant encounter with the federal troops.

The novel’s carefully planned structure is demonstrated by its symmetrical design, Part I consisting of twenty-one chapters, Part II of fourteen, and Part III of seven. Another important aspect of Los de abajo is its epic characteristics. The plot dramatizes not only events of historic and national transcendence, but also heroic exploits reminiscent of the Iliad (especially Demetrio’s role in the battle of Zacatecas and the scene immediately thereafter). Like the Poem of the Cid, Azuela’s novel is divided into three parts, and the Song of Roland comes to mind when Demetrio blows a horn to summon his men. At least two episodes of Los de abajo evoke the Divine Comedy: when a luxury edition of Dante’s masterpiece is destroyed by looters, suggesting Mexico’s metaphoric descent into Hell; and when, in the final lines, Demetrio’s ascent to Heaven is implied: “At the foot of a hollow, sumptuous and huge as the portico of an old cathedral, Demetrio Macías, his eyes leveled in an eternal glance, continues to point the barrel of his gun.” This final image of Demetrio also suggests that the spirit of the Revolution survives despite the death of its hero.

Although, as seen below, Azuela had serious doubts about Mexico’s future after the Revolution, his literary techniques do indeed capture the essence of the upheaval that was transforming his native land as he was creating his masterwork. Perhaps the most basic aspect of his novel is its dynamic, headlong pace, an impression conveyed by its terse, elliptical style. Thus, one-sided dialogues generate forward momentum by obliging the reader to fill in the retorts; similarly, the temporal and spatial gaps between chapters must be closed by a participating reader in order to sustain the narrative thread. Azuela’s use of dialogue and fragmentary action to portray character is enhanced, moreover, by colloquial discourse and brief metaphoric descriptions of superficial reality reflecting the unsophisticated peasant mentality of his characters—rather than lengthy description and detailed, analytical narration. In its form, then, Los de abajo emerges as a truly “revolutionary” novel for its time.

Several critics have emphasized the ambiguity of Azuela’s attitude toward the Revolution. Thus, although the author served on the side of the revolutionary forces and does indeed portray Demetrio as an epic hero who dies fighting for the oppressed, he clearly abhors the barbarism he witnessed and the greed and opportunism of his compatriots. Two embodiments of these attitudes are Cervantes and Solís. The former deserts the federal army and joins the rebels solely to be on the winning side and then absconds with his loot to El Paso, where he launches a successful business career. On the other hand, Captain Solís, the disillusioned idealist and probably the author’s mouthpiece, expresses to Cervantes his loss of faith in the Revolution and its deterministic effect on those who participate in it:
Yo pensé una pradera florida al remate de un camino…Y me encontré un pantano…La revolución es el huracán, y el hombre que se entrega a ella no es ya el hombre, es la miserable hoja seca arrebatada por el vendaval…

[I hoped to find a meadow at the end of the road, I found a swamp…the revolution is like a hurricane: if you’re in it, you’re not a man…you’re a leaf, a dead leaf, blown by the wind]

At a later point, shortly before he is killed, Solís looks toward the future, and says:

Hay que esperar un poco…a que la psicología de nuestra raza resplandezca diáfana…¡robar, matar! …¡Qué chasco, amigo mío, si los que venimos a ofrecer nuestra…vida por derribar a un miserable asesino, resultásemos los obreros de un enorme pedestal…de la misma especie!…¡Lástima de sangre!

[We must wait until the psychology of our race…shines clear and luminous…Robbery! Murder! What a colossal failure we would make of it, friend, if we, who offer our…lives to crush a wretched tyrant [Huerta], became the builders of a monstrous edifice…of exactly the same sort…Vain bloodshed!]

Innovative in its literary form, Los de abajo broke with the long, naturalistic novels and family sagas that had captivated audiences since the 19th century. It is a masterpiece for its unity of theme (the Mexican Revolution) and epic design reflecting the three phases of a nation’s tragic struggle for justice. Despite its episodic nature, it is a carefully structured work of art, modern both in its camera-eye technique and in its conceptual ambiguity.

GEORGE R.MCMURRAY

Editions

Translation: The Underdogs, by Frederick H.Fornoff, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1992 [A scholarly edition with articles by Carlos Fuentes, Seymour Menton and Jorge Ruffinelli. There are earlier translations]
Further Reading

Early criticism of The Underdogs generally considered it an episodic work lacking a clearly defined, unified structure. Recent critics, however, have discerned its epic characteristics and structural unity.

Robe, Stanley L., Azuela and the Mexican Underdogs, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1979 [Provides detailed picture of the two years of political upheaval, 1914 and 1915, in which this novel is set]

Emilio Ballagas 1908–1954

Cuban poet

Emilio Ballagas’s first book of poems, Júbilo y fuga [Joy and Flight], appeared in 1931. This collection placed him amongst the foremost practitioners of the so called “pure” poetry, and thus a member of an innovative movement with other outstanding exponents in Cuba. These included Mariano Brull and Eugenio Florit and the movement’s theoretical bases were formulated by the Frenchman Henri Brémond. With Cuaderno de poesía negra, 1934 [Black Poetry Notebook] he ventured successfully into African-Cuban poetry, a sub-genre whose principal literary figure was Nicolás Guillén. Ballagas’s African-Cuban poetry is restricted, in essence, to a markedly folkloric expression, though it contains social nuances. His poetic career is made up of three stages. Júbilo y fuga and Cuaderno de poesía negra correspond to the first stage, and represent, respectively, the cultured and popular aspects of “pure” poetry in Cuba. In these two initial books, the poet is essentially a voice that is trying out for the first time the joy of singing the delights of the world, with an almost childlike sensibility still innocent of passion and sexual couplings. This joy, which in his first book points towards a sensuality that the critics have called “Adam-like,” that is to say, innocent of the biblical notions of blame and punishment, turns into a real sense of pleasure in Ballagas’s African-Cuban poetry. The poet, through the vocabulary and rhythms of Cuban urban folklore, where the presence of the African tradition of nationality is strong, produces some texts where the verbal recreation broadens the repercussions of his poetic voice considerably. However, his Black poetry is no more than a pleasant parenthesis in Ballagas’s oeuvre, that achieves its first great moment of maturity in the shape of two poems in a markedly Neoromantic style: “Elegía sin nombre” [Elegy without a Name], and “Nocturno y elegía” [Nocturne and Elegy], both of which were incorporated into his book Sabor eterno, 1939 [Eternal Taste]. These poems constitute two of the most exceptional love poems in 20th-century Cuban poetry. Sabor eterno expresses, in relation to the previous stage, the moments of the fall and contrition within Ballagas’s poetry. The earlier innocent enjoyment of the senses has been transformed in Sabor eterno into knowledge, suffering, and solitude, which are reached through the experiences of love and the loss of love. The verse becomes broader and freer, and the expression carries images where the empty space and the growing presence of the night create an atmosphere that is apt for the dissolution of sensuality into loneliness. Because of its confessional style, where the “I” surrenders itself through obfuscating metaphors that constitute any given number of ways to stimulate the reader to unveil the poet’s message, making him his accomplice as well as the ultimate addressee of his voice, Sabor eterno can be placed in the line that—within the Spanish language poetry of the time—Pablo Neruda and Xavier Villaurrutia represented in Latin America, and Luis Cernuda and Vicente Aleixandre in Spain.

From the publication of this book, Ballagas’s poetry enters a phase of withdrawal, both in formal and in spiritual terms, represented by the expression of religious feeling through traditional forms: the décima (ten line octosyllabic verse form); the lira (five line stanza); and the sonnet. With Nuestra señora del mar, 1943 [Our Lady of the Sea], inspired by the Marian name of the Virgen de la Caridad del Cobre, who is greatly revered in Cuba, Ballagas once again approaches the Island’s popular traditions, on this occasion the religious ones. The “Adam-like” sensitivity reverts here to the outlook of the child that returns to her mother’s lap seeking protection, and is expressed through the use of stanzas—modelled on those of the great religious poets of the Spanish language: San Juan de la Cruz and Fray Luis de León—whose construction takes Ballagas towards a Neoclassicism where the intimate and the confessional are subdued, without losing their voice totally. This third stage of his production culminates in his collection of sonnets Cielo en rehenes [Sky in Hostages], which offers a mature expressive tone, characterized by the balance between pain and serenity, between the sensual and the spiritual. Stylistically, the collection’s best sonnets display, in like manner, a balance between the Neoclassical and the Baroque. Ballagas also excelled as a lucid and impassioned essayist, a genre in which he produced a series of texts—many of them delivered as lectures—in which he undertook an enterprise of aesthetic exploration running parallel to the innovative strain in his poetic works. Emilio Ballagas had an unmistakable voice and he achieved a thematic and stylistic richness which make him, together with the exceptional quality of some of his texts, one of the principal figures of 20th-century Cuban poetry.

EMILIO DE ARMAS

Translated by Luis González Fernández

---

Biography

---

Selected Works

Poetry

Júbilo y fuga, Havana: n.p, 1931

Cuaderno de poesía negra, Havana: Santa Clara, 1934
Manuel Bandeira 1886–1968

Brazilian poet and literary translator

Although recognised as one of the outstanding and most respected figures of the Brazilian Modernist Movement, Manuel Bandeira passed through several different literary phases during his long writing career. The range of styles and forms found in his collected work is considerable, but he is doubtless best known for simple, lyrical poems, characterised by tenderness and melancholy, which seek to express everyday experience and emotions.

Bandeira published his first volume of poetry, A cinza das horas [The Hours’ Ash], in 1917. The fifty poems all show the influence of Parnassianism in the formal discipline employed, and Symbolism in the thematic content, but in poems such as “Paisagem noturna” [Nocturnal Landscape] and “Renúncia” [Surrender] there are also indications of the gentle sadness and intimacy that would characterise so much of his work. There is a strong sense of suffering and vulnerability in many of these verses, related in part to Bandeira’s personal experience of serious ill health, which plagued him all his life and deeply marked his vision of the world.

Form was a major concern for Bandeira during these early years of poetic creation, and each subsequent published volume records the increasing effort he made to free himself from the formal dictates of traditional verse, which he regarded as restrictive and oppressive. In Carnaval (1919), many of the poems conform to traditional formal patterns, but the collection also includes “Os sapos” [The Toads], a poem which satirizes...
the narrow conservatism of the Parnassian School. It was an early statement of rebellion as Bandeira searched for a freer form of expression, and moved towards Modernism. Although he did not fully integrate himself into the movement until much later, “Os sapos” was recited at the opening night of the Modern Art Week in São Paulo which inaugurated it in 1922. A further step in that direction was signalled in O ritmo dissoluto, 1924 [The Dissolute Rhythm], which Bandeira himself described as a work of transition. Some of the poems reveal a greater degree of freedom of form and rhythm, but not all are convincing. In some, Bandeira is still unable to find adequate forms of expression for his sentiments, and tends towards the melodramatic or the sentimental. The activities of the Modernists in the 1920s, during the so called “heroic phase” of the movement, provided vital stimulus for Bandeira’s development as a writer, for through them he discovered new ways to continue the renovation of his poetry. Irony, humour and colloquial speech now become the key characteristics of his work, and are clearly in evidence in Libertinagem, published in 1930. This volume signalled his full adherence to Modernism, and contains some of his most memorable poems. Among them is “Poética,” which, in its strident rejection of the consecrated conventions of traditional verse, summarizes the spirit of rebellion of early Modernism. Another is “Vou-me embora pra Pasárgada” [I’m Off to Pasárgada], which envisages a mythical, ideal realm where the poet can enjoy the health and true happiness so far denied him. Humour and playfulness are used to combat the anguish and adversity which had previously produced a tone of despondency in many of his poems. Bandeira became an influential figure among Modernist circles in Rio de Janeiro, where he lived most of his life, but he never completely severed his ties with his native Pernambuco, in northeast Brazil, recollections of which are scattered through his poetry. The most notable example in Libertinagem is “Evocação do Recife,” [Evoking Recife] which, in recalling with a mixture of gentle humour and sadness the city of his early childhood, evokes an era now past, but which has marked his life forever. This poem, more than any other in the collection, exemplifies Bandeira’s concern to make the everyday and the commonplace a central part of his poetry, recalling street sellers, gossiping neighbours, children games, and colloquial speech patterns. For Bandeira, the language of the streets gives vitality to the poet’s work, freeing it from the web of formal, linguistic conventions. Few other contemporary Brazilian poets have so successfully incorporated popular, oral speech into their work, and in doing so Bandeira made a vital contribution to the Modernist objective of broadening literary language.

For many critics, Libertinagem signified Bandeira’s maturity as a poet, bringing together all the individual traits that would distinguish the rest of his work, but he continued to experiment with technique in the years that followed, introducing metrical innovations and seeking to extend the possibilities of free verse. Dividing lines between poetry and prose are blurred in some of the poems collected in Estrela da manhã, 1936 [Morning Star]. Bandeira believed strongly that poetry should be a constant exploration of different forms of expression, and his subsequent volumes of verse contain a variety of styles and structures. Estrela da tarde [Evening Star], for example, a collection published in 1960, contains many examples of traditional verse forms, but also some experiments in concrete poetry. Inevitably, not all attempts were successful, but Bandeira was always attentive to matters of form—a legacy of the early Parnassian influence—and his experimentation was carefully considered and measured. Discipline and caution characterized his approach to writing.
From the 1930s onwards, he also explored new themes, such as the African-Brazilian popular culture that had already attracted a number of other Modernist poets, but he returned to themes of universal concern to produce some of his most moving poems. Of those themes, the contemplation of death, a haunting obsession, is perhaps the most notable, and can be traced through all his work, where his response gradually moves from the restlessness and anguish found in some of his early poems, such as “Delírio” (in A cinza das horas), to spiritual peace through the acceptance of the inevitable in later works, like “A morte absoluta” from Lira dos cinqüent’anos, 1940 [The Lyre at Fifty] and “Preparação para a morte” [Preparing for Death] from Estrela da tarde. Overcoming his own anguish enabled Bandeira to express more solidarity and compassion with others in their suffering, evident in some of the poems of Estrela da tarde, for example, where his characteristic warmth and sensitivity is expressed in simple, accessible verses, colloquial in style, which had become the hallmark of his work. Bandeira dedicated himself uncompromisingly to literature, producing a significant body of critical studies and translations of works written in French and English, but it was his ability to explore basic human emotions and to express his personality sincerely and intimately through clear and concise verse that made him one of Brazil’s outstanding poets of the 20th century.

MARK DINNEEN

Biography

Born in Recife, Brazil, 19 April 1886. Early years peripatetic, but by 1896 family had settled in Rio de Janeiro where he studied at the Ginásio Nacional, a conservative school that emphasized the Classics. Entered São Paulo Polytechnic to study architecture and engineering, 1903. Tuberculosis diagnosed, 1904. Travelled to Switzerland, 1913, and spent several months at a sanatorium in Davos. There he read German poets in the original. Returned to Brazil after outbreak of World War I. Between 1916–22, he lost both parents and two siblings. Formed friendship with Mário de Andrade (see separate entry). Professor of Spanish American literature at University of Rio, 1943. This experience made him aware of how little contact there was between Brazilian and Spanish American writers. From this time, concentrated more on translation (translated Schiller, Shakespeare and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz into Portuguese) and editorial work. Elected to the Brazilian Academy of Letters, 1946. Died in Rio de Janeiro, 13 October 1968.

Selected Works

Poetry
A cinza das horas, Rio de Janeiro: Tipografia do Jornal do Comércio, 1917
Carnaval, Rio de Janeiro: Tipografia do Jornal do Comércio, 1919
Poesias, Rio de Janeiro: Tipografia da Revista de Língua Portuguesa, 1924 [Contains A cinza das horas, Carnaval, and O ritmo dissoluto]
Libertinagem, Rio de Janeiro: Irmãos Pongetti, 1930
Estrela da manhã, Rio de Janeiro: Tipografia do Ministério da Educação e Saúde, 1936
Lira dos cinqüent’anos, Rio de Janeiro: Companhia Carioca de Artes Gráficas, 1940
Belo belo, Rio de Janeiro: Casa do Estudante do Brasil, 1948
Mafuá do Malungo, Barcelona: privately printed, 1948
Opus 10, Niterói: Edições Hipocampo, 1952
Estrela da tarde, Salvador: Editora Dinamene, 1960

Prose Writings
Crônicas da província do Brasil, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1937
Guia de Ouro Preto, Rio de Janeiro: Ministério da Educação e Saúde, 1938
Literatura hispano-americana, Rio de Janeiro: Irmãos Pongetti, 1949
Gonçalves Dias (Esboço biográfico), Rio de Janeiro: Irmãos Pongetti, 1952
Itinerário de Passárgada, Rio de Janeiro: Livraria São José, 1954
De poetas e de poesia, Rio de Janeiro: Ministerio da Educação e Cultura, 1954
Versificação em língua portuguesa, Rio de Janeiro: Delta, 1956
Flauta de papel, Rio de Janeiro: Edições de Arte, 1957
Andorinha, Andorinha, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1966
Os reis vagabundos e mais 50 crônicas, Rio de Janeiro: Editora do Autor, 1966
Colóquio unilateralmente sentimental, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1968

Compilations and Anthologies
Poesia e prosa, Rio de Janeiro: Aguilar, 1958
Estrela da vida inteira: poesias reunidas, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1965
Meus poemas preferidos, Rio de Janeiro: Edições de Ouro, 1966
Poesia completa e prosa, Rio de Janeiro: Aguilar, 1967
Anthologies in Translation
This Earth, That Sky: Poems by Manuel Bandeira, translated by Candace Slater, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988

Further Reading
Arriquicci, Jr, David, Humildade, paixão e morte. A poesia de Manuel Bandeira, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1990
Homenagem a Manuel Bandeira, Rio de Janeiro: Tipografia do Jornal do Comércio, 1936
Pontiero, Giovanni, Manuel Bandeira: visão geral de sua obra, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1986
Cuban ethnographer, poet and prose writer

Ethnographer and poet Miguel Barnet also became known as a prose writer after the appearance of his first two novels: Biografía de un cimarrón (The Autobiography of a Runaway Slave) in 1966, followed by Canción de Rachel (Rachel’s Song) in 1969. These narratives placed Barnet’s literature at the forefront of testimonial writing in Latin America, a literary tradition that had its roots in the chronicles of the conquest. In particular, Columbus’s and Bartolomé de Las Casas’s writings offered the earliest commentary on the newly “discovered” continent. Although of great epistemological value to this period of history, these accounts contributed greatly to the mythification of America because they were marked by authorial distortion and exaggeration. From as early as these first Spanish-language discourses, therefore, testimonial literature revealed itself as a fictionalization of everyday life in the Americas.

It is not coincidental that contemporary Latin American testimonial narrative first reappeared in earnest around the 1960s in Cuba. Factors such as a tradition of historical writing, and the emphasis that the Cuban Revolution of 1959 placed in the functional nature of literature contributed to the resurgence of the genre. Toward the end of the next decade, in contrast to earlier testimonials, these narratives no longer focused on the heroes of important historical events but on the everyday person. It is within this testimonial tradition, whose intention is the vindication of marginal human beings, voices without history, that we must place the work of Miguel Barnet.

Barnet has spoken at length in La fuente viva, 1983 [The Living Source] about the relationship testimonial narrative establishes between the producer of the text (author) and the narrator or historical witness, who is presented to the reader as the real author. The symbiosis reflects the ambivalence between reality and fiction, or more specifically in the testimonial novel, between historical memory and fiction. The question that comes back time and again regarding Barnet’s testimonial novel is whether the testimony of a witness trying to recall an event quite removed from the present time could be considered “factual.” If memory is not only subjected to the distortions of time but also corrupted by the perceptions the present effects upon the past, in what way, if any, is the contemporary testimonial novel more accurate in its portrayal of life than the colonial literary tradition that preceded it? In Biografía the narrative voice belongs to Esteban Montejo, a runaway slave Barnet had interviewed in preparation for the book. Much has been written regarding Montejo’s assumed authorial role as opposed to Barnet’s so-called “editorializing” of the memoirs (this reached an absurd extreme when the book actually appeared in English under Montejo’s name as author). As Roberto González Echevarría aptly puts it, the relationship between Montejo and Barnet is no more or no less complex than that of any author in relation to his character. While the reader may be asked to believe that the “real” voice in the memoirs is that of the old slave (or the synthesis of voices that make up the voices of Rachel) there can be little doubt that there is another voice in the text besides Montejo’s. Biografía and Canción de Rachel were followed by two other novels also within the testimonial tradition: Gallego, 1981 [Man from Galicia], a novel which examines, through the experiences of Manuel Ruiz, the painful immigration of many northern Spaniards to Cuba in the early part of the 20th century, and their difficult adaptation to their adoptive land; and La vida real, 1986 [Real Life], whose main character Julián Mesa, recalls with nostalgia his childhood in a poor and rural sugar-mill town, his subsequent escape to Havana, and then his final emigration to the United States, in the 1950s, in the hope of a better life. Aside from a unity of authorial intention and of structure (all the novels are supposedly based on interviews by the author and/or research on the period), there is also a nostalgia for the past which serves to give coherence to the narrative voices.

In La vida real, Barnet tried to “fill in the gaps of Cuban historiography,” by recording the memories of a Cuban exile living in New York City. By choosing as his narrator and “author” a poor hillbilly from the provinces, a mulatto as well as a political sympathizer of the Cuban Revolution, Barnet once again chose to portray the liminal voice of the underdog, otherwise ignored by official, historical accounts. As narrator and “creator” of the story, Julián Mesa recalls his childhood and youth in Cuba, a country that treated him as an exile already, as a marginal being. During the time of Julián’s actual physical exile in the United States, although his narrative voice is still predominant, Barnet’s authorial voice overtakes the narrative’s intention. By making certain dialogical associations between this text and the literature of Cuban exile of the past (and by extension of the present), Barnet manipulates the narrative in order to convey the notion that Cuban identity is to be found inside as well as outside its borders. There comes a point in the narrative, in which Julián’s testimony of real life and Barnet’s fictionalization of it (linguistically and thematically) are fused, rendering the difference and distance between author and producer practically meaningless. What remains, however, is the question of reality. Indeed, in the end, it falls on the reader to determine to what extent is the narrator real, and where if at all the lines of demarcation between life and fiction are actually to be found.

Barnet may have closed this cycle of historical novels with his most recent Oficio de ángel, 1989 [An Angel’s Craft]. Of a markedly different style from the others, Oficio explores the adolescence of a young man in Havana just prior to the Revolution of 1959. Unlike the testimonial novels, the narrator in Oficio is not a marginal being, nor is he presented to the reader as a subject of study. Notably absent from this narrative is the customary “foreword” by the author-interviewer as well as the confidential and conversational tone adopted by the narrators of the previous novels.

ANA GARCÍA CHICHESTER

See also entry on Testimonial Writing

Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, 28 January 1940, into a middle-class family. Educated at US schools in Havana. Student at School of Advertising at the start of the Cuban Revolution. Enrolled in seminar on ethnology in 1960 and, in 1961, began working as professor of folklore at the School of Art Instructors; continued there until 1966. Gained research experience at Institute of Ethnology and Folklore of Academy of Science where Fernando Ortiz (see separate entry) worked at that time. Latter’s interdisciplinary approach helped to nourish Barnet’s testimonial narrative. Barnet worked also at the Editorial Nacional, run in the early 1960s by Alejo Carpentier. He was a member at this time of the “El Puente” (The Bridge) group of poets, who took their name from a private publishing house of the same name which operated between 1960 and 1965. They published his second volume, Islas de güijes [Goblin Island]. But El Puente, another of whose leading members was Nancy Morejón, fell foul of the cultural police because it was thought that this group gave more importance to aesthetic than to ideological matters. As from 1968 life grew harsher for a “liberal” like Barnet, and he was silenced during the so-called “grey years” of the 1970s. But he, like others of his generation, began to thrive again as from the early 1980s, and was placed in charge of foreign affairs at the UNEAC (Union of Artists and Writers) in the mid-1980s when Lisandro Otero took over the presidency from Nicolás Guillén. Barnet also received a Guggenheim award to research his testimonial novel, La vida real [Real Life] and spent nine months in the US. Some of his works have been made into operas or films. Recipient of the Cuban Premio de la Crítica in 1984 and 1988; National Prize for Literature in 1994; holder of the Alejo Carpentier medal. Member of National Assembly.

Selected Works

Testimonial Writing and Novels

Gallego, Madrid: Alfaguara, 1981

La vida real, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1986

Oficio de ángel, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1989

Poetry

La piedra fina y el pavorreal, Havana: Union, 1963

Isla de güijes, Havana: El Puente, 1964

La sagrada familia, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1967

Orikis y otros poemas, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1980

Viendo mi vida pasar, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1987 [anthology]

Other Writings

La fuente viva, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1983 [essays on literature]

Claves por Rita Montaner, Matanzas: Cuba, 1987

Autógrafos cubanos, Havana: Union, 1990 [Short pieces on contemporary Cuban writers and popular entertainers]

Further Reading

Fernández Guerra, Ángel Luis, “Edipo y Cayo Graco (Para leer a Miguel Barnet,)” Casa de las Américas 30 (1990) [On Barnet’s poetry, and its influence on his narrative production]

García Chichester, Ana, “La intención unificadora en La vida real de Miguel Barnet,” in Critical Essays in Honor of María A. Salgado” Newark, New Jersey: Cuesta, 1994

Perus, Françoise, review article of La vida real, Revista Casa de las Américas 165 (1988)
Afonso Henriques de Lima Barreto 1881—1922,

Brazilian prose writer

It has become a commonplace to state that Lima Barreto was a marginalized figure in his own lifetime and forgotten thereafter, so that only in recent times has his importance been grudgingly recognized. Neither of these assertions is true, while the second in no way would have depended upon the first in any case. Lima Barreto’s first published novel was Recordações do escrivão Isaías Caminha, 1909 [Memoirs of the Registrar Isaías Caminha]. The fact that Lima Barreto’s name was already known in literary circles is borne out by the following anecdote. Earlier that same year, one of Brazil’s most eminent literary critics, Gonzaga Duque, having heard rumours that the young civil servant and occasional journalist was preparing a novel for publication, wrote to him enquiring whether or not this novel was Gonzaga de Sá. Vida e morte de M.J. Gonzaga de Sá, 1919 [Life and Death of Gonzaga de Sá]. The latter work was not published for another ten years, but when it finally was, it obtained second place “with honourable mention” in a Brazilian Book of the Year contest and glowing reviews. With hindsight, the other principal assertion concerning Lima Barreto remains at least partially correct: that his importance lies in his contribution towards the forming of a bridge between the age of Machado de Assis, the age of classic Realism in Brazil, and that of the Brazilian Modernist Movement that burst upon an unsuspecting Brazilian public in 192.2..

Lima Barreto undoubtedly occupies a preeminent position in the period that is customarily dubbed pré-modernista (preModernist)—the belle époque, World War I, and its immediate aftermath. Recordações [Recollections] is certainly a revolt against the serene and polished language and style of Machado de Assis, whom Lima Barreto affected to disdain but secretly admired. Lima’s Balzacian story of provincial lost illusions in the capital, with its mordant satire of the world of journalism and letters, is certainly a protest novel. In one sense, the book is a thinly veiled autobiography in its endeavour to treat the colour question in Brazil. The first-person narrator and protagonist is, like Lima, a young mulatto, failed student and apprentice journalist, who feels victimized and disdained by society because of his colour and lack of powerful friends; but this theme (the importance of which has been persistently overestimated by generations of critics) fades swiftly in the opening chapters after which Lima Barreto can give voice to his far more transcendent and profound preoccupation with the destiny of literature itself, the written word, as a force to move hearts and provoke awareness of the human condition in all its aspects. Rarely has the frightening power of the press to influence and manipulate the masses been more tellingly depicted in a work of prose fiction.

_Vida e morte de M.J. Gonza gade Sá_, written cotermin with _Recordações_, presents the other face of the same drama. The young mulatto narrator, one Augusto Machado, sets out to write the biography of his friend and mentor, Gonzaga de Sá, an aristocratic white civil servant who traces his lineage back to the very founder of Rio de Janeiro, Estácio de Sá, commander of the Portuguese forces that drove the French invaders from Guanabara Bay in 1557–59. The narrative begins with a description of Gonzaga’s death on the hillside above Rio and then retraces the crucial meetings between the sceptical old man and his young disciple, to whom he communicates before he dies his contempt for the Republic that arrived by _coup-d’etat_ in 1889, and his love for old, colonial Rio that in the early years of the 20th century was being systematically destroyed before Lima Barreto’s eyes. _Vida e morte_ is a strange amalgam of revolutionary polemic and nostalgic regret for the passing of an era. The novel is the quintessence of Lima Barreto’s complex and tragic vision of misery, poverty and death in a crumbling and alienating city.

To the themes of his first two works he adds treachery and man’s inhumanity to man in his best-known novel, _Triste fim de Policarpo Quaresma_, 1915 (The Patriot). Set during the chaotic aftermath of the fall of the Brazilian Monarchy in 1889, it tells of the vain endeavours and shattered dreams of the naïve patriot, Policarpo Quaresma, who loses his life in the civil war of 1891–95 when he protests to the dictator, Marshal Floriano, against the arbitrary execution of rebel prisoners. Again, intelligence and idealism are defeated by stupidity, egotism and greed. _Numa e a Ninfa_, 1915 [Numa and the Nymph], like _Triste fim_, a third-person narrative, transposes into a contemporary Brazilian setting Plutarch’s famous story: the Brazilian Numa is the archetypal, faceless, and mediocre politician manipulated by the Nymph (his intelligent wife Edgarda), and by her lover. Superficially, the novel is just one more cruel satire of political corruption in the Brazilian _belle époque_, but on a deeper level it reminds us of Lima Barreto’s overarching mission: a meditation on the destiny of the written word and human intelligence.

This meditation is sustained in his last years in the unfinished Cemitério dos vivos [The Cemetery of the Living], inspired by Dostoevsky’s House of the Dead, and in the posthumous novella, Clara dos Anjos, 1948 [Clara of the Angels]. This last is the completion of a project that Lima Barreto had on the stocks as early as 1904: a story of the sexual exploitation of a mulatta girl by white Brazilian society. The completed narrative shows us again how Lima had evolved as a novelist and commentator by the year of his death. While he never lost his sense of persecution on account of the colour of his skin, he exhibited again and again his compassion for and understanding of the whole of Brazil. His two most arresting protagonists, Gonzaga de Sá and Policarpo Quaresma, are both white; and in Clara dos Anjos, the plight of the poor and the forgotten of whatever race, creed or colour in the slums of Rio, is illuminated with deep pathos and humanity.

Admirer of the great European Realists though he was, especially of Tolstoy and Dostoevsky, Lima Barreto, like Machado de Assis before him, was no slavish imitator. He broke with the poise and solemnity of the previous generation, and with his more corrosive irony and an acute ear for the language of the street, pointed the way towards the Brazilian Modernist and post-Modernist fiction, poetry, and theatre of the mid-20th Like Machado de Assis, whose mantle he inherited whether he knew it or not, he achieved an acute analysis of Brazilian social and political history and was able to transmute this awareness into a series of short and longer fiction that now can be seen to contain telling metaphors and metonymies of early 20th-century Brazil. The isolation of Gonzaga’s house on the heights of Santa Teresa above the city of Rio de Janeiro and Quaresma’s smallholding in which he tries and fails to create the rural paradise that he is convinced is Brazil’s destiny, are metaphors that point us toward the disaster that Lima Barreto felt Brazilian republicanism had visited upon his countrymen. So is the library conserved by Fausto Carregal in memory of his father, a distinguished chemist, even though he finally admits to himself that neither he nor any of his family will ever read the erudite works it contains; and so, in a fit of despair, he douses the books with paraffin and sets them ablaze. In another short story, whose black humour and interpenetration of fantasy and reality anticipate magical realism, a mysterious alchemist convinces the entire population of a village that gold can be obtained from human bones. A gold fever of Californian intensity grips the villagers who proceed to sack the local cemetery, killing one another in their struggle to obtain the precious ingredients with which they hope to solve all their problems. “A Biblioteca” [The Library] and “A Nova California” (The New California) are two of the most moving stories that Lima Barreto wrote. His achievement in the short-story form is as uneven as in that of the novel; yet at his best he expresses as powerfully as any writer the New World has produced the tribulations and the problems of Latin America at the dawn of the 20th century.

R.J.OAKLEY

Biography

Born in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 1881. A mestizo of modest background, Lima Barreto spent his childhood on the Ilha do Governador, an island near his native Rio de Janeiro. Attended the prestigious Colegio Pedro II but was later unable to finish a course in engineering owing to lack of funds. Became a civil servant in Ministry of War. Looked after his father after latter lost his reason. Various pressures caused him to lead a dissipated life with the result that he died prematurely, in 1922.

Selected Works

Novels
- Recordações do escrivão Isaías Caminha, Lisbon: n.p., 1909
- Vida e morte de M.J.Gonzaga de Sá, São Paulo: Revista do Brasil, 1919
- Clara dos Anjos, Rio de Janeiro: Mérito, 1948

Short Fiction
- Histórias e sonhos, Rio de Janeiro: Gianlorenzo Schettino, 192.0
- Journalism (crônicas)

Journalism (crônicas)
- Bagatelas, Rio de Janeiro: Empresa de Romances Populares, 1923
- Feiras e mafuás, Rio de Janeiro: Mérito, 1953
Marginalia, Rio de Janeiro: Mérito, 1953

Other Writings
Os Bruzundagas, Rio de Janeiro: n.p., 1922. [humour]
Diário íntimo, São Paulo: Mérito, 1953 [memoirs]
Impressões de leitura, São Paulo: n.p., 1956
Um longo sonho do futuro; diários, cartas, entrevistas e confissões dispersas, Rio de Janeiro: Graphia, 1993

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading
Aiex, Anoar, As idéias socio-literárias de Lima Barreto, São Paulo: Vertice, 1990
Barbosa, Francisco de Assis, Aldebarana ou A vida de Lima Barreto (1881–1922), Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1952
Lins, Osman, Lima Barreto e o espaço romanesco, São Paulo: Ática, 1976
Marquês dos Santos, Afonso Carlos (editor), O Rio de Janeiro de Lima Barreto, Rio de Janeiro: Rioarte, 1983

Bibliographies
Nunes, Maria Luisa (editor), Lima Barreto, Bibliography and Translations, Boston: G.K.Hall, 1979 [bibliographic information is scant]

Rafael Barrett 1876–1910

Paraguayan journalist
It is in fact problematical to define Rafael Barrett’s nationality, since he was born in Spain and wrote for audiences in a number of South American and European countries.
No nation, however, has more claim to Barrett’s work than Paraguay, of which he wrote in El dolor paraguayo [Paraguay’s Pain]: “I do not feel the terror. I will speak. Nor should you lament that it is a foreigner who says these things. I am no foreigner…Truth and justice are not foreign in any corner of the world (‘Bajo el terror,’ [Under Terror]).” Though he resided in Paraguay for only five years, it was there that Barrett’s notions of social and economic justice took definitive shape as word and deed. It was there that El dolor paraguayo and Lo que son los yerbales [What the Mate Estates Are] flowed from his pen even as his activism on behalf of workers led to repeated episodes with the authorities.

To say this is not to diminish Barrett’s work elsewhere. Indeed, his clashes with the Paraguayan government led ironically to deeper involvements outside the country: he was deported for several months to Uruguay, where he found new readers for his stunning blend of passion and erudition. Wherever he went, in or out of Paraguay, Barrett showered the public with a remarkably diverse literary output. International affairs, the arts, religion, education, mathematics, science, the environment: all were subjects about which he wrote with eloquence and authority. Though his favorite genre was the short editorial essay, he also produced short stories, philosophical dialogues, lectures, and fantasies.

Beset by financial difficulties and terminally ill with tuberculosis—he died tragically in his mid-thirties—Barrett wrote with the conceptual consistency of one who has had little time to contradict himself. Indeed, it may be said that his poor health and hard times imposed on him an intellectual coherence rare in persons of such varied interests. Said he of his illness, “I have loved the unfortunate ever since I became one of them” (“La última primavera” [Final Springtime] in Cuentos breves [Brief Stories]). The philosophical basis of Barrett’s writing was the late 19th-century anarchism of the likes of Tolstoy and Anatole France, an intellectual anarchism which eschewed dynamite for the pen and sought to dismantle repressive structures through the free and egalitarian exchange of ideas. From this single concept flowed the vast and eddied stream of Barrett’s inquisitiveness, and the totality of his scorn for governmental, economic and religious authorities. Barrett disdained politics, including the democratic kind, and dreamt of a society in which the organizing institution was not government but the family. He thundered against the abuse of women and children, and his pleas for “family values” were a rare point of contact between him and his right-wing contemporaries. His notion of family differed sharply from theirs, however, in that he was, by the standards of his day, a feminist. In “El problema sexual” [The Sexual Problem], a speech to a group of Paraguayan workers, presumably all men, he called for the treatment of women as equal partners, for “where women are not respected and not loved, there can be no country, no liberty, no vigor, no movement.”

Implicit throughout Barrett’s work is the notion that values, not laws, are what creates good or evil in a society. The yerba mate workers, he wrote, would suffer even without the legal underpinning of oppression in Paraguay, because their bosses carried evil in their hearts (Lo que son los yerbales). Education is a farce where it fails to teach the love of justice (“Instrucción primaria” [Primary Education] in El dolor paraguayo), and Catholicism is a venal travesty of pristine Christian teaching (“El materialismo católico” [Catholic Materialism] in Mirando vivir [Watching Life]). Christ was something of an anarchist whose values are absent from the ecclesiastical shell that bears his name (El Genuine wealth, which is to say well-being, arises not from money or property, but from a value system, a belief in fairness, in freedom, in work, in service, and in the imagination.

Barrett’s loyalty to this set of ideas was nearly complete, but the instances where he does depart from it are worth mentioning. One notes, for example, a certain ambivalence in the matter of race. Barrett denounced lynchings in the United States (“Lynch” in Moralidades actuales [Current Moralities]) and cheered for black boxer Jack Johnson, yet we wonder what he means when he says that Johnson showed the possibility of black dominance over whites “in certain circumstances” (“Johnson” in Mirando vivir). Likewise the paucity of indigenous subjects in his writing about Paraguay seems curious in a country where Guarani is the majority language and monolingual Spanish speakers are a tiny minority. Not unrelated to this cultural “blind spot” is Barrett’s problematical attitude toward nature. At times his anarchist’s dream of unfettered human creativity seems at odds with his laments against environmental destruction, and he fails to articulate a meaningful ecological difference between anarchistic innovation and capitalistic “progress.”

It is, of course, a mistake to measure Barrett solely by the standards of a later time. Surely, by the yardstick of his own day he was an enlightened voice in these and many other matters. Whatever his inconsistencies on the subject of race, for instance, few of his contemporaries in journalism would have said as he did in “Johnson,” “Black, white?…What does it matter? It’s all an illusion of hatred.” Barrett’s renown as a purveyor of ideas, however, owes as much to his dazzling prose as to the ideas themselves. He imbibed the major writing styles of his day without sacrificing his own independence as a crafter of language. His short stories bear elements of Spanish American Modernismo, yet fall somehow outside the orbit of this movement. And his expository prose—the vast majority of his output—never overdoes its debt to French Naturalists and American muckrakers. Barrett was an original whose vast lexicon and rhetorical repertoire astound readers even today. Though his prose swings between ironic detachment and lofty accusation, it is probably in the latter vein that he is best remembered. “I have seen,” wrote Barrett in El dolor paraguayo, “que los peones ‘robustos’ no pasan dos semanas sin…diarrea o…fiebre. Pobre carne, herida hasta en el sexo, pobre carne morena y marchita…He visto los…pies de las madres, pies agrietados y…heroicos, buscar el sustento a lo largo de las sendas del cansancio…Y he visto a los niños…arrugados, que no ríen ni lloran, las larvas del silencio.” (“robust” peasants who cannot go two weeks without…diarrhoea or fever. Poor flesh, wounded even in its genitals, poor dark desiccated flesh…I have seen the cracked…heroic feet of mothers seeking food along paths of exhaustion…And I have seen…shriveled children who neither cry nor laugh, larvae of silence.” (Other “robust” peasants who cannot go two weeks without…diarrhoea or fever. Poor flesh, wounded even in its genitals, poor dark desiccated flesh…I have seen the cracked…heroic feet of mothers seeking food along paths of exhaustion…And I have seen…shriveled children who neither cry nor laugh, larvae of silence.” (“Lo que he visto” [What I Have Seen]). Lush with parallelisms, potent adjectives, haunting metaphors and many other devices, Barrett’s style has had the variety and vigor to withstand the unpredictable evolution of 20th-century tastes. More than a journalist, Barrett was a prophet who understood the power of language to project thought through time and whose articulation of the world’s ills remains contemporary today. Whether or not they agree with his prescriptions, generations of readers after Rafael Barrett’s death are sure to find his concerns uncannily like their own.

TRACY K.LEWIS
Biography

Selected Works

Journalism and Essays

El dolor paraguayo, Buenos Aires: “La Protesta,” 1909
Lo que son los yerbales, Montevideo: Talleres Gráficos “El Arte,” 1910
Moralidades actuales, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1910
Mirando vivir, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1912,
Al margen: críticas literarias y científicas, Montevideo: O.M. Bertani, 1912
Artículos diversos, San José, Costa Rica: Alsina, 1913 Ideas y críticas, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1915
El terror argentino, Buenos Aires: Proyección, 1971

Compilations and Anthologies

Cuentos breves, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1910
Diálogos, conversaciones y otros escritos, Montevideo: C.García, 1918
Cartas inocentes, Obras completas, Buenos Aires: Américalee, 1954
Conferencias, Obras completas, Buenos Aires: Américalee, 1954
Obras completas, Buenos Aires: Américalee, 1954 [Includes short story “El proprietario (cuento inocente)”]
Cartas íntimas, edited by Francisca López Maíz de Ba Montevideo: Biblioteca Artigas, 1967
Obras completas, Montevideo: Ediciones Populares para America Latina, 1988

Further Reading

Díaz-Pérez, Viriato, “Rafael Barrett, el periodista genial,” in his Ensayos II: notas, una conferencia sobre Rafael Barrett, Palma de Mallorca, Spain: Luis Ripoll, 1988
Forteza, J.R., Rafael Barrett: su obra, su prédica, su moral, Buenos Aires: Editorial Atlas, 1927
Maetzu, Ramiro de and Emilio Frugoni, Lo que son los yerbales paraguayos: semblanzas de Barrett, Montevideo: C.García, 1926
Marcos, Juan Manuel, “Un perfil sumergido del discurso barrettiano,” Río de la Plata: Culturas, Creteil, France, 3 (1986)
Massuh, Victor, En torno a Rafael Barrett, Tucumán, Argentina: Editorial La Raza, 1943
Lo que son los yerbales

Essay by Rafael Barrett

Though it is difficult to define Rafael Barrett’s literary career in terms of nationality, style and content, no such problem exists with respect to the powerful essay Lo que son los yerbales, Barrett’s unambiguous blast against worker exploitation in the production of yerba mate tea. Despite Barrett’s European upbringing and international literary production, Paraguayan intellectuals rightly regard Lo que son los yerbales as part of their own national literary heritage.

First published in June, 1908 as a series of articles for the Paraguayan newspaper El Diario, Lo que son los yerbales is considered by some to be one of Barrett’s crowning achievements. Certainly it has become a classic of Latin American editorial journalism. If the ideal of the genre is to render an accurate account of a specific, remediable circumstance, thereby stimulating public discourse, then Barrett’s essay must be judged a resounding success.

Barrett’s effort emerged indirectly from his admiration for the muckraking fiction of Zola and other naturalistic writers, as well as from his sympathy for anarchist movements on both sides of the Atlantic and his hatred for imperialist economics. Undoubtedly he saw the yerba mate industry as part of a global pattern. He was wise, however, to leave this theoretical framework unstated in Lo que son los yerbales and to concentrate instead on the concrete situation unfolding in the Alto Paraná region. In the decades prior to the article’s publication, powerful interests in Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay had consolidated their hold on yerba mate production in a large area of the upper Paraná basin, employing great numbers of Paraguayan campesinos in a condition of virtual slavery. Lo que son los yerbales details the deceptions employed in recruiting workers, the physical and economic methods of perpetuating their bondage, and the appalling conditions under which they labored. Here in the classic tradition of crusading journalism one reads of governmental collusion with the mate industry, of the cruel fraud of the anticipo tendered new workers “up front” to begin the process of indebtedness, of negligible wages and exorbitant prices at company stores to continue that process, of malnutrition and sleeping in the proximity of snakes, of beatings for failure to meet the day’s harvest quota, of the hopelessness of escape through miles of forest, of eventual death in the service of the company.

The degree of Barrett’s first-hand experience with the yerba mate industry is a matter of debate. Certainly, however, he was a well-known figure among the workers of other industries, and his participation in the labor unrest of June and July 1908 coincides with the publication of Lo que son los yerbales. Few would accuse this author of dilettantism, and fewer still have questioned the overall factual accuracy of his charges. At the interpretive level, of course, there is much more room for argument. One may wonder, for instance, at the wisdom of Barrett’s rhetoric against the forest itself, as if the snakes and vines were deliberate accomplices in the crimes he describes. And one may question his apparent optimism that his article would help provoke a solution to the problem: “Yo acuso de…homicidas a los administradores de la Industrial Paraguaya y de las demás empresas yerbales. Yo maldigo su dinero manchado en sangre, y yo les anuncio que no deshonrarán mucho tiempo más este desgraciado país.” (I denounce as…murderers the management of Industrial Paraguaya and the other yerba companies. I curse their money stained in blood. And I warn them that they shall not dishonor this wretched nation very much longer).

Lo que son los yerbales is a work of journalism, and it naturally sparks debate on these and other matters of “content.” One should not forget, however, that it is also a piece of literary art, as remarkable for its style as for its ideas. Indeed, without his singular expressiveness, it is doubtful that Barrett’s article would enjoy the reputation that it does. Lo que son los yerbales is a masterpiece of the propagandist’s art: sheer passion given the flesh of language. The detached, ironic voice of some of Barrett’s other writings is here discarded in favor of undisguised anger. Irony becomes sharp sarcasm and open accusation, replete with all the devices of the skilled polemicist: rhetorical questions (“Oh flesh shaken by lash…and jackboot…dark, somber flesh, what is there within you?”), parallelisms (“I denounce…I curse…I warn….”), surprising adjective-noun pairs (“opulent scum”), and unusual metaphors (“Paraguay has always been the great provisioner of flesh that sweats gold”). These and many other mechanisms are the stuff of Barrett’s eloquence, and a substantial reason why we remember him today.

Directly or indirectly, Lo que son los yerbales has had an undeniable impact on subsequent literature. Much, for example, of Augusto Roa Bastos’s Hijo de hombre (Son of Man) reads like a fictionalization of Barrett’s article, and one can only speculate on the degree to which Roa Bastos conceived his novel on the basis of the earlier piece. Likewise we may wonder at Barrett’s influence on José Eustasio Rivera’s La vorágine (The Vortex) and other fictional outcries against worker exploitation in the South American interior. Whether or not Roa Bastos and others had Barrett consciously in mind, there is no doubt that the author of Lo que son los yerbales helped create the atmosphere of protest in which they produced their work.

TRACY K. LEWIS

See also entries on José Eustasio Rivera, Augusto Roa Bastos

Note: See the main entry on Rafael Barret (above) for items of Further Reading.

Eduardo Barrios 1884–1963

Chilean prose writer and dramatist

During the last few years of his life, which coincided with the birth of the Boom novel in Latin America, and certainly in the post—Boom criticism of today, little attention has been paid to the works of so-called traditional novelists like Eduardo Barrios and Manuel Gálvez who in their time commanded the front pages of literary periodicals. Barrios, a prize-winning novelist in Chile, was something of an exception, in a sense, throughout the first half of the 20th century. While everyone around him was composing regional novels of the land, indigenous works of social protest, and historical works of revolutionary themes and motives, Barrios was producing novels written in the mould of what might be termed European philosophical fiction, following in the footsteps of his Romantic/Realist masters like Balzac, Flaubert, Galdós, even at times the naturalistic Zola—with the pessimistic ideas of Schopenhauer and Nietzsche also playing a part. Barrios, however, was never to forget the lessons about art which he learned from his modernista mentors.

As a product of his age, Barrios early gained a deserved reputation as a psychological novelist, for the penetrating studies of the human mind which characterised the work of his first trilogy, El niño que enloqueció de amor, 1915 [The Boy Who Went Mad with Love], Un perdido, 1918 [A Lost Soul] and El hermano asno, 1922, (Brother Asno). This important aspect of Barrios’s work has been well documented by scholars like Ned Davison and Vázquez-Bigi in the 1950s and 1960s. There is no doubt that Barrios was a shrewd analytical writer (in the school of Stendhal and Paul Bourget) who dissected the mysteries of the soul of the abnormal types who people his novels, as their titles indicate—locos, feos, perdidos, pobres diablos and the like. Clearly, though, literature is based on more than defective genes, the class struggle, and the law of evolution. Important as these psychological elements may be in Barrios’s work, like the few creole and social components also visible in his fiction, they do not constitute the most important level of his novels. In fact, they serve only as a pretext, as a background, for Barrios’s main concern, which is metaphysical, i.e., the human condition.

It is not a coincidence that the aforementioned Gálvez, a kindred spirit, should capture the essence of Barrios’s work in the prologue to Un perdido: “Yo creo que lo esencial en un novelista es su vision de la vida” (I think that the essential thing in a novelist is his view of life). In other words, beneath the surface of the apparent themes of Barrios—sexual repression (El hermano asno), excessive sentimentalism (Un perdido), childish abnormality and madness (El niño que enloqueció de amor), one finds a concern which transcends regional frontiers and chronological barriers. These texts reveal Barrios’s view of life and his changing perspective towards the metaphysical problems which manifest themselves in all his novels, from the first trilogy to the later works.

Although Del natural, 1907 [Drawn from Nature], his first published work, is poorly written, it is important because it contains in the story “Tirana Ley” [The Tyrannical Law] the seeds of his future works: the role of emotion and its function in the never-ending struggle between the heart and the brain; plus a modernista concern for art, and the metaphysical role of art in the struggle for life. In addition, one should mention the characterisation of his protagonist and his (Spanish) “Generation of 98” affinities with the abúlico/fuerte (weak/strong) contrast, the essence of Barrios’s future novels and the key to his metaphysical view of life. But Del natural was only a beautiful promise, and his mature work really begins with El niño que enloqueció del amor, which takes up the tone and the atmosphere of “Tirana ley,” that is, the tyrannical law of love. Rooted in the Romantic theme of love leading to madness, this short novel is a tragic study of a sensitive child whose weakness and sentimentality are not alleviated by Art. Like the protagonist of “Tirana ley.” The basic theme and the constant in all of Barrios’s work is the importance of emotion, especially as a motivating force which can, however, lead to tragedy: “La emoción es la esencia virtual de las cosas.” (Emotion is the virtual essence of things). “La emoción es el alma.” (Emotion is the soul). With penetrating analysis and linguistic skill, Barrios in El niño…produced a small masterpiece. But these are only techniques, and, as Sartre states, fictional techniques refer back to the writer’s metaphysics. It is the critics’ task to define the latter before evaluating the former. There is no doubt that Barrios in El niño …is already beginning to formulate a tragic view of life which was intensified in Un perdido, written very much in the Naturalist mode.

The protagonist, Luis Bernales, is a much more developed portrait of the type created in El niño…, a timid, sentimental boy tied to his mother’s apron-strings. With the death of beloved family members, his experiences in a military college confirm the determinist doctrines of his friend Blanco. Faced with the harshness of life, he takes refuge in the arms of prostitutes, in drugs and alcohol, and in a world of dreams and illusions. Without the complementary qualities of energy, action and will-power, and without the support of either religion or art, he follows the path of el niño, convinced of the absurdity and hostility of life. Barrios’s message, under the strong influence of Naturalism, is that life is tragic, especially for poor lost souls like Luis who follow their instincts in their search for emotional fulfilment. If Un perdido is less satisfactory aesthetically, it is more by excess than by default, since Barrios seems intent on hammering home the pessimistic view of life, seen in the works of Schopenhauer, Luis’s favourite reading.

With the publication of El hermano asno, Barrios reached the peak of his first period, both from the psychological and aesthetic points of view. Artistically superior to the earlier works, El hermano asno is linked to them metaphysically, since emotion tortments both protagonists, Fray Lázaro and Fray Rufino. With shrewd analysis and skilful development of the character of both monks, Barrios achieves a subtle and ironic reversal of their roles. Nevertheless, El hermano asno is still a tragedy in that the three main characters are indelibly marked, injustice seems to prevail, while an indifferent God looks on. El hermano asno confirms the constant theory of Barrios that emotion without discipline leads to tragedy, and that religion can be a valuable formative force in life. Although Un perdido was aesthetically unsatisfactory, if philosophically powerful, there is no doubt that El hermano asno was Barrios’s literary masterpiece. Always the conscious artist in a search (characteristic of his time) for a simple, transparent, diaphanous, musical style—“I would like to write without words,” he once stated—Barrios was to achieve that ideal completely only once in his literary career, in El hermano asno. In the autobiographical essay “También algo de mí,” 1923 [Also Something of Me], he sought to articulate his concerns on the theory of art and his work, as well as the religious role of art which can help to give meaning to life. In El hermano asno, Barrios was to produce that perfect fusion of content and form, that unique correspondence of effect and vehicle, which he was never able to emulate again completely, although some of the later novels achieve a high standard in parts. Yet he was never able again to match the sustained beauty, spirituality, and poetic simplicity of style which characterises El hermano asno.

After a quiet period of twenty years, devoted to politics, journalism and agricultural pursuits, Barrios broke his silence with the publication of Tamarugal, 1944 [Tamarugo Grove], an inferior novel of Chilean mining life. As always, the main theme is the role of emotion in the life of the three main characters. But now with two decades of experience and maturity, Barrios appears to be formulating a new philosophy of life, more balanced, less pessimistic, and less conducive to tragedy. Still searching for the elusive complementary qualities of strength, energy, and will-power to counterbalance the still desirable tenderness and religious sentiment, Barrios reveals a compromise through the composite portraits of his three main characters, who incarnate all the human qualities necessary for one whole fictional creation.

Four years later Gran señor y rajadiablos [Great Lord and Hell-raiser] appeared, at first glance a criollista novel, but more linked to the first trilogy than it appears, since it represents a further shift in sensibility on the part of Barrios. The key to the novel lies in the figure of the hero, Valverde, who manages to embody a certain balance in his character, thus preserving two opposite attitudes in his make-up without contradicting his psychological authenticity. After the faltering steps of Tamarugal, Barrios succeeds in incorporating in the protagonist the complementary and disciplinary qualities which his previous sentimental heroes lacked. The balance suggested by the title becomes more explicit in the prologue where Valverde is portrayed as “duro y tierno, serio y tarambana, democrático y feudal, rajadiablos...perogran señor” (Hard and tender, serious and wild, democratic and feudal, a hell-raiser...but a great Lord).

Two years after the publication of this apparently anachronistic and atypical novel of the land, Barrios takes up the theme again in Los hombres del hombre, 1950 [The Man within Man], a more analytical and psychological novel (in the spirit of the first trilogy), which underscores and completes the change in attitude and the metaphysical point of view expressed in Gran señor...By means of the two main characters, who are kindred spirits: an anguished, analytical father and a sensitive, artistic son, Barrios points to the link with the first trilogy and the evolution of his fictional creations in the second trilogy. The son, Charlie, makes the connection with Valverde and the early perdidos. Although sentimental and imaginative, Charlie is psychologically stable in the face of life’s problems. With the spiritual support of his father, and his capacity for self-evaluation, his imagination and sensibility are counterbalanced by his energy, action and will-power. Emotion, as always, is the key: “Sigue al instinto...yo me guío por mi ternura...vivimos de nuestras emociones...” (Follow your instincts...I am guided by my heart...we live by our emotions), but not without discipline. In his last novel, as in his first, Barrios does not abandon his belief in the role of emotion, nor his tragic view of life, but he does provide possible means of combating the hostility of the world, and so prevents the realisation of the tragic potential inherent in the character of his sensitive protagonists.

Although the driving force behind Barrios’s view of life was essentially Romantic, he never forgot the lessons of his modernista masters. Of course, Los hombres del hombre cannot match the overall artistic beauty of El hermano asno, but its poetic and sensorial prose captures the mood and tone of its refined protagonists. Here at the end of his creative career Barrios was looking for a way of making existence tolerable. This view of life becomes progressively clearer as one studies the novels from beginning to end. As a whole, they constitute a true expression of Barrios’s philosophy and present his metaphysical perspective, in aesthetic terms—no mean achievement for the underrated Chilean master.

JOHN WALKER
Biography

Selected Works

Novels
El niño que enloqueció de amor, Santiago de Chile: n.p., 1915
Un perdido, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Chilena, 1918
Tamarugal, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1944
Gran señor y rajadiblos, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe, 1948
Los hombres del hombre, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1950

Short Fiction
Del natural, Iquique, Chile: n.p., 1907
Páginas de un pobre diablo, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1923
Y la vida sigue, Buenos Aires: Tor, 1925

Compilations and Anthologies
Teatro escogido, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1947
Obras completas, 2 vols, introduction by Milton Russel, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1962

Further Reading

Barrios has not been well served by the critics over the last three decades and more. Apart from the sterling work of Ned J. Davison in the late 1950s and early 1960s, and Ángel Manuel Vázquez-Bigi in the 1960s (unpublished dissertation and several articles), both on the psychological values/truth in Barrios’s work, there has been little else of value, aside from Joel Hancock’s work (unpublished dissertation and a few articles) on Los hombres del hombre (compositional modes and sensorial prose).

——Eduardo Barrios, New York: Twayne, 1970
Lozada, Alfredo, Estudios críticos, Buenos Aires: El Cid Editor, 1978 [Chapter on El hermano asno]
Martínez Dacosta, Silvia, Dos ensayos literarios: sobre Eduardo Barrios y José Donoso, Miami: Universal, 1976
——Los personajes en la obra de Eduardo Barrios, New York: Senda Nueva de Ediciones, 1988
Morinigo, Mariano, Eduardo Barrios, novelista, Tucumán: Universidad Nacional de Tucumán, 1971

Carlos Germán Belli 1927–

Peruvian poet

Carlos Germán Belli is one of three or four candidates for Peru’s leading contemporary poet, along with Alejandro Romualdo, Javier Sologuren and perhaps Antonio Cisneros. What has attracted most attention about Belli’s work is his unique fusion of seeming disparate elements into a poetic style quite his own, which crosses space and time to connect the Spanish Golden Age (especially the Baroque) with the most contemporary and topical aspects of life in dreary Lima, itself portrayed as the polar opposite of the locus amoenus of pastoral poetry: locus horribilis, it has been called. The evolution of his body of work has moved from the more immediate and specific, often loosely autobiographical portrayal of dispossession and the unrelenting tedium of anonymous and underrewarded labor, in which the “I” is also middle-class (at times even under-class) Everyman, to an increasingly mystical portrayal of love and art as possible vehicles of transcendence. With this thematic shift, his language has moved away from its typical uses of parody and satire to portray disenchantment and frustration, to a more lyrical and dense imagery, allusive no longer to today’s Lima but to that longed-for time and place where, just possibly, the Absolute may finally be glimpsed. Belli’s poetry, then, moves from the ironic to the open expression of faith: from hopeless despair of change ever coming to his country or his own life, to the recurrent assurance that liberation can indeed happen, even if it takes the miracle of divine intervention.

Belli is also notable for his creation of an extensive and highly characteristic series of images and symbols, at times personal in their origins (allusions to family members and jobs he has held, for example). Reading Belli without sufficient context in both his own poetry and the Hispanic literary and cultural tradition can render initially difficult this web of unique signifiers. Let us take first some of Belli’s personal symbols: what or who, for example, are Alfonso-Anfriso, Fisco, or the “Cybernetic Goddess” (Hada Cibernética; the English rendering is the specific preference of the poet himself, to stress her supernatural nature)? Creations of the poet himself, unique to his work and decipherable only by the clues to be found in it. Fisco, as further reading uncovers, is the harsh and impersonal supervisor, a personification of the political, legal and economic system which keeps the anonymous worker under its thumb: all the forces and sources of oppression of daily life in a society still suffering from neocolonial and pseudo-feudal remnants. Alfonso—Belli’s brother, born with severe physical handicaps, rendered most frequently as “Anfriso”—is one of several Bellian images of the person whose fate is fore-ordained to be far less than what life seems to promise. Similar to Alfonso-Anfriso are the one-armed, cross-eyed, or otherwise physically deformed characters, with all of whom Belli often identifies: their exterior disabilities reflect his own interior, more spiritual, ones. The Cybernetic Goddess, until the emergence of the Lady (Señora, or “Filis”) who becomes its later incarnation, is the uplifting power of technology (the computer, quite specifically) to free this oppressed line-worker from menial and stultifying daily routine, meaningful to him only as a way to earn a living: and this, by the narrowest of margins. As over time the Cybernetic Goddess evolves into the Lady, such escape becomes increasingly divine in nature and more identified with Art (the Muse) and Love. While Belli is assuredly not a Marxist, Fisco can be read as confirmation of the enslavement of the middle class, as Marx perceived it: the Goddess/Lady/Muse, then, is a way out, not through social revolution but a revolution of the quality of life through liberation from the empty motions of every day.

Along with his own personal symbolic system, Belli also makes frequent use of the tropes typical of the Spanish Golden Age (Renaissance through Baroque, with a strong Italian influence). Some of these include many of his ways of representing the issue of conflict versus fulfilment (more on which later), such as the “sublunar” (the earthly and hence lowly, in contrast with the celestial); plants or animals seeking their Other (mate, support, destiny); the four directions, or material elements (earth, air, fire and water) and their three manifestations (animal, vegetable and mineral); symbols of class divisions: the amos and dueños [bosses or owners], who gluttonously devour mountains of fine delights (“bolos alimenticios”) while the poetic speaker must beg for crumbs.

Belli, then, rather contrary to the general tendency in recent Spanish American literature to write in ways increasingly more accessible to non-academic readers (Rosario Castellanos, Nicanor Parra, Ernesto Cardenal), elaborates a language quite as challenging and complex as the system of sometimes-private symbols he uses, which are often rather obscure to the reader lacking a relatively solid grounding in the Hispanic (and even Italian) literary heritage. He is in large measure a “poet’s poet”: a term which should not be taken as disparagement, for the same may be said about many of the Hispanic world’s greatest writers: Góngora, Quevedo, Calderón or Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, during the Golden Age, or Carpentier, Cortázar and Borges more recently). This very tension between intellectual elitism and populism is another and striking characteristic of Belli’s style (although in his more recent neo-mystical verse the populist aspect is played down). One notable instance of this daring con-fusion is “Menú,” which suggests that the ingredients of a humble stew, once eaten, ask the enduring questions of philosophers: “de dónde vienen / por qué están allí / hacia dónde van” (from where do they come, why are they there / where will they go). Aside from the doubly scatological implications of the unstated answer, the poem pokes fun at Rubén Darío’s famous poem of metaphysical frustration “Lo fatal.”

Belli’s verse is complex and rich: a literary tour through both the Golden Age and our own, be it of lead or leftovers. This complexity should be taken as part of what he offers his reader, just as Baroque art exalts the reader (or hearer or viewer) precisely through this quality. One issue may be seen as a useful clue in reading him, for it marks all his poetry, and under it are subsumed all his more specific tropes: conflict and fulfilment. Belli questions whether the divisions and fragmentations he finds everywhere and in all times must really be permanent; whether there cannot be some way to transcend them; whether we cannot, as individuals and as societies, become more than we have thus far been. If we cannot, the world is ridiculous, perhaps a game the gods play to laugh at us but in which we must participate because there is no other. But if we can, perhaps we can finally find fulfillment and joy, in an elusive “Pedazo de Edén” [Piece of Eden]; and possibly “Los talleres del tiempo” [Time’s Workshop] will at last produce, as Belli has in his poetry, a jewel of great value.

PAUL W. BORGESON, JR

Biography

Born in Lima, Peru, 15 September 1927. Spent part of his childhood in Amsterdam. Attended Colegio Italiano, Lima. Doctorate on poet Carlos Oquendo de Amat from the University of San Marcos, Lima, where he is a professor; also literary translator. Worked for over twenty years for the Peruvian Senate, transcribing official documents. Recipient of Guggenheim awards in 1969 and 1977. Member of the Peruvian Academy of the Language. Has participated in International Writers’ Program at University of Iowa and attended poetry festivals in Toronto, New Delhi and Florence. Recipient of National Poetry Prize, 1962, and the Civic Medal of the Municipality of Lima, 1986.

Selected Works

Poetry
Poemas, Lima: privately printed, 1958 [Limited edition of 2.00 copies]
Dentro & fuera, Lima: Ediciones de la Escuela Normal de Bellas Artes / La Rama Florida, 1960
[Limited edition of 300 copies]
¡Oh, Hada Cibernética!, Lima: El Timonel, 1961
El pie sobre el cuello, Lima: La Rama Florida, 1964
Por el monte abajo: Poemas, Lima: La Rama Florida, 1966
Sextinas y otros poemas, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1970
En alabanza del bolo alimenticio, Mexico City: Premiá Editora, 1979
Canciones y otros poemas, Mexico City: Premiá Editora, 1979
Más que señora humana, Lima: Ediciones del Tapir, 1986; re-titled Bajo el sol de la medianoche rojo, Mexico City: Premiá, 1990
El buen mudar, Madrid: Ediciones del Tapir, 1986 [prose and verse]
En el restante tiempo terrenal, Madrid: Editorial Perla, 1988

Compilations and Anthologies
Further Reading

Higgins, James, Hitos de la poesía peruana siglo XX, Lima: Milla Batres, 1993 [Section on Belli’s poetry in chapter 3]
Hill, W.Nick, Tradición y modernidad en la poesía de Carlos Germán Belli, Madrid: Pliegos, 1985

Interviews

En Bética no bella

Poem from ¡Oh, Hada Cibernética! by Carlos Germán Belli

Ya calo, crudos zagales desta Bética no bella, mi materia, y me doy cuenta que de abolladuras ornado estoy por faenas que me habéis señalado tan sólo a mí y a nadie más ¿por qué?;
mas del corzo la priesa privativa ante el venablo, yo no podré haber, o que el seso se me huya de sus arcas por el cerúleos claustro, pues entonces ni un olmo habría donde granjear la sombra para Filis, o a mis vástagos.
o a Anfriso tullido, hermano mío;
pero no cejaré, no, aunque no escriba ni copule ni baile en esta Bética

no bella, en donde tantos años vivo

[I now descry, coarse shepherds of this Betis/unlovely, my substance, and become aware/that I am adorned with bruises/acquired in tasks you have assigned me,/ only to me and to none other: Why?;/but the speed of the stag/fleeing the lance I can n’er possess,/nor will my brain flee its box/for the cerulean cloister, for then /there would be no elmtree under which to gather/ shade for Filis, nor my offspring,/nor my brother, crippled Anfriso;/but no, I shall not yield, though I not write,/copulate nor dance in this Betis/unlovely, wherein so long I dwell]

These blank hendecasyllables well typify the poet’s style, themes and overall esthetic stance, and thus offer an appropriate introduction to Belli’s poetry. We may begin by observing some characteristic aspects of Belli’s use of poetic language, most obviously perhaps the use of now-archaic vocabulary and syntax: “calo” (descry), “zagales,” “desta” (“de esta” in contemporary Spanish), the use of “venablo” for lance, “cejar,” “haber” (to have) for the expected “tener,” etc. The imagery is also allusive to the pastoral poetry associated with Renaissance and Baroque Spain and imitated, of course, in the early Spanish American colony: the use of shepherds; Betis (Andalusia, image of the rustic locus ameonus of idyllic pasturelands in many Spanish poets of the time); the elm (symbol of reliable solidity and loyalty), the cerulean cloister (heaven/s) and the “brainbox.” Since the context of this poem is not 17th-century Andalusia but the Lima of Belli’s day, we then have a tension of time and place: the idealized Andalusia of the 17th century serves as a bitterly ironic reflection of the repugnance the poet feels toward his 20th-century life in Lima. Lima, then, is “anti-Betis,” as Belli’s critics have called it; the figure of the poet, encumbered with ridiculous, tedious and thankless jobs, is an “antishepherd,” having neither natural beauty, innocent shepherdesses nor the music of his flute to fill his free time, for he has none of these. All the bucolic imagery serves only to to name that which the poet does not enjoy, that for which he longs but of whose acquisition he has no real hope, since he lacks the ability to flee like a stag and cannot take the escape of death because he is obligated by family responsibilities (“Filis,” his lover-wife, and his brother “Anfriso,” a figuration of Belli’s real brother Alfonso).

Just as the language of the lovely conflicts with the dull and soul-killing reality of the poet’s life, his aspirations—love (couple), pleasure (dance), art (writing)—conflict with social and economic reality. Hence this poem contains a double irony: just as the poets of the Renaissance were certainly not “shepherds” (they were increasingly citified as the knight-errant evolved into the gentleman of the court), so that the pastoral tradition in Spain was an inverted parody and rejection of life in the metropolis, Belli doubly criticizes life in Lima. Just as Andalusia seemed Arcadian to the sophisticated Madrid court, so this setting appears doubly preferable to Belli’s Lima. (Note that Lima’s “shepherds” are described as coarse, rather than the expected “gentle” or “sweet”). It is not only not the bucolic image of Betis, it is not even the Renaissance court of Madrid. His rejection and repugnance, then, are redoubled; and even this seemingly-escapist art provides no real compensation, for it is never, and cannot be, an adequate compensation for his multiple frustrations and alienation since it must always fall short of the perfection he seeks—and it can never really change his life, inextricably shackled by the material.

The closure of “Betis Unlovely” marks this poem as one of a smallish group of poems of resistance (Belli is often more pessimistic and resigned). In this sense one may call it “antiheroic” or “anti-epic.” While the voice is fully cognizant that he is trapped, in this piece he does not give up, although the temptation to do so, in the form of suicide, does present itself. Yet the determination to persist is not really heroic, since the motivation comes not from within himself but from outside, in the form of those dependent on him. He is a reluctant and hence unheroic victim because such sacrifice is imposed, as the definitive slamming shut of the trap of modern life.

Belli, as in this poem, is rarely rebellious and never revolutionary. Most often, his poetic figure is a pseudo-Christological metaphor for meaningless suffering, endless isolation and tedium, an on-going sacrifice which lacks the apocalyptic promise of true ritual or metaphysical escape or compensation alike. He is one of many oppressed by a socio-economic structure lacking any cosmic meaning, functioning to create pain with no hope of release nor meaning to it. Thus the final words, “I live,” become themselves ironic, and cypher the bitter irony underlying the entire conception and explicit content of this, and many other, Belli poems.

A last observation should be made, to contextualize properly Belli’s unique fusion of times, places, motifs and themes. There is one partial compensation to life, even though it is less than fully satisfying and at times even discarded by Belli: that of treating the creation of art itself as a serious game. Indeed, the laborious creation of such complex verses—he cultivates with particular success and pleasure such demanding verseforms as the sestina—suggests that both poet and reader may, even when convinced that life is merely an affirmation of the absurd, find a measure of compensation in the cyphering and decyphering of a highly-coded and conventionalized art form, which itself becomes a meeting-ground for both. Neither he, in the game of writing, nor we, in ours of reading—the ludic attitude of much Baroque art should be remembered here are likely to change our lives, he tells us: but perhaps, as in the narratives of Garcia Márquez (whose existential attitude is comparable), we can at least have some fun together while we’re around. And, if we are lucky, we may with Belli give voice to our place and time, and our community with our others.

PAUL W.BORGESON, JR
Poem translated by Paul W.Borgeson, Jr

Editions

First edition: ¡Oh, Hada Cibernética!, Lima: El Timonel, 1961
Further Reading

Gioconda Belli 1948–

Nicaraguan poet and novelist

One of the fruits of the Revolution in Nicaragua was the emergence of several fine women poets, among them Gioconda Belli. During the decade of insurrection preceding the Sandinista triumph in 1979, Belli wrote award-winning feminist and revolutionary poetry. Although she dedicated herself to writing poetry for nearly two decades—she published five collections between 1974 and 1991—in the late 1980s—Belli turned her poetic sensibility to the novel. Since then, she has published two successful novels and is presently completing a third one. Belli’s unusual success as a poet and transition to novelist can best be understood within the context of recent political events in Nicaragua.

Thematically, Belli’s poetry shares many characteristics with the works of other contemporary Nicaraguan female poets. According to the poet Daisy Zamora, in the introduction to her anthology La mujer nicaragüense en la poesía, 1992. [The Nicaraguan Woman in Poetry], these poets exalt the human body, celebrate sensuality and sexuality, and glorify social protest and revolution. Zamora also calls attention to the testimonial nature of many of the poems by Nicaraguan women poets, specifically, the use of the first person.

The poems of Belli’s first collection, Sobre la grama, 1974 [On the Grass], explore the marvels of the female body, maternity, and sexual desire. In poems such as “Menstruación” [Menstruation], “Maternidad II” [Maternity II] and “Parto” [Childbirth], the poet celebrates the nature of her womanhood. Through her intimist approach, Belli reveals the extraordinary aspects of the ordinary. She addresses the revolutionary struggle in her second book, Línea de fuego, 1978 [Line of Fire], which she dedicated to her friends of the Sandinista National Liberation Front. In poems like “Hasta que seamos libres” [Until We Are Free], “Seremos nuevos” [We Shall Be New], and “Amo a los hombres y les canto” [I Love Men and Sing of Them], she praises and idealizes the revolutionary struggle and announces the advent of a new country of free men and women. Her third and fourth books of poetry, Truenos y arco iris, 1982 [Thunder and Rainbow], and De la costilla de Eva, 1986 (From Eve’s Rib), consist of poems written after the triumph of the Revolution during the period of national reconstruction and the Contra War. Although Belli continues to write intimist poems, she focuses here on the tasks of protecting the Revolution and constructing a new society. Her fifth book of poetry, El ojo de la mujer, 1991 [Woman’s Eye], is an anthology of her previous books and other poems written between 1976 and 1991.

José Coronel Urtecho, one of Nicaragua’s finest poets of this century, praised Belli’s poetry with the following words: “Those who read this book of poems by Gioconda Belli and do not achieve an immediate knowledge, the direct experience of what poetry is, should give up all hope—lasciate ogni speranza—of ever knowing it.”

Since the late 1980s, Belli has dedicated herself almost exclusively to the novel and has written little poetry. Her transition from poet to novelist is somewhat of an anomaly in Nicaragua, a country which since the time of Rubén Darío has produced many fine poets. Although Nicaragua has been known principally as “a land of poets,” many novels have been written by Nicaraguans. However, as a genre the novel has been undervalued and has received little critical attention. In addition, Nicaragua has had few women novelists. At present, Gioconda Belli, Rosario Aguilar, and Mónica Zalaquett are the country’s only female novelists. Therefore, Belli’s commitment to the novel is an important development in contemporary Nicaraguan literature.

Belli’s novels contain many of the themes she exploited earlier in her poetry. Her first novel, La mujer habitada, 1988 (The Inhabited Woman), deals with the incorporation of a bourgeois professional woman, an architect, into the revolutionary movement in the 1970s. Belli presents a contemporary female protagonist involved in a struggle for political and sexual liberation, one that for the author is rooted deeply in Central American history. Belli also employs a parallel story of a Mayan woman’s struggle against the Spanish conquest to demonstrate the continuities of the political struggle in Central America and the limitations imposed by two distinct societies on women’s participation in the defense of their cultures. This novel contains many autobiographical elements and shares some characteristics with the testimonial literature produced in Nicaragua after the Revolution. Translations of La mujer habitada have appeared in English and several European languages, and the German edition has been a best-seller.

In Belli’s second novel, Sofía de los presagios, 1990 [Sofía of the Prophecies], the political struggle as theme is secondary to women’s liberation. Through the life of Sofía, a gypsy girl who is separated from her parents at an early age and is raised by an elderly couple in Diría, Nicaragua, Belli explores the dynamics of sexual oppression in Nicaraguan society. Sofía feels she is trapped in circular time, reliving the experiences of her mother’s life. She experiences both sides of sexual power struggles. At first she is a victim in sexual relations, but then she uses her sexual power to victimize men. In the end, she is liberated from this power struggle through her love for her daughter.

Belli’s emphasis on feminist themes in her novels is reminiscent of her early poetry of the 1970s, before political events in Nicaragua came to dominate her texts. Her political commitment to Sandinismo was almost absolute. During the early 1980s, Belli, like many Nicaraguan writers, believed that literature had to serve the Revolution. She, like them, is currently reevaluating the relationship of literature to society. It is not surprising that both Feminist and Marxist critics encounter what they perceive as contradictions in many of the views presented in Belli’s poetry. Greg Dawes, for example, states in Aesthetics and Revolution: Nicaraguan Poetry, 1979–1990: “Feminism’s engagement with revolution, is not, however, without contradictions in Belli’s poetry. They include the “militarization” of some of her erotic verses, as well as an awkward attitude toward reproduction.” It could be argued, however, that these contradictions, which may be the result of her individual subjective experience, give Belli’s poetry its power.

Without question, part of Belli’s literary success in the 1980s was tied to political events in Nicaragua. Although she has demonstrated considerable talent as a poet and novelist, her work has been promoted for political motives, inside Nicaragua as well as in Europe and the United States, by groups and individuals sympathetic to the Sandinista cause. While it is possible that the demise of the revolutionary government and subsequent internal conflicts within the Sandinista National Liberation Front might diminish the amount of attention Belli’s works receive in the future from certain quarters, she has unquestionably produced original, powerful texts that have enriched Nicaraguan literature and are worthy of admiration and study.

EDWARD WATERS HOOD

Biography

Born in 1948. The daughter of wealthy parents, she was educated in the US and Europe. Married at the age of eighteen, making what her parents perceived as “a good match.” Had two children and worked in an advertising agency in Managua. Began to publish poetry in La Prensa Literaria in 1970. Became involved with the FSLN (Sandinista Front for the Liberation of Nicaragua) and this led to the breakdown of her marriage and to her being forced into exile. Worked on behalf of the Sandinistas in Mexico and Costa Rica and visited Europe to raise funds for them. After the fall of the dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979, she returned to Nicaragua and worked in communications for the Ministry of Propaganda. Has lived in Los Angeles since the mid-1990s. Awarded the Mariano Fiallos Gil Prize of the National Autonomous University of Nicaragua, 1972 and the Casa de las Américas Prize for Poetry, 1978.

Selected Works

Poetry
Sobre la grama, Managua: INDESA, 1974
Línea de fuego, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1978
Truenos y arco iris, Managua: Nueva Nicaragua, 1982

Anthologies of Poetry
Amor insurrecto, Managua: Nueva Nicaragua, 1984
Poesía reunida, Mexico City: Diana, 1989
El ojo de la mujer, Managua: Nueva Nicaragua, 1991

Novels
Sofía de los presagios, Managua: Vanguardia, 1990

Further Reading

Beverley, John and Marc Zimmerman, Literature and Politics in the Central American Revolutions, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990 [Chapter 4, “Nicaraguan Poetry of the Insurrection and Reconstruction,” provides some treatment of Belli’s poetry]

——“Engendering the Political Novel: Gioconda Belli’s La mujer habitada, in Women Writers in Twentieth Century Spain and Spanish America, edited by Catherine Davies, Lampeter, Wales: Edwin Mellen Press, 1993

Rodríguez, Ileana, House/Garden/Nation: Space, Gender, and Ethnicity in Post-Colonial Latin American Literatures by Women, translated by Rodríguez and Robert Carr, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1994 [Chapter 6 is on Belli’s fiction]

Interviews

Randall, Margaret (editor), Risking a Somersault in the Air: Conversations with Nicaraguan Writers, Willimantic, Connecticut: Curbstone Press, 1984 [Includes interview with Belli]

Andrés Bello 1781–1865

Venezuelan writer, statesman and man of ideas

The life and career of Andrés Bello present us with numerous aspects worthy of consideration. He was a man of science, a thinker, politician, legal consultant, philosopher, grammarian, legislator, historian, journalist, and translator. Critics have been unanimous in according him the most prestigious epithets: “prince of South American humanists,” “wise,” among others. An interesting biographical fact is that he was Simon Bolívar’s teacher and that he guided the latter towards the disciplines of geography and literature. He was very enthusiastic about learning languages and he cultivated the natural sciences.

While he was in his own country he wrote a few poems, a summary of the Historia de Venezuela and some other texts which subsequently were lost. When he moved to London in 1810, his writing acquired a different character. His sensitivity was refined in exile, where he mastered Spanish more thoroughly. That is when he completed his training and did important journalistic work. He published the two silvas (the title refers to a particular poetic form) and erudite essays on literary subjects, which circulated among critics and writers.

In 1823, jointly with Juan García del Río and Luis López Méndez he edited the journal Biblioteca Americana or Miscelánea de Literatura, Artes y Ciencias, whose existence was short-lived. In the first volume, consisting of 472 pages, there began to appear the works of this vastly knowledgeable writer on a wide variety of subjects; at once the humanist of profound erudition and the writer and poet with a clear and brilliant style. It was in this journal that he published his Alocución a la poesía [Address to Poetry], with a geographical and historical theme, containing a light descriptive passage, which acts as a link to introduce the longest part of the work. In the first fragment, which extends to verse 447, he inserts praise of the outstanding South American peoples and heroes from the Wars of Independence (songs addressed to Bolívar, Paez, Miranda, and others) in different regions of South America. The poem is a South American profession of faith, written on the basis of classical and Spanish reminiscences, with a poetic and social intention.

In 1826 he published another journal, El Repertorio Americano. In its first 320-page edition, we find another essay on pages seven to eighteen, also in silyva form, which opens the section entitled “Humanidades y Artes liberales.” Under the general heading of “Silvas americanas,” the following title appears: Silva I. La agricultura de la zona tórrida [Silva I. The Agriculture of the Torrid Zone]. This other silyva, a more powerful and coherent work than the previous one, is Virgilian by its title but the fragment is only partly georgic. It consists of expressive stanzas with which he describes the natural beauties of the torrid region of South America. In this way his work is almost epic, as well as geographical and historical, descriptive and moral.

Bello was not a prolific poet. He worked hard on his stanzas refining them carefully, deleting mannerisms which would reduce their delicacy. In musical stanzas of great suppleness he blends philosophy, science, and poetry and the grandeur of the luscious nature of the tropics, loaded with “local colour,” the attractiveness of the South American world, the charms of the countryside, to which the poet recommends a return. After the War of Independence, facing a time of reconstruction, he depicts the wondrous nature of peace. He exhorts South Americans to forget heroism in favour of dignifying work on the land, the source of prosperity.

Those two silyvas laid the foundations of and immortalized his fame as a descriptive poet. They contain passages where he allows the pain and sadness of exile, when memories of his native land overwhelmed him with grief, to be discerned. There are passages of elegiac quality but full of gentle fortitude. He never achieved his intention of writing a long poem—America - perhaps because he felt that, although so popular in earlier centuries, well into the 19th century, the time for great epic poetry had long passed.

In spite of his objectivity and a certain tone with a didactic tendency, in the descriptive and narrative passages all the stanzas come over tinted with a purely subjective lyricism. This characteristic makes the silyvas truly original, although echoes of famous poems resound in them. In Bello, the poet and critic follow a parallel path, beginning in his youth and continuing until the end of his life. His works on the literary origins of the Middle Ages are outstanding (such as his research on the Poema del Cid) and among the foremost in the Spanish language. His artistic theory is based on “the innate feeling of the beauty that is in man”: art is a means of reaching that beauty.

With regard to the set of philological works, with the analytical school of the 18th century the Análisis ideológico de los tiempos de la conjugación castellana [An Ideological Ana of the Tenses in Castilian Conjugation] is considered the most original and profound of his linguistic studies.

Principios del derecho de gentes, 1832 [People’s Rights] consolidated his authority and prestige both within his own country and abroad. In this book he displays his anxiety about the balance and fortune of “the recently emancipated countries” and drew up wise rules of conduct which they should adopt in order to gain the respect of the imperialist powers. The Gramática de la lengua castellana, 1847 [Grammar of the Castilian Tongue] brought him well-deserved fame and is considered the most important of his scientific works.

The corruption of the language worried Bello, as well as excessive neologisms, which would convert Spanish into dialects characteristic of each part of the Continent. He believed the preservation of the unity and purity of the language was the most powerful fraternal bond among Spanish Americans. That is why he used to say that his Gramática “was destined for the use of Americans.” It was Bolívar’s ideal of the unity of the hemisphere which Bello took from the political to the spiritual sphere; he also freed Spanish grammar from the obligation to respect Latin grammar. The source of linguistic correctness is popular usage: “the true and only architect of languages.”

Among his translations, Victor Hugo’s “La oración por todos” [A Prayer for All] is worthy of mention, considered by many critics as being better than the original.

A descriptive poet par excellence of the Hispanic literary canon, an uncompromising poet, his work, of a manifold character, can be considered as a poetic declaration of independence, proclaiming that the time had come for Latin Americans to free themselves from subjection to Iberian literature. Classical by education, steeped in a secure culture, he opposed dogmatism and the imitative approach with flexibility and a generous spirit. A characteristic of his work is balance: he blended innovation with tradition, Classicism and Romanticism, his imagination curbed by a sense of restraint. He longed to achieve beauty, without conventionalities, accepting Romanticism as long as it did not alter universal artistic principles.

BELLA JOZEF
translated by Patrici a James

Biography

Born in Caracas, Venezuela, 29 November 1781. Parents belonged to petty bourgeoisie. Privately educated until he entered the Royal and Pontifical University of Caracas. Graduated in 1800 and became officer of the Spanish Crown; also found time for journalism, becoming the editor of the first Caracas newspaper, La Gaceta de Caracas, in 1808. In 1810 sent to London as Secretary of a diplomatic mission intent on securing Britain’s neutrality in the War of Independence against Spain. Unbeknown to Bello, his exile was to be permanent. Endured real poverty in London where, in 1821, he also lost his first wife, Ann Boyland whom he had married in 1814. Lived in London from 1810 to 1829. Appointed Secretary to Chilean Legation in 1822 and later (1824) to Colombian Charge d’Affaires. In that year he married Isabel Antonia Dunn. Founding editor of the Biblioteca Americana (1823) and of the Repertorio Americano, 1826–27, both published in London. Appointed member of Venezuelan National Academy in 1826. Straitened circumstances obliged him in 1829 to settle in Chile where he had been offered the position of Senior Official in the Ministry of Finance. From 1830, he held a post in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Edited El Araucano, 1830–53. Senator of the Chilean Republic, 1837–55; rector of the University of Chile from 1843. Honorary member of the Royal Spanish Academy, 1851. Criticized for serving an oligarchical regime. Endured much personal suffering; outlived eight of his children. Died on 15 October 1865.

Selected Works

El calendario manual y guía universal de forasteros en Venezuela para el año 1810, Caracas: n.p., 1810
Principios del derecho degentes, Santiago de Chile, n.p., 1832
Principios de ortología y métrica de la lengua castellana, Santiago de Chile: Opinion, 1835
El incendio de la Compañía: canto elegíaco, Santiago de Chile: n.p., 1841
Análisis ideológico de los tiempos de la conjugación castellana, Valparaíso, Chile: Rivadeneyra, 1841
Compendio de gramática castellana escrita para el uso de las escuelas primarias, Santiago de Chile: Morales, 1841
Instituciones de derecho romano, Santiago de Chile: Crepúsculo, 1843
Proyecto de Código civil (1841–1845), Santiago de Chile: n.p., 1846
Gramática de la lengua castellana destinada al uso de los americanos, Santiago de Chile: Cuervo, 1847
Discurso pronunciado…en la instalación de la Universidad de Chile el día 17 de septiembre de 1843, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta de la Sociedad, 1848
Cosmografía, o descripción del universo conforme a los últimos descubrimientos, Santiago de Chile: Opinion, 1848
Compendio de historia de la literatura, Santiago de Chile: Chilena, 1850 Filosofía del entendimiento, Santiago de Chile: Ramírez, 1881; as Philosophy of the Understanding, translated by O. Carlos Stoetzer, Washington, DC: General Secretariat, Organisation of American States, 1984
Gramática castellana, Santiago de Chile: Dirección General de Prisiones, 1937

Compilations and Anthologies
Colección de poesías originales por Andrés Bello, Caracas: Torres Caicedo, 1870
Obras completas, 15 vols, Santiago de Chile: Consejo de Instrucción Pública, 1881–93 Obras completas, 26 vols, Caracas: La Casa de Bello, 1981–86

Translations
Further Reading

Álvarez, O., Labor periodística de Andrés Bello, Caracas: Casa de Bello, 1981
Amunátegui (Aldunate), Miguel Luis, Vida de Don Andrés Bello, Santiago de Chile: Ramírez, 1882
Balbín de Unquera, Antonio, Andrés Bello: suépocay Madrid: Imprenta de los hijos de M.G.Hernández, 1910
Brewer-Carías, Allan R., La concepción del estado en la obras deo Andrés Bello, Madrid: Instituto de Estudios de Administración Local, 1983
Fernández Larraín, Sergio, Cartas a Bello en Londres, 1810–1829, Santiago de Chile: Andrés Bello, 1978
Lynch, John (editor), Andrés Bello: the London Years, Richmond, Surrey: Richmond Publications, 1982
Rodríguez Monegal, Emir, El otro Andrés Bello, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1969

Mario Benedetti 1920–

Uruguayan prose writer, dramatist and poet

Mario Benedetti has cultivated all the literary genres, being the author of novels, short stories, poems, plays, newspaper articles, essays, humorous writing and lyrics for songs. And in all of them he has developed an outlook and critical perspective which at the beginning of his career was centered on Uruguay and Uruguayan problems, but at a later stage shifted into the international arena. His support of the Cuban Revolution has been unwavering and he spent several years of his life in the island. The United States has always been a target for both analysis and criticism (the latter as much on account of the government’s foreign policy as for its history of racism, individualism and consumerism as ways of life).

Benedetti’s literary career may be divided into two phases: the first begins around 1945 with the poetry collection La vispera indeleble [The Indelible Eve] and expands into narrative with the novel Quién de nosotros, 1953 [Who Among Us], the short stories of Montevideanos, 1959 [People of Montevideo], the essay El país de la cola de paja, 1960 [The Straw-tailed Country], and the novel Gracias por el fuego, 1965 [Thanks for the Light]. The prevailing feature of these works is criticism of society and morality. The second phase results from his becoming politicized, and it is apparent in his work. Gracias por el fuego began to earn him an international reputation because the action is set in New York, but its preoccupations are almost entirely Uruguayan. Shortly after, the radical changes that took place in Latin America in the 1960s, and above all, the intellectual ferment and militancy of the Left (the Cuban Revolution, the attacks on US imperialism and the search for a “new” Guevara-type man) had a powerful influence on Benedetti’s writing and in it he combined a moral judgment—which is ever present in his works—with a more sophisticated political outlook.

Benedetti’s essays of the 1970s and 1980s were collected in book form: Terremoto y después, 1973 [Earthquake and After]; El desexilio y otras conjeturas, 1984 [Unexile and Other Conjectures] which are a kind of mirror of the itinerant life and problems that beset the author. Many of them are excellent examples of cultural journalism.

The theme of his novel in verse, El cumpleaños de Juan Ángel, 1971 [Juan Ángel’s Birthday] is the armed struggle in Uruguay, that is, the clandestine guerrilla war. At that time Benedetti was one of the leaders of the 26 of May Movement, a political group whose ideology was close to that of the Tupamaro guerrillas. Later, the dictatorship of 1973 and the military governments proscribed not only the “26 May” but all independent political activity in Uruguay, driving many into exile. In this new period (1973–85) Benedetti lived first in Cuba and later in Spain (where, in the mid 1990s he still spends periods of time), and the theme of exile also found expression in his work.

Pessimism and optimism are key terms in Benedetti’s work. Up to Gracias por el fuego, Benedetti belonged in the ranks of the “pessimists,” as the author himself pointed out on several occasions, because he lived in a country without a “future,” sworn to the mediocre dreams of individualism. By then Benedetti was a very popular writer, as a poet (Poemas de la oficina), as a writer of narrative (Montevideanos), as an essayist (El país de la cola de paja) or humour (Mejor es Meneallo [The More Said, the Better]), as though his readers were searching for mirrors in which to see their reflection.

These writings focused on “average citizens,” middle-of-the-roaders, absorbed by their petty, selfish aspirations, in a crass social atmosphere in which the only possible modes of behaviour are hypocrisy or betrayal (of a friend; of one’s spouse). Benedetti helped to create the figure of this “national type” within the “social imaginary.” Thus the love triangle of Quién de nosotros, the parricide and betrayal of one’s country in Gracias por el fuego, the small-scale, personal tragedy of the office worker in La tregua (The Truce) come as no surprise. The last of these is considered his finest novel—and probably is. It fuses social and individual points of view without one affecting adversely the other. And he fashions credible characters with whom readers may identify. Beginning with a cliché (a man of retirement age begins an affair with a much younger colleague), it turns into a sensitive and intelligent story and a melancholy reflection on the elusive nature of happiness.

Martin Santomé, the central character of La tregua, is a man defeated by the social structure. For Kafka, bureaucracy was a labyrinth or a spider’s web that created anguish; for Benedetti—a perceptive reader of Kafka—bureaucracy is the moderate tragedy of mediocrity. It is most curious that the novel ends with a question. Quién de nosotros ended with a metaphysical question, an anxious search for the hidden God (Who judges whom?), but the final question of La tregua refers in a desolate way to the petty bourgeois without a future: “Desde mañana y hasta el día de mi muerte, el tiempo estará a mis órdenes. Después de tanta espera, esto es el ocio. ¿Qué haré con él?” (As from tomorrow and until I die, time will take orders from me. After so much waiting, here is leisure. What am I to do with it?)

Very different is Gracias por el fuego. The narrow focus of La tregua has been replaced by a socio-political perspective. The author passes judgment on his country in all his texts; here, though, this becomes a theme. Through three generations of a family (grandson, son, father), he tells the story of an old newspaper boss, corrupt and venal, his cowardly sons and a cautiously rebellious grandson. The most dramatic aspects concern the old man’s son, Ramón Budiño, who has a love/hate relationship with his father, and decides to kill him as a way of saving the country, or the multiple victims of this “terrible father.” La tregua was chamber work; Gracias por el fuego is an attempt at a symphony, a reflexion on the collectivity—the amorality of the country.

During Benedetti’s “pessimistic” phase there were more questions than answers. The former could be personal, metaphysical, made painful by uncertainty. Slowly they would make way for questions charged with indignation, appropriate to a lucid witness, a conscious citizen, an engaged writer: “¿Es que este país no tiene fondo? (Can’t one strike bottom in this country?).

In El cumpleaños de Juan Ángel Benedetti sought to bring these sombre reflections to a close so as to give way to a brighter, clearer and more hopeful vision. And this change applied also to the literary “form.” Thus one of the novel’s most original features is that it is written in verse. Blank verse -within the aesthetics of conversational poetry—but not stripped of rhythm; on the contrary, El cumpleaños de Juan Ángel has an undeniable, pleasurable, successfully realized rhythm. This work is the correlate of its author’s restlessness, an expression of his desire for personal, political and aesthetic change. And it is the key moment of a transformation which from the beginning involved overcoming pessimism. Even in troubled times, Benedetti was able to detect and to ally himself with the preoccupations of progressive elements in Latin America and to pin the few hopes of the Latin American on political activism. It is for these reasons that El cumpleaños de Juan Ángel is so central and fundamental to his evolution: during the 1960s, the grey Uruguay of the Poemas de la oficina and Montevideanos gave way to the Robin Hood epic of the Tupamaros who fought against the rich and were liked by the people.

For some years that guerrilla movement was genuinely popular and was represented in the social imaginary as behaviour that was intrepid, courageous and (at last) fit for a country which until then appeared defeated by a spirit of corruption, decadence and red tape. The Tupamaros were the reply that Edmundo Budiño searched for ironically in Gracias por el fuego. They became the only ones determined to combat Power and, if possible, to destroy it, to ensure that a tranquil death would not reach them in old age in their beds. The novel recounts and sings about the country’s history through its collective character. It is dedicated to Raúl Sendic, the Tupamaro leader whom Benedetti had known from his youth. Thus El cumpleaños is a magnificent, undoubtedly original tour de force in which the frontiers dividing poetry from prose are broken down; the various ages of the character are “liberated” in the course of a single day; Uruguay’s dramatic history is recreated without having recourse to any documentary elements; and, above all, the language itself, through its stylistic figures, creates an atmosphere of uncertainty, action and passion. A novel/poem, its theme is revolution and love, denunciation in the face of repression, joy in heroism, and the story of how Benedetti, like many other Uruguayans of the period, grasped a problem (a nettle) and, having done so, experienced and lived it.

The dictatorship of 1973 and its consequences: internal repression, imprisonment and death, the exodus of Uruguayans on a massive scale, challenged the “optimism” that Benedetti supported. Or, rather, they turned it into historical optimism, in a conviction that the steps taken backwards by a regime or a country in the socio-political spheres, no longer signified that the country was condemned. They are obstacles in a historical unfolding which will of necessity end in freedom. This historical vision, which Benedetti struggled to make his own, remained a feature of his production during the years of exile. What he did was to make a theme of his own exile, giving it a place in the imaginary and a category in social, political and aesthetic reflexion.

As from 1973 Benedetti published several books of narrative and poetry which express the theme of exile. Among them are Poemas de otros, 1974 [Poems by Others], Con y sin nostalgia, 1977 [With and without Nostalgia], Cotidianas, 1979 [Everydays], Vientos de exilio, 1983 [Winds of Exile] and Geografías, 1984 [Geographies], Pedro y el capitán, 1979 [Peter and the Captain] is an extremely representative play about the denunciation of repression; at the same time it is an attempt to analyze dialectically and ethically the relationship between torturer and tortured. In narrative, without a doubt Primavera con una esquina rota, 1982, [Spring with a Chipped Corner] and Recuerdos olvidados, 1988 [Forgotten Memories] are two of the texts that best illustrate his “new” optimism. An optimism which, basically, rests on a modern historical confidence (more than the “postmodern” kind) and on the idea that reason and justice will prevail. Primavera, like El cumpleaños before it, is an innovative novel in formal terms: it gives an account of several lives along parallel and converging narrative lines. The imprisoned, exiled and repressed all figure here, encapsulated in their monologues, letters and dialogues. In following these personal histories, Benedetti was looking for a greater social resonance while, at the same time, as the title indicates, embedding the ideology of hope in the verbal and cultural codes. The word spring (primavera) alone, which serves for a character as a tacit source of optimism and gaiety, is the symbolic season of rebirth.

Seldom has Benedetti been more autobiographical than in this novel. The same applies to Despistes y franquezas, 1989 [Frank and Off the Point], but this time he acknowledges it openly: “De antiguo aspire secretamente a escribir…mi personal libro-entrevero, ya que siempre consideré ese atajo como un signo de libertad creadora y, también, del derecho a seguir el derrotero de la imaginación y no siempre el de las estructuras rigurosas y prefijadas.” (From a long way back I secretly aspired to write…my personal bran-tub-book, since I always viewed this shortcut as a mark of creative freedom and, in addition, of the duty to follow the leadings of the imagination and not always those of certain rigorous and established structures.) However, La borra del café [Coffee Dregs] was to be Benedetti’s most autobiographical text and the novel that combines stylistic maturity with the narrative freshness of the early books.

Fifty years after his literary beginnings, Mario Benedetti has demonstrated various things, without setting out to do so, as befits an authentic writer: fidelity to a nucleus of moral principles has made his personal and literary world one of great integrity in Uruguayan and, more generally, Latin American literature; a considerable gift of literary expression which has enabled him quite legitimately—to seduce innumerable readers in a range of countries (he is the author of sixty books, and has sold over a million and a half copies). In addition, he has been admirably true to himself; barbed with critics who frequently have written unfavourable reviews; endowed with a sense of history which, finally, allowed him to see that beneath the debris of national corruption, another young and bold country, and a continent imbued with hope, were worth uncovering, so as to be told and narrated. Benedetti has devoted the best of his energy to this task in the last few decades. He is a unique example of hopelessness turned into hope, seeing this as the best instrument to turn the latter into a reality.

JORGE RUFFINELLI
translated by Verity Smith

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry and Narrative
Out of respect for the cultivated hybridity of some of the texts listed below, no attempt has been made to separate poetry from narrative fiction.

La vispera indeleble, Montevideo: Prometeo, 1945

Esta mañana, Montevideo: Prometeo, 1949

Sólo mientras tanto, Montevideo: Número, 1950

El último viaje y otros cuentos, Montevideo: Número, 1951

Quién de nosotros, Montevideo: Número, 1953

Ustedes, por ejemplo, Montevideo: Número, 1953

Poemas de la oficina, Montevideo: Número, 1956

Montevideanos, Montevideo: Alfa, 1959

Poemas del hoy por hoy, Montevideo: Alfa, 1961

Gracias por el fuego, Montevideo: Alfa, 1965

Contra los puentes levadizos, Montevideo: Alfa, 1966
A ras del sueño, Montevideo: Alfa, 1967
La muerte y otras sorpresas, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1968
El cumpleaños de Juan Ángel, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1971
Hasta aquí, Buenos Aires: Cuadernos de la Línea, 1974
Poemas de otros, Madrid: Visor, 1974
Letras de emergencia, Buenos Aires: Alfa, 1974
La casa y el ladrillo, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1976
Con y sin nostalgia, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1977
Cotidianas, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1979
Primavera con una esquina rota, Madrid: Alfaguara, 1982
Vientos de exilio, Madrid: Visor, 1983
Geografías, Madrid: Alfaguara, 1984
Preguntas al azar, Buenos Aires: Nueva Imagen, 1986
Yesterday y mañana, Montevideo: Arca, 1987
Recuerdos olvidados, Montevideo: Trilce, 1988
Despistes y franquezas, Montevideo: Arca/Nueva Imagen, 1989
Las soledades de Babel, Madrid: Visor, 1991
La borra del café, Montevideo: Arca, 1992
Canciones del más acá, Montevideo: Cal y Canto, 1993

Plays
El reportaje, Montevideo: Marcha, 1958
Ida y vuelta, Buenos Aires: Talía, 1963
Pedro y el capitán, Mexico City: Nueva Imagen, 1979

Essays and Testimonial Writing
Marcel Proust y otros ensayos, Montevideo: Número, 1951
El país de la cola de paja, Montevideo: Asir, 1960
Mejor es Meneallo, Montevideo: Alfa, 1961
Literatura uruguaya del siglo veinte, Montevideo: Alfa, 1963
Genio y figura de José Enrique Rodó, Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1966
Letras del continente mestizo, Montevideo: Arca, 1967
Sobre arte y oficios: ensayo, Montevideo: Alfa, 1968
Cuaderno cubano, Montevideo: Arca, 1969
Crítica cómplice, Havana: Instituto Cubano del Libro, 1971
Crónicas del 71, Montevideo: Arca, 1972
Los poetas comunicantes, Montevideo: Biblioteca de Marcha, 1972 [interviews]
Terremoto y despúes, Montevideo: Arca, 1973
El recurso del supremo patriarca, Buenos Aires: Alfa, 1974
El escritor latinoamericano y la revolución posible, Buenos Aires: Alfa, 1974
Notas sobre algunas formas subsidiarias de la penetración cultural, Mexico City: Tierra Adentro, 1979
Panorama histórico-lterario de nuestra America, Havana: Casa de las Américas, and New York: Vitral, 1982
El desexilio y otras conjeturas, Madrid: Ediciones El País, 1984
La cultura, ese blanco móvil, Montevideo: Universidad de la República, 1985
Escritos políticos, Montevideo: Arca, 1985
Noción de patria, Madrid: Visor, 1985
Cultura entre dos fuegos, Montevideo: Universidad de la República, 1986

Compilations and Anthologies
Todos los cuentos de Mario Benedetti, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1980
Antología poética, prologue by J.M.Caballero Bonald, Madrid: Alianza, 1984

Further Reading

Fornet, Ambrosio (editor), Recopilación de textos sobre Benedetti, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1976
Mansour, Mónica, Tuya, mía, de otros; la poesía coloquial de Mario Benedetti, Mexico City: UNAM, 1979
Navia Velasco, Carmiña, Mario Benedetti: una aproximación crítica, Cali, Colombia: Centro Cultural Popular Meléndez, 1984
Ruffinelli, Jorge (editor), Mario Benedetti: variaciones críticas, Montevideo: Libros del Astillero, 1973 [Contains essays by notable creative writers as well as by critics. These include Julieta Campos, Cristina Peri Rossi, Ariel Dorfman, Sebastián Salazar Bondy and Jean Franco]

Interviews
Alfaro, Hugo, Mario Benedetti: detrás de un vidrio claro, Montevideo: Ediciones Trilce, 1986

Best-Sellers

It was not until the 1960s that the term best-seller was used in conjunction with Latin American literature due both to developments in the publishing world and to the emergence of writers who would come to dominate the Latin American literary scene. This period came to be known as the Boom, and the use of the terminology of the market place to describe a literary phenomenon is, as Ángel Rama has said, no accident. Rama notes the changes in the publishing world instrumental in the creation of the Boom in his essay “The ‘Boom’ in Perspective.” While in the 1940s and 1950s it was usual for a publisher to issue 3,000 copies of a novel, by the late 1960s novels by members of “the big four” (Gabriel García Márquez, Mario Vargas Llosa, Julio Cortázar and Carlos Fuentes) could expect to sell at least 20,000 copies. Gabriel García Márquez’s Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude), as Rama notes in the same essay, was consistently selling 100,000 copies per year from 1968, setting a sales record for a Latin American novel and introducing the Latin American novel to an international market.

The high quality of the literature produced in this period along with the new openings for Latin American writers in the book market (stimulated considerably by the interest in Latin American authors shown by the Barcelona publishing house Seix Barral) led to the emergence of Latin American literary superstars, professional writers who became household names in educated circles. Latin American writers, once their reputations were established and translations began to appear, were able to take advantage of developments in the book market. The growth of the literate population, increased distributing power of multinationals and lower prices of paperbacks all combined to guarantee high sales for the few novelists who were able to break into the international market.

Well-known Latin American novelists have, if anything, increased their sales in the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s, probably as their novels have become more accessible and readable. Carlos Fuentes’s Gringo viejo, 1985 (The Old Gringo) has none of the technical difficulties of La muerte de Artemio Cruz, 1962 (The Death of Artemio Cruz) and Vargas Llosa’s exploitation of popular culture and eroticism in La tía Julia y el escribidor, 1977 (Aunt Julia and the Scriptwriter) has more sales potential than his earlier La casa verde, 1966 (The Green House). Likewise, García Márquez’s El amor en los tiempos de cólera, 1985 (Love in the Time of Cholera) is an unashamedly romantic tale of enormous popular appeal. The 1970s also saw the emergence of the Argentine writer Manuel Puig whose highly readable explorations of gender and class oppression, sexuality and popular culture have allowed his novels to join the ranks of the international best-sellers.

During this internationalisation of the Latin American novelist, women writers were conspicuous by their absence until the 1980s. While well-established women writers such as Clarice Lispector, Luisa Valenzuela, Elena Poniatowska and Rosario Castellanos have undergone a critical revival due to growing interest by feminist Latin Americanists, the only two Latin American women writers to reach the international bestseller market are Isabel Allende and Laura Esquivel.

DEBORAH A. SHAW

Further Reading

Brown, Meg H., The Reception of Spanish American Fiction in West Germany: a Study of Best Sellers, Tübingen: Niemeyer, 1994 [Includes Isabel Allende, García Márquez, Ángeles Mastretta and Vargas Llosa]

Interviews

Isabel Allende 1942–

Chilean prose writer

Isabel Allende is one of the few writers who has managed to achieve consistently high sales figures while at the same time receiving critical attention in academic circles. Her novels have been translated into many languages and are bought principally by a “non-specialist” readership, while her first novel La casa de los espiritus, 1982, (The House of the Spirits) was made into a film with a star-studded cast in 1994. How can one account for this previously unknown Chilean writer’s dramatic entry onto the international literature shelves? Some of the reasons for her success will be examined here with a focus on some of the common points in Allende’s first three novels, novels which established and consolidated her reputation.

Probably the most appealing element of Allende’s fiction for a mass readership is her use of magical realism in its most popular form. Latin American writers from the time of the first European conquerors to Miguel Ángel Asturias, Alejo Carpentier and Juan Rulfo through to García Márquez, have long seen Latin America as a land of myth and magic where anything can and usually does happen. An image of Latin America full of larger than life characters whose belief systems are founded on a combination of religion and superstition and who are capable of the best excesses of love and the worst excesses of violence is an image that sells.

Allende draws on this long tradition in her novels, in the view of some critics to the extent of plagiarising García Márquez. Eva, one of Allende’s protagonists, best sums up her creator’s interpretation of magical realism when she says: “reality is not only what we see on the surface; it has a magical dimension as well, and, if we so desire, it is legitimate to enhance it and color it to make our journey through life less trying.” Exotic notions of the continent are confirmed, and “reality” made exciting, different, colourful and magical: all this is wonderful material for fiction.

Herein lies much of the appeal of Allende for an international readership, for she presents an image of Latin America that is always exciting. The novels present a world of extremes: a world of soldiers and guerrillas, of military coups and revolutionary governments, passionate men and women motivated by love, sex and social justice, of poets and torturers, of women with magical powers and men who are either beasts or saints. Add to the list a collection of more or less lovable freaks in the shape of senile old people, a young woman possessed by spirits (De amor y de sombra; Of Love and Shadows) a harelipped Arab, a glamorous transsexual (Eva Luna), a woman of surreal beauty and green hair, a repressed lesbian and a sexually perverted sadistic French nobleman (La casa de los espíritus) and success is assured.

Allende’s novels are also attractive to a female readership through her creation of strong female characters and her conception of magical properties as essentially feminine. Allende, unlike her male fellow-writer García Márquez, emphasises the spiritual dimension of magical realism and makes this the domain of women. Allende creates a series of protagonists with supernatural powers, white witches with feminine virtues whom readers are invited to wonder at and admire: Clara with her clairvoyant powers and her ability to move inanimate objects; Rosa with her green hair and fantastic tapestries; Irene who can predict the future; Evangelina who is possessed by spirits, and Eva who enchants her listeners with the stories she tells them.

The spiritual dimension of Allende’s women, as well as providing entertainment, is also of symbolic value. In a society dominated by a militaristic cult of masculinity, the author sees spirituality as a form of feminine resistance. Magical powers can be used to ward off the evil spirits of patriarchy, as Clara shows by retreating into a world of spirituality to escape the violence. and negative energy of her husband Esteban Trueba, and through her spirit which returns to give her granddaughter, Alba, strength after she has been imprisoned and sexually abused.

However, women only able to function on a spiritual level are of little use to a female readership and would have a limited appeal as role models. Allende’s heroines are successful because they are able to engage with material reality when required by circumstances. Thus, both Irene and Clara, two of the most spiritual characters, are able to return to earthly matters when faced with the harsh realities of social injustice.

Another reason for Allende’s mass popularity is the fact that while she adopts elements of feminism, principally in her creation of strong women as protagonists of her novels and in her attacks on the worst excesses of machista culture in the form of sexual abuse and militarism, nowhere does she challenge the bases of heterosexual gender relations. On the contrary, her novels depend on the exploitation of the romantic myth for their power to move and intrigue her readership. Romantic love, as in most women’s best-sellers, is where ultimate happiness and fulfilment are to be found, and although Allende’s women are non-submissive and sexually liberated, their worlds will come to revolve around one man. It is significant that the female characters only become involved with the politics of their country through a romantic involvement with a man: Alba through Miguel; Blanca (to a lesser extent) through Pedro Tercero in La casa de los espíritus, Eva through Huberto Naranjo and Rolf Carlè in Eva Luna; and Irene through Francisco in De amor y de sombra. The overall message is that there is one ideal man out there whom the protagonist will eventually find and without whom she cannot be complete. Allende’s appeal is found in the way that she offers her readers a desired reality, the promise of a “new man,” gentle, caring, loyal, passionate, driven by political ideals and devoted to one woman.

Neither does Allende frighten off her male readers who in every novel are offered positive role models. They are invited to identify with the new male heroes who are political enough not to be emasculated. There is the additional promise that the new sensitive revolutionary man will be rewarded with the love of a romantic heroine for the 1980s and 1990s, a heroine who is intelligent, spiritual, kind and caring, possessed of a beauty which corresponds to traditional notions of femininity and who has no sexual complexes.

Yet, despite the heavy romantic content of her novels which has laid her open to criticisms of sentimentality and melodrama, Allende takes her fiction beyond the scope of the sugary love story. Story-telling has a clear ideological purpose for Allende, and is used as a vehicle for documenting social and political truths. The narratives are deeply rooted in a specific social and historical context, a context which is never simply there to provide an exotic backdrop to a love story as in the case of Esquivel’s first novel. In De amor y de sombra, for example, the primary concern of the narrative is to denounce the human rights abuses committed by the military in the Pinochet era in Chile. Similarly, La casa de los espíritus, using the format of a family saga, presents an interpretation of modern Chilean history from a broadly socialist perspective: much of the narrative chronicles social inequality and the abuses committed first by old-fashioned conservatives and then by the right-wing military regime. The elation felt by the author when describing the celebratory scenes following the election of the socialist candidate (a reference to the election of Salvador Allende, Isabel’s uncle) is unmistakable.

Isabel Allende is not a writer who is likely to appeal to the more intellectual Latin American writers. For example, in an interview given in 1995, the Argentine author Juan José Saer observed that the approval of academia is of much greater importance to Allende than to, say, Borges. He said specifically: “For example, very soon there’ll be a flood of these [academic readings] on Isabel Allende. For her, it will be a confirmation and a kind of sacralisation, and I have my doubts about this future consecration.” Yet, so-called professional readers/critics are more likely to forgive Allende her idealised notions of romance in the knowledge that she gives so-called non-specialist readers a social insight into human rights abuses in Latin America that they would be unlikely to find in any other of their reading material. At the same time, “nonspecialist readers” are able to enjoy novels in which political content is never dry or overly factual but rather highly personalised and fictionalised (build up, suspense, dramatic dénoue-ments, etc.) and interwoven with plenty of anecdote and romance. This having been said, who is to say that “professional readers” do not enjoy a good love story, and that “nonprofessional readers” are not fascinated to read about Latin American society?

DEBORAH A. SHAW

Biography

Born in Lima, Peru, 2 August 1942; niece of former Chilean President Salvador Allende who died in the course of the military takeover of September, 1973. Attended a private high school in Santiago de Chile, graduated 1959. Secretary, United Nations Food and Agricultural Organization, Santiago, 1959–65. Married Miguel Frios in 1962. (divorced in 1987), one daughter (deceased) and one son. Worked as a journalist, editor, and advice columnist for Paula magazine, Santiago, 1967–74; interviewer for Canal 13/Canal 7 television station, 1970–75; worked on movie newsreels, 1973–75; administrator, Colegio Marroco, Caracas, 1979–82; guest teacher, Montclair State College, New Jersey, Spring 1985, and University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Fall 1988; Gildersleeve Lecturer, Barnard College, New York, Spring 1988; taught creative writing at the University of California, Berkeley, Spring 1989. Married William Gordon in 1988, one stepson. Recipient of numerous awards including the Panorama Literario Novel of the Year (Chile), 1983; Author of the Year, 1984, 1986, and Book of the Year, 1984 (Germany); Grand Prix d’Évasion (France), 1984; Colima for best novel (Mexico), 1985; Mulheres Best Novel (Portugal), 1987

Selected Works

Novels

Other Writings

Civilice a su troglodita: los impertinentes de Isabel Allende, Santiago de Chile: Lord Cochran, 1974
La gorda de porcelana, Madrid: Alfaguara, 1984 [for children]

Further Reading

Arancibia, Juana Alcira, Evaluación de la literatura femenina de latinoamérica, siglo XX, Costa Rica: EDUCA, 1985 [Contains several contributions on La casa de los espíritus]
Coddou, Marcelo (editor), Los libros tienen sus propios espíritus, Veracruz: Universidad Veracruzana, 1986
Coddou, Marcelo, Para leer a Isabel Allende, Concepción, Chile: LAR, 1988
Riquelme Rojas, Sonia and Edna Aguirre Rehbein (editors), Critical Approaches to Isabel Allende’s Novels, New York: Peter Lang, 1991
Robinett, Jane, This Rough Magic: Technology in Latin America Fiction, New York: Peter Lang, 1994 [Contains two chapters on La casa de los espíritus]

Interviews

Laura Esquivel 1950–

Mexican novelist

Isabel Allende and Laura Esquivel are the only two Latin American women writers whose names are likely to be known to a non-Latin American and a non-specialist readership. Both Allende’s novels and Esquivel’s Como agua para chocolate (Like Water for Chocolate) have vastly outsold novels by the majority of their male contemporaries. Como agua para chocolate was the second best-selling novel in Mexico in 1989 while the English translation spent a considerable period in the New York Times list of best sellers in 1993. Sales of the novel have also been boosted by Alfonso Arau’s screen adaptation of his (now ex-) wife’s novel, for which Esquivel wrote the screenplay. The film has been a huge international success, it has won eighteen international awards and was the foreign language film with the highest box office takings in the United States in 1993.

Extraliterary factors are important in the attainment of bestseller status, and literary text cannot be separated from social context. As Resa Dudovitz writes in her book The Myth of Superwomen: “The bestseller…functions within the popular culture of a particular society as a reflection of contemporary concerns and provides an important understanding of the dominant ideologies of that society.” This mode of conceptualising best-sellers is particularly useful in any attempt to understand the phenomenal success of a first novel by an unknown Mexican writer. Various factors are at play in determining the mass appeal of Como agua para chocolate: 1. The portrayal of a romantic rural past in the face of ever increasing urban modernisation; 2. The portrayal of a lifelong love affair in an age characterised by relationship breakdowns, serial monogamy and a contradictory belief in the “until death do us part” romantic ideal; 3. The reclaiming of traditional notions of femininity and feminine arts (cookery) in a period of confused gender identities and pre-prepared TV dinners; 4. A sense of perceived authenticity in the shape of “real” Mexican food and “real” Mexican culture at a time when TexMex restaurants are becoming increasingly popular in the United States and Europe. Esquivel also assures success with the addition of other market-friendly ingredients such as an original narrative formula (the interweaving of a fast-moving storyline and recipes) combined with reassuring use of elements of the familiar genres of fairy tale and soap opera, and a cast of characters whom readers are invited to either cheer or hiss in true pantomime tradition.

As the makers of Hollywood box-office hits have known since the industry’s inception, there is nothing that reaches audiences like a good old-fashioned love story. To capture a truly intense sense of romance, artists feel the need to go back in time to a historical period that preceded the sexual revolution, when merely to look longingly at a member of the opposite sex was considered over-bold.

Como agua para chocolate is appropriately set in the home of a family belonging to the land-owning classes in revolutionary and post-revolutionary Mexico. The sexual conservatism of the period is further exacerbated by a Mexican family tradition which decrees that the youngest daughter cannot marry or have children as she has to devote herself to caring for her mother. Tita, the youngest daughter of Esquivel’s novel, however, falls in love with Pedro, her childhood sweetheart and what would normally be an extremely conventional relationship (both are of the same class, same ethnic origins, same town and of opposite sex) becomes ideal material for romantic fiction.

Esquivel manages to create an obstacle for her two lovers and to convey the excitement generated by a forbidden love without contravening any of the conservative social values which characterise the ideology within the text, a conservatism upon which its best-seller status depends. As Resa Dudovitz has noted: “women’s bestsellers…rarely propose a world vision which necessitates any radical change of existing social structures.” So, in the case of Como agua para chocolate, while the reader is given the impression of a heroine who seeks to escape repressive family codes, the temptation to rebel is motivated by Tita’s desire to conform to traditional notions of femininity where an ideal woman needs to be wife, mother and nurturer if she is to be fulfilled. Tita’s sole desire in life is to marry Pedro, rear his children and provide husband and children with delicious food.

This rather simple, conventional storyline clearly needed spicing up, to use a cooking metaphor, for the novel to reach the spectacular sales figures that it has achieved. This is achieved by the originality of the narrative format, whereby actual recipes are given, and cooking instructions and plenty of culinary metaphors are woven into the telling of Tita’s plight; by the use of humour and exaggeration to allow the heavy sentimental nature of the novel to be more easily digested; and by the use of “magical realism” with most of the realism taken out, a proven recipe for success.

Esquivel combines all the clichés of romantic love to humorous effect when she has Tita and Pedro’s first orgasm after years of honourable frustration accompanied by spirals of phosphorescent colours which ascend to the sky like delicate Bengal lights. Likewise, the concluding love scene where Pedro enters a tunnel of luminous light which leads to his death in a supreme moment of ecstasy, followed by Tita’s self-immolation by eating the contents of a box of matches, has to be read as a parody of representations of romantic love if it is to be rescued from criticisms of being excessively clichéd and literal.

The so-called magical realism of the novel is another major reason for the commercial success of both novel and film. Esquivel and Arau exploited the taste for “magical realism,” watering down the realism found in the chronicling of important social events in order to concentrate almost exclusively on the magical as the most entertaining and profitable part of the formula. Two of the most memorable scenes, the wedding banquet at which the bitter tears Tita sheds into the cake causes weeping fits and mass vomiting among the guests, and Gertrudis’s abduction at the hands of a revolutionary who picks up the scent of her sexuality released by the aphrodisiac properties of Tita’s cooking, take “magical realism” to the level of the purely sensational and provide little if any insight into the workings of Mexican society at a key point in its history.

Both Esquivel and Allende have hit upon the right formula for producing Latin American best-sellers, but while Allende shows that it is possible to write highly entertaining novels without entirely abandoning liberal political and feminist views, Esquivel plays it extremely safe, rooting her story-telling skills within an extremely traditional and conservative ideology.

DEBORAH A.SHAW

See also entries on The Boom, Film, Magical Realism, Translation

Biography

Born in Mexico City in 1950. Worked as a teacher; has also written books for children and film scripts. Named Mexican Woman of the Year in 1992. Como agua para chocolate has been translated into 29 languages. Awarded the ABBY (American Booksellers Book of the Year), 1994, the first time the award had been given to a nonUS citizen.
Selected Works

Novels

Further Reading

Escandón, Carmen Ramos, “Receta y feminidad en Como agua para chocolate” Fem, vol. 15/102, (June 1991)

Olavo Bilac 1865–1918

Brazilian poet

Olavo Bilac is one of the most anthologized of 19th-century Brazilian poets and is generally described, quite accurately, as both the most famous and the most representative member of the poetic movement Brazilians call Parnassianism. The Parnassianists largely controlled literary society and poetic discourse in Brazil from about 1880 until the rise of Modernismo in the early 1920s, almost completely smothering the one serious challenge to their preeminence, Brazilian Symbolism. Bilac’s coronation, in 1907, as “The Prince of Brazilian Poets,” is indicative both of his contemporary reputation and of the power of the Parnassianist establishment. Bilac’s status as the archetypal Parnassianist, however, made him and his works lightning-rods for harsh criticism and satire once the Modernist rebellion began in 1922. Several of Bilac’s best-known poems still appear in every anthology of Brazilian poetry, but his reputation has not yet recovered from these Modernist attacks, and no serious critical study of his large and varied production has yet been attempted.

At the end of the 1870s, a number of young Brazilian poets endeavored to break away from Romanticism, producing works they called “scientific poetry,” “realist poetry,” or, simply, examples of “A idéia nova” [The New Idea]. In real terms, however, the content and form of many of these poems were virtually indistinguishable from those of late-Romantic poets like Antônio de Castro Alves. This search for something new, something more clearly distinct from Romanticism, was reinforced, after 1880, by exposure to the poems of Théophile Gautier, Leconte de Lisle, and other writers linked to the French movement known as Parnassianism, a relatively brief anti-Romantic reaction of the 1860s and 1870s. The young Brazilian poets began to call themselves Parnassianists around 1885, and the prestige inherent in the French origin of the term greatly assisted Olavo Bilac, Raimundo Correia (1859–1911), Alberto de Oliveira (1857–1937), and other members of the group in establishing themselves as the dominant force in Brazilian poetry.

The central problem, and the central irony, of Brazilian Parnassianism is that the poetic ideology these young writers adopted from the French movement, at least as they interpreted and adapted it, was in many ways inherently anti-poetic. That ideology also ran counter, in many cases, to the whole poetic tradition in Brazil and to the personal inclinations of the Brazilian Parnassianists themselves. Bilac’s 1886 “Profissão de fé” [Profession of Faith], a work based upon Théophile Gautier’s poem “L’Art,” published in 1856, was the most influential statement of Brazilian Parnassianist ideology. In that poem, Bilac defines the poet as a craftsman, a goldsmith lovingly and laboriously toiling to create a perfect object; he twists and files and polishes each phrase before setting the rhyme, “like a ruby, into the golden verse.” All this effort, Bilac insists, is in the service of the goddess of Form.

As the craftsman metaphor suggests, the Brazilian Parnassianists wholly rejected the Romantic view of poetry as divine inspiration channeled through the genius and the emotions of a few exceptional talents. They argued, rather, that any educated upper-class Brazilian willing to spend the time and energy required to master the movement’s detailed and rigidly enforced code of proper versification and metrics could produce a perfect poem. Inspiration and emotion were defined as extraneous to the poetic project; the twin goals were objective description and formal perfection. Many of the titles of Brazilian Parnassianist poems refer to the visual arts and, more specifically, to the imported artistic objects which graced upper-class parlors during the belle époque; these poetic objects are still-lifes, watercolors, miniatures, lithographs, even photographs. Moreover, one often finds multiple layers of reproduction in these works—the poetic object reproduces a contemporary lithograph which reproduces a Renaissance painting or a Greek sculpture. The strong undercurrent of exoticism in Brazilian Parnassianism conforms to this model; the countless poetic descriptions of Middle Eastern or Oriental scenes are not works of the imagination, but metrified versions of the hand-colored lithographs or photographs found in popular travel books. At its most extreme, this Parnassianist emphasis upon objective description defined love poetry not as the expression of emotion, but as the careful and detailed reproduction of portions of the beloved object’s anatomy. Moreover, objectivity and preoccupation with formal perfection often led to utterly banal but carefully rhymed and metered prose, as in the first stanza of Bilac’s poem “Nel mezzo del camin…” (published in 1888, in the first edition of his Poesias):

Cheguei. Chegaste. Vinhas fatigada
E triste, e triste e fatigado eu vinha.
Tinhas a alma de sonhos povoada,
E a alma de sonhos povoada eu tinha…

[I arrived. You arrived. You were tired/And sad, and I was tired and sad as well./Your soul was filled with dreams./And my soul too with dreams was filled…]

This banality, fortunately, is not typical of Bilac’s poetry as a whole, but his works, throughout much of his career, do conform to the model of Brazilian Parnassianism described above, a model he did a great deal to create. There are occasional flashes of real emotion, but objectivity and the constraints of formal perfection far more often serve as a kind of straitjacket, against which he sometimes struggles but which he generally fails to escape. The best of his early poems are found in the Via láctea [Milky Way] collection, published as part of his 1888 Poesias. In these works, written after the unexpected end of his engagement to marry Alberto de Oliveira’s sister, the raw intensity of Bilac’s feelings is sometimes able to break through ideology and form and convince us of the authenticity of his emotions. The constant conflict between impulse and constraint in Bilac’s verse is perhaps most visible in O caçador de esmeraldas [The Emerald Hunter], included in the second edition of his Poesias (1902). This long work is Bilac’s attempt to force one of the central traditions of Brazilian Romantic verse, the patriotic epic, into the Parnassianist mold. His topic is the career of Fernão Dias Paes Leme, a 17th-century explorer of the Brazilian interior, but vast landscapes and heroic deeds, in Bilac’s hands, become little more than metrified history and static tableaux.

The most satisfying of Bilac’s works, for modern readers, is the posthumously-published Tarde [Afternoon] of 1919. The poems in this volume make it clear that, despite the poet’s public rejection of any challenge to Parnassianist orthodoxy, more recent European intellectual developments (the philosophy of Schopenhauer, the verse of the French Symbolists) had in fact had at least some impact on his ideas and his poetic practice. Moreover, ideology, form and theme finally achieve some sort of balance. These are elegiac poems in which the poet, still nostalgic for the past, expresses his acceptance of aging and the approach of death. He sees himself as beyond passion, and the cold objectivity of Parnassianism makes perfect sense within this context. Form, Bilac insists, is all that survives the death of feeling. His nostalgic scrapbook of poetic photographs of lost youth and lost love convinces us and moves us, and remains, perhaps, the single greatest accomplishment of the Brazilian Parnassianist movement.

DAVID T.HABERLY
Biography

Selected Works

Poetry
Poesias, São Paulo: Teixeira e Irmãos, 1888; 2nd edition, 1902
Crônicas e novelas, n.p., 1894
Sagres, Rio de Janeiro, n.p., 1898
Crítica e fantasia, Lisbon, n.p., 1904
Poesias infantis, Rio de Janeiro: Francisco Alves, 1904
Conferências literárias, Rio de Janeiro: Francisco Alves, 1906
Ironia e piedade, Rio de Janeiro: Francisco Alves, 1916
Bocage, São Paulo: Porto, 1917
Tarde, Rio de Janeiro: Francisco Alves, 1919
Bom humor, Rio de Janeiro: Editora Casa Mandarino, 1939

Other Writings
Últimas conferências e discursos, Rio de Janeiro: Francisco Alves, 1977

Compilations and Anthologies
Os melhores poemas de Olavo Bilac, São Paulo: Global, 1985

Further Reading

Elton, E., O noivado de Bilac, com a correspondencia inédita do poeta a sua noiva, Rio de Janeiro: Simões, 1954
Magalhães, Jr, Raimundo, Olavo Bilac e sua época, Rio de Janeiro: Companhia Editora Americana, 1974
Pontes, Eloy, A vida exuberante de Olavo Bilac, 2 vols, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1944
Bildungsroman

“Bildnis” in German is portrait, image, likeness. The related “Bildung” may be translated as shape or shaping, referring both to external form and to the process of formation. While it has lost the strictly religious connotations it had in the Middle Ages (summarisable in the phrase “to fashion in the likeness of God”), “Bildung” retains a moral sense relating to the process of education and acquisition of cultural and social values. “Bildungsroman” is thus the novel of formation or education. The term has left the confines of German studies to be used untranslated in literary criticism in general, a fact which has not always pleased Germanists, who see the Bildungsroman as a national phenomenon.

Theorising about the Bildungsroman (and there is a lot of it, especially in German) often begins with Goethe’s Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre, 1795 (Wilhelm Meister’s Apprenticeship). During the 18th century in Germany, a shift took place in the concept of Bildung, away from the religious and towards the humanistic; the individual is increasingly seen as having innate potential (often of an artistic kind) and that potential is to be drawn out and reconciled with his environment, the latter sometimes being conceived in pantheistic terms. But, while nature may provide the seed, it is not enough for the individual to grow passively; instead, he must engage in active selfdevelopment: Goethe writes in Aus meinem Leben: Dichtung und Wahrheit (From My Life) that “[going] to work on one’s own moral Bildung…is the most advisable thing.” Bildung becomes a matter of will; destinies can be shaped. It comes as no surprise to find that the Nazis later sought to appropriate the genre for their own purposes, the individual standing for the nation. Yet while some “novels of education” seem to signal approbation of the process whereby individuals accommodate themselves to the prevailing ethos, many question that ethos or suggest that it is ephemeral.

As “Bildungsroman” becomes part of the general vocabulary of criticism, so its features become less particular. Nowadays, the term is used very generally to refer to novels entailing a dialectic between the individual and the environment; the novel usually has a male protagonist, that protagonist is frequently portrayed in school, the process of growing up is often allied to sexual awakening, and, in keeping with our time, integration into adult life is seen no longer in terms of optimistic affirmation, but sceptically, as a matter of compromise or reconciliation. The narrative is normally in the first person.

That the Bildungsroman should have been so frequently and deliberately the preserve of male protagonists, offering what were often very stereotypical views of passive and irrational female characters, has naturally caught the attention of feminist critics. These appear to be divided as to whether unearthing forgotten novels of female Bildung serves to redress the balance, or whether that is simply a way of capitulating to masculinist standards.

The description Bildungsroman can be applied to a great many Latin American novels. Some examples are: Raul Pompeía’s O ateneu, 1888 [The Atheneum], a story of a boarding school run by a megalomaniac, the sexual and intellectual awakening of the boy narrator, and the social relationships he develops; two novels that also deal with culture conflict, one of them with a female protagonist: Rosario Castellanos’s Balún Canán, 1957 (The Nine Guardians), which is partly autobiographical and portrays a child of European origin brought up by an Indian nanny, and José María Arguedas’s Los ríos profundos, 1958 (Deep Rivers), also an autobiographically-based story, which tells of a boy torn between his love of the oppressed Quechua people and his Catholic education; Vargas Llosa’s La ciudad y los perros, 1963 (The Time of the Hero) is perhaps the modern novella best fits the classic model of the Bildungsroman, since it portrays an intelligent boy, surviving by his wits in a cadet school to which he has been sent by an alienated father to rid him of his artistic proclivities, a boy who emerges much the wiser and sadder.

PETER STANDISH

Further Reading

Adolfo Bioy Casares 1914

Argentine prose writer

In 1990, Adolfo Bioy Casares was awarded the Cervantes prize, the highest distinction for writers in the Spanish language. That year also marked the 50th anniversary of La invención de Morel (The Invention of Morel) the novel by Bioy that opened a crucial decade in the development of the so-called new Latin American narrative. Over more than half a century of literary creation, Bioy Casares’s works include seven novels, an even greater number of collections of short stories, books of miscellaneous prose with articles and essays, a novel written with his wife Silvina Ocampo, and several volumes in collaboration with Jorge Luis Borges.

It was Borges who wrote the prologue for La invención de Morel, a text that among critics of Spanish American literature has reached a level of popularity and importance equal to that of the novel itself. In this prologue Borges comes down in favor of the adventure story, the novel of “reasoned imagination” while rejecting the psychological and realistic novel. He proposes that a narrative be a “verbal artifice,” a work of pure fiction that does not tolerate any superfluous elements. In this sense, Borges qualifies the plot of Bioy Casares’s novel as “perfect.”
The protagonist of La invención de Morel is a fugitive running away from justice who arrives on an apparently uninhabited island. But he soon encounters a number of people, among them a woman, Faustine, and a bearded tennis player named Morel. The fugitive writes in his diary about his efforts to survive the tides that flood part of the island, to find food, and to avoid being discovered by the other inhabitants. He also mentions some strange things that are happening: no one seems to see him or to be aware of his presence; once in a while the people repeat the same words or gestures they had used before; and they disappear as suddenly as they appear. As Borges notes in the prologue, the “fantastic but not supernatural” explanation is that they and their setting are just images formed by Morel’s “invention.” This consists of machines, activated by the tides, that film, tape record, and then project the complete presence of people and things. The protagonist, in love with Faustine, decides to insert himself into the sequence of projected images with which, facing impending death, he hopes to be able to remain eternally at the side of his beloved. Through the story, Bioy faces the reader with the material and mechanical aspects in the creation of beings and objects by machine and, on the other hand, with the metaphysical reflection about the refutation of time and the quest for immortality. Without ignoring the importance of these subjects or the author’s rich imagination, the fundamental value of this work rests on its compositional techniques, especially on the interplay of narrative levels and points of view.

At the beginning of the novel the protagonist-narrator explains that what we are reading is the journal in which he recorded the strange events that occurred on the island. Every so often there are footnotes written by “the editor,” who usually contradicts or criticizes what the protagonist is saying. Also, there is a manuscript by Morel that includes an explanation of his invention as transcribed by the protagonist-narrator. Therefore, we have the “diary” of the fugitive and the “manuscript” of Morel both included in the text “published” by the editor. And we can recognize three sources of information, or three narrative voices—those of the protagonist, the editor, and Morel’s—none of them reliable in so far as they try to discredit one another. To this ambiguity one must add the way in which clues and scraps of information are dropped into the narrative to assist readers in unravelling the island’s mystery. These are strategies similar to those of a detective story where the reader is invited to participate in the investigation. La invención de Morel presents fiction within fiction, a calculated interplay of narrators and characters, verbal repetitions that evoke temporal repetitions, all in order to construct a text that is self-affirming in its autonomous reality as pure literary artifice.

El sueño de los heroes, 1954 (The Dream of Heroes) is for many critics, Bioy Casares’s best novel, displaying themes and techniques characteristic of his narrative style. Different from the previous novels—La invención de Morel and Plan de evasión (A Plan for Escape)—the action is not set in a remote island but in diverse places in the city of Buenos Aires, a recurrent scene in Bioy Casares’s fictions. Very few works in Argentine literature offer such a vivid image of the Buenos Aires of the 1920s and 1930s as this one does. This is not to say that the story always develops in a realistic atmosphere. On the contrary, the central theme revolves around a dream, or a state of mind that is being remembered as magnificent and to which a man tries to return.

The protagonist of the story is Emilio Gauna, a young mechanic who has won some money gambling at the races and decides to spend it with a group of friends and the so-called “doctor” Valerga, a man the young fellows admire for his reported courage. It is... the carnival season of 1927, and Emilio and his companions go off on a three-day spree that includes bars, masquerades, and brothels. On the last night, at a ball, Emilio has a brief encounter with a masked woman. They part and, in some confusion, he vaguely remembers a knife duel with Valerga. Later, he awakes in an unfamiliar place in the middle of a park. The three days of 1927 become an obsession for Emilio and, when in 1930 he again wins at the races, he tries to relive the events that took place three years before. The story ends with Emilio ready to face death in a knife fight with Valerga. Gauna is happy because he discovers that he is not a coward, and he understands the meaning of the dream (or memory) of the mysterious adventure that has haunted him for so long.

Through the reading of El sueño de los heroes we can identify frequent patterns in Bioy’s narrative. Emilio, the mechanic, and his friends belong to the lower-middle class, the social group that seems to attract especially the author’s attention. In his fictions, Bioy provides an accurate characterization of the members of this group on the basis of their actions and habits and, overall, in his rendering of the peculiarities of their language.

The theme of courage, of a young man sacrificing himself while trying to demonstrate his bravery also appears in “Homenaje a Francisco Almeyra” [Homage to Francisco Almeyra], and dissolves into parody in the adventures of Luis Ángel Morales, the protagonist of Un campeón desparejo [An Uneven Champion], the novel published in 1993.

Regarding the subjects of dreams, premonitions, and the interconnection of past, present, and future, all central ideas in the plot and narrative structure of El sueño de los heroes, it is possible that Bioy found some suggestions in his reading of An Experiment with Time by John William Dunne. In “El héroe de las mujeres” [The Women’s Hero], the title-story in the volume published in 1978, there are several references to Dunne’s ideas. This relation between scientific readings and narrative fictions can be observed in other of Bioy’s works.

Finally, we have to mention the predominant theme in all of Bioy Casares’s stories, the theme of love with its complexity, inconsistencies and touches of light eroticism. Bioy’s fictions offer a parade of confused and unhappy lovers from the fugitive of La invención n de Morel, who real izes th at he has in love with a simulacrum, to Emilio Gauna who only at the end understands that the masked woman of his dream is Clara, his wife. In some situations, the pathetic condition of these lovers is mitigated with the use of humor, a resource that Bioy administers with special ability. Usually it is a veiled humor expressed through irony, witty sayings or light mockery. A frequent character in Bioy’s works is that of a man perplexed when facing the vagaries of the amorous relations, and unable to understand the nature of his feelings or to really know the person he loves, as is the case with Lucio Bordenave in Dormir al sol (Asleep in the Sun) or Nicolasito Almanza in La aventura de un fotógrafo en La Plata (The Adventures of a Photographer in La Plata). Equally perplexed is the protagonist of Diario de la guerra del cerdo (Diary of the War of the Pig), a black comedy in the form of a fantasy about the old being persecuted by the young.

Above all, Bioy Casares’s narratives are well-told stories supported by structures calculated down to the minutest detail. At the same time, Bioy’s considerable gifts as a craftsman are illustrated by his lightness of touch. The vast world of his fictions is rendered in an eloquent style, exemplary in its precise elegance.
MIREYA CAMURATI

Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 15 September 1914, of an upperclass family. Travelled with his family to Europe in 1924 and to the United States in 1929. Attended the University of Buenos Aires in the academic year 1933–34 but became disillusioned with academia and left without completing a course, 1934. Met Jorge Luis Borges in 1932 with whom he collaborated on a number of literary works (under the pseudonyms H.Bustos Domecq and B.Suárez Lynch) and maintained a close friendship until Borges’s death. They founded the literary magazine, Destiempo in 1936 and the “The Seventh Circle” detective series for Emecé Editores, Buenos Aires, 1943–1956. The year 1931 also marked the beginning of his association with Victoria Ocampo, the founder of the literary journal Sur, and then one of the most influential figures in Argentine cultural life. Member of the “Sur Group.” Married Victoria’s sister, Silvina Ocampo in 1940, one daughter. Also wrote film scripts in collaboration with Borges. Recipient of numerous awards including: City of Buenos Aires Municipal Prize, 1941; National Literature Prize, 1969; Argentine Society of Writers Grand Prize of Honour, 1975; Mondello Prize, 1984; Miguel de Cervantes Prize, 1990. Member of the Légion d’Honneur, 1981.

Selected Works

Novels

La invención de Morel, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1940; wit from La trama celeste, as The Invention of Morel, and Other Stories from “La trama celeste,” translated by Ruth L.C.Simms, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1964

Un campeón desparejo, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1993

Short Fiction

17 disparos contra lo porvenir, Buenos Aires: Tor, 1933 [published under the pseudonym Martin Sacastru]

Caos, Buenos Aires: Viau y Zona, 1934

La nueva tormenta, o La vida múltiple de Juan Ruteno, Buenos Aires: Columbo, 1935

Luis Greve, muerto, Buenos Aires: Destiempo, 1937

Dos fantasías memorables, in collaboration with Jorge Luis Borges (published under the pseudonym H.Bustos Domecq), Buenos Aires: Oportet y Haereses, 1946
Un modelo para la muerte, in collaboration with Jorge Luis Borges (published under the pseudonym B.Suárez Lynch), Buenos Aires: Oportet y Haereses, 1946
Los que aman, odian, in collaboration with Silvina Ocampo, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1946
La trama celeste, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1948; with La invención de Morel, as The Invention of Morel, and Other Stories from “La trama celeste,” translated by Ruth L.C.Simms, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1964
Las visperas de Fausto, Buenos Aires: La Perdiz, 1949
Guirnalda con amores: cuentos, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1959
El lado de la sombra, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1962
El gran Serafín, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1967
Adversos milagros: relatos, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1969
Historias de amor, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1972
Historias fantásticas, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1972
Nuevos cuentos de Bustos Domecq, in collaboration with Jorge Luis Borges, Buenos Aires: La Ciudad, 1977
El héroe de las mujeres, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1978
Los afanes, Buenos Aires: Arte Gaglianone, 1983
Historias desaforadas, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1986
La invención y la trama, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1988
Una muñeca rusa, Buenos Aires: Tusquets, 1991

Screenplays
Los orilleros; El paraíso de los creyentes, in collaboration with Jorge Luis Borges, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1955
Les Autres, in collaboration with Jorge Luis Borges and Hugo Santiago, Paris: Bourgois, 1974

Other Writings
Prólogo, Buenos Aires: Biblos, 1929
La estatua casera, Buenos Aires: Jacarandá, 1936
Antes del novedecientos (recuerdos), Buenos Aires: n.p., 1958
Años de mocedad, Buenos Aires: Nuevo Cabildo, 1963
La otra aventura, Buenos Aires: Galerna, 1968
Memoria sobre la pampa y los gauchos, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1970

Editor, with Jorge Luis Borges and Silvina Ocampo
Antología poetica argentina, Buenos Aires, Sudamericana, 1941; as Antología de la poesía argentina, 1948
Compilations and Anthologies

Adolfo Bioy Casares, edited by Ofelia Kovacci, Buenos Aires: Ministry of Education and Justice, 1963

Páginas, Buenos Aires: Celtia, 1985 [selections]

Anthologies in Translation

A Russian Doll and Other Stories, translated by Suzanne Jill Levine, New York: New Directions, 1992

Further Reading

Camurati, Mireya, Bioy Casares y el alegre trabajo de la inteligencia, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1990

Curia, Beatriz, La concepción del cuento en Adolfo Bioy Casares, Mendoza: Universidad Nacional de Cuyo, 1986

Levine, Suzanne Jill, Guía de Adolfo Bioy Casares, Madrid: Fundamentos, 1982

Suárez Coalla, Francisco, Lo fantástico en la obra de Adolfo Bioy Casares, Toluca: Universidad Autónoma del Estado de Mexico, 1994

Tamargo, María Isabel, La narrativa de Bioy Casares: el texto como escritura-lectura, Madrid: Playor, 1983

Interviews

Gálvez, Raúl, From the Ashen Land of the Virgin, Oakville, Ontario: Mosaic Press, 1989

Ulla, Noemi, Aventuras de la imaginación: de la vida y los libros de Adolfo Bioy Casares, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1990

Augusto Boal 1931–

Brazilian playwright and drama theorist

During his varied career, Augusto Boal has written plays, essays and novels, worked as a theatre director and drama teacher, and played an active role in Brazilian politics, but it is as a drama theoretician that he has achieved international recognition. The innovative methods and techniques of his Teatro do Oprimido (Theater of the Oppressed) have not only been a major force in the development of Latin America’s New Popular Theatre, but have also had a huge impact in Europe and North America, where numerous theatre groups have been established to put his theories into practice. Few other Latin American cultural theorists can claim to have had such influence outside the region.

Boal began his work in the theatre in 1956, when, a year after returning from a period of study in the United States, he became artistic director of the Arena Theatre Company in São Paulo. The political atmosphere of the late 1950s and early 1960s in Brazil was highly charged. This was also a time when a wide range of artistic activity was conducted with the objective of stimulating the critical consciousness of the masses in order to help prepare them for political action; Arena was in the forefront of a nation-wide movement to develop a radical popular theatre. In common with many other young dramatists and directors of the period, the starting point for Boal’s work was the conviction that the principal task of the artist was to use art to fight for social and political change. Boal opposed traditional, bourgeois theatre, because he saw it as sterile, and essentially reproducing the mechanisms of oppression within society. He advocated instead a new theatre that would articulate the concerns and aspirations of the poor masses, and explore the forms of social change necessary for their interests to be realised. Predictably, some critics have attacked the ideological basis of Boal’s theatre, claiming it compromises artistic creativity. However, no one has done more to revitalize Latin America’s theatre, and the enormous appeal of Boal’s work among so many is to a large extent explained by the fact that, through its fusion with a diverse range of political, educational and community activities, it has successfully broken theatrical conventions and extended the possibilities of dramaturgy. Significantly, it has encouraged the participation of people who would otherwise have no involvement in the theatre.

With Arena, Boal wrote his first plays, all exploring aspects of political struggle in Latin America, such as Revolução na América do Sul, 1960 [Revolution in South America], a satire exploring the exploitation and poverty suffered by Brazil’s working classes, and A lua pequena e a caminhada perigosa, 1968 [The Small Light and the Dangerous Trek], a short work dedicated to Che Guevara. Boal benefitted from collaboration with other radical playwrights during this period, among them Gianfrancesco Guarnieri and Oduvaldo Viana Filho. Together they experimented with different forms and explored new themes. In plays such as Arena conta Zumbi [Arena Tells about Zumbi] and Arena conta Tiradentes [Arena Tells about Tiradentes], co-written with Guarnieri in the early 1960s, Boal began to re-examine past struggles in Brazilian history in order to draw lessons for the political conflicts of the present. Most important for Boal’s future development, however, were the experiments with new techniques which he carried out with Arena. He described the early years of his work as a “destructive phase,” because he placed such emphasis on seeking ways to disrupt the fixed structures and restrictive conventions of bourgeois drama in order to create a more fluid theatre which would stimulate popular participation. He developed techniques which aimed to create disorder, the most notable being the “Joker System,” referring to the Joker in a pack of cards, and how playing the Joker can upset the pattern of the game. The techniques of this system all served to undermine established forms, bringing about constant changes within a performance in order to increase the possibilities of creative expression.

Given the political objectives of Boal’s theatre, it is not surprising that its underlying theories have been strongly influenced by the work of Brecht, which set out the broad ways in which to break from the constraints of bourgeois theatre. It was Brecht who indicated how the theatre might present the world as changeable, not essentially immutable, and how it could employ popular materials, with which the subaltern classes could identify. Most significantly for Boal, Brecht sought to develop a theatre that challenged the traditional relationship between actor and passive spectator. The fundamental concern of Boal’s theatre has been to change the spectator into an active participant in order to empower him or her for social and political action.

However, Brecht’s work only represented a starting point for Boal, for, although it gives spectators the freedom to think for themselves, power to act is still passed on to the characters in the play. For Boal, that represented an advance at the level of consciousness-raising and the encouragement of critical thinking, but not in terms of action and actually empowering the spectators to act for themselves. That was the crucial issue which Boal set out to address in his theatre. Part of the solution was provided by the Brazilian educationalist, Paulo Freire, for whom all educational and cultural activity was to be conducted with the expressed aim of raising consciousness in order to politicize the marginalized and to enable them to participate in the transformation of their own society. That entailed breaking down the traditional relationship between dominant teacher and passive student, and encouraging the learners to control the course of their own learning. In the process, they would develop a critical awareness of their social experience which would allow them to reflect on the possibilities of change.

The military dictatorship and the resulting political repression forced Boal into exile in 1971, but he continued to develop his new theatre techniques abroad, particularly during extended spells in Argentina and France. His major work, Teatro do oprimido (Theatre of the Oppressed), published in 1974, sent the crystallization of ten years or more of research and experimentation into methods for transferring theatre-making to the marginalized sectors of society. The techniques presented in the work encourage the spectators to intervene in the dramatic action to change its course. The different alternatives are proposed, discussed and acted out. For Boal, this active participation on the part of those who have long been marginalized is a vital step which can serve as rehearsal for social action.

Boal’s approach is exemplified by the techniques of his “Forum Theatre,” where a situation is acted out, usually a problem experienced by a member of the group, and then possible solutions improvised. The result is then discussed, and the story acted out again, with the participants invited to intervene in the action to try out an alternative solution. More and more participation is demanded from members of the group, until the stage is reached where, effectively, they direct the entire action. Other exercises serve to develop powers of critical analysis, such as those of teatro jornal (Newspaper Theatre), in which reports from newspapers are read in different ways, varying the rhythm and tone, or reading the text in a completely new context, so as to view the content from different perspectives. The group then acts out the information conveyed in the report, and is invited to add elements they think may have been omitted. Building upon that is Boal’s teatro invisível (Invisible Theatre), where a rehearsed performance which raises social questions is acted out in a public place, concealing the fact that it is a theatrical performance from the onlooking public, who are drawn in as participants of the action. They are thus converted into actors, and become part of a public forum for the debate of social issues and possible solutions.

Boal’s theories and techniques have been much debated by drama critics. Some argue that even if the spectators are converted into actors, the fact that they are still operating within certain dramaturgical structures, in front of a public which makes demands upon them, means that they remain subjugated to theatre conventions. Yet Boal’s techniques are highly fluid, permitting constant changes of action and of strategies, and giving the participants new scope to assess, evaluate and to act. The aim is to ensure that their involvement in the theatre is accompanied by a high degree of critical awareness. Ultimately, new criteria are required to assess Boal’s work, since many of his techniques depart radically from the premises of traditional theatre, and cannot be examined easily with the methods of conventional drama criticism. Meanwhile, Boal’s theories on the theatre as a vehicle for liberation continue to be developed in new directions. There is considerable discussion as to the ways in which they can be adapted to new and different contexts in Europe and North America, and Boal himself, elected a city councillor for Rio de Janeiro in 1992, has used his methods among community groups to discuss and assess local problems, and propose legislative solutions. The Teatro do oprimido has stimulated a new phase of theatre activity in many parts of Latin America, and has established Boal as the region’s foremost drama theorist.

MARK DINNEEN

Biography

Born in the state of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 16 March 1931. Graduated in Chemistry; studied theatrical production at University of Columbia, New York. Returned to Brazil in 1955 and became director of the Teatro de Arena in São Paulo, 1956. Held this post until 1971 when he clashed with the military dictatorship as the result of his politically engaged theatre. Arrested, imprisoned and tortured. On his release in the same year he travelled first to Argentina, followed by Chile and Portugal, settling finally in Paris where, from 1978, he directed the Centre for the Study and Dissemination of Active Techniques of Expression, known familiarly as the “Groupe Boal.” Experimented with forms of psychodrama. Returned to Brazil in 1986 and became president of the Theatre of the Oppressed centre in Rio de Janeiro. In the early 1990s represented Rio de Janeiro in Brazilian Congress.

Selected Works

Plays

Revolução na America do Sul, São Paulo: Massao Ohno, 1960
Arena conta Tiradentes, in collaboration with Gianfrancesco Guarnieri, São Paulo: Livraria Editora Sagrana, 1967
Torquemada, in Teatro latinoamericano de agitación, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1972
3 obras de teatro, Buenos Aires: Noé, 1973
O corsário de rei, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1985

Novels
A deliciosa e sangrenta aventura latina de Jane Spitfire, espia e mulher sensual, Rio de Janeiro: Codecri, 1977

Short Fiction
Crônicas de nuestra América, Rio de Janeiro: Codecri, 1977

Other Writings
Categorías de teatro popular, Buenos Aires: Ediciones Cepe, 1972
Técnicas latinoamericanas de teatro popular, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1975
200 exercícios e jogos para o ator e o não-ator com vontade de dizer algo através do teatro, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1977
Stop! C’est magique!, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1980

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading

Schutzman, Mady and Jan Cohen-Cruz (editors), Playing Boal: Theatre, Therapy, Activism, London: Routledge, 1994 [Contains both essays and interviews with Boal]

Bolivia

19th-and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry
In cultural terms, Bolivia has long been the poor relation of its neighbours Peru, Argentina and Chile—all of which have a far more prestigious literary tradition. In contrast, such comment as exists on Bolivian literature is almost counterbalanced by investigation of the very reasons for this modest status. Much importance is usually ascribed to the country’s isolation from the main centres of colonial power until independence, and afterward as a result of the loss of the Pacific seaboard in 1879. Also blamed is the high indigenous population which has never been entirely Spanish-speaking, much less literate. The absence of a printing-press until late in the colonial era almost certainly had a negative effect, as did the prohibition of books during the same period. Finally, the political instability suffered by the country until recently was another reason for Bolivia’s perceived literary backwardness.

The Bolivian novel did not appear until well after that of most other Latin American states. Bolivian literature has been associated, not always unjustly, with a parochialism born of isolation, a debilitating political factionalism and the use of fiction as a polemical mouthpiece. The relatively small available readership has meant that writers have been constrained (and conditioned) by their activities in other professions.

The problems of drawing up a valid Bolivian literary corpus are exacerbated by such issues as reliable attribution, nationality of authors, and the switch from Upper Peru to the Republic. These difficulties stem from the tortuous history of Bolivia’s inception and process of self-definition.

However, to place too much emphasis on socio-political factors would be facile: moreover it would be deceptive to present too bleak a picture. Bolivia has produced a rather more valuable body of literature than is generally supposed. One of its most important early writers, and one widely regarded as the progenitor of the nation’s literature, was Bartolomé Arzáns de Orsúa y Vela. Arzáns’s work is widely regarded as precursor or founder of a national literature. In his monumental Historia de la Villa Imperial de Potosí [History of the Imperial Municipality of Potosí] there is an apparent discrepancy between the apocalyptic religious hyperbole favoured by the author and his sense of a burgeoning American identity. However, Potosí was of such economic and political importance by the 18th century that its image as a latter-day Sodom was not entirely inconsistent with its symbolic value as an American icon—one which was used notably by Bolivar. The Historia is a multivocal text, built up from a wide range of data including oral sources, biblical references, and the author’s personal observations. Another important and long-neglected text, again with its polemical thrust, was the extraordinary Quechua play Atau Wallpaj p’uchukakuyninpa wankan [Tragedy of the Death of Atau Wallpa] which deals with the Spanish Conquest from an indigenous perspective.

Colonial Upper Peru, though, was not generally productive on a literary level. The Independence movement provided some creative impetus, notable in the Quechua poetry of Juan Wallparrimachi, and the seditious verses or pasquines circulating at the beginning of the 19th century. However, if Arzáns was the founding father of the nation’s literature, the origins of the novel in this part of South America are more difficult to identify. While some would attribute even this mantle to Arzáns, others (like Augusto Guzmán in his 1955 survey La novela en Bolivia) attribute the first Bolivian novel to an outsider—in this case the Argentine statesman Bartolomé Mitre. In truth, prose fiction in Bolivia did not reach maturity until the late 19th century with the work of Ricardo Jaimes Freyre, Nataniel Aguirre and Alcides Arguedas. Jaimes Freyre, though better-known for the important collections of modernista poetry, Castalia bárbara, 1899 [Barbarous Castalia] and Los sueños son vida, 1917 [Dreams Are Life], wrote stories dealing critically with little-known or deliberately ignored areas of his country’s history. Aguirre’s novel Juan de la Rosa (1885) demonstrates his concern with formal developments and the renunciation of hegemonic narrative positions. The career of Alcides Arguedas was marked by the uneasy coexistence of “sympathetic” mystical-telluric views of the Indian seen in Wata Wara (rewritten as Raza de bronce [Race of Bronze] in 1919), and the Positivist notion, seen in the 1909 work Pueblo enfermo [A Sick People], that Bolivia’s traditions of subservience were compounded by the incompetence of the indigenous mind to cope with modern economic and social realities.

The mines have occupied a special place in Bolivian literature, reflecting their economic and cultural importance to the nation. Edgar Ávila Echazú’s Las minas bolivianas: historia, mito y literatura, 1984 [Bolivian Mines: History, Myth and Literature] traced the discourse of mining and its countercurrents from the beginnings of the Potosí silver boom to the heyday of tin in the 1920s. The nation’s vulnerability to outside exploitation appears, in mining literature as elsewhere, to require a solution to the problem of lack of internal cohesion.

Writing on the mines has run the ideological gamut between the Positivist stance of Jaime Mendoza’s En las tierras de Potosí, 1911 [In the Lands of Potosí], and the doctrinaire Marxist position of a novel such as Roberto Leytón’s Los eternos vagabundos, 1939 [The Eternal Vagabonds]. Mining literature, in a way that reflects its subject, is often seen in terms of two opposing camps or tendencies. These may be defined by social status and ethnic origin. Apart from social hierarchy, “above” and “below” may be seen as categories determined by an individual’s role in the mine. There is a discernible difference between authors with first-hand experience of mining and those without. The first “mining novelist,” Jaime Mendoza, is an example of the outsider, at a physical remove from the mine and a cultural distance from its workers. En las tierras de Potosí was based on his experiences as a mine doctor, allowing him a pseudo-scientific vantage-point used to fuel a Positivist “Negative Indianism.”

At the other end of the spectrum from Mendoza are the short stories of René Poppe, a La Paz writer who once worked in the mines in order to be able to describe the workers’ reality. Poppe’s work displays an undeniable intimacy with the miners’ physical environment, and some understanding of their interaction with it. The stories in his collection El paraje del Tío, 1985 [The Tío’s Niche] take place almost entirely below ground, where his characters—the miners themselves and their “deity,” the Tío—enjoy a certain cultural autonomy and are at least temporarily free from outside interference.

Certainly the mining novel is inextricably bound up with the actual events it portrays: this close link between political reality and fiction has long characterised the Bolivian novel and it will be interesting to see what will result, in cultural as well as social terms, from the waning importance of the mines.

The ruinous Chaco War against Paraguay was a socio-political watershed which spawned its own fictional genre in Bolivia. As Murdo J. McLeod has explained in his 1971 article, “The Bolivian Novel, the Chaco War and the Revolution,” the Chaco novel became an opportunity for national self-definition as well as for airing political grievances. A stock feature of most novels discussing the war is the campfire conversation, where the future of Bolivia is discussed by men with a variety of ethnic and geographical origins and who had previously been unaware of each others’ existence. Most writing stimulated by the experience of the Chaco had a left-wing bias: one of the most coherent Marxist voices of the era and author of the 1935 novel Aluvión de fuego Torrent of Fire], Oscar Cerruto, was seen as the originator of the Chaco-inspired social novel, and contributed to the process of national self-examination which followed the war.

The approach taken in Néstor Taboada Terán’s El signo escalonado, 1975 [The Stepped Symbol] is apparently unique. No other novel deals with the era immediately before the conflict and stops short of the event itself, paying more attention to the conditions which made the war a political expedient for Bolivia’s rulers. Similarly, Aureliano Belmonte Poo’s Carne de conquista, 1927 [Flesh of Conquest] is concerned with the internal condition of Bolivia, and proposes ways, five years before the conflict, of avoiding war with Paraguay. Although Cerruto’s Aluvión de fuego concentrates on conditions at home rather than on the conflict, it deals with social problems contemporary with the war rather than with its causes.

After the Chaco War there were various moves toward a “national literature,” a “vernacular school” which set out to express popular concerns. Cerruto lamented the disunity of his country, in which a person from the tropical north, for instance, would hardly recognise a compatriot from the high plains. Augusto Céspedes, a writer of elegant but highly subjective historical fictions, asserts in Metal del diablo, 1946 [The Devil’s Metal] that the Paraguayan nation had the advantage of “solidez racial y tradición” (racial sturdiness and tradition) over its adversary. This reflects two popular Bolivian misconceptions: one, that the Paraguayan war effort was characterised by solidarity and national unity; the other, that Paraguay could even be considered the victor. Augusto Roa Bastos’s novel of 1960, Hijo de hombre (Son of Man), explodes both these myths (which nevertheless tell us a good deal about Bolivia’s self-image).

There is a constant sense of alienation in most Bolivian social literature, and part of the literary output resulting from the Chaco War was aimed at resolving this national fragmentation: the result was the “exploratory novel” through which it was hoped that Bolivians would become at least theoretically familiar with their own geography. This kind of literature, as McLeod points out, had formal political sanction: the post-Revolution MNR (National Revolutionary Movement) government approved of the genre, which usually featured an expedition into the tropics, benefitting Bolivia’s long-term purpose of colonising these vast and underpopulated spaces. Today, this investigation of “lo propio” (what is ours) has inevitably become bound up with discussion of the cocaine trade. A novel like Tito Gutiérrez Vargas’s Mariposa blanca, 1986 [White Butterfly] is an example of the continuing preoccupation with the Oriente, or eastern lowlands, and its potential for either national salvation or perdition. The novel’s heavily moralising tone plays upon a vision of the lowlands as an Eden from which the people have been estranged through the corrupting effects of the drug trade.

National self-discovery had long been a formal preoccupation of Bolivian Positivists: however, they proposed external scientific investigation rather than any philosophical concern or metaphysical speculation on the essence of the Bolivian character. A fuller kind of exploration, both internal and external, was without doubt stimulated by the trauma of the Chaco.

The mestizo (mixed race) writer occupies an ambiguous position in a country with a majority indigenous population such as Bolivia. This is due to historical as well as social factors: writing has always had an active and instrumental role in the establishment and maintenance of political power. On the other hand, the oral tradition (most often associated with Aymara and Quechua but also strong in Spanish), has allowed local history and identity to develop with a degree of independence from the administrative centre. The role of the mestizo writer may be seen to lie in the discursive breach between these two; an assimilation of local or ethnic realities to the requirements of national or supranational identity.

An example of this can be seen in the use of oral historical sources in Bolivia, a remedy not only to the pilfering of historical documents by neighbouring countries and the US (which Arze terms “dependencia documental”); but also to Bolivians’ own profligate, uninformed attitude to their cultural patrimony. Oral sources have been used not only by historians but by several novelists: use of such material is seen as not only acknowledging cultural plurality but giving a voice to underprivileged (illiterate) social strata. An important addition to Bolivian literature in this regard has been the recent publication of testimonial documents such as the memoirs’ leader Domitila Barrios de Chungara ¡Si me permiten hablar! Testimonio de Domitila, una mujer de las minas bolivianas, 1977 (Let Me Speak! Testimony of Domitila, a Woman of the Bolivian Mines); Ana María Condori’s Nayán Úñatatavi, 1988 [My Awakening] which tells of the process through which a provincial Aymara-speaking girl reaches political and social awareness; rural union leader Enrique Encinás’s view of the 1952 Revolution Jinapuni—testimonio de un dirigente campesino 1989 [That’s How it Was: Memoirs of a Peasant Leader]; and, on a far less overtly political level, the stories of Elvira Espejo Ayka’s Ahora les voy a narrar [Now I’ll Tell a Story], in an Aymara-Spanish bilingual edition by Denise Y. Arnold and Juan de Dios Yapita, 1994.

Indigenist literature in Bolivia has often involved a demagogic stance; such was the case with the most vociferous opponent of Hispanic culture, the early 20th-century poet Franz Tamayo. Himself partly of Aymara descent, Tamayo imbued Indian ethnicity with a telluric mystique which largely derived from Nazism. Guillermo Francovich, who has written extensively on Bolivian art, thought and myth, has linked Tamayo’s indigenist supremacism to a Nazi model: Tamayo’s political rationale, as dubious in its way as that of Alcides Arguedas, brought equivocal reaction from the Marxist Indian ideologue Fausto Reinaga, who, in El indio y los escritores de América, 1968 [The Indian and the Writers of America], abandoned his earlier acceptance of the poet and rejected Tamayo as an oligarch and paternalist. Nevertheless the value of Tamayo’s contribution to Bolivian poetry, visible in such work as Nuevos Rubaiyat, 1927 [New Rubaiyat] and Epigramas griegos, 1945 [Greek Epigrams] is undeniable.

Responses to the degradation of indigenous culture through colonial and state propaganda have come in two essential forms: polemical writing produced by educated Indians such as Reinaga, and literature produced by pro-indigenous elements within the elite group, mostly in the latter half of the 20th century. Most problematic has been the confusion of three inevitably overlapping categories: “nation,” “ethnicity” and “class.” For many, the solution to such a multifaceted problem lies in a coherent definition of both the social position of the mestizo, and the role, in the future of Bolivia, of mestizaje (miscegenation).

The position of Bolivia’s intellectuals has followed a pattern dictated by the country’s fragmented geographical and social features, its isolation and segregation. Radical ideas have often emanated from the elite; the fiercely anti-Hispanic Tamayo, for instance, and the Marxist Augusto Céspedes, were from landed families. However well-intentioned they may have been, such authors have usually been shackled by ideological loyalties. An exception is the folklorist Rigoberto Paredes Candia (1870–1951), who did groundbreaking work on the mythical beliefs underlying indigenous cultures.

Enrique Finot’s Historia de la literatura boliviana, 1964 [History of Bolivian Literature] reminds us that Indianism was based not only upon ethnic considerations, but also had its mystic-telluric aspects. If so, it seems equally to reflect notions of class informed by the influx of Marxist ideas during the 1920s and 1930s.

The type of conservative Indigenism favoured by Tamayo and Arguedas was countered, in the early 20th century, by an Indianism more sympathetic to its subject. This can be seen in novels such as Raúl Botelho Gosálvez’s Altiplano, 1945 [High Plain]; Alfredo Guillén Pinto’s Utama, 1945 [My House] and, in particular, the work of Jesús Lara (1898–1980) which included indigenist fiction based on ethnographic research and Marxist precepts. The novels Surumi (1943) and Yanakuna (1952) are examples of his fierce vindication of Indian rights. He also wrote extensively on Indian song, storytelling and dance in La literatura de los Quechuas, 1958 [Quechua Literature] and produced an accessible Quechua-Spanish dictionary.

Carlos Medinaceli (1899–1949) was the chief exponent of the influential novela de cholos genre (cholo=acculturated urban Indian or mestizo) which developed between the Chaco War and the 1952 Revolution. If not truly an example of cultural mestizaje, the genre broke new ground in the attention it gave to the neglected urban mestizo as a repository of the Bolivian national character. According to Leonardo García Pabón, Medinaceli noted the poverty of the Bolivian novel and its inability to find what he termed a “genius loci” adequate to its surroundings. Perhaps the biggest failing of the national novel was, for Medinaceli, its adherence to realist and naturalist approaches which served ideological positions rather than producing any perceptive insight. Medinaceli recognised that the Bolivian novel was overtly documentary, but without being true to its subject. La chaskañawi [Star-Eyed Woman] controversially dealt with a scandalous affair between a young white man of landed family and a mestiza bar-owner, and opened the way for the examination, through fiction, of the hypocrisies attached to questions of race and class in Bolivia.

The challenge to privilege and vested interests to which Medinaceli’s work contributed was to culminate in the 1952 Revolution. This event, though, received little attention from writers—surely a testament to national disappointment at the failures of the new regime to implement worthwhile change. Instead came a period of stifled debate and the stultifying effect on Bolivian intellectual life of a dominant orthodoxy known as “Revolutionary Nationalism.” When the military regained control in 1964 the result was a prolonged spell of persecution and exile for many of the country’s writers. Perhaps the most influential event in the latter half of the 20th century, in terms of Bolivian fiction, has been Che Guevara’s guerrilla war in 1967. This provoked several novels, the most celebrated being Renato Prada Oropeza’s Los fundadores del alba, 1969 [Founders of the Dawn] which nevertheless, in attempting to fuse political content with literary experimentation, falls short on both counts.

Most critics agree on the significance of a 1959 novel, Los deshabitados [The Vacant Ones] by Marcelo Quiroga Santa Cruz, which marked a key year in Bolivian writing and stimulated a new phase. Quiroga’s novel brought a new approach to subject matter, language and narrative time and space which, although an isolated case, influenced subsequent novelists away from long-standing and anachronistic concerns. The years between 1960 and 1980 saw the last publications of an “old guard” of radical writers who made significant contributions: Arturo Von Vacano, Adolfo Costa du Rels, and Oscar Uzin. Mention must be made of Julio de la Vega’s Matías, el apóstol suplente, 1971 [Matthew, the Substitute Apostle]. Bolivia’s best living poet, Pedro Shimose, whose Quiero escribir pero me sale espuma, 1972 [I Want to Write but out Comes Foam] won the Cuban Casa de las Américas prize, continues to live and work in Madrid. However the most notable avant-garde writer of the 1970s is surely Jaime Saenz (1911–86), whose novel Felipe Delgado (1979) is a look at urban alienation and social deformation characterised by black humour, a taste for the absurd and grotesque, and an unusual distance from political debate.

More recent literature has echoed Saenz’s detachment, or at least adopted a less explicit approach to social issues. An example is Manuel Vargas’s Rastrojos, la novela de Fermín, 1984 [Leftovers, the Novel of Fermín]. Vargas’s work is imbued with the downbeat simplicity of his native Vallegrande, near Santa Cruz in the eastern lowlands. From the city of Santa Cruz itself is José Wolfango Montes, whose satirical novel Jonas y la ballena rosada, 1987 (Jonah and the Pink Whale), has been translated into English and filmed. The presentation of regional identity as a basis for fiction operates in Jesús Urzagasti’s Tirinea (1969) which weaves the folk traditions of his native Chaco into a modern fable, and is continued in his En el país del silencio, 1987 [In the Land of Silence]. Welcome recent publications include Poppe’s El viaje, 1993 [The Journey], the short stories of Edmundo Paz Soldán, (though written from the US and avowedly owing little to Bolivian models): the poetry of Blanca Garnica, and the irreverent experimental writing of Adolfo Cárdenas Franco.

The problems mentioned above, and the various literary approaches to them, amount to a general picture of social dislocation and failure of communication both in international and national terms. On a discursive level, there appears to be a vacuum caused by mutual incomprehension and distrust among the various local and ethnic groups comprising Bolivian society. So far, literature has been unable fully to address these dilemmas. However, there is reason to believe that new writers, with the backing of such stalwarts as Néstor Taboada Terán (see separate entry) can produce a literature adequate to the country’s growing needs.

KEITH J. RICHARDS

Further Reading

Cáceres Romero, Adolfo, Nueva historia de la literatura boliviana, La Paz: Los Amigos del Libro, 1987
Echeverría, Evelio, La novela social de Bolivia, La Paz: Editorial Difusión, 1973 Francovich, Guillermo, El pensamiento boliviano en el siglo XX, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1956
Gisbert, Teresa and José de Mesa, Esquema de literatura virreinal en Bolivia, La Paz: Biblioteca de Arte y Cultura Boliviana, 1963
Guzmán, Augusto, La novela en Bolivia, La Paz: Editorial Juventud, 1955
María Luisa Bombal 1910–1980

Chilean prose writer

It has been difficult to accommodate María Luisa Bombal within the Chilean literary mainstream. From the beginning she rejected the contemporary literary dogmas of regionalism in vogue in Chile and her vanguard prose, published first in Argentina, clearly indicated her innovative preoccupation with feminine themes and her desire to subvert traditional narrative technique. Moreover, although always nostalgic about her birthplace, Viña del Mar, Bombal actually lived little of her life in Chile: at the age of thirteen she left for school in France, returning briefly in 1931 only to move on to the brilliant literary scene of Buenos Aires before her long, voluntary exile in the US. Regrettably, her early reputation as an “exotic Bohemian” dogged her literary career both at home and abroad as details of her tumultuous private life were made public. All of this has undoubtedly contributed to a certain marginalization of this original and unconventional figure, although her finely-crafted prose, written “painfully and in silence” often “four, five and even six times over,” has enjoyed remarkable success. Her first two novellas, La última niebla, 1935 (The House of Mist), and La amortajada, 1938 (The Shrouded Woman), were published in Victoria Ocampo’s prestigious journal Sur to immediate critical acclaim, first in Hispanic America and then beyond with translations into English, French, Portuguese, Czech, Swedish and Japanese; her much anthologized short story “El árbol,” 1939 [The Tree], is now considered a classic in the genre; flattering parallels have been adduced between her poetic prose and that of Juan Ramón Jiménez and Pablo Neruda, or Virginia Woolf and James Joyce; and recent reevaluations of the canon have proposed La última niebla as a new founding fiction of modern Latin American writing.

Bombal intended her first novel to be “a sentimental drama” not an excursion into combative feminism. She did, however, initiate the recurring thematic pattern of her fiction in that, in La última niebla, the drama turns on a middle-class woman’s frustration in a loveless marriage and her gradual alienation from societal norms as she repeatedly asks, but cannot answer, “Why, why is the nature of woman such that a man always has to be the centre of her life?” The lyrical point of view of the first-person narrator is recorded as she translates emptiness and despair into the magical “interior movement” of a series of vital, passionate encounters between the self and the outer world. As a result causal and linear relationships are here displaced by a dynamic network of free-flowing, subjective associations. This transgression or disordering of the “logical” order is clearly apparent in the protagonist’s continual substitution of the verb ver (to see) by imaginar (to imagine), and her use of such vehicles of vision as mirrors, windows, water and, most significantly, the mist itself, to deform or reform the pragmatic copies of reality that vision customarily provides. As Bombal’s protagonist observes, the mist “immaterializes” in order that the imagination, prohibited from direct vision, materialize a new order. By construing this as the inability to grasp reality, earlier (male) readers found in the “hermetic” world of La última niebla evidence only of “an extreme femineity” characterized by both a lack of external action and a sense of individual confinement. More recent criticism has concentrated instead on the “blanks” in coherent, logocentric discourse in Bombal’s fragmented and fragmentary narrative, and her deliberate use of ambiguity which permits a plurality of interpretations that question the traditional binary opposition supposed in culture versus nature, or passivity and action, or dream and reason. Alienation is thus viewed positively as an innovative strategy which is both syntactical—making possible the oscillation between reality and otherness in this example of a fantastic narrative—and ideological—critiquing the arbitrariness of prevailing phallocentric standards that govern how to live and die “correctly.”

In her second novel, La amortajada, Bombal challenged the principle of verisimilitude even more radically by probing into the psyche of a dead woman who fictionalizes her previous existence. Since Ana María cannot speak, this very subjective narration is conducted through memory, free association, and the empathetic manipulation of an anonymous narrator who identifies closely with the experiences of her protagonist. The dominant metaphor here is that of weaving in the numerous references to thread and cloth, and Ana María’s tapestry revealed as a creative stratagem by which an otherwise passive protagonist asserts herself and eludes those realities she finds threatening. From the unravelling of these threads of memory comes spiritual regeneration as Ana María, like another Arachne, finds from within herself the wherewithal to spin the fabric of a new existence, a “life-in-death” rather than her previous “death-in-life.” In La amortajada Bombal created a novel of greater lyrical intensity than La última niebla, but once again her critique of a confined bourgeois existence centred on the alternative of the highly interiorized vision of female experience.

Bombal’s reputation was further enhanced by the publication, in 1939 and 1940 in the Argentine journals Sur and Saber Vivir, of four short stories, of which “El árbol” is undoubtedly the best known. In a series of flashbacks the protagonist, Brigida, recalls episodes from her past as she listens to a concert. Traditional autobiographical techniques are eschewed in favour of a predominantly omniscient third-person narration studded with increasing frequency by Brigida’s own thought-quotations. The antagonism thus set up between figural and narrative viewpoint makes for a certain ironic play that permits alternative readings of the text. Middle-class marriage is, as always, the starting point for the Bombalian heroine, and Brigida duly conforms, only to rebel later by separating from her much older husband, Don Luis. From a normative point of view, therefore, Brigida does not adapt—untutored and puerile, she distances herself from coherent social behaviour by separating from the husband who will give her name, status and, eventually, descendants. The psychological corroboration of this failure to conform comes in Brigida’s gradual alienation from society as she enters a private dream world. What is different here, however, is that Brigida’s mental lucubrations do identify the goal of self-realization and the story ends with her independent declaration in favour of “love, travel and madness.” Bombal’s innovative technique of “voicing” silence provides an alternative “disorder” to the traditionally male codification of life and art in accordance with the lineage, place and language of power.

After two brief visits to the US in 1937 and 1939, Bombal took up permanent residence there in 1941, working first as a script-writer and then in advertising. In 1944 she married Count Raphael de Saint-Phalle (Fal) and spent the next thirty years in New York. After an initial burst of literary activity that saw, with Fal’s help, the revised and augmented translations into English of her novellas as House of Mist in 1947, and The Shrouded Woman in 1948, Bombal published very little more. Her virtual eclipse from the literary scene after the late 1940s has been, wrongly, attributed to Fal’s restraining influence. More likely was the rationalization Bombal later made about a combination of writer’s block and separation from her mother tongue. Unable to “repeat” her literary successes, her perfectionism and “real anxiety, anguish even” over language made this a period of self-imposed censure in which she felt “persecuted” by her characters and “confined in prison.” Such feelings explain well the nostalgic tone and persistent intratextuality of Bombal’s last publications. Thus, in “Washington, ciudad de las ardillas,” 1943 [Washington, City of Squirrels], she offered a series of “Christmas cards” to depict the bitter reality of exile into which, as in earlier writings, she incorporated fragments of fairy lore to underscore the distress time passing caused this self-styled “unhappy poet who writes in prose;” while “La maja y el ruiseñor,” 1960 [The Princess and the Nightingale], another adult fairy-tale, echoed the earlier short story “Lo secreto” [The Secret] written in 1941—and its first version “Mar, cielo y tierra” [Sea, Sky and Land] published in 1940—in its anecdotal evocation of the sea at Viña, Bombal’s “corner of Paradise” and image to conjure up the magic of childhood lost in the adult world.

Although perfectly trilingual the language of composition was clearly an issue for Bombal. Her English translations sold well enough and House of Mist even netted handsome film rights, but her “quaint, syrupy prose” lacking “a logical, neat sense of contrivance” met with mixed reviews from the New York critics, who preferred to dwell upon her flamboyant lovelife rather than the sensorial rhythms and lyrical intensity of her writing. Bombal railed against the “wasp’s nest” that was American literary life and published nothing more in English. Significantly, the struggles of the female artistic consciousness provided the theme of her final publication that appeared in both Spanish and English: the short story “La historia de María Griselda” of 1946 was incorporated two years later into her English version of The Shrouded Woman. This was Bombal’s last analysis of a female mind trying to comprehend the primary sources of alienation and solitude. The complex narrative is created and sustained by the poetic imagination of a disillusioned woman, Ana María, who not only understands the nature of life’s often painful incongruities, but also knows of their destructive impact on the lives of those around her as evinced in Sylvia’s suicide or Alberto’s gratuitous violence and alcoholism.
As the tale unfolds, the confusion between first-and third-person narrators, in a framework of linear memory sequences outside of time or place, favours a symbiotic relationship between the omniscient self of the poet-novelist and the individual self of the figural mind that develops from this process. Through what is most appropriately read as an “anti-story,” the portrait of Griselda the docile, selfless heroine emerges as a dreadful cautionary tale of the female artist who, as victim of her sex and anatomy, can only inspire creativity but not engender it.

Caught herself in a similar paradox, Bombal responded, like all her female protagonists, by silence. Although she continued to write in both Spanish and English until the end of her life nothing appeared in print, neither have her heirs authorized publication or made her manuscripts available for critical comment. In view of this it is worth noting that, according to Sara Vial, the latter include theatre plays, “The Foreign Minister,” “Believe Me, Love” and “Dolly and Jekyll and Miss Hyde,” a collection of short stories, “Noche de luna” [Moonlit Nights], prose works, “El Señor de Mayo” [The Lord of May], the story of an earthquake in Chile, “Embrujo” [The Spell], and her last novel with a metaphysical theme inspired by and dedicated to Fal, “Y habló Caín” [And Cain Spoke]. Such titles confirm her abiding interest in the theatre, that began in Paris in the late 1920s with her early attempt at melodrama and her sometime dramatic studies at Charles Dullin’s Atelier with distinguished French actor Jean Louis Barrault as classmate. Comments in the numerous lectures and interviews given by Bombal in the last years of her life corroborate her continuing search for perfection in narrative technique, and her mid-life predilection for metaphysical and religious themes.

Inevitably, Bombal’s novels of female estrangement came under scrutiny during the 1970s but were, at first, given short shrift by orthodox feminists on account of the author’s reluctance to categorize her work so explicitly and the seemingly ineluctable fact that by their unprotesting subservience to gender norms her middle-class female protagonists only reinforced traditional images of woman’s subordinate role. Most recently, however, this “silence” has been interpreted as one of the typical subversive strategies deployed in vanguard writing by Bombal and other contemporaries like Norah Lange and Teresa de la Parra. Feminist critics now point out how well Bombalian texts, which overflow with rain, mist, ponds and puddles, exemplify the intuition about fluidity as essential to female discourse articulated by French philosopher Luce Irigaray in Ce Sexe qui n’en est pas un (This Sex Which is Not One), and look to Jacques Lacan’s analyses of the “Imaginary” and the “Mirror Stage” to provide insight into Bombal’s highly interiorized visions of the subconscious realm of female experience.

Coincidentally, Bombal’s first book appeared in the same year as the innovative Historia universal de una infamia, 1935 (A Universal History of Infamy); much later, the same Borges would assert that “when they name the best names, María Luisa Bombal is never missing from the list.” Without question she has won her place among the “new” Latin American writers whose exemplary modernity has made them classics.

K.M. SIBBALD

Biography

Born in Viña del Mar, Chile, 8 June 1910, into a prosperous and cultured family. Father died when María Luisa was ten. Mother and three daughters then settled in Paris. There María Luisa was educated at Notre Dame de L’Assomption and the Lycée La Bruyère, and later the Sorbonne where she studied literature and philosophy. Returned to Chile in 1931 and stayed on family estate in the south of Chile. Settled in Buenos Aires in 1933 where she lived in the home of the then Chilean consul, Pablo Neruda. Married the Argentine painter, Jorge Larco in 1934. After husband’s death she moved to New York, 1940. There she married Count Raphael de Saint-Phalle; one daughter, Brigitte. Led productive literary life in the US but returned to Chile in 1970 after her second husband died. Ignored by Chile’s cultural Establishment and never awarded the Chilean National Prize for Literature. Last few years were of isolation and heavy drinking. Died in Santiago de Chile, 6 May 1980.

Selected Works

Some of Bombal’s shorter narratives appeared for the first time in the Buenos Aires journal Sur, while the longer ones were published by the publishing house of the same name.

“El árbol,” Buenos Aires, Sur 69 (September 1939)

“La historia de María Griselda,” Buenos Aires, Sur 142. (August 1946); Valparaiso, Chile: Universitarias de Valparaiso, 1977

Further Reading

Agosín, Marjorie, Las desterradas del paraíso: protag en la narrativa de María Luisa Bombal, New York: Senda Nueva, 1983

Agosín, Marjorie e, Elena Gascon-Vera and Joy Renjilia (editors), María Luisa Bombal. Apreciaciones críticas, Teme, Arizona: Bilingual Press, 1987
The Boom

During the 1960s, Latin American, or more precisely Spanish American literature quite suddenly came to occupy the forefront of the international literary stage. Reading the fiction of Latin America became fashionable among the elite cultural circles of Europe and the United States and some novels became popular best-sellers. Many of the works in question were in fact written in Europe or the US, by writers in exile, voluntary or otherwise. Several factors contributed to this increased prominence of writers from Latin America: a cluster of fine, technically innovative novels all authored by men. These include Cortázar’s Rayuela (Hopscotch), Fuentes’s La muerte de Artemio Cruz (The Death of Artemio Cruz) and Vargas Llosa’s La ciudad y los perros, La casa verde and Conversación en La Catedral (The Time of the Hero, The Green House and Conversation in The Cathedral, respectively). Cabrera Infante’s Tres tristes tigres (Three Trapped Tigers), sought, as its tongue-twisting title indicates, to revitalize the language of literature through word play and the use of the Cuban vernacular. Another major novel to appear in the 1960s was Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude), to be followed by others over the next decade.

The Cuban Revolution focussed the world’s attention on a hitherto relatively unknown subcontinent, while it brought together writers who in the past had often worked in isolation and in ignorance of each other’s activities. Hispanic publishers saw the potential in all this and promoted the works of Spanish American writers very effectively in a growing market; translations followed; finally, some of the writers themselves were (or soon became) very adept at keeping in the limelight. It was being recognised that these writers were not simply exotic, but able craftsmen who were well-read in other literatures and ready to lead rather than simply imitate.

The writers of the Boom, mainly authors of prose fiction, do not constitute a formal movement with a clearly defined manifesto; but they can be said to have collectively brought Modernism to Latin America. The concept of magical realism, although its origins predate the Boom, is often invoked in relation to it; that somewhat ill-defined concept is perhaps most meaningfully applied to García Márquez’s Cien años de soledad. Writers from outside Latin America who influenced those of the Boom include Faulkner, Dos Passos, Virginia Woolf, Proust and Sartre; however, the single most important influence was probably one from Spanish America itself: Jorge Luis Borges. Even if some of the writers of the Boom (García Márquez, for example) disliked Borges, they respected his skills and acquired his respect for the disciplined use of language. The writers of the Boom broke with the established inclination to concentrate on regional or indigenist themes and instead tended to revel in narrative experimentation, self-referentiality and increasing demands made upon the reader. They were much more aware of each others’ activities than had been writers before them, and this awareness sometimes gives rise to intertextual allusions. Significant literature had certainly been written earlier in the century (one thinks of the works of Asturias, Carpentier, Onetti, Rulfo and Borges, to mention only some of the closest precursors who seemed to become assimilated to the Boom in an act of belated recognition) but those works had tended to be written in isolation and to have reached only a limited public.

The Boom was soon caught up in cultural politics, for its stars, at least in the early years, espoused the ideals of the Cuban Revolution, and this spurred the US into trying to steal some of the thunder by seducing them with comfortable visiting posts in its universities. Also important in shaping and promoting the Boom was the role of Seix Barral, a Spanish publishing house which instituted a prize for unpublished novels and awarded it to many of the writers who were to become most famous. Yet, while it is the case that the preeminence during the Boom of a few (undoubtedly excellent) novelists, allied with commercial interests, tended to crowd out other writers from Latin America who also deserved attention, it is also true that the Boom gave Latin American literature an international visibility from which many other writers have since profited.

There was no literary manifesto or cohesive credo among the writers of the Boom, but it is noticeable that their novels tended to be formally difficult and challenging for the reader; one of the most extreme examples, and perhaps the novel that marked a turning point, was Donoso’s El obsceno pájaro de la noche, 1970 (The Obscene Bird of Night). For an inclination was soon to develop towards greater accessibility, more simple linear narrative structure, and the incorporation of popular art forms; the work of Manuel Puig is often quoted as leading this transition to what was to be dubbed the “PostBoom.”

PETER STANDISH

See also entries on Magical Realism, The Post-Boom, Prizes, Translation: Spanish America
Further Reading

Fuentes, Carlos, La nueva novela hispanoamericana, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1969

Payne, Johnny, Conquest of the New Word: Experimental Fiction and Translation in the Americas, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993 [Chapter I is on García Márquez and the Latin American Boom]

Rodríguez Monegal, Emir, El boom de la novela latinoamericana, Caracas: Tiempo Nuevo, 1972

Special Issues of Journals

Review: Latin American Literature and Arts, vol. 33 (September-December 1984)

---

Jorge Luis Borges 1899–1986

Argentine prose writer and poet

Born in Buenos Aires of mixed English and Argentine stock, Jorge Luis Borges received most of his secondary education in Geneva during World War I and never attended a university. His earliest poetry was written in Europe under the influence of the avant-garde of the period. It was published in little magazines in Spain and France in and after 1919 as part of a Spanish movement called ultraísmo, of which Borges coauthored a manifesto in Mallorca in 1921. That same year he returned to Buenos Aires. With a group of friends he launched, through wall-posters, Prisma I and II (192.1 and 192.2), the magazine Proa and another manifesto in the review Nosotros (1921), Argentine ultraísmo. It sought to exclude anecdotic, human content and to strip poetry down to its alleged essence: figurative language. Ultraísta poems were supposed to be little more than patterns of novel images, without logical or syntactical connections or punctuation. Borges himself, however, rapidly evolved away from ultraísmo, first towards a more nationalistic position, with evocations of suburban Buenos Aires and other Argentine themes, and then towards more profound poetry on themes of solitude, time, the enigma of things and death. Love, sporadically present to begin with, was quickly eliminated. Borges was transforming himself into the metaphysical poet of “pensativo sentir” (thoughtful feeling) he was to become and remain in Poemas, 1943 [Poems], amplified in 1954 and 1958, El hacedor, 1960 (Dreamtigers), El otro, el mismo [The Self and the Other], 1969, Elogio de la sombra, 1969 (In Praise of Darkness), El oro de los tigres, 1972 (The Gold of the Tigers), La rosa profunda, 1975 (The Deep Rose) and La moneda de hierro, 1976 (The Iron Coin). The exception is Para las seis cuerdas, 1965 (For the Guitar), simple popular-type songs on Argentine themes. The emphasis on novel imagery gave way to the realization that poetic expression revolves around a few essential metaphors and, as Borges gradually lost his sight, his poetry returned to conventional versification which he could remember more easily. For much of his early manhood Borges was an under-employed intellectual. He worked as a librarian, as the editor of a magazine, El Hogar, and of a series of translated detective stories and as a lecturer. He and his family were persecuted by the dictator Perón, but after the latter’s fall he became director of the National Library and a member of the Argentine Academy of Letters. His international fame really began when he shared the International Publishers’ Formentor Prize along with Samuel Beckett. Sadly, he never became a Nobel Laureate. Late in life, he married twice and was survived by his second wife, María Kodama.

Borges’s early essay collections: Inquisiciones, 1925 (Inquisitions), El tamaño de mi esperanza, 1926 (The Size of My Hope), and El idioma de los argentinos, 1928 (The Language of the Argentines), contain valuable insights into the evolution of his ideas in the 1920s, but were rigidly excluded from his (so-called) Complete Works—much else is missing—in his lifetime, and only began to be republished in the 1990s.

In 1933 he published “Hombre de la esquina rosada” (Streetcorner Man), the first of many tales involving knife-fighters from the poor outer districts of Buenos Aires. Thereafter, physical and moral courage remained for him absolute values immune from his otherwise pervasive scepticism. In 1935 he brought out the tales of Historia universal de la infamia (A Universal History of Infamy), a group of stories adapted from other sources, concerned with evil, cruelty and deceit. These stories do not question reality as those of the 1940s tend to do, and their technique remains linear and generally chronological. By contrast “*El acercamiento a Almotasim.” 1935 (The Search for Almotasim), takes the form of a spoof book review and by that alone casts doubt on the difference between fiction and non-fiction. At the same time, the quest involved is metaphysical—man’s quest for God or the Absolute—which turns out to be circular and ambiguous in its result. Finally, in 1939, Borges wrote one of his most famous tales, “Pierre Menard, autor del Quijote” (Pierre Menard, Author of Don Quixote), which marked the beginning of his full maturity as a short-story writer and prefigured his two masterpieces Ficciones, 1944 (Fictions), amplified in 1956 and El Aleph, 1949 (The Aleph), amplified in 1952. These short stories, chiefly written in 1940s, mark that decade as the turning point in modern Spanish American fiction and established Borges as a writer of world stature, who figures prominently in discussions both of Modernism and Postmodernism.

His most important and memorable short stories are in a sense fables which explore a world without certainties or ultimate meaning, in which either all may be pure chance, or all perhaps conforms to patterns which we are not programmed to discern. Reality, whether outside ourselves or that of our own personalities, is enigmatic and language is probably not in the end capable of expressing it adequately. The appropriate stance is one of detached, sometimes humorous scepticism. But we are frequently conscious of the strain generated by the discrepancy between viewing the world unwillingly as a chaos and hoping against hope that it is a cosmos, albeit governed by mysterious laws. Borges’s most important symbol of life is that of a circular labyrinth. We are born into it; we are alternately comforted and tormented by its deceitful appearance of order; to reach what for each individual is its possible centre is usually to discover a hidden aspect of the self, the futility of the quest, or death. Despite the fundamental Argentinism of some of his tales, most of them, even when set in Argentina, can only be understood in universal, abstract terms. Typical are the “what if...?” type: what if the world were as the Idealist philosophers proclaim (“Tlön, Uqbar, Orbis Tertius”)? what if we were granted immortality (“El inmortal” [The Immortal])? or total recall (“Funes el memorioso;” [Funes the Memorious])? or a simultaneous vision of all things (“El Aleph” [The Aleph])? or the ability to redeem our greatest failing (“La otra muerte” [The Other Death])? Some tales are clear allegories of the human condition: “Las ruinas circulares” (The Circular Ruins), “La Biblioteca de Babel” (The Library of Babel), El congreso (The Congress). Some deal with evil and treachery: “La Casa de Asterión” (The House of Asterion), “La forma de la espada” (The Shape of the Sword), or with the limitations of human knowledge or rationality: “La busca de Averroes” (Averroes’s Search), “La muerte y la brújula” (Death and the Compass). To some critics, especially in the 1970s, all Borges’s stories deal in the end only with writing and should not be seen primarily as commenting on life and reality; but this view seems reductive. Some of Borges’s later stories, such as “La intrusa” (The Intruder), “El indigno” (The Unworthy Friend) or “Historia de Rosendo Juárez” (Rosendo’s Tale) deal with the mystery of the individual personality, but this is a more familiar theme than that of the enigma of reality and these tales sometimes seem less successful.

Technically, many of Borges’s stories (especially the earlier ones) break completely with old-style realism, rejecting its uncritical use of episodes juxtaposed in chronological order based on the notion of cause and effect. Occasionally, as already noted, Borges used apparently non-fictional forms to blur the distinction between the “imaginary” and the “real”; sometimes he brought “low” fictional forms—the spy story, the detective or mystery story—into “high” literature. Almost always, in his best stories, he used crafty devices—stories within stories, artfully concealed shifts of theme, hidden clues, traps for the unwary reader—to add a puzzle-element which symbolizes the complexity of the real. Often, too, the second part of a story comments ironically on the first part. Borges wrote with extreme meticulousness, often after honing a story in his mind for years. Nothing is there by chance, and no Borges story is fully understood unless all the details fit.

Always the industrious professional writer, Borges published minor fictional works in collaboration with his friend Adolfo Bioy Casares, a couple of screenplays, translations of Virginia Woolf and Kafka, some works of literary history, books on Dante, Buddhism and fantastic animals in literature, sundry miscellanies and dozens of prologues, many of which are uncollected. His other non-fictional works include: Evaristo Carriego, 1930, Discusión, 1932 [Discussion], Historia de la eternidad [History of Eternity], 1936, and most importantly Otras inquisiciones, 1952 (Other Inquisitions). They reveal Borges’s sometimes quirky literary tastes, his sometimes quaint erudition and his general intellectual and philosophical outlook. More than any other single influence, his combination of existential preoccupation and subtly non-realist technique helped to change the entire face of Spanish American fiction. The Cuban author Guillermo Cabrera Infante has asserted that no Spanish American writer escapes the influence of Borges’s work.

DONALD L. SHAW

Biography

Selected Works

Short Fiction

El jardín de senderos que se bifurcan, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1942

Dos fantasías memorables, in collaboration with Adolfo Bioy Casares (published under the pseudonym H.Bustos Domecq), Buenos Aires: Oportet y Haereses, 1946

Un modelo para la muerte, in collaboration with Adolfo Bioy Casares (published under the pseudonym B.Suárez Lynch), Buenos Aires: Oportet y Haereses, 1946

La muerte y la brújula, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1951
Nuevos cuentos de Bustos Domecq, in collaboration with Adolfo Bioy Casares, Buenos Aires: La Ciudad, 1977

Poetry
Fervor de Buenos Aires, Buenos Aires: Serrantes, 1923
Luna de enfrente, Buenos Aires: Proa, 1925
Cuaderno San Martín, Buenos Aires: Proa, 1929
Poemas 1922–1943, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1943
El otro, el mismo, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1969
El oro de los tigres, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1972
La rosa profunda, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1975
La moneda de hierro, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1976
Historia de la noche, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1977
Adrogué, Argentina: Ediciones Adrogué, 1977 [includes prose]
La cifra, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1981

Essays and Other Writings
Inquisiciones, Buenos Aires: Proa, 1925
El tamaño de mi esperanza, Buenos Aires: Proa, 1926
Discusión, Buenos Aires: Gleizer, 1932
Las kenningar, Buenos Aires: Colombo, 1933
Nueva refutación del tiempo, Buenos Aires: Oportet y Haereses, 1947
Aspectos de la literatura gauchesca, Montevideo: Número, 1950
Antiguas literaturas germánicas, in collaboration with Delia Ingenieros, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1951

El “Martin Fierro,” in collaboration with Margarita Guerrero, Buenos Aires: Columba, 1953

Leopoldo Lugones, in collaboration with Betina Edelberg, Buenos Aires: Torquel, 1955

The Spanish Language in South America: a Literary Problem; El gaucho Martin Fierro, London: Hispanic and Luso-Brazilian Councils, 1964 [lecture]

Literaturas germánicas medievales, in collaboration with María Esther Vázquez, Buenos Aires: Falbo, 1966

Prólogos, Buenos Aires: Torres Agüero, 1975

¿Qué es el budismo? in collaboration with Alicia Jurado, Buenos Aires: Columba, 1976

Borges oral, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1979 [lectures]

Nueve ensayos dantescos, Madrid: Espasa Calpe, 1982

Los conjurados, Madrid: Alianza, 1985

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras completas, edited by José Edmundo Clemente, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 9 vols, 1953–60

Obra poética, 6 vols, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1964–78

Nueva antología personal, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1968

Obras completas, edited by Carlos V.Frias, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1974

Prosa completa, 2 vols, Barcelona: Bruguera, 1980

Borges, a Reader: Selections from the Writings, edited by Emir Rodríguez Monegal and Alastair Reid, New York: Dutton, 1981

Biblioteca personal: próslogos, Madrid: Alianza, 1988

Anthologies in Translation

Further Reading

Alazraki, Jaime (editor), Borges and the Kabbalah and Other Essays on His Fiction and Poetry, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988
Balderston, Daniel (editor), The Literary Universe of Jorge Luis Borges: an Index to References and Allusions to Persons, Titles and Places in His Writings, New York: Greenwood Press, 1986
Bloom, Harold (editor), Jorge Luis Borges, New York: Chelsea House, 1986
Cortínez, Carlos (editor) Borges the Poet, Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1986
Di Giovanni, Norman Thomas, et al. (editors), Borges on Writing, New York: Dutton, 1973; London: Allen Lane, 1974
Di Giovanni, Norman Thomas (editor), In Memory of Borges, London: Constable, 1988
Lapidot, Ema, Borges and Artificial Intelligence: an Analysis in the Style of Pierre Menard, New York: Peter Lang, 1991
Shaw, Donald L., Borges: Ficciones, London: Grant and Cutler, 1976
Stabb, Martin S., Borges Revisited, New York: Twayne, 1991
Bibliographies

Interviews

Nueva refutación del tiempo

Essay by Jorge Luis Borges
Time, Borges writes at the beginning of Historia de la eternidad, 1936 [A History of Eternity], presents perhaps the most vital of all metaphysical problems. For him, the fact that it does so undermines both our confidence in our ability to understand reality and our sense of the unity and continuity of our individual personalities. For we tend to explain reality in terms of chains of causes and effects following one another chronologically. But what if this notion of an on-going line of time linking things understandably together were an illusion, or merely referred to only one of several co-existing dimensions of time? If we could see time in other ways (as a perpetual present, as circular, as a web of different timescales of which we are programmed to recognize only one), our notion of reality might change radically. Time affects our memory, which is our only real link with our past selves, so that awareness of the mystery of time is simultaneously awareness of the mystery of the personality. To question our notion of time is thus to question some of our most ingrained assumptions, and ultimately to suggest that all reality, including that of ourselves, is really just a construct, not something existing objectively.

One of Borges’s aims seems to be to question, and thus encourage us to question, the comfortable presuppositions by which we live. His two-part essay “Nueva refutación del tiempo,” 1944 and 1946 later republished in Otras inquisiciones, 1952 (Other Inquisitions), examines arguments undercut much of what we take for granted in everyday life. It begins from George Berkeley’s premiss, that of pure philosophical idealism: all things exist only as they are perceived by the mind. Objects as such exist outside the human mind only because they are continuously perceived by the divine mind. However, Berkeley salvaged the idea of the on-going personal identity of the individual perceiver. Hume, though, went further, replacing individual human identity with a mere flow of perceptions. Borges, taking up the argument in his essay, goes further... still. If there is no soul or spirit, if there is no mass or space outside the mind, he asks, how can we defend the idea of continuity, of a before and after for each perception? Each fleeting instant of awareness is completely autonomous; to link them together in series is to cultivate an illusion. On the other hand, it is perhaps possible for the same perception to be shared by different minds, such that each individual “lives” the same “moment,” even at what we would normally call different times. The way our intelligence is programmed and the way language itself functions, he admits, imply chronological succession. So it is hard for us to contemplate the idea of time as a delusion or to deny the ideas of an on-going self or an external world with its history. At the beginning of the essay, Borges confesses that he is not personally convinced by the arguments he adduces, calling them word-games. But at the end he utters the anguished wish that they were true and that the world were not a real world in which the fate of the individual is governed by inescapable conditions, among them subjection to time.

DONALD L. SHAW

Editions

El jardín de senderos que se bifurcan

Short story by Jorge Luis Borges

Clearly, “Nueva refutación del tiempo” is highly relevant to several of Borges’s best-known stories. In “Tlön, Uqbar, Orbis Tertius” reality is reduced to mental perceptions. In “El milagro secreto” (The Secret Miracle) time stops while the protagonist completes a play in which time contains circularities. “La muerte y la brújula” (Death and the Compass) ends with the idea of an Eternal return. But perhaps more interesting is “El jardín de senderos que se bifurcan” (The Garden of Forking Paths). The outer frame of the story is a highly original spy-story which, like the detective-story format of “La muerte y la brújula” situates Borges among the precursors of Postmodernism, one of which features is said to be the blurring of distinctions between “high” and “low” literary genres. Yu Tsun, a Chinese in the pay of Germany in World War I needs to transmit from England to his masters in Berlin the message “Albert,” the name of a town in Flanders from which the British are about to launch an attack. To do so he murders an individual named Stephen Albert and is arrested and condemned to death. But before being killed Albert turns out to have solved the mystery of a novel written by one of Yu Tsun’s ancestors. “El jardín…” is replete with irony. Liddell Hart, whose book on World War I is mentioned at the beginning as one of its sources, points out that the place of the attack was an open secret, so that Yu Tsun’s murder of Albert is futile. Worse still Yu Tsun has killed the only man to have explained his ancestor’s secret. As elsewhere in Borges, reality ironically refuses to submit to our desire to impose a pattern on it. Plans go wrong; quests fail; man is cut down to size.

During the meeting between Yu Tsun and Albert, the story suddenly changes course. Yu Tsun’s ancestor has set out to write a book and to construct a labyrinth. Albert explains that the book is the labyrinth. It describes “Un invisible laberinto de tiempo” (An invisible labyrinth of time). Instead of a chain or chains of episodes illustrating a principle of selection by the author, all possible outcomes of each individual episode are followed out, so that each action or decision leads to an ever more complex series of future consequences, all evolving in parallel and intersecting each other. Ts’ui Pên, the author, is described by Albert as obsessed by “el abismal problema del tiempo” (the abysmal problem of time). Hence his intricate novel is in fact a riddle, the answer to which is the word time. Ts’ui Pên, that is, believed time to be like an inextricable network of separate strands of time, criss-crossing each other and all evolving at once. At the peak moment of the story, Yu Tsun is granted a momentary sensation of time pululating like this all round him. Borges is clearly challenging the reader to take into account that time might well operate in this way and that our limited vision of a single time-flow may well be a simplification, with all that it would entail for our worldview.

But details of the story alert us to the fact that this is only one of several hypotheses. When, near the beginning, Yu Tsun realizes that he alone must undertake the task of transmitting the secret to the Germans and that it will involve his own death, time suddenly freezes:” reflexioné que todas las cosas le suceden a uno precisamente, precisamente, ahora. Siglos de siglos y sólo en el presente ocurren los hechos” (I reflected that everything happens to one precisely, precisely now. Centuries of centuries and things happen only in the present). We detect the similarity with Borges’s mention in “Nueva refutación del tiempo” of “nosotros que somos el minucioso presente” (we who are the finely detailed present) and of the fact that “El presente es la forma de toda vida” (The present is the form of all life). Another alternative still remains. Yu Tsun tells us that his ancestor Ts’ui Pên’s labyrinthine novel works, and chooses as an example a situation in which an unknown assailant may or may not murder Fang, because of a secret. At the end of the story, Yu Tsun, a foreigner and a stranger, murders Albert for a secret reason. Thus time may be in some cases circular, the same episode repeating itself with minor variations. The last adjective of the tale, “innumerable,” referring to Yu Tsun’s contrition and weariness after the murder and his arrest, is there to remind us that in all possible dimensions of time evil behaviour will bring remorse and regret.

Time, then, may be “una red creciente y vertiginosa de tiempos divergentes, convergentes y paralelos” (an ever-growing and vertiginous web of divergent, convergent and parallel times), a labyrinth, in fact. If we look at the structure of the tale, we notice that, in making his way from the railway station to Albert’s house, Yu Tsun realizes that he has been given directions similar to those for moving through a labyrinth. In other words, a static, spatial labyrinth is evoked to prepare us for the idea of an ever-expanding temporal labyrinth. The second reinforces and amplifies the impact of the first. A maze of country lanes leads us to the disturbing concept of innumerable pasts and presents for each moment in time. Other details of the story are similarly relevant to the theme of the mystery of time. The fact that Yu Tsun writes his confession as he awaits imminent execution reminds us of the infinite preciousness of the here and now. Who more than a man facing death could appreciate the idea of time frozen into an eternal present.
notion of circular time is alluded to by the circular moon, a circular clock, a circle of lamplight and a gramophone record turning beside a bronze Phoenix.

Typically, Borges in “El jardín…” combines a (highly dramatic in this case) realistic-type frame story which deceives us by its reassuring similarity to a familiar genre, with a strange and disturbing core, containing unexpected abstract and quasimetaphysical considerations. Nor is the core simply inserted into the frame; the two interact functionally. Form and content combine to undercut our complacency in the face of life.

DONALD L. SHAW

Editions

Translation: There are several translations of this story which was included by Borges in Ficciones. An accessible one is that by Donald Yates in Labyrinths: Selected Stories and Other Writings, New York: New Directions, 1962; Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1970. There are recent reprints.

Brazil

19th-Century Prose and Poetry

At the beginning of the 19th century, Brazil was still part of the Portuguese colonial empire. From the 17th century, this South American colony had relinquished more of its riches to Lisbon than any other, and had already shown strong signs of wanting to become an independent nation. For this reason, it was kept under strict control by the Portuguese government. The most resolute separatist movement had appeared in Vila Rica, in the province of Minas Gerais. The thrust of its ideas derived from reading the French Encyclopedists while pragmatism was influenced by the North American commanders who had been successful in securing the United States’ independence from Britain. Joaquim José da Silva Xavier, the movement’s presumptive leader, known as Tiradentes, was hanged, while fellow-conspirators, such as the poet Tomás Antônio Gonzaga, were punished effectively through banishment to Africa.

France too gave impetus to the fight for independence. In 1808, Napoleon refused to accept Portugal’s decision to support the English cause, and he resolved to invade the country. Immediately, the Prince Regent, Dom João, shifted the capital of the Empire from Lisbon to Rio de Janeiro, by transferring both himself and his entire court to Brazil. As soon as he arrived, he adopted measures essential to the efficient running of State affairs, and this lead quite naturally to a relaxation of both the economic and political constraints to which Brazil had been subjected and which, until that point, had been ruthless. The Prince Regent threw open the doors to the “friendly nations;” he allied himself with England, thus increasing trade with Europe and releasing Brazilian products from the control of Portuguese import taxes. He also launched the Royal Printers which abolished the ban on the publication of books and reading materials in the colony, and made the circulation of news and ideas possible: moreover, he encouraged the establishment of local industry, which until that point had been hampered by legislation and had condemned the entire country to monocultivation or to mining operations. These activities, such as the sugar plantations in the northeast and the prospecting for gold and diamonds in the central western regions, yielded great profits for, yet did not compete with, the fragile Portuguese economy. In fact they kept it going.

Merchants such as John Luccock, who was in Brazil between 1808 and 1818, together with artists such as Jean-Baptiste Debret, bore direct witness to the level of growth which Rio de Janeiro underwent at this time. The city developed refinements and maturity to receive the Portuguese royal family and their distinguished entourage. By 1821, when they had all returned to Portugal, there was no going back for Brazil, even though the government in Lisbon tried to force it to do so. Members of the ruling classes of the time, together with politicians of the importance of José Bonifácio de Andrade e Silva, opposed the Capital’s machinations and persuaded Prince Pedro, the son of Dom João, to head the independence movement, which was begun in 1822 and ratified by 1825.

The new nation, aware that not only political independence, but also symbols and images which would represent this independence were needed, began to search for ways of portraying its individuality and to demonstrate that Brazil really was a separate nation from Portugal. Literature was chosen to fulfil this role, as was described in detail by Ferdinand Denis who had been in Brazil between 1816 and 1819 and had visited Rio de Janeiro and Bahia. In 1826 he published in Paris the Résumé de l’histoire littéraire du Bresil [Summary of the History of Brazilian Literature] thus gathering together the literary works of the 17th and 18th centuries which could be attributed to writers born there. By suggesting that “South America must have freedom of expression as well as of government,” he summed up the ideas which would set apart the Romantic generation, who had been invited to fulfil the role of providing the nation with its own literary works and thus lend credence to its independent status.

Although it was left to the Romantics to implement this plan, it was the plan itself which was responsible for determining the direction which 19th-century Brazilian literature would take. This in turn gave an outlet to the concept of dualism, which, henceforth, was to be firmly rooted in the country’s activities. This dualism comprised the conflict between, on the one hand, the search for a truly national form of expression, free from any possible European influence (superficially Portuguese but French in essence); and on the other, attendance at and use of the most advanced academies and literary styles, which were created and spread within the very same Europe which Brazil had chosen to reject.

France once again played a starring role by helping out in this conflict, as the first Brazilian Romantics graduated from Parisian academies. It was there that, in 1836, Domingos José Gonçalves de Magalhães, together with Manuel Araújo Porto Alegre and Francisco Sales Torres Homem, published the journal Niterói. This included the Ensaio sobre a literatura do Brasil [An Essay on Brazilian Literature], in which Brazilian poetry was accused of being “a Greek woman clad in French and Portuguese styles and adapted to the climate of Brazil; a Helicon virgin who, while wandering through the world, has ripped her mantle which was made by Homer’s own hand; and while sitting in the shade of the South American palm trees, she comforts herself with memories of her homeland, and imagines that she can hear the soft murmuring of Castalia, the tremulous whispering of Lodon and Ismenius, and she mistakes a song-thrush which is warbling amongst the branches of the orange tree, for a nightingale.” To try to redress this situation Gonçalves de Magalhães published the verses of Suspiros poéticos e saudade [Poetic Sighs and Nostalgia] in the very same year and, again, in Paris. This work is said to announce the arrival of Romanticism in Brazil.

However, it was another Gonçalves, Gonçalves Dias, who set the song-thrush warbling in the shade of the palm trees of South America. Although Gonçalves de Magalhães had been the pioneer of Romanticism, his Neoclassical training as a poet prevented him from breaking the necessary ties with the past. Not even when he returned to writing plays and founded the national theatre with his tragedy Antônio José, ou o poeta e a inquisição [Antonio José, or the Poet and the Inquisition] written in 1837 and staged in 1838, nor when he adopted an Indianist style of writing with his 1857 piece entitled A confederação dos Tamoios [The Confederacy of the Tamoio Indians] was Magalhães able to produce literary work of some quality. On the other hand, Gonçalves Dias enjoyed the success which had eluded Magalhães: with his 1846 work, Primeiros cantos [First Songs], Brazilian poetry discovered the themes and discourse which until this point it had lacked. Now it was equipped to converse in a simple yet lyrical way about the country, about the beauty of nature and about the poet’s torments and passions. These were the goals of the poem Canção do exílio [The Song of the Exile]. The book’s title is also that of the opening text; its verses are remembered, recited and parodied even today by everyone who struggles with the national anthem.

Dias was also responsible for the success of the Indianist theme, the most distinctive product of Romantic aesthetics. Since the first demonstrations during the colonial period, the Indian tribes had been providing plots and characters for novels written about Brazil. The Carta (Letter) of Pero Vaz de Caminha begins the series of works by sailors, historians and chroniclers, which refer to the indigenous population of Brazil at the time of the Discoveries. This process continued until the 19th century, when European scientists ventured into the continent’s interior in search of research data. In their turn, 18th-century poets such as Basílio da Gama, Santa Rita Durão, Alvarenga Peixoto and Silva Alvarenga, disciples of the reformist ideas of the Encyclopedists and of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, had accorded the Indian the status of most revered symbol of South America in general, and particularly of Brazil.

But Romanticism went further, as Dias wrote poetry with an Indianist theme from the point of view of the savages themselves. Thus, in “I-Juca-Pirama” he portrays the heroes as having strong, manly voices and the features of courageous warriors; men who are both decent and powerful, for whom honour matters above all else. In “Leito de folhas verdes” [The Bed of Green Leaves] he reverses this process by assuming a lyrical style when he, as the narrator, puts himself in the position of an indigenous woman who is waiting for her lover and sees her expectations dashed.

Indianism turned the main desire of the Romantics into a reality, and it generated a style of poetry totally inspired by local themes and characters. This style became popular because of its acceptance by readers and because it was copied for many decades by later generations throughout Brazil. Linked to Rousseau’s ideals of the “noble savage,” and probably influenced by Rousseau’s work, Indianism was a watershed as it classified works, which were written according to its principles, as expressions of Romanticism; equally, it set these works apart from those which had both come before and were to follow. Indianism was the result of stinging criticism levelled at the Brazilian literary world, and this determined its role as the dominating style.

Although Romanticism was not restricted merely to the concept of Indianism, this was indeed the overriding tendency of the era. Between the years 1840 and 1880, it was manifested in the poetry of Gonçalves Dias, in the novels of José de Alencar and in the plays of Martins Pena. Romantic poetry also encompassed other themes, the most notable of these being of an intimate and romantic nature. They tell of hapless lovers, of the loss of childhood innocence, and of the loneliness of the lyrical subject. Álvares de Azevedo, a disciple of Byron, was the first writer to nurture the idea of “the malaise of the era” and in his verses where he courts death, he finds an outlet for his egotistical and lonely subjectivism. Casimiro de Abreu created a more youthful work, which was a resounding success with the public, however here as well, evidence of individualism and ego worship, the writer’s main areas of interest, are also apparent. Fagundes Varela stereotyped this style and, indeed, took it to its limits; but in this way a niche was created for poetry of a more social nature, which Castro Alves takes on board.

Alves is responsible for a more energetic style of lyrical poetry, less concerned with the sorrow of the lyrical subject. But his merit lies in the fact that he brought up the subject of slavery. Although he was young when he died, he had enough time to produce powerful poetry such as Vozes d’África [Voices from Africa] and Navio negreiro [The Slave Ship], his most original and well-known works, which were published posthumously in 1880. These poems, he condemns the evils of the slave trade and declares the freedom of the blacks to be of pressing importance.

Castro Alves died in 1871, at a time when new writers, such as disciples of Baudelaire and of the French Parnassian school of poetry, eager for a more realist style and uninterested in the heroes who epitomised the national character, began to question the aesthetics of Romanticism. Romanticism lingered because of its ability to support yet another generation of poets, dramatists and novelists, thus spreading its influence over many decades and parts of the country. But precisely for these reasons, its resources were overstretched.

Although Romantic poetry was said to embody the original thought and national character so desired by historians and literary critics, such as Ferdinand Denis and Gonçalves de Magalhães, at the same time it had to distinguish itself from its predecessors and was treated as the inferior style of writers intent on copying the European approach. The Romantic novelists, however, had a different role, and one which was easier to play. Novel-writing began in the 18th century and became popular in the 19th century: thus there were no models to imitate, so the field was open to free artistic expression. However, this freedom was a problem in itself as the would-be novelists lacked a tradition to follow. Consequently, they had to win the public’s approval, as the potential readership had little knowledge of the genre.

The Romantic novelists invented the Brazilian novel. Joaquim Manuel de Macedo undertook the task, and the work which launched his career was a great success. A moreninha, 1845 [The Dark-Skinned Girl] was immediately accepted by the Rio de Janeiro public and for many decades remained the favourite reading of young Brazilian women. There are many reasons for its success: the narrative deals with a daily existence with which the reader can easily identify; the narrator puts himself in a position which allows him to talk to both the fictional characters and the reader; the plot is simple and the characters are jolly and appealing. This formula worked well and Joaquim Manuel de Macedo evolved a highly successful career as a writer, to which he added, above all in the 1840s and 1850s, that of chronicler of life in Rio de Janeiro.

In the 1850s, the novel evolved in different ways, and the writer who was principally responsible for this shift was José de Alencar. Although he had made his debut with two sentimental novels, that is, Cinco minutos, 1856 [Five Minutes] and A viuvinha, 1857 [The Widow], he received public acclaim in Rio de Janeiro for O guarani, 1857 [The Guarani Indian], a historical novel with an Indianist theme. In this novel, Alencar brought the undertaking of Gonçalves Dias to the fictional world: he created a hero of national dimensions, a representative, amongst the indigenous races, of the finest gentlemanly qualities. He achieved the perfect combination of character and the natural backdrop, by appreciating the merits of the Brazilian landscape, in accordance with the maxims of historians and literary critics. He penned a thrilling narrative, full of action, adventure and pace from beginning to end. Finally, he wrapped the whole thing in a mythical enchantment, thus raising the protagonist to the status of timeless symbol and focus of hero-worship by his followers, whether they were other writers or the enthusiastic readers.

With his novel Iracema (Iracema, the Honey-Lips, a Legend of Brazil) published in 1865, José de Alencar continued his Indianist project, embracing it as the way to relate the myths and legends of Brazil to the emerging nation; that is, as the way to bring to life figures from the past, who would serve as guides and role models with which to set standards for presentday behaviour, and with which to set precedents for how the Brazilian people would identify with their past. In his portrayal of the story of the priestess who abandons her tribe and her family because of her love for a Portuguese soldier, Martin, by whom she has a son, (the archetypal Brazilian), Alencar took his lead from the tales of the foundation of the Roman Empire, and compares the future of Brazil with the mighty past of this Empire.

Ubirajara (Ubirajara: a Legend of the Tupi Indians), written in 1874, is Alencar’s last indianist romance. In the interim, he had written historical novels, thus defining the nation’s history by the use of hero figures, for example in As minas de prata, 1862–66 [The Silver Mines], Alfarrábios, 1873, and A guerra dos mascates, 1873 [The Peddlar’s War]. In this same period, he developed the urban novel, recounting in his own way the customs and habits of the Rio de Janeiro middle classes, and levelling criticism, particularly in his novel Senhora, 1875 at the arranged marriages and at the lack of morals exemplified by those who embodied the nation’s capitalism. Similarly, the urban romance allowed Alencar to produce fictional leading roles for women; his female characters assumed these roles not only in Senhora, but earlier in Lucíola (1862), Diva (1864) and A pata da gazela, 1870 [The Gazelle’s Foot]. These women are colourful characters who are in no way overshadowed by the male-dominated society in which they are raised.

But the creative efforts of José de Alencar did not stop there; at the beginning of the 1870s, he realised that if fiction was to reflect issues in the country as a whole, then Indianism and the historical novel would not suffice. He understood that in reality the nation was multifaceted, abounding with incidents and with humour, and he sought to portray these facets with all their variation intact. He thus gave the regionalist novel an opportunity to develop, and the first evidence of this is supplied by his novels O gaúcho,
The other Romantic novelists can be considered only by comparison with Alencar. Notwithstanding this fact, the first to stand out is the journalist Manuel Antônio de Almeida, who, between 1854 and 1855 published the serial Memórias de um sargento de milícias [Memoirs of an Army Sergeant] the national press, and who, later, compiled the articles into book form. This work, one of the few to deal with people in Rio de Janeiro in the public eye, is teeming with incidents and witticisms, and presents an amusing and nostalgic insight into Court life “in the era of the King,” that is, at the time when the Portuguese Prince Regent lived in Brazil.

The other authors were active above all in the 1870s. Viscount de Taunay wrote Inocência in 1872, in which he recounts a story of forbidden love set in the interior of the region of Minas Gerais. Bernardo Guimarães also chooses a rural backdrop for his novels O ermitão de Muquém, 1866 [The Hermit of Muquem], O garimpeiro, 1872 [The Prospector] and O seminarista [The Seminarist] also of 1872. His most famous romance was A escrava Isaura, 1875 [Isaura the Slave Girl], in which he discusses the question of slavery: he surpasses even the abolitionists with his distribution of fictional roles. Franklin Távora was equally accomplished in writing about regional matters, as he showed in his first novel about highway robberies, a theme which was to become popular in Brazilian literature. O cabeleira, 1876 [The Bandit] tells the story of a famous bandit from northeastern Brazil, and in order to devise the character, the author, disillusioned with José de Alencar and a defender of the realist style which was beginning to establish itself, examined genuine documents and sources of information in his attempt to stick to the true facts and to avoid fiction and idealism.

The 1870s were a decade of change. Since gaining its independence, Brazil had adopted the monarchy as its method of government, and had chosen Dom Pedro (the son of Dom João VI who had led the independence movement) as its ruler. He reigned between 1822 and 1831 when he was forced, due to disagreements with the country’s political leaders, to renounce the throne in favour of his son, who was still a minor. The child, Dom Pedro II, could only ascend to the throne in 1840 when he would reach the age of fourteen. In the interim, the administrative duties fell to the consorts, who were removed from office every time there was an uprising in the provinces. There were many such uprisings, because this period was characterised by the threat of the Brazilian empire being broken up. But this eventuality was avoided with the victory of the royal army and the new sovereign’s accession to the throne.

The second reign was calm compared with the rule of Dom Pedro I, followed by the consorts. The monarchist government retained the infrastructure inherited from the colonial period. This was supported by the immense latifúndios, the slave trade and monocultivation. However, little by little the country began to modernise, above all because the cultivation of coffee had enabled new social sectors to attain wealth, a shift of power which ultimately transferred the economic focus to São Paulo. The resultant groups comprised the rural oligarchy associated with the cultivation of coffee and the urban middle classes which profited from the exportation of the product; they demanded change and a greater slice of the political action. At odds with the Royal Court, they adopted the Republic as their marching banner; desirous of a more competent work-force both in the towns and in the countryside, they denounced the slave trade and saw a solution to their labour problems in an acceptance of the white European immigrants who were fleeing indigence in Italy and Germany.

The 1870s also witnessed the rise of a new breed of writer who did not admire the Romantic style: Machado de Assis detected their presence in an essay entitled A nova geração [The New Generation]. Here he emphasised the recent preference for realist poetry modelled on the French Parnassian style, which was based on the ideas of Baudelaire, and a rejection of the idealist models of the Romantics. Within fiction itself, the appearance of action novels set in Brazil’s interior, (and this is how the royal court, where most of the country’s readership was based, got to know about these regions), heralded an era of change for Romanticism. Franklin Távora headed the movement which rejected the heroic, complicated and sentimental plots of previous decades and focused his criticism on José de Alencar, who was thus transformed into the epitome of what to avoid as a role model.

In the 1880s, the transformation seemed complete. Naturalism made a resoundingly successful debut, and was heralded by Aluísio Azevedo who, as a disciple of Êmílio Zola, described both the private and public depravities of the Second Reign. His debut took place in 1881 with the novel O mulato (Mulatto); however his main accomplishment was the 1890 novel O cortiço (A Brazilian Tenement). In his second novel, Azevedo opts for an urban family nucleus, typical of Rio de Janeiro. He uses its members as a backdrop for the depiction of the city’s assorted social groups, and also he describes how to rise in the social scale. Adolfo Caminha writes in the same vein as Azevedo, akin to the style of Eça de Queirós, the Portuguese novelist to whom Caminha indirectly pays a tribute in A normalista, 1892 [The Training School Student]. With this novel, Caminha intended to expose the corruption of Fortaleza, the capital of Ceará and the book’s setting. Another outstanding novel written along the same lines is O ateneu, 1888 [The Academy] by Raul Pompeia, which takes place in an upper-class academy. It evokes the atmosphere of student disputes in order to demonstrate forms of outlandish behaviour and how power was expressed in the society of the period.

If the Naturalists had, in their desire to overcome Romanticism, exaggerated the main aspects and in their own way, distorted the reality of the situation, they had, in contrast, given rise to the desire for an entertaining style of literature, intended to expose social problems of the era. This inclination influenced regionalist prose, which abandoned its preoccupation with describing classes of people and regional characteristics, as Alencar, Taunay, Guimarães and even the rebel Franklin Távora had done. Instead, it brought into focus the reasons why certain areas of the interior, especially in the northeast, were underdeveloped. Drought, the subject of many novels in the 1930s, made its debut in this period, as the theme of two novels which were the total antithesis of the idealist perception of Romanticism. The first was Dona Guidinha do Poço, 1891 [Dona Guidinha of Poço] by Manuel de Oliveira Paiva, which tells of the conflict on an estate in Ceará, between the powerful landowners and their menials who have had their land taken away and who must endure the whims of their bosses. The second was Luzia Homem, 1903 [The Man Luzia] by Domingos Olimpio. This is the story of the difficulties experienced by a group of migrants from the northeast. Even the sertão, the arid and remote hinterland of Brazil, plagued by outlaws and rife with inequality, captured the imaginations of the novelists and acquired literary status in the novel Sertão [The Hinterland] written in 1896 by Henrique Coelho Neto, and in Pelo sertão [For the Hinterland] and Os jagunços [The Gunmen], both dating from 1898, by Afonso Arinos de Melo Franco.

However, the most important novelist of the century does not conform to any of these headings or literary styles. Machado de Assis, who began writing prose within a Romantic framework, with Contos fluminenses, 1872 [Tales of Rio de Janeiro], Histórias da meia-noite, 1873 [Stories at Midnight], Resurreição [The Resurrection] of 1872, A mão e a luva, 1874 (The Hand and the Glove), Helena of 1876 and Iaíá García, 1878 (Yayá García), was the writer who succeeded in turning the outlook of Brazilian literature on its head in the second half of the 19th century. This was due to his capacity for original thought, devoid of any idealisation and totally adverse to any form of classification or strict adherence to aesthetic principles and fashionable political doctrines.

Although in his first works Machado de Assis adheres to the Romantic model of a sentimental narrative with a traditional and well-worn plot, his texts written after 1880 bear the stamp of originality and daring. In 1881 he published Memórias póstumas de Brás Cubas (Epitaph of a Small Winner). Told by a “defunct novelist” who relates his life in an ironic fashion, it shook the main foundations of Brazilian life at that time. “O alienista” (The Psychiatrist) is from the same year and was included in the publication Papéis avulsos [Single Sheets] which depicts the progress of Simão Bacamarte, the doctor who attempts to define the limits between sanity and madness, and ends up succumbing to the latter for want of these limits.

Machado de Assis published his major novels between 1881 and 1908. He divided his time between the novel and writing fables. He brought the latter to a stage of refinement previously unknown in Brazil. He delineated both styles with the attention and care of a true craftsman, and he portrayed the image of society at that time from a satirical point of view, emphasising those characters belonging to the ruling classes as unhappy souls who wander aimlessly and are incapable of creating their own destiny. In Quincas Borba (The Heritage of Quincas Borba or Philosopher or Dog?), published in 1891, he tells the story of a poor teacher from Barbacena in the interior of Minas Gerais, who, finding himself suddenly rich from an inheritance, has no success in Court society. Dom Casmurro, published in 1900, is a fictitious autobiography about a man who is tormented by the failure of his marriage. Esaú e Jacó, 1904 (Esau and Jacob) is the tale of the hostilities between twin brothers who are permanently at loggerheads, and Memorial de Aires, 1908 (Counselor Ayres’s Memorial) is a diary written by an old man who witnesses the end of the slave trade and the beginning of the republican era. In all these novels, Machado de Assis conjures up a world of deception and lack of imagination. His works gave Brazilian literature a face-lift by laying it open to improvements and by solving problems which arose due to Romanticism, the same problems which had prompted him to search for images and symbols which would take into account the life of the nation.

Poetry went in another direction by totally embracing the Parnassian style. The main advocates were Olavo Bilac, Raimundo Correia, Vicente de Carvalho and Alberto de Oliveira. Even though, at the beginning of the second half of the 19th century, Romantic themes had swamped the verses of both aspiring and established poets, it was now the Parnassian model which captured their fertile imagination, providing them with well-defined standards and excellent role models. Only the followers of Symbolism (a style of allegoric poetry which appeared in the last decade of the century) headed by Cruz e Sousa, opposed the Parnassian style. They did so with some success, as Alphonsus de Guimarães, Nestor Vítor and Gonzaga Duque all joined them, together with yet another active generation of young poets in the first decades of the 20th century.

At the end of the century, Brazil’s appearance had changed beyond all recognition. It was no longer a Portuguese colony, nor was it a monarchy. The Republic had become firmly established, supported by the foremost writers and intellectuals of the era, such as Raul Pompéia, Euclides da Cunha and Olavo Bilac, although the most brilliant of all, Machado de Assis, regarded it with suspicion and mistrust, as he regarded all ideas which were adopted through fanaticism and ambition. Brazilian literature now seemed to be on a firm footing, and was subjected to constructive criticism by the likes of José Veríssimo and Sílvio Romero. It proffered compositions of different styles: in the area of fiction Machado de Assis, Aluísio Azevedo, Raul Pompéia, Adolfo Caminha and Coelho Neto should be mentioned; in the area of poetry, Olavo Bilac, Cruz e Sousa and Alphonsus de Guimarães.

The topics favoured disclosed a range of interests, touching on both urban and rural issues, the problems of individuals and of the public as a whole. Despite the problems of the slave trade, black and mulatto writers such as Cruz e Sousa and Machado de Assis established their credibility through their novels, and women such as Júlia Lopes de Almeida and Francisca Júlia began little by little to carve themselves out a niche in the literary world. By the end of the 1890s, these challenges had been replaced by others, and in the next century writers would be propelled to the forefront of Brazilian Modernism and the avant garde.

REGINA ZILBERMAN
translated by Jaine Beswick

20th-Century Prose and Poetry

Brazilian literary production began to occupy an outstanding position in Latin America in the 20th century because it emancipated itself from Europe. This is something which did not yet apply in the 19th century and, even less so, in colonial times. The new phase of its literary history may have resulted in part from the beginning of industrialisation and urban development in the 1920s in São Paulo, which continued on a larger scale, after the 1950s. One can discern four landmarks in Brazilian literature in the 20th century, all of them derived from the vanguard or modernista literature which began in the 1920s.

The first of these moments was marked by the “Semana de Arte Moderna” (Week of Modern Art), which took place in the Municipal Theatre of São Paulo, on 13, 15 and 17 February 1922; but it had to be interrupted due to the hostile reaction of the audience to the performances. A group of intellectuals, poets, musicians and painters were interested in disrupting academic art, especially the academic principles of the Parnassian school of poetry, and they decided to present the audience with a true revolution in art. The Week was financed by Paulo Prado, at a time when São Paulo played a leading role in the economy of the country. The city was in the 1920s one of the few important coffee exporters in the world, a situation that lasted until the great economic crisis of 1929. The modernista movement was led by São Paulo intellectuals, especially by Mário de Andrade, Oswald de Andrade and his wife the painter Tarsila do Amaral, Menotti del Picchia, Manuel Bandeira and the composer Heitor Villa-Lobos, among others.

The Week of Modern Art echoed the changes that were taking place in Europe and were brought from that continent to Brazil by Graça Aranha, the author of the novel Canaã (1902) who, together with Oswald de Andrade, defended the Modernists against the Academics, such as Coelho Neto, an important fiction writer in the 19th century. These changes were represented by the Cubist movement, led by Pablo Picasso, the orchestral and ballet music of Stravinsky, and, especially, the programme recommended by Marinetti in his manifestos of Futurism of 1909 and 1912. In these he urged stylistic simplification and the end to the use of lyrical images, of adjectives and adverbs, which would be replaced by a violent imagery of “words in freedom” related to an age of war, of speed and of machinery. Also the Dada and the Surrealist movements, together with some of Freud’s ideas about the nonlinear and non-Cartesian workings of the unconscious contributed to a quick demolishing of the precepts of the leading literary schools, and of 19th-century academic art. The French poet Blaise Cendrars visited Brazil in 1924, carrying a Kodak camera. He captured the imagination of Brazilian writers because he held the idea derived from simultaneism and Surrealism that photography could disrupt academic art and traditional aesthetics by replacing them with an instantaneous flash in a transient moment. Cinema stressed this sensation even more—and literature incorporated from it sketchier and briefer plot structures, character delineation and scene descriptions.

Modernist literary magazines still held a prestigious position among intellectuals. Such was the case of the São Paulo magazine Klaxon (to blow the horn, in French, after Marinetti’s praise of the din made by machinery and the Rio de Janeiro magazine Festa [Party], for which Cecilia Meireles and Gilka Machado were contributors. Meireles began writing as a postSymbolist, a trait she always retained even in her most important books published later, such as Vaga música, 1942, [Vague Music], or Mar absoluto, 1945 [Absolute Sea], and one which not even Mário de Andrade was exempt from, as in his first book, Há uma gota de sangue em cada poema, 1917 [Every Poem Has a Drop of Blood]. Gilka Machado scandalized the provincial critics with her erotic poems, as in Meu glorioso pecado, 1928 [My Glorious Sin]. However, the most important magazine of the period was the Revista de antropofagia [Journal of Anthropophagy]. It ran for only two issues contained the “Manifesto antropófago” [Anthropophage Manifesto], 1928, which echoed the “Manifsto da poesia pau-brasil,” 1924 [The Brazil-wood Poetry Manifesto], both by Oswald de Andrade. In the latter he imagined a parodic solution for the creation of an autonomous Brazilian literature through a metaphor derived from the ritual of anthropophagy. The Brazilian Indians of the past ate the Europeans or their enemies in order to acquire their qualities or their strength. The totem would thus become a taboo. Following the same recipe, only through the overt imitation and absorption of European models and their art, would Brazilian art be able to release itself from the European influence. Poema pau-brasil, 1925 [Brazilwood Poem] also achieves this aim, while recovering fragments from the texts by the first European voyagers in Colonial times, and combining them through parody and a series of cuts to ideas which the Indians might express about them.
Mário de Andrade’s Paulicêia desvairada, 1922 (Hallucinated City), a book of poems about São Paulo as a metropolis, was one of the main works of Brazilian Modernism. In fiction, Macunaima, o herói sem nenhum caráter, 1928 (Macunaima) resulted from deep research into Brazilian Indian legends and myths and folklore in general. It immediately became a landmark of Modernism and of Brazilian literature. It built a totally new vision or paideuma of the country, as seen from the inside, not through the ethnocentric vision of Europe. The use of parody and intertextuality, the rupture of the realist description of plot and characters and of verisimilitude helped to demolish the old conceptions of art as a definitive, wholesome, coherent structure. It is probably the most complete and also the first piece of anthropological research ever achieved by a Brazilian writer, since the Brazilian Romantic writers used to idealize, not to study or describe accurately the Indian culture. Macunaima is thus the symbol of a struggle for a Brazilian identity and for the establishment of a national culture and language. Mário de Andrade pursued this research in all his books on music, folklore, medicine, in essay style, as in A escrava que não é Isaura, 1925 [The Slave Who is not Isaura], in short fiction, as in Contos novos, 1956 [New Stories], and in poetry, as in Remate de males, 1930 [Strong Evil], among many other works.

Carlos Drummond de Andrade is perhaps the most important Brazilian poet of the 20th century. His first book of poetry Alguma poesia, 1930 [Some Poetry] fell in with the spirit of the movement to such an extent that one of its poems, “No meio do caminho” (In the Middle of the Road) became almost a motto for it, due to the repetition of a single line derived from its title that symbolized the utmost simplification of the poetic art. His style resembled the fragmented form of the short poems by Oswald de Andrade in O caderno do aluno de poesia Oswald de Andrade, 1927 [The Poetry Student Oswald de Andrade’s Notebook], where he imitated the naive way in which children express themselves. Writing like an infant, or an Indian untouched by civilisation, would correspond, then, to getting to know the language of the unconscious, as also did Raul Bopp in Cobra Norato (1931). After Oswald de Andrade and Carlos Drummond de Andrade, the tone of the poetry written in the country became joke-like, or a “poemapiada” (joke-poem), as it is also called, an inexhaustible form of irreverence towards the long and elevated compositions prescribed by Longinus. Drummond had several phases in his career, such as the political, in Sentimento do mundo, 1940 [Feeling about the World] or A rosa do povo, 1945 [The People’s Rose], or the abstract, as in Claro enigma, 1951 [Clear Enigma], and he was also an important short-story writer.

In 1930, the Modernists split into two groups, when writers such as Menotti del Picchia and Cassiano Ricardo moved towards an ideological view of the Indian, calling themselves “Anta” [Tapir], an animal that was supposedly a totem, but which only served as an ideological defence of integralist and Mussolinean ideas. The other group (Mário, Oswald, Tarsila do Amaral, Bopp) carried on with their reading of anthropology, Freud and Marx. These ideological divisions also led São Paulo to the 1930 Revolution, which resulted in the Getúlio Vargas dictatorship (1930–45).

Not every writer accepted the Modernist movement. In spite of being modern in his critical view of Brazilian nationality and identity, Monteiro Lobato defended a rigid Portuguese norm in writing, in opposition to Mário de Andrade, who began to employ Brazilian oral expression or speech and its idioms, a way of writing that was adopted from Modernism and which is still practised in Brazil, as also did Nelson Rodrigues in the theatre. Rodrigues’s Vestido de noiva, 1943 (Wedding Dress) opened a new matter-of-fact tradition for drama present up to now, even on television. Lobato’s main legacies are his book of short stories Urupês (1918) on the underdevelopment of rural Brazil and its inhabitants, and the series of educational novels for children about everyday life on a farm in the hinterland of São Paulo titled Sítio do picapau amarelo [The Yellow Woodpecker Farm], which appeared between 1921 and 1944.

Lima Barreto is perhaps the only truly popular Brazilian writer of the 20th century, if one does not consider the literary quality of Carolina de Jesus’s famous Quarto de despejo [The Junk Room], Diário de uma favelada, 1959 (Children of Darkness) or the experimental Parque industrial, 1931 [Industrial Park], by Patricia Galvão. It is in his novels Recordações do escrivão Isaías Caminha, 1909 [Memoirs of the Registrar Isaías Caminha] and Triste fim de Policarpo Quaresma, 1911 (The Patriot) that Barreto establishes himself as a true follower of the great Realist writer Machado de Assis. Both novels criticise fanatical nationalism and the faith in the Republic, existing in Brazil due to the influence of Auguste Comte’s Positivism. Although he died in November 1922, Barreto was unaware of the importance of the “Week,” but he had a great impact on the ideas and on the Brazilian way of expression as differing from the Portuguese norm.

Os sertões, 1902 (Rebellion in the Backlands), by Euclides da Cunha, although published in the 20th century, is a novel written in a rich, ornamental style and is based on 19th-century theories.

In the 1930s, the so-called “Regionalist novel,” or the “1930 northeastern cycle of the novel” became prominent in Brazilian letters. It attempted to discuss the social and political underdevelopment of the country, especially in relation to the decaying sugar-cane plantations and the drought in the backlands of the northeastern region. The backdrop for this literary trend was the growing influence of Marxist ideas on intellectuals who encouraged social solutions for Brazil’s poor performance in agriculture, and blamed capitalism in Latin America for the dire situation of its population. The first book of this cycle was actually published in 1928, A bagaceira (Trash), by José Américo de Almeida, which only featured a farm and the drought region in order to achieve a naive, Romantic setting for a love affair filled with intrigue. O quinze, 1930 [The Year Nineteen Fifteen] by Rachel de Queiroz, is the book that actually opened the cycle and first characterized the political consciousness that would define the whole period. José Lins do Rego depicted the decay of the old sugar mills and the impoverishment of the landowners when their property passed into the hands of the industrialists. However, in Menino de engenho, 1932 (Plantation Boy), Fogo morto, 1943 [Dead Fire], or Usina, 1936 [The Sugar Mill], he chooses an emotional, personal and confessional tone. Graciliano Ramos was another great writer of this cycle. In his novel Vidas secas, 1938 (Barren Lives), he employed a vocabulary as lean as the victims of the drought themselves, which resembled a cinema script through its stress on terse dialogue. Two of the novels published by Oswald de Andrade, Memórias sentimentais de João Miramar, 1924 (The Sentimental Memoirs of John Seaborne) and Serafim Ponte Grande, 1933 (Seraphim Grosse Pointe) can likewise be interpreted as sensors of this fragmented and non-linear cinematic vision characteristic of our times. Ramos helped to renovate literary language, ridding it of any ornaments and excesses of imagery. São Bernardo (1934) is probably his masterpiece in the sense that it shows the personal conflicts of a landowner and the ill effects that his greedy desire for a large property, typical of his region (the latifúndio, or vast estate) had on its impoverished peasants. Memórias do cárcere, 1953 (Jail Prison Memoirs) is the result of Ramos’s political arrest during the Vargas dictatorship. Later, the poetry of João Cabral de Melo Neto, from Pernambuco, employed the same technique of using a very direct vocabulary of political intention to depict poverty and drought in that region. His best-known work is a rhymed one-act Christmas play, Morte e vida severina, 1965 [Death and Life of a Common Man], which is about the severe conditions of life of the northeastern population. As a diplomat in Spain, he was able to combine the seven-syllable rhyming scheme of the Spanish cancionero (Spanish ballads) with the oral compositions of his native land, either from the cordel (stories sold in street fairs) or from the popular cantadores (singers). His best poems belong to Concrete poetry, such as O câo sem plumas, 1950 [The Featherless Dog], Uma faca so lâmina, 1955 (A Knife All Blade or Usefulness of Fixed Ideas), and “Tecendo a manhã” [Knitting the Morning] in his A educação pela pedra, 1966 [Education through the Stone].

Jorge Amado became known world-wide as a rebellious and political author who situated his novels in the cocoa region of Ilhéus, or in Salvador da Bahia, among very poor characters. He tried to depict the poverty of the region, but imbuing it with a national flavour and sensitivity that only his particular style would permit. Among his most famous novels, which amount to almost fifty, Capitães da areia, 1937 (Captains of the Sands) and Seara vermelha, 1946 [Red Field] correspond to his Marxist phase, whereas Gabriela, cravo e canela, 1959 (Gabriela, Clove and Cinnamon) opens a new stage—one that even when showing the local political alliances, tends to emphasise the feminine figure in a tropical setting. His short novels Os velhos marinheiros, 1961 (Home is the Sailor) and A morte e a morte de Quincas Berro D’Água, 1962 (The Two Deaths of Quincas Wateryell) may be considered as pioneering works of magical realism.

The third great movement in the Modernist phase is marked by the consciousness of language, something that began to emerge in 1945, and was to be stressed in the 1950s. Brazilian literature experienced this shift because the country became more urban, more influenced by the habit of reading of newspapers and books, and more aware of the main intellectual discussions on art and literature. In addition, the growth of federal universities in the main capitals of the country, resulted in a larger and more specialized reading public. The founding of Brasilia, in 1972, may be seen as a result of the self-confidence that the country felt from its contribution to modern art and architecture—owing to Lúcio Costa, Joaquim Cardoso and Oscar Niemeyer. The Cubist era founded by the modern art of Brasilia symbolised new horizons.

This promising situation in the capitalist scene of the modern world that Brazil experienced in the 1950s may have prompted the appearance of the literary movement known as Concretismo (Concrete poetry). Most critics consider that it began in São Paulo, with Augusto de Campos, his brother Haroldo de Campos and Décio Pignatari. Inspired in Arno Holz, its poetic synthesis approaches haiku, or the economy of words present in the media and communication. As in the Cubist flat buildings, this poetry cut out any kind of lyricism or sentimentality, and totally abolished emotion, replacing the old stanzas and lyric elegies with squares, circles and propaganda messages. In 1952 the Concretists founded the magazine Noigrandes, which ran to five issues. The Campos brothers also developed a theory of translation that they called transcription based on the idea of “Make it new,” by Ezra Pound, and in part on the translations by Octavio Paz, as in his Transblanco.

Guimarães Rosa and Clarice Lispector were the main figures of the period from the 1950s to the 1970s. Rosa presented a dialectical combination between pure love and the countrysode view of the bandit (cangaceiro) from the north of Minas Gerais, where he was born in the town of Cordisburgo. He chose to employ not a political point of view, but an aesthetic and philosophical perspective on life and on the peculiarity of the idioms of his region. Grande sertão: veredas, 1956 (The Devil to Pay in the Backlands) is an epic in the form of a novel. It focuses on the farms and the bandit groups that attacked them according to their own sense of law, but it is mainly a travel through words, a research in language similar to the one performed by James Joyce in Ulysses, in 1920. Lispector also wrote as if she were in a constant search for words, sometimes from a Heideggerian or Sartrean standpoint; however, her setting was urban and she concentrated on women characters questioning their feminine roles in the domestic space of their homes, as in her outstanding book of short stories Laços de família, 1960 (Family Ties) or her novel A paixão segundo G.H., 1964 (The Passion According to G.H.).

Another group of poets was inspired by Catholic thought and the writings of Santiago Dantas and Jackson de Figueiredo, and opposed the Marxist trend that formed the basis for the political novels begun in the 1930s, defending an aesthetic notion of literature. The main figures of this spiritual movement were Murilo Mendes and Jorge de Lima. Both tended to overwork the word, the expression, to care for the poetic form of the sonnet, the elegy, or even the epic, in the case of Lima’s long poem Canção de Orfeu, 1952 [Orpheus’s Song]. Crônica da casa assassinada, 1959 [Chronicle of the Murdered House], by Lúcio Cardoso, depicts the decline of a bourgeois family after the coffee slump that affected plantations in Rio de Janeiro State. In poetry, the so-called “Geração de 1945” (Generation of 1945), was thus called because it emerged after the end of the Vargas dictatorship of “Estado Novo,” the death of Mário de Andrade and the end of World War II. It defended a pure aesthetics, rather than the vanguard one proposed by Modernism under the influence of Proust, Eliot, Valéry and Ungaretti, and had two literary magazines: Revista Brasileira de Poesia (1942) and Orfeu (1947–). Some of its most outstanding authors are Ferreira Gullar, with Poema sujo, 1976 (Dirty Poem), Affonso Avila, Ledo Ivo and Thiago de Melo whose poem Faz escuro mas eu canto, 1965 (It is Dark, but I Sing), similar in tone to the political poetry of the Chilean Pablo Neruda, became a political manifesto against the military dictatorship at the time.

The period between the 1970s and the 1990s saw an emphasis on the urban novel and on a postmodern, deconstructive view of utopia and of any optimistic possibilities of social change. At the same time, the population of the country became 85% urban in the 1980s. The imposition in 1964 of a military regime, which lasted until 1984, put an end to all the unrealized projects of social and agrarian reform, and provoked a severe economic crisis later on. The 1970s witnessed the closing down of the Chamber of Deputies and of the Senate, and the end of free elections. While poetry lessened in importance in the literary scene, there was a boom of the short story at the beginning of the 1970s, which was replaced by that of the novel after the 1980s. In the 1970s there was a wave of alternative or “marginal” books by young poets, such as Chacal (pen-name of Ricardo de Carvalho Duarte), Cacaso (pen-name of Antonio Carlos de Brito), Ana Cristina César, Chico Alvim (Francisco Alvim), some of whom sold mimeographed copies of their poems in the streets. They denied the influence of their Modernist predecessors and resented that their generation was unable to effect political change in Brazil; therefore they turned to a personal experience or trip, as did the beat generation in the United States. The 1970s saw the appearance of a great number of novelists and short story writers, most of whom employed magical realism or hyperrealism to depict surreptitiously the political situation of the country under the military dictatorship. Among others, there were Rubem Fonseca, Sérgio Sant’Anna, Ignacio Loyola Brandão. Sant’Anna also employed magical realism, or Surrealism in his Confissões de Ralfo (uma autobiografia literária), 1975 [Confessions of Ralfo, (a Literary Autobiography)] in which fear of madness and the description of a lunatic asylum conveyed the experience of life in the 1970s, but also worked as a psychological reaction to the political events prevailing at the time, a similar setting for Carlos Sussekind (1933-) in Armadilha para Lamartine, 1975 [A Trap for Lamartine]. Roman noir plots and the techniques of bestsellers allowed Fonseca to break with the emotive background traditionally present in the novel and thus to write crude books about a violent life in a Third World country like Brazil. The short story collection Feliz ano novo, 1975 [Happy New Year] by Fonseca, and Zero (1975) by Brandão were banned and confiscated by the military regime in the year of their publication. Through hyperrealism they expressed the absurdity of city life strained by violence and lack of perspective due to an incompetent government. In Fonseca’s short story “O Cobrador,” 1979 [The Bill-Collector], a down-and-out decides to take justice into his own hands and kills all the middle-class professionals that he meets. In the novel Zero, Brandão exaggerates the highly bureaucratic structure of the State mounted by the military in order to prevent the ordinary citizens from attaining their most basic rights. Magical realism was present in Dalton Trevisan, whose O vampiro de Curitiba, 1965 (The Vampire of Curitiba and Other Stories) became a cult book, J.J.Veiga, whose short stories of Os cavalinhos de Platiplanto, 1959 [The Little Horses of Platiplanto] introduced magical realism in Brazil, Roberto Drummond, who wrote the fantastic short novel A morte de D.J. em Paris, 1979 [The death of D. J. in Paris], João Gilberto Noll, Murilo Rubião, whose short novel O pirotécnico Zacarias, 1974 [The Pyrotechnicist Zacharias] became a classic of the fantastic genre, Antônio Torres and Paulo Leminski, with his experimental novel Catatau (1975).

Other authors became steadily established in the novel form, such as Autran Dourado, with Ópera dos mortos, 1967 (The Voices of the Dead), Osman Lins and Érico Veríssimo, whose O tempo e o vento (Time and the Wind), written between 1949 and 1961, is a classic lyrical novel. In the realist style, there were Antônio Callado’s Indian novel Quarup (1967), which was made into a film, José Louzeiro, an author of best-sellers that were often filmed and João Ubaldo Ribeiro, an author of very successful novels such as Viva o povo brasileiro, 1984 (An Invincible Memory)

In the 1990s, Silviano Santiago crossed frontiers of country and sex and infringed the code of nationality while situating his novel Stella Manhattan (1985) in New York City. Personal experience became more important than the defence of ideologies in this and other novels which began to be written in the 1980s. The postmodern vogue which focuses on violence and the lack of any sense of belonging in an urban setting is also present in Caio Fernando Abreu’s Onde andará Dulce Veiga? 1990 [Where Could Dulce Veiga Be?], a pastiche on the lifedrama of a transvestite in a big city like São Paulo.
With the collapse of Utopia, typical of the postmodern era, small groups that beforehand could not express themselves were able to publish their books after the 1970s. Women’s literature went through a boom then, and so did Black literature, including the one produced by Black women authors. In São Paulo, the group called “Quilombhoje” denounced the prejudice that victimized them through the publication of a magazine with the same title, which dedicates every other issue to poetry or to short stories.

Among women authors, who are mainly urban, white and from the middle class, Lygia Fagundes Telles, Nélida Piñón, Sonia Coutinho, Rachel Jardim, Lya Luft, Patricia Bins, Márzia Denser, Helena Parente Cunha, Marina Colasanti are authors who have developed a consistent corpus of women’s literature since the 1970s. Most of their fiction is a follow-up, in similar style, to the enigmatic and metaphoric prose of Lispector’s, and situates women in the confines of the house, from a subjective, self-centered writing of the self. However, it represents a step forward since women have acquired the status of professional writers in Brazil. While Coutinho’s plots now center on the crime novel, Ana Miranda has published a successful historical novel on the Baroque poet Gregório de Matos, titled Boca do Inferno, 1989 (Bahia of all the Devils). Both genres attempt to escape from the idea of self-reference towards a new realistic or historical perspective. All Brazilian literature of the 20th century, in its different facets and phases is, therefore, immersed in the Modernist project begun in the 1920s, and reflects a constant struggle for its identity and autonomous expression.

LUIZA LOBO

See also entries on Concrete Poetry, Modernismo: Brazil, Popular Culture: Brazil, Regionalism: Brazil

Further Reading

General

Schwarz, Roberto (editor), Os pobres na literatura brasileira, São Paulo: Brasiliense, 1983

19th Century

[Stops at Machado de Assis]

20th Century

Bellei, Sérgio Luiz Prado, “Brazilian Culture in the Frontier,” Bulletin of Latin American Research, vol. 14/1 (January 1995) [Concerned also with Spanish America]

Jackson, K. David (editor), Transformations of Literary Language in Latin American Literature from Machado de Assis to the Vanguards, Austin, Texas: Abaporu Press, 1987

Teles, Gilberto Mendonça, Vanguarda européia e Modernismo brasileiro, revised 3rd edition, Petrópolis: Vozes, 1976

Dictionaries and Bibliographies

Coutinho, Afrânio and José Galante de Sousa (general editors), Enciclopédia de literatura brasileira, 2 vols, Rio de Janeiro: Ministério da Educação, 1990 [Very impressive work with comprehensive coverage of topics as well as of writers]

Foster, David William and Roberto Reis (editors), A Dictionary of Contemporary Brazilian Authors, Tempe: Arizona State University/Center for Latin American Studies, 1981

Alfredo Bryce Echenique 1939–

Peruvian prose writer

Despite his international success with publishers and reading public alike, Alfredo Bryce Echenique’s work has received little in the way of substantial critical attention, as is attested by the Further Reading list at the end of this essay. The most likely explanation for this would appear to be that, having lived in Europe since 1963, he has had his work largely passed over by critics and academics in his native Peru. This was exacerbated by the political situation in Peru in 1970, the year of publication of Bryce Echenique’s first (and subsequently widely acclaimed) novel, Un mundo para Julius (A World for Julius), which portrays a limeño oligarchy in decay. In a series of interviews conducted during a visit to Peru in the same year, he refused to place the novel within the context of the leftwing Gobierno Revolucionario de las Fuerzas Armadas (Revolutionary Government of Armed Forces), which had set about undermining the oligarchy since coming to power two years earlier, and brought upon himself a virtual blacklisting by the highly politicised Peruvian academics. In addition to this, the majority of academics in Europe and North America seem until recently to have kept their critical focus firmly on the first wave of the Latin American literary Boom, largely ignoring those authors who belong to what has loosely been called the Post-Boom (those who started to appear in print in the wake of the upsurge of international interest in Latin American literature in the 1960s).

The chronology of Bryce Echenique’s work bears witness to a steady rhythm of publication, with a new work appearing every three or four years. The first ten years of his literary career saw the alternate publication of collections of short stories and novels, a feature which is not as arbitrary as might first appear, for the respective novels provided the author with the opportunity to develop more fully the thematic concerns and stylistic features used more tentatively in the preceding short stories. The sense that it is in the novels that Bryce Echenique finds the scope to achieve fullness of thematic and stylistic expression is borne out by the dominance of this genre in his literary production since 1980. As well as the afore mentioned forms of fictional narrative, Bryce Echenique has published three volumes of chronicles/essays inspired by journeys to the United States, Cuba and various European countries, many of which have first appeared as articles in newspapers and magazines throughout the Spanish-speaking world.

Thematically, Bryce Echenique’s early work is characterised by a concern for the emotional and psychological problems of adolescence (Huerto cerrado [Enclosed Garden]) and childhood (Un mundo para Julius) in a limeño society which is governed by convention and strictly observed norms of social behaviour. Structurally and stylistically, the stories of Huerto cerrado show certain similarities to those of Ernest Hemingway, a feature which may be explained—together with the use of a central common protagonist in a manner reminiscent of the Nick Adams stories—by Bryce Echenique’s undergraduate thesis on “The Function of Dialogue in the Narrative of Hemingway.” Perhaps the most pertinent of these parallels are interior monologue, unadorned dialogue, and style indirect libre, which comes to constitute the mainstay of the narrative style of Un mundo para Julius. It is here in the novel that Bryce Echenique is able to undertake a more profound consideration of the themes initially treated in Huerto cerrado, and the scope of the genre enables him to perfect the use of style indirect libre to create subtle variations in narrative perspective and to manipulate the relationship between the reader and the novel’s various characters.

The subsequent short story-novel coupling of La felicidad, ja ja, 1974 [Happiness, Ha Ha] and Tantas veces Pedro, 1977 [So Many Times Pedro], represents a largely ignored period of Bryce Echenique’s oeuvre, yet it is fundamental to an appreciation of the link between his early work and that published since 1980. While a number of the stories of La felicidad, ja ja continue to deal with the themes of his earlier works, others show a marked concern with the theme of memory, focused especially on the dichotomy happy childhood/unhappy adulthood. Yet others concentrate on the difficulty of attaining the happiness referred to in the collection’s title in a world dominated by the decay of social structures and personal relationships, and it is this aspect in particular which is taken up and given a more thorough consideration in Tantas veces Pedro, alongside the self-referential qualities of the earliest of the stories of La felicidad, ja ja, “Antes de la cita con los Linares” [Before the Meeting with the Linares]. As was true in the case of the first two works, narrative style and theme are inseparably linked, and in order to treat more effectively the themes of social and interpersonal fragmentation, Bryce Echenique introduces in La felicidad, ja ja the use of first- and secondperson narrators, as well as experimenting with both spatial and temporal dislocations, with varying degrees of success. The problems encountered in the initial use of these narrative techniques are, on the whole, successfully resolved in Tantas veces Pedro, which is set, as are half of the stories of La felicidad, ja ja, almost entirely in Europe, reflecting the author’s continuing residence in Paris and his growing concern for the problems facing a Latin American in this continent.

The diptych “Cuadernos de navegación en un sillón Voltaire” [Navigational Notebooks in a Voltaire Armchair] consists of two novels: La vida exagerada de Martín Romaña, 1981 [The Exaggerated Life of Martin Romaña], and El hombre que hablaba de Octavia de Cádiz, 1985 [The Man who Talked about Octavia de Cádiz]. Both are written in the first person which came to dominate Tantas veces Pedro and have as their subject matter the search for an idealised love, the question of (cultural) identity, both in the context of a Latin American in Europe and in general terms, and literary creation as a cathartic process. One of the most noteworthy stylistic achievements of these works is the overcoming of the limitations of first-person narration to present the reader with a range of narrative perspectives via techniques such as filtering experience through the eyes of others and recounting episodes with a subjectivity which expands significantly on the conventional features of style indirect libre.

The use of these stylistic features and thematic concerns is continued in La última mudanza de Felipe Carrillo, 1988 [The Last Move of Felipe Carrillo], which can perhaps be seen as the culmination of the search for a personal narrative voice begun in Huerto cerrado. The narrative techniques of the “Cuadernos,” born out of the crucial Tantas veces Pedro, are used here with similar effectiveness and greater economy, while the more straightforward plot and the return to Peru as a setting mark a synthesis between these and Bryce Echenique’s earliest works.

The long-awaited publication of the novel No me esperen en abril, 1995 [Don’t Wait for Me in April] represents a return to the world of privileged limeño society as setting—and to a narrative style which is reminiscent of that of Un mundo para Julius, for which Bryce Echenique first made his name, while at the same time bearing witness to the rich variety of techniques employed and polished during the course of his literary production.

DAVID WOOD

Biography

Born in Lima, Peru, 19 February 1939. Parents members of Peruvian oligarchy. Father a banker and mother the granddaughter of a former president of Peru, José Rufino Echenique. Educated at exclusive private schools, the Inmaculado Corazón and Colegio Santa María, both run by US priests and nuns. Later attended boarding school run along British lines, the Colegio San Pablo, which he left in 1956. Pressured by father to study Law at University of San Marcos in Lima, but studied literature at same time. Graduated in 1964 and obtained studentship to study literature at the Sorbonne. Began to work at University of Nanterre in 1967. Married Maggie Revilla in same year but couple later divorced. In late 1970s travelled through the cities of the South in the US, and wrote about Memphis, Atlanta and New Orleans in a personal way. Tired of France and returned to Lima for six months in 1977. Returned to Paris but distraught because of a love affair that ended badly he withdrew to Montepellier in 1980. Abandoned teaching for good in 1984 and moved to Barcelona. Invited as visiting professor to University of Texas (Austin) in 1987. Lectured at several US universities. Moved from Barcelona to Madrid in 1989 where he married Pilar de Vega, a professor of Spanish Linguistics. Contributor to various Spanish and Spanish American journals. Awarded Casa de las Américas Prize, 1968, for Huerto cerrado; Peruvian National Literary Award in 1972.

Selected Works

Novels

Un mundo para Julius, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1970; as A World for Julius, translated by Dick Gerdes, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1992, Muerte de Sevilla en Madrid. Antes de la cita con los Linares, Lima: Mosca Azul, 1972
La pasión según San Pedro Balbuena que fue tantas veces Pedro, y nunca pudo negar a nadie, Lima: Libre, 1977; as Tantas veces Pedro, Madrid: Catédra, 1981
La vida exagerada de Martin Romaña, Barcelona: Argos Vergara, 1981
El hombre que hablaba de Octavio de Cádiz, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1985
Goig, Madrid: Debate, 1987
La última mudanza de Felipe Carrillo, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1988
No me esperen en abril, Madrid: Anagrama, 1995

Short Fiction

Huerto cerrado, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1968
La felicidad, ja ja, Barcelona: Barral Editores Peruana, 1974
Dos señores conversan; un sapo en el desierto; los grandes hombres son así, y también así, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1990 [novellas]

Compilations and Anthologies

Todos los cuentos, Lima: Mosca Azul, 1980
Cuentos completos, Madrid: Alianza, 1981
Magdalena peruana, y otros cuentos, Bogota: Oveja Negra, 1986
Other Writings
A vuelo de buen cubero y otras crónicas, Barcelona: Anagrama, 1977; as Crónicas personales, Barcelona: Anagrama, 1988 [journalistic pieces]
Permiso para vivir, antimemorias, Barcelona: Anagrama, 1993

Further Reading

Cornejo Polar, Antonio, “Tantas veces Pedro,” Revista de Crítica Literaria Latinoamericana 7–8 (1978) [Extended review which suggests several possible readings of the work]

Ferreira, César and Ismael P. Márquez (editors), Los mundos de Alfredo Bryce Echenique, Lima: Pontificia Universidad Católica del Perú, 1994 [Compilation of material from a wide variety of previously published sources, organised into chapters]

La Fuente, José Luis de, Cómo leer a Alfredo Bryce Echenique, Madrid: Guías de Lectura Júcar, 1994

Rodríguez-Peralta, Phyllis, “The Subjective Narration of Alfredo Bryce Echenique’s La vida exagerada de Martín Romaña,” Hispanic Journal, vol. 10/2. (Spring 1989)

Un mundo para Julius

Novel by Alfredo Bryce Echenique

Un mundo para Julius, the first novel of Alfredo Bryce Echenique, was a leading contender for the 1970 Seix Barral Prize (it was never awarded following a split within the publishing house), and portrays the problems of a sensitive childhood in an environment which is gradually realized to be increasingly hostile to the ideals of youthful innocence. It also provides the reader with a cross-sectional view of Peruvian society via a dramatis personae of over sixty characters, and more explicitly depicts the decline of the hacienda owning oligarchy. This latter was the only interpretation acceptable to Peruvian critics and academics of the period. This was because Gobierno Revolucionario de las Fuerzas Armadas (Revolutionary Government of the Armed Forces), installedin 1976, had undertaken a significant Agrarian Reform Programme which had greatly weakened the traditional grip of the oligarchy on the Peruvian economy and system of land tenure.

An equally valid interpretation of the work, and one on the whole ignored by critics of the early 1970s, is as a study of child psychology and alienation of the individual. Julius’s mother effectively abdicates responsibility for the emotional and social development of her youngest son to the domestic staff, whose values of friendship and freedom of emotional expression he comes to share throughout his early years. These values contrast markedly with those of Julius’s widowed mother and his eventual step-father, both of whom are more concerned with the whirl of Lima’s exclusive social circles. Susan, Julius’s beautiful but distractée mother, represents the old aristocratic oligarchy and a relatively caring, but ultimately paternalistic, attitude towards the servants, while the increasingly dominant step-father is a member of the new business class rising to prominence in the Lima of the 1950s within which the novel is apparently set. As the influence of Juan Lucas grows, and eventually comes to dominate the household, relations between the servants and the family become ever more cold and distant, without a substitute emotional and social role model ever being offered to the highly impressionable Julius. Young children are seen as something of an inconvenience by both Susan and Juan Lucas, and until Julius approaches adulthood and can involve himself in the adult world in which his parents are so fully absorbed he seems destined to live in a social and emotional no-man’s-land.

The resolution of the question of whether Julius will follow the footsteps of his older brothers into the world of Susan, and more especially of Juan Lucas, or whether he will remain true to his childhood ideals and behaviour is left to the reader, although a close reading of the work provides enough information to arrive at a tentative conclusion. Despite their ruthless hedonism in the latter stages of the work, Julius’s older brothers both previously demonstrated emotional sensitivity, as can be seen when Santiago cries disconsolately when he learns that Cinthia, his little sister, is about to die, and Bobby behaves similarly when he loses his first girlfriend. Without being privy to their thoughts and feelings, it would seem that they have both passed from a sensitive, servant-attended childhood to a Juan Lucas style adulthood during the course of their teens, and the manner in which the reader accompanies Julius in his innermost thoughts and emotions makes it all the more tragic that he appears to be simply following the same difficult path.

It is in the last of the novel’s five sections, significantly entitled “Retornos” [Returns], that the reader can gather more substantial clues as to the probable outcome of the protagonist’s inner turmoil. Until this stage in the work Julius has clung to the memory of his beloved sister as a mentor to whom he could address his thoughts and feelings in times of crisis, but shortly after feeling solidarity with his hitherto loathsome brother Bobby he exorcises the ghost of Cinthia and removes her photograph from his bedside table. Shortly after this he learns that the other emotional mainstay of childhood, his nanny Vilma, is working as a prostitute after having been thrown out of the household to avoid further problems subsequent to her rape by Santiago. When he comes to review his existence and definitively identifies himself in terms of his family, and even Juan Lucas, rather than the servants, unable to see the once beloved Vilma as anything other than a whore, a very conscious decision has been taken to reject those who were his only source of emotional support through his childhood and to accept the values of those who have consistently denied him emotional and social expression and development. Similarly when, as a child of five, Julius entered the servants’ quarters for the first time and saw them as small and ugly, he could hardly be held responsible for his thoughts, as he could not be when he was sick during his visit to the shack where Arminda, the laundry maid, was living. At the end of the book, however, as an eleven-year-old, he is perfectly conscious of the decision he takes not to enter the kitchen when he hears that Nilda, ex-cook and friend, has come to visit and bring him a birthday present, and there can be no explanation for his behaviour, other than an acceptance of the values of Juan Lucas and those like him. Such a pessimistic interpretation of the future for the bright and sensitive Julius to whom readers have grown to feel quite attached would also be very much in keeping with the view of the upper echelons of Lima society as corruptor which comes across in Bryce’s other early works.

The narrative style and pervasive humour of the work play an important role in reinforcing what is communicated at a thematic level. The major feature in this respect is the use of narrative techniques that develop the conventional style indirect libre from which they arise. By allowing the words, and especially the thoughts, of the main characters to enter the narrative in unmediated forms throughout the work, the narrator affords these characters an approbation which comes to influence the manner in which the reader perceives them. This relationship is strengthened by Bryce’s keen awareness of the potential of other traditional narrative devices, such as the direct address by the narrator of both reader and certain characters (notably Julius in this case), all of which serves to reinforce the triangular bond established between narrator, reader and characters. It is highly significant that not all of the characters are presented in this fashion, with Juan Lucas and Susan representing the principal exceptions. When, by the end of the novel, they can be seen to have marginalised all of the other characters and dismissed out of hand values which could be taken as positive in numerous other characters, the assorted outcasts from the world of the beautiful people constitute a loose community with the reader and narrator, and it is Susan and Juan Lucas, along with Santiago and Bobby, who come to be seen as isolated, living in a state of complete isolation from those around them and the society in which they live. It would seem that Julius is destined to join them in the cold and shallow world of Lima’s aristocracy.

David Wood

Editions

First edition: Un mundo para Julius, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1970

Further Reading

Bensoussan, Albert, “Entrevista con Bryce Echenique,” Insula 308–09 (1972) [Interview in which Bryce discusses the world of Un mundo and his literary mentors]
Ferreira, César, “Entrevista con Alfredo Bryce Echenique,” Antipodas 3 (July 1991)
Fanny Buitrago 1940–

Colombian prose writer

Although Fanny Buitrago has not been overtly political in her writings until her recent collection of stories ¡Líbranos de todo mal! [Deliver Us from Evil], la Violencia (or the civil unrest which took place in Colombia in the 1960s during her formative years as a writer) has always been an important, if not the most important subtext in her work. Rather than give her stories a political context—most of her characters have been demonstrably apolitical—Buitrago’s metaphor for characterizing civil unrest is that of the dysfunctional or broken family. This is, in fact, the perfect image for a country, one’s political family, that is torn by violent protest and governmental repression, leaving in its wake death and psychological damage.

The symbol of the broken home, sometimes realized as an infertile couple, an abandoned child, a divorced couple, lovers married to people they do not love, is certainly more accessible to the average reader, especially one outside Colombia, than a realistic description of political upheaval. This paradigm of the dysfunctional family extends throughout Buitrago’s writings, even to her children’s literature. In La casa del abuelo [Grandfather’s House] and La casa del arco iris [Rainbow’s House] the children Falsy, Elsy, and Luisito spend time in a pseudo-single parent situation because their father works in the city far from their grandfather’s house.

Buitrago has concentrated on fiction rather than poetry, with one award-winning play El hombre de paja [Scarecrow], which won her the Cali Theater Festival Prize in 1964, and the libretto for a ballet also to her credit. Buitrago shares many of the other concerns of her fellow Latin American writers: love, death, family honor, the search for personal fulfillment and acceptance, the influence of genetic or racial memory, superstitious beliefs, etc. She also writes about topics of concern to many female writers/readers: rape, or the threat of rape; unwanted pregnancy or its converse, a pregnancy desired in the face of infertility; a woman’s place in a male-dominated society; a woman’s relation to her child(ren) or spouse. Although there are both male and female characters in Buitrago’s writings, most of her protagonists and/or narrators are female. In fact, the world in Buitrago’s writings is a woman’s world, centered on the eternal triangle of man + woman+child. This triad is uniquely unstable in Buitrago’s world view and is seen usually from one of its broken sides: man+woman; woman+child; child+man, thus giving human form to the concept of the dysfunctionality of human interrelations.

To take a concrete example from one of Buitrago’s novels, the foundation of the island culture she presents in Los paña-manes is based on the legendary cry of women giving birth, “pañamán” the “Spanish man,” an allusion to the metaphorical rape of the island historically being repeated when illegitimate children are born. The expression then becomes a deep cultural obscenity, abhorrent to all members of the culture, yet the very basis of all their relationships, even generations after the original “rape” of the island. Characters in the novel include illegitimate and/or abandoned children, and marital and other family relationships are consistently strained or destroyed throughout the work.

The collection Los amores de Afrodita [The Loves of Aphrodite] consists of four short stories and one novella dealing with various aspects of love. Unfortunately this love is often betrayed for power and/or money. In the story “¡Anhelante, oh anhelante!”
[Yearning, oh, Yearning!], one of the few stories with an overt political context, a mother addresses her son whom she feels is about to marry someone inappropriate. After divorcing his first wife, Yiri, to pursue his political ambitions with Maclovia Aranda (the unsuitable one), the son soon discovers that Maclovia’s political ambitions are even greater than his, and that she has no real feelings for him. In the end he becomes involved with revolutionaries and is forced to flee the country. From Switzerland he calls home for Yiri, since Maclovia has asked for an annulment. The broken marriage parallels the country broken by revolutionary upheaval.

Whether Buitrago’s writings are deliberately set in her coastal island or in fictitious Colombian mainland towns, the action involves the same basic themes of abandonment, marital incompatibility, and social constraints versus personal freedom that form her world view. All these manifestations of the dysfunctional family point again and again to the political unrest which occurred during Buitrago’s youth in Colombia. Just as in the refrain popular in the US Civil War (“A house divided against itself cannot stand”), Buitrago demonstrates in her work that relationships and families which are not built on unconditional love will certainly fail; likewise, a country without a firm foundation will crumble from within.

To date, no book-length study of the life and/or works of Fanny Buitrago has been published in the United States, nor has one been listed as published elsewhere in standard reference sources such as the MLA International Bibliography. During the past few years several articles have been published which supplement the chapter in an unpublished dissertation by Nancy McCarty. Other articles deal with Los amores de Afrodita, Los panamanes, and El hostigante verano de los dioses [The Harassing Summer of the Gods], her astounding first novel. The dearth of critical material in the United States on Buitrago is difficult to understand, since her work has earned her so many literary prizes abroad over the years. The fact that her landmark first novel has been reprinted twice in a region of the world not known for major print-runs should be evidence of the significance of that novel, yet no one has undertaken a full-length critical study of El hostigante verano de los dioses. However, one of her stories, “Narración de un soñador de tesoros” [Narration of a Dreamer of Treasures], was included in 1993 in a college-level textbook for intermediate students published by Prentice-Hall Publishers in the United States, placing her among twelve authors including Paz, Cela, Cortázar, García Márquez, and Laforet. This points to an increased appreciation of Buitrago’s talent and will certainly bring her to the attention of a wider audience.

TERESA R. ARRINGTON

Biography

Born in Barranquilla, Colombia, in 1940. Joined the elitist “nadaista” (Towards Nothing) group of writers centered on the town of Cali. Member of this group until 1968 when she chose to withdraw from it. She has lived in various parts of Colombia. Her career as a writer started in 1963 and in 1964 her ballet La garza sucia was premiered in Buenos Aires. Invited by Iowa State University in 1984 to participate in their International Writing Program. Recipient of the following awards: Cali Theatre Festival Prize, 1964; Argentine Summer Season Prize, 1965; runner-up for Seix Barral Award in 1970; second prize in UNESCO contest for best example of children’s fiction, 1988.
Selected Works

Novels
El hostigante verano de los dioses, Bogotá: Tercer Mundo, 1963
Cola de zorro, Bogotá: Monolito, 1970
Los pañamanes, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1979

Short Fiction
Las distancias doradas, Bogotá: Espiral, 1964 [Published with the play El hombre de paja]
La otra gente: cuentos, Bogotá: Instituto Colombiano de Cultura, 1973
Bahía Sonora, relatos de la isla, Bogotá: Almanaque Supremo, 1976
Los amores de Afrodita, Bogotá: Plaza y Janés, 1983
¡Libranos de todo mal!, Bogotá: Carlos Valencia Editores, 1989

Play
El hombre de paja y Las distancias doradas, Bogotá: Espiral, 1964

Children’s Literature
La casa del abuelo, Bogotá: Voluntad Unesco, 1979
La casa del arco iris, Bogotá: Carlos Valencia Editores, 1986
Cartas del Palomar, Bogotá: Carlos Valencia Editores, 1988
La casa del verde doncel, Bogotá: Carlos Valencia Editores, 1990

Further Reading

Bedoya, Luis Iván, “Mitopoética de la cotidianidad femenina en los cuentos de Fanny Buitrago,” in Ensayos de literatura colombiana, edited by Raymond L. Williams, Bogota: Plaza y Janés, 1985

Jaramillo, María Mercedes, “Fanny Buitrago: la desacralización de lo establecido: El hostigante verano de los dioses, El hombre de paja y Los amores de Afrodita,” in ¿Y las mujeres?: ensayos sobre literatura colombiana, edited by Jaramillo, Angela I. Robledo and Flor María Rodríguez, Medellín, Colombia: Universidad de Antioquia, 1991

Interviews
It may seem ironic that the writer who inspired greatest interest in African-Cuban culture over the last fifty years and who dedicated her life to the recording and creative interpretation of a virtually unexplored African-Cuban heritage should be a white woman, born into one of the most prestigious families in the Cuban Republic. Family connections partly explain the apparent anomaly; Cabrera’s brother-in-law, the eminent anthropologist Fernando Ortiz, was the first Cuban to study contemporary African-Cuban culture seriously. She had known him since childhood and it was he who, in his own words, initiated her into “a taste for Afrocuban folklore,” as she indicates in “Prejuicio,” from Cuentos negros de Cuba, 1940 [Black Stories from Cuba]. Cabrera’s father, the liberal lawyer and writer Raimundo Cabrera, had founded the newspaper Cuba y America in New York and here the young Lydia published articles and illustrations from the age of thirteen. She continued to write for the press when the family returned to Cuba from political exile in 1917. From the start, then, Lydia Cabrera had easy access to the world of print culture. However, more important is the fact that she was a woman. As a girl, Cabrera was in close contact with the black female servants of the household from whom she gathered much of her material (in particular Tula and Teresa M.Omi Tomi); similarly, she was not given a formal education nor expected to pursue a career but was allowed to cultivate her interest in art and antiques and to study Fine Arts in Havana and Paris. It was during her stay in Paris (1927–38) that she became acquainted with the Négritude movement and, in 1936, at the insistence of her terminally ill friend, the Venezuelan Teresa de la Parra (who also hailed from a white privileged family and shared her interest in black folk-tales), Cabrera finally wrote down and elaborated on the African-Cuban stories she had heard. These Contes nègres de Cuba [Black Stories from Cuba] were published in France that same year; the Spanish version came out in Cuba in 1940. In 1938 Cabrera returned to Cuba and continued to collect African-Cuban stories and to record traditional African-Cuban customs and beliefs with the assistance of her inseparable companion María Teresa de Rojas. This material would be used in a succession of books, published first in Cuba and—after Cabrera’s departure from the island in 1960—in Miami. Clearly, the daughters of white creole families proved to be valuable instruments in the gathering and dissemination of subaltern cultures; in this respect Cabrera’s work can be compared to that of Rosario Castellanos and Elena Poniatowska in Mexico.

Apart from Ortiz’s pioneering studies, there was little academic interest in African-Cuban culture until the 1930s. During her lifetime Cabrera published over twenty books, all of them related in some way to the African-Cuban world, with the result that she has been compared to Sir James Frazer and her book, El monte [The Mountain], to The Golden Bough. Yet Cabrera repeatedly denied there was any scientific method to her writings; she was not—nor wished to be—a trained professional. Her approach, that of a journalist, witness or enthusiastic amateur, enabled her to write outside the confines of disciplinary conventions and, as is the case with many female authors, her work cannot be slotted easily into generic classifications. It incorporates the discourses of fiction, song, auto-biography, ethnography, linguistics, and testimonial writing. Her four collections of short stories, Contes nègres de Cuba, 1936, ¿Por qué? Cuentos negros de Cuba, 1948 [Why? Black Stories from Cuba], Ayapá; cuentos de Jicotea, 1971 [Ayapá. Stories of the Turtle], and Cuentos para adultos, niños, y retrasados mentales, 1983 [Stories for Adults, Children, and the Mentally Retarded] and her short autobiographical travelogue, Itinerarios del insomnio. Trinidad de Cuba, 1977 [Itineraries of Insomnia. Trinidad in Cuba] have attracted the attention of literary critics, whereas her greatest contributions to anthropological scholarship are the two monographs El monte, 1954, and La sociedad secreta Abakuá, 1959 [The Secret Society Abakú] and the linguistic studies Anagó: vocabulario lucumí, 1957 [Cuban Yoruba] and Vocabulario Congo, 1985 [Cuban Bantu]. El monte, however, can also be read as a testimonio and as such is of great significance because it is here that the lost voices of the black Cuban women of the first half of the century are recorded. One of the most poignant stories in this book is an account of how Teresa M.Omí Tomí lost her baby daughter because of black magic. Omí Tomí, daughter of a slave and over a hundred years old when Cabrera wrote the book, had been the Cabrera family’s seamstress. Before she joined their household she had been brought up among white children and had little knowledge of black religions; consequently, she was unable to protect her child from evil. What she subsequently learned was passed on to Cabrera. The writer acknowledges her debt to her informants in the introduction to El monte: “The only value this book has… consists exclusively of the part played by the blacks themselves. They are the real authors.” She then lists the names of the dozen “real authors” and their associated orishas (spirits), including José de Calazán Herrera, Bangoché, alias el Moro, son of Oba Koso and Calixta Morales and Oddeddei, daughter of Ochoi.

There exist several critical studies of the story collections, especially of the early tales such as “Los compadres” [Buddies], “Bregantino Bregantín,” and “Chéggue.” Unfortunately, criticism is often vitiated by an over-reliance on approaches to literature that stress myth and symbol—the work of Mircea Eliade is a case in point—and by sweeping generalizations about “the African universe,” “black thought,” and “the primitive mentality.” The general view is that Cabrera’s stories are creative renderings of black oral traditions told to her by a series of informants. They are set in the past, in a recognizably tropical landscape (Cuba or Africa), and they usually involve a small number of clearly defined and individually named characters which may be human, animal or supernatural. The animals and divine beings are never wholly good or bad but are attributed with human emotions and failings; the narrations in which they feature, therefore, are fables and myths. Some stories incorporate words, refrains and songs in Lucumí or Congo to the extent that a story becomes a bilingual text. It is this mixture of vivid realism, myth and fantasy, the use of animals indigenous to Cuba, particularly the small turtle (jicotea), the boa (majá), and the vulture (aura tiñosa), and the imaginative, almost lyrical, use of language which makes Cabrera’s tales such a pleasure to read. The presence of supernatural phenomena alongside realistically portrayed men, women and children suggests that Cabrera was a precursor of Latin American magical realism.

Certainly, the narrators show no surprise at the fantastic events recounted. Detailed analyses of Cabrera’s narrative techniques point to the extensive use of anaphora, hypotaxis, simile, metaphor, personification, and other techniques associated with the folk-tale but, at the same time, critics are well aware that these stories are the results of Cabrera’s own creative imagination and skill.

A typical story, considered one of the best in Cuban literature, is “Cundió Brujería Mala” [Black Magic Was Spread Around], from ¿Por qué?, which tells of a woodcutter, Bracundé, who lives near a Congo sorcerer/devil named Indiambo. The devil lusts after Bracundé’s wife and, after casting an evil spell (uembá) so that Bracundé is put in prison, he kidnaps her and takes her to the mountains in a sack. Once Bracundé is free, with the help of his ancestors, his faithful dog and an angry Axe, he wreaks vengeance on the unfortunate devil who is chopped into pieces. Bracundé and his wife then travel the world scattering the bits of devil as they go. But, the narrator informs us, each chopped-up piece grows into another devil thus explaining why black magic is rife in the world. Cabrera introduces the protagonist with the kind of rhythmic, euphonic prose characteristic of her work:

Bracundé era leñador. Iba a un monte a cortar leña. En la ceja de este monte, del monte Monte-Munguela, habitaba un brujo congo, Sicongo-lundé-bantúa: congo malo del Congo Real… Y este brujo era un diablo y este diablo se llamaba Indiambo.

[Bracundé was a woodcutter. He used to go to a mountain to cut wood. On the brow of this mountain, of the mountain Mountain-Munguela, there lived a Congo sorcerer, Sicongo-lundé-bantúa: a bad Congo from Royal Congo…And this sorcerer was a devil and this devil was called Indiambo].

The dialogue between man and devil continues thus: “Manigua...¿Kindiambo?” (Who is master?) And Bracundé responded always: “¡Inxambi!” (God) while onomatopoeia connotes the wife’s delicate footsteps: “Chiqui chiqui chiquirichi/chiquiri chiquiri chiquirichi...” The most striking figure in the story, is the Axe—all-knowing and gleaming on the wall—which finally cuts down the devil in a fit of revenge. The story, just over four pages long, is a typically wellcrafted miniature.
Cabrera’s later work, written in Miami, becomes increasingly nostalgic as the prospect of returning to Cuba fades. She refers repeatedly to her idyllic childhood on the island to which she would never return. Trinidad de Cuba, a digressive potpourri of legends, recipes, and songs is possibly her most subjective work recreating two trips she made to the town in 1923 and 1940. In Los animales en el folklore y la magia de Cuba, 1988 [Animals in Cuban Folklore and Magic], a compendium of vignettes, dialogues and stories dedicated to her cats and published just before she died, she alludes to both “the poetic and marvellous inner world of our infancy” and “the unique charm of our lost island” which she hopes to recapture despite the fact that she is living in a country “where time is only money.” Cabrera’s works have yet to be studied in their full dimension and in their entirety.

CATHARINE DAVIES

Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, 20 May 1900, into a prominent upper-class family. Her father, Raimundo Cabrera, was a lawyer and writer, involved in the pro-Cuban independence movement. The Cabrera home was a meeting place for leading figures in politics and culture. Educated at home and briefly at a private school. Assimilated legends and magical beliefs of Cuban blacks by listening to family servants. Family went into exile in 1917. When she threatened to kill herself Cabrera’s father agreed to allow her to attend the Sorbonne, however, he died before he could fulfil his promise. Determined to be independent, Cabrera set up Havana’s first antiques shop. She sold her share in the family business and went to Paris in 1927, where she attended the Ecole du Louvre until 1930. In that time she became aware of the African revival in the arts and of the Négritude movement. (Her brother-in-law, Fernando Ortiz (see separate entry), was an outstanding Cuban ethnographer). In Paris, Cabrera also renewed her friendship with the Venezuelan poet and novelist Teresa de la Parra. The latter became ill with tuberculosis in 1932, and Cabrera accompanied her friend to a sanatorium. (Some of Cabrera’s African-Cuban stories were written to entertain her sick friend). Cabrera travelled to Spain with de la Parra, but left the country following de la Parra’s death and the outbreak of war in 1936. She returned to Cuba in 1939 and became friends with the paleographer María Teresa de Rojas. In the early 1940s Cabrera began to collate and publish stories and articles on African-Cuban culture. Adviser to National Institute of Culture during the 1950s. In 1959 Cabrera left Cuba, and spent the rest of her life in exile in Madrid and Miami. Died in Miami, 18 September 1991.

Selected Works

Short Fiction

Contes nègres de Cuba, Paris: Gallimard, 1936; in Spanish as Cuentos negros de Cuba, Havana: La Veronica, 1940

¿Por qué? Cuentos negros de Cuba, Havana: C.R., 1948

Ayapá: cuentos de Jicotea, Miami: Universal, 1971

Cuentos para adultos, niños, y retrasados mentales, Miami: C.R., 1983

Other Writings

El monte: ibgo finda, ewe orisha, vititi nfinda: notas sobre las religiones, la magia, las supersticiones y el folklore de los negros criollos y del pueblo de Cuba, Havana: C.R., 1954
Refranes de negros viejos, Havana: C.R., 1955 [sayings/proverbs]
Anagó: vocabulario lucumí: el yoruba que se habla en Cuba, Havana: C.R., 1957
La sociedad secreta Abakuá, narrada por viejos adeptos, Havana: C.R., 1959
Otán Iyebiyé: las piedras preciosas, Miami: Universal, 1969
La laguna sagrada de San Joaquín, Madrid: R., 1973
Yemayá y Ochún: Kariocha, Iyalorichas y Olorichas, Madrid: C.R., 1974 [legends/myths]
Anaforuana: Ritual y símbolos de la iniciacion en las sociedad secreta Abakuá, Madrid: R., 1975
Francisco y Franciscia: chascarrillos de negros viejos, Miami: C.R., 1976
La Regla Kimbisa del Santo Cristo del Buen Viaje, Miami: C.R., 1977
Itinerarios del insomnio, Trinidad de Cuba, Miami: C.R., 1977
Reglas de Congo: Palo Monte Mayombé, Miami: C.R., 1979
La medicina popular de Cuba: médicos de antaño, curanderos, santeros y paleros de hogaño, Miami: C.R., 1984
Vocabulario Congo: el Bantú se habla en Cuba, Miami: Universal, 1985
Supersticiones y buenos consejos, Miami: Universal, 1987
Los animales en el folklore y la magia de Cuba, Miami: Universal, 1988
La lengua sagrada de los ñáñigos, Miami: C.R., 1988

Further Reading
Castellanos, Isabel and Josefina Inclán (editors), En tomo a Lydia Cabrera (Cincuentenario de “Cuentos Negros de Cuba” 1936–1986, Miami: Universal, 1987 [Includes several worthwhile articles (Cruz-Valdés, Irizarry, Sánchez Boudy and Zaldívar) and useful bibliographies]
Hiriart, Rosario, Lydia Cabrera: vida hecha arte, New York: Eliseo Torres and Sons, 1978
Sánchez, Reinaldo, et al. (editors), Homen a je a Lydia Cabrera Miami: Universal, 1977
Valdés-Cruz, Rosa, Lo ancestral africano en la narrativa de Lydia Cabrera, Barcelona: Vosgos, 1974

Guillermo Cabrera Infante 1929–

Cuban prose writer
In 1964 Guillermo Cabrera Infante captured readers’ imagination with his Tres tristes tigres (Three Trapped Tigers), a witty tongue-in-cheek unclassifiable text, therefore generally accepted as a “novel.” Tres tristes tigres, a tongue-twister written in Cabrera Infante’s native Cuban dialect mixed with “rejoyced Spanish,” would become a milestone in the booming Latin American writing of the 1960s. This work had an interesting history.

In 1964, Cabrera Infante was promising two books: a forthcoming volume of short stories and a novel-in-progress. The first was supposed to be “Ella cantaba boleros” [She Sang Boleros]; it was a book of stories centered on a black nightclub singer. Cabrera Infante started writing this “continuing” story in 1961 after his brother’s short film P.M., which focused on Havana’s night-life, was banned, as a kind of continuation of the film by other means. The manuscript of the promised novel, “Vista del amanecer en el trópico” [View of Dawn in the Tropics], would win, in 1964, the highly sought-after Seix Barral Biblioteca Breve prize which set the pace for the Boom of the 1960s. Almost schizophrrenically, one work grew out of dissent from the Cuban Revolution, while the other celebrated it. After Cabrera Infante left Cuba for good in the fall of 1966, although he kept silent on things Cuban until the summer of 1968, his life was in a fix (he was too early for dissidence, which was made popular in the following decade, and Cuban dissidence was unthinkable for the intellectual “Left Bank” anyway). Sitting over the proofs of his novel, he realized that he wanted to publish something else. By coincidence, the Francoist censor had also raised certain objections to the text and Cabrera had to take care of them before the book could be published in Spain. Cabrera Infante seized the occasion, and his work reemerged from its ashes with a new title, Tres tristes tigres. Thematically, the novel merged with “Ella cantaba boleros” and shed its previous opportunistic political content. In the new (re)version, Cabrera Infante placed parody in the center to question radically the vexing aesthetic problems of mimetic art. The vignettes of the original version that chronicled the political violence so pervasive throughout Cuban history would be reorganized and updated in 1972 to include the Cuban Revolution of 1959, in order to appear, in 1974, as a separate volume under the old, now only more ironic, title Vista del amanecer en el trópico (A View of Dawn in the Tropics).

Tres tristes tigres evokes the world of Havana’s night-life and popular culture of the late 1950s, which had to disappear, sacrificed as it was by the Revolution to the “train of Modernity,” which now continues, squeaking along like a rough bicycle ride. The novel engages in a typical postmodern defense and rescue of a specific local culture; yet, in line with modernist experimentalism, it questions each of its own narrative steps, including the very possibility of reaching its goals through artistic means.

The novel impresses the reader as a “gallery of voices” and as a “concentric chaos” of various points of view, confusing the temporal sequence of the narration and erasing the limits between “reality” and “literature.” In the final chapter, “Bachata,” a character appears, called Silvestre, who promises to become the “future” author of the work that the reader has already in hand. Throughout the novel, playful Sternian and metanarrative commentaries abound and reveal that what seems to be spontaneous, unmediated oral speech has actually passed through the sieve of literary discourse. “Bachata” even flaunts references to pages of the printed book. Behind the alleged “naturalness” of the human voices “captured in flight,” a multifarious textuality appears; and behind this, the various “genealogical” layers of creation that the work puts on display. The creative process of writing is dramatized; it is captured in a state of fermentation; yet, simultaneously, it is presented as the result of a process already completed.

The author has confessed that he writes “armed with scissors and a bottle of glue.” In Tres tristes tigres, this technique has produced a collage of textual fragments, taking each cut-up from a different story and interweaving them with others in certain patterns. In this fragmentary montage, the first-person narratives are often anonymous or remain separated from the contexts that might explain their meaning (the case of Arsenio and Laura, making their stage debut in “Beginners”). In the contrary direction, one “fact” may engender multiple “literary” versions that are presented in consecutive “drafts,” translations and retranslations, or in series of parodies (e.g., the story of the lost walking stick, followed by the corrections made by Mrs Campbell, or the celebrated literary parodies on the death of Trotsky “as described” by leading Cuban writers, from José Martí to Nicolás Guillén).

Reading Tres tristes tigres is like deciphering a Cubist and sometimes Surrealist picture. Narrative discourse, represented world, characters, and even many language elements are cut up into fragments and are playfully exploded. The illusion of representation breaks down continually. Reality turns into theater, movies, literature, fiction, and thus becomes a fierce parody of itself. The anthropomorphic identity of the characters melts away in the wordplay like the watches of Salvador Dali. One of the central characters of the novel, Bustrófedon, is actually a rhetorical figure; the text offers various examples of “boustrophedonic” writing. This breakdown of referential communication and of the mimetic conventions produces a vacuum of meaning in the very center of the novelistic construction, an emptiness symbolized best by the Sternian blank pages of “Some Revelations.” Palindromes and mirror images appear side by side with examples of boustrophenon writing, and link Tres tristes tigres closely with Lewis Carroll.

On the surface, the aesthetic quest in Tres tristes tigres creates a “baroque body,” full of “idle imitations, tricky travesties, embezzled embellishments.” However, these “voluptuous volutes” are the result not of superficial playing, but of an agonistic struggle for meaning, representation, and reality through language and playful social discourse (the Cuban choteo) that, in turn, impose their own protagonism. The continuous gaming is a part both of the narrative world evoked and of the self-questioning work of art that is emerging. This double “jesture,” contradictory yet complementary, is fundamental to the radical aesthetic project embodied by Tres tristes tigres.

With the exception of the novel La Habana para un infante difunto, 1979 (Infante’s Inferno) Cabrera Infante’s other works do not measure up to Tres tristes tigres, and none has matched the latter’s international impact and influence on Latin American writing. Yet these other works are not negligible. Different voices of oral discourse and aspects of contemporary urban popular culture are explored in Cabrera Infante’s early experimental short stories and vignettes, Así en la paz como en la guerra, 1960 (Writes of Passage). Cabrera Infante was also an assiduous film critic. His critical close-ups on the new mass culture coming from Hollywood, enriched by narrative passages and Sternian jokes, appeared in Un oficio del siglo viente (A Twentieth-Century Job), and in Arcadia todas las noches [Arcadia Every Night]. The rich leftovers from Tres tristes tigres and other short experimental and sharp epigrammatic texts were put together in the whimsical volumes of O, 1975, and Exorcismos de esti(l) o, 1976 [MidsummerStyle Exorcisms]. La Habana is not a trendy novel, but it is a witty and compassionate evocation of life in Havana’s lower middle-class milieu during the 1940s and 1950s, covering Cabrera Infante’s early teens and his erotic awakening and pursuits. This erotic autobiographical novel shows some picaresque traits and dwells on rather earthy confessions that would have delighted Rousseau. Cabrera Infante collected his political and cultural criticism in a powerful indictment, Mea Cuba, 1992

EMIL VOLEK
Biography

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction

Screenplays (under the pseudonym G. Caín)
Wonderwall, 1968; Vanishing Point, 1970

Other Writings
Un oficio del siglo veinte (published under the pseudonym G. Cain), Havana: Revolución, 1960; revised edition, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1973; as A Twentieth-Century Job (as Cabrera Infante), London: Faber and Faber, 1991
O, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1975
Exorcismos de esti(l)o, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1976
Arcadia todas las noches, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1978
Further Reading

Cabrera Infante’s interviews with Emir Rodríguez Monegal and Rita Guibert are probably the best starting point.

—— “La Habana para un infante difunto: Cabrera Infante’s Self-Conscious Narrative,” Hispania, vol. 68 (1985)

Cabrera Infante, Guillermo, “Epilogue for Late(nt) Readers,” Review (Winter 1971-Spring 1972); and various materials in his own complete edition of Tres tristes tigres, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1990

García Chichester, Ana, “Cultura y vulgaridad en La Habana para un infante difunto” Kentucky Romance Quarterly (1987)

Hall, Kenneth E., Guillermo Cabrera Infante and the Cinema, Newark, Delaware: Juan de la Cuesta, 1989

—— The Subversive Scribe: Translating Latin American Fiction, St Paul, Minnesota: Graywolf Press, 1991 [Levine is a translator of Cabrera’s work]

Nelson, Ardis L., G. Cabrera Infante in the Menippean Tradition, Newark, Delaware: Juan de la Cuesta, 1983

Volek, Emil, “Tres tristes tigres en la jaula verbal: las antinomias dialécticas y la tentativa de lo absoluto en la novela de Guillermo Cabrera Infante,” in his Cuatro claves para la modernidad: análisis semiótico de textos hispánicos, Madrid: Gredos, 1984
Interviews

Special Issues of Journals
World Literature Today, vol. 61 (Autumn 1987)

Caliban

America as the Other

Caliban, in post-colonial literary criticism, is considered one of the most powerful symbols in the European construction of the New World as its Other. Traditionally, Caliban has been seen as the negative foil to Prospero’s culture, Miranda’s virtue, Ariel’s spirituality in a variety of dyadic interpretations; more recent critical attention has focused on The Tempest as “the startling encounter between a lettered and an unlettered culture.” For Stephen Greenblatt, the confrontation between Caliban and Prospero dramatizes one of the basic elements in the construction of the New World by the coloniser’s imagination. The claim made in the play that Caliban had no speech, indeed could not even know his own feelings until given speech, recalls Columbus’s declaration in his Journal that he had to name everything in the New World, and also that he would send six native inhabitants to Spain “para que aprendan a hablar” (that they may learn to speak). According to Greenblatt, Caliban’s alleged lack of language reflects two important beliefs of the European way of conceptualising the world: first, that the natives had no language other than an unintelligible babble and secondly, that any European language could express the Indian experience in an immediate and unproblematic way. But Shakespeare’s Caliban differs from Columbus’s natives in that he has no redeeming features of grace, docility or beauty. Caliban is not a noble savage, a being uncorrupted by culture, but “the abhorrent slave,” the creature that Aristotle argued had no reason and needed firm government, a sentiment ardently invoked by the Spanish to justify their enslavement of the Indians and the erasure of their cultures.

A near anagram of “cannibal,” the name Caliban harks back to Montaigne’s famous essay on this topic. Montaigne’s interest was to point out the shortcomings of Western civilization, its own barbarous practices. But, with Bartolomé de Las Casas, his was one of the few voices that argued that barbarism was not an absolute concept but was relative to the speaker’s situation.

The question of positionality is a crucial point in the contemporary debate about the way Western civilization has set itself up as centre, and constructed an Other according to its own need and for its own self-assertion. This idea was first given prominence with regard to the Orient in Edward Said’s seminal de l’Amérique (1982), discuss ing this subject with rework Orientalism (1978). Tzvetan Todorov, in La Conquête America, examines the manipulative attitudes of Europeans towards the indigenous inhabitants of America. Contemporary theories of literature have brought the question of alterity to the forefront in all discussions of subaltern groups. One of the crucial questions asked is in what way can the centre ever speak of the Other and in turn, by what linguistic means can the Other displace the centre?

Eurocentric assumptions about the centrality and absolute validity of European civilization as opposed to American barbarism were taken as natural by an impressive line of thinkers including Buffon, Voltaire, Hume, Hegel and Schopenhauer: foundational figures in shaping not only European thought, their ideas dominated Latin American self-evaluation. The conflict on these oppositional and hierarchical terms was at the basis of Latin American political thought, expressed most notably in terms of a struggle between civilization and barbarism in Domingo Faustino Sarmiento's polemical work Facundo, 1845 (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants).

At the beginning of the 20th century the thrust of the polemic turned to questions of national identity. The term Caliban came into prominence once more with the writing of José Enrique Rodó’s influential essay Ariel (1900). The confrontation here, inspired by Shakespeare's The Tempest and more particularly by Renan's play Caliban, suite de “La Tempête” (1875), was clothed in moral language. Rodó qualified the “colossus of the North,” the US, as the base Caliban of the modern age, urging the Latin American nations to seek inspiration in the more ethereal Ariel. Rodó’s essay was not a crude polemic against the US: it recognised much of the advances that had been achieved by that nation in terms of material welfare and economic progress and admitted Latin America's comparative backwardness in this respect, but offered different, compensatory values in the stoic tradition of Latin America's cultural heritage. Gerald Martin, in Journeys through the Labyrinth (1989) wryly points out that this debate left little space for the Indians, Blacks and Mestizos. Iris M. Zavala, in her discussion of Ariel as part of “The dialogical cultural signs” in Colonialism and Culture: Hispanic Modernism in the Social Imaginary (1992), berates Rodó for his uncritical acceptance of the connotations of Shakespeare’s characters. She also mentions Caliban as the Other of Darío’s symbol of Spanish American Modernismo, the swan.

Rodó’s essay against the excesses of utilitarianism, pleading for materialism to be tempered by an adherence to moral and spiritual values was misread, and became influential as a spur to a Latin American sense of self-identity based on racial arguments. La raza cósmica, 1925 (The Cosmic Race) by José Vasconcelos is the best known of a number of writings in this vein.

More recently, and following in the insurrectional footsteps of the Barbadian George Lamming or the Martinican Aimé Césaire, Cuba's leading intellectual Roberto Fernández Retamar inverted once more the symbolism used by Rodó. In his essay Calibán (1971) he put forward the idea that while Ariel stands for its intellectual spirit, Latin America is best represented by Caliban, who, though Prospero's slave, remained the island's “rude and unconquerable master.” Retamar is aware that in proposing Caliban as the symbol of Latin America he could be accused of perpetuating European linguistic and cultural domination, yet his aim is to use the language of the opponent as an accepted frame of reference in order best to expose and contest its tacit naturalised assumptions and invert its colonialist connotations.

In post-colonial Caribbean (and African) literature, Caliban continues to be used as an important insurrectional symbol. In the words of Rob Nixon, The Tempest “came to serve as a Trojan horse, whereby cultures barred from the citadel of ‘universal ‘West’ values could win entry and assail global pretensions from within.”

A feminist examination of the failure of Calibán to represent women’s voices of defiance is awaited. Up to the present the only aspect of the Caliban debate to have been aired by a feminist is what Laura E. Donaldson terms “the Miranda complex.” By this she means that in a colonial context the two subalterns, Caliban and Miranda, should have closed ranks against their common oppressor. Instead, Caliban seeks to obtain his revenge on Prospero by attempting to violate Miranda, while she fails to see that as a woman she too is Other and thus continues to support the patriarchal status quo.

EVELYN FISHBURN

See also entries on Une Tempête (Aimé Césaire), Civilization and Barbarism, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento, José Vasconcelos

Further Reading

Brown, Paul, “This thing of darkness I acknowledge mine’: The Tempest and the Discourse of Colonialism,” in Political Shakespeare: New Essays in Cultural Materialism, edited by Jonathan Dollimore and Alan Sinfield, Manchester: Manchester University Press, and Ithaca,
New York: Cornell University Press, 1985

Donaldson, Laura E., Decolonizing Feminisms, London: Routledge, 1992

6/7 (1993)

Fernández Retamar, Roberto, “Calibán,” Casa de las Américas 68 (September-October 1971);

in First Images of America, edited by Fredi Chiapelli, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976

Nixon, Rob, “Caribbean and African Appropriations of The Tempest” Critical Inquiry, vol. 13/3 (1987)

Reid, John T., “The Rise and Decline of the Ariel-Calibán Antithesis in Spanish America,” The Americas, vol. 34/3 (1978)

of Caliban/cannibal explored by Fernández Retamar are also highlighted in this text]

Rodríguez Monegal, Emir, “The Metamorphoses of Caliban,” Diacritics 7 (September 1977)

Sánchez, Marta E., “Caliban: the New Latin American Protagonist of The Tempest,” Diacritics 6
(1976)

Zavala, Iris M., Colonialism and Culture: Hispanic Modernism in the Social Imaginary, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992
Eugenio Cambaceres 1843–1889

Argentine novelist

Three expressions of literature come together in the work of Eugenio Cambaceres: the so-called Generation of 1880, the gauchesque genre, and River Plate Naturalism. Because of its publication date, Potpourri could be said to introduce the literary era of the Generation of 1880. Although the themes are urban, certain descriptions of the plains, a natural biological fatalism, and a kind of rootlessness and remoteness, give Cambaceres’s characters the pathos found in gauchesque poems.

Cambaceres has been called a pioneer of the Spanish American Naturalist novel and is identified as such in literary history. This is because of his unashamed attachment to Émile Zola, together with diverse related theories (Spencer and Schopenhauer were known in Buenos Aires by then, and Florentino Ameghino had recently arrived from Europe professing and proselytising Darwin-style evolutionism).

Cambaceres wrote four novels. Of these, the first is Potpourri—fragmentary, full of inconsistencies, at times burlesque, at times dramatic—an amalgam of themes and its narrative unity is provided by the “realist” precept of the narrator. “I think,” says Cambaceres, “as do the disciples of the Realist school, that simply showing the open sores which disfigure the social organism is the most positive reaction we can use against them.”

Without Zola’s aesthetic density or rigour, but with the same passion for social issues, as well as a few moralistic admonitions under the guise of local colour, Potpourri gently tours the imagination of a first-person narrator, with paradoxical autobiographical tinges. “An exploration of society through several Buenos Aires milieus,” wrote Benito Varela Jacomé, “it reflects the energy of carnival; criticizes the elections run by demagogues and gangsters; examines the country’s educational problems; shows life in the countryside; opposes immigration by creating a grotesque figure of ridicule in the form of a Spanish servant.”

As a critical satire of social mores, defamatory and biased, Potpourri enjoyed a certain notoriety in Cambaceres’s day. His narrator proposes (this is 1882.) the principle of separation of Church and State, and denounces the electoral corruption of his very own party, the Conservatives. This may be why the author did not dare sign the first edition; it came out anonymously.

Música sentimental, 1884 [Sentimental Music], Cambaceres’s second novel, takes place in France and is the story of a prostitute, Loulou, whose love for Pablo—an Argentine from a wealthy family—changes her life. Here, the allusion to Nana (the protagonist of Zola’s novel of that title), is obvious. Despite the autobiographical hint of the first-person narrator, however, the whole nature of the storyteller-witness differs in Música sentimental (from Potpourri). It shies away from subjective comments, tries to adopt a neutral, distant tone, and also gives more scope to the characters, who express timid opinions in the course of their conversations.

Música sentimental, in fact, demonstrates Cambaceres’s evolution and paves the way for his best work, Sin rumbo, 1885 [Shiftless]. Sin rumbo is the truculent story—the influence of Zola’s Germinal is obvious—of a wealthy young man who seduces a maid but, on her premature death, and in the name of the daughter she has left him, determines to remake his life. This all ends in fatal failure when, after his daughter’s death from diptheria, the hero commits suicide in an apocalyptic finale.

_En la sangre_, 1887 [In the Blood], Cambaceres’s last novel, tells the story of a family of Italian immigrants who have come to Buenos Aires to seek their fortune. The main character, Gennaro, the family’s eldest son, is an allegory of social determinism. Of humble origin, despite making a fortune and despite his education, Gennaro ends up as poor as his parents when they first arrived. Cambaceres opposed Sarmiento’s programme of importing cheap labour, and in this novel mooted the idea that societies and social classes are a natural phenomenon, biologically determined.

In _En la sangre_, Cambaceres repeats the trajectory of _Sin rumbo_: he presents the protagonist’s background, distinguishing between him, his experience and his milieu. There follows a logical and fatal plot development, leading to an inevitable conclusion.

Cambaceres’s work is characterized by grand flourishes, a fatalism that comes close to pathos, a taste for vulgarity and a determination to criticize contemporary society until then unknown in Argentine fiction. These are the elements that literary historians will encounter and subsequently elaborate according to their own criteria and agenda. In 1881, Argentine literary history, the history of a “national” literature, was a narrative that had not yet been written. In this sense, Eugenio Cambaceres will be considered historically not so much for his literary production as for the fact that he indicates the end of a given period. Specialists use his work to date both earlier and later stages of Argentine literature, not only in the 19th but also in the 20th century. Cambaceres’s biography is perceived as _ideal_ by the authors of Argentine literary history.

His narratives are novelettish and like popular, serialized fiction. They come close to gauchesque poetry and also to the early narratives about _La gran aldea_, 1884 [The Big Village], as Lucio V. López christened Buenos Aires. Cambaceres’s narrator is to be found perpetually in this ambiguous position. This shift, like an indiscernible unit, distinguishes all his works and represents, like very few novels of the period, a National Drama that had contained much tragedy and laughter, as applies to these parvenu countries, Argentina among them, invented more by their writers than their statisticians.

CLAUDIO CANAPARO
translated by Ann Wright and Verity Smith

Biography

Selected Works

Potpourri. Silbidos de un vago, Buenos Aires: Biedma, 1882
Música sentimental. Silbidos de un vago, Paris: Libreria Española y Americana, 1884

Sin rumbo: estudio, Buenos Aires: Lajouane, 1885

En la sangre, Buenos Aires: Sud-América, 1887

Compilations and Anthologies
Obras completas, Sante Fe, Argentina: Castellvi, 1956

Further Reading

Bastos, María Luisa, introduction to Sin rumbo, New York: Anaya, 1971

Bazán-Figueras, Patricia, Eugenio Cambaceres: precursor de la novela argentina contemporánea, New York: Peter Lang, 1994

Cymerman, Claude, Diez estudios cambacerianos, Rouen: Université de Rouen, 1993 [Includes a bio-bibliography]

Viñas, David, Literatura argentina y realidad política, Buenos Aires: Jorge Álvarez, 1964

Nellie Campobello 1913–

Mexican prose writer and poet

Among the novelists of the Mexican Revolution, Nellie Campobello is conspicuous not only as the lone woman in the company of such better-known writers as Mariano Azuela, Martín Luis Guzmán and Rafael F. Muñoz, but also for the striking singularity of her work. While her writing shares historical contexts as well as artistic and thematic innovations with other Mexican literature of this period, it also stands out in relief against its textual contemporaries. Much of its singularity stems from Campobello’s particular treatment of revolutionary violence and death as filtered through the unflinching gaze of a young female observer.

Although Campobello’s work has consistently attracted a small but devoted reading public, particularly in Mexico, the quantity of criticism devoted to her works is still quite low. Her work ranges widely in focus and genre despite the relative brevity of her corpus as a whole, virtually all of which was published in or around the 1930s. Her first publications were in journalism and poetry; her first published book, ¡Yo!, 192.9 [I!!], was a collection of poems. Her study of Mexican indigenous dance, Ritmos indígenas, 1940 [Indigenous Rhythms], co-authored with her sister Gloria, reflects Campobello’s career as a professional dancer and director of the National School of Dance for many years, and also echoes her fascination with rhythm and movement, which pervades her poetry as well as her prose.

Despite the stylistic variety of her writing, Campobello is best known for her autobiographical prose. Her two major literary works, Cartucho, and Las manos de Mamá (published in one volume as Cartucho and My Mother’s Hands) draw on her childhood memories of life in the northern Mexican state of Chihuahua during the Revolution. Both works counterpose the author’s vivid memories of wartime massacre and injustice with equally powerful images of human tenderness, the latter associated particularly with Campobello’s mother. Although often referred to as novels, the two works are better described as memorias (recollections), or estampas (images or prints), a prose style typical of revolutionary literature, characterized by brief portraits of individuals or events, written in simple language and often centering on a striking visual image. The rustic appearance and brevity of Campobello’s style, however, belies the brilliant artistic intentionality of her work. Her art utilizes her childhood impressions less for the purposes of historical or autobiographical documentation than as touchstones for artistic creation. However, Campobello blends her artistic intensity with an equally passionate determination to testify to her own vision and experience of the Revolution and to defend those of its leading figures with whom she sympathized. Her hero was Pancho Villa, populist leader in the north later eclipsed by rival Venustiano Carranza, and whom Campobello eulogized in her biographical study, Apuntes sobre la vida militar de Francisco Villa, 1940 [Notes on the Military Life of Francisco Villa]. In her eyes, the maverick Villa was the underdog of the Revolution, suppressed in official historical accounts, and she never missed the opportunity to defend him. In the process, however, Campobello also relinquished critical perspective on her hero, though this is a fault of the biography rather than of the literature.

The objects referred to in the titles of the two autobiographical prose works dominate both of them. They are “cartucho” (cartridge) and the mother’s hands, which metonymically evoke the forces that orient Campobello’s narration of her childhood. The part, in both cases, stands for a whole, although that whole is absent, shrouded in the past, and the narrator must conjure it in the narrative present: the cartridges, which many revolutionaries wore draped around their chests like armor, are lethal components of one-time explosive revolutionary fervor; the hands are visible representatives and agents of Nellie’s deceased mother’s strength and maternal care. Violent revolutionary passion and maternal strength, however, are inseparably intertwined in the two works, though the former could be said to dominate Cartucho as the latter preside over Las manos de Mamá. If a father—Pancho Villa—stands behind the cartridge, he is also portrayed in both works as a benevolent, often tender leader; and if the hands of Nellie’s mother are a source of family preservation, they will also explode into activity in order to save Nellie’s brother from death and to regain custody of her children when they are taken from her.

The metonymic mode of the titles permeates the art and narrative content of the works themselves. Writing decades after the Revolution, Campobello seeks to hold her scattered memories together by repeatedly investing with significance symbolic fragments of the lost wholeness of things. These fragments are often the individuals who died in the Revolution and were forgotten by the victors, their corpses left scattered behind in a national struggle toward cultural and historical cohesion. Frequently, the fragments are also memories of a childhood forever dissipated by war and now reinvoked by a writer who seeks to hold a scattered self together through writing. Finally, the fragments are also those of Campobello’s beloved mother, who spent her last breath keeping her family together through violence and hunger and whose many facets are carefully reintegrated in tender invocations.

The structure of Cartucho follows this metonymy through a series of portraits of men—and a few women—associated with Campobello’s childhood and who perished in the violence of the Revolution. Particularly in the first half of the novel, the presentation of each portrait tends to follow a similar pattern: a figure passes before the eyes of the young Nellie, who foresees his imminent death; the narrator often catches a small detail of the individual’s face or body, which is then reinvoked following his execution—shoes, smiles, fingers, cigars as if a reminder that death cannot mark a disappearance but always leaves behind a remainder and a memory. Often Nellie herself preserves the corpse as a piece of the departed individual, as when, for example, she grows fond of a body left outside her window for several days; though the whole itself is lost, she labors to keep the remainder intact, as when she carefully deposits into the pockets of a dead man the shards of his own frozen blood. Campobello honors these remainders in a stark, dispassionate prose devoid of sentimentalism.

The presence of Nellie’s mother is constant in the pages of Cartucho, though her image there remains more in the background in contrast to her centrality in Las manos de Mamá. The prose in this latter work is shifting, suggestive and fragmentary, less stark and direct than Cartucho, though the metonymical focus of the first work continues with the persistent treatment of the mother’s presence by means of the legible peripheries of her hands and skirts. In a similar continuity with the spirit of Cartucho, when Nellie’s brother loses a hand in gunfire, her mother preserves the fingers in alcohol; Campobello describes them as swimming in the bottle like contented little fishes. The mother in this work becomes a protagonist operating even more actively inside and outside the home, in both masculine and feminine spheres. When her children are taken away from her, she returns Courageously to gather them together and then successfully defends before a judge her right to maintain custody of her children. Throughout the text, her hands and skirts are an enclosure protecting young Nellie and her siblings from the horror and hunger of war. The novel begins more slowly than Cartucho, but then moves into similar scenes of more rapid-paced violence so pervasive in the earlier work. Las manos de Mamá differs from Cartucho, however, in its character both as a hymn of devotion to Nellie’s mother as well as a eulogy delivered against the attempted erasures of life by death. Rather than verging on nostalgia, Las manos de Mamá, like the majority of Campobello’s work, is a passionate exercise of rhythm and song against the futility of mere mourning. Or perhaps it could be said that in Nellie Campobello’s work mourning and rhythm, longing and invention, seek out their synchrony.

CARL GOOD

Biography

Born at Villa Ocampa in the state of Durango, Mexico, 7 November 1913. Large, prosperous family of three boys and three girls. Family moved to Chihuahua, 1919, and after mother’s death, to Mexico City, 1923. Attended the English School. Applied herself seriously to dancing and entered the Department of Fine Arts in 1930 as teacher of dance. Began to teach dance at the National University (UNAM), 1932, and by 1937 she was in charge of the National School of Dance.

Selected Works

¡Yo! Colección de versos, Mexico City: Ediciones L.I.D.N., 1929
Cartucho: relatos de la lucha en el norte de Mexico, Xalapa, Mexico: Ediciones Integrales, 1931; as Cartucho and My Mother’s Hands, translated by Doris Meyer and Irene Matthews, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1988
Apuntes sobre la vida militar de Francisco Villa, Mexico City: Edición y Distribución Iberoamericana de Publicaciones, 1940
Ritmos indígenas de Mexico, in collaboration with Gloria Campobello, illustrated by Mauro Rafael Moya, Mexico City: n.p., 1940
Las manos de Mamá, illustrated by José Clemente Orozco, 2nd edition, Mexico City: Editorial Villa Ocampo, 1949
Tres poemas, Mexico City: Compañía General de Ediciones, 1957

Compilations and Anthologies

Mis libros, illustrated by José Clemente Orozco, Mexico City: Compañía General de Ediciones, 1960 [Collected works: includes lengthy prologue by Campobello, as well as Cartucho, Las manos de Mamá, Apuntes sobre la vida militar de Francisco Villa and ¡Yo! Colección de Versos]

Further Reading

Criticism on Campobello is minimal. Her works are consistently mentioned in literary histories of the Mexican Revolution (John S. Brushwood, A.Dessau, M.P.González, Luis Leal, A.Castro Leal, etc.), but usually only in passing. Probably the best treatment of her work is the chapter devoted to Campobello in Martha Robles’s book on Mexican women writers. The articles by Meyer, De Beer and Matthews are also good introductions to her work, and Poniatowska provides an excellent, more “literary,” treatment of Campobello. Cazares Hernández, Laura, “Nellie Campobello, novelista de la revolución,” Casa de las Américas 183 (1991)
Parle, Dennis J., “Narrative Style and Technique in Nellie Campobello’s Cartucho, Romance Quarterly 32 (1985)
Poniatowska, Elena, introduction to Cartucho and My Mother’s Hands by Nellie Campobello, translated by Doris Meyer and Irene Matthews, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1988
Canon

The Literary Canon in Spanish America

Anthologies and works of reference—such as dictionaries and encyclopedias of literature—are quite reliable guides to the literary canon of a given period because it is not part of their remit to take risks by, say, giving prominence to controversial or experimental works. Thus it is worth noting (though the information will come as no surprise), that until the late 1980s, the entries in dictionaries of literature on Latin American writers were generally confined to (largely) dead, (largely) prosperous and (largely) white men. (This encyclopedia complies to the extent of ending with Zorrilla de San Martin, but departs from the accepted canon by starting with Soledad Acosta de Samper, an author not rescued from oblivion until the 1980s).

Of course, not all the eminent male writers of the canon are dead, since a few of the Boom authors of the 1960s were singled out (or shrewdly singled themselves out) for star treatment and have duly appeared on TV in designer jeans and expensive suits to introduce the culture of their country to the Western world. Some of their works of fiction have become what are known in the publishing world as “hardback heroes;” once they have reached best-seller status and become available as paperbacks, they are subjected to considerable commercial hype by publishers of English translations. This process has involved inevitable tabloid distortions, something which is aggravated when the book is turned into a film with a starstudded international cast (The Old Gringo, The House of the Spirits, Chronicle of a Death Foretold). According to these crude (mis)representations, Latin America is a site of poverty, backwardness and the exotic, that is to say, another bland, consumable manifestation of the “other” whose most obvious expression in the cultural journalese of the North is (of course) magical realism.

But it is not only those who distort for profit who are to blame. In an article of 1992, “On Expanding the Base of Latin American Studies,” David Foster addresses this key question: “do Latin American PhD programs in the United States ‘capture’ the essence of a culture of a foreign land, or do they simply embody in a concrete material sense what Santí calls the discourse of Latinamericanism?” Thus there are Mexican scholars who maintain that in the North their literature of the 20th century has been distorted through too great an emphasis being placed on literary representations of the Mexican Revolution. There are also university teachers who give “readings” of Latin American works without, in certain cases, ever descending from their intellectual eyries in the North to visit the country whose literature they are discussing. For this reason they may offer an invention rather than an illumination, rather like the detective in Borges’s “La muerte y la brújula” (Death and the Compass), who insisted on a Jewish solution to a Jewish crime. Those who settle for a virtual reality Latin America based on international congresses and Internet communications are dealers in new forms of sham scholarship: the reality cannot be replaced by information conjured up on a screen.

Teachers of Latin American studies in the North who would like to expand the basis of their courses face very real practical problems. They may, for example, wish to branch out and teach a course on the literature of the Central American countries or other small countries in the region (Paraguay; the Dominican Republic; Bolivia). They are likely to discover that, save in the case of those countries made fashionable by civil war and revolution (Nicaragua; El Salvador), they will not be able to do so because the relevant books will not be available in accessible, inexpensive editions. (Dick Gerdes, in his article on Spanish American literature in translation, included in this volume, gives an illuminating breakdown by country and author of works available in English translation). The same point applies for different reasons to a country like Cuba: purely on political grounds, a cordon sanitaire has been drawn round the Island. With the exception of Miguel Barnet, whom it has proved impossible to ignore because he has played a leading role in writing and promoting the fashionable testimonio form, the works of Cuba’s contemporary writers who are not in exile are not admitted in the canon. It is assumed that nothing worthwhile could be published there under Castro’s “tyranny.” At the same time, few academics from the US, at least, have been able to visit Cuba since 1959. Thus scholars from this country who wish to challenge the received wisdom on contemporary Cuban Island literature have to work very much against the grain.

The Latin American literary canon rightly gives importance to the authors of the past and within the United States, at least, the Colonial period has now been restored to prominence after decades of neglect, with new emphases such as conventual writing. Again, though, the works of the continent’s Colonial and 19th-century writers are not generally available in inexpensive editions. Thus university professors who do not share the (disingenuous?) dismissal by Vargas Llosa of the continent’s earlier writers as “primitives” may well be forced as teachers, if not as scholars, to remain within the confines of 20th-century writing. It is important to add, however, that it has been possible to broaden courses synchronically with courses on women writers, the works of other “minorities” and testimonial writing.

In the last two decades of the 20th century there has been at least one hopeful development, that of desktop publishing. This has allowed small, specialized publishers to make a living by concentrating their skills in specific areas. Examples are The White Pine Press and the Curbstone Press (the latter specializing in poetry) in the United States, and Carcanet and Serpent’s Tail (publishers of some contemporary Latin American fiction in translation) in the United Kingdom. Also helpful to teachers who wish to give their students the opportunity to investigate the literature of the past are the scholarly and fairly inexpensive Cátedra and Castalia editions published in Spain. These late 20th-century developments could not be more opportune since otherwise canon-formation in the future risks being dictated by market forces and restricted largely to hardback heroes which are “the book of the month” and, preferably, also “the book of the film.”

Verity Smith

See also entries on Best-Sellers, The Boom, Feminist Literary Theory, Film, The Post-Boom, Prizes, Translation: Spanish America
Further Reading

González Echevarría, Roberto, “Emir y el canon,” in Homenaje a Emir Rodríguez Monegal, Ministerio de Educación y Cultura, República Oriental de Uruguay, 1987 [Argues that Rodríguez Monegal was responsible for introducing contemporary Spanish American fiction into US university courses]

Ernesto Cardenal 1925–

Nicaraguan poet, politician, theologian and literary translator

Ernesto Cardenal, whose poetry has been translated into more than a dozen languages, is, without a doubt, one of the most widely-read poets in the world. Because his personal history is so closely allied with the evolution of his poetry and this, in turn, so inextricably linked to the history of Nicaragua, it is almost impossible not to make frequent reference to the linear time of biographical and historical occurrences as a means of understanding Cardenal’s extensive literary product.

Thus, one inevitably learns of Cardenal’s involvement in the failed attempt to overthrow the dictatorship of Somoza García in April 1954, and how Cardenal transformed these personal experiences into the quintessential Latin American political poem Hora O (Zero Hour). One considers, too, Cardenal’s religious conversion and how he (as Fr. Lawrence) entered a Trappist monastery in Gethsemany, Kentucky, (Gethsemani, Ky, Cardenal’s book of haiku-like sketches of nat epiphanies, is from this period), where the renowned Catholic contemplative Thomas Merton was his Novice Master from 1957–59.

Here, in a kind of mutual tutelage, Merton and Cardenal developed virtually all the important themes that would manifest themselves in Cardenal’s post-Trappist poetry: history and prophecy, the ethics of Christian and indigenous traditions, and even liberation theology. After Cardenal left the monastery (for health reasons), Merton continued to provide him with a spiritual guidance that shaped his poetry.

Over the next ten years, Cardenal published seminal works that profoundly influenced the development of contemporary Hispanic American poetry. Epigramas is a book that links the themes of love and politics with striking originality, but which, like Neruda’s Veinte poemas de amor y una canción desesperada (Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair), has not managed to hold up very well under feminist scrutiny in terms of the way that the two poets portray women. Until the recent definitive edition of Los ovnis de oro (Golden UFOs)—Cardenal calls this his “Indian poetry”—Cardenal continued to add to the poems on indigenous themes he first published in Homenaje a los indios americanos (Homage to the American Indians) in 1969. This work describes an ideal Amerindian ethical system based on spirituality, antimaterialism and agrarianism in stark contrast to the destructive and immoral capitalism of consumer societies. In Cardenal’s Salmos (Psalms), the speaker joins a biblical antiquity with the problems of contemporary culture. As the Nicaraguan critic Napoleón Chow has indicated, this interpretation of the Bible in Salmos as a means of expressing solidarity with the oppressed and the poor preceded the publication of Peruvian theologian Gustavo Gutiérrez’s fundamental book Teología de la liberación (Liberation Theology) by a full six years. Cardenal later made a significant contribution to the controversies surrounding liberation theology when he published El evangelio en Solentiname (The Gospel in Solentiname), a work in which peasants from Cardenal’s island community (Solentiname) interpret different parts of the New Testament.

Cardenal’s ordination as a priest in 1965 not only conferred upon him a definite social status, it also moved him closer to conceiving of himself as a poet-prophet, one capable of speaking in God’s voice about justice and morality (as well as their absence). If Solentiname, the community he founded in 1965 on the island of Mancarrón in Nicaragua’s Gran Lago (Great Lake), began as a contemplative, perhaps escapist, experiment related to communal experiences in the United States, at the same time, ongoing talks with revolutionary leaders of the Frente Sandinista de Liberación Nacional (FSLN) (such as Tomás Borge and Carlos Fonseca) beginning in 1968 gradually convinced Cardenal to renounce his principles of Gandhian and Mertonian non-violence and to become an international spokesperson for the Frente’s program of armed insurrection. The joining of Christian ideals with struggle for social change based on Marxist-Leninist tenets became firmly rooted in Cardenal as well as in his poetry after trips to Chile, where he met Marxist priests, and to Cuba in 1970, where he was deeply impressed with Fidel Castro’s experiment in socialism. Cardenal dedicated his Canto nacional [National Song] to the FSLN and in it prophesied Nicaragua as “a promised land for the Revolution.” For Cardenal, the earthquake that destroyed Managua right before Christmas in 1972 was a disaster of biblical magnitude that provoked the emphatically oracular tone of his long poem Oráculo sobre Managua [Oracle over Managua],

Historical figures always have been a major presence in Cardenal’s poetry, whether he is describing the conquistadors in the early poem “Proclama del conquistador” [Announcement of the Conquistador] or in El estrecho dudoso (The Doubtful Strait), indigenous personages such as Nezahualcóyotl or Tahirassawichi, or, from the 19th century, William Walker and the filibusters who occupied Nicaragua, or the national hero
A.C. Sandino. The dictator of Nicaragua and his family form such an integral part of Cardenal’s poetry that it led some Nicaraguans to joke that Cardenal’s poetic muse was Somoza (“Su musa es Somoza”). Cardenal uses these historical figures as a means of establishing an ethical framework by which he judges human actions and prophesies change. Despite a work such as Vida en el amor (Love) and declarations by critics such as Luce López-Baralt that Cardenal is “the first mystical writer of Hispanic America,” Cardenal’s fundamental preoccupations as a moralist prevent him from realizing his mystical aspirations in his poetry. This is less true of Cardenal’s controversial 600-page poem Cántico cósmico (Cosmic Canticle), in which the poet distances himself from Catholicism’s conception of God in favor of a pot-pourri that includes a cosmic consciousness based on science and a pseudoscience of the poet’s own invention, the multiple gods and godhead of a variety of world religions, the heterodox Christianity (Gnosticism) of his compatriot the metaphysical poet Alfonso Cortés, and even atheistic ideas regarding nothingness. This openness to different constructions of the divine is yet another of Cardenal’s debts to Merton.

One critic has called Cántico cósmico “the most beautiful gem of 20th-century Hispanic American poetry,” whereas others are daring to say that the emperor is not wearing any clothes. In any case, the Cántico may be considered a summation of Cardenal’s work as a poet. It is a culmination of the ideogrammatical compositional technique that Cardenal learned from Ezra Pound, in which fragments from a multitude of sources can be joined in a coherent whole. Because Cardenal incorporates current astrophysical theory (mostly a repetitive, prosaic rehashing of the Big Bang theory as explained by best-selling authors such as Stephen Hawking) to explain the nature of the entire universe and humanity’s relation to it, Cántico cósmico is also the ultimate extension of Cardenal’s concept of so-called “exteriorist” poetry, which he defines as “objective poetry: narrative and anecdotal, made of the elements of real life and concrete things, with proper names and precise details and exact data and numbers and facts and sayings…the only poetry that can express Latin American reality, reach the people, and be revolutionary.”

Cántico cósmico is considerably weakened by Cardenal’s wholesale inclusion of his two least convincing books—the Utopian politicized verse in Tocar el cielo [To Touch the Sky] and Vuelos de victoria (Flights of Victory), written while Cardenal was Minister of Culture in Sandinista Nicaragua. Due to its ambitious attempt to embrace the scientific knowledge of its time, Cántico cósmico has been compared to Dante’s Divine Comedy. Formally, the two poems have little in common: Cardenal’s amorphous, poorly-edited text shares none of the precision and refinement of Dante’s poem. It has been said, however, that Dante wrote the Divine Comedy in order to shore up his own threatened set of beliefs and to preserve a medieval sense of organization (e.g., the Ptolemaic system and a world divided into warring Guelphs and Ghibellines) that he already knew was being replaced by new scientific and political orders. Perhaps Cardenal is faced with a similar situation (in “Cantiga 42,” the poet says that the purpose of the Cántico is to console himself): the same year that Cántico cósmico was published, the Sandinistas lost the elections in Nicaragua and the old Cold War divisions of the world disappeared. With regard to the “science” in Cardenal’s poem (the poet states in Cantiga 34, “Obviously, I’m no scientist”), true astrophysicists have difficulty with Cardenal’s “extrapolations and confused concepts.” Despite the many moments of Cardenalian brilliance in the Cántico, it is perhaps more appropriate to compare Cardenal’s poem to Pound’s botched magnum opus, the Cantos.

STEVEN F. WHITE

Biography

Born in Granada, Nicaragua, 20 January 1915. Studied for Arts degree at Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM), Mexico City, 1943–47, followed by graduate studies at Columbia, 1947–49. Participated in the abortive “April Conspiracy” of 1954, to remove Anastasio (“Tacho”) Somoza from power. Underwent religious conversion and studied under Thomas Merton, then in charge of novices at the Trappist monastery of Gethsemani, Kentucky. On leaving Gethsemani in 1959 he travelled to Mexico and stayed at the Benedictine monastery in Cuernavaca, 1959–61. Completed his studies for the priesthood in Colombia and was ordained a priest, 1965. He then founded a Catholic base community, Nuestra Señora de Solentiname, on an island in the Great Lake of Nicaragua. Influenced by the theology of liberation, Cardenal gave his support to the Sandinista revolutionaries. The community at Solentiname was destroyed by Somoza’s troops as an act of revenge, 1977. With the triumph of the Nicaraguan Revolution in 1979, Cardenal became minister of Culture. After the defeat of the Sandinistas in the elections of 1990, Cardenal returned to a contemplative life and to writing. Awarded Christopher Book Prize, 1972, and Peace Prize by the German Publishers Association, 1980.

Selected Works

Poetry

Gethsemani, Ky, Mexico City: Ecuador, 1960

Mayapán, Managua: Ediciones de Librería Cardenal, 1968

Homenaje a los indios americanos, León: Universidad Autónoma de Nicaragua, 1969; as Homage to the American Indians, translated by Carlos and Monique Altschul, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973

Canto nacional, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1973

Oráculo sobre Managua, Buenos Aires: Lohlé, 1973

Nostalgia del futuro, Managua: Nueva Nicaragua, 1982,

Quetzalcóatl, Managua: Nueva Nicaragua, 1985
Los ovnis de oro (poemas indios), Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1988; as Los ovnis de oro/Golden UFOs; Poemas indios/The Indian Poems, translated by Carlos and Monique Altschul, edited with an introduction and glossary by Russell O. Salmon, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1992. [Impressive bilingual scholarly edition]

Telescopio en la noche oscura, Madrid: Trotta, 1993

Other Writings

En Cuba, Buenos Aires: Lohlé, 1972; as In Cuba, translated by Donald Walsh, New York: New Directions, 1974

Compilations and Anthologies

Antología de poesía primitiva, selected and translated by Ernesto Cardenal, Madrid: Alianza, 1979

Tocar el cielo: poesías, Managua: Editorial Nueva Nicaragua, 1983

Anthologies in Translation

Apocalypse and Other Poems, edited and translated by Robert Pring-Mill and Donald Walsh, New York: New Directions, 1977

Further Reading

Since the Sandinistas were defeated in the elections of 1990 there has been a perhaps inevitable decline of interest in Cardenal’s poetry. This is unfortunate since the many phases of his poetic production deserve more detailed attention.

Borgeson, Jr, Paul W., Hacia el hombre nuevo: poesía y pensamiento de Ernesto Cardenal, London: Támesis, 1984

Calabrese, Elisa (editor), Ernesto Cardenal: poeta de la liberación latinoamericana, Buenos Aires: García Cambeiro, 1975

Urdanivia Bertarelli, Eduardo, La poesía de Ernesto Cardenal: cristianismo y revolución, Lima: Latinoamericana Editores, 1984

Veiravé, Alfredo, Ernesto Cardenal: el exteriorismo; poesía del nuevo mundo, Chaco: Universidad Nacional del Nordeste, 1974
Cántico cósmico

Poem by Ernesto Cardenal

Cántico cósmico is a very ambitious work in which Cardenal expresses the grandeur of the universe through the history of different peoples, always in search of God beyond their own cosmologies. The Cántico has on occasion been compared to Dante’s Divina commedia (The Divine Comedy) and to De rerum natura (On the Nature of the Universe) by Lucretius. Without doubt this is because Cardenal’s work is an extensive compendium of forty-three Cantigas (originally, medieval poems set to music) in which the poet brings together in a harmonious way human, mythical, religious, philosophical, political and scientific subjects.

The originality of this “poetic song to the Cosmos” is based on how the author inserts and recreates the concepts, theories and models of contemporary physics and astrophysics so as to give weight and idealism to his literary creation. The framework for concepts borrowed from physics and astrophysics in relation to the author’s spiritual concerns, is as follows:

- The origin of the Universe: the Big Bang
- The future of the Universe and its significance for Man
- The Earth, its formation, Man
- Life in other possible worlds
- The basic laws of Physics: Mechanics, Thermodynamics, Electromagnetism, Nuclear and Quantum Physics.
- The great names of Physics
- A history of Physics

But what is most striking from our point of view is that profound knowledge and love of the Universe integrated into a whole, which emerges in the course of the Cantigas, creating a magical encounter between astrophysics and poetry.

Writers such as Reinaldo Arenas in his story “El reino de Alipio,” 1968 [Alipio’s Kingdom], Severo Sarduy in his poetic work Big Bang (1973) and Italo Calvino in Le cosmicomiche, 1965 (Cosmicomics) had already, in one way or another, used scientific knowledge about the heavens in their writings, although not in such an exhaustive way as Cardenal’s Cántico.

Already in the first Cantiga, “The Big Bang,” Cardenal writes:

> En el principio no había nada > ni espacio > ni tiempo.
> El universo entero concentrado > en el espacio del núcleo de un átomo, > y antes aún menos, mucho menos que un protón,
> y aún menos todavía, un infinitamente denso punto matemático.
> Y fue el Big Bang.
> La Gran Explosion.

[In the beginning there was nothing/neither space/nor time./The entire universe was concentrated/in the space of the nucleus of an atom./and before that even less, much less than a proton./and even less than that, an infinitely dense mathematical point./And the Big Bang came to pass./The Great Explosion]

Currently, the Big Bang is the most commonly accepted cosmological model used to explain the origin and formation of the Universe and, perhaps, its evolution. According to this model, the Universe arose out of an almost punctual configuration whose density tended towards the infinite, some ten or twenty million years ago. It came into being as the result of an explosion which occurred simultaneously everywhere. The whole of space filled up from the very beginning and every particle moved away at great speed from all the others. In effect, time and space came into being in that explosion, it being space itself that has expanded from the first moment.

In the hundredth part of a second the Universe was full of electrons, positons, neutrons and photons. The density of this primitive Cosmos may have been four hundred million times greater than that of water, and its temperature of the order of one hundred thousand million degrees kelvin.

Cardenal refers to this scientific knowledge, thus:

> Una centésima de segundo después > la temperatura era de 100.000 millones de grados centígrados > aún tan alta que no podía haber ni moléculas ni átomos ni núcleos de átomos, sólo partículas elementales:
electrones, positrones,
y neutrinos fantasmales sin carga eléctrica y sin masa.

[A split second later/the temperature was of 100.000 million centigrades/still so high that neither molecules nor atoms nor/the nuclei of atoms could exist, only elemental particles/electrons, positrons,/and phatomlike neutrins without electric charge and mass]

The Universe began to expand, to grow cooler, losing density and creating new particles in collisions. In succession, particles formed and were annihilated with a discharge of energy. After three hundred thousand years matter had cooled sufficiently for the electrons to unite with the nuclei, which had been generated. These formed atoms of hydrogen and helium; the photons escaped from the matter producing the cosmic microwave background which can be observed in microwaves. (These were first detected in 1964 and a small anisotropy COSMOSOMAS—has been confirmed by the satellite COBE and the Institute of Astrophysics of the Canary Islands). The gas that resulted from the effect of gravity started to form clusters which finally would condense to form galaxies and stars.

These ideas too are expressed in the Cántico cósmico:

y este gas por la gravedad se fue juntando, juntando más, y después apretándose más en forma de galaxias y estrellas del presente universo.

[and this gas owing to gravity began to come together, ever closer./pressing itself later into the form of galaxies and stars/of the present universe]

This model which we have outlined very briefly is vague in terms of the beginning itself, since the 1035 seconds. It has been supposed that in the first instants there was a phase of exponential expansion, known as inflation, but we are not going to develop this aspect because Cardenal barely refers to it. But there is an alternative theory which philosophically may seem fairly attractive, one that was put forward by Herman Bondi, Thomas Gold and Fred Hoyle: the Universe, at the time of its creation, was more or less the same as it is now. As it expands so new matter is created and this fills the empty spaces between the galaxies. The problem of the primitive Universe is eliminated since there was no such thing; instead it is infinite and eternal. At the present time other theories which attempt to explain the Universe are being developed; however, the evidence provided by the expansion of the Universe, the wealth of light elements and the fluctuations in the radiation of the cosmic background of microwaves incline contemporary scientists towards the theory of the Big Bang. Some of these facts are expressed in the Cántico cósmico with much beauty.

The future of the Universe is another subject of reflection for Cardenal. According to the present Big Bang model the Universe will continue to expand for a time. If the cosmic density of matter is less than the critical density (the minimum value required to stop its expansion completely), then the Universe’s extension will be infinite and it will continue to expand forever; if both densities are equal, the expansion will continue indefinitely, but ever more slowly, tending at the limit to have a zero acceleration of expansion. On the other hand, if the cosmic density is greater than the critical value, the Universe will be finite and its expansion will cease at some point, giving rise to an accelerated contraction that would take it to a state similar to that of its birth, although never the same. The development of this idea may lead to theorizing about a Universe of eternal returns, with successive cycles of expansions and contractions.

Cántico cósmico enquires into this enigma and provides an idealistic, perhaps possible answer:

¿Y si el universo entero tiende a ser un sólo ser universal?

¿Y la última etapa de la evolución el superorganismo universal?
Repitiéndose tras cada Big Bang este universo para ser mejor cada vez hasta llegar a ser el cosmos perfecto, presentes en él todos los tiempos pasados, recapitulados todos los seres.

[And if the entire universe inclines towards a sole universal being?/And the last phase of evolution/the universal superorganism?/With every Big Bang this universe repeats itself/to improve on itself each time/ until it achieves cosmic perfection,/all past times present in it/all beings recapitulated]

These lines harmonize poetry, philosophy and science. But astrophysics and poetry enter into an almost mystical communion when the relationship between ourselves and the stars is broached. The following lines give concrete expression to this harmony:

¿Qué hay en una estrella? Nosotros mismos.
Todos los elementos de nuestro cuerpo y del planeta estuvieron en las entrañas de una estrella.
Somos polvo de estrellas.
También somos hijos del sol (Cantiga 4)

[What is there in a star? Our own selves./All the elements of our body and of the planet/were in the womb of a star./We are stardust.../We are also children of the sun]

........

¡Engendrados por las estrellas! (Cantiga 8)

[engendered by the stars!]

The same ideas recur in other Cantigas with new images. Stars are formed by the gravitational compression of the dust and gas of the interstellar medium. As their lives progress, on the basis of hydrogen and helium, they generate different chemical elements through nuclear reactions of fusion. If the star is very massive it may die as a supernova, exploding and enriching the interstellar medium with the elements that it has created in the course of its life and in its spectacular death.

It is thought that the Sun came into being as a result of the death of some star, such as a supernova, when this interstellar space was compressed owing to the shock wave produced by the explosion. The Earth was formed with the Sun, and life and Man—evolved on the former. Furthermore, advances in spectroscopy have demonstrated that all the chemical elements to be found on Earth, on the Sun, in our bodies and the stars, in the Universe, that is, are the same. Therefore, to some extent it is true to say that we are children of the stars. In the Cántico cósmico Cardenal has made clear our intimate relationship with the Universe. This notion of a cosmic connection, or in diversity, is one that the Cuban thinker José Martí had already integrated into his philosophy, expressing in 1887 a view that is still relevant today:

El Universo es lo universo. Y lo universo, lo uni-vario, es lo vario en lo uno. La naturaleza “llena de sorpresas” es toda una. Lo que hace un puño de tierra, hace al hombre y hace al astro. Los elementos de una estrella enfriada están en un grano de trigo.

[The Universe is what is universal. And the latter, unity in variety, is variety in unity. Nature, “full of surprises” is a whole. What constitutes a fistful of earth, makes humankind and the stars. The elements of a dead star are within a grain of wheat.]

Through the Cántico cósmico Cardenal has given expression to our intimate relationship with the Universe. As he says in Cantiga 6:

Soy hijo de la Tierra y del Cielo estrellado
[I am the child of the Earth and the starry Sky]

MARÍA BEGOÑA DE LUIS
translated by Verity Smith

Editions

Further Reading
Bondi, Hermann, Cosmology, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1952
González Alvarez, Joaquín, Lo científico en la literatura, Cuba: Ediciones Holguín, 1991
Luis, María Begoña de, Introducción a la astrofísica, Madrid: Universidad Nacional de Educación a Distancia, 1993

Alejo Carpentier 1904–1980

Cuban prose writer, musicologist and cultural historian

Alejo Carpentier is rightly considered one of the most important Latin American writers of the 20th century. A man of immense erudition, with his production stretching to fifteen volumes, Carpentier was equally at ease writing on art, architecture or music as he was on literature, history, myth, the African contribution to Cuban culture or the ongoing cultural debate over the identity of Latin America. Carpentier’s musical background is ever-present in his works, not only in his countless journalistic articles and important work on the history of Cuban music, La música en Cuba, 1946 [Music in Cuba], but in his novels and short stories, many of which also take their form or titles from musical compositions: El acoso, 1956 (The Chase), Concierto barroco, 1974 (Baroque Concerto), La consagración de la primavera, 1978 [Rite of Spring]. Architecture features prominently in both the imagery he fashions in relation to Europe and America and, in addition, to his scrupulous attention to detail in descriptions of buildings. The visual arts play a vital role, particularly in El siglo de las luces, 1962. (Explosion in a Cathedral) whose English title is the name of the painting that acts as a recurring motif throughout the novel and whose epigraphs are taken from Goya’s series of etchings on the Napoleonic invasion of the Iberian peninsula, “Los desastres de la guerra” [The Disasters of War].

Carpentier has often been labelled one of the most European of Latin American writers. Born of French/Russian parents, he grew up well-versed in French and Russian culture (his mother wrote articles on Russian ballet in Cuban cultural magazines of the 1920s) and lived for long periods in France during his formative years. However, whilst his early writing originated from his involvement with the avant-garde and Surrealist movements, Carpentier’s major works, written after his return to Latin America, are characterised by a passionate interest in the New World. In these works, in common with other writers of the Boom period, Carpentier struggles to break through the strictures of the Eurocentric vision in order to find a language and novelistic form adequate to the task of defining the multifaceted reality of Latin America and bringing it within the field of vision of the European. Thus, whilst it is true that we find many echoes of European models, and in particular that of Marcel Proust in his works, his novels as a whole can be seen to reflect his quest to break free from European influences and find a suitable style with which to portray, or as he frequently terms it, to translate, the realities of the New World. In his later writings, and particularly El recurso del método, 1974 (Reasons of State), he reaches the stage of novelistic development and maturity where he is able to acknowledge openly the influence of his European precursors in his works themselves. In them he asserts in a ludic manner his own independence and that of other Latin American writers with the confidence of an author well aware of the status and influence that Latin American literature has come to enjoy in its own right.

Carpentier was to find his ideal form of expression in his now famous baroque style, with the use of a rich, innovative and at times highly technical vocabulary. His syntactic construction becomes as rich and ornamental as the landscapes and scenes he is describing as he piles up details one after the other, naming or listing every single thing, animate or inanimate, that makes up reality. This concept of naming is integral to Carpentier’s approach to communicating the reality of the New World. He considers that, because the conquerors imposed a dominant language and culture on the indigenous populations, the latter have been robbed of both their identity and their own means of expression. Thus there is a need to return to roots and then to begin again from scratch, re-appropriating, and then re-naming every single component that makes up the multi-faceted realities of the New World. Only when this has been accomplished will Latin America be able to assume her true identity and her independence be complete.

In this context Carpentier likens the difficulties of the novelist to those of Columbus and the early chroniclers, who found themselves imprisoned by the confines of their language and terms of reference when it came to describing new realities. The narrator of Los pasos perdidos (The Lost Steps), is beset by this problem when he seeks to record the phenomena he encounters in the Orinoco/Amazon basins. Similarly Esteban, symbolically employed as a translator in El siglo de las luces, finds that he needs to invent new words as he struggles to describe the unique realities of the fantastic world of the Caribbean, whilst in La consagración de la primavera Carpentier establishes the parallel between the protagonist Enrique and Hernán Cortés confronted with the completely new realities of Mexico. In his last novel, El arpa y la sombra (The Harp and the Shadow) Carpentier takes this theme still further, not only drawing parallels with the linguistic problems facing Columbus, but also questioning the veracity of historical records through blistering and irreverent use of parody, as the Pope agonises over whether or not Columbus should be canonised, whilst Carpentier’s Columbus, on his death bed, reflects on how many of his texts, and hence the accepted realities of the New World, were nothing more than “un Vasto Repertorio de Embustes” (a vast repertory of lies). By placing himself in the same situation as Columbus and the chroniclers, the first people to record the reality of the New World, Carpentier also effectively puts himself in a position to rewrite this same history and to re-name the reality of Latin America.

Carpentier is probably best known, however, for his concept of “lo real maravilloso” or “the marvellous in the real,” which he discusses in his essays and incorporates into his novels, showing how the New World is one in which reality is perceived on a whole new series of levels, contexts and perspectives defying the European imagination—a world in which what constitutes the “marvellous,” the “fantastic,” or the “magical” in Western eyes actually exists as part of everyday life. Here, Carpentier says, surrealism becomes superfluous—the author does not have to invent the fantastic in his writing, but rather to find a way of expressing the marvellous reality that is already there.

Carpentier introduces his concept of the marvellous real in the prologue of his second novel, El reino de este mundo, 1949 (The Kingdom of this World), set during Haiti’s wars of independence at the end of the 18th century, and seen through the eyes of a Negro slave, Ti Noel. Here, as he recounts the events surrounding the slave rebellions prior to the Bouckman massacre and seizure of power by Henri Christophe, Carpentier juxtaposes the European and Latin American cultural viewpoints—on the one hand the Cartesian and material reality of the French and, on the other, the magical, mainly oral culture of Latin America. Discussions of this and many other issues are found in Carpentier’s important collections of essays and lectures, Tientos y diferencias, 1964 [Gropings and Differences] and La novela latinoamericana en vísperas de un nuevo siglo y otros ensayos, 1981 [The Latin American Novel on the Eve of a New Century and Other Essays].

Closely related to the concept of the “marvellous in the real” is Carpentier’s revolutionary treatment of time, history and reality. In his novels he delights in sweeping aside conventional temporal barriers, substituting the traditional linear or diachronic notion of past, present and future with a synchronic vision in which time is depicted as fluid and malleable and different ages are seen as existing simultaneously on the same plane. Carpentier has described Latin America as, “el único continente donde distintas edades coexisten” (the only continent where different ages co-exist). This is the continent where a journey in space also represents one back in time through previous civilisations the further one penetrates the inaccessible interior, giving one, as the narrator of Los pasos perdidos discovers, “la estupefaciente posibilidad de viajar en el tiempo, como otros viajan en el espacio” (the amazing possibility of travelling in time just as others travel in space). The theme of time travel and links between different temporal and geographical planes are constants found throughout Carpentier’s works, one of the outstanding examples being his famous short story Viaje a la semilla, 1944 (Journey Back to the Source) which follows the life of Don Marcial from death to birth, as if a film were being run backwards.

In turn Carpentier projects a vision of the dynamic ongoing spiral of time onto his concept of war and revolution, seeing ideas and revolutionary ideals as being linked throughout the ages, as is illustrated in his short story “Semejante a la noche,” 1952 (Like the Night) where wars from different ages are all effortlessly juxtaposed onto the same time plane, or in El siglo de las luces and La consagración de la primavera, where Carpentier shows how the ideas brought over to the New World from the French and Bolshevik Revolutions have sown the seed for the ongoing revolutionary process culminating in the victory of Fidel Castro in 1959. In his later works Carpentier adopts an increasingly Marxist stance, voicing ever stronger support for the Cuban Revolution.
Some critics have questioned the motives of his overt praise for Castro in La consagración de la primavera, where some adulatory passages seem to indicate that a desire to win favour has blinded him to the very same need for critical distance when assessing political events which he so advocates in his novels. However, any adverse criticism which political controversy engendered in his later years did not undermine his stature as a writer, as is evidenced by the fact that he was awarded the prestigious Cervantes prize in 1978, two years before his death.

SALLY HARVEY

Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, 26 December 1904, the son of a Russian mother and a French father.
Parents highly educated and very musical. Studied architecture for one year (1922) at the University of Havana. Journalist, Havana, 1921–24, including column on classical music in the signing a manifesto against the dictator Gerardo Machado. Left for France where he earned his living as a journalist, contributing regularly to the Cuban magazines Carteles and Social.
Director of the Foniric Studios, Paris, 1936–39. Married Marguerite de Lessert, 1933; Eva Frejaville, 1939. Returned to Cuba, 1939. After divorce from second wife, married Lilia Esteban, 1941. Writer and producer, CMZ radio station, Havana, 1939–41; employed as musicologist by the Conservatorio Nacional, Havana, 1941–43; visited Haiti, 1943. Moved to Caracas in 1945 where he worked first in broadcasting and later in an advertising agency. Also wrote regular column on the arts for the newspaper El Nacional. After the Cuban Revolution, made director of the Cuban Publishing House, Havana, a post he held from 1963–67; cultural of several awards and honours of which the most important are the Miguel de Cervantes Prize,

Selected Works

Novels

¡Écue-yamba-Ó! Madrid: Editorial España, 1933

El reino de este mundo, Mexico City: Edición y Distribución Ibero Americana de Publicaciones, 1949; as The Kingdom of this World, translated by Harriet de Onís, New York: Knopf, 1957;
London: Gollancz, 1967

Los pasos perdidos, Mexico City: Edición y Distribución Ibero Americana de Publicaciones 1953; as The Lost Steps, translated by Harriet de Onís, New York: Knopf, and London: Gollancz, 1956

El acoso, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1956; as The Chase, translated by Alfred MacAdam, New York:
Farrar Straus and Giroux, 1989
Los convidados de plata, Montevideo: Sandino, 1972
El recurso del método, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1974; as Reasons of State, translated by Frances Partridge, New York: Knopf, and London: Gollancz, 1976
La consagración de la primavera, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1978
El arpa y la sombra, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1979; as The Harp and the Shadow, translated by Thomas and Carol Christensen, San Francisco: Mercury House, 1990

Short Fiction
Viaje a la semilla, Havana: Úcar García, 1944 [novella]
Guerra del tiempo: tres relatos y una novela: El Camino de Santiago, Viaje a la semilla, Semejante a la noche, y El acoso, Mexico City: Compañía General de Ediciones, 1958; as War on Time (includes The Highroad of Saint James, Right of Sanctuary, Journey Back to the Source, Like the Night, The Chosen), translated by Frances Partridge, New York: Knopf, and London: Gollancz, 1970
El derecho de asilo, Barcelona: Lumen, 1972
Cuentos, Havana: Editorial Arte y Literatura, 1976

Essays
La música en Cuba, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1946
Tientos y diferencias: ensayos, Mexico City: UNAM, 1964
Literatura y conciencia política en America Latina, Madrid: Corazón, 1969
La ciudad de las columnas, photographs by Paolo Gasparini, Barcelona: Lumen, 1970 [On the architecture of Havana]
Letra y solfá, edited by Alexis Márquez Rodríguez, Caracas: Síntesis Dosmil, 1975 [articles]
Crónicas, 2 vols, Havana: Editorial Arte y Literatura, 1976
Razón de ser, Caracas: Universidad Central de Venezuela, 1976 [lectures]
El adjetivo y sus arrugas, Buenos Aires: Galerna, 1980
La novela latinoamericana en vísperas de un nuevo siglo y otros ensayos, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1981

Compilations and Anthologies
Obras completas, 14 vols, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1983

Further Reading
Giacoman, Helmy F. (editor), Homenaje a Alejo Carpentier: variaciones interpretativas en torno a su obra, New York: Las Américas, 1970
Harvey, Sally, Carpentier’s Proustian Fiction: the Influence of Marcel Proust on Alejo Carpentier, London: Támesis, 1994
Müller-Bergh, Klaus, Alejo Carpentier. Estudio biográfico-crítico, New York: Las Américas, 1972
Rama, Angel, Los dictadores latinoamericanos, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1976
[On El recurso del método]
Shaw, Donald L., Alejo Carpentier, Boston: Twayne, 1985
Smith, Verity, Carpentier: los pasos perdidos, London: Grant and Cutler, 1983
Volek, Emil, Cuatro claves para la modernidad: análisis semiótico de textos hispánicos, Madrid: Gredos, 1984 [Chapter 3 is on Los pasos perdidos]

Bibliographies
García Cananza, Araceli, Bibliografía de Alejo Carpentier, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1984
Rubio, Patricia and Richard A. Young, Carpenter ante la critica: bibliografia comentada, Veracruz: Universidad Veracruzana, 1985

El reino de este mundo

Novel by Alejo Carpentier

El reino de este mundo, 1949 (The Kingdom of this World) is the introduction to and the opening of Carpentier’s grand cycle of “American novels,” closed only by El arpa y la sombra (The Harp and the Shadow), in 1979, shortly before his death. In the celebrated “Prologue” to El reino, Carpentier points out, among the characteristics of the Latin American continent, the persistence of the mythic worldview, in the Indian and Black communities; the power of magical belief; the historical abundance of extraordinary events; as well as “virgin landscapes;” and sums up these special qualities under lo real maravilloso (the marvellous in the real). In this vision, culture, history, and the poetic presence of nature, together, embody the Latin American difference from other regions of the world. All of Latin America is regarded as the land of lo real maravilloso.

At mid-point, in Tientos y diferencias, 1964 [Gropings and Differences], Carpentier reinterprets his project in terms of cultural “contexts,” retouches dutifully the social and political dimension of lo real maravilloso, and celebrates the baroque style as the only “natural” vehicle for the expression of such a reality. Yet his original “poetics” of the Latin American reality has been only superficially adapted to the new Marxist orthodoxy. Carpentier’s continued stress on cultural difference links him rather to such postmodern reassessments as those found in Antonio Benítez Rojo’s La isla que se repite: El Caribe y la perspectiva posmoderna, 1989 (The Repeating Island: the Caribbean and the Postmodern Perspective).

In the Prologue, Carpentier relates “the marvellous” to Surrealism, but goes to great pains to distance himself from this bogey of the Stalinist left (this might actually better explain the history of this text, expurgated in the 1950s and resurrected a decade later, only when its character of manifesto was fully recognized and Surrealism had become less offensive to the early fidelista Marxism). Carpentier argues that “the marvellous,” pursued only frivolously and superficially by the Surrealists, “is reality” in America. While his image of Surrealism, bordering on caricature, and the leap into “reality” are not completely convincing, and the touch of machismo would bristle today’s sensibilities, the invitation to explore those aspects of Latin American reality that escape the models and modes of Western Modernity, proved fruitful and prophetic. The clash between the Latin American preModernity and the modern forces of capitalism and imperialism will be at the heart of the aesthetics of “realismo mágico” (magical realism), from Arguedas’s Yawar fiesta (1941), right through to Arenas’s El mundo alucinante (Hallucinations) of 1969 and Vargas Llosa’s El hablador, 1987 (The Storyteller) among many others. In some cases there is not any documentable contact with Carpentier’s work.

Early criticism took Carpentier’s vision for fact. A closer look, however, reveals many problems and contradictions. Lo real maravilloso is not “reality” nor “Latin American reality” per se, but only one among many possible models (simulacra) of the reality (realities) in Latin America, and therefore it can advance only one among many possible yet all truly Latin American aesthetics. Although the emphasis of Carpentier’s argument links his “poetics of Latin American reality” rather obviously to the literary aesthetics of magical realism, there is enough of a margin of ambiguity to ensure that the concepts of lo real maravilloso, magical realism, and the fantastic will continue to be happily confused.

Another problem is that “the marvellous” can be recognized only in relation to some dominant norm of “the real;” this norm is, of course, furnished by the modern West. While it could be argued that one’s identity is indeed acquired “in the mirror,” it is also true that the mirror may be a trap, a family theater with prescribed roles. Is not “the marvellous in the real” then a kitsch for export? Are not all Latin Americans cast in the role of “indians,” for the pleasure of Western spectators? Is not the “marvellous reality,” connoting many times infrahuman conditions of life, “marvellous” only for the imaginary tourists, foreign or domestic? However, it should be noted that contemporary writers, such as the Argentine Juan José Saer, refuse to play along.

Yet there is also a positive aspect: in many works of magical realism, Western Modernity is, symbolically, defeated; the “indians” and the modern Westerners, and their values, are, though only aesthetically, presented as equal. Through lo real maravilloso and magical realism, Latin American preModernity appears to anticipate the Postmodern changes of values, coupled with the disintegration of Eurocentrism. The 1970s and 1980s have added another twist to the aesthetics and politics of lo real maravilloso: the growing nostalgic rereading of it as an Edenic, patriarchal past in contrast with the present of rapidly decaying urban landscape, exploding drug “culture,” endemic crises, brutal violence on left and right, and spreading ecological disaster.

El reino recreates historical events in Haiti in the period of the French Revolution. The novel is peopled by fictionalized historical characters and verges on an artistic collage and a palimpsest of memoirs, travel books, and historical documents of that period. The narrative is divided into four parts, each relatively autonomous in regard to their elements: the first goes back to the 1750s (the terrorist voodoo campaign of the mandinga Mackandal against the white colonists); the second shifts to the French Revolution (the 1791 rebellion of the black slaves led by Bouckman; the bittersweet exile of the plantocracy in Santiago de Cuba; Paulina Bonaparte in Haiti, and the failed French imperial attempt to shore up the colonial regime on the island in 1802); the third focuses on the year 1820 (the downfall of the ruthless black king Henri Christophe, who could be, however, the prototype of the modern, “progressive” dictator); and the fourth goes to the second half of the 1820s (Henri Christophe’s family, exiled in Rome, and Paulina Bonaparte’s statue; the rise of the mulattoes in Haiti, the new rulers and oppressors of the blacks; Ti Noel’s illumination and metamorphosis through voodoo).

What the novel lacks in dramatic center, it gains in epic dimension. The apparent lineal and chronological sequence of the loose episodes is crisscrossed by overlapping compositional grids. The story-line makes an explicit parallel between two cycles of violence and oppression: the colonial ancien regime and the first bitter fruit of Independence (Henri Christophe). Towards the end of the novel, a third cycle opens up, that of the “Republican Mulattoes.” The book closes with the promise of yet another rebellion of the oppressed. While Mackandal and Bouckman are historical figures, the character of Ti Noel was created by Carpentier just from a name on some historical document (Christmas symbolism and prophecy are readily apparent in the name). Ti Noel becomes the unifying thread for the great part of the novel. First, he is an observer and a marginal participant, a follower of Mackandal; towards the end, he becomes the protagonist tying the loose ends. Parts two and four of the novel highlight the “dialogue” between the European and the American worlds; but this clash of values is underscored throughout the whole text, many times ironically, by the epigraphs and by the allegorical titles of many chapters.

Carpentier creates a new, artistic order by imposing a rigorous pattern of symmetries, counterpoints, and cycles on the flow of history. The omnipresence of voodoo, the selection and arrangement of historical events, the creative fiction that fills in the gaps, and the parody of European high culture and ideals, together, produce lo real maravilloso; the repeated conflict between the gamut of oppressors and those who remain oppressed, its “realism;” and the failure of the French Revolution and of the “enlightened” despot, its frustrated Modernity. In the magical realism of Carpentier’s novel, voodoo fuels the search for Modernity which, inexorably, represses it.

The author himself, unwittingly disavowing the “Prologue,” opts unequivocally for Modernity. In El reino, beneath the surface of the “marvellous” history hides an allegoric modern pattern of macrohistory, endowed with all its alleged teleology and promise of the future Utopia. This latent message comes to the fore at the celebrated ending of the novel, through the profession of faith in The Kingdom of this World. Yet all this promise rests here on the powers of voodoo. An irony? A postmodern insight?

EMIL VOLEK

Editions

First edition: El reino de este mundo, Mexico City: Edición y Distribución Iberoamericana de Publicaciones, 1949
Translation: The Kingdom of this World, by Harriet de Onís, New York: Knopf, 1957; London: Gollancz, 1967 [There are later editions of this uneven translation]
Further Reading

For an excellent introduction, start with Shaw and Young.
——“Alejo Carpentier y el surrealismo,” Revista de la Universidad de Mexico vol. 37/5 (1981) Volek, Emil, “Realismo mágico entre la modernidad y la postmodernidad,” INTI 31 (1990); different version in his Literatura hispanoamericana entre la modernidad y la postmodernidad, Cuadernos de Trabajo 9, Bogotá: Facultad de Ciencias Humanas, Universidad Nacional de Colombia, 1994

---

El siglo de las luces

Novel by Alejo Carpentier

It was not possible for John Sturrock, responsible for the English version of this novel, to provide a literal translation of its title since it would have sounded totally pedestrian and flat. However, he captures the spirit of the work by availing himself of another title, that of a key painting in El siglo de las luces. The title of the book in the original Spanish, the “Age of Enlightenment,” carries a heavy ironic charge, while the painting, “Explosion in a Cathedral,” encapsulates an apparent paradox by depicting a grandiose church captured in the very instant of its collapse. Throughout his work Carpentier uses European artistic expressions to convey the fact that Latin America from the time of the Conquest has been mediated by Europe’s gaze.

Carpentier’s most ambitious novel, El siglo has a considerable canvas which covers the Caribbean basin and western Europe. It tells, in a heavily allegorical way (Carpentier detested realism in both literature and the visual arts), of Latin America’s entry into the Age of Independence and Modernity. It begins with three adolescents who are closely related and members of the creole merchant class. They are Carlos and Sofía, who are brother and sister, and their asthmatic cousin, Esteban. When the father of the first two dies unexpectedly, the three young people are able to turn their lives upside down. They break all the rules of both decorum and common sense by living at night and sleeping by day; ordering from Paris crates of scientific equipment which, then, they either do not unpack or put to ludic uses. What matters, though, and Carpentier does not believe in applying a light touch, is that here are three young people, intoxicated with the thought of the Encyclopédistes (who nourished the ideas of the French revolutionaries) and who are living in the dark on the eve of the French Revolution. Carpentier offers his readers a Bildungsroman in which Esteban and Sofía grow up by learning what the praxis of the Revolution signifies, particularly when its impact is felt in the New World. These two characters respond to the hard truths of experience in radically different ways: Esteban, sceptical and disgusted, returns to Havana, which had been his point of departure. He vows that he will never again participate in any revolutionary struggle because “No hay más Tierra Prometida que la que el hombre puede encontrar en si mismo” (The only promised land is that which man may find within himself). Sofía’s response is very different in that once she has realized that her lover, Victor Hugues, is a man of straw, she emancipates herself and instead of going back home she proceeds to Madrid. There she is joined by Esteban, whereupon the two of them disappear forever in the course of the uprising against the Napoleonic forces on 2 May 1808. Carlos, Sofía’s older brother, travels from Havana to Madrid and tries to piece together the last moments of the two who perished. Sofía, it seems, grabbed a rusty old lance attached to a wall and declared, as she dragged her cousin along behind her: “¡Hay que hacer algo!” (We must do something!). This expression is one of several that are repeated in the novel. This particular one serves to illustrate how Sofía develops from a young girl, who can think only in terms of looking after or supporting “her man,” into a mature human being able to accept her responsibilities as a member of a wider community, to the point that she is able to give her life to assist in freeing a people from tyranny. (This notion of individual sacrifice for others is to occupy centre stage in a later and more politicized novel by Carpentier, La consagración de la primavera [The Rite of Spring]).

El siglo de las luces reveals the gap between revolutionary theory and practice. Thus slavery is abolished in the early, heady years of the revolutionary process, only to be reintroduced some years later when Napoleon comes to power. But Carpentier makes a point of indicating that some Blacks escape reinslavement and create palenques, jungle or bush communities which, in certain cases, lasted for decades. Another point that the author makes here as elsewhere in his writings, concerns what he terms “desajuste cronológico,” that is, a time lapse between the exposition of ideas in Europe and their arrival and application in the New World. Thus Victor Hugues orders the destruction of a church in a Caribbean town he is besieging only to discover too late that France is no longer an atheistic state, accepting instead the cult of the Supreme Being. What concerned Carpentier was what he perceived as his continent’s cultural dependence on Europe and how aping European fashions (King Henri Christophe in El reino de este mundo illustrates this point) does not allow people to develop their own authentic regional being. Julio Ortega has looked at the protagonists in relation to history and concludes that they can only participate in it when they are estranged from it, that is outside their marginal, colonial world. Their estrangement is registered in the repeated use of images from the theatre and the metaphor of spectacle. However, it should be noted that the character most closely connected with theatrical imagery is a Frenchman, Victor Hugues, who struts about giving an imitation of Robespierre, the political role model he cannot outgrow.

Another target for criticism is the emphasis placed by the French revolutionaries on rationalism and the abstract representation of the divine. For Carpentier the cultivation of the life of the spirit was essential to the wellbeing of humankind. As he puts it succinctly in the novel: “El Ser Supremo era un dios sin historia” (The Supreme Being was a god without history), making it clear that religion is an essential aspect of culture and that to seek to deprive people of it is a form of mutilation. Hence the emphasis placed throughout on the guillotine whose blade severs heads, that is, it does away with tradition and also has to be kept sheathed so as to avoid its slow corrosion by the action of nature, or, revolutionary praxis as opposed to theory. The same point is made in the magnificent central chapter (XXIV) through a reference to a piece of glass whose cutting edge has been softened in the course of its long, aimless journey across the Atlantic. Tradition must not be destroyed; some elements of continuity are essential, and the steady rhythms of life survive the turbulence of revolutionary attempts at radical change. Thus when the former slaves burn down the town of Cap Haitien, the disaster is depicted in the background, as though in soft focus. In sharp focus, in the forefront of the image, is a fisherman who mends his nets.

Like other historical novels by Carpentier, El siglo is set in a very specific time and place. Yet no dates are given save, with great irony, some from the French revolutionary calendar, and the reason for this is that history is seen in terms of a spiral. There are no exact repetitions; instead a series of similar man-made “acontecimientos” or great events. Thus the Caribbean is represented as the site of a series of invasions: the Caribs travel north into the Caribbean but disaster befalls them when they encounter new arrivals in the region, for the Spanish conquerors have arrived. When Victor Hugues leaves La Rochelle at the head of an expeditionary force to the Caribbean, the author makes a comparison with the first voyage of Columbus. The possibility of human beings attaining perfection, expressed through the upward and expanding movement of the helix, figures significantly in the central chapter, XXIV, when Esteban, in a brief ecstatic interlude outside historical time, contemplates a conch shell and exclaims “Te déum” (Praise God).

VERITY SMITH

See also entry on Magical Realism

Editions

Critical edition: The closest to one is that published in 1979 by Ayacucho, Caracas. It has a prologue by Carlos Fuentes, and a chronology and bibliographies by Araceli García Carranza.

Further Reading

Souza, Raymond D., La historia en la novela hispanoamericana moderna, Bogota: Tercer Mundo, 1988 [Chapter I is on this novel]
Tomás Carrasquilla 1858–1940

Colombian prose writer

Before the 1960s, when Gabriel García Márquez captured the world’s attention, Tomás Carrasquilla was Colombia’s bestknown and most popular writer and for many years Colombian narrative was identified with his name. Although Carrasquilla’s narratives were, in the main, written and published in the first decades of the 20th century, his aesthetics is firmly based on literary ideology of the preceding century. Carrasquilla writes in the tradition of 19th-century Realism (realismo) and, more specifically, within two common manifestations of that school: first, regionalism (regionalismo)—the works are set in a specific locale, in the case of Carrasquilla, in Antioquia, his native province, and second, costumbrismo which focuses on the daily life of the people and attempts to reproduce in detail their costumes, tradition and speech in a language that is picturesque and often idiosyncratic to the region. Carrasquilla was hailed early in the century as the “best regionalist writer in America” by the Spanish critic Julio Cejador y Frauca because the Spanish believed that Carrasquilla’s work both synthesized and developed the aesthetic concerns of the Realist tradition. In his production—as in that of many other regionalist and costumbrist writers—the evils of the city is a recurring theme.

Frutos de mi tierra, 1896 [Fruits of My Native Land] was his first novel and it received immediate acclaim. Its criticism of the hypocrisy of life in a small town appealed to a wide readership. In this, as in subsequent works, Carrasquilla uses a simple plot peopled with colorful characters. The novel attracts as much for its imitation of the colorful and peculiar language of the characters as for its intrigue. Carrasquilla developed this regionalism in a significant number of short stories and novels. Among the latter, El Padre Casafús, 1914 [Father Casafús] is of particular interest. Carrasquilla believed that his novella Salve, Regina, 1903 [Hail, Regina]—allegedly written in one week, and published in a volume with other stories—was his best work. The critics, however, point to La Marquesa de Yolombó, 1928 [The Marchioness of Yolombó] as his masterpiece. The action of the novel takes place at the end of the 18th century and is an anatomy of colonial society set against a stark background of life dominated by a mining economy. Carrasquilla depicts this world in an ambivalent light -it generated jobs and wealth, but it was centered and sustained by the power of a corrupt nobility in league with an unscrupulous Catholic Church. The wealth it brought was paid for by a social system characterized by gross inequality and racial prejudice, with a parasitic class of nobles backed by a church that often encouraged blatant superstition rather than forgo its institutional wealth and power.

In his last novel, the trilogy Hace tiempos, 1935–36 [Long Ago] Carrasquilla examines the transformation of Colombian society in the 19th century from one of mining to one of agriculture and commerce. Bound to this process are religious beliefs both Christian and pagan. Religious syncretism is the abstract representation of the racial miscegenation that occurred in colonial times; it is also an enduring leitmotif in Carrasquilla’s work. It is to be found in his first published work, “Simon el mago,” 1896 [Simon the Magus] as well as in his best-known short story, “En la diestra de Dios padre,” 1897 [In the Right Hand of God the Father].
Carrasquilla ferociously opposed Spanish American Modernismo—the literary movement most in vogue in Latin America at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th centuries. The modernista school, very strong in Bogotá, returned the favor. The modernists’ concern with the purity of language made Carrasquilla’s rich patois—the willy-nilly juxtaposition of localisms, vernacular Spanish, colloquialisms, anachronisms and classic Castilian—anathema to the new generation of writers. It also made his work extremely difficult to translate, and is in part the explanation for the paucity of translations of his works.

Carrasquilla is a crucial figure in the production of a national culture in Colombia. His is the creation of a local literature rather than an imitation of foreign, mostly Spanish models. Other writers were to follow his lead. Carrasquilla’s work signals the waning of Romanticism in Colombian narrative and it helped establish narrative patterns that would dominate Colombian fiction for decades to come.

Taken altogether, Carrasquilla’s literary production is quite varied, consisting of novellas, novels, short stories and cuadros de costumbres (brief works that use a “slice of life” to reveal a particular aspect of regional culture). Carrasquilla’s work is diverse, but is not of uniform high quality. His output is at times overdrawn and now quite redundant. None the less, it contains much to recommend it and can be of inestimable value to students of Colombian literature and culture.

GILBERTO GÓMEZ OCAMPO

Biography

Born in Santo Domingo, Antioquia, Colombia, 1858, into a middleclass family. Led a largely uneventful life. Enrolled as student of law at Antioquia University in 1876, but studies were interrupted by the outbreak of civil war. Worked at a variety of jobs including as a tailor, a teacher and as a secretary to a judge. Seldom travelled outside Antioquia and remained a bachelor all his life. Lived in Bogotá for two periods (1895 and 1914–19). In 1928, suffered a fall which left him wheelchair bound. By 1934 he was completely blind, and dictated his most famous work, Hace tiempos. Awarded the Cruz de Boyacá, Colombia’s highest honour, in 1935; Vergara Prize for literature and science, 1937. In 1940, his leg was amputated due to gangrene and this led to his death in the capital of Antioquia, Medellín, in 1910.

Selected Works

Novels

Frutos de mi tierra, Bogotá: Minerva, 1896

Grandezas, Medellín, Colombia: Oficial, 1910

El Padre Casafús, Medellín, Colombia: Oficial, 1914

Entrañas de niño, Medellín, Colombia: Librería de Carlos E. Rodríguez, 1914

El Zarco, Bogotá: Minerva, 1925

Ligia Cruz; Rogelio, Bogotá: Ediciones Colombia, 1926

La Marquesa de Yolombó, Medellín, Colombia: Librería de A.J. Cano, 1928

Short Fiction
Critical Editions
Frutos de mi tierra, edited by Seymour Menton, Bogota: Instituto Caro y Cuervo, 1972
La Marquesa de Yolombó, edited by Kurt L. Levy, Bogota: Instituto Caro y Cuervo, 1974

Compilations and Anthologies
Obras completas, with an introduction by Federico de Onís, Madrid: Espasa Calpe, 1952
Cuentos de Tomás Carrasquilla, Medellín, Colombia: Bedout, 1956

Further Reading
Levy, Kurt L., Vida y obras de Tomás Carrasquilla, Medellín Colombia: Bedout, 1958
——Tomás Carrasquilla, Boston: Twayne, 1980
Maya, Rafael, Los orígenes del modernismo en Colombia, Bogotá: Nacional, 1961
Mejía Duque, Jaime, Tomás Carrasquilla, Bogotá: Procultura, 1990
Rodríguez, R. and Angela Rocío, Las novelas de Don Tomás Carrasquilla, Medellín, Colombia: Auto res Antiqueños, 1988
Sylvester, Nigel, The Homilies and “Dominicales” of Tomás Carrasquilla, Liverpool: Centre for Latin American Studies, University of Liverpool, 1971

Jorge Carrera Andrade 1903–1976

Ecuadorian poet and prose writer
At the heart of Jorge Carrera Andrade’s work there is a preoccupation with certain themes: travel, movement, exile, the relationship between human beings and nature. As he himself acknowledged, “el viaje se hizo la razón misma de mi vida” [travelling became the very reason for my life]. Travel in this context takes a more profound meaning than that of simply visiting places, suggesting instead a metaphor for life itself. Exile, equally, has to be understood in a metaphysical rather than a strictly political sense. This is not to say that Carrera Andrade was uninterested in politics. On the contrary, in his early years he became actively involved in the political events in his native Ecuador as the Socialist Party’s General Secretary and was even imprisoned as a result of his activities. His commitment to politics was reflected in his early work. He wrote revolutionary poetry and edited an opposition newspaper. Like many other Ecuadorian poets of his generation, Carrera Andrade saw Modernismo, which arrived late in Ecuador, as an instrument for the renovation of literary language, as well as a vehicle for the expression of their general sense of dissatisfaction and rebellion. He was, nevertheless, disappointed at the lack of social and political concern expressed in modernista writings.
Although an eminent a poet, Carrera Andrade produced a number of works in prose where he dealt with contemporary problems that interested him. Chiefly among his prose works is his history of Ecuador, El camino del sol [The Path of the Sun], where he takes a somewhat idealistic view of his country’s past. He wrote also accounts of his travels and various volumes of literary history and criticism.

Despite tackling social and political issues, as in his indianist “Cuaderno de poemas indios” [Dossier of Indian Poems], Carrera Andrade cultivated what is essentially a lyrical approach to poetic creation. In his poems he pays close attention to every minute detail as if offering a microscopic view of objects. His poetry, in fact, is characterized by an acute observation of nature. The latter, for Carrera Andrade, is full of signs and portents, as in his poem “Presagios” [Presages]. He sees the objects of nature arranged in meaningful patterns which have to be decoded and understood. The object, hence, becomes an icon, a three-dimensional symbol capable of conveying a message. For Carrera Andrade things are alive and will speak to us if only we listen to them.

This seems to point towards a pantheistic stance on the part of the poet. Instead of seeing nature as the ultimate deity, however, Carrera Andrade’s poetry seems to imply that divinity can be found in every object and creature. This is evident in his poem “Cada objeto es un mundo” [Each Object is a World] which brings him close to animism. In poems like “Version de la tierra” [Earth’s Version] or “Taller del tiempo” [Workshop of Time] he seems to support the idea of the existence of secret currents uniting all creatures and objects of nature with human beings. Indeed, he perceives the role of the poet as that of an interpreter of the silent voices of objects, engaging in conversations with them and deciphering their messages for the benefit of others: “interpretar las apariencias del mundo y decifrar el lenguaje de las cosas para darles a entender a los otros hombres, contribuyendo de esa manera a que la vida humana sea digna de vivirse” (to interpret the world’s appearances and to decipher the language of things in order to make them understood by other people, and in that way contribute to make human life worth living).

In his poetry Carrera Andrade has managed to reconcile the above aspects with his social concerns through his deep sense of solidarity with all human beings, as evidenced above all in “Hombre planetario” [Planetary Man], where he aspires to be the embodiment of all humankind. This seems to contrast somehow with the more introspective aspects of his work, like his sense of solitude, his aversion to modern civilization, and his metaphysical considerations.

As the title of his poem “Apetito de realidad” [Hunger for Reality] reveals, Carrera Andrade, far from advocating fantasy or a subjective view of the universe, yearns for an ever closer relationship with the physical world inhabited by human beings. This, he implies, can only be achieved through the accurate study of reality. As he confesses in “El objeto y su sombra,” reality, for him, has a stronger fascination than dreams or abstractions.

WILLIAM SPINDLER LI

Biography

Born in Quito, capital of Ecuador, 18 September 1903. Attended Catholic schools until 1916 and then transferred to a lay-school, the Instituto Nacional Mejía. Began study of law at University of Quito in 1921, abandoned his studies in 1923. Employed by Ministry of Education, 1924.

Selected Works

Poetry
El estanque inefable, Quito: Universidad Centro, 1922,
La guirnalda del silencio, Quito: Imprenta Nacional, 1926
Boletines de mar y tierra, Barcelona: Cervantes, 1930
Biografías para uso de los pájaros, Paris: Cuadernos del Hombre Nuevo, 1937
La hora de las ventanas iluminadas, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1937
Microgramas, Tokyo: Asia-America, 1940
País secreto, Tokyo: Talleres Bunsh-Sha, 1940
Canto al puente de Oakland/To the Bay Bridge, translated by Eleanor L. Turnbull, Stanford, California: Stanford University Press, 1941 [bilingual edition]
Lugar de origen, Caracas: Ediciones al Servicio de la Cultura, 1945
Canto a las fortalezas volantes: cuaderno del paracaidista, Caracas: Destino, 1945
El visitante de niebla y otros poemas, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1947; as The Visitor of Mist, translated by G.R. Coultard, London: Williams and Norgate, 1950
Aquí yace la espuma, Paris: Editorial Presencias Americanas, 1950
Familia de la noche, Paris: Librería Española de Ediciones, 1953
Moneda del forastero: Monnaie de l’étranger, translated by Jean Mazoyer, Dijon, France: Chambelland, 1958
Hombre planetario, Bogota: Mito, 1959
Floresta de los guacamayos, Managua: Nicaragüense, 1964
Crónica de las Indias, Paris: Centre de Recherches de l’Institut d’Études Hispaniques, 1965
Poesía última, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1968
Libro del destierro, Dakar, Senegal: University of Dakar, 1970 [bilingual edition]
Vacación terrena, in the collection Árbol de fuego 51, Caracas (1972)

Other Writings
Cartas de un emigrado, Quito: Elan, 1933
Latitudes (hombres, viajes, lecturas), Quito: America, 1934
Guía de la joven poesía ecuatoriana, Tokyo: Ediciones Asia-América, 1939
Mirador terrestre, New York: Las Américas, 1943
Rostros y climas: crónicas de viajes, hombres y sucesos de nuestro tiempo, Paris: Ediciones de la Maison de l’Amériqu e Latin 1948
Poesía francesa contemporánea, Quito: Casa de la Cultura, 1951
La tierra siempre verde, Paris: Ediciones Internacionales, 1955
El camino del sol, Quito: Casa de Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1958
Galería de místicos y de insurgentes: la vida intelectual del Ecuador, 1555–1955, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1959
Viaje por países y libros, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1961
El fabuloso reino de Quito, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1963
Presencia a d el Ecuador en Venezuela, Quito: Coló, 1963
Interpretación de Rubén Dario, Managua: Cuadernos Daria 1964
Radiografía de la cultura ecuatoriana, Managua: Ministerio de Educación Pública, 1964
Retrato cultural del Ecuador, Paris: Institut d’Études Hispaniques de l’Université de Paris, 1965
Interpretaciones hispanoamericanas, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1967
Las relaciones culturales entre el Ecuador y Francia, Quito: Edición del Ministerio de Educación Pública, 1967
El volcán y el colibrí, Puebla, Mexico: José M.Cajica, Jr, 1970 [autobiography]

Compilations and Anthologies
Rol de la manzana (1926–1929), Madrid: Espasa Calpe, 1935
Registro del mundo: antología poética, 1922–1939, Quito: Grupo “America,” 1940
Poesías escogidas, Caracas: Suma, 1945
Edades poéticas (1922–1956), Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1958
Los primeros poemas de Jorge Carrera Andrade, Lírica Hispana, Caracas, vol. 20/234 (1962)
Mi vida en poemas, Caracas: Casa del Escritor, 1962.
Antología poética, Milan: La Goliardica, 1963
Obra poética completa, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1976

Further Reading
Carrera Andrade, a significant poet, man of letters and public figure, does not enjoy critical favour at the present time, something that is reflected in the publication dates of the works cited below. A critical re-evaluation and theoretical readings are required.
Cuadra, José de la, “Jorge Carrera Andrade,” in Doce siluetas, Obras completas, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1958
Liscano, Juan, “Americanos en Europa: país y poesía de Jorge Carrera Andrade,” Cuadernos Americanos, Mexico, vol. 15
Ojeda, Enrique, Jorge Carrera Andrade: introducción al estudio de su vida y de su obra, New York: Eliseo Torres and Sons, 1971
Reyes, Alfonso, et al., Jorge Carrera Andrade y la crítica, Madrid: Espasa Calpe, 1935 [Extracts from newspaper reviews, etc.]
Straub, William J., “Cosmovisión de Jorge Carrera Andrade,” Cuadernos Americanos, Mexico City, 181 (1972)
Cada objeto es un mundo

Poem by Jorge Carrera Andrade
Given below is the complete text of this poem from the section “Taller del tiempo,” 1958 [Workshop of Time] in the volume Hombre planetario (1959):

“Cada objeto es un mundo”

Arte poético
Comprende, comprende, comprende:
en cada cosa guíña un duende
o una ala invisible se tiende.

Apresa en tus dedos la brisa que pasa fugaz, indecisa,
No veas el mundo de prisa.
No aprendas efímera ciencia, que es flor de la humana demencia.
La vida no es sólo apariencia.

Las aves—lección del instante—os dan en su escuela volante la clave de un mundo cambiante.
La rosa es crisol de alegría.
Te ofrece tesoros el día.
Gotea el reloj ambrosía.

Comprende y venera al objeto:
Penetra en ese orbe secreto
y sea la flor tu amuleto.

[Know, know, know:/an invisible wing spreads out/or a sprite winks from every thing./Grasp the fleeting, undecided breeze in your fingers/Pause to drink in the world./Do not learn ephemeral science./for it is a flower of human insanity./Life is more than appearances./Birds—lesson of the instant—/give us in their flying school/the key to an ever-changing world./The rose is a crucible of happiness./The day offers you treasures./ The clock drips ambrosia. // Grasp and venerate the object:/enter that secret orb/and may the flower be your amulet.]
“Cada objeto es un mundo” is one of the poems by Jorge Carrera Andrade that best express his ideas on the nature of poetry and its relationship to the world of objects. This relates to the poet’s view of Nature as a living force present in every object and creature, and to his belief in the possibility of finding and restoring the secret correspondences which bind human beings to this force. In order to achieve this feat, the poet must first learn to decipher the language of objects.

The importance that Carrera Andrade attaches to this poem, as his personal interpretation of poetic art, is evidenced in the insistence with which the first line repeats the word “understand,” no less than three times. Carrera Andrade’s ideas, as illustrated in this poem, bring him very close to animism, a belief in the presence of the sacred in all things. This is made explicit in the second line which refers to the vital force which, according to the Ecuadorian poet, enlivens all things: a “duende,” a kind of forest spirit which hides mischievously behind apparently inanimate things from where it winks at us. The notion of a hidden dimension to all objects is continued in the next line which seems to allude to the existence of angels, with the idea of “una ala invisible” (an invisible wing).

In the next verses Carrera Andrade reaffirms his belief in the possibility of capturing and recording life’s transitory experiences, making, as it were, time stand still, through a detailed observation of the world. Such an observation, he suggests, will reveal the true essence of things. He appears to consider the knowledge arrived at through this method as superior to that achieved by “efímera ciencia” (ephemeral science), which he considers a “flor de la humana demencia” (a flowering of human madness) which cannot penetrate beyond the mere appearance of things. In the poem, in fact, he warns against a hasty view of the world: “No veas el mundo de prisa.” In a constantly changing universe the only transcendental values are those of Nature itself. This is Nature’s lesson delivered in line ten of the poem by the flying birds.

More than a subjective interpretation of the world, the poet seems to be prescribing a search for an intense objectivity based in the appraisal of the intrinsic qualities of objects, in their presence and materiality. Hence the need to penetrate into an “orbe secreto” [secret world] within reality. There, he reassures us, lies the path to the treasures hidden in everyday things like a rose, a recurrent motif in his poetry, a clock, or the day itself. Ultimately, Carrera Andrade’s position could be termed idolatrous, in the strictest sense of the word, for his belief in the need to understand Nature’s messages as encoded in the iconic language of objects leads him to consider the latter as worthy, not only of comprehension, but of veneration. The final line accentuates the magical, and at the same time lyrical, component of his poetic vision: “sea la flor tu amuleto” (let the flower be your amulet). This poem, like many others by the Ecuadorian poet, seems to bring Jorge Carrera Andrade close to the aesthetic project espoused by some magical realist novelists whose narratives, like Carrera Andrade’s poems, emphasize the magical aspects of everyday reality.

WILLIAM SPINDLER LI
Poem transliterated by Verity Smith
Miguel de Carrión 1875–1929

Cuban prose writer and physician

The literary work of Miguel de Carrión belongs to the current of the Naturalist and psychological novel of the first Republican generation. In his thesis novels Carrión tries to show, with a didactic purpose, the evils Cuba faces and which threaten the future of the country. He shares with authors of his generation an acute preoccupation with the problems confronting the newly-formed Republic, finally freed from Spanish colonialism. Among the most important characteristics of his work is the successful psychological development of his female characters, whose creation must have been helped by his experience as a doctor and teacher. As in the Realist novels of Benito Pérez Galdós, in those of the Cuban writer the life of the characters is interwoven with the historical, political and social background of the country, making them a rich source of information on the period.

The recurrent theme in the fiction of Carrión is the love between man and woman; a theme which enables him to bring into the open the prejudices and taboos, the double standards and hypocrisy of the period. Like other writers of his generation, he advocates a liberal education for women and rejects the repressions of a sexual nature which religion imposes on the life of the time. Influenced by the trends of French Naturalism, which emphasizes the fulfilment of physical love for the happiness of the individual, and by his own work as a doctor, he realizes the need for a new type of education which would create men and women free from prejudices, and able to develop mentally and physically in a healthy and harmonious way. His great urge was that Cubans should open their minds to new ways of thinking and truly emancipate themselves from the backwardness and narrow-mindedness of centuries of colonial rule. From this point of view his novels carry great didactic weight.

His first novel, El milagro, 1903 [The Miracle] is structured on the polarity of religious-secular life, cloister-country, heaven-earth, and shows the author’s concern for the freedom of choice of the individual. The action is set in the country as though to establish more clearly the strength of the dictates of nature which, after a long inner struggle, finally lead the hero to choose a love which is healthy, normal and procreative. In this work, however, the deep social concern of his later novels is not evident.

After years of hard work, dedicated at first to education and later to medicine, in 1917 Carrión published Las honradas [Respectable Women], which was a commercial success. The central theme of this novel is the sexual repression of a young married woman who, though educated to hypocritical moral standards, is capable of realizing the social injustices affecting women. All the characters are so well developed psychologically that it is possible to be aware of the psychological background of the period, as also of the social context. Las honradas was considered a pornographic novel by those who supported that same intransigent and narrow-minded moral code which Carrión criticizes and attempts to unmask.

Two years later he offset Las honradas with Las impuras [Fallen Women]. The characters in both novels are interwoven in such a way as to represent a kind of socio-historical saga of Cuban society. They show that morality has nothing to do with the body, whether it be naked or clothed, but rather with a human being’s capacity for honesty and understanding. A succession of characters, particularly female ones—who suffer the oppression of an atmosphere and inheritance within the family and socially which conditions them to a life of servility—parade across the pages of both novels. Showing steadfastness and daring in his day, and in order to instruct, in his novels Carrión unveils the intimate life of Cuban society and lays bare the canons of a morality which only produces unhappy homes and frustrated lives. Today his work could undoubtedly be placed within the present feminist trend. Several of his courageous and rebellious female characters fit the definition perfectly.

It is worth mentioning that between the first and last of Miguel de Carrión’s novels his frustration and disenchantment with moral, political and social corruption in Cuba becomes evident. In El milagro, written almost entirely while he was in exile and published at the birth of the Republic, hope triumphs; the hero is saved and the forces of love are the victors in the vast open space of the countryside. On the other hand, in his last novel, La esfinge [The Sphinx], the heroine commits suicide, because she is unable to break through the moral barriers inculcated into her, which makes her repress her instincts and withhold herself from the man she loves. For this novel the author chooses enclosed areas. The ancestral home in Havana is a symbol of the oppressive forces which finally destroy the central character. Carrión may well have portrayed the house in La esfinge as a microcosm of Cuba, where the heroine, just as the country, had yielded to the forces of a stifling reality. Compared with his first novel, the author’s tone in the final one, shows that he too has surrendered to despair and frustration over the facts of national life.

MARÍA L. NEGRÍN
translated by Patricia James

Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, 9 April 1875, only son of a physician. Spent the period of the second war of Cuban Independence in the US with his parents. On his return to Cuba in 1898 he became a teacher. In 1903 he founded a journal for teachers, Cuba Pedagógica. Married Lucía Rivero Beltrán in 1904; only child, María Antonia, born in 1914. Qualified as a doctor of medicine in 1908 and established a cancer research laboratory, the first of its kind in Cuba. Appointed Professor of medicine at Havana University in 1910. From 1917 to 1929 was Professor of anatomy and physiology at the teacher’s training college in Havana. Director of this institution from 1926 to 1928. He was a contributor to El Heraldo de Cuba and to several other journals and newspapers. Founder member of the National Academy of Arts and Letters. Died in 1929
Selected Works

Novels
El milagro, Havana: Azul y Rojo, 1903
La última voluntad, Havana: A. Castillo, 1903
Las honradas, Havana: Editorial Librería Nueva, 1917
Las impuras, Havana: Nuestra Novela, 1919
Nochebuena, Havana: Nuestra Novela, 1924
La esfinge, Havana: Comisión Nacional Cubana de la Unesco, 1961

Further Reading
González Muza, L., La novela y el cuento psicológicos de Miguel de Carrión, Miami: Universal, 1979

Julián del Casal 1863–1893

Cuban poet

Julián del Casal shared with José Martí, Rubén Darío and Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera the initial stages of Modernism in Spanish American literature. His poetic work begins with Hojas al viento, 1890 [Leaves in the Wind] The title of this collection refers to the Romantic current then still in vogue among writers in the Hispanic world, but where it was already possible to detect elements belonging to the early stages of a renewal. The main strength of Hojas al viento is the need to find unusual literary motifs, thereby shifting the perceptions of both author and reader to barely explored areas of reality and culture. Equally strong is the cultivation of form which, in the best pages of the volume, produces texts in which artistic quality seems to becomes the main subject of the poetry.

In his second book of poems, Nieve, 1892 [Snow], Casal reveals a personal assimilation of Parnassian influence, with a special debt to Leconte de Lisle and José María de Heredia, who wrote Les Trophies [The Trophies]. The determination to work to exacting standards is evident here in the attention to textual detail of which each poem is the fruit, as well as in the concept of the book as such, divided into five sections that refer to thematic and formal criteria. Throughout the first three sections: “Bocetos antiguos” [Sketches from Ancient Times]; “Mi museo ideal” [My Ideal Museum] and “Cr españoles” [Spanish Prints], Casal displays his talent at recreating scenes from Graeco-Latin mythology, Judeo-Christian tradition, Gustave Moreau’s paintings and Iberian folklore, indirectly injecting them with his personality. The second section, based on ten paintings by Moreau, represents the climax of the symbol in Casal. Here he creates the most subtle and significant allusions to a convulsed eroticism. In the last two sections, “Marfiles viejos” [Old Ivory] and “La gruta del ensueño” [The Grotto of Daydreams], the poetic first present in the earlier sections, governs the literary discourse, which gives a steady balance to the structure of the volume. This section has a confessional tone; when the writer uses symbols, he does so in a clear and unequivocal way, stating rather than suggesting, establishing a free and easy, almost conversational discourse.

Casal’s third book, Bustos y rimas, 1893 [Busts and Rhymes], published soon after his sudden death, brings together a group of biographical sketches in prose [Busts] and another in verse [Rhymes]. The lyrical section carries the voice of “Marfiles viejos” and “La gruta del ensueño” into full maturity. Here, the author’s literary personality is consolidated around an aesthetic creed that, sketched out by Casal from his early years as a poet, is defined best in a series of antitheses: the city versus the countryside; sumptuous interiors versus the outdoors in inclement weather; knowledge versus innocence; pain versus joy; and precious worked metals that dull “the radiance of the sparkling stars.” With the dark lucidity that brought to him the premonition of his own death, Casal’s voice becomes prophetic, entering a world whose unreality threatens not only the poet but reality itself.

Often termed escapist and decadent, Casal’s poetry represents a culminating point in the development of Cuban literature. Written with a vocation for cosmopolitanism that reveals itself as a longing for universality, his poetry emerges after a stubborn process of national reinforcement. The place that Casal’s poetry takes in this process, character successive breaks that aspire to form a continuity, is truly unique and even contradictory. His voice is not inscribed in the extensive body of Cuban patriotic poetry, in spite of having denounced “los golpes estridentes/del látigo que suena todavía” (the harsh crack of the whip that echoes still); the Island’s nature, described by his predecessors in ways ranging from the descriptive to the symbolic, was not to his taste, when he did not renounce it openly. For him Woman, both as a reality and as a poetic subject, represented “centres of disgust.” However, “that fine spirit, that timid and tender affection” which, according to José Martí, characterized the poet, constitutes one of the purest values of Cuban culture. Though his poetry contains a range of metric and stanzaic forms that have been acknowledged as characteristic of Spanish American Modernismo, while abounding also in expressive resources aimed at renewal, Casal does not possess the stylistic greatness of Martí or Darío. His main contribution to the rise of the new Spanish American poetry was the perfect literary expression of his personality, distinguished by a feeling of extreme and sincere anguish in which Hispanic stoicism and the challenge to an unjust mortality (the term in Spanish is “agonismo”) coincide; outlines of a humanist ethics which, in Latin America, tend to blend into a spiritual synthesis, detectable in the work of some of the major writers such as Martí himself and César Vallejo.

EMILIO DE ARMAS
translated by Verity Smith and Tristán White

Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, 7 November 1863. Attended primary and secondary school in that city. Began to publish poems and articles in newspapers from an early age. Worked in the Treasury and was a student in Faculty of Law but abandoned his studies. Became an important critic on art and literature; also social columnist and commentator on a wide range of national and international issues. This work complemented his poetic output. Published in La Habana Elegante and El Figaro. Lost his modest civil servant’s job as the result of criticizing the Captain General and other Spanish dignitaries. Towards the end of 1888 he made a brief journey to Spain, hoping that he might be able to settle in Europe. Returned in January 1889, profoundly disillusioned. Supported independence from Spain and rejected Spanish literary influences in favour of French ones. Died prematurely and abruptly in 1893 of a violent haemorrhage while dining with friends.

Selected Works

Poetry
Hojas al viento: primeras poesías, Havana: El Retiro, 1890
Nieve, Havana: n.p., 1892
Bustos y rimas, Havana: Imprenta La Moderna, 1893

Compilations and Anthologies
Poesías completas y pequeños poemas en prosa en orden cronológico, edited by Esperanza Figueroa, Miami: Universal, 1993

Further Reading

Armas, Emilio de, Casal, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1981
——“Julián del Casal y el modernismo,” Revista Iberoamericana, vol. 56/152–53 (July-December 1990)
Clay Méndez, Luis Felipe, Julián del Casal: estudio comparativo de prosa y poesía, Miami: Universal, 1979
——“Bibliografía de Julián del Casal,” Revista Iberoamericana 139 (January—June 1967)
Lezama Lima, José, “Julián del Casal,” in his Analecta del reloj, Havana: Orígenes, 1953
Loynaz, Dulce María, “Ausencia y presencia de Julián del Casal,” in her Ensayos literarios, Salamanca: Universidad de Salamanca, 1993
Monner Sans, José, Julián del Casal y el modernismo hispanoamericano, Mexico City: Colegio de Mexico, 1952
Montero, Oscar, Erositmo y representación en Julián del Casal, Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1993
Rosario Castellanos 1925–1974

Mexican poet, dramatist and prose writer

Almost inevitably, the work of Rosario Castellanos suffered initially from the effects of her openly feminist stance in an uncompromisingly masculinist culture. Although it is possible to exaggerate the extent to which her work was marginalised by the literary establishment, in particular her later, more overtly feminist work was frequently branded as “caserita” (homespun) and overly domestic in focus (a classic sexist form of attack on women’s writing). Thus her work attracted little scholarly attention while she was still alive. However, feminist writers, above all those in Mexico and North America, have acknowledged the huge contribution she made both in opening up the professional literary terrain to women, and as the first contemporary author whose writing covers the whole range of genres, she was imbued with a clear sense of what it was to be female and Mexican.

The other major theme laid out and analysed, especially in her early work and in many of her essays, was the situation of indigenous Mexicans. Here, Castellanos drew not only on her experiences as a child of their oppressors (she had been brought up in a privileged landowning family in rural Chiapas) but also as someone who was herself oppressed, on the grounds of her gender. Her writing on the theme of “race” may in many ways look dated in the light of contemporary theories of difference. However, for its time, drawing as it did on her readings of the work of Frantz Fanon and Simone Weil, as well as her experience of working for the Instituto Nacional Indigenista in her native Chiapas, it effectively re-mapped in the literary sphere the complex relationship between this form of oppression and those of gender and class in 1950s and 1960s Mexico.

Castellanos’s first published work as an adult was poetry. In this she was initially influenced by the members of the literary group to which she adhered while at university in Mexico City, which became known as the Generation of 1950. She was also influenced by the work of other poets such as that of José Gorostiza, with its philosophical content and highly allegorical language, as well as by other Latin and North American women writers, for example, Gabriela Mistral and Emily Dickinson, some of whose poetry she translated.

Some critics have argued that the style and concerns of some of her early poetry, \textit{Trayectoria del polvo}, 1948 [Trajectory of Dust], and \textit{De la vigilia estéril}, 1950 [About the Sterile Vigil], with their biblical themes and “Interiorist” trappings, including a heavy reliance on metaphor, underwent a feminist evolution. This involved moving away from what could be categorised as the traditional “feminine” mode of Latin American poetry towards a more original style which adopted the language of an “everyday femininity,” albeit with a fiercely ironic, often bitter subtext. This interpretation, if at times based on a rather selective reading of Castellanos’s female poetic precursors, is convincing to an extent. In the poetry which Castellanos wrote in the late 1960s and 1970s, ancient mythical settings are replaced by the kind of modern mythical spaces of womanhood which, as contemporary feminists have noted, attempt to pass themselves off as “natural” and “common sense.” Frequent use is made of parody and pastiche, replacing elaborate metaphor, to tear holes in the discourses (of psychology, the modern mass media, love and romance, the modern career woman, to name a few) which construct modern femininity. In several poems, Castellanos is expanding what it was possible for a woman poet to write about love, sex, childbearing, while at the same time employing signifiers of an anti-poetic, demythifying stance. Later poems which fall into this category are “Kinsey Report,” “Se habla de Gabriel” [Speaking about Gabriel], “Pequeña crónica” [Little Chronicle], and “Entrevista de prensa” [Interview with the Press], all of 1972. However, there are certain constants in Castellanos’s poetic work which should not be overlooked and which equally reveal her feminist intentions: the recourse to dramatic monologue, “spoken” by a woman, which is almost always for demythifying purposes, regardless of whether the myths are ancient, metaphor-laden ones (Malinche, Salomé, Dido) or their modern cliché-ridden counterparts (the Spinster, the Divorced Woman, and frequently, Rosario, herself), all with an undercurrent of bitterness and alienation. What changes, then, are not Castellanos’s intentions but the poetic possibilities available to her, in an age increasingly influenced by the growth in mass communications and feminist discourses.

Castellanos’s narrative work underwent a similar sea-change. Her first novel, Balún-Canán, 1957 (The Nine Guardians) was a highly original attempt at a fusion of two different prose genres: indigenist writing and autobiographical fiction. The indigenist part of the story—a Tzeltal uprising against the backdrop of the 1930s agrarian reforms in rural Chiapas was an obvious choice of plot. This is partly because of her childhood experience of this area and of the impact of the reforms implemented during the presidency of Lázaro Cárdenas (1934–40). It was owed also to the resurgence of interest in this genre of writing in the mid-1950s which resulted from the government of Ruiz Cortines’s promotion of a neoCardenist set of ideals in its rural policy. This backdrop of rural southeast Mexico was to be re-used many times in both of her early collections of short stories, and in her second novel, Oficio de tinieblas, 1962 (Office of Tenebrae). In her first novel, though, it is the autobiographical part of the story which dominates, with the first-person narration of an unnamed seven-year-old girl, whose life bears many resemblances to known events in the author’s childhood, and who describes to the reader how she came to be in a position to take up a pen and write.

This novel of painful self-discovery can clearly be situated in a 20th-century tradition of women’s autobiographical writing. Oficio de tinieblas, on the other hand, is an ambitious attempt at a more complex depiction of the relationships between the various strata of society in rural Chiapas. Perhaps it is less appealing to readers with its omniscient narrator, broken up only occasionally, as in the first novel, by indigenism’s traditional recourse to lyrical passages in the style of pre-Colombian texts, such as the Popol-Vuh (the creation myths of the Maya Quiché people).

Both novels and many of the early Chiapas short stories are concerned with the oppression of their women characters both from the indigenous and mestizo communities and the white ruling class—and much use is made of interior monologue to set out their plight. In Castellanos’s last book of stories, Album de familia, 1971 [Family Album], while the setting shifts to contemporary Mexico City, the feminist concerns are now clearly in the forefront. As with Castellanos’s later poetry, her later prose clearly owes a great deal to her knowledge of and commitment to the forms of liberal and then of radical feminism which were emerging in a Mexico more open to “outside” discourses.

Feminism was not only a discourse from outside. In many of Castellanos’s essays and also in her play, El eterno femenino, 1975 (The Eternal Feminine), she depicts and analyses the pantheon of illustrious female figures from Mexico’s past (Adelita, la Malinche, Sor Juana). Much of the time the intention is to assail the various nation-building myths with which they have become associated, and also to carry out the task of “recovering” them for a feminist project. This last is a task that Castellanos had begun back in 1950 when, influenced by Simone de Beauvoir and Virginia Woolf, she wrote her Masters thesis on feminine culture. In her essays, many of which were first published in the major newspapers of the time, for example ¡Siempre! [Always] and Excelsior, this feminist intent and content are conveyed in a highly original style which, like some of her poetry, frequently relies on parody and pastiche. It is the emergence of this style towards the end of her life that certain writers and critics have qualified as Castellanos’s greatest contribution to Latin American letters.

CATHERINE GRANT

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 25 May 1925. Grew up in Comitán, state of Chiapas; family moved to Mexico City in 1941, after losing their estate in land reforms. Attended the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM), Mexico City, 1944–50, MA in philosophy 1950; studied at the University of Madrid, 1950–51. Travelled throughout Europe in 1951. Director, Chiapas cultural programmes, 1951–53, and staff member, Institute of Arts and Sciences, both in Tuxtla Gutiérrez. Director, El Teatro Guiñol (puppet theatre) for the National Indigenist Institute, San Cristóbal, 1956–59; the intention behind this venture was to incorporate Indian tribes into Western life. Touré Chiapas, 1956–58. Married Ricardo Guerra in 1958 (divorced), one son. From 1960, journalist for various newspapers and periodicals in Mexico City; press and information director, 1960–66, and Professor of comparative literature, 1967–71, UNAM; Visiting Professor of Latin American literature at the universities of Wisconsin, Indiana, and Colorado, all 1967. Mexican ambassador to Israel, Tel Aviv, and lecturer in Mexican literature, Hebrew University, Jerusalem, 1971–74. Recipient of numerous awards including the Mexican Critics’ Award, 1957; Chiapas Prize, 1958; Xavier Villaurrutia Prize, 1961; Woman of the Year Award, Mexico, 1967. Died as result of an electric shock on 7 August 1974.

Selected Works

Poetry

Trayectoria del polvo, Mexico City: n.p., 1948
Apuntes para una declaración de fe, Mexico City: Ediciones de America, 1948
De la vigilia estéril, Mexico City: Ediciones de America, 1950
Presentación al templo: poemas (Madrid, 1951), with El rescate del mundo, Mexico City: n.p., 1952
Al pie de la letra, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1959
Salomé y Judith: poemas dramáticos, Mexico City: Jus, 1959
Lívida luz, Mexico City: UNAM, 1960
Materia memorable, Mexico City: UNAM, 1969 [poetry and essays]
Bella dama sin piedad y otros poemas, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1984

Novels and Short Fiction

Oficio de tinieblas, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1962.; fragment as Office of Tenebrae, translated by Anne and Christopher Fremantle, in Latin American Literature Today, 1977

Los convidados de agosto, Mexico City: Era, 1964 [short fiction]

Álbum de familia, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1971 [short fiction]

Play

El eterno feminino, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1975; as Just Like a Woman, translated by V. M. Bouvier, 1984; as The Eternal Feminine, in A Rosario Castellanos Reader, 1988

Other Writings

Sobre cultura femenina, Mexico City: Ediciones de América, Revista Antológica, 1950 [essays]

La novela mexicana contemporánea y su valor testimonial, Mexico City: INJM, 1965

Rostros de Mexico, photographs by Bernice Kolko, Mexico City: UNAM, 1966

Mujer que sabe latín, Mexico City: UNAM, 1973 [literary criticism]

El uso de la palabra, edited by José Emilio Pacheco, Mexico City: Excelsior, 1974 [essays]

El mar y sus pescaditos, Mexico City: UNAM, 1975 [literary criticism]

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras, edited by Eduardo Mejía, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989

Anthologies in Translation

Further Reading

Ahern, Maureen and Mary Seale Vásquez (editors), Homenaje a Rosario Castellanos, Valencia: Albatros, 1980

Bigas Torres, Sylvia, La narrativa indigenista mexicana del Siglo XX, Guadalajara, Mexico: Editorial Universidad de Guadalajara, 1990 [Chapter 8 is on Castellanos in the context of “new” indigenist writing]

Rodriguez-Peralta, Phyllis, “Images of Women in Castellanos’ Prose,” Latin American Literary Review, vol. 6 (1977)

---

Antônio de Castro Alves 1847–1871

Brazilian poet

Antônio de Castro Alves had established his reputation as one of Brazil’s greatest poets well before he died of tuberculosis at the age of twenty-four. Much of the poet’s renown is based on the belief that his poetry was instrumental in bringing about the abolition of African slavery in 1888. The adulation of his contemporaries is somewhat puzzling, since only one volume of his verse (the 1870 Espumas flutuantes [Floating Foam]) had appeared before his death. Some of his other works had been printed in newspapers and magazines, but the most of his poems, along with his one play, Gonzaga, were published posthumously. A considerable number of works appeared in print for the first time in Afrânio Peixoto’s 1921 edition of Castro Alves’s Obras completas.

The fact is that Castro Alves, by his own efforts, created a public persona which transcended poetry. He became—and still remains—an emblem of talent, suffering, rebelliousness, and humanitarianism, a central figure in Brazil’s pantheon of national heroes. He began building that persona while still a child, reciting fervent odes on patriotic occasions. He studied at the Faculties of Law in Recife and in São Paulo, but poetry and the amorous adventures which were often the subjects of his verse distracted him from his studies; he had only managed to complete three of the six years of law school by the time he died. His classmates in Recife idolized him as a kind of Student Prince—handsome and beautifully dressed, renowned for his public recitations, his rejection of all constraints on his personal freedom, and his success with women. His greatest conquest came in 1866, when he became the lover of the wellknown Portuguese actress Eugênia Câmara. Eugênia was about twenty years older than Castro Alves and, like virtually all actresses in Brazil at the time, was also a prostitute. Eugênia was intelligent and largely self-educated, and had published a volume of her own verse. For more than two years, she was Castro Alves’s mentor as well as his mistress and financial support; he wrote a play for her (Gonzaga), and toured with her to Bahia, Rio de Janeiro, and São Paulo. During these years, he both perfected his poetic style and learned to present his poems to audiences. Dressed in black, his face powdered dead-white, Castro Alves declaimed his verses on stage or from balconies overlooking public squares; according to contemporary accounts, those who heard these recitations screamed, wept, and fainted.

Many of Castro Alves’s most famous poems were clearly written for public performance, and exemplify the poetic style Brazilians call “condoreiro.” Like the Andean condor, this poetry of passion and verbal pyrotechnics soars high above the pedestrian concerns of mere mortals. It seeks both to astonish and to enlighten us with a lofty vision of the world and of human history, a vision granted to but a few sublime talents; Castro Alves consistently referred to himself, always in capital letters, as a Poet and a Genius. A number of these impassioned odes, as well as his long dramatic poem “A Cachoeira de Paulo Afonso” [The Paulo-Afonso Waterfall], overtly or implicitly espouse the abolition of African slavery in Brazil. Castro Alves wrote his first abolitionist poem in 1863, when he was sixteen, and sporadically produced about thirty-five anti-slavery works over the next eight years. Only six of these appeared in print, all in periodicals, before his death, and fewer than eighteen had been printed before the “Golden Law” ended slavery in 1888.

If the relationship between Castro Alves’s abolitionist poems and the political fact of Abolition is somewhat problematical, so too is the ideology of those poems. Castro Alves appears to have been almost completely uninterested in politics, and played no role in the anti-slavery Republican Party, founded in 1870 by a group of young men which included some of his colleagues in the Faculty of Law. He almost certainly owned a slave, the son of his slave wet-nurse, who served him throughout his life. Very few of his abolitionist poems deal with the reality of African slavery in contemporary Brazil; rather, Castro Alves presents the history of Africa as inextricably linked to bondage and suffering (in his “Vozes d’Africa” [Voices from Africa]), or chooses to portray slaves during Roman times. Most of the slaves who appear in his poems, in fact, are not called “slaves,” but “captives;” they do not represent the millions of blacks who served Castro Alves and his readers, but are universal and timeless emblems of human misery and entrapment. The conflict between the broad themes of Castro Alves’s poetry and the specifics of the Brazilian campaign against African slavery is evident in his most famous Abolitionist poem, “O navio negreiro” [The Slave Ship], which was first published in 1880. Written in São Paulo in 1868, this work demands that Brazilians abolish the importation of African slaves—something which British naval superiority in the Atlantic had in fact forced Brazil to do in 1850, eighteen years before Castro Alves produced the poem and thirty years before the poem was published.

In the face of these contradictions and conflicts, how are we to interpret Castro Alves’s anti-slavery poems and their impact on the Abolitionist movement in Brazil? There are two answers - one personal, the other essentially political. At the personal level, it seems clear that the most striking feature of these poems for Castro Alves’s contemporaries was his willingness to identify with the slaves. Brazilian slave-owners—and virtually all educated Brazilians owned slaves at the middle of the 19th century—did not simply define these blacks as inferior beings destined to serve them; they so completely took their slaves for granted that they were almost unaware of their existence. The drawings of visiting French artists and the accounts of foreign travelers make it clear that slaves were omnipresent and central figures in the daily life of the Brazilian elite. In Brazilian literature of the period, however, as in the consciousness of the readers of that literature, the slave was virtually invisible and irrelevant. Castro Alves made the slaves visible in his poems precisely because his texts make it clear that he identified with them—not as real individuals, but as metaphors for the suffering, isolation, and entrapment which his Romantic ideology taught him were the lot of the true Poet, the role he had so painstakingly created for himself on the stage of life. Castro Alves’s early and tragic death was a central component of his definition of the true Poet, an event which he had come to regard as therefore inevitable. His death from tuberculosis and, perhaps, gangrene (he had accidentally shot himself in the foot in 1869) was interpreted by the Brazilian elite as a supreme act of self-sacrifice; shortly after his death in 1871, his contemporaries began to refer to Castro Alves as “The Martyr of the Slaves” or, even, “The Christ of the Slaves.” Even those Brazilians who had never read a single poem by Castro Alves, who had never attended one of his recitations, became convinced that this handsome, incredibly talented young member of the elite had in some way laid down his life to free the nation’s slaves. This interpretation of Castro Alves’s life and death, however flawed and incomplete, none the less made Abolitionism a respectable and acceptable cause, even for those who owned slaves, and laid the psychological groundwork for the end of African slavery in 1888.

DAVID T.HABERLY

Biography

Born on an estate near Curralinho in the state of Bahia, Brazil, 14 March 1847. Secondary education at Colégio Sebrão and Ginásio Baiano. His brother, José Antônio, committed suicide, 1864. Studied law at University of Recife, from 1864. Founder, with fellow students, of an abolitionist society in 1866. Formed relationship with the actress Eugênia Câmara in 1866 and travelled with her to Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo, 1868. Foot amputated, 1869. Died of tuberculosis on 6 July 1871.

Selected Works

Poetry
Espumas flutuantes, Bahia: Camilo Lellis Masson, 1870
A cachoeira de Paulo Afonso, Bahia: Imprensa Econômica, 1876
Vozes d’África—Navio negreiro—Tragedia no mar, Rio de Janeiro: Tipografia da Escola de Serafim José Alves, 1880
Os escravos, Rio de Janeiro: Tipografia da Escola de Serafim José Alves, 1883
Últimas estrofes, Bahia: Tipografia do Diário da Bahia, 1895

Play
Gonzaga ou a revolução de Minas, Rio de Janeiro: Cruz Coutinho, 1875

Other Writings
Correspondencia, inéditos e dispersos, Bahia: Livraria Progresso Editora, 1956

Compilations and Anthologies

Poemas revolucionários, São Paulo: Universitária, 1945

Further Reading

Much of the immense bibliography on Castro Alves, partially catalogued by Hans Jürgen Horch, is enormously reverential; the Calmon biography is the most detailed of these texts. Haddad’s revisionist study, harshly criticized when it first appeared, has since come to be regarded as fundamental. More recent criticism has focused on the relationship between Castro Alves’s Abolitionism and the works of foreign writers, and on his non-Abolitionist lyrics.

Calmon, Pedro, Castro Alves, o homem e a obra, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1973
Caudillismo refers to the exercise of total and arbitrary power by a strong man. After the conquest of Latin America, this system permitted members of native elites to retain a local power base in exchange for loyalty to the colonial regime. In this way, rural populations were kept in the semi-feudal position of retainees. Caudillismo—from the Spanish word caudillo, a leader or military chieftain—has taken various forms throughout its long history in Latin America. For the most part, caudillos have come from the military sector. They have a firm interest in maintaining their power base, maximizing personal gain and defeating rivals. A charismatic personality is a feature common to many leaders of this kind.

The decades following the Wars of Independence in Latin America are known as the age of the caudillos. Military chiefs organized private armies of gauchos or llaneros and vied for power. The period was chaotic and characterized by intermittent civil wars. A few countries were able to replace this anarchical system with constitutional rule, but in most countries national caudillos assumed power and tended to centralize authority. Caudillaje thus came to be a system of local rule by a strong political boss. When the Latin American states were founded in the 19th century, the rural and urban subaltern classes persisted as a powerful force in the form of pre-capitalist types of political organization, above all the patronal institution of caciquismo and coronelismo. Many of the dictatorships deplored by liberals as “barbarous” during this historical period, however, were more expressive of the culture and interests of rural and regional populations than were the liberal-democratic regimes modeled on those of European nation-states and expressing the interests of the coastal capital cities. A cacique, is to this day any strong local leader. (He who establishes his power beyond the locality and who exercises regional or national control is also called a caudillo). A cacique maintains himself in power by a complex system of nepotism, patronage for his clients, control over local government services, illegal activities, and the use of force. In Peru, caciques are known as curacas. In Brazil, local bosses coroneis, and a close equivalent of caciquismo is known coronelismo. Traditional and contemporary caudillos, charismatic political leaders, and personalist political parties are political expressions of personalismo. Peronism (Argentina’s Juan and Eva Perón) and Castroism (Cuba’s Fidel Castro) are two of many examples where the force of personality has dominated a popularly based political movement. The power of caudillismo has been an effective means for mobilizing mass political movements, centralizing the power of the state, and instituting innovative and revolutionary changes. But since the system caudillismo sustains is often too dependent on the power and prestige of one man, political succession, institutional stability, and continuity of policy become major and persistent problems in the society.

Some of the more notorious 19th-century caudillos include: in Venezuela, José Antonio Paez (1830–36; 1861–63) and Antonio Guzmán Blanco (1870–88); in Argentina, Juan Manuel de Rosas (1829–52); in Mexico, Antonio López de Santa Anna (1829–55). In the 20th century, military men who have established extremely repressive caudillo-type personal dictatorships have been: Juan Vicente Gómez in Venezuela; Fulgencio Batista in Cuba; Rafael Leónidas Trujillo in the Dominican Republic; Anastasio Somoza and his son, Anastasio Somoza Debayle, in Nicaragua; François Duvalier and Lieutenant General Raúl Cedras in Haiti; Getúlio Vargas in Brazil (1930–45) and Augusto Pinochet in Chile. Most literary and “liberal” political writers condemn caudillos for their despotism, brutality, cupidity, and antidemocratic stance.

Caudillos flourish in societies held together by strong personal attachments and by patron-client relationships. Such a figure is characterized by a personal style of decision-making. The caudillo or dictator figure has inspired a number of novelists to use specific historical figures or the caudillo figure as archetype in historical, fictional and semi-fictional accounts.

Caudillo literature has portrayed the dictator/strongman figure since Domingo Faustino Sarmiento’s Facundo, 1845 (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants), as each literary text depicts Spanish-American culture and social practice within the framework of diverse literary formats. His paternalistic-authoritarian regime is characterized by both charismatic leadership and terrorist tactics. The literary figure is referred to by a number of synonymous titles or phrases: from the most obvious, Caudillo (Chief), Padre (Father), Sabio (Sage), Señor Presidente (Mr President), Primer Magistrado (First Magistrate), Supremo (The Supreme One), Patriarca (Patriarch), Bienhechor (The Benefactor), Generalísimo (The Highest General), Conductor (Leader), Guía (Guide), Jefe (Boss), Protector (Protector), Comandante (Commander), and Désopota Ilustrado (Enlightened Despot). In Los dictadores latinoamericanos, Ángel Rama makes the following observation about this figure in Latin American literature: “More than a historical figure, he is a myth, dreamed about but not thought about, hated but not analyzed.” And, giving credence to this perception, the novelist Alejo Carpentier in his El recurso del método, 1974 (Reasons of State), adds: “nothing walks on this continent as much as a myth.” This legendary, recurrent figure is both a myth and a reality for the Latin American writer and is often appropriately portrayed as a blend of the fictional with the historical. The very protean form that the narrative takes reflects the real and surreal images that the figure of the caudillo suggests to its Latin American audience. Roa Bastos’s Yo el Supremo, 1974 (I the Supreme), for example, takes on a plethora of formats interwoven in a single work—history, novel, sociological essay, moral philosophy, biographical novel, revolutionary pamphlet, testimonial documentary, poetic prose, autobiographical confession, ideological debate over literary limits, and, finally a linguistic treatise of sorts reflecting on verbal expression and its ability to communicate effectively. At times the protagonist may be a specific historical figure or, in other instances, he may be an archetypical figure, as in García Márquez’s El otoño del patriarca, 1975 (The Autumn of the Patriarch). In this Colombian novel the action takes place in a Latin American country in an advanced state of corruption, anarchy, savagery, and physical exuberance. The time is the modern period, though not specified. Dominating the action is the dictator-general, at first an almost messianic presence loved by the people, appearing suddenly among the peasants like a vision.

Perhaps the best-known of the earlier literary pieces on the caudillo figure is Sarmiento’s Facundo. Sarmiento composed this autobiographical, non-fictional account of his youth using a heterogeneous style encompassing the history of Argentine customs and types, a biography of the gaucho caudillo Juan Facundo Quiroga (Rosas’s rival caudillo), and a political diatribe against the government of the tyrant Manuel Rosas.

ELENA DE COSTA
See also entries on El Señor Presidente (Miguel Ángel Asturias), Los de abajo (Mariano Azuela), La muerte de Artemio Cruz (Carlos Fuentes), Doña Bárbara (Rómulo Gallegos), El general en su laberinto (Gabriel García Márquez), Yo el Supremo (Augusto Roa Bastos), Pedro Páramo (Juan Rulfo)

Further Reading

Azuela, Mariano, Los caciques, Mexico City: Editorial de la Compañía Periodística Nacional, 1917; as The Bosses, translated by Lesley Byrd Simpson, in Two Novels of Mexico, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1956 [fiction]

Calviño, Julio, La novela del dictador en Hispanoamérica, Madrid: Cultura Hispánica, 1985

—— Historia, ideología y mito en la narrativa hispanoamericana contemporánea, Madrid: Editorial Ayuso, 1987

Canfield, Martha L., El “patriarca” de García Márquez: arquetipo literario del dictador hispanoamericano, Florence: Opus Libri, 1984

Davis, Harold Eugene, et al., Revolutionaries, Traditionalists, and Dictators in Latin America, New York: Cooper Square Publishers, 1973

Hamill, Hugh M., Caudillos, Dictators in Spanish America, Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1992, [Essays on theories underlying the root causes of caudillismo and an analysis of various caudillo figures in the 19th and 20th centuries. Also includes an excellent bibliography on definitions, theories, and contexts of the caudillo, as well as caudillos in literature]

Jitrik, Noé, Muerte y resurrección de Facundo, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1968

Pacheco, Carlos, Narrativa de la dictadura y crítica literaria, Caracas: Ediciones CELARG, 1987

Rama, Ángel, Los dictadores latinoamericanos, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1976

Aimé Césaire 1913-

Martinican poet and politician

The short-lived venture of Légitime Defense [Legitimate Defence] had a strong Marxist and anti-colonial edge. It was edited by three Martinican students, Etienne Léro, René Ménil and Jules Monnerot when they were together in Paris in 1932. Its publication prompted Aimé Césaire to create his own journal, L’Étudiant Noir [The Black Student] in 1934 with Léopold Senghor and León Damas “for all black students, regardless of origin, African, Antillean or American.” The appearance of this journal was to determine the dual course of Césaire’s life.

One can differentiate between Césaire the poet to the politician but not dissociate them. The ambition to define an authentic black culture is encapsulated in the coining of the word negritude, around 1935. For Senghor, it is “the whole of the black world’s cultural values;” for Césaire, in Cahier d’un retour au pays natal (Return to My Native Land), it originates in “Haiti, where Négritude first stood up and swore by its humanity”. Lilyan Kesteloot defines it as “the slave’s demand for justice, dignity and humanity.”

Cahier d’un retour au pays natal, a cultural milestone, was written in France and first published there in 1939 but achieved recognition under the aegis of André Breton in the bilingual French/English edition of 1947. The themes of Cahier, centering on the identity of the black West-Indian, are outlined in Tropiques, the journal Césaire founded in 1941 with Ménil and Monnerot after returning to Martinique at the outbreak of World War II.

However, the fame of Cahier rests equally on its obscurity and originality, achieving what Ménil called for: “a form originating in Europe awaiting contents originating in Africa.” He there by rejected two centuries of “fake” Antillean literature, based on imitation of French models. His images result from the conscious fusion of numerous sources, owing little, despite what is often alleged, to the Surrealist process of automatic writing.

Césaire’s literary vocation and political career run parallel and closely related courses. To quote Ernest Moutoussamy: “His poetic discourse is that of a prophet, his political discourse is that of a realist and as such makes room for compromise.” He had seen unification with France as the first step towards independence in the immediate post-war context but after the Left was defeated in June 1946, the decree of unification was found to be ridden with ambiguities. Césaire’s career as a deputy, from 1945 until a socialist government was elected in 1981, under François Mitterrand, would be a continuous struggle to ensure that the D.O.M or Overseas Departments be granted in practice the same status as those of mainland France.

His political concern extended to the whole of the colonised world as testified by his support for self-determination and independence in Vietnam, Algeria and Africa. The most famous of those statements is Discours sur le colonialisme, 1951 (Discourse on Colonialism), in which he denounces humanism and its “universal” values based exclusively on the white civilisation and used as a pretext for world domination: “a civilisation which seeks ways round its principles is condemned to perish.”

In 1947, he had launched Presence Africaine, journal and publishing house, in order to facilitate cultural exchanges between all areas of the black diaspora, across language divides.
Accused of treason by Frantz Fanon after the unification with France, Césaire has steered an uneasy course marked by growing disillusion with politics. In 1956, after leaving the Communist Party, which he accused of empire building in the Third World in his Lettre à Maurice Thorez (Letter to Maurice Thorez), he founded the Progressist Martinican Party in order to attend to the needs of his fellow countrymen. Yet he is equally mistrusted by those Martinicans who consider his ultimate commitment to autonomy as dangerously Utopian.

Césaire’s literary production, especially his writing for the stage, reflects this disillusion, as neo-colonialism, corruption and nationalism took hold over Africa. La Tragédie du Roi Christophe, 1963 (The Tragedy of King Christophe) sought to justify strong men such as Nkrumah and Sékou Touré, African leaders who attempted to fill the vacuum left by decolonisation. On the other hand, Une Saison au Congo, 1966 (A Season in the Congo) takes a deeply pessimistic view of the fate of Patrice Lumumba.

Though revered as a father figure, Césaire’s cultural options are also strongly contested by the younger generation of Martinican writers. Whereas he stands firm for Francophonie (black literature in French), Bernabé, Chamoiseau and Confiant in their Eloge de la créolité of 1992, [In Praise of Creoleness], would like to define their identity by writing in Creole-based French as the way towards a specific Caribbean culture.

DENISE GANDERTON

See also entries on La Revue du Monde Noir and Tropiques under Journals, Négritude

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry
Ferments, Paris: Seuil, 1960

Plays

Et les Chiens se taisaient, Paris: Presence Africaine, 1956

Essays

Compilations and Anthologies

Oeuvres completes, 3 vols, Fort-de-France, Martinique: Désormeaux, 1976

Further Reading

Confiant, Raphael, Aimé Césaire, une traversée paradoxale du siècle, Paris: Stock, 1993 [Re-appraisal of Césaire by a member of the Creoleness generation]
Hale, Thomas (editor), Critical Perspectives on Aimé Césaire, Washington, DC: Three Continents Press, 1992
Kesteloot, Lilyan, Aimé Césaire, poète d’aujourd’hui, Paris: Seghers, 1963

Une Tempête

Play by Aimé Césaire

Une Tempête is the last of four plays written by Aimé Césaire. In contrast with La Tragédie du Roi Christophe, 1963 (The Tragedy of King Christophe) and Une Saison au Congo, 1967 (A Season in the Congo), it is not centered on a specific historical figure and if all Césaire’s theatre is political, as Roger Toumson notes, it is on the broader issue of colonisation, by way of a parody of Shakespeare’s The Tempest.

It was first produced, like its predecessors, by Jean-Marie Serreau who became, in the 1960s, the champion of nonaligned African and Caribbean theatre. Because Césaire’s plays were considered as objectionable in France as Soyinka’s were in England, backing was initially provided by the Hammamet Festival in Tunisia before it was transferred to the Avignon Festival and subsequently to the Théâtre de la Cité Universitaire, Paris.

Césaire’s declared intention was to adapt Shakespeare’s Tempest for black theatre, so that, as Antoine Régis remarked in La Littérature franco-antillaise (1992), “the play’s structure, production and even its lyrical moments participate of a single pedagogical purpose.”

The title “A” Tempest points to the choice of a radically different interpretation of Shakespeare’s play. Shakespeare’s plot is condensed from five acts into three and considerably altered to turn the play into an indictment of the ideology which legitimised the colonial enterprise. From the power struggle between Prospero and his brother Antonio, which underpins the original, he retains the conspiracy which deprived Prospero of his dukedom but assimilates him to Columbus, demoted as viceroy of the Indies by the Spanish sovereigns and accused of heresy and magical practices by the Inquisition. Accordingly, the scene moves to the West Indies and Césaire redefines the central characters on the pattern of the colonial class structure. Prospero and other Europeans stand for white power while Caliban is the black slave, and Ariel the mulatto siding with his master. In accordance with the master-slave dialectics, Shakespeare favours Ariel who shows aspirations to a “civilised” order while giving up on “bestial” Caliban who refuses it, thus justifying the superiority of nurture over nature.

In contrast, Césaire builds his play around the central confrontation between the coloniser and the colonised who contests the legitimacy of the policy of conquest. Caliban denounces the magical (technological) powers used by Prospero to take possession of the island and challenges the superiority of the white civilisation offered as a bonus to inferior beings. He subsumes the revolt of the Rebel of Et les Chiens se taisaient [And the Dogs Kept Silent], the struggle for freedom of Christophe in Haiti and the set-back of Lumumba’s defeat in Une Saison au Congo.

Although Caliban fails to overthrow Prospero by force, he predicts the end of colonial power:

```
Prospero: Eh bien, moi aussi, je te hais!
Car tu es celui par qui, pour la première fois j’ai douté de moi-même.
```
I too hate you. For it is through you that for the first time, I have doubted myself.

(Act 3, scene 5)

In Une Tempête, Prospero stays on, with the excuse of defending civilisation and safeguarding its achievements but in reality because he needs his slaves in order to feel superior: “Nous ne sommes plus que deux sur cette île. Plus que Toi et Moi.” (Only the two of us left on this island, only You and Me.) (Act 3, scene 4).

Césaire also updates and contextualises The Tempest through his choice of resolutely modern language. Prospero’s elevated register when addressing his peers or soliloquising contrasts with the use of slang and colloquialisms when talking to his slaves, coming down to their level: P

Prospero: “vilain singe. Comment peut-on être si laid!” (Nasty ape. How is it possible to be so ugly!). For which Caliban pays him back in kind: “Avec ton nez crochu, tu ressembles a un vieux vautour.” (With your hook nose, you look like an old vulture.) (Act I, scene 2). To Ariel waxing lyrical, Prospero says: “Ecrase! Je n’aime pas les arbres a parole.” (Wrap up! I don’t like talking trees.) (Act I, scene 2). Ariel is shown to imitate the high register of his master; Caliban will have none of it:

Ariel: Il m’a promis ma liberté. A terme, sans doute, mais c’est la première fois qu’il me l’a promis Caliban: Du flan! D’ailleurs ne m’intéresse pas. Ce que je veux, c’est Freedom now!

(Act 2, scene I)

In order to broaden the meaning of the French “liberté,” Césaire backs it up with a reference to Black Power. Caliban’s description of Prospero’s “arsenal anti-émeutes” (riot-squad weaponry) carries a hint of the 1968 Paris riots. The choice of register also indicates that Césaire, in the words of Antoine Régis, is conscious of “writing in French while rejecting the ideological and literary context of the language.”

This context is common to all European literature, so that the play is open to a range of other interpretations. Caliban accuses Prospero of having robbed him of everything, including his name. Prospero counters this accusation with a reminder that he could just as well have called him “cannibal” or by derision “Hannibal,” alluding to the names the emancipated slaves were given at random from encyclopedias. Whereas Shakespeare used the character of Caliban to deride the “good savage myth” because he believed in the principle of hierarchy, Césaire portrays Prospero as a slave-master who justifies the subjugation of other races on the same principle.

The concept of “identity” which was the cornerstone of European thought until the Renaissance had for consequence that difference could only be construed as inequality. Therefore, Shakespeare’s Caliban is the absolute “other,” naturally monstrous and inferior because he contradicts the definition of “human” which took white Christian Europeans as the absolute norm. The other can only be defined by reference to it:

Prospero: Tu pourrais au moins me bénir de t’avoir appris a parler
[You could at least thank me for having taught you to speak.]

(Act 1, scene 2)

Another dimension of the play rests with Ariel, pointing to a positive issue to the confrontation. Whereas in order to exist, Caliban can only proclaim what he is not (as Glissant wrote, “Je ne suis qu’en tant que je suis autre” [I only exist through being the other]) Ariel dreams of reconciliation: “J’ai souvent fait le rêve associés, de bâtir un monde merveilleux, chacun apportant en contribution ses qualités propres.” (I often had a wild dream that one day, Prospero, you and I, we would undertake like brothers to build a wonderful world where each would contribute his own qualities.) (Act 2, scene I)

Like the island itself in Cahier d’un retour, Ariel would at last accept his multiple identity to assume his destiny. DENISE GANDERTON

See also entries on America, the invention of; Caliban; Civilization and Barbarism

Editions

Further Reading

Antoine, Régis, La Littérature franco-antillaise, Paris: Karthala, 1992
Bradby, David, Modern French Drama, Cambri dge: Camb University Press, 1984
Nisbet, Anne Marie and Beverley Ormerod, Négritude et Antillanité, étude d’Une Tempête d’Aimé Césaire, Kensington: New South Wales University, 1982,

Chicano Literature

Chicano literature (writing by people of Mexican descent residing permanently in the US) is often considered a phenomenon arising at the time of the Civil Rights Movement. While the protest period comprises a moment of intensified literary production yielding an important body of texts, a tradition of Chicano literature dates from well before the 1960s. Philip Ortego refers to that boom of the protest period as a Renaissance, thus stressing a need to recognize earlier texts and to study the relationship between contemporary and prior writings. Since that Renaissance, Chicano literature has earned a world-class reputation and its proliferation over the last two decades attests to a rich and dynamic tradition. As Chicano identity constitutes an ethnic experience of being between two cultures and simultaneously of being a part of the latter, it is no surprise that questions of subjectivity and community have been central concerns in literary production. That is not to say that Chicano literature is monolithic and offers a homogeneous account of the ethnic experience. Rather, the variety of Mexican-American experiences has yielded diverse meditations on identity and community and, thus, the literary tradition is characterized by its heterogeneity. To understand that tradition in relation to the many geographical, socio-historical and cultural contexts of its production, and to situate contemporary writing within an ongoing trajectory, it is helpful to follow Luis Leal’s elaboration of four stages in Chicano literary history leading up to the contemporary period: the Hispanic period (1542–1821), the Mexican period (1821–48), the period of transition (1848–1910) and the period of interaction (1910–43).

Here, however, for reasons of space, the period under examination is that defined by Leal as contemporary. Its beginning is marked in 1943 by the events known as the Zoot Suit Riots, sparked by assaults made by US servicemen on Chicanos in Los Angeles. These incidents emphasized the ambiguous status of Mexican-Americans who, although they served their country overseas during World War II, were subject to discrimination at home. A recognition of the inequity displayed by the riots is crucial for a consideration of Chicano culture as it marks a key moment in the politicization of the latter. That politicized consciousness is fomented by returning Chicano troops whose acute awareness of prejudice led them to take an active role in the organization of Mexican-Americans with a view to the pursuit of civil rights and socio-economic and political empowerment.

Towards the end of the 1960s, amid the climate of protest, the nascent politicization of the 1940s comes to fruition with the activism of different groups whose efforts are collectively referred to as the Chicano Movement. Deriving much of their strategy and rhetoric from the black Civil Rights Movement, Chicanos attempted to direct regional and localized concerns into a cohesive national organization. Yet, the diversity characterizing Chicano identity and its representations undermines any semblance of a unified front reflecting all spheres of experience. The only common factors among the latter were and remain those of US residency and Mexican heritage and, beyond these, Chicano identity resists homogenization. Even Spanish, rather than providing a standard mode of communication, may be ascribed a divisive function, given regional differences and the varying proficiency with which it is spoken and written. Thus, the Movement is best considered an assemblage of separate organizations with localized concerns that have in common the aim of certain forms of empowerment.

A crucial function of the Movement was its catalyzing effect on literary production, particularly poetry and drama. As genres that have traditionally lent themselves to consciousness raising and protest, they evolved in conjunction with the Movement, as expressions of activism and as forums for that very activism. Neither required publication as they were, initially at least, directly available and accessible to the audiences for which they were intended. Poems were distributed and read at political gatherings while theater was conceived and performed contemporaneously with the events which it treated. Luis Valdez’s agit-prop actos (acts) and “Corky” Gonzales’s poem “I Am Joaquin” are two key instances of this politicized literature of the Movement period and comprise the more influential examples of early contemporary cultural production. Both authors were involved with important tendencies in organized political activity. Gonzales was founder/leader of the Denver-based Crusade For Justice; Valdés and El Teatro Campesino were active in support of the United Farm Workers Union in California. While “I am Joaquín” was read at meetings, the actos were performed at sites of protest such as the fieldworker’s strikes.

Literature derived from this politically-charged time was generally marked by its alignment with and articulation, at some level, of Movement ideology. Poetry in an innovative, interlingual format provided a popular vehicle for representations of a marginalized socio-cultural and historical experience with the aim of raising consciousness and encouraging self-empowerment. However, poetic representations differed greatly with regard to the terms of community and identity and with regard to the historical and mythical models employed as cultural reference points in the endeavor to provide accounts of the latter. Chicano identity expressed by Alurista, in Floricanto en Aztlán, 1971 [Flower and Song in Aztlán], espouses pan-ethnic solidarity. Employing a largely interlingual syntax, Alurista urged an awareness of a pre-Columbian Chicano heritage and engaged Náhuatl-Mayan philosophy and aesthetics to counter the dominant, Anglocentric worldview which had repressed the Chicano experience.

While certain poets of this period recuperated the pre-Columbian cronotope, others drew upon more recent figures and contexts to provide a cultural axis for a consciousness of community. José Montoya looked to the urban experience of the 1940s and 1950s and to the culture of the Zoot-Suiters, or pachucos, for the hero of his 1972 interlingual poem “El Louie” (Louie). By its immortalization of Louie, the deceased focal point of the community that is represented, the poem and its reading perform an elegiac function, guaranteeing the recovery of that community in the present. For Bruce-Novoa, “El Louie” is paradigmatic of Chicano poetry, comprising a recuperation and representation that reaffirms and ensures the continuity of the ethnic heritage and history. That interlingual reaffirmation of identity effected by Montoya is seen in the works of other poets of the Movement period such as Abelardo Delgado, author of Chicano (1969), Sergio Elizondo, Perros y anti-Perrros: una épica chicana, 1972 [Dogs and Anti-Dogs: a Chicano Epic], Tino Villanueva, Hay otra voz Poems, 1972 [There is Another Voice Poems], Ricardo Sánchez, Canto y grito mi liberación, 1973 [I Sing and Shout My Liberation]), Raúl Salinas, Viaje/Trip, 1973 and Angela De Hoyos, Arise, Chicano! and Other Poems, 1975.

While much poetry of the late 1960s and early 1970s is linked with Movement ideology, the relationship of narrative with the latter is less direct. Novels could not be written and distributed with the immediacy of poetry and drama. Moreover, prose fiction did not lend itself to oral delivery, least of all in the context of political activism that required uncomplicated, message-oriented works. Furthermore, alongside the popular function and possibilities of poetry and drama, narrative remained inaccessible to a mass audience. Dependent on publication and distribution, narrative supposed a readership with a degree of literacy and leisure that did not include large sectors of the Chicano community at the time. With the institution of the Quinto Sol Press prize for fiction in 1970, works were lauded in so far as they comprised acceptable representations of the Chicano experience. The characteristics of the first three winners, Tomás Rivera’s…Y no se lo tragó la tierra, 1971 (…And the Earth Did Not Part), Rudolfo Anaya’s Bless Me, Ultima, 1972 and Rolando Hinojosa’s Estampas del valle y otras obras, 1972 (Sketches of the Valley and Other Works), as well as other sanctioned texts of the period, Richard Vásquez’s Chicano, 1970 and Ernesto Galarza’s Barrio Boy, 1971, suggest the criteria for canonicity: an emphasis on community survival; an exploration of the role of the individual as a member of the latter, positioned between opposing ideologies; a representation of the development of the individual as writer of a collective experience; and accessibility of language.

The narrow scope of criteria for canonicity is symptomatic of a repressive tendency within the Movement itself, particularly with regard to issues of gender, as certain dominant factions considered la causa (the cause) a male enterprise. A radical politics of ethnic identity precluded issues of sexual politics which were not considered part of the collective agenda. Militant and progressive in the pursuit of racial equality and empowerment, the Movement was conservative and reactionary in relation to questions of gender; a prejudice manifested in the sphere of literary production. Until the mid-1970s, Chicanas had been almost wholly ignored by male-run presses and journals and were published only in so far as they expressed, or left unchallenged, the patriarchal perspective. Consequently, women were prevented from speaking and writing about themselves and their experience of oppression within their ethnic community. In addition to sexual difference, differences of sexuality were not accommodated in a project for community defined by its a heterosexual bias. Homosexuality was taboo given its rejection of the traditional family unit, the preservation of which was prioritized by the Movement as a means of safeguarding cultural heritage and values. Thus, although Chicano author John Rechy had published three novels by 1970, with major presses and to international acclaim, his work was ignored. The refusal to embrace Rechy as a member of the ethnic group was due to his homosexuality and his thematization of the latter in novels such as City of Night, 1963 and Numbers, 1967.

By the mid-1970s, however, with the waning of the politicization and oppositionality espoused by cultural nationalist factions in the Movement, literature was identified as Chicano more on the basis of the author's heritage than in terms of how that heritage was articulated or manifested itself, if at all. This yielded a more open conceptualization of Chicano literature as Rechy and others were increasingly recognized and accepted as Chicano writers. The shift coinciding with a declining influence of certain ideological currents on the production, publication and reception of literature, declared itself with a flourishing of the kinds of writing repressed by the dominant cultural nationalist discourse of the Movement. This change was heralded above all with the appearance in 1975–76 of important works by women: the collection of short stories Rain of Scorpions, 1975 and the play The Day of the Swallows (1976, first published 1971) by Estela Portillo; the novels Come Down from the Mound (1975) by Berta Ornelas and Victuum (1976) by Isabela Ríos; and the poetry collections Restless Serpents (1976) and La mujer es la tierra, 1975 (Woman is the Earth) by Bernice Zamora and Dorinda Moreno. These works marked the start of two important processes. First, they initiated the articulation of a repressed feminist consciousness with regard to the issue of women’s oppression within the ethnic group. Second, the works of Portillo et al were pivotal as they ushered in a period in which hitherto unaccommodated literary voices flourished in all genres. Women’s writings, regional literature, works not focusing on la causa or foregrounding ethnicity in an oppositional sense, and gay writings all began to dispel notions of a monolithic community and literary tradition.

Since the mid-1970s, poetry has moved away from the interlingual and the overtly political to become more introspective, displaying an increasing formal sophistication... and a diversification of thematic concerns. Among the more important collections are the following: The Elements of San Joaquín, 1977 (Gary Soto); Bloodroot, 1979 (Alma Villanueva); Palabras de mediodia/Noon Words, 1979 (Lucha Corpi); Emplumada, 1981 [Feathered] (Lorna Dee Cervantes); Women Are Not Roses, 1984 (Ana Castillo); Martin and Meditations on the South Valley, 1987 (Jimmy Santiago Baca); My Wicked, Wicked Ways, 1987 (Sandra Cisneros); and From the Cables of Genocide, 1991 (Lorna Dee Cervantes). As poetry displays a growing degree of craft, a broadening of thematic and stylistic scope and an accommodation of differences pertaining to gender, sexuality and ideology, narrative has followed a similar trajectory. Writers began to offer different perspectives on Chicano identity, producing more subjective, formally diverse works that did not attempt to speak for the collective, and which largely discarded the previously dominant ethnic Bildungsroman model. Authors started to experiment with other narrative forms and to foster intertextual linkages with works and tendencies from Latin American, United States and Peninsular literary traditions.

While the Quinto Sol prize-winners Anaya and Hinojosa continued to produce, new voices enriched Chicano narrative, breaking fresh structural and thematic ground. In particular, the heterogeneity of Chicano prose is intensified in the late 1970s and early 1980s with narratives which challenge the previously dominant ideology of militant sectors of the Movement. Nash Candelaria’s Memories of the Alhambra, 1977, rejects Mexican ancestry and problematizes the hitherto familiar depiction of the search for cultural identity and roots. Espousing assimilation, Candelaria anticipates the most polemic text of the 1980s, Richard Rodríguez’s Hunger of Memory (1982). This sophisticated meditation on language and identity proved controversial due to what many construed as Rodríguez’s refusal of responsibility to his ethnic community, his rejection of that which had been achieved with a view to empowering Chicanos and his advocacy of assimilation. The controversy surrounding Hunger stemmed from its rejection of bilingual education and affirmative action, two political spoils won through minority activism in the 1960s. To some, Rodriguez was a vendido (sell out) and his work without merit while, to other readers, his work added another significant dimension to an already multifaceted Chicano tradition.

Since the early 1980s, numerous works have continued to enrich Chicano prose. The Rain God, 1984 (Arturo Islas), Face, 1985 (Cecile Piñeda), The Hidden Law, 1992 (Michael Nava) and The Rag Doll Plagues, 1992. (Alejandro Morales) are some of the novels which stand out, along with the autobiographical narratives Living Up the Street, 1985 (Gary Soto), A Beautiful, Cruel Country, 1987 (Eva Antonia Wilbur-Cruce) and Always Running, 1993 (Luis Rodríguez). Within this corpus of prose, as with poetry, the Chicana contribution has been significant. Continuing the work begun by writers such as Portillo, recent fiction has increasingly addressed the status of women within the ethnic group and has sought to negotiate feminine subjectivity and to provide representations of the latter. Moreover, diverse works by Sandra Cisneros (The House on Mango Street, 1984), Sheila Ortiz Taylor (Faultline, 1982), Ana Castillo (The Mixquihuala Letters, 1986), Denise Chávez (The Last of the Menu Girls, 1986) and Alma Villanueva (The Ultraviolet Sky, 1988) explore issues of gender and sexuality both within the specificity of the minority experience and, simultaneously, within a broader, trans-ethnic feminist context.
In addition to the novel, a varied body of essayistic prose has flourished. Alongside Richard Rodríguez’s Days of Obligation (1992) and Rubén Martínez’s The Other Side (1992) an outstanding contribution is Cherrie Moraga’s Loving in the War Years/Lo que nunca pasó por sus labios, 1983 [What Never Passed His/Her Lips]. A hybrid, bilingual, autobiographical narrative documenting the oppression of Chicanas from a lesbian perspective, Moraga’s work critiques the heterosexual hegemony and the homophobia of the patriarchal ethnic community. Yet, the most important work of the last decade is Gloria Anzaldúa’s Borderlands/La Frontera: the New Mestiza (1987), a text that defies genre categories. This bilingual and interlingual work blends the lyrical and the prosaic, theoretical commentary and autobiographical insight, to propose a more accommodating conceptualization of Chicano ethnicity. Anzaldúa rejects the binary logic of Western thought that underlies strategies of domination and according to which identity is constructed in unitary terms through its repression of differences. In place of a repressed model of subjectivity, Anzaldúa proposes a mestiza, or border consciousness, which refuses confinement to one identity and permits simultaneous residence in plural communities through multiple alliances and identifications.

WILSON NEATE

Further Reading

Critical Studies
Rodríguez del Pino, Salvador, La novela chicana escrita en español: cinco autores comprometidos, Ypsilanti: Bilingual Press, 1982
Children’s Literature

Feminists are apt to say that literature for children tends to be dismissed by university teachers and scholars as an area suitable only for attention by women. It is certainly true that up to the present children’s literature in Latin America has attracted very little critical interest in the English-speaking world, a point that emerges with sharp clarity in the list of texts recommended for further reading at the end of this article. However, within the continent the importance of children’s literature has been widely recognised by intellectuals who are also creative writers, ethnographers or pedagogues. Borges once gave an interviewer to understand that all great literature eventually becomes children’s literature, adding that he hoped that in the long run his own work would be read by children and, indeed, his personal bestiary, El libro de los seres imaginarios (The Book of Imaginary Beings), is certainly accessible to young readers. Other writers of continental stature who have either written children’s literature or recognised its importance, are Domingo Faustino Sarmiento (Argentina), José Vasconcelos (Mexico), Horacio Quiroga and Juana de Ibarbourou (Uruguay), Marta Brunet and Gabriela Mistral (Chile), Monteiro Lobato (Brazil), Salomé Ureña (Dominican Republic) and both José Martí and Eliseo Diego in Cuba. To these one might add the Peruvian writer and ethnographer, José María Arguedas, whose Castilian versions of popular tales and poems of the Quechua people include material accessible to children and adolescents.

Why, then, has literature for the young in Latin America attracted the attention of many of its most distinguished writers? One very important reason is that it is a foundational literature in the sense that governments in newly-independent countries seek to inculcate a sense of nationhood into schoolchildren. In the case of provinces or regions remote from the capital, this involves accepting the notion of central government, of a culturally dominant metropolis and a periphery whose own culture is tamed by being turned into folklore. Scholars working in the area of cultural studies in Latin America have noted how folklore was discovered in the early decades of the 20th century when modernising states were seeking ways to achieve partial integration of their rural populations. This form of research and cultural appropriation finds its way into children’s books and school texts either directly through, say, compilations of popular tales and poetry, or in a more mediated way by the adaptation of indigenous or regional originals. However, there is one crucial example of resistance to the centre by a writer, precisely when and where the process of absorbing the regions into the national mix was in its most acute phase. The author in question was Horacio Quiroga, a Uruguayan by birth, who spent most of his adult life in Argentina. For much of the time he chose to live in a wild tropical part of the country, writing short stories which centre on human beings in relation to their natural environment. Quiroga’s most famous collection of stories for children is Cuentos de la selva (South American Jungle Tales), and an interesting point about this book is that in 1919 the Uruguayan Ministry of Education considered its suitability as a school text but turned the text down because it was thought not to be didactic. At the end of the 20th century its didacticism is perfectly obvious because Quiroga was several generations ahead of his time in his concern for the environment and his awareness of the danger to species in the wild caused by humans encroaching on the animals’ natural habitat. This is the theme of many stories for adults and also of “La guerra de los yacarés” [The War of the Alligators] from Cuentos de la selva. In fact, all Quiroga’s animal stories are accessible to young people, but the essential difference between these and the ones he wrote specifically for children is that the latter display a delicate sense of humour altogether lacking in the sombre stories for adults. In his stories Quiroga attempted also to educate his readers about snakes, so as to counteract the horror of them inculcated by film-makers and both elite and popular writers in the West.

The emergent nation state in Latin America needed to safeguard itself against the cultural imperialism of the United States. At the end of the 19th century the Cuban José Martí regularly warned Latin Americans that the increasing economic power of the US placed them in danger of losing their independence once more. And Martí too wrote for the young by founding in 1889 a magazine, La Edad de Oro [The Golden Age]. Only four issues appeared, not because the magazine was not well received, but because Martí fell out with his financial backer. Thus scholars have only a limited amount of material to work on, but all the same, certain points emerge clearly. For example, the opening article of the first issue is devoted to the subject of liberty. This is “Tres heroes” [Three Heroes], which centres on leading figures of the wars of independence in Latin America, Simon Bolivar, Hidalgo and San Martín. Another article, “La ruinas indias” [Indian Ruins], serves to awaken interest in the continent’s pre-Columbian past, while “La Iliada de Homero” [Homer’s Iliad], shows how important it was to Martí that children should also be introduced to the European classics. This was a belief shared by the Mexican José Vasconcelos who was Minister of Education in the early 1920s after the decade of revolution in his country. He chose to emphasize Hispanic and Catholic elements so as to combat influences from the Protestant North and, like Martí, he believed that children should be introduced to the works of Homer because the epic was appropriate to childhood as the dawn of life.

Children’s literature was not, of course, only fashioned or commissioned by educators intent on forming young minds in a particular way. The children of the creole elite learned the lore of other cultures, such as the African or the Amerindian, from their nannies. This oral tradition was particularly strong in Brazil where, in addition, written expressions of the popular such as “literatura de cordel” (literature on a string, because that was the way it was sold in markets) appealed to children because of its strong and lurid narrative line.

The 1959 Revolution in Cuba brought children’s literature into prominence, as had applied earlier in the case of Mexico. Since that time officials in the cultural sphere have given the impression that with the exception of Martí, children’s literature in Cuba was the invention of the Revolution. Certainly it is true that it had never before been promoted to such an extent nor received generous subsidies, but the official line requires some qualification. The children’s theatre in Havana, the Guiñol Nacional, was opened in 1955 and there was some interesting work for children being published in the 1940s and 1950s, particularly by Anita Arroyo, Hilda Perera-Soto and Emma Pérez. Anita Arroyo’s children’s stories are fascinating in ideological terms because as an educated member of the bourgeoisie she was sensitively aware of social injustice, but at the same time she had a very real vested interest in the status quo. Thus, like some 19th-century English writers (Dickens, George Eliot), she thought that social conditions could be improved by individual acts of philanthropy. A particularly clear example of her political naïveté is the story “Islas de diamantes” [Diamond Islands] in which a golden-hearted gringo gives a beach urchin an extraordinary experience by taking him on a flight from Varadero to Havana. In another story, “La rosa de conchas” [The Conch Shell Rose], a gringo buys an urchin a set of new clothes which transform him, readers are told, in a most amazing way. At the end of this story the fortunes of the poor family are left to chance in a literal sense as the good gringo buys them a set of lottery tickets. Since the Cuban Revolution there has been an explosion of talent in the sphere of children’s writing in Cuba. Among the most important contributors to its success have been Eliseo Diego, Mirta Aguirre, Enid Vian, Dora Alonso, Julia Calzadilla and many others, including book illustrators and stage designers. It is likely that one reason for the popularity of this form of activity in Cuba since 1959 is that it is “safe” in the sense that there is no need for the creative people involved to practice self-censorship.

The globalization of US mass culture alarms Latin American intellectuals and this includes, of course, its impact on the young. In 1971 Ariel Dorfman and Armand Mattelart published Para leer al Pato Donald: comunicación de masa y colonialismo (How to Read Donald Duck: Imperialist Ideology in the Disney Comic). At the time it made a great impact but read now, although it is a well-researched study, it seems strident, over-earnest and dualistic. As has been pointed out in a more recent study on popular and mass culture in Latin America, namely Memory and Modernity by William Rowe and Vivian Schelling (1991), the “alien” culture may be assimilated in such a way as to produce active, creative results. Thus the authors of this work remind us that the residents of barrios or shanty towns in Mexico City appropriated the figure of Superman, turning him into Superbarrio, a character who dresses like the American original and who fights for their right to running water, electric light and sewage.

VERITY SMITH

Further Reading

This is divided into three sections: 1. Anthologies and histories of children’s literature that cover the continent; 2. Works by writers and pedagogues about literature for children in Latin America; 3. Works of fiction and non-fiction for children from some of the countries of the continent.

2. Brunet, Marta, “El mundo mágico del niño,” a special issue of Atenea (Santiago de Chile), 1959

——“Cuentos para niños,” in Obras completas, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1963

Sarmiento, Domingo Faustino, “Cuentos para niños,” in Obras completas, vol. 29, Buenos Aires: Juan Roldán, 1914

Vasconcelos, José, De Robinson a Odiseo. Obras completas, Mexico City: Libreros Mexicanos Unidos, vol. 2, 1958

3.

Aguirre, Mirta (Cuba), Juegos y otros poemas, Havana: Gente Nueva, 1974

Arroyo, Anita (Cuba), El pájaro de lata, Havana: Cultural Sociedad Anónima, 1946

Corona, Pascuala (Mexico), Cuentos mexicanos para niños, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1945

Ibarbourou, Juana de (Uruguay), Chico Carlo, Montevideo: Barreiro y Ramos, 1944

——Los sueños de Natacha, Montevideo: Ediciones Liceo, 1945

Martí, José (Cuba), La Edad de Oro, San Salvador: Ministerio de Educación, 1955

Mistral, Gabriela (Chile), “Rondas” and “Jugarretas,” in Poesías completas, Madrid: Aguilar, 1958

Quiroga, Horacio (Uruguay), Cuentos de la selva, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Editora

——“Buenos Aires,” 1918; as South American Jungle Tales, translated by Arthur Livingston, New York: Duffield, 1922; London: Methuen, 1923

Rego, José Lins do (Brazil), Histórias da Velha Totônia, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1936; subsequent editions as Estorias da Velha Totônia

Walsh, María Elena (Argentina), El reino del revés, Buenos Aires: Fariña, 1963

——Cuentopos de Gulubú, Buenos Aires: Fariña, 1966

Chile

19th-and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

Nineteenth-century Chilean literature sought to create a national mode of expression while maintaining an extensive dialogue with the literature of Spain, the rest of Europe and North America. There was also an intense relationship with French literature, with particular emphasis on its ideology. The 19th century falls into three distinct stages, each identifying with the major literary tendencies of the period: Neoclassicism 1800–45;
Romanticism 1845–90; and Naturalism 1890–1935. These periods coincide with moments of historical, political and social transformation in Chile: first, the struggle for independence and the anarchy it involved; second, the establishment of the republic; and last, the social upheavals resulting from industrialization. Common to all these periods is the utilitarian concept of literature, which perceives literature as an instrument for change and which can influence the social structure. Literature is an expression of society and its collective concerns, and as such is realistic. It sets out faithfully and efficiently to depict changing conditions. It is deterministic and historicist, portraying the collapse of the old regime and the introduction of a new order. Its ultimate aim is to point the way to rationality, freedom and progress.

In terms of literary history, the period of independence and anarchy (1810–45) runs parallel to a Neoclassicism inspired by the Italianate tendencies predominating in Spain. The most obvious influence in poetry and theatre is Metastasio. Outstanding among the first Neoclassical generation was Juan Egaña (1768–1836), a Catholic intellectual, professor of Rhetoric and dean of the Royal and Pontifical University of San Felipe, author of Cartas Pehuenches [Andean Letters] and personal memoirs, El Chileno consolado en los presidios o Filosofía de la religion, 1826 [A Chilean Finds Consolation in Prison or Philosophy of Religion], written during his incarceration at Juan Fernández. He was a poet who emulated Metastasio, like Meléndez Valdés, who translated his Zenobia, for the salon of the wife of the governor Muñoz de Guzmán. A senator and member of the 1813 Junta, he drafted the Constitution of 1823. Among his contemporaries was Camilo Henríquez (1769–1825), a priest of La Buena Muerte and man of letters whose reading included Raynal, Rousseau and Voltaire. He was the author of a proclamation of freedom, signed with the anagram Quirino Lemachez, and editor of Chile’s first newspaper, the weekly Aurora de Chile (1812–14). He also wrote two dramas not intended for production. The first, inspired by Rousseau, was Camila o la patriota de Sur America [Camila or the Patriot of South America]. The second, La Inocencia en el asilo de las virtudes [Innocence in the Sanctuary of the Virtues] drew its inspiration from Jansen. The political satire that flourished in the press encouraged debate and also gave rise to the most extensive literary outpourings of the period, from such writers as Camilo Henríquez, José Joaquín de Mora and Antonio José de Irisarri. Those in power, and the Chilean character, were the main butts of the satire. The dominant figure of the Neoclassical period, whose influence endured into the following period, its greatest poet and the most distinguished figure in 19th-century humanism, was Andrés Bello (1781–1865). The leading figure of the third generation of Neoclassicists was Antonio José de Irisarri (1786–1868), satirical poet and author of the novels El cristiano errante, 1847 [The Wandering Christian] and Historia del Periclito Don Epaminondas del Cauca, 1863 [The History of the Highly Illustrious Don Epaminondas of Cauca]. Irisarri was also an eminent philologist. Mercedes Marín del Solar (1804–1860), a disciple of Andrés Bello, was the leading woman writer of the 19th century. Among her poetry is the Poema fúnebre a la muerte de Diego Portales, 1837 [Elegy on the Death of Diego Portales], written to mark the statesman’s death.

Romanticism developed during the formation of the autocratic republic and the ensuing crisis (1845–1890). The literary output of this time was inhibited by the anti-liberal climate and the classical education of the young writers. The 1842 movement, which provided a starting point for the new generation, was centred on the reforms attempted by the old San Felipe University which was abolished to make way for the University of Chile, which, under the leadership of Andrés Bello, organized the country’s entire educational and cultural system. These liberal, innovative and combative activities centred on proscribed Argentine writers, in particular Domingo Faustino Sarmiento and Vicente F. López, who aggressively incited Chilean youth to challenge Bello’s authority. The outlook of the young Chileans was, however, no less romantic than that of their detractors, nor were the genres they cultivated—scenes from everyday life, narrative poems, sentimental lyric poems—out of step with the new trends. José Victorino Lastarria’s address to the Literary Society on 3 May 1842, is credited with being the starting point of the new movement and the first declaration of intent to instigate a distinctly Chilean literature. Lastarria was later to lose much of his influence in the light of the new demands of Naturalism and Positivism. Of the shorter literary forms, the one most cultivated by this first generation and throughout the period was the artículo de costumbres. The inspiration for articles of this kind came from two Spanish authors, Mariano José de Larra and Mesonero Romanos, and they consisted of scenes from everyday life and portraits of social types which served to describe the characteristics of the various social strata. The genre was developed by the leading writers of the period, the most important of whom was José Joaquin Vallejo (1811–1858), writing under the pen-name “Jotabeche.” Lastarria, Alberto Blest Gana, Daniel Barros Grez and many others cultivated this type of work. “Jotabeche” outshines the rest through the scope and continuity of his work and the humour and artistry of his description and characterisation of types. In some cases, his narrative style emulates that of the short story and anticipates the tradición of Ricardo Palma. His contributions to El Mercurio de Valparaíso made him the bestknown writer of his time. The most important novelist of the 19th century was Alberto Blest Gana (1830–1920). He produced a cycle of historical novels, covering events beginning with the period known as the Spanish Reconquest, 1814–18, described in Durante la Reconquista [During the Reconquest]. The 1835 victory over the Peruvian-Bolivian Confederation is the subject of El loco Estero, 1875 [Estero the Madman], while Martín Riv as (186 2,) d eals wit h the war of 1851, and Los transplantados, 1875 [The Expatriates] focuses on Spanish Americans in Paris at the turn of the century. Like Balzac, Blest Gana saw himself as the chronicler and custodian of his time. His most popular work is Martin Rivas (Martin Rivas in the English version). This is the novel that every Chilean has read and of which the largest number of editions have been published. A popular genre of the period was the serial novel, of which Daniel Barros Grez (1834–1904) is the most outstanding writer. His series, Las aventuras del maravilloso perro Cuatro Remos, 1883 [The Adventures of Four-Legs the Wonder Dog], is still read today.

In the realm of travelogues, memoirs and autobiography, Vicente Pérez Rosales’s Recuerdos del pasado, 1882. [Memories of the Past], are the most important memoirs of the 19th century. He orders events from childhood to maturity, in Chilean, Brazilian and French settings: the Silvela School in Paris and his teacher Leandro Fernández de Moratin; crossing the Andes and the bands of gaucho guerillas; finally, the German colonization of the south. It is still an enjoyable read and its interest as both history and personal memoir has not dwindled. Lastarria’s Recuerdos literarios, 1885 [Literary Recollections] are vital to the understanding of the literary history of the period. The most notable examples of travel literature are Sarmiento’s Viajes [Journeys] and Páginas de mi diario durante tres años de viaje, 1856 [Pages from My Diary during Three Years of Travel] by Benjamín Vicuña Mackenna (1831–86), biographer, chronicler and historian, and the most prolific writer of the time. The outstanding contemporary political essayist was Francisco Bilbao (1823–57), whose essays include Sociabilidad chilena [Chilean Sociability]. History books were the most relevant intellectual expression of the period, represented by the immense works of Miguel Luis Amunátegui (1828–88), Diego Barros Arana (1830–1907) and Vicuña Mackenna.

In poetry, Salvador Sanfuentes (1817–60), Guillermo Blest Gana (1829–1905), Eusebio Lillo (1826–1910) and Guillermo Matta (1826–99) were the leading Chilean Romantic poets. Among Sanfuentes’s narrative poems is El campanario, 1842 [The Bell Tower], in which, motivated by liberal political ideas, he tells of the struggle for independence and recounts native legends, using both themes to lay the foundation of a national poetry centred on Indian affairs and the history of the homeland. Guillermo Blest Gana and Eusebio Lillo were the most distinctly lyrical of the sentimental poets. Blest Gana’s Armonías, 1884 [Harmonies] is about love, sadness, reminiscence and nostalgia, and includes protest, letters, humour and a few Indian verses. Guillermo Matta was a civic poet who drew his inspiration from Auguste Comte’s “religion of humanity,” devoting his poetry to the glorification of scientists and thinkers, modern heroes who give the poetry a lingeringly prosaic and intellectual flavour. Only a few poems and certain verses from the work of these poets survive.

The Naturalist novel developed out of Lastarria’s ¡Salvad las aparenencias!, 1884 [For the Sake of Appearances] and by virtue of its absence from the work of Blest Gana, who explicitly rejects Naturalism in his techniques of characterisation. The period was to last from 1890 until 1935, through three generations, each adopting a different approach to Naturalism. The first attempts to portray a crude form of reality were bedroom scenes. These were later abandoned in the face of serious criticism by the press. On a socio-political level, the movement coincided with industrialization, social advancement and enrichment, and the establishment of the first workers’ organizations, and what contemporary bourgeois liberals called “the social question.” The Revolution of 1891 deeply affected the realities of Chilean life. The period 1890–1935 witnessed a blend of Modernism—with its Parnassian, Symbolist and Decadent elements—and Naturalism. Vicente Grez (1847–1909) whose novels include El ideal de una esposa, 1887 [A Wife’s Ideal], a portrait of temperamental incompatibility and jealousy, was the most outstanding novelist of the first Naturalist generation. Luis Orrego Luco (1866–1947) was Chile’s leading modernista. A contemporary of Rubén Darío, Orrego Luco was responsible for receiving the poet on his arrival in Santiago. His most important novel Casa grande, 1908 [The Big House] is a love story which ends with an elegantly-executed crime brought about by a clash of temperaments, social change and the moral and economic collapse of the upper class. However, the most original expression of Naturalism came with the mundonovista generation, enhanced by elements other than the influence of Zola and Taine. From his European vantage point, Francisco Contreras, poet and prose writer, created the concept and coined the word mondovisme (New Worldism) in the Mercure de France. His foreword to El pueblo maravilloso, 1927 [The Marvellous People] traces the development of this type of novel. Mariano Latorre is the most convincing and lucid representative of the regionalist movement. His narrative takes as its setting the many and varied geographical locations suggested by the title of his anthology Chile, país de rincones, 1947 [Chile, Land of Crannies], in which, using the argument of the determinism of environment, he rejects the possibility of literature advocating the unity of a land which encompasses seven types of different and conflicting landscapes: desert, transversal valleys, longitudinal valleys, mountain range, coast, forest and the south. His novel Zurzulita (1918) anticipates the so-called “American exemplary novels” or “novels of the homeland.” However, for the protagonist the drive for regeneration of the land is not the result of expectation or desire, but of the triumph of violence and peasant cunning. The mundonovista novel explores different aspects of the conflict between the rural and urban attitudes. Eduardo Barrios (1884–1963), developed the psychological novel, beginning with the Naturalistic form of Un perdido, 1918 [A Lost Soul], through the Decadence of El hermano asno, 1922, (Brother Asno), to the contemporary psychological insight of Los hombres del hombre, 1950 [Man’s Many Faces] and the robust rural expression of Gran señor y rajadíablos, 1948 [Great Lord and Hell-raiser]. Fernando Santiván (1886–1973) shows understanding of social problems and sympathy towards the emancipation of the lower classes in El Crisol [The Melting Pot]. Joaquín Edwards Bello (1887–1968) describes the world of a seaport in his novel Valparaiso, la ciudad del viento [Valparaiso, the Windy City] which was to appear in various versions. It was published under this title in 1931, then in 1943 as En el viejo almendral [In the Old Almond Grove] and then simply as Valparaiso in 1955. Other notable novelists are Augusto D’Halmar (1882–1950) following in the steps of Zola in Juana Lucero (1902) and, in the Decadent tradition, Pasion y muerte del cura Deusto [The Passion and Death of Father Deusto] and in many novellas. There are two writers who, each in their different way, are something of a phenomenon. One is Pedro Prado (1886–1952) author of the novels Rapa Nui, un juez rural [A Country Magistrate] and especially Alsino (1920). The latter is the novel of a mundonovista artist and poet, who derives his poetry from its natural source. The second is Jenaro Prieto (1889–1946), author of El socio, 1928 [The Partner], an ironic challenge to the aggressive tendencies of the avantgarde, especially in its parody of imagist language.

The short story was a popular genre of the period. An outstanding member of the first generation was Daniel Riquelme (1854–1912) whose Bajo la tienda [Under Canvas] carries echoes of the Pacific Campaign. Baldomero Lillo (1867–1923) with his collections Sub terra (1904) and Sub sole (1907), Federico Gana (1867–1926), with Días de campo, 1926 [Days in the Country] and Rubén Darío (1867–1916), with his stories in Azul, 1888 [Blue] are examples of Naturalistic and Decadent tendencies. Mariano Latorre (1885–1955), author of many volumes of stories, is the mundonovista and criollista short story writer par excellence. Augusto d’Halmar, Eduardo Barrios, Pedro Prado, Olegario Lazo Baeza all handle the short story with great dexterity. In literature by women, novels of the period brought to the fore the first authors to gain prominence in the world of letters. They wrote under pseudonyms and were members of the upper class. They included “Shade,” Mariana Cox de Stuven (1871–1914) author of Un remordimiento, 1909 [A Sense of Remorse] and La vida íntima de María Goetz, 1909 [The Intimate Life of Mari a Goetz], and “Iris,” Inés Echeverría de (1868–1949), with her cycle of novels in the style of memoirs, Cuando mi tierra nació, 1930 [When My Country Was Born], Cuando mi tierra era niña, 1942 [When My Country Was a Young Girl], and Cuando mi tierra fue moza, 1943–46 [When My Country Was a Young Woman]. The celebrations in 1910 of the centenary of Independence provoked reflection on the state of the nation expressed in essays like those of Nicolás Palacios, Raza chilena, 1911 [Chilean Race], Alejandro Venegas, Dr Valdés Canje Sinceridad o Chile íntimo en 1910 [Sincerity or Inside Chile in 1910], Francisco A.Encina (1874–1965), Nuestra inferioridad económica, 1911 [Our Economic Inferiority]. Armando Donos, Augusto D’Halmar, and Fernando Santiván all produced interesting memoirs. In La fronda aristocrática, 1928 [The Aristocratic Frond], Alberto Edwards (1873–1932) presents the deepest insight into the socio-political phenomenon of Chile. Literary history, criticism, bibliography and other disciplines were dominated by the distinguished and multi-talented writer José Toribio Medina (1852–1930), whose vast output seems hardly conceivable for one man.

In poetry, the first—1882—generation of poets included José A.Soffía and Luis Rodríguez Velasco, who took their inspiration from Bécquer and Campoamor, as well as from Classicism and the first manifestations of the French Parnassians. The modernista generation of 1897, whose sensibility began early in Chile with the publication of Darío’s Azul, issued its first publication to coincide with its participation in the 1887 Varela Competition, taking second prize in the poetry section, in which the winner was Eduardo de la Barra with his heroic Canto a las glorias de Chile [Ballad to the Glories of Chile]. Rubén Dario was to live in Chile between 1887 and 1889 and his work would influence the poets of his own generation and the whole period. Pedro A.González (1863–1903) was the most outstanding modernista poet with his Ritmos, 1895 [Rhythms] and Poesías [Poems] (1905). Julio Vicuña Cifuentes, Antonio Bórquez Solar and Gustavo Valledor Sánchez also produced notable works. As for the younger 1912—generation, Pedro Prado (1886–1952), in his Flores de cardo, 1909 [Flowers of the Thistle], marks the shift of sensibility away from Modernism and towards the intimacy and simplicity that were the hallmarks of the new generation. Prado’s books of poetic prose has resonances of Rabindranath Tagore and Omar Khayyam. With the Mexican Antonio Castro Leal, he was joint author of Fragmentos, 1922 [Fragments], an apocryphal book bearing the signature of Karez-y-Rosham. Los pájaros errantes, 1940 [Birds of Passage], Otoño en las dunas, 1940 [Autumn in the Dunes], Esta bella ciudad envenenada, 1945 [This Beautiful Poisoned City], Más que una rosa, 1946 [More than a Rose] revert to the sonnet and other traditional forms. Carlos Pezoa Velis (1879–1908) represents the sencillismo (cultivated simplicity) of his generation with the inclusion of popular themes in poems such as “Pancho y Tomás [Pancho and Thomas], “Nada” [Nothing], and others, in his posthumous anthology. Gabriela Mistral (1889–1957) detaches herself from the trends followed by others of her generation and creates her personal brand of poetry, taking advantage of the innovations of the avant-garde. Her great books, Desoladón, 1922 [Desolation], Ternura, 1924 [Tenderness], Tala, 1938 [Felling], Lagar, 1954 [Winepress], and Poema de Chile, 1967 [Poem of Chile] transformed her into the leading figure in contemporary Chilean and Spanish American letters. Other outstanding poets of the group include Carlos R. Mondaca (1881–1928), Diego Dublé Urrutia (1877–1967), Manuel Magallanes Moure (1878–1924), Max Jara (1886–1965), Jorge González Bastías (1879–1950), who together made up a generation whose diverse forms of expression are all within the simple spirit of elemental motifs and unpretentious sentiments.

Chilean literature during the contemporary era (1935–95) is enhanced by the international status acquired by such major figures as Gabriela Mistral, winner of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1945, the first to be awarded after World War II and the first to be accorded to a Spanish American writer, and Pablo Neruda (1904–73) who was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1971, Neruda is the most widely-read writer in Spanish and his work has been translated into many languages. Vicente Huidobro (1893–1948) was a writer of considerable literary importance, who influenced Spanish and Latin American poetry and the French and European avant-garde. His premature death limited the extent of his work. All these poets were affected to a greater or lesser degree by the socio-political situation, and the new factional alignments of left and right leading to the turmoil which was to shape the fate of the nation throughout the period between 1938 and 1980. The avantgarde period and the political realignment of left and right is marked by Huidobro’s early militancy and his equally precocious rejection of the foolhardy pact between the Soviet Union and Germany in 1939, followed by his condemnation of ideological divisions and the affirmation of “el hombre total” (the whole man). In this respect, the only parallels were Gabriela Mistral, who denounced the Cold War in “La Palabra Maldita” [That Accursed Word], and later the essays of Lihn, Valdés and Hunneus which censured sectarianism in La cultura en la sociedad en vías al socialismo [Culture in a Soc Moving Towards Socialism]. Avant-garde writers of the period clearly registered their rejection of the status quo, not only in the world of letters but also in contemporary society and the world at large. As well as Huidobro and Neruda, others including Parra, Lihn and Arteche wrote poems dealing unequivocally with the current situation. Postmodern poetry of the present day defies such classification and embraces allusions to current events, imitations of journalistic and advertising styles, and its own interpretation of different ethnic cultures.

Among the first generation of the literary avant-garde, the generation of 1927, it was Vicente Huidobro more than anyone else in the world of Hispanic letters, who defined cracionista poetry, which champions the autonomy of poetry and inspired a poetic language independent of everyday language, while staying close in its selection of vocabulary and linguistic content of its process of subversion. His poetic work, whose autonomy is not at odds with its specific context, presents a critical vision of modernity and its plans for democratization and secularization, the introduction of technology and distortion of the environment. In El espejo de agua, 1916 [The Mirror of Water], Poemas árticos, 1918 (Arctic Poems), Ecuatorial, 1918 [Equatorial], Altazor (1931), Temblor de cielo, 1931 [Heaven Trembling], Ver y Palpar, 1941 [Seeing and Feeling] and El ciudadano del olvido, 1941 [Citizen of Oblivion], Huidobro moves increasingly towards autonomy of vocabulary and subject matter. Pablo Neruda was the poet with the greatest influence on the language thanks to simple, sentimental works like Crepusculario, 1923 [Where Twilight Dwells] and some of the Veinte poesias de amor y una canción desesperada, 1924 (Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair) of which millions of copies have been sold and the poems set to music and sung by the unprivileged. His most ambitious and disparate work is Canto general, 1950 (Canto General), which in fifteen poems traces the political history of America from pre-Columbian civilization up to the modern dictatorships. Linked by an autobiographical thread, the various sections of the Canto tell of political militancy and the persecution suffered as a result. The crowning moment comes with Alturas de Macchu Picchu (The Heights of Macchu Picchu), one of the greatest poems ever written in Spanish. Stimulated by the transformations introduced by the new trends, he wrote Estravagario (Extravagaria) along the lines of anti-poetry and Odas elementales (The Elemental Odes) in the style of the youthful poetas láricos (poets of the hearth or of provincial settings), following the prototype of Materias [Materials] in Gabriela Mistral’s Tala. He left eight posthumous books, which developed and expanded on the playful, mythical and ideological themes of his previous work. Pablo de Rokha (1894–1968) was the thunderously aggressive poet of ideological opposition. Inspired by Marx and Mao, his language is savage, prosaic and violent. Other important, but less striking, members of this generation were Ángel Cruchaga Santa María (1893–1964), whose early works were mystical and closer to Neruda, his Rostro de Chile, 1955 [Face of Chile] filling the gaps in Canto general, and Rosamel del Valle (1900–65) whose early work bore strong resemblances to Huidobro but who later turned to Surrealism, contributing to the magazine Mandrágora.

The second avant-garde generation, the generation of 1942, was Surrealist and anti-poetic. The young poets founded the runrunismo and agú movements and their periodicals Mandrágora (1938), Leit Motif, Ariel (1925), and others. The outstanding figure of this second avant-garde generation is Nicanor Parra. His (anti-) poetry proclaims the precedence of the spoken language over the written, through speeches, sermons, debates and vernacular sayings, partisan slogans, etc., although he also produced a variety of written genres, such as statements, political speeches, newspaper articles, advertising slogans, news bulletins, stories in various styles, lending a prosaic dimension to his antipoetry, which was also expressed in popular forms like folk song, advertising, postcards, painting and photography. Irony and humour are the dominant stylistic devices in his satire which targets populist politics, dictatorship and repression in equal measure. Later he devoted himself to the protection of the environment, writing so-called “ecopoems.” Alongside Parra, the most outstanding figure is Gonzalo Rojas (1917-), 1992, winner of the National Prize for Literature and the Queen Sofia Poetry Prize in the same year. His impassioned and sensual poetry has matured with the poet. His major works are Contra la muerte, 1964 [Against Death], Oscuro, 1977 [Dark], Transtierro, 1979 [Hinterland], Del relámpago, 1981 [From the Lightning], and Materia de testamento, 1988 [Clauses from a Will]. His basic themes are eroticism, freedom, death and mystery, the cryptic and the conspicuous. Other outstanding poets of this generation include Humberto Díaz Casanueva (1906–92), whose works include the exceptional Requiem (1945), La estatua de sal, 1947 [The Salt Statue], Los penitenciales [Penitential] (1960) and Sol de lenguas, 1969 [The Light of Language]. He is a poet who combines poetry and erudition. The most important phenomenon of this generation is the Surrealist group Mandrágora [Mandrake] formed around 1938 by Braulio Arenas, Enrique Gómez Correa and Jorge Cáceres. They were briefly joined by Gonzalo Rojas, Humberto Díaz Casanueva and several poets of the previous generation. Among the Surrealists, Braulio Arenas (1913–88) produced the most extensive and coherent work, although in his later years he moved away from Surrealism. He was awarded the National Prize for Literature in 1984. The magazines Mandrágora, Leitmotif and his books, including El AGC de la Mandragora trace the history of the movement and help explain it. Among his most important books are Discurso del gran poder [Discourse on Might], Luz adjunta [Adjoining Light] and Poesía [Poetry].

The third avant-garde generation, the generation of 1957, was defined by ideological and political tensions and permeated by the singularly barbed and sceptical attitudes of the 1980s. Among its leading and diverse representatives are Enrique Lihn (1929–88), Miguel Arteche (1926-) and Armando Uribe Arce (1933-). Lihn was a poet, novelist and playwright, whose poetic works are the most worthy of recognition. His poetry proclaims the precedence of the written language over the spoken, we speak as we write, but paradoxically seeks to show the domination of the printed word over our literary practices. La pieza oscura, 1963 [The Dark Room], La musiquilla de las pobres esferas, 1969 [A Little Music from the Lower Spheres], Paris, situación irregula 1977 [Paris, an Unusual Situation], Diario de muerte, 1989 [Diary of Death], display highly individual features marked by irony, disillusion, and self-conscious criticism of his own poetry. Miguel Arteche represents a totally different outlook with the biblical and religious references of his tormented view of the world, reminiscent of Quevedo, and the curious nature of his visions. His most striking works are Destierros y tinieblas, 1963 [Exile and Twilight], Otro continente, 1957 [Another Continent], Quince poemas, 1961 [Fifteen Poems], Noches, 1976 [Nights] and Fénix de madrugada, 1994 [Dawn Phoenix]. Last, Armando Uribe Arce has produced only a few books of short, humorous and ironic poems: Los obstáculos, 1960 [Obstacles], No hay lugar, 1971 [There is No Room], Por ser vos quien sois, 1989 [Since You Are Who You Are]. Other notable poets of the period are Luis Oyarzún (1920–72) and Ludwig Zeller (1927–).

With the relaxation of political and ideological tension, a new period began around 1980, rejecting the affectation and detachment of the pre-avant-garde poets. The generation of 1972 includes Jorge Teillier (1935–), Oscar Hahn (1938–), Manuel Silva Acevedo (1942–), Juan Luis Martínez (1943–93), Waldo Rojas (1943–) Gonzalo Millán (1947–) and Rodrigo Lira (1949–81). Teillier is one of several important “poets of the hearth” or “poets of provincial settings,” using a muted rhetoric and straightforward subjects. Some of their output was to be affected by exile, worldly experience and scepticism. Others are dissidents such as Martínez, Rodrigo Lira Gonzalo Millán, whose work is characterized by the confluence of different cultural and artistic forms.

Numbering among the outstanding representatives of the current generation of 1987 is Raúl Zurita (1951–), whose work is the most extensive, most widely recognized and translated. He is the author of Anteparaiso, 1982 [Antiparadise], Purgatorio, 1979 [Purgatory], Canto a su amor desaparecido, 1985 [Song to a Lost Love], El amor de Chile [The Love of Chile] and Vida nueva, 1994 [New Life]. Another notable poet is Diego Maquieira (1951–), author of La Tirana, 1983 [The Tyrant] and Los Sea-Harrier, 1993 [Sea Harriers].

Poetry written by women is a growing phenomenon. The unsurpassed works of Gabriela Mistral are the most distinguished expression of feminine poetry, defying categorization. Other women poets include María Monvel, Teresa Wilms Montt, Winett de Rokha (1895–1951) and Marta Brunet (1897–1967) who in her Aleluyas para los más chiquitos [Alleluias for the Very Young] tackles the difficult genre of children’s poetry, similar to the Mistralian “jugarretas” (nursery rhymes). There are many other women poets among whom Delia Domínguez (1931–), Sara Vial (1931–) a Cruchaga (1931–) stand out.

Popular poetry presents the exceptional case of the living voice of folk tradition which inspires the widely published works of Violeta Parra (1917–67), including Violeta, Décimas [Ten-line stanzas], Veintiuno son los dolores [Twenty-one Forms of Pain], Virtud de los elementos [The Virtue of the Elements] and others included in numerous anthologies. Apart from the popular poetry tracked down in towns and villages, and brought to a wide audience by Violeta Parra and her brother Roberto, others, such as Julio Vicuña Cifuentes, Raquel Barros, Manuel Dannemann and Inés Dolz, have guaranteed the survival of folk ballads, while the popular poetry of soldiers, religious festivals and songs celebrating the human and the divine, have been collected by Juan Uribe Echevarría.

A new phenomenon is ethnic poetry and literature. Indigenous poetry, that is, poetry written by Araucanian Indians in Spanish or Mapudungún and sometimes published in a bilingual version. This new trend is represented by Elicura Chihuailaf (1958-) in En el país de la memoria, 1988 [In the Land of Memory] and the youthful Leonel Lienlaf (1970–) with his Se ha despertado el ave de mi corazón, 1989 [The Bird in My Heart Has Awakened]. Another variation is poetry written in Spanish by descendants of the colonialists using Araucanian words and phrases, as in Karra Maw’n (1984) by Cieemente Riedman (1953).

The contemporary novel shows how this genre has been transformed by narrative subjectivity, new levels of reality, selfexamination and strange allegories and allusions illuminating new contexts. Manuel Rojas (1896–1973) was the first to use a subjective narrative position in an early novel Lanchas en la bahía, 1932 [Boats in the Bay]. The novel was innovative in taking as its subject the common people, the marginal world of the outcast, and the development of the protagonist in the midst of desperate conditions. The same applies to his fourpart cycle Hijo de ladrón, 1951 (Born Guilty), Mejor que el vino, 1964 [Better than Wine], and his last novel La oscura vida radiante, 1971 [A Life of Darkness and Light]. Hijo de ladrón is the finest, and is undeniably among the most distinguished of all Spanish American novels. Its autobiographical story, its narrative style and technique display considerable originality. La oscura vida radiante invokes the political situation of 1920, and describes political agitation with an ideological fervour not previously seen in his work Punta de rieles, 1960 [Where the Rails Cross], is an innovative novel in the form of a conversation in which two characters exchange the intimate details of their personal lives and a double play on words both spoken and undisclosed. Rojas was also one of the more important writers of short stories, striking for their anecdotal and emotive style rather than for any other narrative virtue. Of the novels of Benjamí n Subercasea ux (1902–7 which include Daniel, Rahab and Jemmy Button, the last is his most ambitious. It tells of the voyage aboard the “Beagle,” of Captain FitzRoy, who rounds up a group of Yaghan Indians and takes them to the Royal Court of England. Having been educated there, they return to their homeland where they integrate fully and forget all about their European training. It is a culturally and ethnically diverse, anthropologically pessimistic novel. The novels of Juan Marín (1900–63) Viento negro, 1944 [Black Wind] and Paralelo 53 Sur [Parallel 53 South] were denied recognition when first published, because of the denunciation of the exploitation in the coal mines in the former, and criticism of international interests in the Chilean petrochemical industry in the latter. Other notable novelists of this generation are Salvador Reyes (1899–1970) and Carlos Sepúlveda Leyton (1894–1944), author of Hijuna, 1934 [Bastard], La fábrica, 1935 [The Factory] and Camarada, 1938 [Comrade]. The most prominent woman writer of the period is Marta Brunet (1897–1967), author of Montana adentro, 1923 [Into the Mountain], Humo hacia el sur, 1946 [Smoke in the South], María Nadie, 1957 [Maria Nobody], Amasijo, 1962 [Hotchpotch], and among other works, two volumes of short stories, La mampara, 1946 [The Screen] and Raíz del sueño, 1949 [Root of Sleep]. The main theme of her work is the role and experience of women. Another important writer is Alberto Romero (1896–1981), best remembered for his novel La viuda del conventillo, 1930 [The Widow from the Slums].
Among the leading novelists of the 1942 generation are Carlos Droguett (1912–), María Luisa Bombal (1910–80) and Nicomedes Guzmán (1914–64). Droguett’s novels include Los asesinados del Seguro Obrero, 1940 [Murders at the Dole Office] and his more elaborate version, Sesenta muertos en la escalera, 1940 [Sixty Corpses on the Staircase] (1940), Eloy (1960), El compadre, 1967 [The Buddy], Patas de perro [Dog’s Paws] (1965), Todas esas muertes, 1971 [So Many Deaths] and El hombre que trasladaba ciudades [The Man Who Moved Cities]. His novels of colonial times Supay el cristiano, 1967 [Supay the Christian] and Cien gotas de sangre, 1961 [One Hundred Drops of Blood] complete his obsessive and self-imposed task of portraying Chile’s bloody history. His most notable successes are Eloy and El compadre. The first is the story of a murderer at bay in the mountains, while the second records popular dismay at the death of the President, a character modelled on Pedro Aguirre Cerda. One of the leading Spanish American storytellers is María Luisa Bombal, author of La última niebla (The House of Mist), La amortajada (The Shrouded Woman) and La historia de María Griselda [The Story of María Griselda], and a handful of other masterly short stories available in collections. All are stories of women forlornly defending their identity and their right to genuine love. Representing a distinctly Chilean version of Neorealism, a modified version of Socialist Realism, Nicomedes Guzmán (1914–64), a writer of working-class origins, produced novels based on his personal experiences, such as Los hombres osuros, 1939 [Men of Darkness], La sangre y la esperanza, 1943 [Blood and Hope] and La luz viene del mar, 1951 [The Light Comes from the Sea]. Another remarkable figure is that of Juan Godoy (1911–81), author of Angurrientos, 1940 [The Greedy], La cifra solitaria, 1945 [The Solitary Number] and Sangre de murciélago, 1959 [Bat’s Blood]. Oscar Castro, Daniel Belmat, Francisco Coloane, Reinaldo Lomboy and Volodia Teitelboim are important novelists of the period. This generation’s short stories were inspired by Surrealism and by the debate surrounding new writing in Chile, in which Braulio Arenas, Droguett and Miguel Serrano participated. The leading short story writers are María Luisa Bombal, whose work includes the masterly story “El árbol” (The Tree), and Oscar Castro.

The generation of 1957 began to publish in 1950, but the latter date gave the group its name. Their most important member and Chile’s outstanding contemporary writer is José Donoso. His works include Coronación, 1957 (Coronation), El obsceno pájaro de la noche, 1970 (The Obscene Bird of Night), Casa de campo (A House in the Country) and La desesperanza (Curfew). His most recent novel, the first in ten years, is Donde van a morir los elefantes, 1995 [The Elephants’ Graveyard] which mingles humour, disillusion and metanarrative. Donoso’s El lugar sin límites (Hell Has No Limits), Este Domingo (This Sunday), El jardín de al lado (The Garden Next Door) and La misteriosa desaparición de la condesita de Loria [The Mysterious Disappearance of the Young Countess of Loria], are novels of sexuality, disaffection and exile, whose influences include that of the erotic novel. He has also written several novellas and collections of short stories, as well as Historia personal del Boom (The “Boom” in Spanish American Literature: a Personal History), an ingenious exercise in literary history. Jorge Edwards is the author of Los convidados de piedra [The Stone Guests], which alludes to recent political events in Chile, El museo de cera [The Wax Museum] and La mujer imaginaria [The Imaginary Woman]. He has also produced Cuentos completos [Complete Short Stories], collected in several volumes. The small output of Jorge Guzmán (1930–), author of Job-Boj (1968) and Ay Mama Inés, 1963 [Oh, Mother Inés], is of exceptional quality. Job-Boj tells two interwoven and contrasting stories of people in different situations, and Ay Mama Inés is an example of the new Latin American historical novel, conforming to the evolution of the genre and telling the story of Inés Suárez, mistress of Pedro de Valdivia, conqueror of Chile. Other outstanding writers of this generation are Enrique Lafourcade (1927–), Guillermo Blanco (1926–), and Hugo Correa (1926–), who specializes in science fiction. Margarita Aguirre and Mercedes Valdivieso (1925–93) are the leading women writers of the generation.

The present period, which began in about 1980 is already far removed from the activities of the avant-garde and the confrontation between left and right that typified their youth. Three generations can be distinguished, already dissolved in the spirit of the postmodern. Among the outstanding representatives of the generation of 1972 is Antonio Skármeta (1940–), a skilful storyteller whose works include Desnudo en el tejado [Naked on the Roof], Novios y solitarios [Couples and Singles], Tiro libre [Fire at Will], and novels with resonances in actual events, such as Soñé que la nieve ardía (I Dreamt the Snow was Burning), about Allende’s last days in Chile, La Insurrección (The Insurrection), dealing with the time leading up to the Sandinista Revolution in Nicaragua, and Match Ball, a parody of sports reporting and tabloid journalism, set in the world of international tennis. The novels of Mauricio Wacquez (1939–) explore the realm of sexuality. They include Frente a un hombre armado, 1981 [Face to Face with a Gunman], Paréntesis, 1982 [Parenthesis], and Ella, o El sueño de nadie, 1983 [She, or The Dream of Nobody]. Cristián Hunneus (1937–85), was the author of Cuento de cámara [Chamber Stories], La casa de Algarrobo [The House of Algarrobo] and the novels El cuarto de los niños, 1980 [The Children’s Room]. The last is an account of childhood unfolding predominantly as a metanarrative commentary, and El verano del ganadero, 1983 [The Summer of the Rancher], an erotic novel narrated by the central character, Gaspar Ruiz, a device distancing the narrative from the controlling hand of the real author. Other novelists of this generation include Carlos Morand (1936–), José Luis Rosasco (1935–), Poli Délano (1936–), Patricio Manns (1937–), and Francisco Simon Rivas (1943–). Among the younger members of the group, Luis Sepúlveda (1949–), author of the novels Un viejo que leía novelas de amor, 1992 [An Old Man Who Read Romantic Novels] (1992) and Nombre de torero, 1994 [Name of a Bullfighter], has succeeded in interpreting the literary concerns of the new society. He projects an ecological vision defending cultural and ethnic differences against the violence of society and the powers that be, while writing a well-told story. This period has brought to the fore a large number of women writers, who have assertively established a new and different literary environment. Isabel Allende (1942–), Diamela Eltit (1949–) and Ana Maria del Río (1948–) form an exceptional group of novelists who have elevated the status of women in 20th-century literature. With La casa de los espíritus (The House of the Spirits), Isabel Allende has reached a wide audience and her fame has increased even further with the translation of the novel into several languages. Eva Luna, 1987, El plan infinito, 1991 [The Infinite Plan] and Paula (1994) clearly draw on the territory explored in her first novel. Diamela Eltít’s publications begin with a series of anti-novels on marginal subjects, unlike those usually forming the basis of the novel. These include Por la patria, 1986 [In the Name of the Fatherland] and Lumpérica, 1983 [Lumpen/America]. Among her later novels is Vaca sagrada, 1991 (Sacred Cow), where she modifies her strategies, turning to the ideology of the body and the act of writing, producing a novel of eroticism stained by the blood of woman. Los vigilantes, 1994 [The Vigilantes], is a monodic novel in the form of letters, a feminist allegory in a unique setting. Ana María del Río, is a novelist and short story writer, author of De golpe, Amalia en el umbral, 1991 [Suddenly, Amalia is on the Doorstep]. In her feminist novel Siete días de la señora K, 1992 [Seven Days in the Life of Mrs K], she attempts to revive women’s experience of discovering their bodies and autoeroticism, tempered by the disillusion with such experience taken from the work of María Luisa Bombal. In general terms, this is her most accomplished work. Her latest novel is Tiempo que ladra, 1994 [Barking Time].

The present generation (that of 1987) comprises novelists born between 1950 and 1964 who are just beginning to achieve prominence. They include Gonzalo Contreras (1958-), author of La ciudad lejana [The Distant City], Arturo Fontaine (1952-), author of Oír su voz, 1992 [To Hear His/Her Voice], Marcela Serrano (1951-) and Pía Barros (1956-), the most skilled and aggressive of the feminist writers with her El tono menor del deseo, 1991 [Desire in a Minor Key]. Alberto Fuguet (1964-) emerges as the most innovative figure in his short stories and novels Mala onda (1991) and Por favor, rebobinar, 1994 [Rewind, Please].

Reportage-style literature, arising from political events in Chile between 1973 and 1985, deals with international politics, internal repression and exile. The most important works of this kind are Tejas Verdes (Tejas Verdes), by Hernán Valdés, and Jorge Edwards’s Persona non grata. Ethnic literature, focusing on indigenous cultures, includes La reina de RapaNui [The Queen of Rapa-Nui], by Pedro Prado, about the Easter Islanders, and Ranquil (1942), by Reynaldo Lomboy (1910–74), the story of a massacre of Indians during colonial expansion. El vado de la noche, 1955 [The Night Ford] by Lautori Yankas (1902–), and other works of lesser significance, deal with different periods in the history and aspects of the lives of Chile’s indigenous Araucanian Indians. This period has also seen the emergence of a number of works revealing the spirit of the descendants of the frontiersmen of long ago. Collectively, these have come to be known as the literature of “bad conscience” or “guilty conscience.” Patricio Manns (1937–) and Luis Vulliamy are the leading exponents of this tendency. Another aspect of ethnic literature is that collected by Rodolfo Lenz in his Estudios araucanos [Araucanian Studies], and more recently in Cuentos mapuches de Chile, 1987 [Mapuche Tales from Chile], stories told orally in Spanish, and carefully compiled by the great folklorist Yolando Pino Saavedra, as part of his extensive research into the Chilean folk tale.

Further Reading

Concha, Jaime, Poesía chilena, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Quimantú, 1973

———, La novela chilena del último siglo, Santiago de Chile: Editorial La Noria, 1993

Bibliographies

Muñoz González, Luis, Diccionario de movimientos y grupos literarios chilenos, Concepción, Chile: Universidad de Concepción, 1993

Special Issues of Journals

Review: Latin American Literature and Arts, vol. 49 (Fall 1994)

Revista Iberoamericana 168–69 (July-December 1994) [On 20th-century Chilean literature]

Antonio Cisneros 1942–

Peruvian poet

Antonio Cisneros is a member of an influential generation of Latin American poets that began publishing their first collection of poems in the 1960s. What brings these poets together to constitute a generation is the belief that writers must embrace the moral imperative of being truthful and of engaging with their reality; therefore, they must insist on saying what needs to be said rather than what it is possible to say within the constraints of poetic writing. In Cisneros’s preface to his anthological Poesía, una historia de locos [Poetry, a History of the Mad], the writer’s ideal should be to say what one wishes to express and not simply what it is acceptable to say. He is addressing one of the principles which defined the new poetic practice of his generation.

Cisneros is one of the most important voices of the “Sixties Generation.” His poetry is iconoclastic, acerbic, highly critical of his cultural heritage, and up to a point, quite contemptuous of Latin American reality. His is a strident version of conversational poetry, keenly observant of the injustice of traditional social demarcations, which he denounces fiercely. One of his main concerns is the Peruvian national experience, a theme that dominates Comentarios reales de Antonio Cisneros, 1964 [Royal Commentaries of Antonio Cisneros], his third book of poems, and the first widely acclaimed work by him to introduce a new poetic expression and a new narrative tone. It is uncommon for a book of poems to receive such a national broad-based acclaim as this volume did in Peru. The collection reviews the history of Peru backwards, or in Cisneros’ words, a Brechtian vision of history, meaning that history is here told from the viewpoint of the common people, thus superseding the perspective of the national heroes and monuments erected to commemorate them. This early work speaks accurately to the historical decade of the 1960s in Peru, when guerilla uprisings in the Sierra region, and in Ayacucho in particular, had been defeated. Cisneros, although sceptical of Socialist Realism’s worth, had fewer reservations about the political convictions that provoked it. Thus he joined the second phase of the political uprising in the Ayacucho area, in a gesture similar to other Peruvian intellectuals of his generation. It should be remembered that the decade of the 1960s, marked as it was by the Cuban Revolution of 1959 and of its leader, Fidel Castro, was crucial in the development of many Latin American artists and writers, one of the reasons for grouping them within a generation. The other book of poems that is connected to this concern is Crónica del Niño Jesús de Chilca, 1981 [Chronicle of the Child Jesus of Chilca]. This volume’s central theme is also historical; this time it centres on a community of coastal Peru, 100 kilometres outside Lima, which shares the same linguistic features of Cisneros, according to the poet’s description. Whereas his Comentarios reales, is a chronicle in dialogue with the idea of Spanish chronicles of the Conquest of America, in Crónica del Niño Jesús de Chilca he assumes an anthropological approach. This applies in the sense that the poet replicates the social sciences’ methodology of interviewing informants whose testimony is transcribed, imitating their linguistic idiosyncrasies. These poems chronicle the birth, existence and impending death of the Niño Jesús de Chilca religious community, and the disappearance of a way of life in the area. Both of these books, set apart as they are by almost twenty years, reflect Cisneros’ concerns with Peruvian sociopolitical reality.

In between these two major books, Cisneros wrote four volumes of poetry whose titles reflect considerable change in tone and theme as this poetry is informed by new experiences and new perception of unencountered realities. Canto ceremonial contra un oso hormiguero, 1968 [Ceremonial Song against an Anteater], displays the aesthetics of the “Sixties Generation,” in that it exposes a very vital and critical Latin American perspective of Western culture, written after the poet made his first trip outside of Peru for an extended visit to England, where he arrived on board a cargo ship. His first encounter with European culture and the confrontation with it is what nurtures this volume of well crafted poems. Cisneros considers this collection of poems the first set in which he felt free to speak of themes not addressed before—such as speaking freely of Peru as well as of England, of highly personal themes as well as of his cultural background—all conceived within a new poetic language. Cisneros considers this period of his life quite important for himself as well as for the world. He was attempting to reinvent a rigid and death-bound Leftist political movement by addressing a range of liberatory movements: feminism, free love, communitarianism, and other heterodoxies that arose during the 1960s together with the outrageousness of popular English rock artists like The Beatles, The Rolling Stones or Bob Dylan in the United States. Agua que no has de beber [Water You Will Not Drink] and Como higuera en un campo de golf [Like a Fig Tree on a Golf Course], construct a dramatic personal mythology, the former, in a sense, anticipating the latter. Cisneros regards both as pushing too far into the construction of an individualistic poetry that he describes as “Anglo-Saxon and French permissiveness” because of what this phrase connotes about solidarity and the individual. El Libro de Dios y de los húngaros, 1978 [The Book of God and of the Hungarians] marks another dramatic change of pace and theme in Cisneros’s poetic evolution. This collection of poems is constructed with political, religious, and travel material, whose poetic voice reveals great fragility as well as great maturity. It is a striking volume in that the reader witnesses the reconversion of the poetic voice—and of the poet Cisneros himself—to Christianity, a development in Cisneros’s trajectory of a quite unusual nature. However, this dramatic turn of events is a part of the significant shifts that constitute the imprint of this outstanding Peruvian poet. This volume took by surprise both Cisneros’s associates in the Left, and those in the political right, another feature of Cisneros’s character as a writer and as an individual. Monólogo de la casta Susana, 1986 [Chaste Susan’s Monologue], also articulates the profound belief in God which, as the poet himself has pointed out, began in his second book of poems David (1962). Recently, Eduardo Urdanivía Bertarelli has studied this important element in Cisneros’s most recent poetry. The poetry of Antonio Cisneros will continue to evolve as it has in the past twenty years, and it will continue to challenge the use and articulation of poetic language in Spanish American literature. This poet bears the mark of a great writer.

MAGDALENA GARCÍA PINTO

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry

Destrero, Lima: Cuadernos del Hontanar, 1961
David, Lima: El Timonel, 1962
Comentarios reales, Lima: La Rama Florida/Universitaria, 1964
Canto ceremonial contra un oso hormiguero, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1968
Agua que no has de beber, Barcelona: Milla Batres, 1971
Cómo higuera en un campo de golf, Lima: Instituto Nacional de Cultura, 1972
El libro de Dios y los húngaros, Lima: Libre-I, 1978
Monólogo de la casta Susana y otros poemas, Lima: Instituto Nacional de Cultura, 1986
El arte de envolver pescado, Lima: Caballo Rojo, 1990
Las inmensas preguntas celestes, Lima: Campodónico, 1992,
Other Writings

Compilations and Anthologies
The Spider Hangs Too Far from the Ground, translated by Maureen Ahern, William Rowe and David Tipton, London: Cape Goliard, 1970 [Contains poems from several collections]
Land of Angels, translated by Maureen Ahern, William Rowe and David Tipton, Portree, Isle of Skye: Aquila, 1985

Further Reading
Higgins, James, Hitos de la poesía peruana siglo XX, Lima: Milla Batres, 1993 [Chapter 4 has a section on Cisneros] Urdanivia Bertarelli, Eduardo,”…y blanquearé más que la nieve. Poesía y experiencia de fe en la obra de Antonio Cisneros,” Revista de Crítica Literaria Latinoamericana, vol. 18/35 (1992)

Interviews

Special Issues of Journals

Civilization and Barbarism

This traditional dichotomy was made prominent in Latin America with the publication of Domingo Faustino Sarmiento’s monumental work Civilización y barbarie: vida de Juan Facundo Quiroga, 1845 (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants). It became the key concept in all evaluation and self-evaluation of Latin America, the principal metaphor through which its reality was perceived and conveyed. Eventually the referents of each of the terms changed, but the dual and oppositional formula remained constant. The origins of the terms are interesting to note: civilization harks back to its Greek meaning of city whereas barbarism, also Greek in origin, was simply the way the Greeks referred to those whose language was not Greek and pronounced Greek badly. By the time these terms came to be used by Sarmiento they had become clearly hierarchical: the worst and the best stages in the evolution of nations. But Sarmiento simply highlighted and adapted a trope that had prevailed in connection with America from the time of the conquest, and even before, when the constricted imagination of medieval Europe had felt the need for an idealised Other against which to measure itself. This took the form of both an Utopia that would serve to show up Europe’s own imperfections, and its opposite, a place of savagery which would allow it to exult in its own superiority. Recent studies of the first writings about the newly discovered continent reveal a carefully constructed text to reflect this dual position. For instance, in his letters, Columbus simultaneously enthuses over the beauty, docility and good-nature of the natives he has come upon (as if to fulfill expectations of having reached the Indies), whilst at the same time warning against the natives’ lack of disciplined behaviour and barbaric cannibalistic practices (in justification of conquest and colonization). But under colonialism, it is almost exclusively the latter image of barbarism that is made to predominate, the indigenous population demonized and their cultures ignored or erased. At best, the attitude was of America as a tabula rasa awaiting the imprint of civilization. Only some lone voices, such as Bartolomé de Las Casas pointed out that barbarism was a subjective criterion, dependant upon the speaker’s position.

Antoniello Gerbi, in his La disputa del Nuevo Mundo, 1960 [The Dispute of the New World] traces the continuously Eurocentric debate concerning the New World, highlighting the uninterrupted flow of theories on the inferiority of America, from Buffon’s assertion that America is a more recent and still immature continent where animals fail to reach their full growth potential, to Cornelius De Pauw’s view that things degenerate in America’s unhealthy climate and Hegel’s unflinching acceptance of these ideas. These became foundational beliefs, later developed by theories of environmental and biological determinism which, together with the racial pyramid of Positivist thought, were the philosophical ideas that exerted the greatest influence in the political thought of post-independence American states.

From Mexico to Argentina, the dynamics of history were seen as a conflict between native barbarism and cosmopolitan civilization. Sarmiento, in Facundo, declared that these key terms were transitional, adding that since barbarism was the earlier one, it would be eradicated by the inevitable forward march of progress. The conditions most conducive to barbarism were those of life on the pampas, where the extension of the territory and its rigours made human communication difficult if not impossible, and allowed for the rule of brute force by the local petty tyrants, the caudillos. It was a primitive, retrograde way of life which had become a stumbling block in the development of the nation. Hispanic colonial rule, with its insistence on traditional, conservative values and blind authoritarianism, had done little to alter this basic picture but was now seen to provide a stepping stone to a more progressive system, a civilization based upon the European model. Sarmiento’s ideal civilization was that of the industrialized Anglo-Saxon countries of northern Europe, their chief virtues being their democratically elected government and their liberal laissez-faire policies. Reason, order, system, strategy are some of the key words that describe civilization; another is cosmopolitanism with a decidedly European bent. Literary critics have often pointed out that Facundo’s narrative style does not support the clear-cut division of the political message arguing that the romantic exuberance of Sarmiento’s prose betrayed an ambivalence in his position. There is much truth in this concerning the artist’s aesthetic sensibility, but little as regards the politician. Sarmiento’s ruthless political programme was, at the time of writing Facundo, unequivocal: he advocated massive immigration, preferably from the industrialised countries of northern Europe in order to “whiten the desert” and bring Argentina nearer to the coveted way of life which he termed “civilization.” The first step to achieve this was to be the wholesale extermination of the gauchos and their way of life, or, at best, their absorption into the new order. (He was to reverse his ideas once his desired policies were put into execution.) José Hernández, in his epic poem in two parts, Martin Fierro (1872 and 1879), depicts this extermination, but in his version barbarism is imposed upon the gaucho by the policies of a centralized government whose methods are corruption, treachery and forcible conscription. Barbarism is also depicted as the natural condition of the Indians who have become the new cultural underdogs.

The most famous fictionalised attempt to dramatise the conflict between the dual forces of civilization and barbarism is found in Doña Bárbara (1928) by Rómulo Gallegos. In this novel, nature, represented in its unbridled barbarism by the eponymous heroine, is defeated by the forces of enlightenment and the promise of a new dawn (her rival and victor is called Santos Luzardo, luz being the Spanish for “light”).

Sarmiento’s ideas, though continuing to be influential throughout the sub-continent, were beginning to be questioned in the face of events once they had become implemented. The Cuban José Martí, at first an admirer of Sarmiento, moved the debate surrounding civilization and barbarism on to a moral plane. Taking the US as an example of a nation that followed the path of “civilization,” he suggested that whilst the economic and political advances of industrialising countries such as the US were undisputed, Latin America had other, more valuable spiritual assets which it ought not to betray. Arguing against the crude importation of ideas from Europe and the US, Martí wrote in his essay “Nuestra America” (Our America) of 1891: “No hay batalla entre la civilización y la barbarie, sino entre la falsa erudición y la naturaleza.” (It is not a question of a battle between civilization and barbarism, but between false learning and Nature). These sentiments were echoed by the Uruguayan José Enrique Rodó, whose essay Ariel inspired a new generation with a measure of pride in their Latin American cultural heritage.

In the first decades of the 20th century, when the advantages of this new American promise had already begun to disappoint, the debate evolved around the problems attendant upon the encroachment of Modernism. A new aesthetic flourished in the literary movement called criollismo (creolism), which spread across the sub-continent this time aligning wisdom with a mythical past golden age in which those who had previously been held to be barbarians became the new repositories of civilization.

In Ricardo Güiraldes’s Bildungsroman Don Segundo Sombra (1926), a complete volte face has taken place, with the eponymous gaucho becoming the highest exponent of civilization. As a result of the vertiginous growth of the city, the rural countryside has once again become the seat of “true” civilization, and gaucho life is presented as one of seamless physical and spiritual harmony.

Sylvia Molloy, in her study of autobiography, At Face Value (1991), draws parallels between Sarmiento and the Mexican José Vasconcelos. For the latter, barbarism equalled ignorance which he and his party as self-appointed educators of the nation sought to eradicate. The polarized forces of nativism or indigenismo and universalism became the conflicting forces in a search for national identity.

In recent years, feminists have adapted Sarmiento’s worn terminology to the situation of women in Latin America. The most important study on these lines is Francine Masiello’s Between Civilization and Barbarism: Women, Nation and Literary Culture in Modern Argentina (1992), an exploration of the positioning of women in the changing cultural constructions of the nation. Masiello’s revisionist reading suggests the “collapse of these false dichotomies.” The construction of women, either as the civilizing influence of the homemaker and thus supporter of the patriarchal state, or as feared exponent of barbarism, irrational and anarchic creatures threatening the nation’s stability finds little support in the extensive documentation of women’s writing of the last hundred years. These reveal, instead a more fluid cultural history in which the distinctions of the official binary account are constantly blurred.

The opposition between civilization and barbarism reappears in Borges’s “Poema conjetural” [Conjectural Poem] as stages in the discovery and acceptance of one’s inner destiny. In Out of Context (1993), Daniel Balderston expands upon this idea in his penetrating reading of Borges’s story “Historia del guerrero y de la cautiva” (Story of the Warrior and the Captive) in which he examines the strongly contested connotations of civilization and barbarism and its wide historical context. Even when emptied of its traditional values, the dualism of the trope continues to attract writers and critics as a powerful metaphor to express the contradictions of Latin America.

EVELYN FISHBURN

See also entries on Doña Bárbara (Rómulo Gallegos), Don Segundo Sombra (Ricardo Güiraldes)

Further Reading

Lojo de Beuter, María Rosa, La “barbarie” en la narrativa argentina (siglo XIX), Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1994

Colombia

19th-and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

Until the publication of Gabriel García Márquez’s Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude) in 1967, the history of Colombian literature was dominated by the development of five distinct historical and cultural traditions: the Caribbean coast, Greater Antioquia, the Cundinamarca-Boyaca Highlands, Greater Tolima and the Western Valley. Geographical barriers contributed to this development of regional literatures associated with ideological constants related to each region’s cultural and socioeconomic history. Instead of considering Colombian literature as a continuous and cohesive development within a global, national literary tradition characterized by successive and distinct literary movements, the country’s regional literary evolution has tended to emphasize separate traditions and individual writers and/or works produced within each region. For example, within the Greater Antioquia region, the novelist Tomás Carrasquilla, produced Realist and costumbrista fiction in considerable quantity between 1896 and 1935. In the Greater Valley the most important work has long been considered Jorge Isaacs’s María (1867). In the Greater Tolima region, which has been closely associated with the Cundinamarca-Boyaca Highlands, José Eustasio Rivera’s novel, La vorágine, 1924 (The Vortex), considered a classic novel of Colombian literature, belongs to the elitist, writing culture which has dominated much of the country’s literary traditions and history until the 1970s.

When García Márquez’s Cien años de soledad appeared in 1967, it marked a decisive turning point in Colombian and Latin American literature. In a sense, the novel turned the whole idea of regionalism inside out by situating the story of the Buendía clan in the remote town of Macondo which has since acquired mythic proportions. Suddenly, the marginocentric displaced the traditional centers of literary dominance, and the Caribbean coastal region, which had long been isolated geographically and culturally from the interior throughout much of Colombia’s history, assumed a new literary prominence. Cien años’s transcendent regionalism not only enabled the coastal literature to participate in a more national and international tradition, but it also initiated a re-evaluation of Colombian literary traditions.

With the Declaration of Independence in 1810 and complete independence from Spain in 1824, political power passed from the Spanish to the national aristocracy and military leaders. Both of these groups were of creole origin, that is, citizens of Spanish descent. ... who were born in New Granada. These leaders often occupied second-tier political military posts in the Spanish colonial system, so they frequently lacked the governing experience necessary to ensure a smooth transition from colonialism to independence. In Colombia the political battle lines were quickly drawn between the Liberals and the Conservatives, each of which had diametrically opposed political agendas. The Liberals advocated regional autonomy, reduced power for the Catholic Church, and free international commerce. Conservatives, many of whom belonged to the landed aristocracy, favored a strong central government and church, on which their political power and wealth directly depended.

The 19th century witnessed the rise of many charismatic caudillos, or strongmen (see entry on Caudillismo and Dictatorship), whose lack of political experience and leadership helped fuel the numerous bloody civil wars which ravaged not only Colombia but many of the fledgling independent countries of Latin America. The Liberal/Conservative paradigm, under many different names, has dominated much of Colombian and Latin American history up to the present day. In Colombia, two of the most internecine conflicts were The Thousand Days War (1899–1901) and the period designated as la Violencia (The Violence), 1948 to 1965, during which an undeclared civil war claimed the lives of some 2,00,000 to 300,000 people. Since most of the violence took place in the countryside, Colombia experienced a tremendous emigration to the cities. This period also profoundly marked literary production, giving rise to what some have called the Novela de la Violencia (the Novel of Violence).

Even after the establishment of the Frente Nacional (National Front) in 1958, a bipartisan agreement between the Liberals and Conservatives to alternate in political power for four years during sixteen years to restore order and peace and create a controlled democracy, the powerbrokers remained the same. The goals of the successive governments were the pacification of the country, economic development, political stability and unification of the country. The Cuban Revolution of 1959 helped spawn the formation of guerrilla movements in Colombia, the most important of which are Las Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia (The Armed Revolutionary Forces of Colombia), El Ejército de Liberación Nacional (The National Liberation Army) and M-19 which disbanded in the late 1980s. The other recent significant development in Colombia is the creation of drug cartels in the 1980s, the most notable of which are the Medellín and Cali cartels. While the Colombian government was finally able to destroy the Medellín cartel after waging a bloody and costly war, the Cali cartel continues to function along with many other microcartels which grow, process and export cocaine and, more recently, heroin. While the guerillas and the drug barons talk of peace and surrender with successive Colombian governments, their sophisticated organization in cells and extensive networks enable them to reap enormous illicit profits.

This sociopolitical situation creates enormous distortions in Colombian society and its economy and it adversely affects the development of literature beyond regional boundaries. Gabriel García Márquez, in spite of his international status, is still considered by Colombians a costeño writer, that is, a writer from the Caribbean coast. Indeed, of all the regions of Colombia, the coastal region stands in sharpest contrast to the interior, which usually refers to the highlands region of which Bogotá is the center. Unlike the highlands region, which represented the repository of traditional Hispanic traditions and values (Bogotá traditionally portrayed itself as the “Athens of Latin America”) and where writing and political power were the most closely wedded, the Caribbean coast, with its oral traditions, heterogeneous cultures, African influence, its more radical geographical isolation, tropical climate and proximity to the ocean, has developed distinct literary traditions.

Two famous costeño poets, Candelario Obeso (1849–84) and Luis Carlos López (1883–1950), incorporated popular language and themes into their poetry. Obeso was the first Colombian poet to attempt to write authentic African-American poetry by using everyday language and colloquial expressions. His one published book of poetry, Cantos populares de mi tierra, 1877 [Popular Songs of My Land], employs colloquial language and speech patterns which contrast with the prevailing literary language of the Hispanic Romantic poetry of the period. Luis Carlos López, who came from Cartagena, incorporated local customs, traditions and language into his poetry. He also introduced another dominant costeño cultural element into his poetry—humor—which not only permeates coastal literary traditions but constitutes one of the hallmarks of the coastal region’s most famous writer, Gabriel García Márquez.

In spite of these and other innovations, literary production remained closely allied to the elite writing culture. Juan José Nieto (1804–66) from Cartagena, was not only a novelist but also one of Colombia’s important political and military leaders of the 19th century. Two of his novels, Ingermina, o la hija de Calamar, 1844 [Ingermina, or the Child of Calamar] and Los moriscos, 1845 [The Moors], deal successively with the conquest of the Calamar Indians and the expulsion of the Moors from Spain, both clichéd themes of official history. Nevertheless, beginning in the 1920s, new works started to appear which had little to do with the establishment. In 1927, José Felix Fuenmayor (1885–1966) published Cosme in which a character of the same name, living in Barranquilla, employs humor and irony to mock many traditional institutions. By the 1940s and 1950s writers like Álvaro Cepeda Samudio (1926–72), Héctor Rojas Herazo (b. 1921), Alfonso Fuenmayor (b. 1927) and García Márquez were expanding the horizons of Colombian literature by searching for new modes of literary expression. A group of young writers and intellectuals, which would later be called the Barranquilla Group (García Márquez, Cepeda Samudio, Fuenmayor and Germán Vargas), avidly read the works of Franz Kafka, Ernest Hemingway, William Faulkner, Virginia Woolf and others, discussed them and initiated their own writing experiments.

Two of the more important works to emerge from this group are Cepeda Samudio’s La casa grande, 1962 [The Big House] and García Márquez’s Cien años de soledad. La casa grande centers on a family during the famous massacre of the banana workers in Ciénaga in 1928. The complex narrative structure of the novel reveals the generational conflicts and the political upheaval caused by this seminal event in Colombian labor history. García Márquez’s Cien años de soledad combines and completes much of his earlier work and constitutes the totalizing novel which not only encompasses Colombian and Latin American history, but also extends into the realm of myth and timelessness. The novel, which is the chronicle of the Buendía family living in the remote town of Macondo, achieves universality by intensifying and concentrating everything in a few characters and a small fictional space. It is a totalizing novel which communicates to readers on many levels, and William Faulkner’s mentorship in this novel and other works by García Márquez has served the latter well.
Antioquia, while not as geographically isolated as the Coastal region, nevertheless remained rather underdeveloped during the colonial period and its literary traditions did not start to flourish until well after the founding of Medellín in 1616. The 18th century saw a cultural and economic upsurge under the leadership of Juan Antonio Mon y Velarde (1784–87). During the late 19th century Antioquia experienced a significant economic growth accompanied by considerable increase in its literary production.

The first major novelist, Tomás Carrasquilla (1858–1940), represents the middle-class Antioquian writer who did not belong to the elite class which had dominated Colombian literature until the 20th century. Between 1896 and 1935 Carrasquilla produced a large number of Realist and costumbrista works. His three major works are Frutos de mi tierra, 1896 [Fruits of My Land], Grandeza, 1910 [Greatness] and La marquesa de Yolombó, 1928 [The Marchioness of Yolombó]. Following the lead of the European Realist and Naturalist writers, Carrasquilla tied his description of his characters to their environment. He paid particular attention to local customs, character types, the common people and local color.

One of the most innovative figures of Antioquian literature is León de Grieff (1895–1976) who created a new poetic language in Colombian poetry. He belonged to a literary group called Los Nuevos (The New Ones) and his own exploration of avant-garde literature contributed to his new poetic language. His Libro de signos, 1930 [The Book of Signs] created new technical innovations in poetic language.

The 20th-century Antioquian novel has generally remained more traditional, and one of the most important figures is Manuel Mejía Vallejo. His best-known novel, El día señalado, 1964 [The Appointed Day], contains two narratives: a third-person account of a town and the unwanted presence of government troops, and a first-person story of personal vengeance. The main theme of the novel is la Violencia in Antioquia, and the novel succeeds in surpassing the status of a simple protest novel.

Bogotá and the highlands region have been the dominant cultural loci since the colonial period and have continued to dominate in all the literary spheres since independence. Culture has remained the most strictly Hispanic in Bogotá. In the late 19th and early 20th centuries Bogotá underwent a period of conflict, growth and the incipient phases of modernization. The combination of traditional Hispanic cultural values and the effects of modernization also dichotomized literary production into conservative and modern, experimental spheres. This region has been the center of major poetic movements in the 20th century—Los Nuevos, Piedra y Cielo, Mito and Nadaísmo—as well as the repository of important novelists such as José María Vargas Vila (1860–1933), Clímaco Soto Borda (1870–1919), Eduardo Zalamea Borda (1907–63), Tomás Vargas Osorio (1908–41) and Eduardo Caballero Calderón (b. 1910).

Costumbrismo flourished in the highlands region and José María Vergara y Vergara (1831–72) and José María Samper (1828–88) were its main exponents. 19th-century poetry was dominated by the Romantic verse of Rafael Pombo (1833–1912). Miguel Antonio Caro (1843–1909) and José Asuncion Silva (1865–96) represent opposite tendencies in poetic language at the turn of the century. While Caro’s poetic inspiration derived from classical sources, Silva drew his inspiration from Baudelaire, Verlaine, Rimbaud and other 19th-century European poets. Silva died at the age of thirtyone and his poetry was only posthumously appreciated in Colombia. During the mid-1930s the Piedra y Cielo group formed in Bogotá and its young poets began to effectuate an important renovation of Colombian poetry. Its two major figures are Eduardo Carranzas (b. 1913), who is the traditionalist, and Arturo Camacho Ramírez (b. 1910), the avantgardist. The Piedra y Cielo group concentrated on the universe of poetic metaphors, somewhat in line with the French Symbolist poet Stéphane Mallarmé who sought to create a poetic language which did not name but suggest objects or reality. Other poetic movements of the succeeding decades continued to bring innovations to Colombian poetry.

The 20th-century novel of the highland region was closely linked to the official literary language of the power elite. José María Rivas Groot (1863–1923) and José Manuel Marroquín (1856–1918) embodied the conservative values in their fiction. The thorn in the side of the Conservative political and literary hegemony was José María Vargas Vila, whose many novels and other writings openly expressed his anticlerical and antiinstitutional stance. Another contrast to the official literary language is the work of José A. Osorio Lizarazo (1900–64) whose proletarian novels coincided with the rapid industrialization of Bogota and also its worst economic crisis of the 20th century. Eduardo Zalamea Borda published Cuatro años a bordo de mí mismo, 1934 [Four Years with Myself] which chronicles the rites of passage into manhood of the narrator as he travels from the urban culture of Bogota to the coastal Guajira area. This novel contrasts the folkloric, rural traditions of the coast with the urban culture of Bogota. Eduardo Caballero Calderón exemplifies the cultural values of the elite culture in Bogota in which writing and power are indissolubly linked.

Greater Tolima, which includes the area of the Department of Huila, closely mirrors the literary traditions of the highland paradigm. The literary tradition of this region resembles the highland model. In spite of having two important cities, Ibagué and Neiva, no independent cosmopolitan center has evolved in the region. The region’s most important writer is José Eustasio Rivera (1889–1928) whose 1924 novel, La vorágine (The Vortex), has become a classic of Colombian and Latin American literature. As Raymond L. Williams points out, “the predominant subject is not a fictional world projecting a simulacrum of 1924 rural Colombia—with its vacuous women and bedraggled workers—but rather the self in the process of writing. Lacking traditional subject matter, Cova’s most fully developed and central subject is writing: its dynamism is found in the narrator’s striving for a form of written expression.” The novel is the mature expression of a writing culture whose close links to Bogota confine writing to a specific sociocultural domain.

The other event which deeply affected the Tolima region was la Violencia and Tolima was a focus point of this phenomenon during the 1950s. While many of the novels it spawned are of dubious literary value, the novel of Jorge Eliécer Pardo (b. 1945), El jardín de las Hartmann, 1978 [The Garden of the Hartmann Ladies], transcends the limits of protest literature to depict the violence in more generic terms.

The Western Valley region, centered in the Valle del Cauca, which includes Popayán to the south and the Chocó region to the north, shares the cultural heterogeneity of the Coastal region. Popayán has long been a bastion of traditional values while the Valle del Cauca, with Cali as its center, has had both the traditional aristocracy and more popular traditions. The Chocó, which was opened to mining in the 18th century, has remained isolated and sparsely populated, and is a center of African traditions. The region’s abundant resources and fertile land have brought it economic prosperity, and the region underwent a significant economic transformation during the early part of the 20th century. La Violencia also deeply affected the region and, since the 1980s, one of the most significant factors has been the rise to prominence of the Cali drug cartel. Although the poetic tradition of Western Valley has not been as strong as that of the highland region, its novelistic tradition has always been strong and independent, influenced by a combination of cultural and historical forces and by a mixture of oral and written culture.

The most important novel of the 19th century is the Romantic novel María (1867) by Jorge Isaacs (1837–95). While Isaacs’s novel is primarily the product of his involvement in the writing culture of the Western Valley, it is nevertheless a well-conceived work whose intimate connection with the natural world is sensitively portrayed. The novel’s oedipal structure, the themes of childhood and separation and the attention to sensorial images related to nature make it a more authentic rendition of many archetypal Romantic themes than certain European models which never surpass the vague and pervasive feeling of melancholy.

The creation of a literature rooted more in oral traditions has also played an important role in the Western Valley region. Its most distinguished 20th-century novelist is Gustavo Álvarez Gardeazabal (b. 1945) whose novels are deeply racinated in the history and oral traditions of the Valle del Cauca, primarily the city of Tuluá, where he has also served as mayor. His first two novels, La tara del papa, 1971 [The Pope’s Defect] and Cóndores no entierran todos los días, 1972 [Condors Don’t Bury Everyday], are squarely situated in the historical context of la Violencia of the Valle del Cauca. He draws on the oral tradition in El bazar de los idiotas, 1974 [The Idiots’ Bazaar] in which he creates humorous and critical effects by parodying a variety of languages. More recently, Álvarez Gardeazabal has started a new cycle of novels which veer away from the regional tradition. Another important writer who draws on oral sources is Andrés Caicedo (1951–77) whose only novel, Que viva la música, 1977 [Let the Music Roll On] depicts the frenetic life of a young woman who, obsessed by music and leading a nocturnal existence in Cali, is caught up in the sociocultural ambiguities which confront many young people.

Colombian literature since the publication of Cien años de soledad has developed in new directions and it is more difficult to consider it in purely regional terms. García Márquez’s universal critical and popular appeal has given Colombia increased national and international exposure. One interesting development for Colombian literature has been the creation of the Association of North American Colombianists in 1983. This group of American and Colombian academics has helped disseminate Colombian literature through its meetings in Colombia and the United States. Writers such as R.H. Moreno-Durán, Albalucía Ángel and Fanny Buitrago have lived abroad for many years and their work reflects the influence and cultural traditions of other countries. García Márquez, who has also spent much of his career abroad, has cast a long shadow over Colombian and Latin American literature. His enormous impact on the literature of his continent has continued unabated, and his work has incorporated and reshaped many of the elements of Modernism and Postmodernism. García Márquez, along with many other Latin American like Carlos Fuentes, Mario Vargas Llosa and Augusto Roa Bastos, have helped propel Latin American literature to the forefront of worldwide literary prominence. The formerly Latin American literary marginocentric has displaced the traditional literary centers.
The progressive blurring of regional boundaries in Colombian literature of the last twenty-five years has produced a literature which also tends to efface the dividing line between official and popular culture. Fanny Buitrago situates much of her short fiction and novels in the Caribbean coast, and oral culture plays an important role. Her novels include El hostigante verano de los dioses, 1963 [The Harassing Summer of the Gods], Cola de zorro, 1970 [Fox’s Tail], Los pañamanes, 1979 [The Pañamanes] and Los amores de Afrodite, 1983 [The Loves of Aphrodite]. Manuel Zapata Olivella’s Changó, el gran putas, 1983 [Changó, the Baddest S.O.B] is an ambitious novel about the African diaspora which covers several continents and six centuries of African and African-American history. He incorporates oral traditions, collective memory and myth in his sweeping and ambitious novel.

Colombian literature has surpassed its regional boundaries and has responded to factors which lie beyond the grasp of the elite writing culture. It not only incorporates a much wider gamut of cultural elements but it also participates much more extensively in the international discourse of Latin American literature.

See also entries on Fanny Buitrago, Tomás Carasquilla, Gabriel García Márquez, Jorge Isaacs, José Eustasio Rivera

Further Reading

Deas, Malcolm, Del poder y la gramática, y otros ensayos sobre historia, política y literatura colombianas, Bogota: Tercer Mundo, 1993

Jaramillo, María Mercedes and Angela I. Robledo (editors), Escritura y diferencia. Autoras colombianas del siglo veinte, Colombia: Universidad de los Andes and Universidad de Antioquia, 1994

Jiménez, David P., Historia de la crítica literaria en Colombia, Bogota: Centro Editorial Universidad Nacional de Colombia, 1992

Karsen, Sonja, Ensayos de literatura e historia iberoamericana, New York: Peter Lang, 1988

[Chapter 3 has sections on Jorge Isaacs, Guillermo Valencia and Cien años de soledad]

Kohut, Karl (editor), Literatura colombiana hoy. Imaginación y barbarie, Frankfurt: Vervuert Verlag, and Madrid: Iberoamericana,

Meyer-Minnemann, Klaus, La novela hispanoamericana del “fin de siècle,” Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1991 [Chapter 6 has sections on Vargas Vila]

Colonial Literature

New Granada

The conquest of present day Colombia began in 1508, when Alonso de Ojeda arrived in Cartagena. Like his fellow Spanish explorers Diego de Nicuesa, Martín Fernández de Enciso and Gonzalo Fernández de Oviedo (1478–1557), Ojeda wrote about the conquest of the northern “Terra Firma” zone of Colombia. He made valuable contributions to the ethnography and natural sciences of that region of America in Sumario de la natural historia de las Indias, 1526 [A Summary of the Natural History of the Indies] and Historia natural y general de las Indias [The Natural and General History of the Indies], whose first part was published in 1535. Gonzalo Jiménez de Quesada (1499 or 1509(?)–1579) narrated the expedition from the Caribbean coast and the foundation of Santa Fe de Bogota (1538) in his Epítome de la conquista del Nuevo Reino de Granada, 1550 [Epitome of the New Kingdom of Granada’s Conquest]. Jiménez de Quesada also referred to the American theme in other works that remain lost: “Los ratos de Suesca” [Suesca Times], “Historia general de las Indias” [General History of the Indies], and “Diferencia de la guerra de dos mundos” [Differences in Warfare from Two Worlds].

The Epítome, as well as other tales of expeditions that will be mentioned, fit within the general characteristics of the chronicles of the Indies. Like them, they reveal the establishment of a nascent capitalism and a period of ideological and political upheavals. Thus they inscribed apparently incongruent and diverse aspects related to Spanish impositions. Reading them shows medieval, humanist and renaissance mentalities, or how they distance themselves or adjust to a providentialist historiography. Fray Pedro de Aguado, the first writer exclusively concerned with the New Kingdom of Granada, posited in his Recopilación historial, 1582 [Collected Historical Writings] that the basic goal of the Spanish empire was to expand Christianity in the New World. Aguado consequently adheres to Utopian ideals and reneges from the Machiavellian concepts which other authors would adopt. These chronicles also register the confrontation between the conquerors and the Amerindians, a relevant and well-known theme in the formation of Spanish American literature. In this regard, Jiménez de Quesada emphasized the need to “debarbarize” the Amerindians.

On the other hand Aguado, carried away by his moralizing attitude, presented the natives as victims of Spanish injustice and cruelty. A similar attitude was assumed by Joan de Castellanos (1522–1607) in his verse chronicle Elegías de varones ilustres de Indias, 1589 [Elegies of Celebrated Men of the Indies]. Castellanos alluded to the “painful cases of the conquest.” Nevertheless, he underlines the “deeds” of his compatriots. Aguado employed Adam-like metaphors, while other chroniclers availed themselves of cannibalistic descriptions. Jiménez de Quesada mentions the abruptness of the New World landscape, although other texts present the land with images inspired in the notion of paradise.

Fray Pedro Simon (1574–1626(?)), in his providentialist Noticias historiales de las conquistas de Tierra Firme en las Indias Occidentales [Historical Notices of the Conquest of Terra Firma in the Western Indies] revealed the conflicts and struggles among the Spaniards. For this reason, the second and third part of his work were not published along with the first in 1627. It is worth repeating that most of the chronicles were self-proclaimed “true stories,” which refute the validity of other texts which called themselves “truthful.” This description is due to several causes. Sometimes the authors are interested in acquiring fame or in obtaining colonial territories that were in litigation. Other times the dispute centers on how to write history from the perspective of what has been “seen, lived or heard,” like Aguado and Simon. Or, “truth,” in telling came from the author’s use of other narratives or testimonies, as is the case with “official” chronicles. Thus, the variety of “true histories” displaces the medieval notion of a single “truth.” As a consequence the chroniclers employ narrative strategies that would facilitate acquisition of personal benefits, as textualized (despite their differences) in Cortés and Bernal Díaz del Castillo. In any case, powerful self-images are constructed and, like Jiménez de Quesada, who emphasized the riches of the emerald and salt mines, magnify the booty obtained. Naturally, as critics have argued over the last thirty years, the use of such sources blurs the frontier between history and fiction.

After the first half of the 16th century colonial society is consolidated. Regal and hierarchical, it is a society attached to homogenizing Spanish principles and Counter-Reformation proposals. Despite this, the literature of the period insinuates a process of crossbreeding and the awakening of a Spanish American conscience. The colonial chronicles of this period do not recreate intrepid deeds but rather everyday events. They recount what took place in the ecclesiastical and civil administrations as well as notable episodes within religious orders and anecdotes from the provinces. One such tales is Lucas Fernández de Piedrahita’s (1624–88) Noticia historial de las conquistas del Nuevo Reino de Granada, 1688 [Historical Notice of the New Kingdom of Granada’s Conquests]. This deeply moralizing work is a chronological re-ordering of other published and unpublished histories of the region. One of its sources is Jiménez de Quesada’s “Compendio historial de las conquistas del Nuevo Reino” [Historical Compendium of the Conquests of the New Kingdom]. A work like Juan Floréz de Ocáriz’s (1626–?) Genealogías del Nuevo Reino de Granada, 1674 [Genealogies of the New Kingdom of Granada] deals with a basic concern of the incipient creole society: it establishes new ancestries, whose origins are constituted by individuals who transported Catholicism and Iberian customs to the New World. Another chronicle of the period, Historia de la Provincia de San Antonino del Nuevo Reino de Granada, 1701 [History of the New Kingdom of Granada’s San Antonino Province], by Alonso de Zamora (1635–1717), tells the history of the Dominican order in that land and relates matters of general interest. Zamora’s text is remarkable in terms of the physical description of the New Kingdom. As in other American territories, the missionary work of the religious orders involved translating catechisms, philological treatises and grammars. Some of the latter date back to the first half of the 17th century and deal with the native languages of the New Kingdom of Granada. Most notable among them are the books by fathers Bernardo Lugo and José Dadey on the Chibcha language and the research by brothers Francisco Varaix and Luis Zapata de Cárdenas on the Muisca language.

The society of 17th-century New Granada also partook of the Baroque. It was thus marked by a tendency toward excess, which combined penitence and lavishness, sensuality and asceticism. This is particularly evident in El carnero, 1636 (The Conquest of New Granada) by Juan Rodríguez Freyle (1566–1640?), another moralizing chronicle. However, it is a work that combines fun with sin, while subtly discovering and criticizing the social reality of Santa Fe de Bogotá by relating “cases.” These are stories of scandalous events, most of them sexual in nature, which Rodríguez Freyle incorporates to the story of the first hundred years of colonialism in New Granada. Yet, those “cases” are also important because they are fabricated by employing very elaborated aesthetic procedures.

The Baroque period produces other types of text. One of them, the Desierto prodigioso y prodigio del desierto [The Wonderful Wilderness and Wonders of the Wilderness], written around the mid-17th century is, according to Héctor Orjuela, the first Spanish American novel. This complex work by Pedro de Solís y Valenzuela (1624–1711) has multiple narrators and is organized by superimposing narrative levels. Thus, what comes together are “prodigious” tales, an autobiography and some stories that its author tells, poems, ascetic prose, biographies and theater.

Many writers, among them Pedro Tobar y Bueniá, Basilio Vicente de Oviedo, Juan Bautista de Toro and Fernando de Vergara Azcárate produce religious works in prose and verse. Nevertheless, outstanding among them is Francisco Álvarez de Velasco y Zorrilla (1647–1708), whose conceptist Rhymtica sacra, moral y laudatoria, 1703 [Sacred, Moral and Laudatory Rhymtics] shows different and innovative metric combinations.

Of course, the most canonical of these authors was Hernando Domínguez Camargo (1606–1659). Some of his poetry and a brief text in which poetry alternates with verse is Inventiva apologética [An Inventive Apologetic], included in Jacinto de Evia’s Ramillete de varias flores poéticas, 1676 [A Cluster of Various Poetic Flowers]. The Inventiva is a literary and theological treatise, full of malice and wit, written by Domínguez Camargo in order to attack the author of a critique against one of his poems devoted to Christ. His best-known work, the unfinished Poema heroico de San Ignacio de Loyola, 1666 [Heroic Poem of Saint Ignatius of Loyola], is made up of 1200 octaves that encompass the birth of the saint up to the founding of the Society of Jesus. The Poema follows the Góngora model and, according to present day criticism, enriches that model. It does so by showing the poet’s mythological erudition and his various knowledge not only of theological but of natural sciences, games of chance, hunting and culinary arts.

Convents were a key site for the colonial life of New Granada, since their relations with the outside world were quite singular. They had close ties with the various levels of political and economic power. But, at the same time, managed to stay away from them. They thus became spaces for literature and, above all, for literature written by women. Those texts, according to contemporary feminist criticism which has devoted special attention to research on conventual writing, are clear early examples of “feminine writing.”

Some priests wrote about the lives of the religious women who took confession with them. Those writings became the “lives” of nuns. These texts could very well have been autobiographical tales whose probable authors gave them to their confessors, who turned them into biographies. Some of these narrations are the life of Madre Catalina María de la Concepción, founder of the Convent of Santa Clara de Cartagena; the life of Madre Francisca María del Niño Jesús (1723); and that of Sor Maria Gertrudis Theresa de Santa Inés. These works, however, have been attributed respectively to fathers Luis de Jodar, Pedro Pablo de Villamor and Andrés Calvo de la Riba.

Within the context of conventual writing, there were autobiographies by nuns whose authorship was not usurped by their confessors. One of them is Su vida [Her Life], by Francisca Josefa de Castillo y Guevara (1672–1741). This is a text that interlinks dreams and fantasies with everyday details, without being concerned about chronology. It also includes childhood memories, details about the author’s family and the misfortunes of her existence in the cloisters of Santa Clara, together with intimate testimonies, mystical experiences and pious thoughts. Another one of her works is Aféctos espirituales [Spiritual Passions], which, like Su vida, can be read as autobiographical, mystical and hagiographical. But this is clearly a more poetic text whose literary elaboration surpasses Su vida. Another nun who produced an autobiographical text was Jerónima Nava y Saavedra (1669–1727), who finished writing her “spiritual life” in 1727. Her narrative, due to critics’ carelessness, was attributed to Juan de Olmos and was edited and published in 1994, under the title Autobiografía de una monja venerable [Autobiography of a Venerable Nun].

The writing of chronicles persisted into the 18th century. Generally written by priests, their purpose was to give prominence to the missionary work of the various religious orders settled in the New Kingdom of Granada. They are Historia de las misiones de los llanos de Casanare y los ríos Orinoco y Meta, 1728 [History of the Casanare Plains and Orinoco and Meta Rivers Missions], by Juan Rivero (1681–1736); Historia de la Provincia de la Compañía de Jesús del Nuevo Reino de Granada en la America, 1741 [History of the Province of the Society of Jesus in America’s New Kingdom of Granada], written in Spain by José Cassani (1673–1750); El Orinoco ilustrado, historia natural, civil y geográfica de este gran río y sus caudalosas vertientes, 1741 [The Illustrated Orinoco: the Natural and Political History of this Great River and its Mighty Sources] by José Gumilla (1686–1750); and Floresta de la Santa Iglesia Catedral de Santa Marta, 1739 [Collected Delights from the Santa Marta Cathedral] by José Nicolás de la Rosa.

Toward the middle of the 18th century the colonial system began to disintegrate. The way of life, once austere, gave way to frivolous behavior. Rococo, the style that corresponds to these circumstances, had its representative in the poet Francisco Antonio Vélez Ladrón de Guevara (1721-?). The society of New Granada, now guided by Enlightenment ideas, became interested in questioning the present, planning the future and writing about it. New literary genres were produced to replace the scarce production in poetry and prose fiction. The Enlightenment also entered feminine cloisters. In one of them, the convent of La Enseñanza, María Petronila Cuéllar (1761–1814) wrote Riego espiritual para nuevas plantas, 1805 [Spiritual Watering for New Plants], a manual for the education of the novitiate. There were also numerous essays, administrative reports, travel books and, finally, open pamphlets and critiques of the Spanish regime. The crisis in the Iberian peninsula, Bourbon politics, the rigidity and inefficiency of the colonial apparatus, the introduction of the printing press, the creation of newspapers, the Botanical Expedition that was undertaken, and the consolidation of Spanish American conscience by mestizos and creole groups explain those changes.

Some of the books which diagnosed society and proposed alternatives to transform it were Descripción del Reyno de Santa Fe de Bogotá, 1789 [Description of the Kingdom of Santa Fe de Bogota], by Francisco Silvestre, the Pensamientos políticos y memorias sobre la población del Nuevo Reino de Granada, 1808 [Political Thoughts and Memoirs Concerning the New Kingdom of Granada] by Pedro Fermín de Vargas (1762–1811). By the same token, Antonio Nariño (1765–1823) translated and published The Rights of Man and of the Citizen in 1794; a text which was essential for the development of the struggle for Independence in Colombia. Camilo Torres, Francisco José de Caldas, Jorge Tadeo Lozano and Francisco Antonio Zea, outstanding authors and politicians were also active participants in the process of rupture from Spain which culminated in 1819.

From 1980 on the tendencies of international criticism, which contend to revise literary canons and recover ignored or marginal texts, have provided a creative impulse to research on the colonial literature of New Granada. This is buoyed by the increasing interest among Colombian scholars, in various disciplines, who carry out tremendous effort toward reconstructing the country’s past. Colombia’s colonial literary history is thus undergoing a period of rewriting and expansion.

ANGELA I. ROBLEDO

See also entry on Conventual Writing

Further Reading

Cobo Borda, Juan Gustavo and Santiago Mutis Durán (editors), Manual de historia de Colombia, 2 vols, 2nd edition, Bogota: Procultura e Instituto Colombiano de Cultura, 1982 [Volume I is on the colonial period]

Jaramillo de Zuleta, Pilar, En olor de santidad. Aspectos del convento colonial 1680–1830, Santa Fé de Bogota: OP Gráficas, 1992

Orjuela, Héctor, Estudios sobre literatura indígena y colonial, Bogota: Instituto Caro y Cuervo, 1986

Robledo, Angela I., “Antes de la Independencia,” in ¿Y las mujeres? ensayos sobre literatura colombiana, edited by Robledo, María Mercedes Jaramillo and Flor María Rodríguez, Medellín, Colombia: Universidad de Antioquia, 1991

Tovar Zambrano, Bernardo, La colonia en la historiografía colombiana, 3rd edition, Bogota: ECOE, 1984

Vergara y Vergara, José María, Historia de la literatura en Nueva Granada, 3 vols, Bogota: Biblioteca de la Presidencia de Colombia, 1958

Colonial Literature

New Spain

With the conquest of the Aztecs in 1521, the Spaniards immediately began to rebuild the former city of Tenochtitlán, which they called Mexico, and to transform it into a major cultural center in the New World. As the capital of the new Viceroyalty of New Spain, it was the seat of the region’s colonial administration and the focal point of religious efforts to convert the area’s Amerindian population. Spain’s physical presence in New Spain, however, was only the beginning of the colonization process; its ultimate success would rest on the effectiveness of the Spaniards to communicate their beliefs and values to the conquered, thus imposing European culture upon them.

In order to incorporate this new viceroyalty within the Spanish empire in a systematic and harmonious manner, therefore, a conceptualization of the conquest was set forth by officialdom in which the Peninsular-born male Spaniard was portrayed as the dominant figure in a society that was paternalistic and protective of Indians, blacks, mestizos, women, and even American-born Spaniards, or creoles. This hegemonic vision of the New World pervaded Spain’s ideology in the Indies and made Utopia a principal theme of colonial discourse.

The first works of literary merit produced by the Spaniards in New Spain were chronicles and histories that generally followed the principles of Renaissance historiography. Creative literary devices were clearly utilized within the historical framework of these persuasive and often eloquent accounts, and they usually provided moral instruction and paradigms of identity for New Spain’s residents to follow. In this regard, these writings were meant to play a positive and unifying role in the formation of Mexican society that would confirm Spain’s absolute authority.

With the intention of maintaining Spain’s preeminence in the New World and reaffirming its belief in Utopianism there, official restrictions were placed on the exportation of books to New Spain and the writing of works about America. As early as 1506 Ferdinand prohibited the transfer of works of fiction to the viceroyalty, and the prohibition was restated twenty-five years later by Juana la Loca, who identified chivalric novels such as Amadís de Gaula (Amadis of Gaul) as being especially detrimental to the welfare of newly converted Indians. Both civil and ecclesiastical authorities were responsible for this censorship, and severe punishment was meted out, in some cases, to those who violated their rules. In 1556 the first Index was published in Spain, in 1560 the Council of the Indies required all printers and vendors of books with an American theme to have a license, and in 1571 the Inquisition was established in Mexico City. Despite all of these measures, however, books that were supposedly prohibited flowed into New Spain, according to extant ship manifests, and circulated freely among members of the viceroyalty’s readership. Although relatively few writers, printers, or book dealers suffered the consequences of violating these restrictions, efforts to enforce strict censorship did influence literary production in New Spain. Even the great poet Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz expressed a desire to avoid any problems with the Inquisition in her famous letter to the bishop of Puebla, and the development of the entire genre of the novel was greatly restricted until the early part of the 19th century when José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi wrote his picaresque narrative El Periquillo Sarniento (The Itching Parrot).

The military subjugation of New Spain’s Indians was immediately followed by the area’s religious conquest, which was zealously undertaken by the Catholic Church, the right arm, as it were, of the Spanish state. Friars from the Dominican, Franciscan, Mercedarian, and Augustinian orders and the Society of Jesus engaged in the conversion on a grand scale and established schools, libraries, and universities. In 1538 the first printing press arrived in the New World at the request of Mexico’s first bishop, Friar Juan de Zumárraga. Vocabularies and dictionaries of Amerindian languages along with doctrinal Christian works comprised the first publications produced. Many of New Spain’s earliest writers were members of religious communities, and they sought to document their role in the progress of the evangelization as well as to preserve elements of indigenous culture. Among them was Friar Toribio de Benavente who became known as Motolinía, or “poor one” in the Náhuatl language. His principal work Historia de los indios de Nueva España (History of the Indians of New Spain) is noted for its description of an early performance of missionary theater that took place in Tlaxcala in 1538. The play, or auto, as it was called, depicts Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden at the time of the Fall. The brief dramatic work was designed to incorporate new converts more closely within the Catholic Church by enabling them to participate in Christian ceremonies. For that reason, it was performed by Indian actors speaking their own language. This piece closes with a religious carol, or villancico, in which Eve’s purportedly deceitful actions are reiterated. These ten lines of poetry were probably some of the first written in Spanish in New Spain, and constituted, in some cases, the initial words that Indians learned in Spanish.

Another Franciscan, who studied and wrote about New Spain’s Indians, was Friar Bernardino de Sahagún, a professor of Latin at the Academy of Santa Cruz de Tlatelolco, which was founded in 1536 by the Flemish friar Pedro de Gante. His Historia general de las cosas de Nueva España (General History of the Things of New Spain), although only parts of it are extant, is considered to be his most notable work and provides a valuable source of information on the ancient Aztecs.

Adding to the knowledge of pre-conquest Mexico are several accounts written by Indian historians who had been educated in the schools established by the first friars. The Crónica mexicana [Mexican Chronicle] by Don Hernando de Alvarado Tezozomoc is particularly worthy of mention because of the penetrating view it presents of the nature of the Indian and its inclusion of elements from the Códice Ramírez [Ramírez Codex], an anonymous manuscript that reflects on the events surrounding the conquest from the indigenous perspective. Don Fernando de Alva Ixtlilxóchitl, another descendant of Aztec royalty, who was able to interpret the hieroglyphics of antiquity, wrote the Historia chichimeca [History of the Chichimecas], a work that complements the accounts of Tezozomoc and other Indian historians by unveiling the rich culture of a neighboring tribe of the politically dominant Aztecs.

Although the conquest of Mexico was essentially complete with the fall of Tenochtitlán, many of the issues that it posed were left unresolved. Paramount to the wellbeing of its Spanish participants were the rewards granted by the Crown to the conquerors for their loyal service in the Indies. Many years after serving in the ranks of Hernán Cortés’s army, Bernal Díaz del Castillo endeavored to claim for the common soldier the spoils of victory he felt that were due. In his Historia verdadera de la conquista de la Nueva España (True History of the Conquest of New Spain), he presents a compelling case for the just compensation of his comrades at arms and at the same time provides the most thorough and lively description of the Spanish campaigns against the Indians. Contradicting Francisco López de Gómara’s Historia general de las Indias (General History of the Indies), which the historian had based on the Cartas de relación (Letters) written by Cortés himself, Bernal Díaz focuses on the accomplishments of his fellow soldiers without diminishing the stature of his captain. In a forthright and colloquial manner, he recounts his many adventures to the reader, and his creative portraits of Moctezuma and Doña Marina, the Indian woman who served as Cortés’s translator when he arrived in Tenochtitlán, are unmatched by any other eyewitness account. In this respect, his history marks an initial phase in the evolutionary development of the novel.

Apart from the many chronicles and histories, only several of which have been mentioned here, residents of New Spain cultivated other forms of literary expression, and their works often extolled the viceregal capital for its splendor or recounted the heroism of the conquest in verse. Francisco de Terrazas was probably the first poet of Spanish descent to be born in Mexico, and his poetry generally demonstrates the influence of Italianate rhyme in the New World. Cervantes praised his talent by referring to him as the “new Apollo” in the sixth book of La Galatea. In his sonnet “Dejad las hebras de oro ensortijado” [Surrender the Golden Curls], for example, Terrazas exalts feminine beauty and charm and follows precisely the Renaissance concept of womanhood in which a lady’s loveliness is compared to the rare beauties of nature. Inspired by Alonso de Ercilla’s epic La Araucana, he also wrote a long poem entitled Nuevo Mundo y Conquista [New World and Its Conquest], a work that remained unfinished at the time of his death.

Another significant contributor to the development of poetry in New Spain was Bernardo de Balbuena. Describing the city of Mexico as a paradise in a constant state of springtime, he focuses principally on its physical aspects that eloquently come alive with his erudite language and meticulous description. This elegant tableau depicts the capital at the end of the 16th century and introduces Mexican readers to the initial intricacies of the Baroque.

Although Mexico City was for many Spaniards the realization of the Utopian dreams they had for their American territories, it represented the great disparity that existed in other sectors of colonial society as well, especially when comparing the lot of Peninsular-born Spaniards to that of creoles. Several anonymous works, one beginning “Viene de España” [He Comes from Spain] and “Minas sin plata” [Mines without Silver] convey the resentment and anger of some creoles at being denied access to the wealth and power bestowed routinely on those actually born in Spain. These satiric poems are important in the history of literature, as they represent the emergence of a popular culture in New Spain and the glimmer of a national consciousness that would increase as the colonial period progressed.

The conversion of New Spain’s native population was the principal impetus in the development of the theater, and indeed the Catholic Church would play a role in the performance of theatrical works throughout the colonial era, as plays were an integral part of religious festivities. By the close of the 16th century, however, the dramatist Fernán González de Eslava began introducing lay elements into his coloquios, or colloquies, a measure that would signal the advent of a separate secular theater in New Spain. Although this new trend in drama precipitated the construction of theaters throughout New Spain, the viceroyalty boasted few outstanding dramatists during the 17th and 18th centuries. Juan Ruiz de Alarcón, who left Mexico for Spain and is considered among the Golden Age dramatists, and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz are the only real exceptions.

González de Eslava’s coloquios, which are divided into acts and are accompanied by dedicatory poems and interludes, afforded the playwright the opportunity of incorporating current customs and events within the context of episodes taken from the Bible. An excellent example of this is his Coloquio VII in which Teresa and Diego, a married couple living in New Spain, have a spat over the new law prohibiting the production of silk in the viceroyalty because it was already produced in Spain. When Teresa insists that she must have it to make her dresses, she forces Diego to accompany her aboard a ship bound for China. The prophet Jonah, who is on his way to Nineveh, is also a passenger, and when a storm breaks unexpectedly during the voyage, both Teresa and Jonah think that they are responsible for this manifestation of God’s wrath. Jonah ultimately hurls himself into the ocean to restore calm seas, and a contrite Teresa promises to be an obedient wife. Although all of González de Eslava’s colloquies are morally didactic and inspired by some aspect of religious doctrine, comedy is a characteristic of his work. Slapstick, buffoons, and a distorted yet amusing form of speech called sayagués contribute moments of levity to his works and temper the seriousness of these pieces with entertaining frivolity. The inclusion of a comic character in the cast of a religious play was not uncommon and was also employed by the Mexican born playwright Juan Pérez Ramírez in his Desposorio espiritual [Spiritual Betrothal of Pastor Peter and the Mexican Church].

The Baroque had a profound influence on the literature of New Spain during the 17th century, and the sheer challenge of its odd metrical forms and complex metaphors inspired numerous writers to try their skills at literary composition. Although aspiring poets were especially fascinated by the ambiguity and contradiction of such rhetorical adornment, the extravagance and affectation that characterized their works won them little distinction. The Triunfo Parthénico [Parthenic Triumph] compiled by Don Carlos de Sigüenza y Góngora provides a sampling of works by New Spain’s poets written for one of the many competitions in which learned people engaged. This particular compilation was assembled in 1682. to celebrate the Immaculate Conception, and the quality of its entries exemplifies the general mediocrity that pervaded the 1600s.

A rare exception to the stylistic decadence of the 17th century was the literary production of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, who used the elaborate excesses of the time to create a space in which to express the concerns of a female intellectual. Her prose, poetry, and drama represent the pinnacle of literary creativity from both the viceregal court and Catholic convents in New Spain whose excellence remained unmatched throughout the entire colonial period.

Having been invited to the court of the viceroy of the Marquis of Mancera because of her precocity, she wrote extensively for its members. The sonnet “Este que ves…” [This (portrait) That You See…] is particularly beautiful, and the sensitivity of her love poetry has given rise to much speculation about her personal life. Among her other notable works are the long poem El primero sueño (Sor Juana’s Dream), in which she imitates the extreme style of the Spanish Baroque poet Luis de Góngora, and the riotous comedy Los empeños de una casa [The Trials of a Noble House], in which she follows the tradition of the Golden Age dramatist, Pedro Calderón de la Barca. Although she ultimately decided to leave the court because of its artificiality, she continued to write secular works after entering the convent, the only viable alternative for a single woman during the colonial period who did not wish to remain with her family. Her desire to continue writing non-religious works, however, brought her into conflict with the bishop of Puebla, Don Manuel Fernández de Santa Cruz, and provoked the writing of her famous letter Respuesta a Sor Filotea de la Cruz (The Answer), in which she defends her inclination to study and write and speaks out on behalf of education for women. Although she did write many works of a profane nature, those with a religious theme are no less meritorious. Her auto sacramental, Divino Narciso [Divine Narcissus], in which Sor Juana brillianty blends mythology and theology, is considered to be a masterpiece.

Although Sigüenza y Góngora did not distinguish himself as a poet, despite his many efforts, his ability to document and write history was exceptional, and the artistry with which he composed his works puts him in second place, after Sor Juana, as a literary figure of importance in 17th century New Spain. As an outstanding intellectual of his time, he was a professor of mathematics at Mexico’s university and was appointed royal cosmographer by Charles II. Among his works of literary merit is his Infortunios de Alonso Ramírez [Misadventures of Alonso Ramírez], which possesses definite novelistic features that in some respects characterize the Spanish picaresque. He also participated in a scientific expedition to Florida’s Gulf coast and prepared a plan for the defense of Pensacola against the pirates. His most important scientific work, however, is his Libra astronómica y filosófica [Astronomical and Philosophical Terms], in which he countered the theory of the Jesuit Father Kino, who believed that comets such as the one that appeared over Mexico City in November of 1680 would bring disaster.

The interest in Mexican history, especially in the ancient past, continued during the 18th century. Departing from the scholasticism and Gongorist rhetoric of their immediate predecessors, historians such as Don Francisco Clavijero and Don Mariano Fernández de Echeverría y Veytia applied modern methods of thought and investigation to the task of piecing together the heritage of pre-conquest cultures and civilizations. Aided by his exceptional linguistic ability in Amerindian languages and basing his work on the careful research accomplished by Sigüenza y Góngora and other historians like him, Clavijero sought to provide a rich and varied panorama of the life of the Aztecs and their neighboring tribes. The picture presented in Clavijero’s outstanding book, Historia antigua de México [Ancient History of Mexico] is completed by Veytia’s Historia antigua [Ancient History], which deals with additional indigenous groups to inhabit the territory that later became known as the Viceroyalty of New Spain. Veytia is also recognized for his study of Mexico’s prominent female religious figures, most notably the Virgin of Guadalupe.

Throughout the vicerregal period, classical culture was a major influence in New Spain’s literature, and it inspired the composition of a number of works in Latin. Beginning in the 16th century with Francisco Cervantes de Salazar’s Diálogos [Dialogues], this tradition continued during the last one hundred years of Spain’s rule and flourished among members of religious orders such as the humanists Francisco Javier Alegre, Rafael Landívar, and Diego José Abad. Landívar is the most important of these writers, and his Rusticatio Mexicana [A Rural Life in Mexico], which was influenced by Virgil’s Georgics, is probably the most striking example of neo-Latin poetry in which the viceroyalty of New Spain is described.

By the end of the 18th century, it was clear that residents of New Spain had formulated their own identity separate from that of the Spaniards and that the imposition of colonial administration must be lifted and the viceroyalty dissolved. Mexicans had developed a national consciousness that was no longer compatible with the cultural and ideological goals of Spain, and they adamantly moved toward revolution. The novelist and essayist José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi, known among his contemporaries as “the Mexican Thinker,” is the embodiment of this new spirit, and the freedom he expresses in his many works, which marks the advent of the independence era, is both political and artistic.

JULIE GREER JOHNSON

See also entries on José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz

Further Reading

Cypess, Sandra Messinger; La Malinche in Mexican Literature: from History to Myth, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1991

——Satire in Colonial Spanish America: Turning the New World Upside Down, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993

Merrim, Stephanie (editor), Feminist Perspectives on Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1991

Colonial Literature

Peru

When we speak of Peruvian colonial literature, we must credit Inca literature as a valuable foundation. The first Spanish priests understood that the only way to teach religion to the natives was by learning their language and their traditions and giving them a new Catholic meaning. This was the main reason for the syncretism that still endures in Peruvian and Latin American culture. In addition, the Inca’s oral tradition was recreated not only for the chroniclers but also for literary authors. As Dick Gerdes states in his essay on Peruvian literature in the Handbook of Latin American Literature (1992.), it is clear that an examination of colonial literature must go beyond the study of “white” male writers: “The project for the future will be to incorporate all canon strata, dominant and popular, written and oral, male and female, into a literary canon in which modern critical perspectives will help us to appreciate Peruvian literature.”

When the Spanish arrived in the New World, they encountered a people and environment unknown to them and all other Europeans. They recorded their new experiences in the form of chronicles. At first these works were considered to be simply historical documents, but they recently have come to be seen as literary works. The rhetorical styles of the chronicles were strongly influenced by the triumphant, providential, and paternalistic modes. With Francisco Pizarro’s arrival in Peru in 1532, the Inca civilization changed abruptly for both the so-called “colonized Indian” and the European colonizer. Styles intermingled and informed one another; agendas emerged and changed; and the telling of history became also the creation of colonial selves.

There are three groups of chroniclers: the Spanish, the mestizos, and the Inca. Among all the Spanish chroniclers Pedro Pizarro (1515–87) was one of the few who wrote exclusively about Peru. In his Relación del descubrimiento y conquista del Perú [Account of the Discovery and Conquest of Peru], he describes the fratricidal savagery of the Spanish civil wars and lavishes praise on his conqueror cousin. Pizarro’s narrative style is lively and has the authority of an eye-witness who describes Pizarro’s arrival on Peruvian soil, Atahualpa’s capture, and the Inca’s way of life, especially their dances. Another well-known chronicler is José de Acosta (1540–1600). He deserves mention because he was a defender of the native Peruvians against the Spanish excesses and cruelties. His Historia natural y moral de las Indias, 1500 [Natural History of the West Indies] is a study which more accurately approaches the culture and the organization of the Inca Empire. Acosta, like Father Bartolomé de Las Casas, writes about the emperors of Mexico and Peru, recognizing their monarchical skills. Besides providing an incisive philosophical, ethnographical and historical study of the New World, he reveals himself as a skillful scientist writing brilliantly about the natural richness of Peru and of Latin America.

Among the mestizo chroniclers, El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega is the first famous Peruvian writer. He asserts in his Comentarios reales de los Incas, 1609 (Royal Commentaries of the Incas], the significance of knowing the Peruvian native culture and language in writing about the Incas. He relates how his Inca relatives and his mother introduced him to the history and customs of his Inca heritage, thus making clear that he could speak about his ancestors with authority. He wrote La Florida del Inca, 1605 (The Florida of the Inca), which describes Hernando Soto’s expedition to Florida. The second part of the Comentarios Reales is Historia General del Perú, 1619 [General History of Peru] which narrates the bloody civil war among the Spaniards.

Garcilaso’s Comentarios reales is considered a classic work and is the beginning of the Latin American literary canon. The text was conceived as a penetrating exploration of personal and Peruvian identity. Because of the native uprising during the 18th century, the Spanish Crown banned the reading of Garcilaso’s seminal work, and it was secretly confiscated all over Peru.

Another colonial author wasFrancisco de Avila (1573–1647), a mestizo born in Cuzco. Avila studied at the Jesuit College in Cuzco, Peru, and graduated in 1606. He was the author of El manuscrito de Huarochirí [The Huarochiri Manuscript] which was translated by José María Arguedas, and given the title Hombres y dioses de Huarochirí, 1966 [Huarochiri Men and Gods]. Ávila’s Manuscrito is a chronicle of magical origins about the gods, traditions, and legends of the Andean people. Ávila’s work, and it helps us to understand the importance of indigenous traditions. It has been compared to the Comentarios reales of El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega, in its presentation of the Inca’s religion and customs. Furthermore, El manuscrito de Huarochirí has a subtext that suggests that the European and Andean religions are of equal value, correcting the belief that one is superior to the other.

Before examining what have been called “Indian” chroniclers, it should be noted that it is more accurate to call them “native” chroniclers and that accuracy is important. It is not appropriate to continue the tradition of misdesignation that began with Columbus.

Among the native chroniclers are Titu Cusi Yupanqui, Joan de Santacruz Pachacutí Yamqui Sallqamaygua and Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala. (The work of only the first two will be examined because there is a separate essay on Guaman Poma in this encyclopedia). Titu Cusi Yupanqui (1529–70), whose Spanish name was Diego de Castro, wrote the Relación de la conquista del Perú [Account of the Conquest of Peru] and Hechos del Inca Manco Inca II [The Deeds of Inca Manco Inca II]. The former was not published until 1916, perhaps because it was not popular during its time as it was a direct and passionate defense of the native people. This chronicle was inspired by the abusive treatment of the natives by the ruling Spanish. In Hechos del Inca Manco II, Cusi Yupanqui writes of the last Incan King of Cuzco, Manco Inca, and his rebellion in 1535. He presents Manco Inca as a heroic warrior who battled bravely against the European invasion. His style of narration is vivid, and his rhetoric is dramatic and captures the attention of the reader.

Joan de Santacruz Pachacutí Yamqui Sallqamaygua was a bilingual native who wrote Relación de Antigüedades deste Reyno del Pirú [Account of the Antiquities of the Kingdom of Peru]. It was first published in English in 1873. His work has a distinctly evangelical tone because he was a convert to Catholicism. Although Santacruz Pachacutí condemns the idolatry of some Andean people, he rescues the Incas’ faith and compares it to Spanish Catholicism. He writes with great beauty about native traditions and mythology. But Santacruz Pachacutí is also important because he is the first to reveal and include Inca poetry. His chronicle interweaves the religious and liturgical hymns of Sinchi Roca, Manco Cápac, and Huascar. In writing about Manco Capac’s hymn, Santacruz Pachacutí emphasizes its lyrical form and use of metaphor. Sinchi Roca’s hymn is also beautifully described. It was composed by the Inca to honor his first-born child in the same way one would honor God’s Son.

Besides the chronicle, other literary forms flourished during colonial times. Poetry and drama in their diverse expressions were used to teach religion. Juan de Espinoza Medrano (1629–88) is perhaps the most notable writer of the period. He was known as “El Lunarejo” and wrote extensively in drama, lyric, and prose. Among his dramatic works are El hijo pródigo [The Prodigal Son], a religious allegory in both Quechua and Spanish.
Amar su propia muerte [Love Your Own Death] based on a passage from the Old Testament, and El rapto de Proserpina [Proserpine’s Abduction], were both extensively presented in colonial times. “El Lunarejo” was a faithful disciple of Góngora. The Peruvian writer dedicated El apológetico en favor de D. Luis de Góngora, Príncipe de los poetas líricos de España [The Apologetics of Don Luis de Góngora, Prince of the Spanish Lyric Poets] to his teacher. Among his prose, La novena maravilla [The Ninth Wonder] has aroused new critical interest. Other writers, such as Pedro Peralta Barnuevo (1664–1743) with Pasión y triunfo de Cristo, 1737 [Passion and Triumph of Christ], and Pablo de Olavide (1725–1803) and his El Evangelio en triunfo, 1798 [The Triumph of the Gospel], are considered to be Espinoza Medrano’s disciples.

Drama was a popular genre during colonial times. Besides the religious plays the most well-known dramatic play is represented by Ollantay. Although it was first published in Cuzco in 1837, the truth is that this play had been transmitted by oral tradition for countless generations. Some critical editions have credited the play to Antonio Valdez, a Sicuani (Cuzco) priest who knew the native Quechua and could have transcribed the work. Ollantay is an epic play in three acts which narrates the plebeian general Ollantay’s rebellion against King Inca Pachacutec when he is not allowed to marry the Princess Cusi Coyllur. Ollantay recreates Inca times and is considered the most representative play of colonial times.

La muerte de Atahualpa [The Death of Atahualpa Inca] is another bilingual play. This dramatic play has only one act and is written in verse and prose it has native and Spanish characters. Among the natives are the Inca King Atahualpa, Huáscar his brother, three Coyas or Inca Queens, and other minor characters. The Spanish are represented by Francisco Pizarro, as a diplomatic ambassador and Father Valverde as the preacher. The play recounts the fateful encounter between Atahualpa and Pizarro.

In addition to the Ollantay and La Muerte de Atahualpa there are also some others plays such as Usca Paucar [Paucar the Beggar], an anonymous play written in the 18th century. Usca Paucar is a Quechua-Christian play dedicated to the Virgin of Copacabana. This play is divided into three acts and deals with the trials of its protagonist Paucar, a rebel beggar Inca. Although Usca Paucar was very poor and, as a former noble, untutored in any trade, he could not accept any help because he was arrogant and proud of his origin. Moreover, in the end he was convinced by his love of Koirtica to join the Procession honoring the Virgin Mary and was led to conversion and happiness; as in other Spanish colonies, the majority of plays had religious purposes and relied on allegory to communicate their message.

In general the most popular genre during colonial times was the lyric. For a time it was believed that this form reigned supreme until the discovery of the first Peruvian novel, written by José de Acosta, Peregrinación de Bartolomé Lorenzo, 1666 [Bartolomé Lorenzo’s Peregrination]. For many years the novel was forgotten, but in 1899 it was rediscovered by Cesáreo Fernández Duro who published it in the Boletín de la Real Academia de la Historia in the same year. The most recent edition was published in Peru by the well-known literary critic José de Arrom in 1982, and in 1994 a study of this first Peruvian novel was included in Historia de la literatura peruana by César Toro Montalvo.

Peregrinación de Bartolomé Lorenzo is a biography, but Acosta also includes some fictional passages that partake of the picaresque genre and make the novel interesting.
Furthermore, Acosta enriches his narration with the language of the native people and his descriptions of American flora and fauna. Peregrinación is a short but dense novel of about thirtyfive pages. Divided into five chapters and written in a picaresque style, Acosta’s novel may be compared to that of the Mexican writer Singuenza y Góngora’s Infortunios de Alonso Ramírez, 1690 [The Misfortunes of Alonso Ramírez]. However, the Peruvian novel also has a humanitarian message - throughout the text, the reader can perceive Bartolomé Lorenzo’s charitable and kind intentions toward the native people. In many passages of the novel Bartolomé Lorenzo avoids joining his fellow Spanish commanders in attacking the native villages. For this reason he is persecuted and ordered to be hanged; but, because some Jesuit priests come to his aid, he is able to escape his doom. Indeed, Bartolomé Lorenzo then entered a monastery.

Satire was another popular genre in the colony. It was used as a didactic form to point up certain social and political problems and to entertain the audience at the same time. These satirists used language in an ironic and humorous manner, and the preferred targets of their criticism were lascivious women, false virgins, doctors, cheats, lower-class people (especially slaves), and even priests. Esteban de Terralla Landa and Juan del Valle y Caviedes enjoyed misrepresenting and mocking a wide range of people in their works. By criticizing everyone, the satirist subverted and deconstructed the social conventions of the colony. Hardly anyone could escape becoming a target of colonial satirists such as Mateo Rosas de Oquendo (16th century), Juan del Valle y Caviedes (17th century), and Alonso Carrió de la V砂浆era and de Terralla Landa (both 18th century).

During the Classic period, some colonial female authors emerged alongside their male counterparts. These include Amarilis, whose real name was never revealed. Amarilis wrote her Épistola de Amarilis a Belardo, 162.1 [Epistle from Amarilis to Belardo]. Another woman writer was Clarinda, whose name was uncovered in the 19th century by Ricardo Palma. Prior to that time her writing had appeared anonymously in 1608. Her only known text is Discurso en loor de la poesía, 1608 [A Discourse in Praise of Poetry], a sensual poem of neoplatonic provenance. Besides the lay women authors, many nuns were writers. Santa Rosa de Lima (1586–1617) is well-known for her exquisite poetry. Others include Sor Antonia Lucía del Espíritu Santo (1646–1709), whose work was compiled by Josefa de la Providencia; María Manuela de Santa Ana (1695–1793) a recent discovery whose manuscripts are still unpublished; Juana de Herrera y Mendoza (18th century); Josefa de Azaña y Llano (1696–1748); Josefa Bravo de Lagunas y Villela (18th century); and Juana Calderón Badillo (1726–1809). These women wrote mostly spiritual autobiographies of literary as well as historical interest. The works of nuns are particularly relevant because they reveal important facts about life within the convent and beyond its walls. Also much conventual literature portrays the microcosm within which nuns had considerable independence. Although they were subject to the orders of their superiors, they could deal freely with philosophical, spiritual and historical issues and they could record their thoughts in their writing.

The list of women’s names makes it clear that there are a substantial number of female writers; yet, the anthologies and other collections represent a heavily male tradition. There is a need to improve the circulation of knowledge about Peruvian women’s literature because women play an important part in the construction of culture at all times.
It is also important to refer to the transitional literature before Peruvian independence; of particular relevance in this context is Carta a los españoles americanos [Letter to the Spanish Americans] written by the ex-Jesuit Juan Pablo Viscardo y Guzmán (1747–98). Carta a los españoles americanos was published in Paris on the eve of the third century of the Discovery of America. It is considered fundamental because it served to raise the consciousness not only of the Peruvians but also the entire Americas as well. In addition, Carta a los españoles americanos is considered a historic document seminal for the independence of all the South American nations.

El Mercurio Peruano, 1792. [The Peruvian Mercury] was a newspaper founded by many patriotic intellectuals of La Sociedad Amantes del Perú [Society of Supporters of Peru]. El Mercurio Peruano is another foundational component of colonial literature which shaped the consciousness for independence. It transmitted the ideas of the Enlightenment and also provided, although tenuously, the opportunity for intellectual and social change. In this important newspaper is reflected the transcendental nationalist spirit epitomized by some well-known collaborators, Hipólito Unanue, Baquijano y Carrillo, Peralta Barnuevo, José de Riva-Agüero, among others.

Another literary form was the pasquines (pasquinades). These were anonymous, satirical texts and lampoons, written in verse and prose, sometimes with drawings. The pages were printed and pasted on the walls of public buildings in the most important cities such as Lima, Arequipa, Cuzco and Puno, and in the small villages as well. The pasquines used popular language and their role was to exalt the Peruvians’ awareness of political and social issues. They were banned and prohibited because their texts were considered subversive and against the principles of the Spanish crown. Another purpose of the pasquines was to criticize the administration in general.

Some of these pasquines also discussed the brave actions of Túpac Amaru’s uprising and several poems in the form of pasquines are dedicated to him. For instance, Melchor de Paz in his Diálogo sobre los sucesos del Perú [Dialogues about the Events in Peru] includes some pasquines from Arequipa written in 1870. The verses criticize the Spanish King and exalt Túpac Amaru’s deeds. There is one well-known poem, a décima to Tupac Amaru King of the American Continent, which was read in different parts of the Viceroyalty such as La Plata, Oruro, and Nueva Granada. It has a libertarian tone and was illuminating, especially to the oppressed people of the colony. García Márquez was to draw on the tradition of the pasquines in an early novel, La mala hora (In Evil Hour).

As the culmination of “colonial” literature, the “pasquines” are, in a sense, symbolic of much that has existed in Peruvian writing from the beginning. The telling of histories, the wry and unfettered wit, the spirit of rebellion, the hungry quest for spiritual and intellectual enlightenment, and the constant renegotiation in the diverse and exciting literature have all been present in the diverse and exciting literature of Peru. Whether we read the chroniclers, marvel at the fables of the Incas, laugh with the satirists, delve into the newly discovered treasures of women’s writing, or explore the many other literary forms discussed, we are tapping into a tradition rich in conflict, wonder, and brilliance.

In conclusion, the literature of colonial Peru is a vast field that offers many interesting possibilities for continued study. This study will shed light not only on the nature of colonialism and its interaction with the native cultures of the region, but also on these issues in the larger context of colonialism throughout the world.

ELIA J. ARMACANQUI-TIPACTI
Concrete Poetry

Concrete poetry was an international avant-garde movement in poetry in the 1950s and 1960s. The prime exponents of this spatially and visually oriented minimalism were the co-founders Swiss-Bolivian poet Eugen Gomringer and the Brazilian Noigandres group: Augusto de Campos, Haroldo de Campos and Décio Pignatari. This cosmopolitan movement owes a great deal to their organizational, theoretical, and creative initiatives. The conceptualization and practice of concrete poetry, in fact, developed more intensively in Brazil than anywhere else, quite remarkable for a peripheral South American nation with natural operational restrictions. Brazilian concrete poetry is widely cited, and its supporting essays are recognized as the richest contribution to the theory of concrete poetry. In terms of local impact, it is noteworthy that while in many countries concrete poetry had a relatively modest impact, poesia concreta comprised the most provocative and distinctive development in Brazilian lyric after Modernism. Beyond national frontiers, concrete ventures have attracted more attention for Brazilian poetry than any other contemporary manifestation. In terms of recognition, repertories of broadly-conceived concretism—encompassing theory, literary criticism, poetry, and translations by the Noigandres poets and associates—has been to Brazil what the writings of Octavio Paz are to Mexico, or the poetry and memoirs of Pablo Neruda to Spanish America.

As a movement, Brazilian concrete poetry lasted from the mid-1950s to the late 1960s, in three stages of development. In the first “organic” or “phenomenological” stage (1953–56), depersonalization, spatialization and visual shaping were key procedures. The second division (1956–61) is that of “classical,” “high” or “orthodox” concrete poetry, when the Noigandres poets and their colleagues used ultra-rational principles of composition. The foundational document—the “pilot plan for concrete poetry” (1958)—comprised a compilation of interdisciplinary ideas from earlier manifestos and articles. The concrete platform was built of universal and national planks. Select features of the experimental works of key modern authors of both the “old” and “new” worlds were adopted. Cornerstones were Mallarmé’s “prismatic subdivision of ideas,” Pound’s ideogrammatic method, and Joyce’s concept of “verbivocovisual” word-ideogram. Other essential points of departure were e.e. cummings’s typography and atomization of words and Apollinaire’s vision of calligramme. National resources were the synthetic, Cubist poetry of Oswald de Andrade and his celebrated manifestos, as well as the architectonic verse of João Cabral de Melo Neto. In a third phase, 1962 on, more open notions of “invention” prevailed. Diverse practices included semantic variations, collages, creative advertisements, and lexically-keyed semiotic poems.

Since about 1960, the term “concrete poetry” has been used worldwide to refer to various kinds of verbal (and some nearly non-verbal) experiments on the printed page that are not rightly comparable to high concrete poetry, which was profoundly poetic and conceptual. Since some later visual poetry—including Brazilian—may appear to be “against” language, it must be kept in mind that classical Brazilian material was founded on literary language and is often about words. The Noigandres poets did cite Pound’s notion that poetry is more like painting and music than literature, but they first sought to be true to his characterization of great literature as “language charged with meaning to the utmost possible degree.”

Brazilian concrete poetry, from its inception to unresolved current debates, has lived a stormy and controversial life. In the 1950s, it was attacked for its lack of an orienting affectivity, and its non-linear, non-discursive structure was held to be self-defeating. It was frequently said that the concrete project was doomed to be a blind alley, since it proclaimed the end of the “historical cycle of verse.” In the early 1960s, objections to concrete poetry’s assaults on natural syntax, conventional lyricism, and verse-making gave way to protests based on political attitudes and ideology. In the phase of invention, concrete poets responded overtly to Brazil’s climate of nationalism and activism, in essays and creative texts alike. Early concrete poetry had included notable examples of social discourse (land reform, cultural imperialism), and later examples proved no inherent contradiction between concrete techniques and social aims. Many still challenged the appropriateness of an experimental avant-garde in a severely imbalanced, underdeveloped country such as Brazil. Appealing to the gains of Modernism, the Noigandres poets defended their right to aesthetic research and recalled Oswald’s critical re-elaboration of foreign information in national terms. In the context of the developmentalism of the 1950s, it is instructive to note that concrete poetry reversed the normal flow of cultural information from metropolis to colony and became an export product. Still, while there are indeed pertinent social factors in concretism, the vocation of the Noigandres poets was always primarily poetic, and concrete poetry was above all a textual enterprise.

New Brazilian poetry of the 1970s was markedly pluralistic. While the informal discursivity of so-called marginal poetry garnered attention, the lasting effects of concretism cannot be overlooked in other ventures. Since the late 1960s, song was a recognized channel for poetry, and Augusto de Campos’s interest in innovative popular music (MPB) prompted experimentation that included concrete concepts. Varied products of verbal art fell under the sign of “intersemiotic creation,” from constructivist lyric to different youthful experiments with visuality and graphics. Preference for semiosis over emotivity implied clear but non-restrictive recognition of concretist ideals. In many lyrical pursuits, fracture, paronomasia and concision figured prominently. The most evident impact of concrete poetry may be found in a propensity toward brevity, which is reflected in the popularity of haiku. To whatever degree concrete poetry was a factor in new lyric of the 1970s, the value of the term “post-concrete” is primarily chronological. Late in the decade the Noigandres poets increased their visibility and circulation with the publication of their collected poems: Haroldo de Campos, Xadrez de estrelas, 1975 [Stars’ Chess], Décio Pignatari, Poesia pois é poesia, 1976 [Poetry for That is What it Is], and Augusto de Campos, VIVA VAIA, 1979 [Long Live Catcalls].

Since 1975, only the work of Augusto de Campos shows palpable continuity with concrete poetry. His poems are enriched with such non-verbal elements as typeface, color, and layout, and there is a return to words and phrases without renouncing the visual syntheses of concrete poetry. Augusto’s most provocative poem was the timely “pós-tudo,” 1984 [posteverything], which pondered the dilemma of those who pursue innovation in the late century, questioned Postmodernism as fashion, and touched off an extended polemic in Brazil about the legacy of concrete poetry, something that is discussed by Gonzalez and Treece in their study, The Gathering of Voices (1992).

Four decades after the inaugural exhibition of concrete poetry in Brazil, there is adequate perspective to judge its development and impact. The historical chapter of concrete poetry as a vanguard movement has long been closed, but concretism’s attention to materiality, linguistic substance, and modernity remains in vigor. Problematic aspects of the formulation of concrete poetry include the sanctification of certain critical references (e.g., Pound) and the elevation of rupture and textual radicalization to self-justified values. In addition, the Brazilians’ portrayal of concrete poetry as the result of an organic evolution of literary forms was illusory; instead it was the product of contrived invention and conscious elaboration. Similarly, the Noigandres poets’ declaration of the end of verse, far from being prophetic, was mostly a manifesto phrase of iconoclasm. Conventional poetry of self-expression continued forcefully in Brazil, but concrete poetry both affected the shape and extension of verse and spawned other poetic vanguards, such as neo-concretismo (1957), poesia praxis (1962), and poema processo (1967), as well as non-denominational experimentation in the 1970s and 1980s.

Concrete poetry represents the most solidly theorized and carefully practiced organized modality of poetry in Brazil. The Noigandres poets merit recognition, with and beyond concrete poetry, for creating new textual modalities, offering alternate (e.g., analogical, visual) models of expressivity, initiating a major rethinking of poetic structuring, and for the pursuit of uniqueness and rigor. In a broader sense, the leaders of poesia concreta set new parameters for the discussion of modernity, creating an option to aestheticism and ethnically-driven nationalism. With its insistence on theory, historical reconsiderations, and alternative tradition, the concrete vanguard took on a civilizing mission that proved to be a national project of modernity, thus joining what Antônio Cândido called the tradição empenhada, the national and continental tradition of engagement. With its front-line integration into international circuits and proactive emphasis on a modernizing exploitation of intellectual and technical resources regardless of origin, Brazilian concretism helped reconfigure the nation in cultural terms.

CHARLES A. PERRONE

Further Reading

Solt, Mary Ellen (editor), Concrete Poetry: a World View, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1970 [The introduction has essential documentation and includes major manifestos]

[Each example has a critical commentary alongside the lexical key]

Special Issues of Journals

“The Changing Guard II,” Times Literary Supplement, London (3 September 1964) [This issue of TLS features international experimental poetry and avant-garde movements. Articles by Max Bense, the Brazilian theorists and others]

Poetics Today vol. 3/3 (1982.) [Articles by Claus Clüver, Jon Tolman, et al., and translations of key articles by the Noigandres poets]

Maryse Condé 1934–

Guadeloupean novelist, playwright and essayist

Although Maryse Condé remains outside the recent French Antillean antillanité and creolité literary movements, her discourse in its polyphonic nature and wide range addresses the predominant preoccupations of the Antillean writer. Within the context of the complex and traumatic West Indian heritage of slavery, colonization and assimilation, Condé’s fictional characters are searching for an identity which reflects that of a larger community. And, as a black woman writer from a geographically, culturally and politically marginal world, Condé self-consciously attempts to represent the interrelated issues of race, gender and class. In her fiction—eleven novels over twenty years—Condé weaves together the cultural and historical confluences of Europe, Africa and America in a pattern similar to her personal itinerary as well as reminiscent of the “golden triangle” of the Atlantic slave trade. With a cynical distance which seemingly reflects her ideological independence, she explores the multi-layered hybridity and multifarious contradictions of the system of relationships in the Antilles while expanding it beyond her native island to the larger West Indian community as well as to the global world. Indeed, if Condé belongs to the French Antilles, she refuses to be compartmentalized as an Antillean in order to maintain a freedom devoid of the boundaries of restrictive definitions. Condé’s nomadism, which translates into a transcultural and intercultural approach, along with her systematic exploration and reconstruction of history, are the most striking characteristics of her fictional work.

In the first stage of her writing, the myth of Africa as maternal figure of the original genealogy—the return to the authentic past—is her main source of inspiration. With Héré-makhonon, 1976 (which ironically means “welcome home” in Malinké), and Une Saison a Rihata, 1981 (A Season in Rihata), Condé questions and challenges Aimé Césaire’s vision of Négritude through two Guadeloupean female protagonists in search of their African roots. Mirroring the antinomies of their colonial backgrounds, these exiles are unable to define a role for themselves on the African soil and to break free from a westernized frame of reference. With these novels, Condé initiates her narrative technique involving multiple points of view which convey the unsolvable conflicts experienced by the heroines and which reflect their historical collective condition. The quest for the African past is also the main focus of Ségou, 1984 (Segu), the two-volume saga of the Bambara empire of Segu. In this award-winning best-seller, Condé recreates a high civilization of a precolonial Africa that practiced slavery well before the Europeans and entertained extensive contacts with the Christian and Islamic worlds. The political and religious conflicts which eventually dissolved the Bambara empire lead to the dispersion of the children of Nya to Brazil and the Caribbean, and consequently to the emergence of the African diaspora. Thus, Condé challenges again Césaire’s claim of his Bambara heritage as one confiscated solely by the Europeans.

During the decade between Hérémakhonon and Ségou, Condé published several theoretical essays on Aimé Césaire’s poetry and on Antillean culture and literature, and she particularly examined the historico-cultural significance of early women novelists of the French Antilles, thus reflecting her activity as university professor in France and in the United States. However, after Ségou, Condé focused almost exclusively on her creative writing and resolutely turned to the African diaspora with Moi, Tituba sorcière noire de Salem, 1986 (I, Tituba, Black Witch of Salem), a historical subject which begins her series of fictional works set in the New World. The novel’s female protagonist asserts her presence and her role within the puritanical and racist US society of the 17th century, as well as within the institution of sugarcane plantations in Barbados. Tituba’s first-person narrative—the story of her escape from erasure by colonial and patriarchal forces—allows Condé to rewrite a new Caribbean history from a woman-centered point of view.

The revision of history, also by a woman narrator, and the elusive pursuit of “authenticity” confront the characters of La Vie scélérate, 1987 (The Tree of Life). In this novel, Condé reconstructs the story of her own family through a multicultural narrative which explores the historical and cultural significance of race, gender and class relations in the diverse contexts of the New World—Panama, the US, Jamaica, Haiti—and of France. She raises relentlessly the questions of exile, estrangement from the motherland, relations to the “others” of the diaspora and to the whites, and a return to roots. Through the young female narrator, Condé also examines the reality of the West Indian woman within the present structures of power and her role as a writer.
The nature of writing and the failure of achieving a completed story is also central to Traversée de la mangrove, 1989 (Crossing the Mangrove). Written as a detective novel, the book never solves the mystery—the death of the central hero—because the multi-voiced narrative technique unceasingly disrupts and contradicts the telling of his past. The hero’s individual story, which is constructed like a puzzle with missing pieces, remains as elusive as the collective history of the island he inhabits. Through the characters acting as traditional storytellers, Traversée explores the diversity of the voices of the community and suggests the impossibility of retrieving the collective history. This obsessive quest forms also the underlining narrative of Les Derniers Rois Mages, 1992. [The Last Magi] which, as with Tituba, deals with a historical subject revised by the imaginary of the writer. And, as with Condé’s other novels, the themes of exile, dispossession, psychological dislocation, and the search for African roots are predominant. The Martinican-born descendant of an African king lives in exile on a South Carolina island while the hero’s AfricanAmerican wife is investigating her own heritage in the French Antilles.

The relation between the Caribbean, Africa and America, and the destiny of the spiritually dispossessed remain Condé’s concern throughout her fiction up to her recent work, La Colonie du Nouveau Monde, 1993 [The Colony of the New World]. In this novel, the author continues her exploration of exile and of the yearning for belonging in relation to establishing identity in a totally foreign world. With her usual irony, she uncovers the great futility pursued by the “colony,” a marginal group of diverse people attempting to save a community going through an inexorable process of metamorphosis and final disintegration.

Condé has also written several plays in which characters, invested with symbols, represent the confrontation of traditional African or Antillean values with new ideas imported from abroad. However, these themes find a more developed and effective treatment in her novels.

If Condé’s fiction departs from Guadeloupean perspectives, it expands far beyond her island to represent universal problems. Her large international readership, especially in the English versions of her novels, demonstrates her major role in revising our understanding of the world.

MARIE-AGNÈS SOURIEAU

See also entry on Francophone West Indies for more information about the Créolité and Antillanité movements

Biography

Selected Works

Novels

_Ségou; les murailles de terre_, Paris: Laffont, 1984; as _Segu_, translated by Barbara Bray, New York: Viking, 1987

_Les Derniers Rois Mages_, Paris: Mercure, 1992

_La Colonie du Nouveau Monde_, Paris: Laffont, 1993

_La Migration des cours_, Paris: Laffont, 1995

Plays

_Dieu nous l’a donné_, Paris: Oswald, 1972

_Mort d’Oluwémi d’Ajumako_, Paris: Oswald, 1973

_Pension les Alizés_, Paris: Mercure, 1988

_An Tan Revolisyon_, Pointe-à-Pitre: Conseil Regional, 1989

_The Hills of Massabielle_, produced New York, 1991

Essays and Other Writings

_La Civilisation de bosalle_, Paris: L’Harmattan, 1978

_La Parole des femmes: essai des romancières des Antilles de langue française_, Paris: L’Harmattan, 1979

Further Reading

Bruner, David K., “Maryse Condé: Creative Writer in a Political World,” in _L’Esprit Créateur_ (Summer 1977)

Conventual Writing

Writing by the nuns of Spanish America is an exciting field of research that has come into its own in the past fifteen to twenty years. After centuries of neglect, scholars are beginning to realize the importance of these texts; as Arenal and Schlau noted: “these texts contain almost the only record we have of the consciousness of early modern women in Hispanic lands.” This statement requires one qualification: the women in question were exclusively white and of the middle or upper classes. Women of other races could be nuns’ servants, but not nuns themselves, at least not until the 18th century, when the daughters of the Indian nobility in Mexico finally had a convent of their own.

In colonial times the great majority of women were totally illiterate, though nuns often had some degree of literacy. There were also many, many religious communities in Spanish American cities, as the daughters of the upper and middle classes had but two options in life: marriage or the convent. For a daughter to enter a convent presupposed paying a dowry to the order, but once she was a nun, her spiritual and bodily well-being was assured. As religion permeated all aspects of colonial society, most women who took the veil were dutiful Catholics, but not all of them had a true religious calling. Furthermore, since nuns were perpetually enclosed within the walls of their convents, life within a religious community was often full of contention, strife, politics and even physical violence.

What did nuns write? All kinds of religious literature: devotional meditations, prayers, poetry, songs, plays to be performed on religious holidays, descriptions of mystical experiences, letters, records of the founding of convents, and spiritual autobiographies. It is the last of these that has attracted the most scholarly attention in recent years.
Pioneering research in this field of conventual writing was done by historians Josefina Muriel and Asuncion Lavrin, but as colonial documents are often interdisciplinary in nature, more recently literary scholars, especially feminists, have been drawn to the spiritual autobiographies of Spanish American nuns. For years the only text under consideration in this genre was Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz’s Respuesta a Sor Filotea, 1691 (The Answer) but now there are a number of other autobiographies available. Besides Arenal and Schlau’s study, Untold Sisters, which covers life stories by nuns in both Spain and Spanish America, there are three other works which are very useful when read in terms of comparison and contrast, especially since the nuns who authored them were more or less contemporaries: Madre María de San José (Mexico, 1656–1719); Francisca Josefa de la Concepción de Castillo, known as “La Madre Castillo” (Colombia, 1671–1742); and Ursula Suárez (Chile, 1666–1749).

Writing by nuns is not readily accessible to the modern reader for several reasons. First of all, the religious setting and its language are frequently unfamiliar to our more secular age. Because nuns had little formal education, their spelling and grammar are often whimsical, their punctuation erratic, and their vocabulary colloquial. (These factors make the texts of special interest to historians of the language, however.) One must also understand the conditions under which these autobiographies were produced. The great model for these nuns was the autobiography of St Theresa of Avila (1515–82). Because of her extraordinary qualities as a mystic and reformer, she had been ordered by her confessors to write down her life story, something she did not want to do, and did in a hurry. She was canonized in 1622, only forty years after her death, and her life, reforms and great devotion had an enormous impact on Spanish America. Many confessors looked at the nuns under their spiritual guidance, and urged those who also showed exceptional qualities to write down their lives. No, not urged—ordered. Many nuns found writing a harrowing task, and no wonder: because of their lack of education, they felt inferior setting pen to paper; what they wrote became the property of their confessor, and could be shown to the Inquisition; and the act of writing ran counter to all the Church had taught them. Exemplary nuns were to be silent and self-effacing, and were told to discipline both their flesh and their will in the service of God. Then to ask them to write their autobiography, the most self-affirming kind of writing there is, was extremely conflictive for many of these women. All three of the nuns under discussion here recorded their fear and revulsion at writing, though how much of this was formulaic is not certain.

Another problem was the women’s relationship to the confessors who not only ordered them to write, but had complete control over the texts the nuns produced. Their spiritual fathers could edit and publish them under their own name, burn them, forget them, or lose them. This happened to María de San José, whose previous confessor lost ten out of thirty notebooks she had written; a subsequent confessor ordered her to rewrite the missing part. Ursula Suárez’s confessor would give her only enough paper for each day’s writing, then take the pages away and not let her see them again, all the while insisting that she continue telling her life story. She was thus unable to give her autobiography any kind of inner cohesion. Because the nuns were aware of possible scrutiny by the Inquisition, they wrote circumspectly and within carefully delineated parameters, but in spite of this their stories have very personal touches, ranging from relationships with their families and sister nuns, to open ire at male and female superiors.
With all the emphasis on religion in this time, one would think that families would be glad when a daughter wanted to become a nun. This was not always the case. Some had to overcome a great deal of family hostility towards their choice of the religious life. Ursula Suárez’s mother was determined that her well-born daughter should marry well, while María de San José’s family simply could not afford the entrance dowry. For nearly thirty years she lived a religious life of fasting, devotion and penance within her family, which did not always find this behavior easy to live with. Because María de San José had to wait so long before she was able to enter a convent, her life story is an excellent account of daily life on a small Mexican ranch in the late 17th century.

All of these women experienced visions, heard God speak to them, and felt the ecstasy of direct communion with their Lord. As nuns were considered the brides of Christ, these visions and experiences at times took on decidedly erotic overtones. Yet mystical experiences also gave them the power of authority, as their confessors could not dispute that which the nuns had heard, seen, and felt. But how could they be sure it was God and not the Devil who spoke through them? We forget today how very dark the nights were for the people of earlier centuries, how filled with shadows, and fear of the Evil One. All three women attested to seeing the Devil, and, illustrative of the racism endemic to colonial society, said he appeared either as a Black or an Indian man. La Madre Castillo even attested to seeing the Devil dressed as a cleric glare at her balefully, then go into the cell of a sister nun.

Many nuns reported having visions, yet, instead of being hailed as a blessing, often led to fights with their sisters, who were jealous or thought it was a device to get attention. La Madre Castillo, who seemed to have been generally quite unpopular, suffered under this greatly, as she was physically attacked and verbally abused by other nuns in her convent. Ursula Suárez also had battles, but hers were political, as she was the ringleader of one faction in her convent. In spite of frequent strife, all three of these women became leaders in their communities: La Madre Castillo and Ursula Suárez were elected abbesses, and María de San José was selected to be one of the founders of a new convent of her order.

Spiritual autobiographies by nuns thus reveal a great deal of information about a significant sector of colonial Spanish American women: their concept of themselves in relationship first to their families and then to their communities, the manner in which female orders governed themselves, and finally the tactics of submission and subversion by means of which they navigated, in the words of Arenal and Schlau, “being a woman author who asserts her own authority even as she declares obedience to God’s and her confessor’s will.”

NINA M.SCOTT

See also entries on Colonial Literature: New Granada, New Spain and Peru; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz; Mystics

Further Reading

Conventual Writings
Arenal, Electa and Stacey Schlau (editors), Untold Sisters: Hispanic Nuns in Their Own Work, Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1989
Julio Cortázar 1914–1984

Argentine prose writer

Author of eight collections of short stories, five novels and a number of other books that are less easy to categorize, Julio Cortázar is one of the four most notable writers of the Boom and Argentina’s most influential and famous modern writer after Borges. In fact, it was the publication of one of Cortázar’s early stories, “Casa tomada” (The House Taken Over), in the journal Sur, on the advice of Borges, that brought the younger author to public attention. Cortázar had previously published poetry under the pseudonym of Julio Denis, and a verse play, Los reyes [The Kings], inspired by the myth of the Minotaur; but it was as a short story writer that he first made his name, and many still regard him as a master of that genre above all others.

Cortázar was something of a polyglot, and translated Robinson Crusoe and the stories of Edgar Allan Poe into Spanish; Poe’s influence is visible in a number of the Argentine’s tales. The first collection, of which “Casa tomada” was to be part, was Bestiario, 1951 [Bestiary]. It established a broad pattern that was to be followed in various guises for a long time thereafter: ordinary human beings in ordinary situations become caught up in extraordinary developments. Also evident is the influence of Alfred Jarry, for whom, as is well known, the rules were less interesting than the exceptions;
Cortázar’s debt to the French Symbolists and Surrealists has been demonstrated in a number of studies.

“Casa tomada” deals with a middle-aged brother and sister living alone and in comfort in a large family house; one day, one of them hears a noise in another part of the house and, concluding that the premises have been invaded, they confine their movements to “this side,” only to find themselves ever more constrained by the (always unidentified) invaders; eventually, the couple flee. The sense of there being two sides, one of which is unknown, beyond reach or forbidden, is something of a constant in Cortázar: his characters are often caught in designs that they can neither understand nor influence, often feel the need to go beyond the comfortably knowable and into the realm of the indefinable, the “other side.” Cortázar’s interest in Buddhism and the Vedanta may be at play, for the other side, even when it involves death, is often seen as a complementary mode of existence. Critics have had a field day with the ambiguities of “Casa tomada,” seeing it (for example) as a story about incest or as political allegory. That, too, is symptomatic: the impossibility of arriving at a single, unequivocal interpretation, as also the determination to try to do so, have been hallmarks of Cortázar criticism.

In Bestiario there are resonances and parallels between stories that suggest that there is more of an overall authorial design than can be discerned in the later collections. Many of the characters in Bestiario seem to have a monstrous dimension which is repressed and must be released; in the title story a young girl senses that a tiger is roaming through her house; in another its narrator starts to vomit rabbits. The fantastic and mysterious loom large in the subsequent story collections, Final del juego (End of the Game) and *Las armas secretas (Secret Weapons)—1956 and 1959 respectively. In “La noche boca arriba” (The Night Face Up) a hospital patient who has been in a motorcycle crash becomes a sacrificial victim on an Aztec pyramid; in “Lejana” [The Distant Woman] the soul of a young woman in Buenos Aires transmigrates to an old woman in Budapest; in “Las armas secretas,” one of Cortázar’s most accomplished and unsettling stories, a young Frenchman, increasingly possessed by the personality of a Nazi who had raped a French girl years earlier, comes to threaten to rape his own girlfriend. All three of the previous examples demonstrate Cortázar’s interest in the idea of the double and in portraying links (he was to coin the term “figuras”) between people in different times and places. Perhaps the prime example of this is the title story of Todos los fuegos el fuego, 1966 (All Fires the Fire), in which two tales of passion unfold, one in a Roman arena, one in the Paris of the 1960s, revealing increasing parallels and correspondences until they come to a common end by fire (hence the title can be understood to mean that all fires are particular instances of a general and timeless phenomenon: fire).

Despite all the fantastic elements there are also stories that are broadly realistic, such as those dealing with childhood and adolescence, both of which themes the author treated with masterly sensitivity: “Los venenos” (The Poison), “Final del juego” and “La señorita Cora” are examples.

In his later books of stories Cortázar continues to plumb the human psyche, and to experiment with techniques in doing so. For example, the theme of the transition from adolescence to adulthood, which had already given rise to some formal fireworks in the last story mentioned, is more daringly explored in “Vd. se tendió a tu lado” (You Lay Down at Thy Side) from the collection Alguien que anda por ahí, 1977 (A Change of Light and Other Stories). “Clone,” from Queremos tanto a Glenda, 1981 (We Love Glenda So Much), deals with a chamber choir (one of its members is Gesualdo—a clear reference to the Neapolitan composer and murderer) and its form is based on the disposition of “voices” in the different movements of Bach’s “Musical Offering.” Indeed, music is a considerable force in Cortázar’s literature: he makes many references to the classical and jazz repertoire, uses musical structures as metaphors, takes the inspiration for one of his most famous stories, “El perseguidor” (The Pursuer), from the life of Charlie Parker.

It was above all the liberating power of improvisation in jazz, the ability to break free of the pattern (even if it was to return to it eventually) that appealed to Cortázar. In many of his writings he portrays people as victims of routine, and advocates the case for breaking the pattern of the predictable; in one of his less easily classified books (and that itself is surely significant) he describes the behaviour of the “famas,” who are well organised, conventional and dull beings as compared with the lively and unpredictable “cronopios” (of whom Cortázar, of course, is one!). In Los premios, 1960 (The Winners), the first-published of his novels (he had written one earlier, but it was published posthumously) a group of competition winners find that their prize is to spend time on a ship anchored in the estuary of the River Plate close to Buenos Aires. They learn that a part of the ship is forbidden territory, and react to this news in a variety of ways, some passively acquiescing and some not. The novel combines sociopolitical criticism with a certain amount of metaphysical speculation; it also has a mysterious authorial presence in the person of Persio, hovering above and seeking a coherent design in the narrative. Here can be seen the seeds of what was to come.

Unable to tolerate the Peronist regime, Cortázar had left Argentina in 1951. Though he lived in France for some three decades, his creative writing was always in Spanish, and in a variety of it that is both accessible and easily recognisable as the language of the River Plate. It was in Paris and Buenos Aires that he set the novel that many regard as the greatest of the century in Latin America: Rayuela, 1963 (Hopscotch, see separate essay, below). The hopscotch figure is like a mandala, symbolizing the searches in which the various characters are involved, but also representing the challenge facing the reader. The latter is presented at the outset with an invitation to read the novel in at least two possible ways: the first is the conventional way, entailing beginning at the beginning and stopping at a line of asterisks, which, says the author rather scornfully, stand for “FIN” (The End); one might perhaps call this the “fama” reading. The second involves jumping about the book and including apparently extraneous material that is left out in the other reading. Needless to say, the second reading is the more challenging, demands more reader participation in the construction of the novelistic experience, and is the role Cortázar favours: that of the “lector cómplice” (participatory reader). Once again, we find the notion that there is “another side” to be discovered, reflected in the formal division of the book into three parts, the first of which is labelled “Del lado de allá” (That Side), the second “Del lado de acá” (This Side), while the third is “De otros lados (capítulos prescindibles)” (From Other Sides [dispensable chapters]). Buenos Aires is set against Paris. The protagonist, Oliveira, is an intellectual seeking a transcendental perspective; the Cartesian world-view is undermined; bridges are extended between opposites. To this metaphysical dimension is added literary speculation by the characters, in the shadow of a fantasmal author-figure called Morelli (some of whose precepts are to be read about in the “extraneous” chapters). Ponderous as all this may sound, the potential for pedantry and pretentiousness is avoided thanks to an iconoclastic humour that has few equals in Latin American literature. Cortázar is certainly concerned about the big issues, and every bit an intellectual, but he is also often very funny indeed. From a chapter in Rayuela was to come the idea for his next novel, 62: modelo para armar, 1968 (62: a Model Kit), which takes reader participation a stage further by providing the elements with which to build a narrative. His last novel Libro de Manuel, 1973 (A Manual for Manuel), is concerned with reconciling aesthetic concerns with politically engaged literature, to make creative writing accessible and socially meaningful to the public without compromising the use of language. In that novel a manual is being composed for the child Manuel, a sort of collage of press clippings about politically sensitive issues.

Once a fervent supporter of the Cuban Revolution (although his enthusiasm was reduced by the events of 1968), a frequent critic of the politics of the Southern Cone, and a champion of the Sandinistas (giving them the royalties of some of his last books), Cortázar was a man of impressive political strength, but equally strong as a defender of literature on its own terms. He faced many pressures to write more explicitly political literature, but was no more willing to compromise his writing than he was to abandon his struggle for a better society. Much of his work can in fact be read as political allegory; some of those in power found him explicit enough to have his books prohibited. For all that, he takes his place in literary history as a highly inventive and skilled writer who had much to say about existential and literary matters.

PETER STANDISH

Biography

Selected Works

Short Fiction

_Bestiario_, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1951
_Final del juego_, Mexico City: Los Presentes, 1956
_Las armas secretas_, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1959
_Todos los fuegos el fuego_, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1966; as _All Fires the Fire and Other Stories_, translated by Suzanne Jill Levine, New York: Pantheon, 1973; London: Boyars, 1979
_El perseguidor y otros cuentos_, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1967
_Ceremonias_, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1968 [Contains _Final del juego_ and _Las armas secretas_]
_La isla a mediodía y otros relatos_, Estella: Salvat, 1971
_Octaedro_, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1974
_Alguien que anda por ahí y otros relatos_, Madrid: Alfaguara, 1977
_Divertimento_, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1986

Novels

Poetry

_Presencia_, Buenos Aires: El Bibliófilo, 1938 [Published under the pseudonym Julio Denis]
_Pameos y meopas_, Barcelona: OCNOS, Editorial Llibres de Sinera, 1971
_Salvo el crepúsculo_, Madrid: Alfaguara, 1984

Plays

_Los reyes_, Buenos Aires: Gulab y Aldabahor, 1949
_Nada a Pehuajó, y Adiós, Robinson_, Mexico City: Katun, 1984

Essays and Other Writings

_Último round_, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1969
_Literatura en la revolución y revolución en la literatura_, in collaboration with Oscar Collazos and Mario Vargas Llosa, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1970
_Viaje alrededor de una mesa_, Buenos Aires: Cuadernos de Rayuela, 1970
Prosa del observatorio, in collaboration with Antonio Gálvez, photographs by Cortázar, Barcelona: Lumen, 1972

Humanario, Buenos Aires: La Azotea, 1976 [on the photographs of Alicia D’Amico and Sara Facio]

Los autonautas de la cosmopista; o, un viaje atemporal Paris—Marsella, in collaboration with Carol Dunlop, Barcelona: Muchnik, 1983

Argentina: años de alambradas culturales, edited by Saúl Yurkievich, Buenos Aires: Muchnik, 1984

Policrítica en la hora de los chacaletes, Concepción, Chile: LAR, 1987

Fantomas contra los vampiros multinacionales, Buenos Aires: GenteSur, 1989

Compilations and Anthologies

Cuentos, edited by Antón Arrufat, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1964

La casilla de los Morelli y otros textos, edited by Julio Ortega, Barcelona: Lumen, 1973

Los relatos, 3 vols, Madrid: Alianza, 1976

Cartas a una pelirroja, edited by Evelyn Picon Garfield, Madrid: Orígenes, 1990

Julio Cortázar: siete cuentos, edited by Peter Beardsall, Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1994 [Part of a series intended for students, with a long introduction]

Anthologies in Translation

Further Reading

Alazraki, Jaime, En busca del unicornio: los cuentos de Julio Cortázar, Madrid: Gredos, 1983

Hacia Cortázar: aproximaciones a su obra, Barcelona: Anthopos, 1994

Burgos, Fernando (editor), Los ochenta mundos de Cortázar: ensayos, Madrid: EDI-6, 1987

Carter, E. Dale (editor), Otro round: estudios sobre la obra de Julio Cortázar, Sacramento: California State University, 1988

Cedola, Estela, Cortázar: el escritor y sus contextos, Buenos Aires: Edicial, 1994

Giacoman, Helmy F. (editor), Homenaje a Julio Cortázar, New York: Las Américas, 1972

Lagmanovich, David (editor), Estudios sobre los cuentos de Julio Cortázar, Barcelona: Hispamérica, 1975
[Chapter on Octaedra]
Picon Garfield, Evelyn, ¿Es Julio Cortázar un surrealista? Madrid: Gredos, 1975
Rein, Mercedes, Julio Cortázar: el escritor y sus máscaras, Montevideo: Diaco, 1969
Viñas, David, De Sarmiento a Cortázar, Buenos Aires: Siglo XX, 1970 [Chapter on Cortázar]

Interviews
Prego, Omar, La fascinación de las palabras: conversaciones con Julio Cortázar, Barcelona: Muchnik, 1985

Bibliographies

Special Issues of Journals
Books Abroad, vol. 50/3 (1976)

---

Rayuela

Novel by Julio Cortázar
Published in 1963, Cortázar’s second novel is one of the principal works of the Latin American new narrative. It is also characteristic of the River Plate: its roots in the metaphysical tradition are evident; it is a Buenos Aires odyssey, following Roberto Arlt’s Los siete locos (The Seven Madmen) and Leopoldo Marechal’s Adán Buenosayres; and it is an instance, and a critique, of the traditional connections of educated and affluent citizens of the River Plate republics with European high culture, and especially with Paris.

In Rayuela, Western ways of thinking are explicitly criticised. More precisely, the habit of establishing categories, which are then accepted unquestioningly as real (this includes the passive reception of literary genres, as well as dictionary definitions) is perceived as dangerous and inhibiting, and is undermined, using reference to many modes of thought, including modern western science, as well as poetry, Zen, wordplay, and the absurd.

The construction of Rayuela virtually guarantees an active reader or “lector cómplice”, and hence multiple readings. There are two narrative sections: chapters 1–36—“Del lado de allá” (That side)—which are set in Paris, and chapters 37–56—“Del lado de acá” (This side)—set in Buenos Aires; the third section, chapters 57–155—“De otros lados, capítulos prescindibles” (Other places, optional chapters)—is a heterogeneous collection of texts. The author states in a “tablero de dirección” (table of instructions) that Rayuela is many different books, and proposes two principal readings: sequentially, ending at chapter 56; a hopscotch progress beginning at chapter 73, thereafter jumping at the end of each chapter to another, as directed.

The hopscotch has multiple significance. The notion of quest is implicit: in the game one progresses by stages from “earth” to “heaven.” However, the fact that hopscotch is a game implies that the quest requires childlike qualities, and that it is never conclusive; it is neither a place nor an allegorical map, merely a pattern. Its abstract, formal, repeatable nature (there are in Rayuela two real hopscotches, one in a Paris street, the other in a Buenos Aires lunatic asylum) on the one hand suggests the underlying patterns (figuras), often found in Cortázar’s stories—“La noche boca arriba” (The Night Face Up), for example—or Borges’s unseen labyrinths: “La muerte y la brújula” (Death and the Compass). Conversely, the pattern’s ubiquity and the unpredictability of the game suggest a surreal, rather than a causal universe (or narrative).

Reading sequentially, chapters I to 36 present the life of Horacio Oliveira, an Argentine intellectual misfit, in 1950s Paris where he has fled to escape what he considers a backward, derivative society. Oliveira, who mistrusts all linguistic and social structures and signs, is engaged on a search for meaning, his “kibbutz of desire.” The main foci of his existence are his Uruguayan companion, Maga, (the name means “enchantress”) and a circle of friends known as the “Club de la Serpiente” (Serpent Club). Maga’s conventional tastes and intellectual naivety coexist with instinctive apprehension of reality. As Oliveira observes: while he defines and describes, but cannot touch metaphysical rivers, she swims in them with the natural grace of a swallow in flight. The couple eschew definite assignations, instead staging chance encounters on the hopscotch of central Paris. Bridges, which link territories but do not belong in them, hold special fascination. The Club is the forum for intense discussion, and for drinking and listening to jazz. (References to jazz abound in Rayuela, and it is the subject of Cortázar’s story “El perseguidor” (The Pursuer), where the jazzman inhabits a complementary, non-rational reality). In Rayuela however, jazz (like sexual encounters) does not open a way through the inhibiting incrustation of culture. The resolution of the Paris section is triggered by the parting of Oliveira and Maga, and the death of her child, Rocamadour. This leads to Maga’s disappearance—perhaps suicide—and the Dantesque descent of Oliveira, who is arrested engaging in fellatio with a bag lady below a bridge over the Seine, and as a result of this transgressive act is deported. The dénouement contains some memorable episodes: the concert of the absurd, brave modernist pianist, Berthe Trépat (chapter 23); the sustained tension of the reunion of the Club while, unknown to Maga, Rocamadour lies dead in the same room (chapter 28).

Back in Buenos Aires, Oliveira associates with a long-time friend, Traveler, and his wife Talita. Tension grows, as it emerges that Traveler and Oliveira are doubles, and Talita resembles the lost Maga. Bridges continue to be important, notably the absurd physical and psychic bridge constructed between Oliveira and Traveler, which Talita straddles (chapter 41); a second key notion is of a porous reality, which is pierced by tunnels, rather like the wormholes of modern cosmology. This section also ends with Oliveira’s descent, this time into a comically-portrayed lucid lunacy: after kissing Talita/Maga in the basement morgue of the lunatic asylum where the three work, he expects Traveler’s attack, and barricades himself in his room. In fact, through “finding” Maga, Oliveira has crossed a threshold, and his real fear is the reimposition of a dead, absurd order, personified by the Arltian caricatures who own the asylum, rather than Traveler. The story ends in suspension: any attempt to invade Oliveira’s territory might provoke him to cross a second threshold, making a final leap onto the “heaven” square of a hopscotch below.

In the second proposed reading, the Paris and Buenos Aires chapters are encountered in the same relative order (except the deleted chapter 55, whose material is incorporated elsewhere), usually alternating with single chapters or series from the third section. As Steven Boldy puts it, the “optional” chapters are the culture (in the broadest sense) linking Paris and Buenos Aires (sections). The inserted texts may be poems, press cuttings etc., which resonate with allusions elsewhere in Rayuela, specific digressions, such as conversations or introspections, or new narrative branches, for example that detailing Oliveira’s relationship with a second lover, Pola. The ending also changes: while the sequential reading ends with the suspension of events, the second skips over the suspended events to a new stalemate of chapters 58 and 131, whose circling includes the theoretical, as well as the narrative aspects of Rayuela.

Chapter 22, in which an old man (subsequently revealed as an author, Morelli) is reported to have been run down in the street is, in terms of Rayuela’s own metaphors, the bridge linking these two aspects. Morelli’s thoughts are presented, directly or through the Club’s commentary; and he possesses a collection of texts—chapters of the novel’s third part (some labelled “Morelliana”)—which are to be assembled by the “lector cómplice” /the Club into a book.

Essentially, these chapters from the third section accompany the narrative with discussion of perception and representation, both in relation to (the) narrative, and in the broader context of occidental thought. The argument begins at chapter 73 with a declaration of the fluidity or arbitrariness of signs, one example used being Picasso’s car/ape sculpture, although given the concept of underlying figuras, Mambrino’s helmet (Don Quixote, Book I, chapter 21) is perhaps there too. A dismantling of language and genre culminates, near the end of the Paris section, in a group of chapters (particularly chapter 99) which is a kind of Morelli/Cortázar “manifesto.” Then, in the Buenos Aires half of the narrative, manifestly absurd analytical structures, such as Ceferino’s taxonomy, accompany and contrast with dissolution of categories in thought, as Oliveira approaches and crosses the sanity/madness threshold.

Cortázar and Morelli reiterate the principle that the reader is essential in the novel’s writing. This being the case, the suggested readings, like the bridges and tunnels, are also metaphors, and Morelli’s injunction to assemble a collection of texts a literal suggestion, not (only) a pointer to discovery of foreseen alternative structures (see Borges’s story, “Examen de la obra de Herbert Quain” (Examination of Herbert Quain’s Works). Secondly, chapter 115 includes the Morellian statement that he does not place characters in contexts, but, rather creates situations in the characters; he is concerned not with representation, but with the flow of mind. In the light of these principles, the multitudinous references—frequently simply namings—to jazz, painting, philosophy and literature, among other subjects, may be accepted as proof of the inevitability of multiple and autonomous readings/writings, rather than as a challenge for a painstaking Pierre Menard (chapter 22 leads us to Morelli; and see Borges’s story “Pierre Menard, autor del Quijote” [Author of the Quixote]).

PAUL JORDAN

Editions

Further Reading

Boldy, Steven, The Novels of Julio Cortázar, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1980 [Chapter 2 is on Rayuela]
Costa Rica

19th-and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

According to Abelardo Bonilla in Historia y antología de la literatura costarricense, 1957–61 [History and Anthology of Costa Rican Literature], when news of independence from Spain reached Costa Rica from Guatemala, it did not occasion significant expressions of patriotism because this geographic area, which had had little contact either with Spain or with the rest of Spanish America, already perceived itself as a nation. This precocious sense of independence was due in part to lax governing by the Spanish authorities, for whom Costa Rica was not a source of great wealth or power. The absence of mines and a relatively small indigenous population were factors that kept this province, so distant from the seat of government in Guatemala, from becoming an area of large-scale exploitation of natural resources, or of large plantations. The indigenous population, estimated to have been 50,000 in 1502, by 1810 had decreased to 8,000. The total population of Costa Rica, in fact, in the early years of Central American independence, was 50,000. Most Costa Ricans were farmers and lived in the central highlands in or near the cities of Cartago (the capital), San José, Heredia, and Alajuela.

By 1848, when Costa Rica officially established itself as an independent nation and not a part of a Central American confederation, its population had doubled (100,000) and its intellectuals and politicians had taken up the challenge of defining a national identity. Among the characteristics widely accepted as conforming to the Costa Rican national identity are: patriarchal, peace-loving, passive, conciliatory, timid, respectful of law and human rights, orderly, hard-working, democratic and homogeneous. Someone once called Costa Rica “the Switzerland of the Americas,” and this image, with its connotations of fair-skinned Europeanness, has also become commonplace, along with the observation that there is very little indigenous influence in popular culture. It is possible to read the literary history of Costa Rica as a dialectic of the nurturing and rejection of these myths of identity.

Writers during the second half of the 19th century, which encompassed the initial period of nation formation from 1848–89, tended to be doctors, lawyers and/or politicians, who wrote political speeches, essays on education, law, history and science, and texts appropriate for use in the newly founded schools. Newspapers were an important forum for the diffusion and debate of ideas and the exchange of opinion. The first printing press was brought to Costa Rica in 1830. The first printed newspapers were El Noticioso Universal, 1833–35 [The Universal News], Correo de Costa Rica, c.1833 [The Post of Costa Rica], and La Tertulia, 1834 [The Gathering]. A hand-written newspaper, La Tertulia Patriótica [The Patriotic Gathering], had circulated in 1824, published by Rafael Francisco Osejo, perhaps the most noteworthy intellectual of the pre and early independence period in Costa Rica. A native of Nicaragua, he went to Costa Rica in 1814 to establish the first institution of higher learning, the Casa de Enseñanza de Santo Tomás (The House of Teaching of St Thomas). Before its opening, young men from Costa Rica typically studied at the University of León in Nicaragua or the University of San Carlos in Guatemala. Osejo wrote the first locally-produced textbooks: Aritmética, 1830 [Arithmetic] and Geografía, 1833 [Geography], and was instrumental in composing the country’s first Law of Public Instruction in 1832. Between 1840 and 1850 the Escuela Normal (Teachers’ Training College) was founded, as well as the Liceo de Niñas (School for Girls). Costa Rica’s democratic attitude toward public education is wellknown and admired internationally, and Osejo is the first in an illustrious line of educators and political leaders who have maintained a tradition of free and equal access to public education. This prioritizing of public education has had an obvious salutary effect on the literary expression of the nation.

Osejo’s successor, José María Castro Madriz, was the founder and rector of the University of Santo Tomás, as well as president of Costa Rica from 1847 to 1849, and again from 1866 to 1868. His speech at the inauguration of the University, and the University’s statutes, which he composed and which establish the institution’s collective and autonomous character, are important cultural documents that reflect the essential independence and egalitarianism at the heart of Costa Rican national identity. Castro Madriz’s legacy was continued in the second half of the 19th century in the work of Jesús Jiménez (1823–1925), statesman and educational administrator, Julián Volio (1827–89), whose articles on topics of politics and education appeared in such publications as La República [The Republic], and El Noticiero [The News], and Mauro Fernández (1843–1905), who, as Minister of Education from 1886–89, was responsible for promulgating the General Law of Public Education of 1886. He also made the controversial decision to close the University of Santo Tomás in 1888, arguing that the country lacked a sufficient foundation at the primary and secondary levels to support a university. It was reopened in 1940.

Also contributing to the cultural atmosphere of the second half of the 19th century were numerous intellectuals from Europe, Latin America, and the United States who spent time in Costa Rica involved in research, teaching, journalism, and publishing. Among them were various German scientists such as Alejandro von Frantzius, who studied and wrote on the flora, fauna and geography of Costa Rica; the Cuban revolutionary Antonio Zambrano, who lived in Costa Rica from 1876–1906 and is credited with popularizing there the ideas of Positivism, which deeply influenced much of the narrative of the time. The visits in 1891 of the famous Nicaraguan modernista poet, Rubén Darío, and the Cuban writer and revolutionary José Martí, also served as a stimulus to local intellectuals. Numerous Central American writers have, at various times, lived in Costa Rica and participated in literary life. Of note in the late 19th century were Salvadorean Alberto Masferrer and Guatemalan Máximo Soto Hall, who founded the first newspaper in Costa Rica with sections devoted to literature and art, El Diario de Costa Rica, 1885 [The Costa Rica Daily]. The presence and influence of foreign writers, particularly from other Central American countries, has continued to the present. Many Nicaraguans, for example, such as Sergio Ramirez and Daisy Zamora, spent time in Costa Rica during the Sandinista war against Somoza in the 1970s. Manlio Argueta of El Salvador and Mario Morales of Guatemala are but two more of the numerous examples of Central American writers who have sought and found refuge in Costa Rica.

The most common forms of written expression during the 19th century were to be found in the numerous newspapers and periodicals that carried interviews with public figures and articles and essays of a polemical nature on political, social, and cultural topics. It was customary for contributors to use pseudonyms, due to the incendiary nature of much of their writing. Most of these periodicals were published at irregular intervals and were short-lived. Not until late in the century were there daily newspapers, such as the above-mentioned El Diario de Costa Rica, La Prensa Libre [The Free Press] and El Heraldo de Costa Rica [The Herald of Costa Rica]. These daily publications often included reviews, literary criticism, short stories and poems, and promoted literary expression through the sponsorship of literary contests and prizes. Pío Víquez (1848–99) was one of the most prominent journalists of this time. He founded and directed El Heraldo de Costa Rica and was known for his humorous and iconoclastic articles that included travel narratives, sketches of daily life, and commentary on art and politics.

With the exception of a brief and tantalizing summary of the literary accomplishments of Manuela Escalante, who lived in San José during the first half of the 19th century, there are no Costa Rican women writers of this period discussed or anthologized in the histories of Costa Rican literature. Whether this is due to an absence of women dedicated to writing at this time, or to a critical practice that has ignored or been blind to women’s literary presence, will be resolved only if scholars take on the task of researching this phenomenon.

One of the few records currently available to scholars interested in Costa Rican poetry of the 19th century is Lira costarricense, 1890 [Costa Rican Lyre], an anthology of poetry from the second half of the century compiled by Máximo Fernández. Among the poets included are Emilio Pacheco Cooper (1865–1905), Justo A. Facio (1859–1931), and José María Alfaro Cooper (1861–1939). Alfaro Cooper’s extensive religious poem La epopeya de la cruz, 1921 [The Epic of the Cross], is the only example in Costa Rican literature of epic poetry. There are no women poets in the anthology.

Literary historians agree that the dominance of costumbrismo is the distinguishing characteristic of Costa Rican narrative until well into the 20th century. Costumbrismo in Costa Rica is diverse in tone, technique, and degree of criticism of the national reality, but what all costumbrista texts have in common is that they focus on the customs, language, and social patterns of Costa Rica. They are descriptive and colloquial. The following three early practitioners of costumbrismo display the trends that later costumbrist writers would follow.

Manuel González Zeledón (1864–1936), who used the pseudonym Magón, is one of costumbrismo’s most beloved writers. He began publishing sketches of Costa Rican life in 1885 in the periodical La Patria [The Fatherland]. In 1910 he moved to the United States where he lived until shortly before his death in 1936. His stories and sketches, most of which are based on his own life and retold with humour, irony, and nostalgia, paint a picture of life in Costa Rica in the 19th century that sentimentalizes the patriarchal structure and locates national identity in language and folklore. His descriptions of market scenes, rural celebrations, and everyday interactions are full of affection and good humour.

In Aquileo J. Echeverría’s (1866–1909) short stories, Crónicas y cuentos míos [My Chronicles and Stories], published posthumously in 1934, one can see the influence of the modernista aesthetic of musical, sensual prose, but he is remembered primarily for his Concherías, a term he invented to describe costumbrista sketches in verse that reproduce the regional speech of the conchos or rural Costa Ricans.

Joaquín García Monge’s brand of costumbrismo is often described as realist because he flavour’s his descriptions of rural as well as urban Costa Rican life with a Naturalist perspective and a denunciation of society’s ills. This is apparent in El moto, 1990 [The Orphan] and La hijas del campo, 1900 [Daughters of the Countryside]. Besides his contribution to the novel, García Monge is an important figure in Costa Rican literature because he founded and directed the Repertorio Americano, 1919–58 [American Repertory], an influential and unusually long-lived cultural journal of international circulation. He encouraged Costa Rican writers and published their essays, stories, and poems alongside the submissions of illustrious writers from Spanish America and Spain and translations of offerings by Europeans and North Americans.

The beginnings of costumbrismo were concurrent with the widespread popularity in much of Spanish America of Modernismo, whose aesthetics and ideology were radically different from costumbrismo’s regional focus and folksy diction. These differences inspired a literary debate regarding the use of popular speech in literature. Those who argued for its appropriateness included Carlos Gagini (1865–1925), a short story writer and philologist, whose Diccionario de barbarismos y provincialismos de Costa Rica, 1892 [Dictionary of Costa Rican Idioms and Regionalisms], reedited in 1919 as Diccionario de Costarriqueñismos [Dictionary of Typical Costa Rican Speech], bears testimony to a national trend to embrace, as central to the national identity, all that could be considered typically Costa Rican, even and especially if it did not coincide with the cultural norms of the metropolis. Fernández Guardia articulated the opposing point of view, insisting that the Spanish language not be deformed by elevating regional expressions and “mispronunciations” to the status of literary language. Those who argued for a home-grown thematic and aesthetic proved unquestionably to be in the majority.

The desire for Costa Rican literature to be more cosmopolitan, eurocentred, or universal, has remained a weak, yet constant, counterpoint to the more prevalent impulse to observe, describe, and define the local scene. This has been true of poetry as well as prose, evidenced by the extreme popularity of the costumbrista Concherías, as compared to the minor influence of Modernismo. The foremost modernista poet was Rafael Cardona, whose Poema de las piedras preciosas, 1914 [Poems of the Precious Stones], although published after the popularity of Modernismo had waned in most of Spanish America, is clearly modernista in theme, language, and musicality.

The cultivation of coffee was introduced in 1804, and in 1844 the first shipments to England initiated a period of economic growth that gradually transformed Costa Rica into a capitalist economy with an extensive transportation and communication infrastructure. In 1897 banana cultivation began, and the Atlantic coast became the scene of large-scale investment in this crop. The social displacement, alienation, and oppression occasioned by the new system or large plantations devoted to coffee and banana production, often owned by foreign companies, and by the exigencies inherent in an export economy, became a persistent theme in much Costa Rican narrative from the end of the 19th century well into the 20th. The writers who explored this painful side of Costa Rican reality include many of the country’s most acclaimed novelists and short-story writers. Noteworthy among those who came to be known as the Generation of 1940 are Carlos Luis Fallas (1909–66), whose novel Mamita Yunai, 1941 [Mommy United Fruit], is based on his personal experiences as a worker and union organizer on the banana plantations; Fabián Dobles (b. 1918), author of Ese que llaman pueblo, 1942 [What the People are Called] and El sitio de las abras, 1950 [Where the Clearings Are]; Joaquín Gutiérrez (b. 1918), whose novel Puerto Limón deals with the situation of workers on the Atlantic Coast.

But not all Costa Rican writers were content to cultivate the various types of costumbrismo and Social Realism. Yolanda Oreamuno (1916–56) published in 1943 in Repertorio Americano “Protesta contra el folklore,” [Protest against Folklore], a critique of costumbrista literature that she claimed had become shallow through repetition. She argues for a literature that embraces the urban environment and the psychological suffering caused by the bureaucratic and technological changes of contemporary society. Her novel, La ruta de su evasión, 1949 [The Route of Their Escape], incorporates the then experimental techniques of stream of consciousness and interior monologue. The text is a complex and tortuous introspection by characters located in no explicitly defined time or place.

Oreamuno was a pioneer because she dared to challenge the literary Establishment and because she was a woman attempting to forge a place for herself in Costa Rican letters. She was preceded by a handful of literary foremothers. One of the first was María Fernández de Tinoco (1877–1961), a novelist and archaeologist as well as a founding member of the Theosophical Society of Costa Rica. This esoteric belief system was popular among Costa Rican intellectuals in the early years of the 20th century. Among its adherents were José Basileo Acuña and Rafael Cardona. Given the virtual extinction of the indigenous population of Costa Rica, Fernández de Tinoco’s two novels, Zulai (1909) and Yonta (1909), which advance an esoteric theory to explain the origin of preColombian civilizations in the New World, are anomalies. None the less, the author has the distinction of being the first woman in Costa Rica to publish a literary text.

María Isabel Carvajal (1888–1949), who used the pseudonym Carmen Lyra, wrote Bananos y hombres, 1931 [Bananas and Men], a Social Realist novel, but is best known for Los cuentos de mi tía Panchita, 1920 [My Aunt Panchita’s Stories], still read and loved by Costa Rican children. She was instrumental in legitimizing children’s literature among Costa Rican writers. Other practitioners of this genre include Lilia Ramos (1903–88), Carlos Luis Sáenz (1899–1984), and Marilín Echeverría (writing under the pseudonym Lara Ríos). Carvajal also contributed to Costa Rican literary life by befriending and encouraging many young writers. A teacher and an active member of the Communist Party, her home in San José doubled as a print shop for political and educational publications and a gathering place for Latin American political exiles as well as Costa Rican students and intellectuals.

Luisa González (b. 1904) was a writer, educator and political activist who founded, with Carmen Lyra, the first preschool in Costa Rica. Among her literary accomplishments are the editing of Nuestra Voz [Our Voice], a newspaper for women, and A ras del suelo, 1970 [Ground Level], an auto-biographical narrative that portrays her childhood in a poor neighbourhood in San José.

Following Yolanda Oreamuno’s example, a number of women have enriched Costa Rican narrative with innovative and arresting fiction. Carmen Naranjo (b. 1931), a prominent figure in Costa Rican cultural life, has written many novels, including Los perros no ladraron, 1966 [The Dogs Did Not Bark], a critique of bureaucracy, and Diario de una multitud, 1974 [Diary of a Crowd], a collage of urban voices. She has also written poetry and essays. Her short stories are perhaps her most successful writing. They address such themes as political corruption, lost idealism, ambiguous sexuality, and women’s struggle for autonomy. Anacristina Rossi’s (b. 1952) María la noche, 1985 [Maria the Night], won the national award for the novel in 1985. Its exploration of feminine sexuality and its lyricism appear again in her latest works: La loca de Gandoca, 1992 [The Madwoman of Gandoca], an ecological novel based on actual happenings, and Situaciones conyugales, 1993 [Conjugal Situations], a collection of short stories. Linda Berrón has written short stories and a novel, El expediente, 1989 [The File], a playful and ironic love story with a feminist twist. She directs the recently established publishing company, “Mujer” [Woman], devoted to publishing works by and about women.

Tatiana Lobo was born in Uruguay but now makes Costa Rica her home. Her excellent collection of stories, Tiempo de claveles, 1989 [Time of Carnations], was followed by the ambitious and imaginatively conceived historical novel Asalto al paraíso, 1992 [ Assault on Paradise]. Lobo’s novel represents a high point in a contemporary trend in the Costa Rican novel to reconsider and redefine their history and national identity, questioning official versions and foregrounding previously marginalized or ignored groups, events, and regions of the country. Other examples are Así en la vida como en la muerte, 1975 [In Life as in Death], by Gerardo César Hurtado (b. 1949); Breve historia de todas las cosas, 1975 [A Brief History of Everything], by Marco Tulio Aguilera Gurramuño; and Samuel Rovinski’s Ceremonia de casta, 1975 [Family Ritual].

Following the Civil War of 1948, there was a decade of relatively little literary production. The themes that most fiction writers gravitated to in the 1960s and 1970s were the various existential crises occasioned by urban growth. Some examples are Julieta Pinto’s A la vuelta de la esquina, 1975 [Around the Corner] and Alfonso Chase’s Mirar con inocencia, 1975 [To Look Innocently].

The lives of the African-Caribbean inhabitants of the Atlantic Coast entered Costa Rican literature through the novels of Carlos Luis Fallas. In Mamita Yunai, for example, their socio-economic situation is emphasized. Quince Duncan (b. 1940), Costa Rica’s first African-Caribbean writer, has broadened and deepened this presence by introducing the identity issues related to being a minority ethnic group within a country that has historically seen itself as homogeneous. Among his novels are Hombres curtidos, 1971 [Hardened Men] and Kimbo, 1989. Eulalia Bernard, an African-Caribbean poet, has published Ritmohéroe, 1982, [Rhythmhero], a collection of poems that express with irony, honesty, and affection, the daily life of her people, seen through the lens of an acute political awareness.

Costa Rica’s poetry of the 20th century is more difficult to categorize than its fiction. Numerous poets have experimented with an intensely subjective and intimate expression on the one hand, or have followed the various Spanish American trends such as exteriorism and conversational poetry, which communicate an attitude of solidarity and anti-elitism. Poets who represent the former include Isaac Felipe Azofeifa (b. 1909), Mario Picado Umaña (b. 1928), and Alfonso Chase (b. 1945). Julieta Dobles (b. 1943) and Laureano Albán (b. 1942) tend towards the latter generalization. A third trend has been to incorporate classical and biblical or pre-Colombian myths in a poetry that strives for transcendence, such as Quetzalcoatl (1947), by José Basileo Acuña. Recent women’s poetry is often openly celebratory of female sexuality and questioning of gender roles. A precursor was Eunice Odio (1922–74), whose Los elementos terrestres, 1948 [Terrestrial Elements] is a collection of eight long poems that project a mystical-erotic vision of gender relations. A more recent example is La estación de fiebre, 1982 [The Season of Fever], by Ana Istarú (b. 1960).

Costa Rica in the 1990s has become a most desirable tourist destination. The national identity myth that Yolanda Oreamuno, ever the iconoclast, openly criticized in 1939 in “El ambiente tico y los mitos tropicales” [The Tropical Myths and the Costa Rican Environment]: That Costa Rica is a tropical paradise populated by beautiful women and peace-loving men, blessed with beautiful beaches, exuberant tropical nature, and a climate of eternal spring; that the nation is a democracy, committed to egalitarianism and public education, disinterested in bearing arms; that Costa Rica is “the Switzerland of Central America” i.e. homogeneously white—these national myths have survived and continue to be exploited. None the less, as Costa Rican literature travels through the 20th century from costumbrismo through Naturalism and Social Realism, grappling with change and the pressures of the modern world, it has often painted a different picture. Costa Rica as seen through its literature is more complex, less homogeneous, less complacent and less egalitarian than the myth.

Abelardo Bonilla (1899–1969) has been extremely influential in determining the Costa Rican literary canon. In his exhaustively researched and generously inclusive Historia y antología de la literatura costarricense, 1957 [History and Anthology of Costa Rican Literature], he established coherent parameters and offered judicious evaluations that subsequent scholars, critics, and literary historians have followed with only minor deviations. Magza Zavala and Seidy Araya, in their provocative La historiografía literaria en América Central, 1995 [Literary Historiography in Central America], examine Bonilla’s aesthetic and political assumptions and offer suggestions for future literary historians searching for more timely ways to organize, evaluate, and make sense of the literature not only of Costa Rica but of Central America.

JANET N. GOLD

Further Reading

Duncan, Quince (editor), El negro en la literatura costarricense, San José: Editorial Costa Rica, 1975

Garnier, Leonor (editor), Antología femenina del ensayo costarricense, San José: Ministerio de Cultura, Juventud y Deportes, 1976

——, Literatura costarricense: antología y biografías, San José: Librería e Imprenta Lehmann, 1927

Special Issues of Journals

José de la Cuadra 1903–1941

Ecuadorian prose writer and journalist
Best known for his short stories, José de la Cuadra is one of the most illustrious Ecuadorian writers in terms of technical expertise and political commitment. He was an active member of the Generation of 1930 and of the Group of Guayaquil. As a lawyer, professor and social activist, he steadfastly served the popular classes, especially the montuvios—lowland peasants, inhabitants of the coastal region of Ecuador—whose world, customs, and language he carefully observed in his pioneering essay, El montuvio ecuatoriano, 1937 [The Ecuadorian Montuvio].

Four historical events were key in the development of Cuadra’s progressive political and literary ideology: the popular uprising of 15 November 1912, in the course of which an estimated 1,000 workers were massacred in Guayaquil; the July Revolution of 1925, led by a group of young, progressive military officers; the founding of the Socialist Party in 1926; and the publication in 1930 of Demetrio Aguilera Malta, Joaquín Gallegos Lara and Enrique Gil Gilbert’s Los que se van: cuentos del cholo i del montuvio [The Disappearing Ones: Tales of Halfbreeds and Hillbillies], a seminal work in modern Ecuadorian fiction. Cuadra’s belief in the writer’s responsibility to criticize injustice prompted him to formulate, for the first time in Ecuador, the foundations of a popular committed literature of “denunciation and protest.”

The Ecuadorian coast, known for its brutal exploitation of peasants, is the setting of Cuadra’s work: Although the agricultural bourgeoisie of Guayaquil controlled this region throughout the 19th century, there existed simultaneously a social organization, ruled by peasant caciques. The latter, however, were displaced by the expansion of the urban bourgeoisie at the beginning of the 20th century. The demise of caciquismo ended a way of life shared by many peasants of the Ecuadorian lowlands. The fascinating world of the montuvio, on the border of myth and history, was rescued for future generations by the writers of the Generation of 1930. They were urban middle-class intellectuals of popular extraction, who sought the institutionalization of an Ecuadorian national language drawing from different popular idioms.
Of Cuadra’s early books, El amor que dormía, 1930 [Love Sleeping] is characterized by a certain pompousness in a Romantic and modernista vein. However, in some of the stories of Repisas, 1931 [Display Case], Cuadra had already perfected many elements of his writing: realistic crudeness of language and themes, an ample register of popular voices, a tragic conception of human destiny, and the unconditional demand for justice. The last trait is evident, for example, in the strange vengeance exacted by a retarded boy, as recounted in “Chumbote.” The twelve short stories of Horno, 1932 [Oven] adumbrate Cuadra’s mature work with its faithful representation of the world-view of the montuvio. We find there as well a kind of linguistic synthesis, a laconic expressiveness—effective antidotes to what Alfredo Pareja Diezcanseco called the “baroque excesses of tropicalism”—which turn such stories as “Banda de pueblo” (Travelling Musicians), “La Tigra” (The Tigress), “Olor de cacao” (The Scent of Cocoa) into masterpieces. “Banda de pueblo” has been hailed by Jorge Enrique Adoum as the greatest short story in Spanish.

After this book, Cuadra’s language would express a bitter irony, stripped of rhetorical flourishes, reproducing in a succinct style the speech of his characters. Cuadra’s last work in this genre, Guásinton, 1938 [Washington], is a collection of fourteen diverse stories linked by a sparse style and a sharp psychological analysis. In this work, Cuadra explores the collective consciousness of the montuvios as he searches for symbols that convey the human condition and imprint it in collective memory. Thus he presents such memorable figures as the mythical-legendary alligator, Guásinton, “feudal lord of the Montuvian waters,” or men with tragic destinies like the healer and miracle-worker, Camilo Franco.

Of particular importance for the subsequent development of the Latin American narrative was Cuadra’s short excursus into the realm of the novel, Los Sangurimas, 1934 [The Sangurimas] and the unfinished Los monos enloquecidos, 1931 [The Mad Monkeys], published posthumously in 1951. In Los Sangurimas Cuadra emerges as the precursor of magical realism in Spanish America, anticipating by thirty three years García Márquez’s classic Cien años de soledad, 1967 (One Hundred Years of Solitude), a work considered to be the epitome of the genre. Los Sangurimas superimposes various levels of reality: mythic, legendary, magical, hyperbolic, symbolic, historical, and sociological. It is a polysemic recreation of coastal peasants’ lives, which proceeds from the sociological principles Cuadra himself develops, three years later, in his essay El montuvio ecuatoriano. This work can be considered one of the main contributions to the social thought regarding Ecuador’s indigenous peoples, as well as a theory of national culture.

It was a long and difficult process of experimentation which led Cuadra towards the mythical-legendary world view finally expressed in Los Sangurimas. For example, the mythical and circular structure of time is present in short stories like “Guásinton,” “Cubillo, buscador de ganado” (Cubillo, the Cattle Rustler), and “Galleros” (Cock Fighters), where the reader can detect the artistic use of elements of popular culture such as fables, folk-accounts, and superstitions. The tragic symbolism of “Banda de pueblo” is a key part of the transition from traditional realism towards a magical one: nine hallucinating beings—eight men and one child—anti-heroes of the tropics, musicians roaming through coastal villages, transcend their apparent simplicity to become fantastic characters, hyperbolic creatures who flirt insolently with death and life. Finally, “La Tigra,” a story written after Los Sangurimas, presents the intertwining of multiple levels of reality, using the theme of the virile woman. The young Pancha, having witnessed the violent death of her parents, seeks to avenge them and protect the virginity of her younger sister, Sarita, by becoming “Francisca the Tigress.” Cuadra explores the dilemma of personal freedom, the psychology of a sado-masochistic woman, the fixation of hatred. There seems to be a kind of fatalism at work as Pancha becomes a male-devouring woman. The metaphorical structure, the poetic intensity, the linguistic economy, the interaction of lineal and circular plots, the closed and oppressive space, and the ritualized sexual orgies make “La Tigra” a clear precursor of the magical-realistic tradition.

But it is Los Sangurimas that provides a synthesis of Cuadra’s world-view in techniques and concerns. It is both a personal and collective story, a dialectical interplay between fiction and reality, clearly showing Ecuadorian particularities within Spanish America. Various narrative levels are superimposed, driving the novel in many directions both temporally and spatially. On the surface, the novel appears simple and traditional. It begins with a prologue in which Cuadra develops “La teoría del matapalo” [The Theory of the Matapalo]. The matapalo, a large, robust tree growing in the coastal plains of Ecuador, serves as a metaphor for the world view of the Montuvian people, whose way of life is centered around violence and machismo. The three central parts of the novel are entitled: (1) “El tronco añoso” (The Old Tree-trunk), which recounts the life of the lecherous patriarch Nicasio Sangurima, the mythical reincarnation of the matapalo; (2) “Las ramas robustas” (The Sturdy Branches), which present the stories of four of Nicasio’s many children: Colonel Eufrasio (an illiterate, womanizer, a looter, and the murderer of his brother), the lawyer Francisco (a despised and corrupt traitor), Father Terencio (the drunken and opportunistic exploiter of his parishioners), and the farmer Ventura (an egotistical, greedy, and subservient man, “un grandísimo pendejo” [a big fool]); (3) “Torbellino en las hojas” (Whirlwind in the Leaves), which narrates the generational conflict set in motion by incestuous relationships: intense fighting divides the family, and the section ends with homicide and the profanation of the magical world the characters inhabit. In the epilogue, entitled “Palo abajo” (The Fallen Matapalo), we witness Nicasio’s madness and the final destruction of the Sangurima family and the matapalo tree.

Time and space in the novel have a mythical and cyclical life of their own. Violence, solitude, lack of love and of communication also emerge as cyclical and of mythical proportions. They are unavoidable and their consequences imply destruction as illustrated by the contrapuntal repetition of key elements: life, death, water, soil, shadow, and light, which give life to Cuadra’s magical realist style.

Cuadra’s literary world, as a saga of the Montuvian people, is a legacy of intense aesthetic and social significance. As he once said, “A people without a mythical past is like a man who has never been a child.” Thus the mythical past and the conflictual present are rendered with tenderness, solidarity, humanity, on the one hand, and with crudity, corrosive irony, and bitter humor, on the other. His unforgettable characters are complex human beings, rather than Manichean creatures. Cuadra’s threefold commitment—to his people, his art and his ideology—bears testimony and becomes a testament: a written proof of the socio-political meaning of literature.

PABLO A. MARTÍNEZ
Biography

Born in Guayaquil, Ecuador, 3 September 1903. Attended Vicente Rocafuerte High School, Guayaquil; entered University of Guayaquil as a student of law in 1921, obtaining his first degree in 1927. Studied for a doctorate in law. Participated actively in student organizations and founded the Universidad Popular, intended for the underprivileged, in 1925. Married Inés Múñez del Arco Andrade in 1928. He was also a teacher in secondary and tertiary education; a civil servant who held important posts such as General Secretary of Public Administration. Professor of Penal Law at the University of Guayaquil; 1937. In addition he represented his country as consul in Argentina and Uruguay. Died in Guayaquil in 1941.

Selected Prose Works

Oro de sol, Guayaquil: El Telégrafo, 1924
Perlita Lila (recuerdos), Guayaquil: Mundo Moderno, 1925 [memoir]
Olga Catalina, Guayaquil: Mundo Moderno, 1925
Sueño de una noche de Navidad, Guayaquil: Artes Gráficas “Senefelder”, 1930 [Published under the pseudonym Ortuño Zamudio]
El amor que dormía, Guayaquil: Artes Gráficas “Senefelder,” 1930 [short fiction]
Repisas (narraciones breves), Guayaquil: Artes Gráficas “Senefelder,” 1931 [short fiction]
La vuelta de la locura, Madrid: Dédalos, 1932
Horno, cuentos, Guayaquil: Tipografía y Librería de la Sociedad Filantrópica, 1932 [short fiction]
12 siluetas, Quito: America, 1934 [Sketches of his own generation of Ecuadorian authors]
Los Sangurimas, novela montuvia ecuatoriana, Madrid: Cenit, 1934 [novella]
El montuvi ecuatoriano (ensayo de presentación), Buenos Aires: Imán, 1937 [An essay on the people of Cuadra’s own region]
Guásinton; relatos y crónicas, Quito: Talleres Gráficos de Educación, 1938 [short fiction]
Palo de balsa, Quito: America, 1938
Los monos enloquecidos, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1951

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras completas, edited by Jorge Enrique Adoum, with a prologue by Alfredo Pareja Diezcanseco, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1958
Cuentos, with a prologue by Jorge Enrique Adoum, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1970

Further Reading

Robles, Humberto E., Testimonio y tendencia mítica en la obra de José de la Cuadra, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1976
———“De San Borondon a Samborondón (José de la Cuadra), Nuevo Texto Crítico, vol. 4/8 (1991)
Cuba

19th- and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

Cuban literature is generally said to begin with Silvestre de Balboa, who was born in the Canary Islands and was the city clerk of Puerto Príncipe (Camagüey). At the beginning of the 17th century he wrote a historical epic poem in royal octaves, Espejo de paciencia [Mirror of Patience], inspired by the kidnapping of the bishop Fray Juan de las Cabezas y Altamirano by the French pirate Gilberto Girón. This poem is accompanied by six laudatory sonnets written by separate authors and a motet composed by Balboa himself, all of which form an exceptional and early illustration of the importance that poetry was beginning to have in the country’s life.

The foundation of various educational institutions represented an important step forward in the cultural life of the country, in whose capital a printing press had been established in the first few years of the 17th century. In 1722 the Seminario de San Basilio was founded in Santiago de Cuba, and in 1728 the University of Havana. The year 1773 saw the creation, also in Havana, of the Colegio Seminario de San Carlos, one of the most significant institutions as regards the country’s cultural life during its long colonial period. This century also gave rise to another important aspect of Cuba’s intellectual life: the emigration of leading figures, who left the country in search of a more favourable cultural environment. During this period, three Cubans dedicated to religious oratory achieved public recognition in Mexico: Brother José Manuel Rodríguez, José Julián Parreño and Francisco Javier Conde y Oquendo. However, no truly outstanding literary figures emerged in the course of this century.

Cuban literature’s second period, which began around 1790, includes the island’s transformation from trading post to colony, and the emergence of a national identity, with some serious expressions in the fields of poetry and reflexive prose, and, to a lesser extent, those of narrative and drama, the latter genre meriting the mention of the work by Santiago Pita, El príncipe jardinero y fingido Cloridano [The Gardener Prince and Fake Cloridano], printed in Seville in 1730. There emerged, also, a current that would manifest itself forcefully and constantly in the country’s literature: costumbrismo, the genre depicting customs and manners. Journalism began in 1790 with the publication of the Papel Periódico de la Havana [The Havana Periodical Paper], and became the principal vehicle for literary diffusion in Cuba during the greater part of the 19th century.

The first important poet was José María Heredia (1803–39), whose pro-independence ideas led to his early exile. Heredia, a cultured poet inheriting a Neoclassical tradition, and who displayed an intense Romantic style, is one of the first great names in Spanish American literature. Amongst the most notable of his compositions are “En el Teocalli de Cholula” [In the Teocalli of Cholula], “Niágara”, “Himno del desterrado” [The Hymn of the Exile], “Inmortalidad” [Immortality], “A mi esposa” [To My Wife] and “A Emilia” [To Emilia], Heredia’s poetry, published in New York in 1825, exerted a productive influence on the literary life of the country during the first half of the 19th century.

In the field of prose writing, the most notable figures of this time were Francisco de Arango y Parreño (1765–1837), Father Felix Varela (1787–1853), José Antonio Saco (1797–1879), José de la Luz y Caballero (1800–62,) and Domingo Delmonte (1804–53).
Together they developed the nation’s intellectuality in such areas as the economy, sociology, education, philosophy and literary criticism.

Alexander von Humboldt described Arango y Parreño—whose work focused principally on the country’s economy—as an eminent statesman. Felix Varela excelled in the field of philosophy, and served as Cuba’s representative to the Spanish Cortes (Parliament). Because of his political convictions, he was sentenced to death in 1823, during the second of Ferdinand VII’s absolutist political reactions. Having managed to escape, he spent the rest of his life in exile in the United States, where he supported the idea of Cuban independence, and where his work within the Catholic Church was so distinguished that he achieved the post of vicar-general of New York. José Antonio Saco was one of the century’s most notable figures of the Cuban intelligentsia. In his works, the central preoccupation was the country’s identity, for which he postulated an evolutionary process the best result of which would lead to independence, and the least desirable, to the annexation of Cuba by the United States.

On these foundations, the second division of this period began, in 1834, when the literature of the country grew in strength while undergoing a transformation. Lyrical poetry, established by the previous works of innumerable poets, and wholly dignified by Heredia, came to the forefront of literary life, and costumbrismo manifested itself emphatically and with ingenuity.

After Heredia’s death in exile, three poets came to dominate this initial stage of Romanticism in Cuba: Gabriel de la Concepción Valdés (1809–44), José Jacinto Milanés (1814–63) and Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda (1814–73). Valdés, who became famous under the pseudonym Plácido, is the first Cuban writer of any consequence with mixed Spanish and African origins. Plácido came from the stream of versifiers that ran throughout Cuban literature, and he brought to the country’s poetry an air of fine transparency that stands out in some of his best compositions, such as “Jicotencal,” “A una ingrata” [To an Ungrateful Woman], “La luna de enero” [The January Moon], “Égloga cubana” [Cuban Eclogue], “La flor del café” [Coffee Blossom], “La flor de caña” [Cane Blossom] and “La flor de la piña” [Pineapple Blossom]. The strong desire for liberty expressed in other exceptional poems—“El juramento” [The Oath] and “Muerte de Gesler” [The Death of Gesler]—together with his condition as a free mulatto, in a slave-owning society, led to his being persecuted, and to his execution by firing squad, at the hands of the colonial government.

José Jacinto Milanés brought a feeling of melancholic intimacy and an expression of unblemished sensitivity to his best poems: “La fuga de la tórtola” [The Escape of the Turtledove], “La madrugada” [Dawn], “El mar” [The Sea], “El beso” [The Kiss], “De codos sobre el puente” [Resting on the Side of the Bridge], “Bajo el mango” [Below the Mango Tree] and “Invierno en Cuba” [Winter in Cuba]. He was one of the first representatives of Romantic theatre in Latin America, with his plays El conde Alarcos, 1838 [Count Alarco] and Un poeta en la corte, 1846 [A Poet at Court].

It is in the person of Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda that Cuban literature had its first great woman writer. Already established in Spain, she gained a high degree of fame as a poet and a dramatist. Her style is forceful and, on occasion, declamatory, but it was provoked by genuine feelings, which she manifested above all in her collected letters. As a dramatist, she wrote a play of unquestionable quality in the tragedy Baltasar (1858). Her novel Sab (1841), set in Cuba, is a telling indictment of the horrors of slavery.
Among her poems, the most notable are: “Al partir” [When Leaving], “Imitando una oda de Safo” [Imitating one of Sappho’s Odes], “A él” [To Him], “La pesca en el mar” [Fishing at Sea], “Serenata de Cuba” and “La vuelta a la patria” [Return to the Homeland].

During this period, Cirilo Villaverde began to write his novel Cecilia Valdés, the most important example of the narrative genre in 19th-century Cuban literature. Although he completed the final version in 1879, it was not published until 1882. At the same time journalism grew in diversity through an incalculable number of publications, most of them short-lived; and academic oratory and the theatre strengthened their presence in the cultural life of the country.

Two quite different poets brought this literary period to its conclusion: Joaquín Lorenzo Luaces (1826–67) and Juan Clemente Zenea (1832–71). They both distanced themselves from Spanish influences in order to embrace other literatures, especially French and English, as sources for their cultural education.

Lorenzo Luaces developed two forms of expression arising from a growing tendency to differentiate between the Cuban and Spanish cultures: creole and ciboneyist (a term that relates to the Ciboney Indians) poetry and drama. However, the most abiding elements of his work can be found in compositions of a careful formal elaboration, in which he reveals himself as a precursor of Julián del Casal: “La concha de Venus” [Venus’s Shell], “La fuente del amor” [The Fountain of Love], “La salida del cafetal” [On leaving the Coffee Plantation] and “La muerte de la bacante” [The Death of the Bacchante]. On the other hand, Creolism and Ciboneyism were no more than an attempt to consolidate an authentically popular form of poetry, which would take shape in the literary work of Juan Cristóbal Nápoles Fajardo (1829–62). Using the pseudonym El Cuculambé, Nápoles Fajardo published Rumores del Hórmigo [Rumours of the Hórmigo] in 1856. This book became a model for the country’s popular poets, and its mode of expression is, almost exclusively, the ten-line stanza (décima). (It is a type of poetry that continues to be cultivated successfully to the present day in both its learned and popular forms).

Clemente Zenea was a Romantic poet, writing with refined expression and an elegiac style. Some of the best examples of truly lyrical verse in 19th-century Cuban poetry can be ascribed to him. His poetic voice penetrates the depths of feeling, and succeeds in reaching some of the mysteries of the soul. Linked, while still a youth, to the cause of Cuban independence, he lived in exile in the United States, where he practised revolutionary journalism. He returned to Cuba in order to meet the leader of the Revolution, Carlos Manuel de Céspedes. Zenea was taken prisoner while trying to return to the United States and was shot by the colonial government. Among his best poems are the narrative poem “Fidelia,” “Sobre el mar” [On the Sea], “Retorno” [The Return], “A mi amada” [To My Beloved], “Oriente y ocaso” [Sunrise and Sunset], “Nocturno,” “En días de esclavitud” [In the Days of Slavery], “A una golondrina” [To a Swallow] and “En Greenwood.”

With the outbreak of the Ten Years War in 1868, the third period of Cuban literature began, which, spanning the successive attempts to gain independence, extended to the establishment of the Republic in 1902. Two intellectual currents characterize this period: one of a pro-independence stance, essentially revolutionary; and one advocating autonomy, believing in gradual change, and having as its basis a Positivist philosophy.
This period embraced the literary output of two generations, structured, approximately, around the year 1860. The attempts to liberate Cuba from Spanish domination, or to loosen the constraints placed upon the island by Spain, mark the polemical, and frequently declamatory, style of the literature of this time. Moreover, the influence of French literature is palpable, many writers having turned to it as a further example of their aspirations for liberty. Romanticism was diluted little by little, until the best from this deep current flowed into a new form of expression, Modernismo, which emerged as the first specifically Spanish American literary movement. In Cuba, José Martí (1853–95) and Julián del Casal (1863–93) were the two foremost figures of this movement.

The status of pioneer of the Modernist movement is assigned to José Martí. Modernist traits can be seen even in some of his early prose—as in the short story “Hora de lluvia” [The Time for Rain], published anonymously in 1875 in the Mexican publication Revista Universal [Universal Magazine] and it takes clearer shape in his first book of poems, Ismaelillo [Little Ishmael] of 1882. In this work he fuses together the most vibrant currents of popular and anonymous Spanish poetry with his own innovative conception of the literary image as an expression of plastic fantasies springing from one’s consciousness. He wrote almost all of his oeuvre in exile, with the imperative of taking the pro-independence revolution forward, to which he dedicated a significant part of his oratorical and journalistic writings, and for which he died in combat. During his long stay in the United States, he produced a large body of articles on that country, which constitute a beautiful and expressive literary portrait of life in North America. These articles and Ismaelillo greatly influenced Rubén Darío’s Azul, 1888 [Blue], and dazzled Domingo Faustino Sarmiento. Martí’s Versos libres [Free Verses]—a work that, because of its posthumous publication, became more of a poetic cycle than a book—responds to the development of poetic art discernible in Ismaelillo, and progresses from the most robust sources to be found in Romanticism to a modernity that surpasses text-book Modernismo, in effect preparing the ground for the poetry of the 20th century. The Versos sencillos, 1891 [Simple Verses] constitute Martí’s most successful attempt to render visual art as verbal imagery. As a literary and art critic his work is as acute as it was ahead of its time, and this can be attributed to the integrative quality of his thought, which led him to construct opinions of a universal applicability from specific valuations. He wrote his last great pages in a notebook, in which he jotted down his impressions of the military campaign, in the middle of a war of independence.

Julián del Casal, taking as starting points his rejection of the colonial milieu in which he lived and the models offered him by the French poetry of the time, produced literary work marked by the bitterness and desperation of his feelings, and by structural composition of the highest quality. His poetic art is based around the ever more polarized opposition of art and reality which he ends up by rejecting in an absolute and self-destructing manner. He worked on sonnets as one might paint with words, and his three books—Hojas al viento, 1890 [Leaves in the Wind], Nieve, 1892 [Snow] and Bustos y rimas, 1893 [Busts and Rhymes], with a poetry section and another of prose writings—make him one of the most exceptional poets of Cuban literature.

During this period, besides the revolutionary oratory of Martí and Manuel Sanguily (1848–1925), there was a flowering of pro-autonomist oratory, notably in the figure of Rafael Montoro (1852–1933). The field of literary criticism produced an abundance of important writers, particularly Enrique Piñeyro (1839–1911), whose broad intellectual background and wide range of ideas fused with his capacity for sharp analysis.

Enrique José Varona (1849–1933) stands out as one of the most eminent figures of 19th-century Cuban literature. He devoted himself to literary criticism and to thought and his longevity allowed him to continue his intellectual development during the republican period.

The War of Independence (1895–98) quickly came to an end once the United States entered the conflict. North American troops combined with the Ejército Libertador de Cuba (Cuban Liberation Army) to defeat the colonial forces. There followed four years of administration by the United States, designed to serve as a period of transition between the colonial regime and the republican one. It was brought about through the adoption of a liberal constitution, limited by the Platt Amendment, which allowed the United States the right of intervention in the island’s affairs in exceptional circumstances. The island officially became the Republic of Cuba on 20 May 1902.

The fourth period of the literary history of Cuba thus began with the establishment of the republic, and continued until the republican regime was replaced by the revolutionary one, on 1 January 1959.

At the end of the 19th century the development of poetry was briefly disrupted after the death of its two principal exponents of Modernismo, Martí and Julián Casal. The most representative poetic voices of this particular moment are collected in the anthology Arpas cubanas, 1904 [Cuban Harps], but the poetry of the new century did not take off in Cuba until the arrival of two innovative figures: Regino Boti (1878–1958) and José Manuel Poveda (1888–1926). Boti, inspired by a serious concern with form, assumed consciously the task of enriching Cuban poetry, something which he achieved in Arabescos mentales (1913) and in later books such as El mar y la montaña, 1921 [The Sea and the Mountain] and La torre del silencio, 1926 [The Tower of Silence]. Poveda was a poet and prose writer with hyperaesthetic sensibility; his texts are characterized by a nervous imagination and a formal care, which take shape in his Versos precursores (1917).

The other leading poet of this period was Agustín Acosta, who evolved from a modernista position and displayed a fluid use of language. His poetry tends towards a profundity of thought and uncomplicated expression, and on some occasions a strong social resonance. Among the most notable compositions of his considerable oeuvre are Ala, 1915 [Wing], La zafra, 1926 [The Sugar Cane Harvest], Los camellos distantes, 1936 [Distant Camels], Últimos instantes, 1941 [Last Instants] and Las islas desoladas, 1943 [Desolate Islands].

Essay writing, one of the strongest strands of Cuban literature, extends and diversifies during the 20th century. However, during the early years of this period the overriding preoccupation was the exploration of nationhood, which was studied from a variety of perspectives, ranging from the socioeconomic to the metaphysical. In the first generation of republican writers, the most prominent essayists include Jesús Castellanos (1879–1912), Luis Rodríguez Embil (1879–1954), Emilio Gaspar Rodríguez (1889–1939), Fernando Lles (1883–1949), José Antonio Ramos (1885–1943), Francisco José Castellanos (1892–1920), Medardo Vitier (1886–1960) and Fernando Ortiz, who produced a monumental piece of research and analysis of Cuban culture, which he defined as the result of the transculturalization of Hispanic and African roots.
In the second republican generation the essay form tended towards barbed criticism and polemic, although there is space also within the genre for the expression of the imagination. Given the political role of this generation in the country’s disturbed history, the essay was one of its principal literary manifestations. The leading figures were: Rafael Suárez Solís, José María Chacón y Calvo, Miguel Ángel Carbonell, Félix Lizaso, José Antonio Fernández de Castro, Jorge Mañach, Juan Marinello, Francisco Ichaso, Antonio Sánchez de Bustamante y Montoro and, right on the chronological edge of the generation, José Antonio Portuondo and Mirta Aguirre.

During the first few decades of the 20th century, Cuban narrative did not offer works of any particular interest, but was rather a period of gradual growth towards maturity, in which it is possible to call attention to some key moments. Jesús Castellanos, an excellent writer of narrative of the modernista school, marks the transition between the 19th and 20th centuries with a careful prose style which serves as a vehicle of expression for his critical viewpoint and disenchantment with reality. Historical narratives, inspired above all by the recent War of Independence, make up the principal output of such writers as: Emilio Bacardi (1844–1922), Raimundo Cabrera and Luis Rodríguez Embil. Reflections of social preoccupations can be seen in the work of José Antonio Ramos, Carlos Loveira (1882–1928), Luis Felipe Rodríguez (1888–1947) and Enrique Serpa. An interest in the psychological is present in the work of Miguel de Carrión (1875–1929), and in the short stories of the painter Carlos Enríquez.

Carlos Loveira was the author of novels that are fundamental for an understanding of the social reality of his era: Generales y doctores, 1920 [Generals and Doctors], Los ciegos, 1922 [The Blind] and Juan Criollo, 1927 [John the Creole]. Miguel de Carrión portrayed women successfully, which was the most important aspect of his novels with a psychological bent, such as: Las honradas, 1917 [Respectable Women] and Las impuras, 1919 [Fallen Women]. Luis Felipe Rodríguez, from a poor background, put together the best of his narrative work around 1924 in La conjura de la ciénaga [The Conspiracy of the Swamp], a work that would reach its definitive form with the title Ciénaga in 1937.

The short story and the novel were developed by writers such as Alfonso Hernández Catá; Federico de Ibarzábal; Carlos Montenegro; and Lydia Cabrera, whose splendid research into African-Cuban culture culminated in her book El monte [The Mountain]; Lino Novás Calvo; Felix Pita Rodríguez; Dora Alonso; and Onelio Jorge Cardoso, a narrator who transformed the range of topics to be found in the countryside into a veritable art form.

The third decade of the century witnessed the rise of a new generation of poets including the pioneering figure Mariano Brull (1891–1956). His Poemas en menguante, 1928 [Waning Poems], introduced pure poetry into Cuba, sustained by the thesis of the Frenchman Henri Brémont, and influenced by Paul Valéry. Brull was the creator of the jitanjáfora, a playful style of verbal invention, where poetry is reduced to the pure beauty of words stripped of meaning. His work comprises the following books: Canto redondo, 1934 [Round Song]; Solo de rosa, 1941 [Rose Solo]; Tiempo en pena, 1954 [Time in Sorrow] and Nada más que, 1954 [No More Than], where he offers self-contained and intense metaphysical texts.

A number of women poets came to the fore during this period. The most outstanding of them are Emilia Bernal, Dulce María Loyzaz (b. 1902), Serafina Núñez (b. 1913), Carilda Oliver Labra (b. 1924) and Rafaela Chacón Nardi (b. 1926). Loyzaz’s poetry is of an intensely intimate nature, and shows great attention to form. Her Obra lírica (1955), which does not attach itself to any particular school, was honoured, in Spain, with the Miguel de Cervantes Prize. Her exceptional literary talents are confirmed in her poetic novel Jardín (1951) and in her travel book Un verano en Tenerife, 1958 [A Summer in Tenerife].

Other poets of the time include Ramón Rubiera, Enrique Loynaz (one of Dulce María’s brothers) and Andrés Núñez Olano, whose works, although not as innovative as those of Brull, nor of a quality as refined as those of Dulce María Loynaz, are worthy of consideration from the point of view of their markedly personal lyricism. Another group of poets stands out, whose sentimental tone, tempered by irony and a colloquial style, sets them apart from the previous authors; they are José Zacarías Tallet, María Villar Buceta, and Rubén Martínez Villena (1899–1934), the latter a poet of great sensibility and a pure stylistic talent. Such poets have in common a critical outlook that directs them towards poetry with a social content, especially so in Manuel Navarro Luna, Regino Pedroso and Félix Pita Rodríguez.

Three poets of stature dominate the literary scene from the 1930s: Eugenio Florit (b. 1903), Emilio Ballagas (1908–54) and Nicolás Guillén (1902–89). The first, of Spanish origin, produced a very considerable lyrical output that situates him among the foremost figures of pure poetry in Cuba, with brilliant texts, where personal feeling is expressed in an ever purer manner. Of note among his works are Doble acento, 1937 [Double Accent]; Reino, 1938 [Kingdom]; Cuatro poemas, 1940 [Four Poems]; Poema mío, 1947 [My Poem], which constitutes the first compilation of his poetry. Conversación a mi padre, 1949 [Talking at My Father]; Asonante final, 1950 [Final Assonant] and a book of poems as recent as Hasta luego, 1992 [See You Later], ratify his highest qualities as a lyrical poet.

Emilio Ballagas is another of the chief voices of Cuban poetry. His lyricism has a strong emotional vein, which takes shape in his book Sabor eterno, 1939 [Eternal Taste], where he collected—among other texts of exceptional quality—“Elegía sin nombre” [Elegy without a Name] and “Nocturno y Elegía” [Nocturne and Elegy], two of the most abiding love poems of all time in the history of Cuban poetry. In his last book, Cielo en rehenes [Sky in Hostages], he chose to restrict himself to the sonnet form, which allowed him to achieve a more controlled form of expression, in which the love sentiment fuses with religious emotion. Ballagas also developed poetry with an African-Cuban theme in Cuaderno de poesía negra, 1934 [Black Poetry Notebook], and also wrote some social poetry.

But it was Nicolás Guillén who brought together and took to the highest plane these two strands; the African-Cuban and the social, with a type of poetry displaying a forceful quality of expression, and deeply rooted in Spanish popular verse and the sonority of the Cuban way of speaking. His extensive output reaches culminating points in Motivos de son [Son Motifs] (1930), Sóngoro cosongo (1931), West Indies, Ltd. (1934), El son entero, 1947 [The Entire Son] and, above all, in his Elegías (1958). His poetry benefits from its thematic diversity, in which themes of love and eroticism occupy an important place alongside collective actions. He was able to combine refinement of form with a popular style, which turned him into a poet of national importance.

The first great moment for stylistic renovation—as regards expression and structure—in the Cuban novel, comes about with the work of Enrique Labrador Ruiz (b. 1902), a writer with fine creative flair and with deep Cuban roots. His short stories, which he called gaseiformes, deconstruct and reform the narrative with surprising mastery: El laberinto de sí mismo, 1933 [His Own Labyrinth], Cresival (1936) and Anteo (1940). His “misty” novels—Carne de quimera, 1947 [Illusory Flesh] and Tráiler de sueños, 1949 [Dream Trailer]—are equally original and innovative. The novel La sangre hambrienta, 1950 [Hungry Blood] and his collection of short stories El gallo en el espejo, 1953 [The Rooster in the Mirror] are his most mature works, revealing his capacity for continual innovation and searching, characteristics also of El pan de los muertos, 1958 [The Bread of the Dead]. The profound feeling of liberty that runs throughout his work caused him to leave Cuba and he died in exile in the United States. This meant that his work, and even his name, were silenced by the Cuban authorities, practically erasing him from the country’s literary history.

Alejo Carpentier, perceived by many Cubans as a “European,” produced solid, well-crafted narratives of a thematic richness that turned him into one of the most internationally renowned of Cuban writers. His novels and short stories are notable as much on account of their verbal density as because of their imaginative plots and frequent use of American themes. Among his principal works are El reino de este mundo, 1949 (The Kingdom of this World); Los pasos perdidos, 1953 (The Lost Steps); Guerra del tiempo, 1958 (War on Time); and El siglo de las luces, 1962, (Explosion in a Cathedral), a work displaying an epic style and quality, which represents the height of his literary production.

The poetry of the third republican generation is characterized by the accentuated autonomy of lyrical expression as contrasted with social expression, from which the majority of new poets distance themselves in order to undertake the search for Cubanness, which turns towards not only the roots of nationhood, but also to metaphysical and universal dimensions. The poet José Lezama Lima (1910–76), was central to this enterprise. He founded various journals, culminating with Orígenes (1944–56), around which a group of poets of the highest calibre gathered.

Lezama Lima’s literary production is one of the most controversial in Latin American literature. His was a poetic concept of reality sustained in the image, the image itself conceived as the incarnation of poetic essence, at the same time as it is the expression of significant knowledge. Lezama became known through his poem Muerte de Narciso, 1937 [The Death of Narcissus]; there then followed: Enemigo rumor, 1941 [Hostile Rumour]; Aventuras sigilosas, 1945 [Stealthy Adventures]; La fijeza, 1949 [Fixedness]; Dador, 1960 [The Giver] and Fragmentos a su imán [Fragments to Their Magnet], published posthumously in 1977. His novel Paradiso (1966), in which he developed his concept of the image as a reproductive force in the poetic universe, brought him international acclaim. At the same time it became the initial cause for the ostracism to which he was subjected by the Cuban regime, whose authorities rejected the strong eroticism of certain passages in the work, and above all its treatment of homosexuality.

Together with Lezama Lima, the first group of poets involved with Orígenes are: Virgilio Piñeira (1912–79), Ángel Gaztelu (b. 1914), Justo Rodríguez Santos (b. 1915) and Gaston Baquero (b. 1918). Virgilio Piñeira’s literary work began with poetry—Las furias, 1942 [The Furies] and La isla en peso, 1943 [The Corporeal Island]—but he achieved his best results in the field of narrative, and, above all, in the theatre. Ángel Gaztelu, the author of Gradual de laudes, 1955 [Gradual for Lutes], is a poet of genuine and transparent mysticism. Justo Rodríguez Santos, by way of contrast to the other members of the group, stands out because of his classical verse style, which finds its principal form of expression in the sonnet. Gaston Baquero is one of the greatest voices of Cuban poetry, the author of works of the highest quality, such as “Palabras escritas en la arena por un inocente” [Words Written in the Sand by an Innocent]. His free verse conforms to a way of thinking that hovers over reality as though it were to observe it from a participating distance.

The second Orígenes group brings together Eliseo Diego (1920–94), Cintio Vitier (b. 1921), Octavio Smith (1921–86), Fina García Marruz (b. 1923) and Lorenzo García Vega (b. 1926). Eliseo Diego’s poetry is uncomplicated yet profound, and carefully worked, and expresses an almost unfathomable compassion for living and inanimate things. All his works are of a sustained quality, though of particular note are En la Calzada de Jesús del Monte, 1949 [In Jesus del Monte Boulevard] and El oscuro esplendor, 1966 [The Dark Splendour]. Cintio Vitier’s poetry—which the poet groups in three phases: Vísperas [Eves], Testimonios [Testimonies] and Nupcias [Nuptials]—follows successive paths of expressive inquiry as a result of deep metaphysical, philosophical and social preoccupations. At the same time, his work as a critic and essayist has broadened the range of his influence. As a student of Cuban poetry and the work of José Martí, he has written texts that are of great importance to the national culture, among which Lo cubano en la poesía, 1957 [Cubanness in Poetry] is the most notable.

Fina García Marruz’s poetry has unveiled some of the deepest recesses of the everyday. Her poetic discourse is heavily charged with meaning and the image reaches the unsurpassable quality of identifying itself with the reality named. Among her principal works are Las miradas perdidas, 1951 [The Lost Gazes] and Visitaciones, 1970 [Visitations]. Octavio Smith is an author whose work is brief and to the point. His first book, Del furtivo destierro, 1946 [From the Furtive Exile], contains some of his best poems. Estos barrios [These Neighbourhoods] and Crónicas y andanzas [Chronicles and Adventures] complete his oeuvre. Lorenzo García Vega is a poet and prose writer with a strong imaginative projection. His best books include: Suite para la espera, 1948 [Waiting Room], the novel Espirales del cuje, 1952 [Tobacco-frame Spirals], the essay collection Los años de “Orígenes, 1979 [The Orígenes Years], Variaciones o como veredicto para sol de otras dudas, 1993 [Variations or as a Verdict for a Sun of Other Doubts] and Collages de un notario [A Notary’s Collages].

Virgilio Piñera’s efforts as a dramatist reinvigorated the theatrical genre in Cuba. As a writer of short stories, Piñera was not only an excellent creative artist, but he also influenced the authors of the next generation. His rich imagination and the capacity to express the essential elements of reality, come together with a wide literary culture and an irreverent attitude, which make him one of the sharpest figures of 20th-century Cuban literature. He wrote the novels La carne de René, 1952 (René’s Flesh) and Pequeñas maniobras, 1963 [Small Manoeuvres], but his most important narratives appear in Cuentos fríos, 1956 (Cold Tales) and Cuentos, 1964 [Stories], books that bring together texts of universal significance.

The fifth period in the history of Cuban literature commenced in an abrupt fashion when, on the 1st January 1959, a popular Revolution overturned the military dictatorship governing the island. The complex events that followed the Revolution gave rise to the establishment of a Marxist regime, officially proclaimed in 1961. An ever widening group of people was affected by the economic and political measures adopted by the regime, and exile became the only option for thousands of citizens, especially professionals from the sectors of medicine, law, and education. The country entered a period of increasing subordination to the Soviet Union, and literature, as well as art and culture in general, remained under the patronage and supervision of the State. The slogan “Within the Revolution, everything; without the Revolution, nothing” indicated the pattern of censorship that the Cuban authorities were to apply to any cultural manifestation. Established writers such as Gastón Baquero, Enrique Labrador Ruiz, Lydia Cabrera and Agustín Acosta, left Cuba. Others, such as José Lezama Lima and Virgilio Piñera—after enjoying, initially, some prestige—became victims of ostracism until the end of their lives. By way of contrast, figures such as Cintio Vitier, Eliseo Diego and Fina García Marruz, after remaining silent during the first few years of the political process, adhered to it and continued to write and publish important works. Nicolás Guillén, having, for a long time, been a Marxist militant, was exalted to the status of national poet. A sanitized interpretation of Carpentier’s work also merited official praise and the prestige of an institute devoted to the promotion of his work. Dulce María Loynaz sank (or so she maintains) into a prolonged silence, equivalent to being an internal exile.

The profound and often violent transformation of the economic and political structures in these years coincided, approximately, with the arrival of the fourth literary generation of the century, composed of figures born around 1930. In general terms, this generation adopted an attitude of hostile and open criticism towards the preceding one, blaming it for having written a literature of evasion. Political slogans now took the place of literary images, and realism with a social content became the principal mode in the field of narrative, while the colloquial and the prosaic dominated in poetry. The substantial resources directed at literature and art by the State favoured the growth, without precedent, of new writers.

The most outstanding poets of this generation are Rolando Escardó (1925–1960), Ana Rosa Núñez (b. 1926), Roberto Friol (b. 1928), Francisco de Oraá (b. 1929), Roberto Fernández Retamar (b. 1930), Pablo Armando Fernández (b. 1930), Fayad Jamis (1930–88), Pedro de Oraá (b. 1931), José Álvarez Baragaño (1932–62), Heberto Padilla (b. 1932), César López (b. 1933); Rafael Alcides (b. 1933), Alberto Rocosolano (b. 1933), Antón Arrufat (b. 1935), Manuel Díaz Martínez (b. 1936), Armando Álvarez Bravo (b. 1938), Juana Rosa Pita (b. 1939); Miguel Barnet (b. 1940), Belkis Cuza Malé (b. 1942), Guillermo Rodríguez Rivera (b. 1943) and Nancy Morejón (b. 1944).

In the field of narrative, the most notable figures are Guillermo Cabrera Infante, Calvert Casey, José Lorenzo Fuentes, Severo Sarduy, José Soler Puig, Manuel Coffío, Norberto Fuentes, Lisandro Otero, Hilda Perera, Jesús Díaz and Reinaldo Arenas. This generation found itself already split for political reasons towards the end of the 1960s, when the contradictions between official requirements and the natural development of intellectual life created a crisis around the poet Heberto Padilla, which produced a tightening of state control over art and literature. These pressures were most marked in the narrative genre, where stories dedicated to the guerrilla battles and the activities of the state’s security forces were promoted. While writers such as Lisandro Otero and Roberto Fernández Retamar—the latter with a wide output as both a poet and an essayist—identified wholly with the official line, other authors, such as Juana Rosa Pita, Ana Rosa Núñez, Sarduy, Padilla himself, Cuza Malé, Cabrera Infante, Álvarez Bravo and Arenas, left Cuba. In exile, some of these authors wrote works that have brought them international recognition.

Towards the end of the 1970s and early 1980s another literary group began to emerge, composed both of writers living on the island and writers in exile, especially in the United States or Spain. This wave was to be characterized by its evident thematic and stylistic break with the preceding one, and by its giving rise to a literature where the values of subjectivity and of the image oppose, implicitly, the prevailing assumptions.

Among the poets of this set that have achieved literary maturity on the island, the most notable are Lina de Feria (b. 1944), Delfín Prats (b. 1945), Luis Rogelio Nogueras (1945–85), Alberto Serret (b. 1947), Raúl Hernández Novás (1948–93), Aramís Quintero (b. 1948), Raúl Rivero, Lourdes González (b. 1952), Luis Álvarez (b. 1950), Reyna María Rodríguez (b. 1952), Lourdes Rensoli (b. 1952), María Elena Cruz Varela (b. 1953), Cira Andrés (b. 1954), Jorge Yglesias (b. 1956), Chely Lima (b. 1957), Daina Chaviano (b. 1957) and Alberto Lauro (b. 1959). The literature of this group has had to negotiate censorship, and, in some cases, oppose it. Delfín Prats’s poetry was banned in Cuba for over ten years. María Elena Cruz Varela suffered acts of violence, and was imprisoned because of her defiance of political freedom, and Raúl Hernández Novás, a poet of enormous talent, committed suicide in 1993.

In exile the poets most worthy of note are José Kozer, Reinaldo García Ramos (b. 1944), Esteban Luis Cárdenas (b. 1945), Amando Fernández (1949–94), Lourdes Gil (b. 1950), Carlos A. Díaz Barrios (b. 1950), Andrés Reynaldo (b. 1953) and Roberto Valero (1955–94). The narrative of this group, like the poetry, contains a wide thematic range, and in it the inner being of its characters is given prominence, together with a stylistic treatment in which the realism is enriched by a conscious attention to formal values. The works of Carlos Victoria (b. 1950)—published while in exile—stand out, as do those of Senel Paz, Francisco López Sacha, Reinaldo Montero, Roberto Urías and Alejandro Querejeta. The best examples of dramatic writing in this generation are in the works of Abelardo Estorino, José Triana (b. 1931), Antón Arrufat and Abilio Estévez; and Rine Leal emerges as the outstanding critic of this genre.

The early 1990s have been painfully difficult for Cuban writers—as for all those who live in the island—because of acute shortages and a loss of peace of mind resulting from the collapse of the economy. However, in the middle of the decade it can be said that matters have improved considerably, an improvement that applies as much to the health of cultural journals as to book publishing. Several worthwhile short story writers have either consolidated their reputations or emerged on the scene in the course of this decade. Many anthologies, which include the work of different age groups have appeared, among which are Fábula de ángeles, 1994 [Fable of Angels], edited by Salvador Redonet and Francisco López Sacha. This volume, quite unconsciously, excludes women contributors completely, assigning to women a totally traditional image, via an erotic design on the book’s cover. Apparently, not even the term “tokenism” has yet entered the vocabulary of some editors in Havana. A further development in publishing has been the emergence of the Pinos Nuevos [Young Pines] series intended for those who have not previously published in book form. This series of slender, inexpensive volumes includes both fiction and criticism, and was made possible by the financial assistance of an Argentine publisher. Where genre writing is concerned, one serious talent has emerged over the last few years, namely that of Leonardo Padura Fuentes (b. 1955), previously a journalist, literary critic (particularly of the work of Carpentier and of crime fiction) and writer of “serious” narrative. Padura plans a tetralogy of hardboiled or noir novels, and published the third of these, Máscaras [Masks], in 1996. Unsurprisingly, this intelligent, well-crafted work won him the Spanish Premio Gijón for the best “novela negra” of 1995. Padura’s genre writing is boldly critical of corruption in high places (junior ministers, career diplomats, etc.), and he consciously deflates the political rhetoric with which his own generation grew up.

In spite of the rifts created in Cuban literature by the political circumstances of the last thirty-seven years, the salient values of this body of literature, as much on the island as off it, confirm its essential unity.

EMILIO DE ARMAS
translated by Luis González Fernández

Note: The penultimate paragraph was written by the editor after her return from Cuba in April 1996.

Further Reading

Lists of this kind, particularly on contemporary Cuban writing, are sometimes marred by a Montague versus Capulet (that is, Miami versus Havana) approach which is inimical to serious scholarship. The list below seeks to provide interesting, worthwhile and provocative items regardless of their place of publication.

Bernard, Jorge L. and Juan A. Pola (editors), Quienes escriben en Cuba, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1985 [Interesting because it shows the rehabilitation of some authors silenced in the 1970s]

Bunck, Julie M., Fidel Castro and the Quest for a Revolutionary Culture in Cuba, University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1994

Campuzano, Luisa, Quirón o el ensayo y otros eventos, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1988 [Included because it contains a first, sketchy outline of women’s writing in Cuba since 1959]

Huertas, Begoña, Ensayo de un cambio. La narrativa cubana de los 80, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1993

Kutzinski, Vera M., Sugar’s Secrets: Race and the Erotics of Cuban Nationalism, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia,

Loynaz, Dulce María, “Influencia de los poetas cubanos en el 1993 Modernismo,” in her Ensayos literarios, Salamanca: Universidad de Salamanca, 1993

Menton, Seymour, Prose Fiction of the Cuban Revolution, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1975

Navarro, Desiderio, Ejercicios del criterio, Havana: Union, 1989 [Regarded as something of a maverick by more sedate island critics, Navarro played a key part in promoting interest in literary theory—particularly that emanating from Eastern Europe and the USSR—in Cuba in the 1980s]

Ortega, Julio, Relato de la utopía, Barcelona: La Gaya Ciencia, 1973
Rodríguez Coronel, Rogelio, La novela de la revolución cubana, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1986 [A classic example of a critical work ruined by the attentions of the censor. It is included here for its historical interest since it was written in the 1970s, the darkest period in post-revolutionary letters]
Smith, Verity, “Obedezco pero no cumplo: una introducción a la labor de los poetas de Holguín,” Cuban Studies, Pittsburgh, 22 (1992) [Focuses on a dynamic group of artists and writers, and seeks to demonstrate that Cuban literary life in the 1980s was by no means limited to Havana]
Vitier, Cintio (editor), La crítica literaria y estética en el siglo XIX cubano, Havana: Biblioteca Nacional José Martí, 1974

Anthologies
Pérez Sarduy, Pedro and Jean Stubbs (editors), Afrocuba. An Anthology of Cuban Writing on Race, Politics and Culture, Melbourne, Australia: Ocean Press, 1993

Bibliographies
Martínez, Julio A. (editor), Dictionary of Twentieth Century Cuban Literature, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1990 [Includes lengthy topics and a useful appendix on major literary journals. Quite comprehensive coverage of women writers]

Special Issues of Journals
Latin American Literary Review, vol. 8/16 (Spring-Summer 1980) [Special issue on literature of the Hispanic Caribbean with articles on general topics and individual writers such as Reinaldo Arenas, Miguel Barnet, Lydia Cabrera, René Marqués and Severo Sarduy. Also contains poems and short stories in English translation]
Revista Iberoamericana, vol. 55 (January-June 1990) and vol. 56 (July-December 1990)
Letras cubanas 20 (December 1994) [The section “Prosas profanas” is devoted to narrative by women]
Cuban writers outside the island have consistently pursued their literary endeavour. Their writing is not disconnected from the place which nurtured their first images and the rituals of their culture. Allegories and tropes bear the marks of a national identity that constitutes its leitmotif. Cuban poet José Lezama Lima believed that it was the common vision, myths and traditions that linked the social group and conformed a nation. “If the vision is ever lost,” he wrote, “the people will be scattered, the nation dispersed.” Yet he also believed that Cubans were “a people inhabited by a living image.” To this, Cuban author Cabrera Infante has added that “we all carry Cuba within us, like a mysterious music, like a singular vision.”

Exile writing in the US bears testimony to precisely the indelible presence of that vision from a distance. The historical conditions which led to exile itself cannot be ignored and they form the focal point of contemporary Cuban literature. The Revolution officially sanctioned a bifurcation of the country’s literary discourse. This rupture served to legitimize what was written and published inside Cuba, while the literature produced outside the island would carry with it the stigma of the fugitive. Only recently have these two discourses begun to be reintegrated, and there have been many gestures toward that restoration from both sides.

Contrary to how it may be perceived, Cuban writing in the US is highly heterogenous, in content as well as style. The reasons for this are varied. Authors of several generations are represented, as are the members of all social classes and races. In addition, a writer’s arrival to US shores can be dated as late as the mid 1990s, as in the cases of María Elena Cruz Varela and Norberto Fuentes; or it can go as far back as the 1960s, as in the cases of Lorenzo García Vega (a member of the Orígenes group) and Lydia Cabrera. Another complicating factor is the internal division that sets aside, on the one hand, those writers who began to publish while still living in Cuba. Until recently, they have been regarded, in their country and abroad, as the true heirs of the national literary canon. On the other hand, there are those who began their writing career after they abandoned the island. They consider themselves the real exile writers. This self-definition is based on the fact that they were deprived of the proper channels and the institutions of their trade. They had no access to publishing houses nor did they encounter, once in the US, any interest in their work. They had no writers’ union, no national award. They had to create the mechanisms that allowed them to publish and distribute their books in a country where the dominant language was not Spanish. In spite of their efforts, the global literary community still questions their legitimate Cuban heritage.

Beyond all their aesthetic diversity, Cuban exile literature is shaped within the political coordinates of expatriation. It is within this alternate Cuban space, this extra-territorial reality, that its identity is built. Despite the individual writer’s desire or interests, historical reasons condition, transcend and interpret the literary text. When the Revolution defines as a hegemonic discourse all that is written inside the island, it succeeds in relegating the one produced abroad to a state of illegitimacy. The perception that others have of this writing inserts the writer within an inescapable political context.

This is why exile as a condition of being is what ultimately defines Cuban writing in the US, more than the classifications of language or generation. It is a literature that harps on the themes of displacement and loss, reflecting the anguish of marginalization. Yet, far from being marginal, it is an organic discourse, full of history and of images arising from Cuba’s literary traditions and cultural codes. There are, indeed, historical precedents for this phenomenon. The first territorial displacements in the island’s difficult history occurred in the aftermath of Spain’s domination, late in the 19th century. Cuba’s most prominent writers of the last century—José María Heredia, Cirilo Villaverde, José Martí, Juan Clemente Zenea—lived and wrote their major works in the US.

Since dispersion and displacement conform to a pattern in the nation’s history, Cuban writers in the US believe their exile to be temporary. This rationale, enhanced by a strong sense of national identity and a self-determination to continue writing in Spanish, implies a resistance to US cultural hegemony. Unlike other Hispanic authors in North America, Cubans have shown little interest in incorporating their writing into mainstream society. The insistence on the usage of Spanish, particularly, has relegated their work to the indifference and alienation of their milieu. The passage from one place and its culture to a strange environment, between conflicting languages, has acted as a threat to the self. Therefore, the recurrence of themes which have been naively perceived as stubbornness of memory and nostalgia for the past, merely affirm the vital experience of resisting dissolution and fragmentation through a continuity.

A chronology of Cuban exile literature reveals various degrees of consciousness and development throughout its different periods. Four major, significant transitions occur between 1959 and 1995. These intervals loosely correspond to each decade. The 1960s, for example, can be viewed as the “dark ages” of Cuban writing in the US. Few books were published, and writers were more concerned with gathering in small groups (usually isolated pockets in Miami and New York) for readings of their work. They also funded modest literary magazines. Poet and journalist Mauricio Fernández played a significant role then, editing several short-lived journals and organizing cultural functions. As a contrast, authors in the island were experiencing Cuban literature’s first golden era, when Carpentier, Lezama, Piñera, Padilla, Triana, Vitier, Diego and Arrufat, published their major works.

The situation gradually changed during the 1970s. Cuban literary reviews in the US achieved a level of excellence. Escandalar, Enlace, Exilio and others, were edited by the emerging and established voices of Lorenzo García Vega, Octavio Armand, José Kozer, Mauricio Fernández and Lourdes Casal. Poetry was the most prolific genre of the period, and Orlando Rossardi edited the first anthology of poets from inside and outside the island. The works of Kozer and Armand, of Isel Rivero, Pura del Prado, Rafael Catalá, Martha Padilla, Omar Torres, Mercedes Cortázar, Dolores Prida and Ivan Acosta became better known. Three books proved to be the most influential of that decade. El sitio de nadie, 1972 [Nobody’s Place], a novel by Hilda Perera, portrayed the predilections of the Cuban middle classes, shaken by an idealized version of the Revolution and disrupted by exile life in Miami. El caso Padilla, 1972 [The Padilla Case], by Lourdes Casal, was a compilation of documents, declarations, articles, letters, interviews and other pertinent information concerning Heberto Padilla’s controversy over official cultural policy, his book Fuera del juego (Sent off the Field), which won the Casa de las Américas Prize in 1968, his incarceration in 1971, and his public self-criticism at the Union of Artists and Writers in Havana. In 1978, Lorenzo García Vega published Los años de Orígenes [The Orígenes Years], his subjective and polemic account of that generation of writers. Perera, Casal, and to a lesser extent García Vega, succeeded in striking a tender political chord in the collective psyche of the Cuban exile community, which the poetry collections had failed to address.

When the Mariel Harbour boat-lift operation began in 1980, the exodus of new and established writers to the US was once again renewed. After twenty years, the two separate branches of Cuban discourse met and tried to merge. As a result, exile literature was revitalized linguistically and thematically. For the new arrivals, it meant the freedom to explore areas such as homosexuality in their texts, as well as an access to books that were unavailable at home. A healthy curiosity for the Other, and a desire to be heard produced several journals during that decade. First, there were Linden Lane (edited by Belkis Cuza and Heberto Padilla) and Mariel (founded by Reinaldo Arenas, Reinaldo García Ramos and Carlos Victoria); then, Lyra (Iraida Iturralde and Lourdes Gil) and La nuez [The Nut] by Rafael Bordao. A more coherent, articulate vision of Cuban literature in the US began to emerge.

In 1988, the first major international conference on Cuban literature outside the island was held at Rutgers University, New Jersey. Author and art curator Ileana Fuentes directed this project where writers and critics met for several days of lectures, readings and panel discussions. The event acted as a catalyst for a series of similar efforts, some as ambitious and others more geographically and financially restricted. Three conferences were held: one in Miami and two in New York, at the Ollantay Centre for the Arts. In the period between 1987 and 1994 two poetry anthologies and a first collection of essays, exclusively on the topic of Cuban writing, were published. The Latin American Writers Institute of New York had Lourdes Gil as guest editor for a special issue on the subject of Cuban writing in the US. The more significant books of that decade, all published in 1989, were La isla que se repite (The Repeating Island), a collection of essays on identity in the Caribbean by Antonio Benítez Rojo; La mala memoria [A Poor Memory], Heberto Padilla’s account of his participation in the revolutionary process; and El portero [The Porter], a first novel on life in exile, by Reinaldo Arenas.

In the last decade of the 20th century, Cuban discourse appears to be steering in a new direction. Revista Iberoamericana of the University of Pittsburgh, edited by Alfredo Roggiano and Enrico Mario Santi, gathered together the literature from inside and outside the island in a two volume edition. Michigan Quarterly Review also published two volumes on the subject, edited by anthropologist and author Ruth Behar. This attempts to reevaluate Cuban discourse and proposes alternate ways for the future of a nation that no longer fits its insularity. The approach is not popular in many sectors of the exile community, nor is it totally accepted inside the island. Further interest in the issue was stated at two international conferences of Cuban writers from outside and inside the island, celebrated in Stockholm and Madrid in 1994. Four writers living in the US participated: Heberto Padilla, Lourdes Gil, José Kozer and Orlando Rossardi. Though new perspectives stretching beyond ideologies, generations and geography are being sought, the political reality of a divided nation adds to what is already a complex question.

LOURDES GIL
Further Reading

Critical Studies
Monge Rafulls, Pedro (editor), Lo que no se ha dicho, New York: Ollantay Press, 1994
Sánchez Boudy, José, Historia de la literatura cubana (en el exilio), Miami: Universal, 1975 Vázquez Diaz, René (editor), Bipolaridad de la cultura cubana, Stockholm: Olof Palme Center, 1994

Fiction
Excludes writers with separate entries in the book. Works published before the author went into exile are not listed.
——Estatuas sepultadas y otros relatos, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1984
——Vencido el fuego de la especie, Somerville New Jersey: SLUSA, 1983
——Empieza la ciudad, Coral Gables Miami: La Torre de Papel, 1993
——Carece de causa, Buenos Aires: Último Reino, 1988
——De donde oscilan los seres en sus proporciones, Tenerife, Canary Islands: H.A. Editor, 1990
Montes Huidobro, Matías, Desterrados al fuego, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1975
——Segar a los muertos, Miami: Universal, 1980
——Ojos para no ver, Miami: Universal, 1981
——La mala memoria, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1989
Rodríguez Santos, Justo, Los naipes conjurados, Madrid: Playor, 1979 ——En fin la noche, Madrid: Playor, 1983
Victoria, Carlos, Dharma, Miami: Universal, 1985

Anthologies
Burunat, Silvia and Ofelia García (editors), Veinte años de literatura cubano-americana, Tempe, Arizona: Bilingual Press, 1988 [Divided into several sections which include African-Cuban, Roots and Family; Politics and Revolution]
Cultural Dependency

Cultural dependency is said to occur when a society follows external models of culture at the expense of its ability to develop its own. Dependency implies not merely mutual influence, which would permit an exchange of cultural traits, but an unequal interaction in which the stronger partner enjoys an advantage and is able to promote its own cultural forms as the most desirable. In most cases, the phrase refers to the reliance of an economically disadvantaged nation or region on more powerful foreign countries. However, it can equally well apply to the situation within a single region or country, as less populated and cosmopolitan areas turn to the nearest cultural capitals to lead them in cultural matters. For example, the major literary and arts centers of Latin America, such as Buenos Aires, Mexico City and São Paulo, come under the sway of European and US modes. At the same time, they exert a considerable influence not only on the rest of the country but also on neighboring nations with less sophisticated cultural resources. The discussion of cultural dependency should include its inverse, cultural autonomy. The latter does not imply puristic isolation from foreign influences, but rather the ability to assimilate new elements, including those from other regions, without their displacing the local culture’s own cultural products and dampening its creativity.

Although the term cultural dependency only gained currency in the 1960s, the phenomenon has long been in existence. The Spanish and Portuguese colonization of the New World created severe inequalities between cultures. Native groups lost not only the lands they once governed but also many of their cultural practices, especially such elite skills as astronomy, cosmology and writing. While the writing of Mesoamerican peoples and the notational system of the Inca empire survived some time after the conquest, they eventually died out as new generations were not trained in their use. Since then, native communities have depended on the Roman alphabet, and often on European languages, to transcribe their groups’ traditional knowledge in durable form. Oral transmission has been a conduit not just for traditional learning but also for rebellion. As Jean Franco notes in Minnesota Review (1975), while writing was a blocked outlet, oral expression allowed native peoples “to maintain a consciousness of their past and build up resentment and subversion over long periods.”
Descendants of Spaniards and Portuguese were also at a cultural disadvantage vis-à-vis the colonial powers, who understandably wished to prevent the development of an independent New World identity. Spain’s controls over New World culture included censorship, the Inquisition, and restrictions on printing presses and the importation of books. Novels were forbidden lest they overstimulate the inhabitants of the New World. For criollos, American-born offspring of Spaniards, talk allowed for backbiting and the mockery of ecclesiastical and viceregal authorities. Among colonial-era documents that convey this anti-authoritarian talk is the Lazarillo de ciegos caminantes desde Buenos Aires hasta Lima [Guide for Blind Travelers from Buenos Aires to Lima] by Concolorcorvo (real name Alonso Carrió de la Vandera, born c.1715, died after 1778), published clandestinely in 1775 or 1776. This work satirizes authorities and the attitude that would later be called cultural dependency. For example, it ridicules a New World dweller ignorant of the land he inhabits, convinced that only European affairs are of any consequence.

Paradoxically, the colonials’ desire to imitate the mother country at times produced an original, unique New World expression. The ardor with which Latin American architects, artists and writers threw themselves into baroque creation resulted in a uniquely Latin American Baroque.

The majority of Latin American countries declared their political independence early in the 19th century. As independence became a reality, many intellectuals realized that political decolonization was only the beginning of constructing new national and Pan-American identities. During this era, a good deal of poetry was written to promote nationalistic sentiment and to stress the differences between the Old and New Worlds. Europe often appeared as an exhausted, decadent continent, while Latin America, uncontaminated by excessive sophistication, was a virtuous fresh start. The 1826 poem A la agricultura de la zona tórrida [To the Agriculture of the Torrid Zone], by Andrés Bello, epitomizes the campaign to convince Latin Americans that they are entrusted with a unique cultural mission. In Bello’s vision, the newly freed inhabitants of the New World are to shun the strife and urban decadence of Europe and to stand out as a decentralized, pacific culture. Independence-era intellectuals made proposals to strengthen Latin America’s cultural independence from Europe. Preconquest Indian civilizations were idealized as emblems of the New World; place names changed; the unsullied American landscape, with its unique flora and fauna, was celebrated. Pedro Henríquez Ureña, in his Ensayos en busca de nuestra expresión [Essays in Search of Our Expression], whose core essays appeared in 1928, reminds readers of the many Utopian schemes to make Latin American culture unique, such as the proposed development of new linguistic strains that would allow the New World to divorce itself from Spanish and Portuguese. Yet the European linguistic legacy proved inevitable in literature and general intellectual discussion. With specialized exceptions, such as Indian-language material transcribed in Roman alphabet, Latin American literature today exists in the language of the conquerors.

Starting in the 1870s, Latin American economies became more engaged with those of Western Europe and the United States. The new trade relations disadvantaged Latin America, which exported raw materials while relying on more industrialized countries for manufactured goods. The region was dependent in the sense that economically stronger countries set the agenda; it was also vulnerable to depressions caused by drops in commodity prices. Yet its traders and financiers enjoyed unprecedented prosperity, importing luxury items and modern conveniences. Culturally, as well, Latin America grew closer to continental Europe and the United States; in particular, educated Latin Americans were pre-occupied with following literary developments in France. It was during this period that Spanish American literary Modernism arose. Though criticized for its imitative dependency on foreign tendencies, Spanish American Modernism was the first original literary movement generated in Latin America. Critics from Octavio Paz to Ángel Rama have examined this paradox. In Rama’s analysis, Spanish American Modernists, fearful of inhabiting a cultural backwater, rushed pell-mell to acquire the latest European trends. In their zeal, they mixed together literary novelties considered incompatible in Europe as well as the established Romanticism and Realism, creating an original fusion. While Modernism was long perceived as above the fray of social relations, many researchers now study it as part of the transition the region was undergoing through strengthened trade and cultural exchange and campaigns for modernization and internationalization.

The 20th century brought novel forms of cultural exchange and influence. New media came to Latin America, starting with telegraph, radio, telephone and cinema. From the mid-1950s, forms of communication proliferated. Nations wielded influence less via industrial might than up-to-the-minute expertise in communications and marketing. Poorer countries depended less on Western Europe and more on US and transnational corporations. As such forms as transistor radios and televisions spread even to rural areas, observers expressed concern that they were inhibiting locally produced culture and imparting an outlook at odds with local realities. To use a much-cited example, international satellite newscasts, at a high level of technical sophistication, often displaced reportage originating in Latin America. Critics were disturbed that the satellite broadcasts reflected a US view, with Latin American issues receiving meager and poorly informed coverage. Herbert Schiller’s 1969 Mass Communications and American Empire documents the basis for such concerns.

The Chilean Ariel Dorfman deserves mention for his ability to spread concepts of cultural dependency to a broad audience. Dorfman and Armand Mattelart’s popular Para leer al Pato Donald, 1971 (How to Read Donald Duck: Imperialist Ideology in the Disney Comic), shows how Donald Duck stories justify the US practice of investing abroad after exhausting domestic opportunities. Dorfman and his students sought to counter such influences by producing comics reflecting Chile’s concerns.

A common objection to the concept of cultural dependency is that it promotes an isolationist cultural ideal. While some nationalistic purists may well use the term cultural dependency, most educated observers realize that interregional exchange is inevitable. To criticize cultural dependency is not to object to all outside influences. Rather, the goal is to support the creativity of regional cultures, which can evolve by adapting foreign elements if they are not overwhelmed by them.

NAOMI LINDSTROM

See also entries on Andrés Bello, Ariel Dorfman, Modernismo: Spanish America
Further Reading

Cândido, Antônio, “Literatura y subdesarrollo,” in America Latina en su literatura, edited by César Fernández Moreno, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1972

Casals, Lourdes (editor), El caso Padilla: literatura y revolución en Cuba, Miami: Universal, 1970 [See, in particular, documents 15 and 16]

Castro, Fidel, Palabras a los intelectuales, Havana: Consejo Nacional de Cultura, 1961

Dorfman, Ariel and Armand Mattelart, Para leer al Pato Donald, Valparaiso, Chile: Universitarias de Valparaiso, 1971; as How to Read Donald Duck: Imperialist Ideology in the Disney Comic, translated by David Kunzle, New York: International General, 1975; revised edition, 1984 [This content analysis of Disney comics, concerned with economic as well as cultural dependency, spread concepts of dependency to a general intellectual public]

Franco, Jean, “Dependency Theory and Literary History: the Case of Latin America,” Minnesota Review 5 (Fall 1975)

Henríquez Ureña, Pedro, Ensayos en busca de nuestra expresión, Buenos Aires: Raigal, 1928

Rama, Ángel, Transculturación narrativa en América Latina, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1982 [Rama is the literary critic who has achieved the most significant results in examining dependency and related phenomena in Latin American writing]

—— Las máscaras democráticas del modernismo, Montevideo: Fundación Ángel Rama, 1985

Santiago, Silviano, Uma literatura nos trópicos: ensaios sobre dependência cultural, São Paulo: Perspectiva, 1978

Roque Dalton 1935–1975

Salvadorean, poet, prose writer and revolutionary

Few lives conform to the stereotypical image of the Latin American romantic revolutionary intellectual as neatly as Roque Dalton’s. As a political activist and guerrilla fighter, Dalton’s existence was one of imprisonment, torture, close brushes with death, periods of exile and clandestine returns to El Salvador. As a writer, he is best known for his poetry, the medium which he loved and the medium in which he felt he could express himself most comfortably. Yet Dalton also worked in a variety of other literary forms including drama, the essay, the monograph, history and journalism. In both his prose and his poetry, he often manipulated and stretched genre parameters in his never-ending search for creative self-expression. Finally, as a Don Juan, Dalton was reported to have loved women…and to have had affairs with hundreds of them. Dalton’s death was no less dramatic than his life. Caught up in the midst of the ideological battles of El Salvador’s notoriously sectarian left, he was accused of revisionism, charged with treason, and tried and executed by former comrades. “Lógica Revi” [(Per)Verse Logic], a poem that ends with the chilling prediction that “Una crítica al Partido Comunista Salvadoreño/solo la puede hacer un agente de la CIA./Una autocritica equivale al suicidio.” (Only a CIA agent/can criticize the Salvadorean Communist Party/Self-criticism is equivalent to suicide), thus makes for prophetic reading.

What most strongly characterises Dalton’s work is his unrelenting quest to find the universal in the Salvadorean and the Salvadorean in the universal; he was driven by a compulsive need to find a way of being Salvadorean within a larger world and obsessed with finding ways to communicate his findings to his compatriots. Often lonely and isolated—he spent nearly thirteen years in exile (in Mexico, Cuba and Prague) and other periods in prison—Dalton’s writing is fiercely patriotic, and bursts with love and longing for his country and his people. Yet Dalton is neither excessively didactic nor excessively morose. He possessed a biting wit and a devastating sense of humour, and, despite his commitment to the convictions for which he lived and died, was rarely one to take himself or his circumstances too seriously. Rather, he mocks, jokes and lets his audience have a laugh at his expense, but never without the sting in the tail, never in the absence of a message or a deeper meaning. These traits are evident in a verse titled “Taberna” that he wrote during his exile in Prague: “Ironizar sobre el socialismo parece ser aqui un buen digestivo/pero te juro que en mi país primero hay que conseguirse la cena.” (Here, to speak ironically about socialism/seems to be a great way to aid digestion/but I can tell you that in my country/ we have yet to eat our dinner).

Dalton’s life was coloured by the popular uprising of 1932 which was led by the communist leader Agustín Farabundo Martí. The insurrection failed, and 30,000 people, most of whom were unarmed Indians, peasants and workers, were massacred under the presidency of General Maximiliano Hernández Martínez. As Dalton wrote in a poem entitled “Todos” [Everyone] he therefore belonged to a generation that was deemed half-dead and half-alive because, at that time, “to be a Salvadorean is to be half-dead.” Events such as the massacre had been erased from official history, and because of this Dalton vowed to uncover and resuscitate what he called the hidden history of his country, Las historias prohibidas del Pulgarcito [The Prohibited Stories of Tom Thumb]. The title is taken from the nickname given to the smallest of the five Central American republics by the Chilean poet Gabriela Mistral. In this work, Dalton constructs an account of El Salvador from the time of the conquest through 1969, the year of the so-called “Soccer War” with Honduras. Dalton has pieced together a counterhegemonic or countercultural history of El Salvador by interspersing his own poetry with actual government documents, fragments of text taken from Spanish chronicles, verses from popular songs, letters and newspaper reports.

Even at his most political, Dalton never sought to hide the personal qualities that fuelled his convictions. This is evident in Miguel Mármol: los sucesos de 1932 en El Salvador (Miguel Mármol). Here, in Dalton’s recording of the testimony of the most legendary of El Salvador’s older generation of communists, the personal and the political are tightly interwoven. As a result of the interactions that occurred in the course of its making—between interviewer and interviewee, old guard and new-generation communist, oral “folk” historian and academically-trained historian—the text is enriched with an extraordinary ideological and strategical complexity and vigour. Dalton’s own historical and political interpretations and analyses appear alongside Mármol’s, and the theoretical debates of the old and the new left are as crucial to the narrative as the eyewitness accounts of the development of the revolutionary process in El Salvador and the stories about the daily lives of the peasants and workers. Miguel Mármol is therefore not strictly a testimonial but a new kind of polemical literary form that is revolutionary as literature as well as revolutionary in its political message. Dalton’s friend and fellow writer Manlio Argueta has called the man who survived twelve neardeath experiences “a living document,” and the book is considered to be essential reading for anyone interested in people’s history.

Dalton was a great admirer of José Carlos Mariátegui, the brilliant revolutionary intellectual who sought to adapt Marxism-Leninism to the circumstances of his native Peru. In his efforts to “decolonize” European Marxism and to show how Marxist theory was applicable to El Salvador, Dalton, like Mariátegui, changed its packaging by (re)presenting it in a way that was consistent with the national reality of his country. Thus, a poem such as “La gran burguesía” [The Grand Bourgeoisie] paints a portrait of this social sector that is recognizable to the Salvadorean reader: “Los que producen el aguardiente/y luego dicen que no hay que aumentar el sueldo/a los campesinos/porque todo se lo van a gastar en aguardiente…(Those who produce liquor/and who then say that we musn’t raise the salaries/of the peasants/because if we do then they’ll just go and spend it all on liquor…)
In some instances, as John Beverley points out, this repackaging may present problems for the English-speaking reader because its very “Salvadorean-ness” compromises its universality. This could be a negative feature of Dalton’s work were it not for the numerous aids that he provides by way of a guide. Thus, while certain cultural references or colloquialisms may be unknown—and seemingly untraceable—the concepts contained elsewhere explain Dalton’s motivations and reasoning in no uncertain terms. The essay “Poesía y militancia en América Latina” or the shorter “El problema de hablar de Lenin en América Latina con el agravante de hacerlo desde un poema” [The Problem of Speaking about Lenin in Latin America and the Added Injury of Doing So in a Poem] are therefore good starting points for the new reader.

Where Dalton does connect easily and directly with his public, it is often because his humanitarianism and his openness about himself and his politics are so appealing. Outside of his poetry, this is most apparent in the “semi-autobiographical novel” entitled ¡Pobrecito poeta que era yo! [What a Dud Poet I Was!]. Dalton preferred to view his life as being representative of the lives of many others of his generation, and this is a fictionalised account of a life that Dalton never considered to be specifically his. Dalton-as-Dalton is therefore absent from his own “autobiography,” and the book is instead arranged around the diaries of several different characters. What is expressed elsewhere in poetry here appears in a Joyce-style stream of consciousness prose. Sarcastic, honest, moving—and at times unremittingly funny—its lighter side tells of Dalton’s bouts of drunkenness and his search for good meals, good poetry and “good” women during his years as a law student and aspiring poet. But the other side of the life of an increasingly committed militant communist living under a repressive military government is also portrayed here in all its horror. Full of Dalton’s opinions on national culture (what he referred to as both a Reader’s Digest culture and as “a load of shit”) and of his self-critical philosophical and psychoanalytical interpretations of his episodes of existential and patriotic angst, ¡Pobrecito poeta reads as a sort of politicised Central American version of The Catcher in the Rye.

The role of the intellectual and the role of cultural practices within a revolutionary process represent other constant themes in Dalton’s work. As a middle-class revolutionary intellectual and militant within a highly polarised society, these issues were close to his heart. He attempted to work through them in his essays and his poetry, maintaining that honest intellectuals who lived their lives in the struggle could become “proletarianized” to some extent by being aware of their class position and of “the eminently bourgeois character” of the expressive means that they had at their disposal. Some of these reflections appear in Un libro rojo para Lenin [A Red Book for Lenin]. Here, Dalton plays with Lenin’s notion of Party literature and its relevance and applicability to El Salvador and Latin America. While Dalton queried these ideas, he never wavered from his belief that the cultural field ought to be as important in the revolutionary process as the battlefield; as far as he was concerned, his poetry and his gun were weapons of equal importance. In so far as he worked through his political ideas both as a poet and as a guerrilla fighter, it must be said that in few other lives have communist revolutionary theory and action been so very closely linked.

JENNY SHUBOW

See also entries on Guerrilla Poetry, José Carlos Mariátegui
Biography

Born in El Salvador, 14 May 1935. Attended Jesuit primary and secondary schools in San Salvador and university in Chile, Mexico and El Salvador. Unable to complete law school due to imprisonment and exile. Joined the Communist Party of El Salvador in mid-1950s. Co-founder of the important Círculo Literario Universitario in San Salvador; editor of “La Jodarría,” a satiricalpolitical journal; visited USSR as delegate to a youth conference. Exiled to Mexico in 1961; first visit to Cuba, where he was to live eventually and where he worked with Casa de las Américas. Lived in Prague from 1965 to 1967. Late 1960s and early 1970s, visited North Korea and North Vietnam, where he worked in a bicycle factory and underwent military training. Made several clandestine journeys to El Salvador; in 1973. Following a split in the Communist Party, joined the Ejército Revolucionario del Pueblo (People’s Revolutionary Army). Recipient of numerous literary awards for his poetry, including: Central American Poetry Prize (corecipient, with Otto René Castillo), 1955; Central American Award of the University of San Salvador, 1956, 1958, 1959; International Literature Prize of the International Union of Students, 1961, Casa de las Américas Prize, 1969. Assassinated by a rival guerrilla faction, on 10 May 1975, four days before his 40th birthday.

Selected Works

Poetry

La ventana en el rostro, Mexico City: Andrea, 1961
Taberna y otros lugares, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1969
Los pequeños infiernos, Barcelona: Llibres de Sinera, 1970
Un libro levemente odioso, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1988

Prose Poetry or Collage Poetry

Las historias prohibidas del Pulgarcito, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1974
Un libro rojo para Lenin, Managua: Editorial Nueva Nicaragua, 1986
Prosoemas, Madrid: La Idea, 1987

Essays

El Salvador: (monografía), Havana: Biblioteca Nacional José MartíZ, 1963
¿Revolución en la revolución? y la crítica de derecha, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1970 [A critique of Regis Debray’s highly influential essay, and a defense of the essay against the right-wing attacks it received]

Compilations and Anthologies

Poesía escogida, San José, Costa Rica: EDUCA, 1983

Con manos de fantasmas: antología, Buenos Aires: Nueva America, 1987

En la humedad del secreto: antología poetica de Roque Dalton, edited by Rafael Lara Martínez, San Salvador: Concultura, 1994

Other Writings

El intelectual y la sociedad, with others, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1969 [Transcription of a round-table discussion held in Havana on 2 May 1969]

¡Pobrecito poeta que era yo!, San José, Costa Rica: EDUCA, 1976 [semi-autobiographical novel]

Further Reading

Benedetti, Mario, “Una hora con Roque Dalton,” in his Los poetas comunicantes, Montevideo: Marcha, 1972

——Poesía trunca, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1977

Beverley, John and Marc Zimmerman, Literature and Politics in the Central American Revolutions, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990 [This book, like the authors’ other joint and single publications, provides what is perhaps the most useful and important assessment of Dalton’s context and work]

Poems

By Roque Dalton

As a revolutionary poet, Roque Dalton’s lifelong mission was to heighten the political awareness of his audience through denouncing the atrocities and injustice perpetrated by El Salvador’s long string of military dictatorships. Real experiences and real people, real places and real dates appear time and time again in these pages; Dalton wanted his fellow Salvadoreans to learn their history. Poetry was therefore not simply a means of denouncing the inhumane, but also a vehicle for teaching the reader about the actual strategies for effecting social and political change that were being played out on the battlefield in El Salvador and other parts of the world. The revolutionary theories of Guevara and Fanon and the concrete examples of Cuba and Chile appear alongside the lessons to be learned from the failures of El Salvador’s own revolutionary movements. For example, “Maneras de morir” [Ways of Dying], written in the aftermath of the 1973 coup in Chile, is meant to provoke a rethink about how political and social change might be brought about in Latin America:

El Comandante Ernesto Che Guevara
llamado por los pacifistas “el gran aventurero de la lucha armada”
fue y aplicó sus concepciones revolucionarias a Bolivia.
En la prueba se perdió su vida y la de un puñado de heroes.
Los grandes pacifistas de la vía prudente también probaron sus propias concepciones en Chile:
los muertos pasan ya de 30 mil.
Piense el lector en lo que nos dirían si pudieran hablarnos de su experiencia los muertos en nombre de cada concepción.

[Commander Ernesto Che Guevara/whom the pacifists call/“the great adventurer of the armed struggle”/went and applied his revolutionary conceptions/to Bolivia./ In putting them to the test he lost his life and that of a handful of heroes./The great pacifists of the prudent way/also tried out their conceptions in Chile:/more than 30,000 people have already died./Let the reader think about what they would say to us/those who have died for each of these concepts/if they could tell us about their experiences.]
Full of unveiled party political messages and obsessed with communicating the need to fight for revolutionary change, this poetry escapes the agit-prop label only because Dalton’s love for his country and his people comes through so clearly and consistently. This, rather, is didactic political poetry at its best—and at its most didactic and political.

Despite his many commitments as a guerrilla in the midst of a guerrilla war, Dalton was a prolific writer. Margaret Randall (1990) estimates that apart from his prose he produced some 800 pages of poetry and prose-poetry. In these pages, elements taken from Salvadorean popular culture, the hard political rhetoric of the committed left-wing intellectual and Dalton’s own artistic genius work together to depict an alternative or unofficial version of Salvadorean reality. Dalton’s work must therefore be read as a search to define and express “lo salvadoreño,” what Gramsci referred to as the “nationalpopular.” For example, the country’s name (which translates as “The Saviour” or “The Redeemer”) has long been the basis for many jokes. As a result, a verse that draws upon this living tradition and this sense of humour must be read as being affectionately critical rather than just critical: “Todo es posible en un país como éste que, entre otras cosas, tiene el nombre más risible del mundo: cualquiera diría que se trata de un hospital o de un remolcador. (Everything is possible in a country like this—one that, among other things, has the most ludicrous name in the world:/who wouldn’t think that it refers to a hospital or a tugboat.” From “Sir Thomas”).

Indeed, although it is revolutionary in style as well as content, Dalton’s poetry often drew upon extant Salvadorean and Latin American traditions (Salarrué’s use of the vernacular, Náhuatl poetry’s humanism, Otto René Castillo’s fierce patriotism, Nicanor Parra’s “anti-poetry”). References to oral as well as written traditions are apparent: what is often an idiosyncratic rambling verse is interspersed with popular Salvadorean sayings, dirty jokes and phrases from songs, as well as with borrowings in direct quotation from a variety of national and international printed sources. Together they contextualize the poetry, thereby helping the poet to connect with his audience by providing them with common cultural references which they can relate to. Because of this, when Dalton uses his collage-poems to portray his interpretation of the state of the nation or, equally potently, as a space in which he can present his vision of what the nation could and should become, both images come across as identifiably and unequivocally Salvadorean:

El Salvador será un lindo
(y sin exagerar) serio país cuando la clase obrera y el campesinado lo fertilcen lo peinen lo talqueen le curen la goma histórica lo adecenten lo reconstituyan
y lo echan a andar.

[El Salvador will be a lovely/(and without exaggerating) serious country/when the working class and the peasants/fertilize it brush it up powder it/cure its historical hangover/make it presentable reconstruct it/ and set it on its way.]
Similarly, when highlighting—as he so often did—the contradictions of capitalism and underdevelopment, he is at the same time contributing to the Salvadorean tradition of finding delight in paradox and absurdity. In a country with a highly developed vernacular and with a highly politicised population, Dalton’s use of Salvadorean slang alongside Marxist-Leninist phraseology and concepts seems to make perfect sense.

Dalton’s poetry draws on his studies in Mesoamerican anthropology and world history. The commitment to humanity which is also evident in his work must certainly have been influenced by his religious education; “like almost all revolutionaries,” he once said, “I was educated in a Jesuit school.” Although Dalton considered the religious themes that surface in his work to be vestiges of “the conflict that existed in my youth between my revolutionary consciousness and my Christian consciousness,” his later poetry shows that while this Christian consciousness might have merged with his revolutionary one, it never disappeared altogether. (“Los hongos” [Mushrooms], a very long poem that Dalton worked on between 1966 to 1972, is dedicated to Ernesto Cardenal, the Nicaraguan revolutionary poet and Trappist monk, “as our problem, a problem of Catholics and Communists”). As Poemas clandestinos (Clandestine Poems), the title of one of his most well-known collections of poems, makes clear, his poetry was also conditioned by several periods of imprisonment and torture and by the nearly thirteen years spent in exile and the secret returns to his homeland: “No confundir,” he wrote of himself and of the comrade-poets of the so-called “Committed Generation,” “somos poetas que escribimos desde la clandestinidad en que vivimos” (Let’s set the record straight: we are poets who write from the clandestinity in which we live), from “Sobre nuestra moral poética” [On Our Poetic Morality]. Yet despite the harshness of the circumstances of his life, Dalton never lost his almost child-like love for his homeland and his people: “País mío vení/papaítopaísa solas con tu sol/todo el frío del mundo me ha tocado a mí/y tu sudando amor amor amor (Come to me, my country/ Daddyland, alone with your sun/Here I am feeling all the cold in the world/and there you are sweating love love love), from “Temores” [Fears].

Dalton’s poetry is warm, tender, intimate, honest, self-parodying and eminently human; it is telling that he should have rejected Neruda (for being mechanical) in favour of the more complex Vallejo. He was firmly committed to writing poetry that was “beautiful”—indeed, what he wrote on aesthetics shows that he was unwavering in his belief that a work of art must not just serve a political function, but that it first and foremost must be good as art. He regarded “the privilege of beauty” to be but one more privilege that needed to be expropriated from the bourgeoisie through class struggle. Nor was all of his poetry purely political. Dalton was moderately self-obsessed, and he himself was a common theme for his work. This is evident in poems such as “Huelo mal” [I Stink], “27 años” [27 Years Old], “Buscándome líos” [Looking for Trouble] and “No siempre fui tan feo;” [I Wasn’t Always So Ugly]. (His face had borne the brunt of football injuries, beatings in prison, an attack carried out on him during his lengthy exile in Prague—and, it is said, the odd punch meted out by a jealous husband or two). He also wrote a good deal of love poetry. Yet even in these poems Dalton is seeking to connect with others, to show that he was no different from anyone else, that, “Yo, como tú, amo el amor, la vida, el dulce encanto/de las cosas…” (I, like you, love love, life, the sweet enchantment/of things…”) (in “Como tú;” [Like You]). Finally, although his is often gallows humour, Dalton must surely rank as one of the funniest writers that Latin America has ever produced. His mastery of the pun and the subversive and his joyously carnivalesque qualities make the frequent comparisons with Brecht (whom Dalton admired enormously) fully warranted.

JENNY SHUBOW

Rubén Darío 1867–1916

Nicaraguan poet, prose writer and journalist

Most scholars would agree that the modernistas’s search for originality in poetic expression, together with the forging of a Latin American project of intellectual autonomy so much discussed in the continent since Independence, was pushed forward with Rubén Darío. He, in a contradictory fashion, refused to be the head of a movement that none the less seized the imagination of writers in the American continent as well as in Spain. Darío provided a then stultified linguistic vehicle with renewed combinations of rhythm, rhyme and a richness of lexicon that reinvented the Spanish language, and made it more malleable to modern poetic practice. Thus the Spanish poet Gerardo Diego noted the liberating influence of the Nicaraguan poet in the Peninsula in the construction of a language endowed with an enhanced poetic expression suitable for the new generation’s needs and aspirations to linguistic renovation.

Darío grounded the formal aspect of what he conceived as innovative in his poetic system on the abandonment of usual orderings and common clichés; on directing attention to interior melody in order to develop a successful rhythmic expression; on novelty in the choice of adjectives; on a careful study of the etymological meaning of the words; on the appropriate application of erudition and lexical refinement, and on appropriation and recasting of thematic and poetic concerns from French Symbolist, Parnassian, and Romantic poetics.

Darío’s poetics embodied the modernista spirit, and spearheaded this movement which has been defined from different perspectives. For Federico de Onís, Spanish American Modernismo was the Hispanic form of the Western crisis of letters and spirit that began to take place around 1885 and ended during the second decade of the 20th century. For the Mexican poet, Octavio Paz, Modernismo is an erotics of language and a consciousness of linguistic expression. More recently another poet, José Emilio Pacheco, perceptively interpreted Modernismo as an attempt to break away from centuries of humiliation to begin a process of reconstruction and development similar to those of the main urban cultural centres in Western culture. It is in this context that Darío needs to be situated and read.

However, even closer to the present, the Uruguayan critic Ángel Rama asked a very pointed question: Why is it that Darío is still alive today, when his aesthetics has been abolished, and his ornate lexicon, themes and poetics superseded? Rama credits Darío with changing the perception of intellectual work by rejecting the view that art was merely expression; instead literature should be regarded as a process of rigorous intellectual engagement that required serious and arduous preparation. Darío was in Rama’s words “the perfect example of this reevaluation of intellectual work that set a great divide” in Latin American literary history.

In addition, Darío is the best counter-example to the argument that only urban, cosmopolitan areas can be the site of innovation and change in Latin American culture. Born in Metapa, then a small town in a small Central American country, in a sense, marginal twice over, Darío mastered the poetic forms of the European literary tradition, ventured into the forms and themes of 19th-century European culture, and appropriated them for Spanish American literature. Although he wrote poems during his formative years, such as Epístolas y poemas, 1885 [Epistles and Poems], it is with the publication of Azul, 1888 [Blue] in Santiago de Chile, that Modernismo is recognized as a new artistic movement, a recognition that tended to blur partly the contribution of José Martí and Julián del Casal (Cuba), José Asunción Silva (Colombia) and Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera (Mexico) to Modernismo, a misreading that has been appropriately addressed by presentday literary criticism.

Jorge Luis Borges, in assessing the importance of Darío in Spanish American letters, enlightened Darío’s contribution to his generation by stating that “Darío renovated everything: subject matter, vocabulary, meter, the magic of certain words, the poet’s sensibility and that of the reader. Its flavour has not ceased and will never cease. Those of us who at some point rejected him now understand that we are his followers. We can call him the liberator.” Without Darío, Spanish American turn-of-the-century literary production would not have achieved the originality and legitimization that it has today.

During his years in Santiago de Chile (June 1886 to February 1889) the young Darío explored a cornucopia of poetic possibilities: from the patriotic hymn, “Canto épico a las glorias de Chile,” [Epic Song to the Glories of Chile] to romantic rhymes (“Otoñales”) to satiric poems in Abrojos [Thistles] to the sensual poetry of Azul, as well as a successful incursion into the short story through widely acclaimed texts included in Azul, Darío’s first important collection. Ángel Rama finds it useful to think of these poems as belonging to two different categories: one group are “realist poems” in which the poet ruminates over ideas about the world, and in the other “artistic poems,” he constructs the world within its own contradictions.

Prosas profanas y otros poemas, 1896 [Prosas profanas and Other Poems] is his second great collection. It is a display of a sensually charged reading of culture new to Spanish American letters. Poems that made a mark as in the case of “Era un aire suave” (There Was a Softness in the Air). It was also a compendium of musical rhythms and metrical combinations not yet heard in Spanish, although Darío’s mastery of versification came from the great poetry of the Spanish Medieval and Renaissance traditions, somewhat obscured by the decadence of the Spanish spirit in later centuries.

Cantos de vida y esperanza, 1905 [Songs of Life and Hope] continue the spirit and themes of Prosas profanas. This time, however, “it is the crisis of the aestheticism of Prosas profanas, comments Enrique Anderson Imbert. Darío’s reflection on himself as a Spanish American poet, and as a man of his time, laconically remarks in the opening lines of this most moving book of poemas: “Yo soy aquel que ayer no más decía / el verso azul y la canción profana…(I am the one who only yesterday sang the blue verse and the profane song). These are poems of a mature poetic voice that has not renounced his earlier obsessions; rather, there is a reckoning of what must prevail from the poetic edifice he had constructed thus far. Darío envisioned the “selva sagrada” (sacred forest) as an all encompassing artifice that includes the world in its totality. The aspiration to a harmonious unity is the overriding force in this book; a force that was taken up by the poets that followed Dario, like the Mexican Octavio Paz.

El canto errante, 1907 [The Wandering Song] is preceded by one of the most lucid prologues, where he enunciates more explicitly than in the prologues to Prosas profanas and Cantos de vida y esperanza, his thoughts on poetry: “Poetic form will not disappear; it will expand, modify itself, following an everchanging development in the eternal rhythm of the centuries.” His other books of poems are Poema del otoño y otros poemas, 1910 [Autumn Poem and Other Poems], Canto a la Argentina y otros poemas, 1914 [Song to Argentina and Other Poems]; his prose collections include El mundo de los sueños, 1917 [The World of Dreams], La vida de Rubén Darío escrita por él mismo [The Life of Rubén Darío Written by Himself], Los raros, 1896 [The Eccentrics], España contemporánea, 1901 [Contemporary Spain], Letras, 1911 [Letters].

MAGDALENA GARCÍA PINTO

Biography

Born Felix Rubén García Sarmiento in Metapa, Nicaragua, 18 January 1867. Adopted the pseudonym Rubén Darío by 1880. Travelled to Chile, 1886 where he spent three years. This stay considerably broadened his intellectual horizons. Returned to Central America, 1889. Married Rafaela Contreras in 1890 (died 1892), one son; later married Francisca Sánchez, one son. Secretary of the Nicaraguan delegation for the celebration of the 400th anniversary of the discovery of American, Spain, 1892.; Colombian consul in Buenos Aires, 1893–94; visited Paris, June 1893; journalist in Buenos Aires; visited Madrid, 1899; travelled to France and Italy, April 1900. Nicaraguan consul in Paris, 1903–07; secretary, Nicaraguan delegation at the Pan-American conference, Rio de Janeiro, 1906; correspondent for Latin American papers, such as La Nación (Buenos Aires) in various parts of Latin America as well as in Paris and Madrid; also served Guatemala in various diplomatic and representative functions. Led an increasingly dissipated life and died of cirrhosis of the liver in Nicaragua, 6 February 1916.

Selected Works

Poetry

Epístolas y poemas, Managua, Nicaragua: Tipografía Nacional, 1885

Abrojos, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta Cervantes, 1887

Cantos de vida y esperanza, “Los cisnes,” y otros poemas, Madrid: Tipografía de la Revista de Archivos, Bibliotecas y Museos, 1905

El canto errante, Madrid: Pérez Villavicencio, 1907

Poema del otoño y otros poemas, Madrid: Biblioteca Ateneo, 1910

Canto a la Argentina y otros poemas, Madrid: Clásica Española, 1914

Sol del domingo: poesías ineditas, Madrid: Sucesores de Hernando, 1917
Other Writings
A. de Gilbert: biografía de Pedro Balmaceda, San Salvador: Imprenta Nacional, 1890
Los raros, Buenos Aires: Talleres de La Vasconia, 1896; revised and augmented edition, Barcelona: Maucci, 1905
Castelar, Madrid: B. Rodríguez Serra, 1899
Peregrinaciones, Paris: Charles Bouret, 1901
España contemporánea, Paris: Garnier Hermanos, 1901
La caravana pasa, Paris: Garnier Hermanos, 1902.
Tierras solares, Madrid: Leonardo Williams, 1904
Opiniones, Madrid: Librería de Fernando Fe, 1906
El viaje a Nicaragua, Madrid: Biblioteca Ateneo, 1909
Todo al vuelo, Madrid: Renacimiento, 1912.
La vida de Rubén Darío, escrita por el mismo, Barcelona: Maucci, 1916

Compilations and Anthologies
El mundo de los sueños: prosas póstumas, Madrid: Librería de la Vivda de Pueyo, 1917
[journalism]
Impresiones y sensaciones, edited by Alberto Ghiraldo, Madrid: Biblioteca Rubén Darío, 1925
Escriptos dispersos, edited by Pedro Luis Barcia, 2 vols, La Plata: Universidad Nacional de La Plata, 1968–73
Cuentos fantásticos, edited by José Olivio Jiménez, Madrid: Alianza, 1979

Anthologies in Translation
Selected Poems, translated by Lysander Kemp, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1965

Further Reading
Anderson Imbert, Enrique, La originalidad de Rubén Darío, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1967
Ellis, Keith, Critical Approaches to Rubén Darío, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1974
Giordano, Jaime, La edad de ensueño: sobre la imaginación poética de Rubén Darío, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1971
Henríquez Ureña, Max, Breve historia del Modernismo, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1954
Ingwersen, Sonya A., Light and Longing: Silva and Dario: Modernism and Religious Heterodoxy, New York: Peter Lang, 1986
Pacheco, José Emilio, prologue to Antología del Modernismo, 1884–1921, Mexico City: UNAM, 1970
Nocturno XXXII

Poem from Cantos de vida y esperanza by Rubén Darío

Nocturno

A Mariano de Cavia

Los que auscultasteis el corazón de la noche, los que por el insomnio tenaz habéis oído el cerrar de una puerta, el resonar de un coche lejano, un eco vago, un ligero ruido…

En los instantes del silencio misterioso, cuando surgen de su prisión los olvidados, en la hora de los muertos, en la hora del reposo, sabréis leer estos versos de amargor impregnados…

Como en un vaso vierto en ellos mis dolores de lejanos recuerdos y desgracias funestas.
y las tristes nostalgias de mi alma, ebria de flores,
y el duelo de mi corazón, triste de fiestas.

Y el pensar de no ser lo que yo hubiera sido, la pérdida del reino que estaba para mí, el pensar que un instante pude no haber nacido,
y el sueño que es mi vida desde que yo nací.

Todo esto viene en medio del silencio profundo en que la noche envuelve la terrena ilusión, y siento como un eco del corazón del mundo que penetra y conmuye mi propio corazón.

[You who have sounded the heart of the night/who, gripped by insomnia, have heard,/a clicking door, a rattling coach/a long way off, a muffled echo, the merest sound…

In the instants of mysterious silence/when the forgotten rise from their prisons/at the hour of the dead, at the hour of repose/you will know how to read these lines in bitterness steeped…

As though in a glass, I pour into them my sorrows/of distant memories and grave misfortunes/and my soul, light-headed on flowers, harks back sadly/and my heart grieves jaded by pleasure

And I think how I am not/what I might have been/ the loss of the kingdom that was there for me/and the thought that for an instant I might not have been born /and how my life has been a dream since my birth

All this comes in the midst of the deepest silence/in which night envelops earthly illusion/and I feel like an echo of the world’s heart/that pierces and moves my own heart.]

There is an apparent irony in the fact that this poem is dedicated to Mariano de Cavia, a well known Spanish journalist of the period (that is the first decade of the 20th century) who specialized in articles on linguistic refinements and subtleties. This is because although the poem shows Darío at the heights of his powers (Cantos de vida y esperanza was published in 1905), it is also, with one exception, written in rather plain language.
Not, of course, that this “Nocturno” is simple in technical terms; on the contrary, translating it reveals the extent of the poet’s technical confidence and competence.
However, what stands out here is that for Dario the period of defamiliarizing the language of literature in Spanish is over. There are no verbal pyrotechnics, no imported, exotic language; gone are the excesses (including the kitsch) of Azul and Prosas profanas. Within the new plain(er) language there is one term taken from scientific discourse that stares out threateningly from the first line. This is the verb auscultar, to auscultate in English, although it has been rendered in the translation of the poem by the unscientific “to sound,” since the more learned term would never be used by a doctor when addressing a patient in the English-speaking world. But it is important to take due note of this scientific term because it shows that Darío in his maturity is still experimenting with language and, in this respect, despite the poem’s old-fashioned confessional tone, is moving towards the avant-garde. A few years later—in 1913—Stravinsky was to shock the core a Parisian audience with his ballet The Rite of Spring, in which rhythm dominates over melody and harmony; in 1917, T.S.Eliot challenged conventional “poetic” language by the use, again, of a scientific term in his poem “The Love Song of J.Alfred Prufrock.” This is where he writes: “Let us go then, you and I, when the evening is spread out against the sky/Like a patient etherised upon a table.”
Darío too is experimenting, not only with words but with silence, suggested here by the use of unfinished lines that leave the interlocutor(s) to work out, as in a casual conversation, what has been left unsaid.

The title, “Nocturno,” is an apparently straightforward verbal sign denoting a dreamy and gentle musical composition appropriate to the night. In the still night the poet establishes at once an intimacy with his readers or interlocutors by assuming that they will empathize with him: “Los que auscultásteis el corazón de la noche.” They too, in their maturity, will have experienced insomnia and this type of sadness, provoked by an awareness of past indulgence and squandered talent. Where is the poet? Granted that Darío is talking to us in such a relaxed manner, we want to know where the conversation takes place, but the information is withheld, for the poem is not anecdotal and the poet is indifferent to local colour. The setting, though, is urban and, like the verb of the first line, this is potentially alienating granted the poet’s hostility to modern bourgeois society.

The poem, in keeping with its title, is intensely musical, something else that emerges clearly when a translation is attempted. A strong, almost compulsive rhythm is established, one that is based on inner rhymes (line 4), on enjambment, that is, of running one line straight into the next one (lines 3–4 of the poem), the use of alliteration and of the repetition of often plain words and their cognates: pensar; nacer/nacido; triste, and the most dominant of all, the beating heart. By the time Darío wrote this “Nocturno,” the dissipated life to which he alludes in it was undermining his health and death, or Ella
(She) as he often referred to it, began to haunt him; so it is not surprising that the spirit of the dead, rising from their graves, should be evoked in the second stanza. The dreamlike quality of the traditional nocturne is thus disturbed by powerful, dark emotions.

Like many other poems by Darío, this “Nocturno” is a much quoted classic and phrases from it such as the opening line and “triste de fiestas,” are as well known in the Spanish-speaking world as certain lines from Shakespeare’s sonnets. Yet its modernity prevents it from being a safe, conventional poem. Exasperated by the sillier excesses of Spanish American Modernismo, the Mexican poet Enrique González Martínez exclaimed: “Tuércele el cuello al cisne” (Twist the swan’s neck), a remark aimed at Darío who used swans consistently in his poetry in either a decorative or a thoughtful way. Arguably, though, in a poem like this “Nocturno,” Darío was engaged in throttling his own swan.

VERITY SMITH

See also entries on Julián del Casal, Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera, José Martí, Modernismo: Spanish America, José Asunción Silva
Editions

First edition: Cantos de vida y esperanza. “Los cisnes” y otros poemas, Madrid: Tipografía de la Revista de Archivos, Bibliotecas y Museos, 1905

Critical edition: Azul...Cantos de vida y esperanza, edited by J. María Martínez, Madrid: Cátedra, 1995

Note: There appears to be no translation of this collection—an unlikely gap.

Del Paso, Fernando

See Paso

René Depestre 1926–

Haitian poet and prose writer

René Depestre, the most celebrated contemporary Haitian poet, has spent most of his adult life in political exile. But, despite his absence from his native island, he remains essentially Haitian, identifying with his deprived countrymen, unrelentingly returning to the mythology of his heritage and expressing the obsessive, often painful memories, associated with his homeland. His early literary career was dedicated to the cause of socialist humanism and Haiti’s liberation from oppression. Jacques Roumain had a profound impact on his political thinking and poetic inspiration, as on most of the intellectuals of Depestre’s generation.

From his first revolutionary volume of verse, Étincelles, 1945 [Sparks], published at the age of nineteen, Depestre demonstrated his commitment to the restoration of his people’s dignity and to all the oppressed of the world. Heir of ardent Haitian patriots such as Makandal, Louverture, Dessalines and Roumain, Depestre became the leading voice for the radical young generation, expressing his bitterness and rage for his country’s exploitation and deprivation. But his communist orientation, and his use of poetry as a vehicle for his politics forced him to exile. Indeed, for Depestre, the intellectual’s responsibility is to dispense knowledge to the masses and to give them hope by initiating revolt. In linking poetry and revolution, he developed a new literary radicalism. After the failed student revolution of 1946, Depestre was exiled in France. Later, in 1958, he chose to live in Cuba, then in France again when Haiti yielded to the excesses of the Duvalier dictatorships.

Traduit du grand large, 1952 [Translated from the High Sea] is a volume of poetry written during Depestre’s Cuban exile. It is a long and devastating song relating the miseries of his handcuffed island and of the whole planet under the maddening North American imperialist violence. But as the poet unfolds the world map of racism and oppression, he also depicts a magnificent portrait of a liberated humanity, inspired by the example of socialist countries where the people have overthrown the dictatorship of injustice, hunger and illiteracy.

In Minerai noir, 1956 [Black Ore], the poet exposes the plight of Blacks reduced, as the title reveals, to objects of material exploitation. In this poem, Depestre expresses painful memories of his homeland, personified as a female captive: she is a zombi, an essential figure of dispossession in Haitian mythology. Depestre’s poetic inspiration reveals the tension between his unattainable, mythic past and his present sense of alienation, between his individual quest and his visceral attachment to his lost land. This tension is most evident in his subsequent collection of poetry, Journal d’un animal marin, 1964 [Diary of a Marine Animal] where the poet must confront his permanent condition of exile, reexamine his life of errancy, and consider the problematics of being elsewhere. His sense of alienation leads him to reevaluate his identity as necessarily an unstable composite of elements, as a constant process of transformation.

Pursuing his political reflections in his poem, Un Arc-en-ciel pour l’Occident chrétien, 1967 (A Rainbow for the Christian West), Depestre attests to the great wrath that shakes the foundations of the world. The poet is a “new Negro” who is proud of his disruptive marooning powers. He is able to conjure up the fighting divinities of Haitian Voodoo mythology as well as the great revolutionary heroes of the past. But the poet-hougan becomes powerless when at the end of his crusade he encounters a neo-colonial world ready to sacrifice humanity with “atomic gods” to economic greed. Only wisdom and goodwill of all peoples may save humanity from barbarity and hatred. The poet’s anger has transcended and transformed itself into a song of love and hope.

The question of race and origins determined Depestre’s political vision. Early, he rejected the concept of Indigenism and Négritude—the latter transformed to “noirisme” by François Duvalier in support of his fascist politics—for a universal authenticity. Along with several members of the short-lived Haïti Littéraire—such as Anthony Phelps, Jacques-Stéphen Alexis, René Philoctète, Franck Etienne—Depestre shifted from the notion of a timeless Haitian essence or cultural authenticity to the concept of an open-ended, ever-changing cultural identity. “I have a whole system of roots...I have multiple identities,” he said in a 1992 interview. His collection of essays entitled Bonjour et adieu a la negritude, 1980 [Hello and Goodbye to Negritude], reflects the poet’s rejection of the ideology of authenticity and his urge to liberate aesthetics by demythifying the process of literary creation.

In Le Mât de cocagne (The Festival of the Greasy Pole), Depestre, satirizing the Duvalier regime, violently criticizes the axioms of the Négritude ideology. However, Poète a Cuba, 1976 [Poet in Cuba], dedicated to the great writer Jacques-Stéphen Alexis, tortured and murdered by François Duvalier’s henchmen, marks a turning point in Depestre’s ideological commitment. The poet is still dedicated to the “dezombification” of his people (i.e., their liberation from bondage), but he redefines the revolution through an exploration of his erotic obsessions and anxieties. He attempts to comprehend himself and his transitory world through a celebration of woman, a composite muse who takes him far away from his revolutionary project. He transforms the political into the erotic.

In this respect, Alléluia pour une femme-jardin [Hallelujah for a Garden-Woman, first published in Cuba in 1973 and reprinted in France in 1981] articulates Depestre’s new paradoxical pursuit. His search for the lost Eden, his need to repossess the beauty of his native land, becomes embodied in a long list of beautiful women to be possessed and lost, or simply disposed of. In this collection of stories the writer articulates the use and abuse of woman’s image in the Caribbean through what he calls his “géolibertinage.” The myth of the island woman as the vessel of his sexual vigor remains Depestre’s obsession in his two subsequent volumes. In Hadriana dans tous mes rêves, 1988 [Hadriana in All My Dreams], he reimagines, through the technique of magical realism, the marvelous realm of his native Jacmel. The confusion between reality and the imaginary leads to an allegorical representation of the mystery of woman. His last published volume, Éros dans un train chinois, 1993 [Eros in a Chinese Train], expresses through an aesthetic that Depestre calls “erotico-magical realism,” his boundless love for women of different cultures, their beauty and fertility. Unfortunately, his image of the female tends to represent a new kind of exploitation.

With his erotic imagination, Depestre attempts to apprehend the world and to recreate a liberated, triumphant Haiti. If Depestre has succeeded in transcending the narrowness of his national identity to embrace a world perspective on erotic ecosystems, his revolutionary projects in socialist and militant humanism belong to a lost past.

MARIE-AGNÈS SOURIEAU

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry
Étincelles, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie de l’État, 1945
Gerbe de sang, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie de L’État, 1946
Minerais noir, Paris: Presence Africaine, 1956
Journal d’un animal marin, Paris: Seghers, 1964
Poète a Cuba, Paris: Oswald, 1976
Au Matin de la negritude, Luxembourg: Euroeditor, 1990
Anthologie personnelle: poésie, Arles: Actes Sud, 1993

Novels
Alléluïa pour une femme-jardin, Paris: Gallimard, 1982
Hadriana dans tous mes rêves, Paris: Gallimard, 1988
Éros dans un train chinois: neuf histoires d’amour et un conte de sorcier, Paris: Gallimard, 1990

Other Writings
Por la revolución, por la poesía, Havana: Instituto del Libro, 1969; as Pour la Revolution, pour la poésie, Montreal: Leméac, 1974
Influencia del África en las literaturas antillanas, in collaboration with Henry Bangou and George Lamming, Montevideo: ILAC, 1972
Problemas de la indentitad del hombre negro en las literaturas antillanas, Mexico City: UNAM, 1978
Bonjour et adieu a la negritude: travaux d’identité, Paris: Laffont, 1980

Further Reading
Dayan, Joan, “‘Hallelujah for a Garden-Woman’: the Caribbean Adam and His Pretext,” French Review (March 1986)

Detective Fiction

Although Latin American writers are not prolific when it comes to producing detective fiction, the region is the source of a significant body of works that follows or plays with the conventional formulas of the British whodunit and North American hard-boiled narrative. The development of the genre in Latin America is governed in large part by a marketplace saturated with translations from abroad. Publishers often have been reluctant to support native authors, since foreign works are cheaper to produce and their sales are easier to predict. That circumstance has changed in some respects since the 1970s due to shifting views of what constitutes literary expression. The genre has flourished, for example, in post-revolutionary Cuba, and in Argentina the lowbrow status of the hard-boiled model lent itself to the form’s use in questioning official discourses of authority. Despite these recent developments, the detective fiction sections of bookstores from Mexico City to Buenos Aires continue to be dominated by Agatha Christie novels and the like in Spanish and Portuguese.

Latin America’s detective fiction is best characterized by a sense of estrangement, resistance, and invention. The genre evolves there as if it were itself a mystery, not to be solved, but rather explored. The aim is not mastery, as Sherlock Holmes would have it, but rather elaboration. Because of its origins and ideological perspective, the genre is, in a sense, an unusually visible reminder of the phantom hand that rests on Latin America’s shoulders, the imperial grip that defines a colonized reality. The imported genre is an incongruent model that demands to be scrutinized. As such, detective fiction functions also as an invitation to reinvention. The formulas of the two main detective fiction models—the tidy, British murder puzzle and the more violent and variable hard-boiled tale associated with the United States—are ideologically and culturally loaded tropes that provoke. As might be expected, strictly formulaic detective fiction is relatively rare in Latin America, as are serial writers. The constraints of the genre and the discouragements of the market create an environment where authors are less likely to satisfy conventions than they are to experiment with them.

Latin America’s centers of detective fiction writing are Argentina, Brazil, Cuba and Mexico. Other countries, especially Chile, Colombia and Peru, have also produced notable texts. The earliest works are from Argentina and date from the late 19th-century, only a few decades after what is generally regarded as the birth of the genre with the publication of Edgar Allan Poe’s “Murders in the Rue Morgue” (1841). Outside of Argentina, detective fiction does not emerge significantly until the 1920s. Throughout Latin America, detective fiction has been cultivated by some of the region’s leading intellectuals and public figures. Among those contributing to the genre are: in the River Plate, Eduardo Ladislao Holmberg, Horacio Quiroga, Jorge Luis Borges, Adolfo Bioy Casares, Enrique Anderson Imbert, Marco Denevi, Osvaldo Soriano and Ricardo Piglia; in Brazil, Afrânio Peixoto, Maximiniano Coelho Neto, Jorge Amado, João Guimarães Rosa, Rubem Fonseca; in Cuba, Lino Novás Calvo; and in Mexico, Rodolfo Usigli, José Emilio Pacheco, Jorge Ibarguengoitia, Vicente Leñero. In Colombia and Peru respectively, Gabriel García Márquez and Mario Vargas Llosa are significant cultivators of the genre.

The absence of women on these lists is consistent with the gendered history of literary culture in Latin America. Two other aspects help to explain women’s relative absence from the field. First is the historical record that finds the British whodunit model to be the one most cultivated by women authors anywhere until late in the 20th century. That precedent, however, is set in another context. The whodunit’s potential to inspire is undermined by the difficulty evident throughout the history of the genre in Latin America of adapting the model to another register. The strongest detective fiction by women writers there emerges as an expression of an oppositional voice. Like Latin American literature in general, most detective fiction that reaches the reading public is produced by representatives of the dominant, white, male society, although these authors often use the form to question some of the values and attitudes that affirm that culture. Among the few women who have experimented with the genre are: from Argentina, Silvina Ocampo, María Angélica Bosco, Syria Poletti, Angélica Gorodischer, Gloria Pampillo; from Brazil, Maria Alice Barroso; and from Mexico, María Elvira Bermúdez.

Apart from the few formulaic works produced in Latin America, and the Cuban post-revolutionary genre, the region’s detective fiction typically falls into three categories: parody, documentary narrative, and anti-detective fiction. These three modes or intentions frequently occur together as well, in various combinations. An example of parody is Glauco Rodrigues Corrêa’s Crime na baía sul, 1980 (The South Bay Crime), which pokes fun at Brazilian paternalism and provincialism, while also satirizing the whodunit formula by questioning its crime-to-official solution inevitability. An example of the fusion of detective and documentary fiction is Rodolfo Walsh’s Operación masacre, 1957 [Operation Massacre]. Here, the author incorporates detective fiction devices into a text that attempts to document an extralegal execution that the Argentine government denies ever occurred. The conventions that entertain by producing suspense are engaged here instead for the purpose of challenging and denouncing. The “solution” to Walsh’s mystery is knowledge and commitment to social change. In Vicente Leñero’s anti-detective novel Los albañiles, 1963 [The Bricklayers], the solution is eliminated altogether. The principle of closure is replaced by an overwhelming sense of duplicity generated by the hierarchical structure that, for Leñero, describes Mexican culture. One final group of works of detective fiction from Latin America are the Cuban texts that emerge in the post-revolutionary period. These are intended to promote the values of the Revolution, and they often lose out in the translation of a genre steeped in capitalist tradition. Some authors, however, have been successful in exploiting conventional strategies while projecting a socialist perspective. Among these are Ignacio Cárdenas Acuña, Juan Ángel Cardi, and Arnaldo Correa.

AMELIA SIMPSON

Further Reading

General
Simpson, Amelia, Detective Fiction from Latin America, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson Press, 1990 [This comprehensive study of the genre in Latin America gives an historical overview followed by an analysis of selected texts]
Simpson, Amelia, (editor and translator), New Tales of Mystery and Crime from Latin America, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson Press, 1992, [An introduction that discusses the genre and introduces the eight stories that follow. These are from Argentina, Mexico, Brazil, and Cuba. Authors include Ricardo Piglia, Ignácio de Loyola Brandão, and Rubem Fonseca. Most are published here for the first time in English]
Sklodowska, Elzbieta, La parodia en la nueva novela latinoamericana (1960–1985), Amsterdam and Philadelphia: Benjamins, 1991 [Chapter 5 is on varieties of detective fiction]

Argentina
Lafforgue, Jorge and Jorge B. Rivera (editors), Asesinos de papel, Buenos Aires: Calicanto, 1977
[This important anthology includes introductory remarks about detective fiction in Argentina, a series of observations about the genre by Jorge Luis Borges, Marco Denevi, Ricardo Piglia and others, and stories by authors such as Horacio Quiroga, Leonardo Castellani, Velmiro Ayala Gauna and Adolfo Pérez Zelaschi]

Rivera, Jorge B. (editor), El relato policial en la Argentina, Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1986 [A valuable introduction by Rivera is followed by stories by seven writers including Rodolfo J. Walsh, Juan Carlos Martini and Eduardo Goligorsky. The authors’ responses to written interview questions are also included]

Brazil

Amâncio, Moacir (editor), Chame o ladrão: Contos policiais brasileiros, São Paulo: Edições Populares, 1978 [The introduction to this anthology angrily protests social conditions in Brazil, and the stories, which are examples of detective fiction broadly defined, support that view]

Medeiros e Albuquerque, Paulo de, O mundo emocionante do romance policial, Rio de Janeiro: Francisco Alves, 1979 [The book focuses on the foreign detective fiction Brazilians mostly read. There is one chapter, however, on detective fiction written by Brazilians]

Cuba

Nogueras, Luis Rogelio, Por la novela policial, Havana: Union, 1982 [This thoughtful, short book argues for the genre’s validity in a post-capitalist setting, and analyzes some specific texts]

Mexico

Torres, Vicente Francisco, El cuento policial mexicano, Mexico City: Diógenes, 1982 [This anthology of Mexican detective stories by authors such as Antonio Helú, María Elvira Bermúdez, and Pepe Martínez de la Vega includes a useful, historical introduction]

Augusto D’Halmar 1882(?)–1950

Chilean prose writer

Augusto D’Halmar began his literary career in Chile in the early 1900s and quickly gained prominence as one of the country’s foremost writers. His works reflect the influence of several different literary movements in Latin America, including Naturalism, Spanish American Modernism, and Vanguardism. He was also an avid reader and follower of such authors as Tolstoy, Oscar Wilde, Alphonse Daudet, and Pierre Loti, among others, whose style is evident throughout his works. He was such an avid admirer of Tolstoy that he even established a short-lived Tolstoyan agricultural colony. He was the recipient of the first National Literature Prize awarded in Chile (1942.). Both his works and his adventurous life as a traveler and foreign diplomat helped to create a sort of mystique about him throughout Chile, aided by a twenty-six year absence from the country.
D’Halmar’s first work was the Naturalist novel Juana Lucero, o los vicios de Chile, 1902. [Juana Lucero, or the Vices of Chile]. Both the topic and the style of the novel were greatly influenced by Émile Zola’s novel Nana (1880). Juana Lucero is the story of a young girl who falls prey to prostitution and societal prejudice and eventually dies a tragic death. It is not the author’s most memorable text. However, it is important for having introduced Naturalism to Chilean letters, and it provoked considerable debate throughout Chilean society. The novel also predated more lasting Latin American Naturalist novels of the time that took up the prostitute-asheroine theme such as Santa (1903) by the Mexican Federico Gamboa, and Nacha Regules (1919) by the Argentine writer Manuel Gálvez.

D’Halmar is best known as a novelist, but he is also the author of numerous short stories that can best be characterized as marking the period of transition between Naturalism and Modernism in Chile. After Juana Lucero, the author abandoned his adhesion to the stricter tenets of Naturalism and introduced many elements of the fantastic into his stories. Of all the author’s short stories, two in particular express his mastery of this genre. Both “En provincia” [In the Provinces] and “A rodar tierras” [Rolling Across the Land], demonstrate the author’s superb narrative ability. Imbued with suspense, fantasy, and a complex psychological portrayal of the protagonists, “En provincia” is considered by Mario Ossea as one of the best short stories in Chilean literature. It is a tale about adultery in a small town in southern Chile told in the first person by the narrator, a lonely bachelor used by his boss’s wife to give her the child that her husband could not. “A rodar tierras” is an allegorical tale that is much more fantastic in nature, and it is said to have been influenced by Hans Christian Andersen. The story narrates the history of a piece of thistledown that errantly blows across the land. The narrative voice is seemingly directed toward a juvenile audience. The author employs the simple tones and narrative style characteristic of children’s literature. None the less, the story is a telling allegory of man’s wandering upon the earth, and of life’s lack of direction or meaning. The story is actually quite reflective of D’Halmar’s own life story and was in fact considered by the author to be his only and best autobiography, as he himself makes clear in “Cuento como cuento un cuento” [Telling How I Tell a Tale].

With La lámpara en el molino, 1914 [The Lamp in the Mill], D’Halmar further abandoned the limitations of realism which confined his earlier works. La lámpara makes use of a far more poetic language, of surreal imagery, and the imaginative presentation of people, places, and events that go beyond the merely descriptive confines of realist prose. Evident in the text is an effort to seek out beauty, lyricism, and the metaphysical. Imaginismo as it was called, was in part the heir of Modernism, but D’Halmar is largely held responsible for initiating this literary style into Chilean letters. Subsequent writers who carried on this tradition include Pedro Prado and María Luisa Bombal. La lámpara is based on the events surrounding the controversial courtship and marriage of D’Halmar’s sister.

D’Halmar’s early works are all representative of Chilean reality in that the places, people, and customs all tend to be taken directly from the national environment and from his own personal experiences. However, the works of the second phase of his production differ greatly in that they were all conceived and written during his twenty-six year absence from the country. D’Halmar’s travels and employment as a Chilean diplomat literally took him around the globe. The exotic places, people, and experiences he encountered became the subject matter of his books. His residence in Spain led to his most famous novel, La pasión y muerte del cura Deusto, 1924 [The Passion and Death of Father Deusto], and his collection of essays, La Mancha de Don Quijote, 1934 [Don Quixote’s La Mancha], based on that famous region of Spain, home to one of literature’s most memorable characters. In Mi otro yo, 1924 [My Other Self], D’Halmar uses India as the backdrop for the novel, giving very lengthy and detailed descriptions of the country and customs of the people. The novel itself is not a very tidy narration, but it does give insight into the author’s passion for exotic travel and adventure.

D’Halmar enjoyed great success as an author during his lifetime. He came to be one of the most influential of 20th-century Chilean writers; his texts were widely read, reprinted, and used as models for younger writers. Although he played such an important role in the history of Chilean letters, both the author and his works for the most part have remained forgotten for the past thirty years. Recently, however, there has been a renewal of interest in his writing because of the open treatment of homoerotic themes found throughout the majority of his texts. In the past this topic, as well as the author’s own homosexuality, conveniently had been glossed over, mentioned in highly euphemistic terms, or neatly explained away by most critics, in spite of an often overt textual presence. Indeed, as David Foster has demonstrated, at least ten of D’Halmar’s works deal either directly or indirectly with homosexuality and largely involve older male/younger male relationships that inevitably end in tragedy. The work that most openly addresses this issue, La pasión y muerte del cura Deusto, contains all the characteristics of a tragic love story. The novel was written during the author’s residence in Spain, and it takes place in Seville. The basic plot revolves around the personal conflict between religiosity and homosexual desire as experienced by a Basque priest who finds himself overwhelming attracted to an Andalusian boy. His desire eventually leads him to commit suicide rather than succumb to his physical yearnings and a love that must not be. La pasión y muerte is also the author’s best novel in terms of narrative style, structure, and the psychological development of the characters. For Ramón Acevedo it is the most complex and original Modernist novel of Hispanic America, although it was published quite some time after the zenith of Modernism. Other texts by D’Halmar dealing with homosexuality include La sombra de humo en el espejo, 1924 [The Shadow of Smoke in the Mirror] and Nirvana (1918), both autobiographical in nature in which the author recounts his travels in the Orient, the Far East, and Europe and his experiences with servant boys and guides. A third text, Los alucinados, 1935 [The Hallucinated], is a collection of four short stories all dealing with male homosexual relationships.

DARRELL B. LOCKHART

Biography

Born Augusto Geommine Thomson in Santiago de Chile on 23 April 1882(?). Illegitimate son of a French adventurer and merchant captain, Auguste Geommine, and of Manuela Thomson Cross, only child of a distinguished lady of Scottish ancestry, Juana Cross. D’Halmar much affected by his illegitimacy granted the high social standing of his mother’s family. Childhood spent in Valparaiso on the coast in the home of his maternal grandmother. Brought up in female household; pampered; lacked a male role model. Had two sisters after his mother married, but latter died young. Returned to Santiago where he attended school. This was an unhappy experience, and he had to endure the nickname “Margarita.” Able to live by his pen as a journalist because his grandmother supplemented his income. In 1903 he decided to establish a Tolstoyan colony with two friends. This ended in 1905 since they were not able to adapt to a simple, agricultural life. Stayed in the country at San Bernardo where he worked in a very modest capacity at the railway station. Joined there by his grandmother and sisters. Idyllic period of his life. In 1907 became consul general in Calcutta after travelling widely in Europe. Left India after a few months because of ill health. Consul in Etén on the north coast of Peru. Returned to Chile in 1915 and then became war correspondent for Buenos Aires newspaper, La Nación. Travelled to France in 1917. Wounded at front and almost died from septicemia. Recovered and settled in Madrid in 1918 where he spent the next 16 years. Felt very much at home in Spain but returned to Chile in 1934 where he was greeted with enthusiasm. First writer to be awarded Chilean National Prize for Literature after its creation in 1942. Died of cancer of the throat on 27 January 1950.

Selected Works

Juana Lucero, o los vicios de Chile, Desterrados del ideal y de la suerte no despertéis al que sueña, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta Turín, 1902.
La lámpara en el molino, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta New York, 1914
Gatita, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta Universitaria, 1917
Nirvana, Barcelona: Casa Editorial Maucci, 1918 [travel book]
Mi otro yo, Madrid: Ediciones de la Novela Semanal, 192,4
La sombra del humo en el espejo, Madrid: Editora Internacional, 1924 [Volume about his travels in Europe, Egypt and the Far East]
La pasión y muerte del cura Deusto, Madrid: Editora Internacional, 192.4
La Mancha de Don Quijote, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1934
Capitanes sin barco, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1934
Los alucinados, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1935

Compilations and Anthologies
Cristián y yo, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1946

Further Reading

Acevedo, Ramón L., Augusto D’Halmar: novelista (estudio de “Pasión y muerte del cura Deusto”), San Juan, Puerto Rico: Editorial Universitaria, 1976 [An excellent analysis of D’Halmar’s most famous text, which also provides insights into his other works. Places the author’s work within the framework of Spanish American Modernism]
Díaz Arrieta, Hernán, “Augusto D’Halmar,” in his Los cuatro grandes de la literatura chilena durante el siglo XX, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1962
Espinoza, Enrique, “El hermano errante,” prologue to Antología de Augusto D’Halmar, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1963
Orlandi, Julio and Alejandro Ramirez, Augusto D’Halmar: obraestilo-técnica, Santiago de Chile: Editorial del Pacifico, 1942, Dias, Antônio Gonçalves

See Gonçalves Dias

Eliseo Diego 1920–1994

Cuban poet, prose writer and literary translator

One of modern Cuba’s most renowned authors, Eliseo Diego began his literary career as a member of the Orígenes group of poets. Writers like Ángel Gaztelu, Cintio Vitier, Fina García Marruz, Gaston Baquero, Virgilio Piñera, Justo Rodríguez Santos, Octavio Smith and others, gathered around the journal (Orígenes) founded by poetic oracle José Lezama Lima to practice what Roberto Fernández Retamar (1954) has designated trascendentalismo, that is, the aesthetic of distancing oneself from surrounding reality to pursue metaphysical explorations through a cosmopolitan and frequently complex baroque style. Diego, however, represents within the group a visionary clarity and an attachment to relatively simple forms that transform him into something of an anomaly. In her excellent preface to the Uruguayan edition of Divertimentos y versiones, 1967 [Divertimentos and Versions], Ida Vitale clarifies this contradiction when she emphasizes that Diego “does not appear to have been overtaken by the Surrealist torrent that captivated and defined Labrador Ruiz or Lezama Lima.” Instead, Diego exudes a false naïveté based on a literary attitude permanently attached to a sense of wonderment when confronting the most trivial matters. A prolific writer, he reflects as well a remarkable thematic continuity throughout his ample literary production. Love, death, tedium, nostalgia and, above all, time reappear insatiably to promote what Vitale has called the “trama unitaria” [unitarian structure] of his works. As a result, Diego at times seems reiterative, monotonous and, paradoxically, somewhat dense despite his characteristic tonal and stylistic simplicity, a writer whose poetry and prose must be absorbed in small dosages.

Despite Vitale’s assertions, Diego is firmly entrenched within the artistic taste of the Orígenes generation. Cintio Vitier (1970) has argued correctly that Lezama Lima’s creative family, over which he presided for decades as paternalistic coryphaeus, was far more diverse than one may presume. If writers like Gaztelu, Virgilio Piñera and Baquero pursue Lezama’s teleological baroque over which metaphor presides as an everchanging and always surprising deity and cultural and speculative themes retain predominance, Octavio Smith, Lorenzo García Vega and, of course, Eliseo Diego evidence a second, more mundane attitude. According to Vitier, they have in common “a more intimate approach to poetry, a dependence upon quotidian reality and a search for an intuitive center located in memory.” In Diego’s case, an inherent lyrical nostalgia for a familial and national past as well as for objects, feelings, experiences, relies precisely on what one of his poetic voices has named “el prodigio feliz de la memoria” (the happy portent of memory). In his Proustian looking back, the writer frequently creates an almost child-like dreamy ambiance where reality and unreality intermingle in bewildering fashion. Hence, as Antonio Fernández Ferrer (1993) aptly concludes, not only Diego’s prose but also his poetry fit regularly within the mold of fantastic literature.

Diego’s second and third books, Divertimentos (1946) and En la Calzada de Jesús del Monte, 1949 [In Jesus del Monte Boulevard], still convey the essence of his creative persona. The first work is a collection of brief narrative pieces akin in spirit to the fable and the fairy tale. From his beginning as a writer, Diego evinced an interest in children’s stories which finally resulted in translations of the tales of Hans Christian Andersen (1965) and the Grimm brothers (1966). In Divertimentos, their influence as well as that of Jonathan Swift, Lewis Carroll and other authors associated at least tangentially with such fiction is revealed particularly in the ingenuous lyrical tone of anecdotes laden with parabolic significance. Nevertheless, as José Lezama Lima has pointed out (1970), these divertissements possess a grotesque quality that transforms them into imagistic conceptions closer to the Goya of joyous tapestries than to the evangelically evanescent Murillo. They embrace what Lezama terms a “bewitching clarity” that forces the reader to amble between translucent story and the potentialities of metaphor. The sisters who bring about someone’s demise by cutting a thread on a perpetually unfinished decorative cloth in “De las hermanas” (About the Sisters); the numerous obstacles that Don Rigoberto Rodríguez employs unsuccessfully to impede death’s deliberate approximation in “De la pelea” (About the Struggle); the Lazarillo-like character of “De los pasteles” (About the Pastries), whose pact with the Devil to guarantee him access to pastries meant for the Bishop fails because of Satan’s own gluttony, are texts representative of Diego’s prodigious imagination. It allows him to transcend poetic reality by interspersing successfully heterogeneous psychological, marvelous and fantastic elements. This collection exemplifies as well the impossibility to categorize Diego’s writings in a conventionally generic manner. His poetry oftentimes resembles prose, his prose resembles poetry. Antonio Fernández Ferrer (1993) maintains that, for Diego, poetry and prose are inseparable. They correspond to a self-same creative attitude and to a homologous world view that require identical responses from readers. For instance, a book like Versiones (1970), traditionally defined as prose-poetry in critical studies and literary dictionaries, is included as fiction in Ida Vitale’s edition of Divertimentos y versiones.

En la Calzada de Jesús del Monte is a fundamental book in the annals of contemporary Cuban poetry. Cintio Vitier (1949) asserts that through a discursive lyrical approach fluctuating between psalm and testimony, Diego undertakes the task of toning down (“sosegar”) poetry, while providing a physical background (“espaciar”) for it. The poet pretends to place readers within the context of individual remembrance and immediate concreteness to make them reflect on their temporality, on their mortality. “La calzada más bien enorme de Jesús del Monte” (The more or less enormous boulevard of Jesús del Monte) symbolizes a spatial stability that will inevitably supersede a poetic voice which, albeit conscious of its own impermanence, finds solace in the endurance of familiar places, objects, reconstructed lives and circumstances through iterative and, in a sense, communicative memory. By sharing a past, by inscribing it literarily, one secures continuity through description. At the same time, the conceived artifact becomes, as Diego himself attests (1992), “un nuevo objeto dentro de la realidad” (a new object within reality), enriching it by becoming a symbol to be reinterpreted and apprehended in changing circumstances.

In 1968, Eliseo Diego published a curious compendium of prose and poetry: Muestrario del mundo o Libro de las maravillas de Boloña [A Sampling of the World or Book of the Marvels of Boloña]. Mixing prose, free verse and conventional poetic stanzas (couplets, sonnets, traditional décimas or ten-line strophes, etc.), Diego elaborates a series of intuitive images based on etchings produced by the 19th-century Cuban printer José Severino Boloña. The poet’s fascination with time, death, memory, cyclical nature, chance, and so forth makes itself manifest through a myriad lyrical descriptions far more provocative than the pre-text whence they emanate. At times, Diego’s style gains archaic qualities to convey the colonial nature of the reconstructed etchings. In the fragment entitled “Intercálase la historia del anticuario [Here You Find Intercalated the Story of the Antiquarian] for example, his writing becomes more antique than the anecdote itself, resembling the rhetorical tone of apalogues conceived by medieval Spanish author Don Juan Manuel or the ingenuousness of Indo-Arabic tales. In the story, an antiquarian is so given to his art of refurbishing and in some cases recreating objects that he rejects Aladdin’s lamp upon finding it. There is nothing he requires but his craft. The tale’s significance emerges from its metaphorical virtue, from its intent to reproduce Diego’s own artistic process vis-à-vis his pre-text. In other texts within the collection, the writer intends to formulate prolonged existential metaphors. Such is the case of the poem “Riesgos del equilibrista” [Risks of the High Wire Artist] in which the poetic voice expands on Boloña’s image to illustrate the precariousness of human life in the uncomfortable movement between the darkness from which one emerges and the one into which one disappears.

Eliseo Diego’s numerous other books give evidence of a creative evolution dependent upon similar motifs and a consistent poetic view based at least partly on his religiosity. A writer who works in a socialist society, he has nevertheless defined his public role as follows: “I am a very religious man, I am Catholic, and for me one of the most fascinating concepts in the world is the problem of good and evil. The artist’s responsibility is to make use of his creative gift in the best possible manner, always trying to contribute to future well-being, to children’s welfare, to humor, to what is called goodness and beauty. That is the way in which the artist will fulfill his social responsibility.” Such a quasi theological commitment to an art based on the elevation of the trivial and insignificant to sublime spheres, defines Diego as an inimitable writer, one who has developed a highly personal style and a patently recognizable creative intuition.

Jorge Febles

See also entry on Orígenes under Journals
Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, 2 July 1920. His mother was Cuban by birth, but raised in New York and so her first language was English. Attended primary and secondary schools in Havana. Studied law at University of Havana (1941), but gave it up in 1943. Married Bella García Marruz, sister of the poet Fina García Marruz. Member of the editorial board of the Spanish literary journal, Clavileño and founder member of the Cuban journal Orígenes from 1944 to 1947. Taught English at night school. Inspector of English Instruction at Ministry of Education, until 1954. Completed his studies in Education in 1959. In 1959 and 1960 he taught British and US literature in courses at Casa de las Américas. Worked in Department of Children’s Literature and Storytelling at the National Library in Havana, 1962–70. Placed in charge of public relations at the UNEAC (Union of Artists and Writers) in 1963. Appointed editor of one of UNEAC’s magazines, Union, 1970; also served as member of their publications committee. Frequently judge of literary contests in Cuba. Travelled to Eastern Europe and to USSR. Translated literary texts from English and Russian (using a transliteration in the case of the latter). In 1979 awarded Maxim Gorky International Prize for his translations of poetry from the Russian. Awarded National Prize for Literature in 1986, and Juan Rulfo Prize in 1993. Died in 1994.

Selected Works

Poetry and Short Fiction
No attempt has been made to separate the genres since the author often mixed prose and poetry in one volume.

En las oscuras manos del olvido, Havana: Clavijo, 1942.
Divertimentos, Havana: Orígenes, 1946
En la Calzada de Jesús del Monte, Havana: Orígenes, 1949
Por los extraños pueblos, Havana: Úcar García, 1958
El oscuro esplendor, Havana: Belic, 1966
Divertimentos y versiones, Montevideo: ARCA, 1967
Versiones, Havana: Union, 1970
Nombrar las cosas, Havana: Union, 1970
Noticias de la Quimera, Havana: Union, 1975
Los días de tu vida, Havana: Union, 1977
La casa del pan, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1978
Un almacén como otro cualquiera, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1978
A través de mi espejo, Havana: Union, 1981
Soñar despierto, Havana: Gente Nueva, 1988
Libro de quién sabe, de quién sabe, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1989
Cuatro de oros, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1991

Translations

Poems, translated by Kathleen Weaver and Eliseo Diego, New York: Center for Cuban Studies, 1982
Conversación con los difuntos, Mexico City: Ediciones del Equilibrista, 1991 [Translations by Eliseo Diego of the poetry of other writers]
Compilations and Anthologies

Inventario de asombros, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1983
Poesía, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1983
Prosas escogidas, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1983
Veintiséis poemas recientes, Mexico City: Ediciones del Equilibrista, 1986
Eliseo Diego [Antología poética], Mexico City: UNAM, 1987

La sed de lo perdido, edited by Antonio Fernández Ferrer, Madrid: Siruela, 1993 [An excellent collection of Diego’s prose and poetry which permits readers to familiarize themselves with texts illustrative of the writer’s aesthetic evolution]

Further Reading

Interviews

Special Issues of Journals

La Gaceta de Cuba, Havana (July 1990)
Casa de las Américas, vol. 34/194 (January-March 1994)

Dominican Republic

19th- and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

To a great extent, the literature of the Dominican Republic has been engaged in the struggle against the political oppression that has held Hispaniola in its grip since 1492, when this island—now Haiti and the Dominican Republic—became part of the then nascent Spanish empire. Since then, in the Dominican Republic, the literary text has served as an instrument of protest against abuses by governments concerned most often with exploiting the people and the land. Dominican literature has tried to come to terms with the historical realities of a nation that has suffered from a particularly disturbing history. Moreover, it expresses a people’s search for a national identity. Hispaniola was first settled by Spaniards, but also passed under the colonial rule of England and France. As the native inhabitants were obliterated, Africans were brought over by force to work the plantations. Dominicans came to share their Caribbean island with Haiti, a country that invaded and annexed the Dominican Republic in the 19th century. The countless changes in government led a 19th-century Dominican priest to write: “Spanish I was born yesterday/in the afternoon I became French/Ethiopian I was in the night/today English I am, they say./My Lord, what in the end will I be?” In the 20th century, Hispaniola has still been preyed upon by foreign forces; the United States has made its presence felt on the island through business enterprises and military interventions. Finally, as one considers a history of Dominican literature one cannot forget that all aspects of Dominican life were profoundly affected by the brutal dictatorship of Rafael Leonidas Trujillo which lasted from 1930 to 1961.

It is hard to determine at what precise moment a body of Dominican literature with an identity of its own began to emerge. However, here as elsewhere, poetry is the first genre to establish itself. Leonor de Ovando (died c.1610) is one of the first if not the very first poet of America. It is known that she was born on the island, became a Dominican nun, and prioress of the Regina Monastery. Of her literary work five sonnets and a composition written in blank verse are extant. Other early Dominican female poets are Manuela Aybar “La Deana” (1790–1850) and Josefa Antonia Perdomo (1834–96). Salomé Ureña Henríquez (1850–97) was the first woman in the Dominican Republic to write nationalistic poetry with topics such as Spain’s rule of her country and the injustices of the various despotic and corrupt governments that dominated the island in the 19th century. Ureña’s work, both literary and social, aimed at the foundation of a Dominican nationality. Through her poetry she tried to inspire Dominicans to work towards a better country. Moreover, influenced by Puerto Rico’s Eugenio María de Hostos (1839–1903) she herself contributed to the progress of her country by establishing the first Teachers’ Training College for Women. She has been grouped with other nationalistic poets known as “Dioses Mayores” [The Greatest Gods] that include Gaston Deligne (1861–1914) and José Joaquín Pérez (1845–1900). Deligne harshly criticized Spanish American modernismo in his “Ars Nova Scribendi,” 1897 [Art of New Writing]. Pérez’s poetry, as his Fantasias indígenas, celebrates the native inhabitants of the island.

Tomás Hernández Franco (1904–52), Héctor Incháustegui Cabral (1912–79), Manuel del Cabral (1912), and Pedro Mir (1913) have been classified as the Poetas Independientes del 40 (Independent Poets of the 1940s). In Yelidá, Hernández Franco exposes his ideas about the superiority of the Caribbean mulatto while telling the story of a young Norwegian sailor who marries a black prostitute: “la esposa de Erick madam Suquí/rezaba a Legbá y a Ogún por su hombre blanco/ rezaba en la catedral por su hombre rubio” (the wife of Erick madame Suquí/prayed for her white man to Legbá and Ogún /she prayed for her blond man in the cathedral). The tone of Héctor Incháustegui Cabral’s poetry is pessimistic. Through it he examines his country and the injustices that abound there. He expresses his dissatisfaction in poems like “Canto triste a la patria bien amada” [Sad Song to the Beloved Mother Country] in which he states, “Patria, palabra hueca y torpe/ para mí, mientras los hombres/miren con desprecio los pies sucios y arrugados./y maldigan las proles largas./y en cada cruce de caminos claven una bandera/ para lucir sus colores nada más...” (Motherland, empty and crude word/for me, while men/look at dirty and wrinkled feet with contempt,/ and curse the abundant progeny,/and at every crossroads bury a flag/only to show off its colors). Unlike other Dominican poets, his protest was not directed at the figure of Trujillo but at the bourgeoisie which he accused of hypocrisy, superficiality, and indifference in “Invitación a los de arriba [Invitation to Those at the Top]. In Diario de la guerra [Diary of War] he offers the reader a vision of death and destruction as he describes the effects of the 1963 war on Dominican society. Manuel del Cabral’s poems deal with social issues and with the role that Africans played in the history of the Americas. He praises Africans and attempts to return to their descendants a sense of self-esteem and love for their heritage. He alludes to the injustices blacks have suffered in the poem “Ellos” [They]: “Ellos comen cuando pueden/pero por ellos comemos cuando queremos./Ellos son zapateros pero están descalzos./Ellos nos visten pero están desnudos” (They eat when they can/but because of them we eat when we want./They are shoemakers but are barefoot./They dress us but are naked). His Compadre Mon [Friend Mon] is an epic poem in praise of the common Dominican man personified in the figure of Don Mon and may be compared to José Hernández’s Martín Fierro. Pedro Mir has been forced by the oppressive political situation of his country, namely the dictatorship of Trujillo, to use his poetry as an instrument of resistance against despotism and social injustices. Prominent in his poetry is the image of the victimized Dominican peasant. In Hay un país en el mundo [There is a Country in the World] he creates a sociohistory of his country while presenting a problem common to Latin American capitalist countries, that is, the polarity that exists between the rich and the poor. In this poem he calls the Dominican Republic, “País inverosímil” [Unimaginable Country] and insists that “los campesinos no tienen tierra” (the peasants own no land). History is an important element in many of Mir’s works. El gran incendio, 1969 [The Great Fire], Las raíces dominicanas de la doctrina de Monroe, 1974 [The Dominican Roots of the Monroe Doctrine], La noción de periodo en la historia dominicana, 1981–83 [The Concept of Period in Dominican History] , and Historia del hambre, 1987 [History of Hunger] are all dedicated to Dominican history, and even his novel, Cuando amaban las tierras comuneras, 1978 [When Communal Lands Were Loved] explores the significance of his country’s troubled history. In “Contracanto a Walt Whitman” (Countersong to Walt Whitman) Mir criticizes Whitman’s vision of the United States developed in Leaves of Grass. Mir’s concern for Dominican women is shown in “Poema del llanto trigueño” [Poem of the Mulatto Weeping] and “Amén de mariposas” [Butterflies’ Amen]. In the first of these, the exploitation of working Dominican women is presented through the colors black and white. The second is an elegy for the death of the Mirabal sisters who were assassinated on Trujillo’s orders on 25 November 1960. In his introduction to Countersong to Walt Whitman and Other Poems, Silvio Torres-Saillant has written, “In the Dominican Republic no one lays a more legitimate claim to intimacy with the yearnings of the Dominican people as well as with the texture of their collective voice than Pedro Mir.” Undoubtedly, Mir remains popular and highly esteemed among Dominicans living on and off the island.
Aída Cartagena Portalatín (1918–94) belonged to La Poesía Sorprendida [The Surprised Poetry], a movement that began in 1943 when a journal of the same name was established. The members of this movement included among others Franklin Mieses Burgos (1907–76), Freddy Gaton Arce (1920–76), and Manuel Rueda (1921). Gaton Arce was one of the founders and co-directors of the magazine and editions published by La Poesía Sorprendida. His “Vía” represents a first attempt at automatic writing and Surrealism in the Dominican Republic and has been compared in its importance to Aimé Césaire’s Cahier d’un retour au pays natal (Return to My Native Land). Manuel Rueda established in 1953 the collection “La Isla Necesaria” [The Necessary Island] in which his sonnets “Las Noches” [The Nights] were published. In his poems, as in “Canto de regreso a la tierra prometida” [Song of Return to the Promised Land] a concern over the division of Hispaniola is expressed: “Medias montañas/medios ríos, /y hasta la muerte/compartida” (Half mountains/half rivers, /and even death/shared). Cartagena Portalatín began to publish in the 1940s when the dictator Trujillo was in power and any overt criticism of him or his system of government could bring immediate death. This situation made her write poetry whose message of protest is veiled. For example, in “Como llorar la muerte de una rosa” [How to Cry the Death of a Rose] from her collection Del sueño al mundo, 1945 [From Slumber into the World] she questions why people do not show pain at the death of others, but she hides her criticism within a poem that pretends to be about the fleeting beauty of a rose. In her work, both prose and poetry, she refers to her struggle as a woman living and writing in a male dominated society.

La Poesía Sorprendida group was followed by the Generations of 1948 and 1960. Straddling these two generations is Marcio Veloz Maggiolo (1936) whose poetry is marked by a striving to understand man’s relationship with God and nature. Jeannette Miller (1944) started her literary work as part of the Generation of 1960, and her work is still mostly scattered in newspapers and magazines except for three volumes of poetry, El viaje, 1967 [The Voyage], Formulas para combatir el miedo, 1977 [Formulas to Fight Against Fear] and Fichas de identidad/Estadía, 1987 [Identity Records/Sojourn]. The death of Trujillo and the war in 1965 mark a moment of change in Dominican literature. After 1965 various poetry groups emerged: El Puño, La Isla, La Máscara, La Antorcha, etc., (respectively: The Fist, The Island, The Mask and The Torch). The poetry produced by these groups became known as Joven Poesía or Poesía de Postguerra (Young Poetry or Postwar Poetry). Some of the poets that participated in this movement were Norberto James Rawlings (b. 1965), Enriquillo Sánchez (b. 1947), Mateo Morrison (b. 1947), Cayo Claudio Espinal (b. 1955), and Soledad Álvarez (b. 1950).

Since the 1980s there has been what Bruno Rosario Candelier has called in his Ensayos literarios, 1986 [Literary Essays] “un boom femenino.” Among the most recent Dominican women poets are Carmen Sánchez, Sherezada (Chiqui) Vicioso, Aurora Arias, Ylonka Nacidit-Perdomo, Ángela Hernández and Sabrina Roman. These poets have incorporated into their work an element that has often been denied in Dominican society, the African heritage of the island. As Daisy Cocco De Filippis has put it in “Indias y trigueñas No Longer: Contemporary Dominican Women Poets Speak”: “The rejection of the African element in Dominican poetry is expressed in the representation of women in a constant antinomy between a virginal and submissive white woman and a sensual and sinful negress or mulatto woman.” De Filippis also reminds us that the Black woman has been usually Haitian in Dominican poetry such as in Manuel del Cabral’s poetry and Tomás Hernández Franco’s Yelidá. Perhaps taking their directive from Cartagena Portalatín, who was a Black poet and was not afraid to celebrate her African descent in her writings, now female poets have begun to change the image of women in Dominican poetry.

Although it has been stated that the quality and volume of poetry far outweighs those of prose, the novel, short story, drama, and essay have been successfully cultivated in the Dominican Republic. As with poetry, these genres have been practiced both by men and women. The novel appears on the island in the 19th century with Amelia Francisca de Marchena (1850–(?)) who published Madre culpable (1893) and Francisca Martinoff (1901). Furthermore, since the 19th century short stories have been written by Dominicans such as Máximo Gómez (1833–1905), Virginia Elena Ortea (1866–1903), Pedro Henríquez Ureña (1884–1946), and José Alcántara Almánzar (b. 1946). Where theater is concerned, the group Los Trinitarios, used the stage to promote independence during the 19th century. Members of the Poesía Sorprendida and Generación del 48, Manuel Rueda, Héctor Incháustegui Cabral, and Máximo A. Blonda (b. 1931), also have produced socially engaged plays in the 20th century. For example, social issues like the significance of the frontier with Haiti and the political situation of the country after Trujillo’s death are the main topics of Blonda’s Pirámide 179, 1969 [Pyramid 179] and Franklin Domínguez’s Se Busca un hombre honesto, 1964 [Looking for an Honest Man]. Camila Henríquez Ureña (1894–1973) has been considered a Cuban writer even though she was born and died in the Dominican Republic. The reasons for this are likely to be that she emigrated with her family, Francisco Henríquez Carvajal and Salomé Ureña, to Cuba as a young girl and that her adoptive country provided her with a far more developed cultural milieu than her birthplace. She travelled extensively in her life and held teaching positions at various universities in the United States and Cuba. Throughout her career she wrote essays on a variety of literary figures such as Goethe, Shakespeare, Lope de Vega, and Gabriela Mistral. Her works were collected and published in Cuba in 1982, under the title Estudios y Conferencias.

Dominican critics, such as Pedro Paix (b. 1952) in La narrativa yugulada, 1981 [Strangled Narrative], have stated that their country has not evolved culturally to the point that it can serve as fertile ground for the development of the novel. Yet, in spite of these assertions, the novel has taken root in the Dominican Republic and there are examples, both from the past and the present century, that have been worthy of international attention.

The 19th century in the Dominican Republic, as in the rest of Latin America, was a time of nation building. The new nations had to legitimize themselves and the concerns of these young nations were translated by their writers into novels that explored national identities. As part of this search, writers like Manuel de Jesús Galván (1834–1910) looked at the customs, ethnic backgrounds and history of their people and wrote novels such as Enriquillo, leyenda histórica dominicana, 1882. (The Cross and the Sword). This text has a political and cultural significance in the history of the Dominican Republic since it established a cultural identity for Dominicans as descendents of the intermarriage of noble Indians and Spaniards while excluding Africans from their culture. Other novels that share similar concerns are Federico García Godoy’s Rufinito (1908), Alma dominicana, 1911 [Dominican Soul], and Guanuma (1908–14), and Tulio Cestero’s La sangre, 1914 [Blood].
In the 20th century there have been two major female voices in Dominican prose, Aída Cartagena Portalatín and Hilma Contreras. Cartagena Portalatín’s best-known prose work is an experimental novel, Escalera para Electra, 1969 [A Staircase for Electra]. This novel received an honorable mention in Spain’s Seix Barral Prize competition for best novel of the year. Moreover, it was the first prose text after the fall of Trujillo to search for a new definition of national identity. Hilma Contreras’s talent was recognized by Juan Bosch in 1937 when she sent him the short story “La desjababa.” He wrote back praising her, “al país le nace una escritora cabal, no una principiante, ni siquiera una aficionada feliz. Un fruto sazonado” (a complete writer has been born to this country, not a beginner, not even a happy amateur. A ripe fruit). In 1953 she published her first volume of short stories, Cuatro cuentos [Four Stories] and, in 1986, a novel, La tierra está bramando [The Earth is Roaring]. In 1993 she was honored by the Dominican National Library which organized a conference to celebrate her eightieth birthday and published a collection of her short stories, Facetas de la vida [Facets of Life]. Moreover, Dominican women are now willing to try their hand at genres like science fiction usually considered off limits for Hispanic women. One such writer is Altagracia Moreta Feliz who in 1992, published El extraño fenómeno de los 500 años [The Strange Phenomenon of the 500 Years], a didactic science fiction novel which in adapted form has become required reading in Dominican schools.

Juan Bosch (b. 1909) was a political exile from 1937 to 1961; in 1963, after Trujillo’s death and promising to establish a democracy, he was elected president of the Dominican Republic. Because he opposed Trujillo, Bosch was ignored by Dominican critics while the dictator lived, and afterwards, critics have often been overwhelmed by Bosch’s political life, so that his works remain mostly unstudied. He has written prose since the 1930s and one of his early works, La mañosa, 1936 [The Wily One] is a political novel in which a mule becomes the main character in a text that portrays the confusion of a country involved in a civil war. The text also speaks to economic concerns since it portrays the exploitation of a country for the financial benefit of the powerful few. He has published many essays of political and historical significance for the Dominican Republic, among these are De Cristóbal Colón a Fidel Castro (El Caribe, frontera imperial) [From Christopher Columbus to Fidel Castro (The Caribbean, Imperial Frontier)] and El estado: sus orígenes y desarrollo [The State: its Origins and Development]. In the second, Bosch traces the origins and developments of the state since its beginnings in Mesopotamia to the formation of the Nazi state in 1934. The importance of Bosch’s short stories cannot be denied and after Trujillo’s death, Aída Cartagena Portalatín in her 1969 anthology, Narradores dominicanos [Dominican Narrators], described Bosch as “the best example of the Dominican short story writer.” His two collections, Cuentos escritos en el exilio, 1976 [Stories Written in Exile] and Cuentos, 1983 [Stories], have influenced many other Dominican writers. His texts have motivated younger Dominicans to emulate him or to rebel against his traditionalism expressed in stories whose main topic is the peasant and his problems. Among the writers Bosch has influenced is José Alcántara Almánzar who has become one of the best modern Dominican short story writers.

Pedro Mir’s prose includes works like La noción de período en la historia dominicana, 1981 [The Concept of Period in Dominican History], an essay which dates the beginning of Dominican literature to the 17th century and a novel, Cuando amaban las tierras comuneras, 1978 [When Communal Lands Were Loved]. In his novel, Mir examines the relationship of the Dominican Republic and the United States and the historical significance of the “tierras comuneras” [common lands]. Among the important characteristics of the novel is the rejection of grammar. Sentences may go on for several pages and punctuation symbols are non-existent. The narrator not only rejects grammar, he also states that his narration rejects the standard rules of literature and places it within the boundaries of common public documents like birth and death certificates. The novel portrays the heroic struggles of the common Dominican people against other nations and shows how as similar historical situations recur, the people answer each new challenge with actions that seem repetitions of those carried out before but which in fact achieve progress. Throughout the text references are made to the cyclical nature of history.

Marcio Veloz Maggiolo’s De abril en adelante, 1975 [From April On] also holds a significant place in Dominican letters as it was a finalist for the Seix Barral Prize. Maggiolo’s text seeks to deal with the historical events of April 1965. His novel, Los ángeles de hueso, 1967 [Angels of Flesh and Blood], attempts to transform Dominican narrative and his collection of short stories, “La fértil agonía del amor,” won the Dominican Republic’s National Award for Short Stories in 1980. Yet another example of an internationally acclaimed Dominican novel is Pedro Vergés’s Sólo cenizas hallarás (bolero), 1980 [You Will Only Find Ashes (Bolero)]. This novel explores the effects of Trujillo’s repressive regime and his legacy on the personal lives of Dominican’s struggling to better themselves within a repressive society.

After Trujillo’s death and a change in the United States’ immigration laws of 1965, a greater number of Dominicans went to the United States. Some have permanently settled there while others continue to travel back and forth between the island and the mainland. From this population of Dominicans living in the United States a new body of literature, sometimes written in English, sometimes in Spanish, or a combination of both, is emerging. For example, Julia Álvarez has published two volumes of poetry Homecoming (1984) and The Housekeeping Book and two novels, How the García Girls Lost their Accents (1991) and In the Time of the Butterflies (1994), all originally written in English, that have rapidly come to the attention of critics. The first of the novels tells the story of three sisters and their parents, who, forced out of the Dominican Republic by Trujillo’s regime, must change a life of luxury in their native land for exile in the United States. The second is a fictional account of the life and assassination of the Mirabal sisters. Another work acclaimed by critics is Viriato Sención’s first novel, Los que falsificaron la firma de Dios, 1992, [Those Who Forged God’s Signature]. This Spanish language novel, written in the New York’s South Bronx, has been, according to Silvio Torres-Saillant in Brújula/Compass 16 (1993), “hailed as the most important text in the Dominican literary market today” and “a significant achievement in a place where literary artists have too often and too easily spoken of the apathy of their home public.” Other Dominicans living and writing in the United States are Leandro Morales, Manuel Marshall, and Luis Manuel Ledesma. Moreover, among these immigrants literary groups such as the Círculo de Escritores Dominicanos en Nueva York and Grupo Literario Pensum have begun to publish collections of works by Dominican writers living in the United States.

LINDA M. RODRÍGUEZ
Further Reading

Primary Sources
Cabral, Manuel del (editor), 10 poetas dominicanos, tres con vida y siete desenterrados, Santo Domingo: Publicaciones America, 1980
——Escalera para Electra. Santo Domingo: Editora Taller, 1975
——Tablero: doce cuentos de lo popular a lo culto, Biblioteca Taller 109, Santo Domingo: Editora Taller, 1978
——Culturas africanas: rebeldes con causa, Santo Domingo: Editora Taller, 1986
De Filippis, Daisy Cocco (editor), From Desolation to Compromise. A Bilingual Anthology of the Poetry of Aída Cartagena Portalatín, Colección Montesinos no. 10, Santo Domingo: Editora Taller, 1988
——Cuando amaban las tierras comuneras, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1978
——¡Buen viaje, Pancho Valentín! (Memorias de un marinero), Biblioteca Taller 130, Santo Domingo: Editora Taller, 1981
——La noción de período en la historia dominicana, Santo Domingo: Universidad Autónoma de Santo Domingo, 1981
Moreta Feliz, Altagracia, El extraño fenómeno de los 500 años, Santo Domingo: Grafideas, 1992

Critical Studies
Baeza Flores, Alberto, La poesía dominicana en el siglo XX, generaciones y tendencias, poetas independientes, La poesía sorprendida, suprarrealismo, dominicanidad y universalidad (1943–1947) II, Colección Estudios no. 22, Santiago: Universidad Católica Madre y Maestra, 1977
García Cabrera, Estela, “La conquista y colonización de America a la luz de Manuel de Jesús Galván,” Revista de la Universidad Católica de Puerto Rico 61 (October 1987)

——One Master for Another. Populism as Patriarchal Rhetoric in Dominican Novels. Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1983

——“Not Just Any Narrative: How Romance Can Love Us to Death,” in The Historical Novel in Latin America, edited by Daniel Balderston, Gaithersburg, Maryland: Hispamérica, 1986

Sosa, José Rafael (editor), La mujer en la literatura: homenaje a Aída Cartagena Portalatin, Santo Domingo: Editora Universitaria, 1986

Bibliographies

Special Issues of Journals

Revista Iberoamericana 142. (1988) [Includes articles by Efrain Barredas, Margarite Fernández Olmos, Neil Larson and Doris Sommer]

---

José Donoso 1924–1996

Chilean prose writer

When Chile awarded its Premio Nacional de Literatura (National Prize for Literature) in 1990 to José Donoso, his native country recognized not only the importance of his work within the Chilean context but also the place of preeminence his writing has achieved in Latin American letters in the 20th century. One of the most articulate spokesmen for contemporary Latin American literature and culture, Donoso is among the renowned group of Boom writers who began to receive wide recognition in the 1960s (i.e., Julio Cortázar, Carlos Fuentes, Gabriel García Márquez and Mario Vargas Llosa). He has been known mainly as a fiction writer, and his novels, novellas, and short stories have been read all over the globe. He has, in addition, also published works of poetry and drama, as well as a widely read memoir about the Boom of the Latin American novel, Historia personal del “Boom” (The “Boom” in Spanish American Literature: a Personal History).

Donoso’s contributions to Latin American literature, and to 20th-century fiction as a whole, lie mainly in the area of prose fiction, if not also in the realm of fictional poetics. His writing has examined the social and cultural realities of Latin America, and especially of Chile, while also addressing timeless questions about the nature of literature and the writer’s art. Both in his “realist” and “reflexive” writing Donoso has looked with a critical eye at the social and political forces that shape modern Latin American reality and at the literary and linguistic strategies that sustain contemporary narrative fiction. Consequently, his novels inventively engage modern literary theory and criticism as much as they perceptively analyze Chilean and Latin American history, society and culture. Donoso’s steady literary production since the 1950s and the sustained critical attention paid to his work for more than three decades confirm his place of preeminence within the Latin American tradition and his enduring contribution to modern literature. Indeed, acknowledgment of his work has come in the form of various awards, fellowships, and academic appointments, as well as with the international success of his individual texts.

Donoso’s literary production has been varied, as evidenced by the diverse literary models with which his writing has been engaged and the disparate thematic motifs that have informed his many works of fiction. He has given his readers elaborate political allegory in Casa de campo (A House in the Country), clever erotic farce in La misteriosa desaparición de la marquesita de Loria [The Mysterious Disappearance of the Young Marchioness of Loria], and a personal, político-literary documentary in La desesperanza (Curfew); he has presented introspective meditations on exile in El jardín de al lado (The Garden Next Door), searching queries about sexual identity in El lugar sin límites (Hell Has No Limits), incisive evaluations of modern bourgeois culture in Tres novelitas burguesas (Sacred Families: Three Novellas), and critical reflections on writing and authorship in El obsceno pájaro de la noche (The Obscene Bird of Night), Casa de campo, El jardín de al lado and Taratuta (Taratuta; Still Life with Pipe). All of these works have drawn on Donoso’s vast knowledge of European and US literature, art and music, while also remaining rooted in the experience of Latin American culture. He has become an international literary figure whose works resonate with equal force outside and inside the borders of his native Chile.

Donoso’s literary career began in Chile in the 1950s with the publication of Veraneo y otros cuentos [Summer Vacation and Other Stories]; included in Charleston and Other Stories in 1955, and Coronación (Coronation) in 1957. The focus on Chilean society and culture through tales revolving around upper-middle-class households is evident in these mostly realist texts and also shapes the stories and critical perspectives of Este domingo
(This Sunday) and El lugar sin límites, both published in 1966. It has been widely held, by both critics and the author himself, that in his next novel, El obsceno pájaro de la noche, published in 1970 but written over a period of eight years, Donoso takes a significant turn away from realist representation and toward a reflexive interrogation of literature and language. This thematically and technically complex novel, arguably Donoso’s Boom-era masterpiece, is at once the culmination of earlier meditations on the established familial and class structures underlying Chilean, and also Latin American, social order and the beginning of his critical inquiry about the procedures and principles of narrative fiction. The dual focus on Latin American reality and on literary problems also informs some of his most important and successful later works. For example, Casa de campo is both a political allegory dealing with the rise and fall of Allende in Chile and a literary meditation about the art of writing novels in the 20th century; El jardín de al lado thematizes the question of exile, as experienced by Donoso and many of his compatriots in recent decades, and experiments with techniques of narrative surprise; and Taratuta involves itself with a story about the Russian Revolution, which at the same time resonates meaningfully for the Latin American context and interrogates the relation between history and literature more generally.

While Donoso’s writing contains many significant ideas about Latin American history, politics, and culture, and many of his works of fiction inventively engage current issues in narrative poetics and criticism, his writing overall is essentially literary. In addition, Donoso’s personal memoir of the Boom years, first published in 1971 and expanded in 1983 to include an authorial update and also an account by Donoso’s wife, provides an inside view of the literary phenomenon as experienced by its writers rather than by its critics and readers. Though his view is personal and idiosyncratic, as the title of the essay underscores, it also speaks of a group experience and cultural phenomenon that has been much analyzed by others, and which, his essay reminds its readers, can be seen from a variety of perspectives. Other, perhaps more critically instructive, self-analyses can be found in the many interviews Donoso has granted to critics over the years, and especially in “Ithaca: the Impossible Return,” where, in speaking about his own art, language, and life, he inevitably seems to speak for other Latin American authors as well. Written just before he returned to live in Chile after a seventeen-year self-exile, the essay ends with the following observation: “Just as it was necessary, at one point, to leave Chile, and introduce a distance, an ausencia, a linguistic silence so I could write—an experience shared with so many novelists of my generation—I may have to go back to the first Ithaca I came from [i.e., Chile] in order to write about the uprooted and lonely people, younger than I, to whose breed, with its debilitated national identity and lost national vernacular, I now seem to belong.” Throughout his career, Donoso’s writing has continually interrogated questions about national identity and language, about the people, history, and culture to which his work is attached; more important, perhaps, is that his literary production has offered some of the most varied and adventurous responses to those questions within modern Latin American literature.

LUCILLE KERR
Biography

Born in Santiago de Chile, 5 October 1924. Attended the Grange School, Santiago; University of Chile Instituto Pedagógico, 1947; Princeton University, New Jersey, A.B., 1951. Worked as a shepherd in Patagonia. Taught English at the Catholic University of Chile in 1954 and journalism at the University of Chile; staff member at Revista Ercilla, Santiago, 1959–64. Married María del Pilar Serrano in 1961, one daughter. Worked at Colorado State University, Fort Collins, 1969; literary critic for the magazine Siempre, 1964–66; participant in Writers’ Workshop, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1965–67. Recipient of numerous awards including: City of Santiago Prize, 1955; Chile-Italy Prize for journalism, 1960; William Faulkner Foundation Prize, 1962.; Guggenheim Fellowship, 1968 and 1973; Critics’ Prize (Spain), 1979; Encomienda con Placa de la Orden de Alfonso X el Sabio, 1987; National Prize for Literature (Chile), 1990; Woodrow Wilson Foundation Fellow, 1992.. Died in Santiago de Chile, 7 December 1996.

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction

Veraneo y otros cuentos, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1955
Dos cuentos, Santiago de Chile: Guarda Vieja, 1956
El charlestón, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1960; as Charleston and Other Stories, translated by Andrée Conrad, Boston: Godine, 1977
El lugar sin límites, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1966; as Hell Has No Limits, translated by Hallie D. Taylor and Suzanne Jill Levine, in Triple Cross, New York: Dutton, 1972
Cuentos, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1971
La misteriosa desaparición de la marquesita de Loria, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1980
El jardín de al lado, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1981; as The Garden Next Door, translated by Hardie St Martin, New York: Grove Press, 1992, Seis cuentos para ganar, Santiago de Chile: CochranePlaneta/Teleduc, 1985
Taratuta; naturaleza muerta con cachimba, Madrid: Mondadori, 1990; as Taratuta; Still Life with Pipe, translated by Gregory Rabassa, New York: Norton, 1993
Donde van a morir los elefantes, Buenos Aires: Alfaguara, 1995

Poetry

Poemas de un novelista, Santiago de Chile: Ganymedes, 1981

Plays
Sueños de mala muerte, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1985
Este domingo: version teatral de la novela homónima, Santiago de Chile: Andrés Bello, 1990 [Adapted from his novel of the same title]

Essays

Further Reading

Castillo-Feliú, Guillermo (editor), The Creative Process in the Works of José Donoso, Rick Hill, South Carolina: Winthrop College, 1982
Cerda, Carlos, José Donoso: originales y metáforas, Santiago de Chile: Planeta, 1988
Cornejo Polar, Antonio (editor), Donoso: la destrucción de un mundo, Buenos Aires: García Cambeiro, 1975
González Mandri, Flora, José Donoso’s House of Fiction: a Dramatic Contraction of Time and Place, Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1995
Gutiérrez Mouat, Ricardo, José Donoso: impostura e impostación; la modelización lúdica y carnavalesca de una producción literaria, Gaithersburg, Maryland: Hispamérica, 1983
Luengo, Enrique, José Donoso: desde el teatro al metatexto, Concepción, Chile: Aníbal Pinto, 1991
McMurray, George R., José Donoso, Boston: Twayne, 1979
Magnarelli, Sharan, Understanding José Donoso, Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1993
Quinteros, Isis, José Donoso: una insurrección contra la realidad, Madrid: Hispanova, 1978
Solotorevsky, Myrna, José Donoso: incursiones en su producción novelesca, Valparaíso, Chile: Universitarias de Valparaíso, 1983
Vidal, Hernán, José Donoso: surrealismo y rebelión de los instintos, San Antonio de Callonge, Spain: Aubí, 1972

Interviews

Casa de campo

Novel by José Donoso

Donoso’s Casa de campo tells the story of a very large Chilean family in the 19th century and presents the ruminations of the 20th-century narrator-author who tells that story. It is a text that focuses as much attention on the telling of that story as on the story that is told.
It is a text that can be read allegorically, to figure either recent Chilean history or the history of Spanish America more generally, or reflexively, to analyze the narrative procedures and critical principles that govern the reading and writing of novels such as Donoso’s Casa de campo. The events of the fiction involve the Ventura y Ventura family, which comprises numerous adults and children who spend their summers together at the family property called Marulanda; their servants, who accompany the family to their summer home; and the native population that resides around Marulanda and on whose labor the family wealth has been built. The key events in the story are the picnic excursion taken by the adults and the servants away from the house and what transpires among the children during their absence, which is simultaneously perceived as a period of one year by the children and one day by the adults. Critics have proposed that the setting and events correspond to Chile’s political history from around 1970, when Salvador Allende was elected President, to 1973, the date of the military coup and Allende’s death. In that reading, Marulanda has been equated with Chile; the Ventura y Ventura adults with the oligarchy; the family’s children with the Chilean middle class; the natives with the country’s lower classes or proletariat or even Communists; the family’s servants with the Armed Forces; the servants’ leader (the Mayordomo) with Pinochet; Adriano Gomara (who became a Ventura by marrying into the family) with Allende, and his rise to a position of leadership over the children during the parents’ absence with Allende’s election in 1970; the return of the servants and the death of Adriano at the novel’s end with the military coup of September 1973; and the foreigners who accompany the adults on their return and to whom the adults arrange to sell their property with North Americans.

Casa de campo’s political allegory is a powerful, and apparently overriding, concern of the whole novel. Indeed, in this text Donoso seems to have aimed to speak more directly about a specific set of historical events in Chilean, and also Latin American, history rather than to focus on more circumscribed social and cultural issues that had dominated some of his earlier works. As important as the allegorical content of the novel is, however, it is not the only significant topic taken up here by Donoso. Indeed, Casa de campo also presents a complex meditation on modern literary language and narrative technique; it is also a playful consideration of the art of writing and narrating novels. The novel explores such topics in the pages in which the narrator, who identifies himself also as the novel’s author, speaks openly to the reader about the decisions he has had to make in telling the Venturas’ story and about the critical concepts and notions of which he is aware as he composes his text. The narrator-author talks about verisimilitude, about the psychology of fictional characters, about the language deployed by different entities, about the author’s relation to the reader, and about the real-world models on which his fiction supposedly has been based. All the while this narrator-author emphasizes the text’s status as artifice and the unreality of its story, which, he confesses near the end of the text, none the less manages to seduce its knowledgeable creator into its narrative web. Casa de campo artfully moves between what might appear to be opposing thematic interests and discursive forms; however, under Donoso’s sure hand these seemingly diverse topics and techniques coalesce to produce one of the author’s most accomplished works of fiction and a text that exemplifies the extraordinary inventiveness that has characterized Latin American narrative in recent decades.

LUCILLE KERR
Editions

First edition: Casa de campo, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1978

Further Reading

Íñigo Madrigal, Luis, “Alegoría, historia, novela (a propósito de Casa de Campo de José Donoso), Hispamérica 2,1 (1978)
Kerr, Lucille, “Conventions of Authorial Design: José Donoso’s Casa campo” Symposium 42, (1988)
Murphy, Marie, Authorizing Fictions: José Donoso’s “Casa de Campo,” London: Tamesis, 1992

Ariel Dorfman 1942–

Chilean prose writer and dramatist

It may be one of the more delightful ironies of Latin American literature that Ariel Dorfman should be best known for one of his earliest works and one of his latest works, both through genres with which one does not immediately identify this enormously talented writer. Para leer al pato Donald, 1971 (How to Read Donald Duck) is a biting sociological interpretation of Walt Disney’s comics in terms of US imperialism, which has become a handbook of de-colonisation. More recently his provocative play La muerte y la doncella, 1992, (Death and the Maiden) has gained for Dorfman an international reputation, admired by critics both in the stage version seen in London and Broadway, and more recently in the Roman Polanski film version. The irony resides in the fact that, sandwiched between these two book-end popular works of political ideology and Pinochet-inspired drama, lies a whole solid corpus of literary writings, critical essays, short fiction, poetry, drama and especially novels, for which he is not at all well known, because of their complexity (both formal and thematic) and challenging propositions. One of the reasons why Dorfman has not gained a popular following is because the complexities of his work force the reader to participate in the creative process. In addition, Dorfman needs to write about politics which influences our lives, and its concomitant themes in Latin America, like exile and alienation.

Dorfman’s first novel Moros en la costa, 1973 (Hard Rain), is much more a fictional collage of book reviews, film scripts, letters, interviews and other miscellaneous pieces which capture the times of the Allende Marxist experiment, with its socioeconomic and cultural reforms, all rendered in an obscure but challenging manner by the author’s attempt to modify and modernise the structure of the novel. It owes much formally to Cortázar’s Rayuela (Hopscotch) and resembles his Libro de Manuel, 1973 (A Manual for Manuel) despite Dorfman’s criticism of the latter which he considered a political failure. As an early statement of Dorfman’s ideological stand and experimental approach to language, Moros en la costa is a dense work which certainly achieves his aim of provoking the active reader’s collaboration.

Viudas, 1981 (Widows), if more structurally traditional, is very much a novel in the Dorfman tradition, concerned as he was (in exile) with the political implications of his country under Pinochet. Dorfman’s original intention had been to have it published under a pseudonym, since he was persona non grata in Chile, to obviate the censor’s rules. However, since it was set in a Greek village suffering from Nazi oppression during World War II, the political (editorial) strategy proved also to be a successful literary device because it ensured aesthetic distancing. Setting it in Greece gave it tragic overtones (Antigone, Trojan women) which it might not have achieved otherwise, if set realistically in Chile. The timeless, yet timely, story of the bereaved women and the disappeared men makes a powerful contribution to the universal cry for human rights.

More directly concerned with Pinochet’s Chile, although set in an unnamed country, La última canción de Manuel Sendero, 1982 (The Last Song of Manuel Sendero) is another complex work. Linked to his first novel by the revolutionary form of the text, it has multiple narrative voices and several layers of plot, including that of the two main characters writing a film script about Pinochet (cf., the two-thousand-year legend of the dragon Pinchot), and the babies (including the son of Manuel Sendero) who refuse to be born into an evil world full of victims, oppressors, and abuse of power. This is a powerful novel about Dorfman’s favourite themes, exile, dictatorship, human love, solidarity, which represents the best of his ideas while pushing literary and formal boundaries to the limit, thus daring his readers to jump into the creative act of composition. Dorfman insults no one’s intelligence in this rewarding, labyrinthine novel which transcends borders and epochs.

With the publication of Máscaras, 1988 (Mascara), Dorfman has produced another provocative study of the soul of dictatorship, which conjures up comparisons with Kafka and Orwell, without being overtly a political novel, since it is not set in Chile or even in Latin America. In this inventive story, which is not obviously about human rights but more about betrayal and deception, alienation and memory, Dorfman has created a nondescript character who is not remembered or recognised by anyone, not even his own family. His encounters with a plastic surgeon and his amnesiac lover change his invisibility (not to mention his life) forever. This is a disturbing novel, difficult to understand (even for Dorfman, he admits), notwithstanding the “sort of epilogue” which, rather than helping the reader with its clues and hints, only confuses us more with its quirky ideas on identity, personality and politics.

One of the themes of Máscaras, the absence of trust and the need to confide in others, becomes paramount in Dorfman’s recent novel Konfidenz [Confiding] which was published in 1994 with little fanfare, so taken up were the critics with the filming of La muerte y la doncella and its director, Roman Polanski. As in all of his novels, Dorfman is concerned here with the effect of dictatorship, exile and political corruption on human beings. With something of the tone and spirit of his previous novels, Konfidenz is at once a political allegory (about truth and betrayal) and a story of personal love between two people who have never met, thrown together by tyranny and approaching war. The unwary reader might assume that it is another novel about Chilean exiles, notwithstanding the title, before the plot unfolds to reveal details about the anti-fascist protagonists who are, in fact, Germans conspiring in Paris against Nazism just before the outbreak of war in 1939. The personal life of the heroine, her love for her fiancée, the links with the political organisation and its ambivalent, ambiguously named members and their need to confide and trust in each other, all demand an attentive reading. The intrusion of anonymous voices and characters, the role of the narrator, the author and, of course, the accomplice-reader, all contribute to the work’s fascination and sophistication.

Dorfman’s recent commercial success may tempt him to write with less intellectual rigour. Will he be able to sustain his writing on popular culture (Disney, Reader’s Digest, Lone Ranger, children’s literature, etc.) and literary criticism—original essays on Roa Bastos, Neruda, Asturias, García Márquez, Carpentier, Cardenal, Borges, testimonial literature and much more, in revealing studies like Imaginación y violencia en America (1970), and Hacia la liberación del lector latinoamericano, 1984 (Some Write to the Future). Five collections of short stories capture the essence of life in Chile under Pinochet’s dictatorship—human dramas as they affect children, prisoners, doctors, censors, soldiers and their families.

If Dorfman seems best known in the mid-1990s for La muerte y la doncella, an irony that will not be lost on him, given his views on popular literature and the demands he puts on his readers, at least he is consistent in his themes. The Pinochet abuses cannot and should not be forgotten by the families of the disappeared or those who survived the institutionalised torture like the protagonist of this hit play. Pauline never forgets the brutal humiliation of doctor Miranda, who tortured her whilst listening to Schubert’s music, nor does she forget the voice. In the post-dictatorship days, when her neoliberal husband, the lawyer Gerardo, now commissioned to investigate the atrocities of the previous regime, brings home his new friend the doctor, Pauline, with horror, recognises the voice of her torturer. Or does she? Set on revenge, she takes the law into her own hands, despite the protests and the advice of her fair-minded do-gooder husband.
Dorfman’s preoccupation with this theme, which runs like a leitmotif through all his work, is matched only by his dramatic presentation and theatrical skill—not to mention the convincing ambiguity and the accomplice-reader’s doubts. Dorfman deals with some important moral issues here—especially the dilemma for the victims of oppression (and the author) who have to live in peace with the now pardoned oppressors and torturers. As he wrestles with truth and lies, reality and imagination, Dorfman creates not only powerful drama but also demands from his compatriots an examination of conscience.

With the success of La muerte y la doncella and the stage version of Viudadas, and several other plays in gestation, Dorfman’s work for the stage is unlikely to prove ephemeral.

With democracy restored to Chile, although the dragon Pinchot still hovers in the shadows, Dorfman can now spend half his life in his own country, and the other half as a distinguished professor and a literary celebrity in the US. Given the many fragments and contradictions in his own make-up, Dorfman is clearly a multifaceted figure. But the pain and grief of the Pinochet years remain, and will be reflected in his continuing work, which is at root still political.

JOHN WALKER
Biography

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction

Cria ojos, Mexico City: Nueva Imagen, 1979; as My House is on Fire, translated by the author and George Shivers, New York: Viking, 1990

La última canción de Manuel Sendero, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1982.; as The Last Song of Manuel Sendero, translated by the author and George R. Shivers, New York: Viking, 1987

Dorando la píldora, Santiago de Chile: Ediciones del Ornitorrinco, 1985

Plays

Widows, produced 1988 [Adapted from his novel Viudas]

Poetry

Pruebas al canto, Mexico City: Nueva Imagen, 1980

Pastel de choclo, Santiago de Chile: Sinfronteras, 1986

Essays and Other Writings
Further Reading

As yet, there has been no sustained criticism of Dorfman’s work, apart from Oropesa’s modest monograph. However, there have been a fair number of book reviews of individual works, and his critical and sociological works have been highly regarded for many years.

Galán, Eduardo, “La muerte y la doncella. ¿Perdonar los crímenes del fascismo?” Primer Acto (May-June 1993)

Jara, René, Los límites de la representación. La novela chilena del golpe, Madrid: Fundación Instituto Shakespeare, 1985

Oropesa, Salvador, La obra de Ariel Dorfman: ficción y crítica, Madrid: Pliegos, 1992

Vidal, Hernán, Cultura nacional chilena, crítica literaria y derechos humanos, Minneapolis: Ideology and Literature, 1989

Interviews

Autran Dourado 1926–

Brazilian prose writer

Autran Dourado stands out as one of the most important contemporary Brazilian writers. Since 1947, he has authored more than twenty books, including novels, short stories, novellas, and essays dealing with the poetics of the narrative. Obsessed by the baroque heritage of his native state of Minas Gerais, skillful in the use of stream of consciousness, a skilled craftsman, he has written many of his books employing blocos (blocks), a technique that he outlines in his Uma poética de romance, 1973 [A Poetics of the Novel].

A significant portion of his fiction is set in Minas Gerais, probably by the turn of the century or in the first three decades of this century, when politics was chiefly a conflict between the two most powerful local families, in a social environment dominated by colonels (chieftains) and landlords; in this setting, honour was an indisputable value, passion was repressed, sex was a matter for men in the brothels. The main exceptions to this general background are Os sinos da agonia, 1974 (The Bells of Agony), whose plot takes place in 18th-century Minas Gerais, and A serviço del-Rei, 1984 [On His Majesty’s Service], a kind of contemporary account of the intricacies of power, based on his experiences as the Presidency’s Press Secretary.

Three of his novels, Ópera dos mortos, 1967 (The Voices of the Dead), Lucas Procópio, 1984 and Um cavalheiro de antigamente, 1992. [An Old-Fashioned Gentleman] reconstitute the story of the family Honório Cota. In the first one, Rosalina inherits the tradition of the sobrado (mansion) a kind of sacred space, in the words of Maria Lúcia Lepecki, in opposition to the profane space of the town. In the house both lineages the one her grandfather, the passionate Lucas Procópio, and that of her father, the secluded João Capistrano—mingled together. Silence reigns in the house, and its only linkage with the small town is through Quiquina, a black servant who is a deaf mute. When Juca Passarinho arrives and settles in the house to work as an odd-job man, the prevailing order is disturbed: he talks too much, he is from another social stratum, he tries to change things (in the mansion the watches were stopped each time someone died). When he becomes Rosalina’s lover, she begins to suffer a process of double and divided personality: a passionate woman who speaks uninterruptedly (not about him and not to him) during the night and the boss during the day. At the end, Rosalina goes mad, her unborn child is buried by Quiquina, who restores the sacred order in the sobrado and expels Juca. The patriarchal order is disappearing, there are no heirs, the silence and conversation symbolizes the impossibility of historicity within the sobrado. As language is primarily a form of socialization, within a space in which language is frozen there is no social transformation possible.

Despite the fact that Quiquina belongs to both another social group and a different ethnicity, the truth is that she is totally absorbed by the values of the mansion. There is no continuation for the seigniorial class due to the absence of heirs and due to the impossibility of forging another agent of social transformation. In this regard, Ópera dos mortos portrays the impasse of social reproduction among the dominant elites in Brazil, during the transition from the agrarian “aristocracy” into the new urban sectors.

Senra argues that Autrian fiction is built labyrinthically, focusing on characters that are always on the margins of society, surrounded by the pomp of a baroque and decadent.
Minas Gerais, with its social injustice and moral depravity. “I continue more and more bent towards the past and a Minas that weighs inside of me,” he said once in an interview with Senra (1983). In Dourado’s novels the mythic is used for the purpose of criticizing, among other things, a state of social immobility. The author’s obsession with the phantoms of the mineiro past, nevertheless, seems to suggest that his fiction is somehow trapped in the critique that it is aiming to tackle. Be that as it may, incommunicability, death, decadence, madness, solitude are among the main themes that act as vertebrae for his production, undoubtedly one of the most outstanding in Brazilian contemporary literature.

ROBERTO REIS

Biography

Selected Works

No attempt has been made to divide these works into separate genres because this would run contrary to the author’s intentions.

Teia, Belo Horizonte, Brazil: Edifício, 1947
Sombra e exílio, Belo Horizonte, Brazil: João Calazans, 1950 Tempo de amar, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1952
Três histórias na praia, Rio de Janeiro: Ministério da Educação e Cultura, 1955
Nove histórias em grupo de três, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1957
Solidão solitude, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1972
Os sinos da agonia, Rio de Janeiro: Expressão e Cultura, 1974; as The Bells of Agony, translated by John Parker, London: Peter Owen, 1988
Novelário de Donga Novais, Rio de Janeiro: DIFEL, 1976
Armas e corações, Rio de Janeiro: DIFEL, 1978
As imaginações pecaminosas, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1982,
A serviço del-Rei, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1984
Lucas Procópio, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1984
Violetas e caracóis, Rio de Janeiro: Guanabara, 1987
Um artista aprendiz, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1989

Essays
Uma poética de romance, São Paulo/Brasília: Perspectiva/INL, 1973
“Matéria de carpintaria,” Cadernos da PUC, vol. 9 (1975)
O meu mestre imaginário, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1982

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading
Lepecki, Maria Lúcia, Autran Dourado, São Paulo/Brasília: Quíron/INL, 1976
Patai, Daphne, Myth and Ideology in Contemporary Brazilian Fiction, Rutherford, New Jersey: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, and London: Associated University Presses, 1983 [Chapter 8 is on Dourado]
Reis, Roberto, A permanência do círculo—hierarquia no romance brasileiro, Niterói/Brasília: EDUFF/INL, 1987
Senra, Ângela Maria de Freitas (editor), Autran Dourado, São Paulo: Abril, 1983 [Série Literatura Comentada]

Drummond de Andrade, Carlos

See Andrade

Oswald Durand 1840–1906

Haitian poet

Oswald Durand has traditionally been considered Haiti’s national poet and, until quite recently, was unanimously hailed by his countrymen as “the Haitian Verlaine” or even “the Haitian Victor Hugo.” Present-day critics have tended to temper this adulation. In particular, they have criticized his imperfect versification and his tendency to use the same images and turns of phrases in different poems. Throughout his life, Durand contributed numerous poems to newspapers and reviews. Only in 1896, when he was fifty-six, did a selection of his work appear in the two volumes of Rires et pleurs [Laughter and Tears] published in Paris. Four years later, a twenty-page brochure of his Quatre nouveaux poèmes [Four New Poems] appeared in Haiti, but it is likely that the major part of his production is still buried in 19th-century periodicals, most of which have become extremely rare.

Be that as it may, several of Durand’s poems have become classics: most literate Haitians know them, often by heart. Whatever their formal qualities or shortcomings, these poems strikingly illustrate important aspects of the Haitian collective psychology, and of Haitian attitudes towards life. Thus, Durand was one of the first poets who dared to allude directly to the color prejudice through which class distinctions are, to a large degree, expressed in Haiti. The obviously autobiographical Le Fils du noir [The Black Man’s Son] is the first-person lament of a dark-complexioned man whom a lightcolored young woman has rejected as a suitor simply because of his pigmentation. Like most of his readership, Durand was phenotypically a mulâtre rather than a noir (the Black man’s son is careful to remind us that his dead mother was as white as his beloved). This overly sentimental poem, which expresses neither resentment nor revolt but only plaintive sorrow and resignation, hardly constitutes a threat to the status quo. To be sure, color tensions and rivalries in Haiti were much less virulent in the 19th century than they became later, and were expressed with particular discretion, all the more since, at the time Haitians were proclaiming their patriotism and unity before foreign racism and especially before the first ominous manifestations of US imperialism in the Caribbean.

This patriotism is given expression in many of Durand’s poems. The famous Ces Allemands! [These Germans!] for example, was written right after the Kaiser sent two warships to Haiti to enforce a German national’s abusive claims on the national treasury. The government was forced to comply, and the German crew piled insult upon injury by befouling a Haitian flag before sailing away. Durand compares his country’s humiliation to that of the French, who were also ransomed by the enemy after their defeat in the Franco-Prussian war. In Ode a la France [Ode to France], another denunciation of the Prussian barbarians, the poet invokes and celebrates the spirit of Napoleon Bonaparte. This is surprising, at the very least, since Napoleon had condemned Toussaint Louverture, the greatest hero of Haiti’s struggle for independence, to die of cold and starvation in the Fort de Joux in the Jura mountains.

Another well-known poem deals with an epidemic that was destroying coconut palms around 1880. Since the coconut palm appears on the Haitian coat of arms, it becomes, in La Mort de nos cocotiers [The Death of Our Coconut Palms], a synecdoche for the whole country. Durand expresses the fear that the tree dying of sickness symbolizes the country, dying of partisan politics and corrupt government. This lamentation on the state of the nation and the criminal irresponsibility of its leaders has been a traditional theme in Haitian letters practically since Independence, and Durand illustrates it with an ingenious and felicitous conceit.

But not all of Durand’s poems are suffused with this typically Haitian pessimism; many express the sensuality and joie de vivre which are equally typical of the Haitian collective sensibility. Durand was famous for his appreciation of attractive ladies and strong drink, and many of his poems are celebrations of the beauty of Haitian women. In Nos payses [Our Country’s Women], for example, he compares them favorably to their White sisters both in physical appearance and amorous expertise. The poet exalts the different phenotypes found in Haiti, the Griffonnes et négresses, et jaunes mulâtresses (light and dark and high-yellow girls), whom he claims to have loved with equal abandon. He tends to describe them in a typical Haitian manner, that is by comparing them to tropical fruit. So that his mistress Idalina’s mouth “…notre caïmitte/Elle imite/Le violet pur et beau” (As purple as our lovely caymitos) and her breasts suggest “Deux sapottes veloutées/Surmontées/De deux grains de raisin noir” (Rising above twin sapodillas/Two black grapes or maybe raisins).

Just as Durand celebrated his country’s women, so was he inspired by its landscapes. He was the first to introduce systematically in his verse the flora and fauna of the island. Until then, Haitian poets preferred to pretend that Haiti (like France) was covered with oaks and apple trees where larks and nightingales sang, rather than with royal palms and mango trees where pipirits and madam saras nestled. In the same way, Durand could be called one of Haiti’s first costumbristas: he delighted in describing everyday scenes of urban and rural Haitians at work and play. As the critic Louis Morpeau put it twenty years after Durand’s death, he can be considered the most Haitian, the most instinctively African-Latin, the most original of our poets, because he commemorated our splendors and bewailed our wretchedness, because he felt, and skillfully expressed the captivating charm of our country, its very soul.

Another of Durand’s claims to fame is his supposedly autobiographical Creole poem, Choucoune. Several Haitian poets had occasionally composed in the vernacular before him, invariably in the comic or lightly erotic vein, and Durand in fact contributed numerous compositions of that kind to newspapers. Indeed, he innovated by also composing rather clever advertisements for various Port-au-Prince stores and businesses. Although he carefully collected his Creole poems in several notebooks which were never published and seem to have disappeared, only two poems in the vernacular were included in the one hundred and sixty-eight titles collected in his Rires et pleurs: a short fable in the manner of La Fontaine, Lion aq bourrique (The Lion and the Donkey), and Choucoune. The latter is probably the best-known of all Haitian poems: it was set to music by Mauléar-Monton, a compatriot of Durand’s, and, under its English title Yellow Bird, is still played and sung by West Indian orchestras all over the world. Of course, only Creole speakers can appreciate the original lyrics. The poem is in fact a kind of pastoral variation on the theme of Le Fils du Noir: Petit-Pierre (the name denotes a Haitian of lower social status) bemoans the faithlessness of Choucoune, a beautiful marabou (a woman with dark skin, European features and long silky hair) who was about to marry him when a young white man came on the scene and seduced her away. The refrain expresses Petit-Pierre’s sorrow with a pungent Creole expression which probably dates back to the times of slavery: de piéds-moin Ian chaine! (my two feet are in chains!). Significantly, unlike the French language Le Fils du Noir, the poem is not an expression of despair. Indeed it is full of half-humorous, half-salacious details: Choucoune has “tété dubout (firm breasts), li pas gros femm’, li grassett”’ (she is not a stout woman, she is plump) and when her jilted lover sees her some time later, “Li va fai’ yon p’tit qat’ron…p’ti ventr’li bien rond!” (She’s about to have a little mulatto…her stomach is nice and round!). The description of the White seducer is also humorous and somewhat bitter-sweet: unlike Petit-Pierre, he is rich enough to sport a pocket-watch, he has red hair, a nice pink face, and above all “bell’ chivé” (good, that is silky, not woolly hair). But what immediately wins Choucoune over is that “li parlé francé,” and not Creole, the lowly, inferior, lower-class language which every Haitian speaks but which the upper classes denigrate: that a Haitian who speaks French is superior to one who speaks Creole only seemed obvious to Durand’s readers who, by definition, belonged to the former group. No doubt they identified with the White seducer, and found it perfectly natural that a pretty peasant girl would prefer him to her rough-hewn betrothed. Yet, while not revolutionary, the poem is somewhat disturbing, as evidenced by the fact that it has often been anthologized in bowdlerized versions.

LÉON-FRANÇOIS HOFFMANN

Biography

Born in Cap-Haïtien, Haiti, in 1840. His mother was Aristie de Vastey, a relative of general Thomas-Alexandre Dumas (father of Dumas père). Both parents were killed in the 1842. earthquake; raised by his grandmother in the border town of Ouanaminte.
Largely self-educated, having received only elementary schooling and two years of secondary formal education. Worked as a tinsmith and was encouraged by Demesvar Delorme, one of the most famous Haitian men of letters of the day, to submit his poetry to newspapers. In 1860 he was teaching at a primary school when he married Virginie Sampeur, whom he deserted a few years later. His wife’s lament, L’Abandonnée [The Abandoned Woman], appears in most anthologies of Haitain poetry. In 1866 he was named director of the lycée (academic secondary school) in the provincial town of Gonaïves. Having somehow displeased the government, he spent some time in prison in 1883 under sentence of death, but two years later was freed and elected to the lower chamber of the legislature, where he enjoyed six consecutive terms and served as the publisher of the official journal, Le Moniteur, and the satiric review Les Bigailles. In 1905, at the urging of the novelist Frédéric Marcelin, who was at the time Minister of Finance, the Haitian Parliament awarded Durand a monthly retirement pension of 225 gourdes. Died in 1906 and was given a state funeral.

Selected Works

Fiction
Quatre nouveaux poèmes, Cap-Haïtien: Imprimerie Librairie La Conscience, 1900
Further Reading

Douyon, Ernest, L’Année d’Oswald Durand, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie de l’Abeille, 1905 [A volume in honour of Durand containing, in particular, speeches to the legislature in support of a motion granting the poet a pension]

Fignolé, Jean-Claude, Oswald Durand, essai critique, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie Les Presses Port-au-Princiennes, 1968 [A revisionist essay stressing, through an analysis of selected poems, the limitations of Durand’s poetry]

Esteban Echeverría 1805–1851

Argentine poet and prose writer

Among Latin America’s finest and best-known Romantic writers, Esteban Echeverría was largely responsible for the introduction into Argentina, and the Southern Cone in general, of the movement he personifies. He is also an early example of the strong tendency among Latin American writers of the 19th century to become important political figures, a regional characteristic which in more muted fashion continues today. As in the case of José Martí and (to some extent) Pablo Neruda, it is somewhat difficult to separate the value of his strictly literary contributions from what he represents to Latin American intellectual history as a whole: just as he, and they, would have had it.

Echeverría was born in Buenos Aires in 1805, to a family of modest economic resources, further reduced with the death of his father when the poet was still a young child. His formal education, in part due to his limited opportunities, was never completed, even though he studied Law and Social Sciences in Paris, using such savings as he had accumulated working in a dry-goods store while pursuing his own readings in diverse areas, together with the study of French. Echeverría’s time in France, along with the influence of English Romanticism, was to mark permanently both Echeverría’s life, and Spanish American Romanticism. In Paris he came to know many of the major literary figures of the time—Hugo and both the Dumas (father and son), for example—and was much inspired by the passions and innovations of the new style which was sweeping the European continent in all the arts. Schiller, Goethe and Byron in particular, were his most enduring Romantic inspirations.

Upon his return to Buenos Aires in 1830, he set the pattern for his adult life, participating simultaneously in the promotion of the new art he brought from his European experience and in actively opposing the dictatorial regime of Juan Manuel de Rosas, the subject of Echeverría’s most acclaimed single piece, the short story El matadero (The Slaughter House), often described as the first example of the short story genre in Spanish America. It is, along with his essays, his best writing for many modern readers: mordant, allegorical, denunciatory and clearly political, accusing Rosas and his Federalist cohorts of turning the capital city, and the country itself, into nothing less than a place of bestial carnage. (Echeverría was a Unitarian, that is, one who favored a strong central government in Buenos Aires and progressive schemes of modernization on a European model). El matadero uses effectively mordant sarcasm and blunt, polar symbolism to denounce Rosas and his deeds and to portray favorably the Unitarian cause.
The story then is, aside from its artistic merit, a classic illustration of fictional narrative addressing real social issues in Spanish America.

El matadero and all of Echeverría’s best works were written after 1830, in spite of his active participation in the Asociación de Mayo he helped found, in political forums and in his abundant essays and speeches. (One of the best-known of the latter was to this same association, on its inauguration.) He also theorized about writing, especially in the Romantic vein (“Classicism and Romanticism,” for example), and continually stressed the urgent need for an independence which went beyond mere political separation from Spain and promoted artistic and intellectual liberation as well from any foreign models: “We are independent, but not free,” he wrote. And like a good and dedicated Romantic, his strongly moralistic foundations were expressed in prose and verse in which the national territory, history and character were the models on which to base the Argentina he wished to see, both in reality and in his country’s literature.

El matadero, along with several poetic works, stands in esteem today despite what now seems a somewhat simplistic and at times over-wrought melodramaticism: that is to say that Echeverría both introduced Romanticism, and was the exponent of both its greatest and most valuable passions, and its tendencies toward qualities now more often seen as “unrealistic.” This sin—if it is a sin—lies in the very nature of the entire movement, in its glorification of the individual, the homeland and emotional commitment, along with persistent conflicts with lived, politicized and all-too-fallible realities. In this tonality, he produced his best-known work, “Elvira, o La novia del Plata” [Elvira, or The Bride of the River Plate]; his passionate Los consuelos [Consolations], his dramatic and Byronesque La cautiva [The Captive], along with his Rimas [Rhymes]. While a good part of his work was only published posthumously, largely for political reasons, Echeverría was nevertheless a visible, oft-quoted and influential artistic and political figure for two decades.

Echeverría was largely responsible for introducing to Spanish America what soon became Romantic commonplaces: the portrayal of nature as reflective of the characters’ mental and spiritual state, and its strong personification and use in foreshadowing; the hyper-pure leading characters; the extreme moral dichotomy between typologized antagonists; use of varied verse-forms; abundance of vivid and active adjectives, subordination of realistic plot to apparently-fortuitous events, and more. All these qualities may be exemplified in the following passages from La cautiva, which (the first two stanzas) introduce and then (the last one) close an Indian attack on the “Christian” (white) settlers of the pampa. The “subhuman” and cruel Indians approach:

> El crepúsculo, entretanto, con su claroscuro manto,
veló la tierra; una faja,
egnra como una mortaja,
el occidente cubrió;
mientras la noche bajando
lenta venía, la calma que contempla suspirando.
inquieta a veces el alma,
con el silencio reinó ...

Bajo la planta sonante del ágil potro arrogante
el duro suelo temblaba.
Y envuelto en polvo cruzaba [el clamor]
como animado tropel,
velozmente cabalgando;
víanse lanzas agudas,
cabezas, crines ondeando,
y como formas desnudas de aspecto extraño y cruel . . .

The bloody attack over, the Indians withdraw in raucous celebration:

… y bajo el callo
del indómito caballo, crujiendo el suelo temblaba;
hueco y sordo retumbaba
su grito en la soledad.
Mientras la noche, cubierto el rostro en manto nubloso, echo en el vasto desierto,
su silencio pavoroso,
su sombría majestad.

[Nightfall, meantime, /with its chiaroscuro cloak, / o’erlooked the land; a band, / black as a winding-cloth, / covered the West; / while the descending night / slowly came, for the calm / it contemplates sighing, / restless at times its soul, / in silence assumed its reign. // Under the resounding hooves / of the daring and agile mounts / the firm soil shook. / And wrapped in dust there crossed / in animated throng, /swiftly riding [the horde’s sound]; / sharp spears gleamed, / heads and manes undulated, / and things like naked forms / of strange and cruel appearance. // …and under the hooves / of the unmastered horse / the earth creaked and shook; / their screams in the solitude / empty and dully resounded. / While the night, its face / covered in cloudy cloak, / threw o’er the vast desert, / its fearsome silence, / its dark majesty.]
Echeverría, unlike many of his contemporaries in the Unitarian movement, was able to spend most of his time in his native land, being exiled only later in his life, when he joined those who had preceded him to Montevideo after an unsuccessful attempt to oust Rosas. Through his final months, suffering from the probable tuberculosis which had afflicted him since his youth (and possibly contracted during the ten years he himself called “degenerate”), he continued to write. At the time of his death in 1851, he was correcting the manuscript of La cautiva. Echeverría stands today as a model of intelligent and reasoned political commitment, the man most responsible for the introduction of Romanticism into Spanish America—where it became arguably the most dominant literary movement ever—and the author of works which, in denouncing the failings of his own times, announce his own lasting faith that humankind can and surely will produce better days to come, through social commitment and art alike: for Echeverría, as a thoroughgoing Romantic, these two passions are one, inseparably the responsibility and hence the grand opportunity for nothing less than personal and national glory.

PAUL W. BORGESON, JR

Poem translated by Paul W. Borgeson, Jr

See also entry on Caudillismo and Dictatorship

Biography

Born José Esteban Antonino Echeverría in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 2 September 1805. Studied Latin, French, philosophy and drawing during a foundation year at the University of Buenos Aires. Visited Paris in 1825. There, over a period of five years, he delved into a range of subjects in an unmethodical way. Returned to Buenos Aires via London, 1830. Profoundly depressed by state of Argentina on his return. Withdrew into himself. This proved to be a productive period for him as a writer. Joined the literary group that met in the back room of the bookseller Marcos Sastre, 1838. Formed the “Asociación de la Joven Generación Argentina,” 1838. Involved in abortive insurrection against the strongman, Manuel de Rosas, 1839, and fled to Montevideo. Poverty and poor health prevented him from further involvement in bringing down Rosas. Died 19 January 1851.

Selected Works

Poetry

Elvira, o, la novia del Plata, Buenos Aires: Argentina, 1832

Los consuelos, Buenos Aires: Argentina, 1834

Rimas, Buenos Aires: Argentina, 1837

La guitarra, Montevideo: n.p., 1842

La insurrección del sud, Montevideo: Cornejo de Plato, 1849

El ángel caído, in Obras completas, vol. 2, Buenos Aires: Imprenta y Librería de Mayo, 1871

Prose Narratives

“El peregrinaje de Gualpo,” in Revista del Río de la Plata, Buenos Aires, 1873
“Cartas a un amigo,” in Revista del Río de la Plata, Buenos Aires, 1873

Essays
Dogma socialista, Montevideo: Nacional, 1846

Compilations and Anthologies
La cautiva, La guitarra y otros poemas, Buenos Aires: Plus Ultra, 1975

Further Reading
Bogliolo, Rómulo, Las ideas democráticas y socialistas de Esteban Echeverría, 3rd edition, Buenos Aires: La Vanguardia, 1937
Bucich, Antonio, Esteban Echeverría y su tiempo, Buenos Aires: Virtus, 1938
Ghiano, Juan Carlos, “El matadero” de Echeverría y el costumbrismo, Buenos Aires: America Latina, 1968
Mantovani, Juan, Echeverría y la doctrina de la educación popular, Buenos Aires: Perrot, 1957
Mercado, Juan C., Building a Nation: the Case of Esteban Echeverría, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1995
Moreno Davis, Julio, Esteban Echeverría, su vida y su pensamiento, Panama City: n.p., 1972
Palcos, Alberto, Historia de Esteban Echeverría, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1960
Roggiano, Alfredo, “Esteban Echeverría y el romanticismo europeo,” in Actas del Sexto Congreso Internacional de Hispanistas, Toronto: Department of Spanish and Portuguese, University of Toronto, 1980

Ecuador

19th- and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry
The modern name Ecuador, bestowed upon the nation by the members of the National Assembly in 1830, rather belies the pre-Hispanic and colonial heritage of the country. Much more descriptive are previous designations such as the Kingdom of the Shyris (referring to the indigenous peoples who populated the region) or the colonial demarcations of the territory (when Ecuador was called the Audience of Quito). Despite Ecuador’s reduced size since 1942, Benjamin Carrión’s idea of the “patria pequeña” (small fatherland) asserts that Ecuador is capable of major contributions to world culture, nevertheless: “El Ecuador no podrá competir con las grandes potencias en el aspecto material, pero podrá hacerlo en las faenas del espíritu” (Ecuador cannot compete with major nations as far as material goods are concerned, yet it can compete in matters of spirituality).

It is an Ecuadorian, José Joaquín Olmedo, who is cited in numerous literary anthologies for writing the rousing text of the military victory against Spain which secured the independence of the colonies. His epic poem La victoria de Junín, Canto a Bolívar, 1825 [The Victory at Junín, Song to Bolívar] immortalizes the heroic deeds of Simon Bolívar and links the victorious general to the accomplishments of the traditional warrior-kings of the Incas. A defender of the rights of the indigenous population, Olmedo also argued vociferously as a delegate to the courts at Cádiz. Olmedo, for a number of decades dominated the literary scene. His measured poetry describes another epic battle, the successful campaign of General Flores against rebellious armies of citizens. His letters, in addition to his poetry, assure him international recognition.

Newly conscious of their national identity in the aftermath of independence from Spain, several Ecuadorians are credited with establishing the origins of their nation: Pedro Fermín Cevallos wrote a history of Ecuador up to 1845; Pablo Herrera published a history of Ecuadorian literature in 1860, as did Juan León Mera in 1868. The literature of the early republic often features the essays of Ecuador’s politicians, especially the presidents. In the 19th century, Vicente Rocafuerte’s and García Moreno’s speeches and long essays are preserved, as are Luis Cordero’s verses of Quichua poetry. These same writers contributed to the regional magazines devoted to the arts and the exploration of social issues: La Union Literaria, 1893 [The Literary Union, Cuenca] and Revista Ecuatoriana, 1890 [Ecuadorian Magazine, Quito]. One of the earliest feminist essays was published in the highly regarded Revista de la Sociedad Jurídico-literaria, 1904 [Journal of the JudicialLiterary Society] where Marietta de Veintimilla argued against male superiority and encouraged women to become writers.

Federico González Suárez’s Historia general de la República del Ecuador, 1890 [General History of the Republic of Ecuador] took him ten years to write for he gathered up books and manuscripts, consulted the archives of Spain and the Americas, and even undertook archeological excavations. The four volumes were shaped by his view of history: “In looking back at our ancestors we can suggest a way of bettering our national character, because a nation, however virtuous it may be, can also improve itself.” González Suárez’s legacy surpasses the chapters and pages he wrote. He fomented a valuable contribution to Ecuadorian culture in acquiring an impressive research library and in founding the Ecuadorian Society of American Historical Studies, 1909, later the National Academy of History). The nucleus of young intellectuals he gathered in the Archbishop’s Palace became outstanding contributors to museum collections and library holdings, in addition to writing monographs on Ecuadorian culture: Jacinto Jijón y Caamaño, Carlos Manuel Larrea and José Gabriel Navarro.

An attempt to summarize the literary tendencies of the 19th century calls attention to the excesses of Romanticism and the cool presence of Neoclassic decorum. Dolores Veintimilla de Galindo embodies the Romantic ideal prominent in the century. Her scant production of intensely personal verse (ten poems) and prose (three texts) is rendered more poignant by the taking of her own life in 1857. Another romantic figure is seen in Marietta Veintimilla who assumed command of Ecuadorian troops and accepted presidential duties if pressed into service by her uncle, Ignacio Veintimilla, who governed Ecuador from 1876-1883. Later, in exile, she wrote Páginas del Ecuador, 1890 [Pages on Ecuador], a hybrid of novel and memoir.

Juan Montalvo also reflects the political tensions defining the 19th century; much of his writing was undertaken in exile. Montalvo oscillates between Romantic ardor in his polemical pamphlets and a Neoclassic manner in his didactic essay. Much to Montalvo’s chagrin, Juan León Mera’s skill as a writer and his choice of indigenous themes brought Mera recognition from the Spanish Academy. The success of Mera’s Cumandá (1879), a novel inspired equally by French literature as well as the tropical forests of Ecuador, intensified the rivalry between the two writers, both native sons of Ambato. Mera’s prominence as the foremost Ecuadorian literary spokesperson was challenged by other contemporaries. In his essays, Remigio Crespo Toral took exception with Mera’s depictions of Ecuador as a country steeped in indigenous lore. Instead, Crespo’s poetry embraced religious themes, Bolívar’s last thoughts, and improved relations between Spain and the Americas. Julio Zaldumbide, known as the “philosophical poet,” also criticized Mera’s position: “Our nation is not Incan, and thus that kind of poetry cannot be our national poetry nor can you be proclaimed our national poet because you do not think and feel as the American populace thinks and feels.” Zaldumbide, diplomat and cabinet-level appointee, wrote intensely self-searching meditative verse. Another statesmanpoet, Numa Pompilio Llona, similarly avoided themes of nation to craft finely-honed sonnets reflecting Parnassian esthetics and Golden Age motifs.

General Eloy Alfaro’s victorious march up the Sierra from the coastal plains in 1895 would decisively affect literary production at the turn of the century. An advocate of separation of church and state, Alfaro’s liberal policies are reflected in the increasingly realistic observation of socio-economic problems in Ecuadorian literature. A la costa [To the Coast], published by Luis A. Martínez in 1904, uses climactic and ecological factors to explain character development. More importantly, Martínez portrays an entire society, coast and highlands, subject to unjust and obsolete economic and social controls. The graphic realism so characteristic of A la costa was continued by three young writers from Guayaquil (Gallegos Lara, Aguilera Malta, Gil Gilbert) in their collection of short stories Los que se van, 1930 [Those Who Leave]. The choppy, incisive and occasionally lyrical prose highlights the dialectical speech and customs of the coastal inhabitant, the montuvio. All three of these authors, along with José de la Cuadra and Alfredo Pareja Diezcanseco, formed the influential writers collective, the “Grupo de Guayaquil.” Nela Martínez, an active member of this group whose work is dispersed in numerous publications, deserves more critical attention.

Demetrio Aguilera Malta and Alfredo Pareja Diezcanseco both served as Ecuador’s representatives in diplomatic as well as literary circles and, despite these obligations, they were the most prolific writers of the “Guayaquil Group.” In his early novels, Don Goyo, 1933 and La isla virgen, 1942, [The Virgin Island], Aguilera Malta describes lyrically the mythical belief systems of the coastal inhabitants who at the same time realistically confront the ruling class’s exploitation of their environment. Although later novels C.Z. (Canal Zone), 1935 and Madrid, 1936, venture beyond the enclosed regional themes of the Ecuadorian coast, Aguilera returned to this location in his Siete lunas y siete serpientes, 1970 (Seven Serpents and Seven Moons). Aguilera Malta also made an unjustly under-regarded contribution to the novel of dictatorship with his El secuestro del general, 1973 (Babelandia). Pareja Diezcanseco was the first of the Guayaquil group to narrate the novel of the city and thus present the complexities of factory workers and wealthy industrialists, a growing middle class, street peddlers and domestic workers, and the claustrophobic confines of incarceration explored in La casa de los locos, 192.9 [House of Fools]; Río arriba, 1931 [Up River]; El muelle, 1933 [The Dock]. Although Pareja embarked upon a project of defining the nation in his history of Ecuador (1946) and in his novelistic renditions of the colonial artist Miguel de Santiago and President Eloy Alfaro, he experimented with myth and magical realism in Las pequeñas estaturas, 1970 [The Small Ones] and La manticora, 1974 [The Manticore].

In the Andean region of Ecuador, writers described the plight of the downtrodden Indian inhabitants, paralleling the efforts of the writers on the coast. Gonzalo Zaldumbide’s early novel Egloga trágica [Tragic Elegy], written in 1910–11 and finally published as a novel in 1956, shows little sympathy for the Indian; Agustín Cueva characterizes it as a “swan song” of the ruling landowner class. However, literary interest in the Indian was heightened by the powerful sociological analysis written by Pío Jaramillo Alvarado, El indio ecuatoriano, 192.2, [The Ecuadorian Indian]. Jorge Icaza’s Huasipungo, 1934 (The Villagers) depicted the government official, priest, and landowner as oppressors of the Indian, much as did Fernando Chávez in a previous novel. The crude vocabulary and brutal descriptions of living conditions common to Icaza’s style are occasionally relieved by passages of intense lyricism adapted from the Quichua oral tradition, as when Andrés mourns the death of his wife. Icaza’s novel, despite its pessimistic theme, was enormously successful and inspired many imitators. Alfonso Barrera Valverde’s lyrical novel Dos muertes en una vida, 1971 [Two Deaths in One Life] moves beyond the indigenous theme to depict the campesino of indigenous heritage who leaves the countryside to obtain a university degree and thus contemplates a new identity as a mestizo of Indian and Spanish heritage. It is possible that indigenous narrative and poetry will be infused with new insights, given heightened cultural consciousness among Indians and the successful protest marches coordinated by CONAIE (the Confederation of Indigenous Nations of Ecuador) in 1990 and 1992. For instance, Ariruma Kowii, a native of Otavalo, recently has published two books of Quechua poetry.

The Esmeraldas province has inspired both Adalberto Ortiz (Juyungo, 1934) and Nelson Estupiñán Bass’s Cuando los guayacanes florecieron, 1954 [When the Guayacan Trees Bloomed] to portray the traditional rhythms and lyrics of the African Ecuadorian population along with narratives of social unrest and a quest for equality. Antonio Preciado’s poetry, reflective of Esmeraldas, has received numerous prizes and is widely translated. Laura Hidalgo has collected and analyzed the traditional décimas, popular verses sung in the northwestern coastal cities of Ecuador.

While much of Ecuadorian literature takes a long, hard look at social injustice and economic hardship, there is a significant body of work that departs from this theme. In disseminating the writings of Henri Barbusse, Gabriele D’Annunzio and José Enrique Rodó, Gonzalo Zaldumbide provided the intellectual foundation for Ecuador’s generation of “decapitated” modernista poets of the turn of the century: Borja, Noboa Caamaño, Fierro, and Silva. Zaldumbide’s admiration for French literature and culture is paralleled in Alfredo Gangotena’s work, written primarily in French. Well received by Jean Cocteau, Max Jacob and Tristan Tzara, Gangotena’s poetry received wider dissemination with translations written by Gonzalo Escudero and Filoteo Samaniego (1956). Similarly, César Dávila Andrade, a member of the poetic literary circle called “Elán,” cultivated a personal and hermetic style, which ended with despair in his final years in Caracas. His poetry reflects a meditative contemplation of natural surroundings and the place of humans within it; however, in Boletín y elegía de las mitas, 1954 [Bulletin and Elegy of Work Gangs] he does engage in a more ideologically outspoken defense of the Indian.

In the 1920s and 1930s, the vanguardist manifestos published in literary magazines articulated the esthetic and social concerns of many writers. Decidedly modern illustrations, innovative typography, and audacious Modernist themes distinguish the internationally-oriented Guayaquil magazines of the 1920s (Savia, Los hermes, Singulus). Unfortunately, Motocicleta [Motorbike], a key magazine of these years, has not yet turned up (1996) despite intensive research. Among its contributors was Hugo Mayo; El zaguan de aluminio, 1982 [The Aluminum Vestibule] recovers some of his provocative vanguardist poetry. Often, these publications focused on regional issues. In Loja, Hontanar, 1931 [Hontanar] and Bloque, 1935 [Block] emphasized indigenous themes under the guidance of Carlos Manuel Espinosa, while G. Humberto Mata in Cuenca wrote poems laced with Quechua words for Mañana, 1928 [Tomorrow]. In Quito, Lampadario changed its name to Elán in 1932, yet the orientation of the journal was steadfast. In 1931 their stated objective was “To make art out of its social function, extracting it from our own reality.” Nervio (1934) was the organ of the socialist writers of A.N.D.E.S in Quito. Despite the activity of these literary circles, Jorge Icaza remained unattached to any group while Jorge Carrera Andrade’s essays and poetry were eagerly sought by these periodicals.

Pablo Palacio was one of the first writers to capture the fragmentation of Ecuadorian society. In fact, some critics laud Palacios as a precursor of vanguardism and the founder of Ecuadorian literature, assertions much debated by Agustín Cueva. A glance at the titles of his brief narratives reveal the psychologically oriented, subjective themes that characterize his work: Un hombre muerto a puntapies, 1927 [A Man Kicked to Death], Vida del ahorcado, 1932 [Life of a Hanged Man], along with Deborah (1927). This self-reflexiveness allows him to address the central questions of literary representation, although this same piercing inquiry causes significant disruptions in a coherent narrative framework. Eschewing regional stereotypes, Palacio decenters reality and presents a universal dilemma, according to Patricia Varas: “What we end up with is one individual, alone, encapsuled in a cement block.”

As in the 19th century, the question of identity surfaces in contemporary Ecuadorian literature and essay. With the creation of the Casa de la Cultura (the Ecuadorian Cultural Endowment) in 1944, selected writers and artists have received national recognition and funding. However, in the 1960s, writers and critics proposed an alternative model for the legitimization of culture in the nation. The Frente Cultural (Cultural Front) challenged the official line in their journals La bufanda del sol [The Muffler of the Sun] and Pucuna [Blowgun]. Members of this collective, Raúl Pérez Torres and Ivan Egüez, with dazzling narrative techniques closely evaluated their society. They both highlight political events in their narratives—the massacre of sugar mill workers in 1977 and the aftermath of the Peruvian invasion in the time of Galo Plaza—with consciously crafted prose. Pérez, recipient of three prizes for narrative, uses stream of consciousness and multiple narrators in first/second/third persons to mock bourgeois conventions. Egüez in La Linares, 1975 [The Linares Woman] contrasts the official government version of events with the gossipy whisper of testimony from the masses. In poetry, Ulises Estrella’s Peatón de Quito, 1994 [Footsteps through Quito] is a demythifying glance at Ecuadorian history, along with Humberto Vinueza’s Un gallinazo cantor bajo un sol de a perro, 1970 [A Buzzard Singer Beneath A Scorching Sun].

In recent poetry and narrative, the everyday language of life is exalted. Julio Pazo’s prizewinning book of poetry, Levantamiento del país con textos libres, 1982 [A Bettering of the Country Through Free Texts] emphasizes Andean foods (“sancocho” soup with its common ingredient, potatoes) and popular culture (the singer Carlota Jaramillo), while Euler Granda includes dialog recovered from the sounds of the city, recast in poetic form (Poemas con piel de oveja, 1993 [Poems in Sheepskin]. Women writers also observe their surroundings and are not silent about controversial topics such as abortion (Laura Pérez’s Sangre en las manos, 1959 [Blood on One’s Hands], lesbianism and rape (the short stories of Eugenia Viteri), the confusion of mestizaje (creolization) in Mary Corylé, and subversions of sexual categories (the title story of Lucrecia Maldonado’s No es el amor quien muere, 1994 [It’s Not Love Who Dies]. Currently, the literary group Mujeres del Atico (Women of Atico) has attracted attention through their sponsorship of cultural events and their newspaper editorials published in El Telegráfo (The Telegraph, Guayaquil). Cecilia Ansaldo Briones is one of the participants. Her anthology of Ecuadorian short stories Cuento contigo, 1993 [I’m Counting on You] is a useful guide to the genre and her critical essays are always insightful.

Television has encouraged an appreciation of Ecuadorian themes with the airing of a mini-series based on Cumandá and “La Tigra” (The Tiger). In addition, the publication of “Clásicos Ariel” (Ariel Classics) and Colección Antares (the Antares Collection) has made Olmedo, Mera, and Icaza (as well as other writers) available in low cost, mass-produced editions with excellent critical commentary appended. As in many nations, appropriations to the humanities have been slashed and therefore publications have been curtailed. Nevertheless, Cultura, the journal of the Central Bank of Ecuador, continues to provide insightful commentary as does the new magazine Kipus [Incan Knots], published by the Andean University Simon Bolívar. With the continuing sponsorship of regional workshops, the Casa de la Cultura (Ecuadorian Cultural Endowment) is providing a venue for little-known but gifted writers. Thus, literature and the arts may begin to reflect the multicultural society so often mentioned in the speeches of presidents Borja and Sixto Durán in recent years.

REGINA HARRISON

Further Reading

Carvajal, Ivan, et al., Historia, cultura y política en el Ecuador, Quito, Ecuador: El Conejo, 1988 Carrasco, Adrian, et al., Estado, nación y cultura. Los proyectos históricos en el Ecuador, Cuenca, Ecuador: IDIS, Universidad de Cuenca, 1988 — Sobre nuestra ambigüedad cultural, Quito, Ecuador: Editorial Universitaria, 1974
— Literatura y conciencia histórica en America Latina, Quito, Ecuador: Planeta, 1993 — Incursiones en el mundo literario del Ecuador, Guayaquil: Universidad de Guayaquil, 1987
— Sobre el ensayo ecuatoriano contemporáneo, Quito: Banco Central, 1988 [Includes Cumandá; Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda; Huasipungo; several works by Aguilera Malta]
Tinajero, Fernando, De la evasion al desencanto, Quito, Ecuador: El Conejo, 1983 [Iconoclastic response to Ecuadorian letters]
— Aproximaciones y distancias, Quito, Ecuador: Planeta, 1986
Rodríguez Castelo, Hernán, Lírica ecuatoriana contemporánea, 2 vols, Quito, Ecuador: Círculo de Lectores, 1979

Special Issues of Journals
Casa de las Américas, Havana, 127 (July—August 1981)
Revista Iberoamericana 144–45 (July-December 1988)

Jorge Edwards 1931-

Chilean prose writer

By tradition, Latin American intellectuals are often granted or assume diplomatic posts. With this in mind, it is not surprising to discover that Jorge Edwards joined the Chilean Ministry of Foreign Relations in 1960. Edwards, by then a recognized short-story writer, became the first diplomatic representative to be sent to Cuba by the Allende government. This brief and stormy appointment of only three and a half months culminated in his enforced resignation and departure from Cuba. The experience marked a turning point in Edwards’s career as a writer since it provoked him into writing the work for which he is perhaps best known, Persona non grata. Work on this book began in early 1971, continued in Paris, and was completed in Spain toward the end of 1973. Within five months of its publication, this historical chronicle or testimony, which Edwards describes as “a non-fiction political novel” of post-revolutionary Cuba had sold out two editions.
Persona non grata sets itself apart from other social documents of the period, since it chronicles social repression from the viewpoint of the artist who speaks his conscience in a police state. Since the work is, in part, the autobiography of an intellectual, it offers a richness of unique perspectives—a single authorial voice which calls upon other renowned figures to comment upon a multiplicity of related topics. Fidel Castro, of course, is an important figure in the narrative as are his brother Raúl, Che Guevara briefly, Salvador Allende, as well as a number of writers, such as Carlos Fuentes, Mario Vargas Llosa, Pablo Neruda and several Cuban ones. Indeed, the book’s publication resulted in a political scandal and intellectual debate in Latin America that caused Mario Vargas Llosa (by then hostile to Cuba) to comment that Edwards had “broke[n] the sacred taboo among intellectuals: the untouchability of the Cuban Revolution.” Persona non grata, although not limited to these topics, includes reflections on the following: Chile during the Allende years, socialism in Latin America, the role of the writer-diplomat, freedom of speech and conscience of the writer in the newly-formed society as he attempts to critique that society, the Chilean Revolution and the diverse interpretations of socialism taken by Cuba and Chile, charismatic leadership and its advantages and pitfalls, the plight of the artist in a repressive society, foreign intervention in Chilean and Cuban internal political affairs, the Latin American need for independence from foreign control and exploitation, and the fate of the bourgeoisie and the intelligentsia in Cuba. An openstructured, polyhistoric, or multi-perspective narrative, Persona non grata is replete with testimonial formats: chronicles, anecdotes, diary excerpts, self-reflections, rhetorical questions, personification, demythification, critical commentary, analysis, and synthesis. These forms of pseudofiction are presented as undisguised autobiography, often underscored through typographical variation or quotation marks in the text. The work placed Edwards in a type of “literary exile” from those of his peers who, like Julio Cortázar, still supported the Cuban Revolution. This sector of the Left condemned the book, and mass demonstrations ensued at the work’s publishing houses in Germany and France. Edwards was harshly criticized and isolated from his contemporaries both in their native countries and those living abroad in exile. The publication of this book, more than any of his other writings, was to have a lasting impact on Jorge Edwards the man and the writer. It was at this point that Edwards began to question the role of the intellectual in the political affairs of the state, particularly as they relate to artistic creation. In short, the demarcation between literary creation and testimonial or historical accounts, between fiction and reality, became even further narrowed with the publication of Persona non grata.

As regards Edwards’s other prose works—namely his short story collections and novels—they are characterized by autobiographical elements and a lyrical mood, together with social criticism, particularly of the Chilean middle class. In the epigraph to his short story “Adiós, Luisa,” Edwards reveals his “symphonic” approach to his craft: “The writer is a public researcher: he alters what he begins, stubborn and unfaithful, he is unfamiliar with anything else but this single artistry: that of themes and their variations.” His themes in these shorter narratives generally are the product of his own experiences placed in a social context: childhood, solitude, lack of communication, and, most significantly, an existentialist focus on sociopolitical, familial, and cosmic order. Revolution-counterrevolution, order-disorder, harmony-disharmony in all their personal and social manifestations are examined repeatedly in Edwards’s narratives. These existentialist themes of self and society of the so-called Generation of 1950 group of writers of which Jorge Edwards is considered a member, are most apparent in his short story collections El patio, Gente de la ciudad [City Folk] and Las máscaras [Masks] and his novel El peso de la noche [The Weight of the Night]. The writers of this group share an intellectual curiosity for the works of Camus, Kafka, Proust, Jean-Paul Sartre and an artistic appreciation of the poetic works of fellow Chileans Vicente Huidobro and Pablo Neruda. Their protest in the form of “peaceful anarchy” exposes social ills in their literary works through a variety of styles. Jorge Edwards’s works of social realism focus on autobiographical themes with a sharp criticism of bureaucracy and middle-class decadence and loss of values. His works portray an authoritarian Chilean society operating on rigid norms which place sanctions on personal rebellion and individual freedoms. All the while Edwards creates a subtle poetic mood, despite his biting censure. Just as Edwards’s experimentation with new narrative techniques of time and simultaneity and the limits between reality and fantasy are apparent in later works, a sense of “time lost” in the Proustian sense provides the backdrop to his short stories and novels. As figures resigned to empty, ritualistic, and sordid lives, many of his characters incapable of enduring the pain of their suffering or of altering their lives, seek escape in alcoholism, denial, and fantasy. The themes of bourgeois decadence and decaying conservatism are recurrent concerns in all of his works. Social, political and moral order are sharply contrasted with disorder, adventure, and individual and social excesses; familial degeneration becomes a reflection of social disintegration. Edwards portrays alcoholics as examples of social degeneration and believes that alcohol is the “opium of the Chilean people” that has become an integral part of all facets of societal interactions.

Like García Márquez, Edwards was entertained by the stories of an older person (his mother) as a child. Indeed, the strong female characters prevalent in some of his works are fictional counterparts to this maternal figure—the grandmother Cristina in El peso de la noche; the protagonist of La mujer imaginaria [The Imaginary Woman] varied characters in Los convidados de piedra [The Stone Guests]. The artistry in the prolific writings of Jorge Edwards perhaps lies most in his ability to blend the personal with the social, the anecdotal with the historical, and the real with the imaginary. His recently developed interest in the historical novel is a testimony to his diverse stylistic talents in this regard. Throughout his narrative career Jorge Edwards has never lost sight of his national heritage. Regardless of his travels abroad, Edwards’s major concern is an almost sociological study of the Chilean people, their personal lives and social interactions, their impact upon individual lives (such as the novelist’s own life), as well as the profound effect of class and group dynamics on the nation as a whole in its pendulum movements to embrace different degrees and forms of order from social revolution to military dictatorship to a restoration of democratic rule.

ELENA DE COSTA

See also entry on Testimonial Writing

Biography

Born in Santiago de Chile, 29 July 1931. Relatives were owners of the important daily newspaper El Mercurio to which he contributed for a time. Educated by Jesuits at the Colegio de San Ignacio de Santiago preparatory school; studied Law and Philosophy at the University of Chile where he came in contact with a number of writers and poets. Received law degree in 1958; studied Political Science at Princeton University, New Jersey, a year later. Foreign political appointments include: 1960, secretary of Chilean embassy and representative for European affairs (as Chilean delegate to General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, otherwise known as GATT), served in Paris; 1962, named Secretary to the Chilean Ambassador in France and to the European Common Market (Brussels); 1967, Advisor for Cultural Affairs and Chairman of Department for Eastern European Affairs in Chile (Ministry of Foreign Relations); 1970, attaché to Chilean embassy in Lima, Peru, and first diplomatic representative of Salvador Allende’s socialist government in Havana, Cuba, at the end of the same year; 1971, enforced departure from his post in Havana; subsequently sent to Paris to assist the Chilean ambassador, Pablo Neruda, in the capacity of Advisory Minister; 1973, expelled from the diplomatic corps by General Augusto Pinochet. Political views are currently expressed as President of the Committee for Freedom of Expression of the Chilean Commission on Human Rights. In 1980 Edwards was accepted into the Chilean Academy of the Language. In 1985 he assumed teaching posts in the United States at the University of Fort Collins, Colorado and Vanderbilt University in Nashville, Tennessee.

Selected Works

Short Fiction
- El patio, Santiago de Chile: Carmel Soria, 1952
- Gente de la ciudad, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1961
- Las máscaras, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1967

Novels
- El peso de la noche, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1964
- Los convidados de piedra, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1978
- La mujer imaginaria, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1985
- Fantasmas de carne y hueso, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1993

Testimonial Writing

Other Writings

Compilations and Anthologies
José María Eguren 1874–1942

Peruvian poet

Alongside the work of César Vallejo, that of José María Eguren is the other literary landmark critics refer to in discussions about modern poetry in Peru. In the introduction to his Antología de la poesía peruana, 1965 [Anthology of Peruvian Poetry], in which he traces a history of the poetic tendencies of this century, Alberto Escobar calls them the “founders” of the tradition.

Eguren’s first poems appeared in 1899, during the great social changes of the western world at the end of the century. His first book was published a few years before World War I, a period which saw the close of the belle époque and the expansion of the society of masses. In contrast with these agitated years, Eguren lived a life isolated from the artistic milieu of his era, his few contacts with other writers were, nevertheless, fundamental. He established friendships with authors of earlier and later generations, predominantly with those representing dissonant voices in a conservative environment. His friendship and interaction with Manuel González Prada, José Carlos Mariátegui and Martín Adán testify to his knowledge of the literature of his contemporaries and his immersion in the aesthetic preoccupations of his time. In his works, Eguren assembles the... different ways in which Spanish American Modernismo and European poetry give form to the definitive universal expansion of capitalism and of bourgeois values.

Eguren’s biographers have underlined the importance of his childhood in the outskirts of Lima, the city where he was born, as well as the years he spent living by the sea. These circumstances have been used by his critics to explain the poet’s constant inclination toward nature and his detailed contemplation of the rural landscape and Lima’s foggy coastal shores.

Eguren’s style is most certainly sensorial and meticulous to the point of miniaturization. With regard to sound, his verses create a refined musicality. The use of synesthesia and a rich vocabulary contribute to this effect, as one can appreciate in the initial lines of the poem “Avatara” from his collection La canción de las figuras, 1916 [The Song of Figures], “Sweet Orpheons were echoing…/The lamplighter painted/a violet evening star,/and we saw crystal sadness on the balconies.” Visually, Eguren’s images are unstable, mysterious, surrounded by scenery full of vagueness and crepuscular shadows. Eguren also draws upon Nordic mythological imagery to create poetic scenographies for memorable characters, such as, for example, those that appear in the texts “Los reyes rojos” [The Red Kings], “Syhna la blanca” [Syhna, the White One], “La tarda” [The She-Evening] or “La niña de la lámpara azul” [The Girl with the Blue Lamp]. The predominance of sensorial images; an interest in nature and the sea; the title of his first volume, Simbólicas, 1911 [Symbolics]; and elements reminiscent of Charles Baudelaire and Edgar Allan Poe, have permitted a Symbolist reading of his work. The voice of Eguren imposes itself subtly and full of suggestion as, for example, at the end of the poem “El bote viejo” [The Old Boat], from his collection Sombra, 192,9 [Shadow]: “And in the depths of the night, /on a delicate glistening wave,/the dying boat departed/towards faraway ports.”

The critics never cease to mention Poe—a poet with whom Eguren was certainly familiar—in many of the readings of the Peruvian’s work. There are, in fact, numerous common elements between the two writers: medieval and gothic settings, speculative wanderings, hair-raising situations, an atmosphere of death, an infantile tone and rigorous formality, among others. Eguren eclectically appropriated whatever he might need. These same elements are also shared by the Bolivian poet Ricardo Jaimes Freyre, his contemporary. But the previous comparisons are sustained, especially if the analysis goes beyond thematics and stylistic tools, paying special attention to the “founding” function these poets played in the cultural life of their nations, undergoing a move from an aristocratic rural society to a democratic industrial society.

Contemporary commentators on Poe, William Carlos Williams and T.S. Eliot, for example, have emphasized the “originality” of Poe’s work (as being novel and creating space for novelty) in the English language. Just as Poe is a cultural founder of the first modern project of a democratic, industrial and capitalist nation, Eguren plays a similar role in the formation of a modern nationality in Peru. The complex imagery created by these writers consists of people, places and settings that have not previously existed anywhere, neither spatially nor temporally, the origins of which reside in language itself. This new type of poetic language, that has marked the western poetry of the 20th century, possesses forms and contents that capture the readers’ attention. The poem is no longer a stylized or ornamented reflection of an already existing reality. The language signals the artificial nature of the poem as a work of art that proposes to sustain itself on its own, without being obliged to reflect or to reproduce any previously known reality. The geography, the setting, the protagonists and the objects of this poetry have vague contours making them unrecognizable. Eguren’s poetry proposes to broaden the reader’s parameters of perception, thus allowing a new consideration of sensory reality, a type of modern “consciousness.”

These poetics precede the reorganization of the world at the beginning of the 20th-century when, along with industrial production and mass society, wars are carried out which result in the redefining of territories and the determining of economic relationships between the modern nations. It is in light of this context that the characters of Eguren’s poetry are animated, as in the poem “El caballo” [The Horse], where this figure, killed in “an ancient battle,” “At the leaden corner/of the barricade,/with empty eyes/and with horror, comes to halt. //Later its slow steps/are heard/along deserted roads,/and ruinous town squares.” The atmosphere of infantile evocations, decadence and disintegration in Eguren’s poems, is an expression that accompanies a process of modernization that has two faces: military destruction and the promise of technological progress. The contemplation of nature as well as the treatment of childhood take on particular importance in the works of Eguren, especially if one considers that these refer to the experience of the years of the Pacific War (1879–83), Chilean military occupation and the biggest economic crisis in 19th-century Peru. At the end of the war, Eguren’s family left the hacienda where they lived in the outskirts of Lima, and moved to the town of Barranco, on the shores of the Pacific. This town and the neighboring beach resort of Chorrillos were residential zones ransacked and burned by the occupying troops.

Along with his literary work in verse, Eguren left a series of texts in prose that were collected and published posthumously under the title Motivos estéticos, 1959 [Aesthetic Motives]. In these he elaborates his ideas on art, poetry, and the manner in which the artist gives form to modernity. Eguren sees the poet as one who “guides his contemporaries toward civilization,” saying also that: “The poet should consecrate his artistic aptitudes toward breaking through the limits reached up to that time, if this is not achieved he will remain there; but under no circumstances is he allowed to turn his head because the defeated will defeat him.” Eguren’s conception of modernity finds its roots in the “specialized” work of the writer, which he understands as the person who dedicates himself to the production of new forms of language and interpretations of his world.

The work of Eguren also includes painting and photography. His watercolors develop themes and depict environments similar to those found in his poetry. In photography, Eguren was a dedicated technician who constructed miniature cameras and experimented with microfilm.

Those active in the circuit of cultural propagation in Peru chose to shun Eguren who, therefore, was valued by only a few of his contemporaries. Now he is considered one of the most difficult and fascinating writers of Spanish America. Even with Modernismo and avant-garde in the past, his work still offers unexplored facets for his critics.

Luis REBAZA-SORALUZ

Biography

Born in Lima, Peru, 7 July 1874. Brought up with seven siblings on an estate near Lima. Happy childhood in close proximity with nature. Educated at Jesuit school, La Inmaculada, in Lima.
After the death of his parents, he moved to Barranco (then a small village close to Lima) with his two unmarried sisters, Susana and Angélica. Began to publish poetry in magazines in 1899. Took up painting and photography. Published poetry in Mariátegui’s journal, Amauta (see entry on José Carlos Mariátegui). Lived a retired life with his sisters until his patrimony ran out around 1928. Moved house and obtained employment as librarian in Ministry of Education. Health declined and he died in Lima, April 1942.

Selected Works

Poetry
Poesías, Lima: Biblioteca Amauta, 1929 [Contains Simbólicas, 1911; La canción de las figuras, 1916; Sombra and Rondinelas]

Prose
Motivos estéticos: notas sobre el arte y la naturaleza, Lima: Universidad Nacional Mayor de San Marcos, 1959

Compilations and Anthologies
Poesías escogidas, selected by Manuel Scorza, with an introduction by José Carlos Mariátegui, Lima: Patronato del Libro Peruano, 1957
Obras completas, edited by Ricardo Silva-Santisteban, Lima: Mosca Azul, 1974

Further Reading
Higgins, James, Hitos de la poesía peruana, Lima: Milla Batres, 1993 [Chapter I is on Eguren]
Mariátegui, José Carlos, “Eguren,” in his Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, Lima: Amauta, 1928; as Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality, translated by Marjory Urquidi, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971
Ortega, Julio, José María Eguren, Lima: Editorial Universitaria, 1965 Silva-Santisteban, Ricardo (editor), José María Eguren: aproximaciones y perspectivas, Lima: Universidad del Pacifico, 1977

El Salvador

19th- and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry
The literary history of El Salvador is characterised by two salient features: small clusters of writers who stand out like beacons among their contemporaries and the critical, often tragic nexus between literature and politics throughout its embattled history since Central American independence in 1821. This general framework for surveying modern Salvadoran literature yields three immediate insights. First, with very few exceptions, El Salvador’s literary canon does not seem to have left behind many significant schools or movements. Second, as if in confirmation of Carlos Fuentes’s thesis that in history “centuries” are not to be measured in years but by epochs, Salvadorean history—including that of its literary development since independence—falls into three clear-cut periods: a very long 19th century until the Great Massacre of 1932; a very short 20th century from 1932 to the signing of the Peace Accords of 1992, and since then the possibility, at least, of a New Dawn of political reconciliation. Third, because the novel, as Georg Lukács has argued, is quintessentially a bourgeois genre, and El Salvador has to this day remained trapped at a feudal stage of development, the country has produced very few novelists, or for that matter, novels of note. Poetry has in fact been the principal genre, with important contributions in areas such as the short story, the essay, literary journalism, literary criticism and, to a much lesser extent, theatre.

Among the poets who flourished in the first fifty years after independence, the most prominent was Miguel Álvarez Castro (1795–1856). He wrote patriotic and pastoral verse, his best known compositions being “Al ciudadano José del Valle” [Ode to José del Valle, Citizen] and “A la muerte del Coronel Pierzon” [Upon the Death of Colonel Pierzon]. Another important name is that of José Batres Montúfar (1809–44), the “Salvadorean Leopardi,” and one of the principal links between Neoclassicism and Romanticism in Central America. Apart from his lyrical poetry in the madrigal or elegiac manner, Batres Montúfar is also remembered for his Tradiciones de Guatemala (1845), evocative short stories and verses about life, courtship and intrigue in the colonial era.

A Spanish poet from Santander, the florid and grandiloquent Fernando Velarde, spent some time in El Salvador in the 1870s, bringing with him his Cánticos del Nuevo Mundo, 1860 [Songs from the New World], a collection which helped to ignite the romantic imagination in the republic. Inspired by the currents of passion, liberty and pantheism flowing from Europe, Salvadorean Romantics sang principally of the self, love and country. Among the leading exponents of Romantic verse were Juan J. Cañas (1826–1918), who penned the national anthem; Francisco E. Galindo (1850–96), whose “sonorous thought” and “words of gilded rose” were praised by Rubén Darío; and Antonia Galindo (1858–93), the first woman poet of renown, whose verses combined personal feeling with a universal sympathy, as exemplified in “A mi madre” [To My Mother]. A significant development during this period was the first regular appearance of literary criticism in the cultural pages of the country’s newspapers. Joaquín Méndez (1868–1942) founded La Juventud [Youth], a society of scientific and literary enquiry, which published a monthly journal, La Juventud Salvadoreña [Salvadorean Youth], in its heyday in the 1890s. The literary and cultural revival taking place towards the end the 1800s was given a significant fillip by the foundation of the National Library in 1870, the establishment of the Academy of Language in 1876, and the creation of the Academy of Science and Literature in 1888, which for a brief period published a monthly journal, Repertorio Salvadoreño [Salvadorean Index], Some of the leading intellectuals in the country wrote for Repertorio Salvadoreño, which also attracted contributions by international names of the calibre of Ricardo Palma, Julián del Casal and Rubén Darío.

In 1882 Modernismo (Spanish American Modernism) made a grand entrance in the field of Salvadorean letters via Francisco Gavidia, who introduced Rubén Darío himself to the revolutionary application of the rhythms of the French Alexandrine to Spanish verse. Gavidia (1863 or 1865–1955) is in fact the first major figure in the history of Salvadorean literature, his output in poetry, drama, philology, the essay and fiction spanning almost eighty years. It is, however, as a modernist and epic poet that Gavidia excelled, and such compositions as his translation of Victor Hugo’s “Stella,” “La ofrenda del bramán” [The Brahman’s Offering], “La defensa de Pan” [In Defence of Pan], and “Sóteer o tierra de preseas” [The Saviour or The Land of Jewels] are worthy of inclusion in any anthology of Spanish verse. Although capable of extreme exoticism, Gavidia was also responsive to his time and place in history: he could sing just as easily of fauns, princesses and swans as of the native senzontle, the Indian maiden Xochitl or the clay figurines of the Christ of Esquipulas. His poems may narrate the deeds of Apollo, Orpheus and Euridice but they also celebrate the cause of liberty embodied in national heroes like Francisco Morazán and José Matías Delgado. His interest in autochthonous Salvadorean themes is also evident in his dramatic works, especially in La princesa Cavek, 1913(?) [Princess Cavek] and Cuento de marinos, 1947 [Seafarers’ Tale]. He excelled as a writer of short fiction, his most impressive collection being Cuentos y narraciones, 1947 [Stories and Tales], in which he skilfully blends personal memory and national history. He wrote his own epitaph in the final verses of “Turris Babel”: “¡Poeta!/Tú de nuevo edifica/No la torre …el idioma” (Poet! Your task is to rebuild not the tower but language).

A small but impressive list of writers, mainly poets, joined Gavidia in the late 1800s and early 1900s in creating a modern Salvadorean literary tradition, among them the two Romantics par excellence, José Calixto Mixco (1880–1901) and Armando Rodríguez Portillo (1880–1905), whose melancholy verses presaged their early deaths by suicide. Carlos Bustamante (1890–1952), a follower of Dario, in his early years wrote sonorous verses redolent of modernista colour and panache. During this period the beginning of a modern Salvadorean theatre was also forged, with plays by J. Emilio Aragón (1887–1938) and José Llerena (1895–1943). However, the only figure to rival Gavidia in stature was Alberto Masferrer (1868–1932), who exerted a profound influence nationally through a series of moral and philosophical treatises based on an eccentric brand of Tolstoyan Christianity, oriental mysticism, theosophy and parapsychology, and which he applied in magisterial fashion to Salvadorean reality. Written in a polished, clear, poetic style, his main publications included Las siete cuerdas de la lira, 1926 [The Seven Strings of the Lyre], El dinero maldito, 1927 [Wretched Money] and El minimum vital, 1929 [Life’s Minimum]. He dabbled in poetry and theatre, and he wrote a novel, Una vida en el cine [A Life in the Cinema], with a feminist theme. In 1926 he founded a newspaper, Patria, a section of which, “Vivir,” showcased the work of up-and-coming writers. As a literary critic he encouraged the imitation of the French masters, but warned that European models should be read creatively and critically in the search for an original Salvadorean voice, thus anticipating Alejo Carpentier’s quest for an autochthonous identity for Latin America via its European heritage. By lending his name and prestige to the candidature of the Labour Party’s Arturo Araujo in the presidential elections of 1929–30, Masferrer sealed his political fate. He ended his life a sad and broken man two years later during the barbarous regime of Maximiliano H. Martínez, the antithesis of everything Masferrer stood for intellectually and politically.

The most important literary movement in El Salvador following the golden years of Modernismo was costumbrismo [literature of manners and customs], embodied in prose by Arturo Ambrogi (1875–1936) and by José María Peralta Lagos (1873–1944), and in poetry by Alfredo Espino (1900–28). A precocious talent who began his career as an obsessive modernist nicknamed “la Señorita Azul” [The Blue Miss], Ambrogi later found another and more lasting voice as the verbal painter of El Salvador’s rural spirit. In his most famous book, El libro del trópico, 1918 [The Book of the Tropics], in a series of short stories and vignettes, he combines impressionistic brushstrokes to describe the countryside with an authentic feel for the nuances and registers of Salvadorean Spanish. On occasions he manages to enter the consciousness of his humble characters and to penetrate the depths of their hearts, as in the case of “Bruno,” a tale of a campesino’s (peasant’s) thwarted love. Ambrogi also won further acclaim for his travel book, Sensaciones de Japón y de China, 1915 [Impressions of Japan and China]. Peralta Lagos, alias T.P. Mechin, wrote two famous books, Burlando, 1923 [Mocking the Mocked] and Brochazos [Brushstrokes], festive descriptions of Salvadorean customs and types. He also wrote a short novel, Doctor Gonorréitigorrea (1926), a satire of Salvadorean society and the play Candidato [Candidate], a satire of the presidential campaign of 1930–31 that was to have such dire consequences for Salvadorean history. Ambrogi and Peralta had their poetic counterpart in Alfredo Espino, long-since regarded as El Salvador’s national poet. His posthumous volume, Jícaras tristes [Cups of Sadness], full of a gentle, nostalgic love of country, have become compulsory reading for Salvadorean expatriates and exiles.

Times of great political convulsion and moral disturbance, according to Mario Vargas Llosa, tend to provide a stimulus for literary creativity—and this is exactly what occurred in El Salvador following the Great Slaughter of 1932, when General Martínez ordered the massacre of about four per cent of the population in order to save the country from an alleged Communist insurrection. For the next fifteen years or so a brilliant nucleus of intellectuals did not so much oppose, as offer passive resistance, to the military-oligarchical regime in command. Among creative writers the doyen was undoubtedly Salarrué (pen name for Salvador Salazar Arrué, 1899–1975). Beginning his career as a novelist with El Cristo negro, 1922, [The Black Christ], and ending it as a poet with the collection Mundo nomasito, 1975 [My Little World], Salarrué earned international acclaim for his book of regionalist short stories, Cuentos de barro, 1933 [Clay Stories], some of which have become Salvadorean classics, such as “Somos malos” [We’re Evil] and “La repunta” [The Flood]. A confirmed theosophist and a master of narrative technique, as well as possessing an incomparable ear for the sounds and rhythms of Salvadorean Spanish, Salarrué manages to impart to his stories an air of magic and superstition that antedates the magical realism of subsequent generations. He also wrote Cuentos de cipotes, 1945 [Kids’ Stories], a highly original collection of stories about children for children and adults narrated in an eccentric style that seeks to imitate the playful, cheeky, sometimes incomprehensible voice of Salvadorean cipotes (urchins or kids) talking to each other.

A number of fine poets of multifarious hues and tendencies participated in the literary renaissance heralded by Salarrué. Claudia Lars (pseudonym for Carmen Brannon, 1899–1974) is not only considered El Salvador’s outstanding woman poet, but also the country’s foremost lyrical voice, comparable in quality to Gabriela Mistral and Alfonsina Storni. Her best known collections of this period are Estrellas en el pozo, 1934 [Stars in the Well], Romances del norte y sur, 1947 [Ballads of the North and the South] and Sonetos (1947). Like Salarrué, she continued writing until the end of her life, but even as El Salvador plunged ever deeper into fratricidal conflict, Claudia Lars never lost sight of of her country’s place in the universal scheme of things, as demonstrated by Nuestro pulsante mundo, 1969 [Our Pulsating World], in which she responds with eyes of wonder to Paul McCartney and to the conquest of space. Throughout his long life Vicente Rosales y Rosales (1894–1980) wrote varied poetry of cosmic, mythological and mystic themes, but is best remembered for a collection with the eccentric title of Eutorpologia Politalonal, 1938 [From Euterpe, the Muse of Music and Lyric Poetry, Logos and Polytonal], in which he applied a personal theory of comparative theory and music to versification. In the 1940s, Lydia Valiente (1900–76) wrote poetry about her intensely felt proletarian ideals, while Serafín Quiteño (1899–1952) produced one outstanding collection, Corasón con S, 1941 [Heart written with an S], that conveys powerfully felt emotions.

Among novelists two names stand out in Salarrués generation: Alberto Rivas Bonilla (1891–?) and Miguel Angel Espino (1902–68). In 1936 Rivas Bonilla published Andanzas y malandanzas [Adventures and Misadventures], a picaresque tale of the trials and tribulations of canine life in rural El Salvador; whether it is an allegory of existence in the dehumanising environment of the time is for the reader to determine. Espino, on the other hand, is remembered for two novels, Trenes, 1940 [Trains] and Hombres contra la muerte, 1947 [Men against Death]. Written in the style of a fictional autobiography, Trenes makes compelling reading for two reasons: it is an ode to woman in her multiple avatars (virgin, mother, courtesan, goddess), as well as a metanovel anticipating the self-conscious narratives of the post-boom. Hombres contra la muerte, by contrast, is a novel of the jungle inspired by José Eustasio Rivera’s La vorágine, 1924 (The Vortex). Highly praised for its power and lyricism, it denounces the exploitation of forest workers in Belize. One other figure stands out during this traumatic period of El Salvador’s history: Alberto Guerra-Trigueros (1898–1950), one of the most influential intellectuals of his generation. Owner and director of Patria and a disciple of Masferrer, Guerra-Trigueros used his newspaper as a tribune to denounce imperialism in Central America and dictatorship in El Salvador. He published Poesía versus Arte, 1942 [Poetry versus Art] and El libro, el hombre y la cultura, 1948 [The Book, Man and Culture], in which he expounded his humanistic views on art and culture. Guerra-Trigueros, more than anybody else, paved the way for the next generation of committed writers who were to rise to prominence following the so-called “revolution of 1948.”

Between 1948 and 1956 the promise of a new political and social deal was not fulfilled because of yet another period of authoritarian rule. Salvadorean intellectuals, many of whom had opposed the Martinez dictatorship, were prompted to express their anger and disenchantment, with poetry as their principal medium. Patriotic, irreverent, rebellious, iconoclastic, many of them forced into exile, they composed powerful verses denouncing social injustice and the cynicism of the Salvadorean establishment. “Monólogo en dos preguntas” [Monologue in the Form of Two Questions], by Antonio Gamero (1917–74), in which the poet is exalted as the singer of proletarian hopes and aspirations, and the suggestively titled 10 sonetos para mil y más obreros [10 Sonnets for a Thousand Workers and More], by Oswaldo Escobar Velado (1919–61), convey the aesthetic that lay at the heart of this kind of poetry in El Salvador. Pedro Geoffroy Rivas (1908–79) wrote his antibourgeois lament, “Vida, pasión y muerte del anti-hombre” [Life, Passion and Death of Anti-Man] in 1936–37 when he was in gaol in Mexico for anti-government activities, and it was to become the anthem for committed writers in El Salvador from the 1950s to the present. One of its verses, “¡Pobrecito poeta que era yo!” [What a Dud Poet I Was!] was to be immortalised by Roque Dalton in the title of his celebrated novel.

Not all Salvadorean intellectuals, however, have been politicised, with some notable figures refusing to have their creative work “contaminated” by what they have considered the stench of politics. Perhaps the outstanding representative of this school of thought was Raúl Contreras (1896–1973), a poet who had made an impression as far back as 1925 with La princesa está triste [The Princess is Sad], a play-in-verse glossing Rubén Darío’s renowned poem. Contreras found renewed fame in the late 1940s and in the 1950s as Lydia Nogales, the pseudonym he used to compose some of the most beautiful and perfectly crafted verses (especially sonnets) in the history of Salvadorean literature. Lydia’s mysterious, dream-like allure is captured in the sonnet “Inesperada” [The Unexpected One]: “Yo soy la Novia que jamás se entrega; corporal y sutil, cálida y fría, / que a sí misma se ignora todavía, / siendo principio y fin, alfa y omega.” (I am the unattainable bride, of flesh and yet subtle, warm and cold, I am she who doesn’t yet herself know, I am the beginning and the end, alpha and omega). By the mid-1950s the apparition of Lydia Nogales had split the Salvadorean literary establishment into two camps: the “pro-nogalists” who believed in an art of truth and beauty beyond politics, and the “antinogalists,” who, rejecting what they considered the view of the artist in an ivory tower, called for a new aesthetic built upon the music of hammers, saws and hoes. This division has in fact continued to condition and inform the outlook of creative writers in El Salvador throughout the succession of military and civilian presidents, juntas, dictators and the civil war that have racked the country since then.

An outstanding literary figure beyond politics was Hugo Lindo (1917–85), who, while suffering intensely the Salvadorean tragedy, chose to devote his creative energies to the task of preserving and continuing what he deemed the beauty of Latin America’s literary heritage in his war-torn country. As a poet, he wrote polished verses of metaphysical dimension with subtle transitions from the natural to the spiritual world. Some of his best poetry has been published in a bilingual edition by Elizabeth Gamble Miller (Sólo la voz/ Only the Voice, 1984). He is acknowledged as the pioneer of science fiction in El Salvador with the collection of short-stories Guaro y champán, 1947 [Liquor and Champagne], a genre he explored further in Espejos paralelos, 1974 [Parallel Mirrors]. His major novel, ¡Justicia, señor Gobernador! [Give us Justice, Mr Governor!], is a fine psychological study of a judge who, during the trial of a child murderer, reviews the country’s social and economic iniquities, coming to the scandalous conclusion that it is God who is guilty of the crime and all other crimes in El Salvador.

Hugo Lindo was also a literary critic who did much to dignify the profession in El Salvador, crowning his career in this area with a meticulous two-volume edition of the select works of Salarrué (1969–70). In a country where, outside the cultural pages of the principal newspapers (La Prensa Gráfica, El Diario de Hoy and Diario Latino) literary criticism has had scarce outlets and few professional practitioners, the outstanding critic has been Luis Gallegos Valdés (1917–?). The country’s most prolific and far-ranging critic, his masterpiece is Panorama de la literatura salvadoreña, 1981 [Panorama of Salvadorean Literature], which is obligatory reading for any scholar specialising in this field. Another outstanding critic is Matilde Elena López (1922–?), who has written numerous articles on poetry, her main publication being Estudios sobre poesía, 1970.
Edmundo Barbero contributed more than anybody to promote the appreciation and the study of theatre in El Salvador, and his Panorama del teatro en El Salvador, 1970 [Panorama of Theatre in El Salvador] is an invaluable volume.

From the mid-1950s to the present very few intellectuals in El Salvador have not been influenced by Sartre’s Existentialism, on the one hand, and Castro’s Revolution, on the other. The consequence has been the appearance of successive generations of committed writers, their degree of commitment ranging from the purely verbal, to the spiritual, to the ideological and in some extreme cases, to the militant. The moral leader for assuming commitment with one’s time and place in history was the historian, dramatist, editor and poet Italo López Vallecillos (1932-?). López Vallecillos utilises poetry sensitively as a vehicle to explore the depths of existential dilemmas in a godless milieu, as in these verses from “Arriba, Abajo,” 1954 [Up, Down]: “Y entre las nubes y el polvo/que camino, yo, el solitario, el hombre de la duda, sin Dios” (And between the clouds and the dust that I tread, go I, lonely, man of doubt, without God). López Vallecillos shows in his poetry that it is indeed possible to be a committed poet without blatant sloganeering, as does the playwright Walter Béneke (1928-) in Funeral Home, 1954, with its dramatic depiction of alienation in an absurd world.

The supreme model of revolutionary commitment in El Salvador was Roque Dalton (1935–75), for whom poetry was as militant an expression of the armed struggle as Che Guevara’s rifle. In his best-known and most admired collection, Taberna y otros lugares, 1969 [In a Tavern and Other Places], he explored the ineluctable nexus between poetry and politics, a subject over which he agonised and which he finally summarised with deceptive simplicity in “Arte Poética 1974”: Poesía/Perdóname por haberte ayudado a comprender/que no estás hecha sólo de palabras” (Poetry, forgive me for having helped you to understand that you are not made solely of words). Dalton was also an accomplished novelist, producing two important works, Miguel Mármol (1972), which set the tone for future testimonial narratives in Latin America, and ¡Pobrecito poeta que era yo!, 1976 [What a Dud Poet I Was!], a verbal and stylistic extravaganza in which the reader perceives the despair of a man seeking to find a justification for being a writer in a country like El Salvador: “¡Qué risa! Es terriblemente ridículo ser un escritor salvadoreño…” (What a joke! It’s horribly absurd to to be a Salvadorean writer …) It is no exaggeration to say that since Gavidia, no writer has left such an indelible influence in El Salvador, morally and creatively, as Dalton, whose tragic death at the hands of fellowCommunists brought to a premature end the life of one of the most talented writers Latin America has produced in the modern era.

Other writers of Dalton’s generation have produced works of diverse merit and sensibility. Roberto Araujo (1937–) earned fame in the 1960s as the poet of Chalatenango, the forgotten province of El Salvador, and he has also written a major play, Jugando a la gallina ciega, 1970 [Blind Man’s Bluff], which combines elements of the grotesque and of horror most effectively. Roberto Cea (1939–), a prolific and versatile writer, has written verses that range from the mythical and the magical in Todo el códice, 1968 [The Entire Codex], to the erotic in Mester de picardía, 1977 [The Picarosque Craft], to the political and historical in Los herederos de Farabundo, 1981 [Farabundo’s Heirs]. Alfonso Quijada Urías (1940–) is a poet who earned Dalton’s admiration for Estados sobrenaturales y otros poemas, 1971 [Supernatural States and Other Poems], in which he explores the fears and neuroses of being alive in Central America in the 1960s. Álvaro Menéndez Leal (alias Menen Desleal, 1931–) is an iconoclastic writer who, apart from fantastic fiction, is the author of Luz negra, 1966 [Black Light], an absurdist play in which the main characters are two severed heads; it is the most widely translated and performed play by a Salvadoran. However, apart from Dalton, only two other modern writers have succeeded in consistently transcending the borders of El Salvador with their works, and not insignificantly, their most important output has been published elsewhere: Claribel Alegría (1924–) and Manlio Argueta (1935–). Alegría, Nicaraguan by birth, brought up in El Salvador, now divides her time between Nicaragua and Mallorca and has retained a profound Salvadoran consciousness. She has written numerous collections of poetry, including Sobrevivo, 1978 [I Survive], which won the Casa de las Américas prize in 1978. It is as a novelist that she has won most acclaim, particularly for Cenizas de Izalco, 1966 (Ashes of Izalco), written jointly with her husband, Darwin J. Flakoll. She has earned a reputation as one of Latin America’s best writers of testimonial fiction, depicting the fate of peasants and women in warravaged Central America. Manlio Argueta, who lived in exile in Costa Rica between 1972 until very recently, and has now returned to El Salvador to work in the national university, has written some of the best examples of war literature in Central America. His novel, Un día en la vida, 1980 (One Day of Life) is without doubt one of the most technically competent and psychologically harrowing depictions of the effects of civil war on the peasant population of El Salvador. Both Alegría and Argueta have compiled important anthologies that have done much to promote the literary talent of El Salvador abroad, including New Voices of El Salvador (1962) by the former, and Poesía de El Salvador, 1983 [Poetry of El Salvador], by the latter.

During the last civil war (1982–92) a number of writers, spanning different generations and encompassing a wide range of perspectives, responded to the carnage with varying degrees of anger, pain, bewilderment or defiance. Poetry and short fiction were the favoured genres, particularly among the younger writers, with Ricardo Lindo (1947–), Miguel Huezo Mixco (1954–), Horacio Castellanos Moya (1957–) and Jacinta Escudos (1961–) being the most prominent. However, among the writers who chose to remain in El Salvador during these years and who survived, physically and creatively, one name undoubtdly stands out: David Escobar Galindo (1943–), poet, novelist, dramatist, short-story writer and literary critic. Escobar Galindo has been producing poetry of the highest quality since 1963, when he was still a student. His best collections, Duelo ceremonial por la violencia, 1971 [Ceremonial Wake for Violence], Trenos por la violencia, 1977 [Lament for Violence], Sonetos penitenciales, 1982, [Penitential Sonnets] and Oración en la guerra, 1989 [Prayer in War], treat the theme of violence from the point of view of an anguished humanist, as conveyed by “Penitential Sonnet I” : “Igual que en el soneto de Quevedo/miré los muros de la patria mía,/ y en lugar de la justa simetría/sólo hay desorden, crápula, remedo.” (Just like Quevedo in his famous sonnet, I beheld the walls of my dear country, and where there should be glorious symmetry saw only chaos, dissipation and parody). His short novel La estrella cautiva, 1985 [The Captive Star], is a subtle study of psychological agony and erotic intrigue set against the background of political mayhem in the city of San Salvador. Since 1988 Escobar Galindo has been writing a very popular series of weekly short stories, Historias sin cuento [Stories without a Plot], in La Prensa Gráfica, which focus upon the joys and sorrows of daily life in the towns and villages of El Salvador. An analysis of these stories, written in the elegant, controlled style of a superb literary craftsman aiming to write for a wide audience, irrespective of class or ideology, reveals the subtle transition that appears to be occurring in Salvadorean literature as writers move out of a dark era into a more promising one.

In the mid 1990s it is too early, however, to claim that an “aesthetic of peace” is replacing the “literature of war.” Nevertheless, there are signs of a literary reawakening. Testimonial literature by ex-combatants from both sides, but particularly by ex-guerrillas, is flourishing in the form of war memoirs, journals, novels and short-stories. Exiled writers such as Manlio Argueta have returned to work alongside those who, like David Escobar Galindo and Roberto Cea, suffered the war years at home. Literary and cultural magazines of quality are being published once again: Cultura, Amate, Tendencias, Paradoxa, Ars, all of which receive the support of the government or that of a university or a foundation. Books of literary criticism are appearing in the university bookshops and critics of quality and experience, such as Rafael Rodríguez Díaz, are now focusing their attention on Salvadorean writers and topics objectively and dispassionately. Foreign critics are also now devoting more time and space to Salvadorean writers. In the final analysis, it seems as if after years of marginalisation and neglect reflecting the country’s turbulent history, Salvadorean literature may be set to enter a new period of creativity.

ROY C. BOLAND

Further Reading

Criticism on Salvadorean literature is scarce. Some of the most important works of criticism have been published by Salvadorean writers and have already been cited in the article. Since El Salvador made the headlines during the civil war, more attention has been paid to its literary output, especially in the US and Europe. For articles and books on the major writers (Salarrué, Roque Dalton, Claribel Alegría) it is advisable to consult the Further Reading section of the entry on each one of these authors, and the MLA Bibliography. The following publications provide useful anthological or critical material: Escobar Galindo, David, Indice de la poesía salvadoreña, 2nd edition, San Salvador: UCA Editores, 1987 [An excellent anthology of Salvadorean poetry, with notes and prologue]

———Después de medianoche/After Midnight, translated and edited by Roy C. Boland, Santa Tecla: Ricaldone, 1987

Guillén, Orlando, Hombres como madrugadas: la poesía de El Salvador, Barcelona: Antropos, 1985

Huezo Mixco, Miguel, “Acerca de una estética extrema,” in Letraviva, San Salvador: Istmo Editores, 1994 [A provocative personal commentary on the evolution of Salvadorean literature from independence to the period immediately after the civil war of 1982–92]

Jaramillo Levi, Enrique and Leland H. Chambers, Contemporary Short Stories from Central America, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994

Paschke, Barbara and David Voldenpesta (editors), Clamor of Innocence: Central American Short Stories, San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1989

Rodríguez Díaz, Rafael, Temas salvadoreños, San Salvador: UCA Editores, 1992, [Contains some penetrating analyses of important authors and developments in Salvadorean literature]

Santos, Rosario (editor), And We Sold the Rain: Contemporary Fiction from Central America, Peterborough: Ryan Publishing, 1989
Salvador Elizondo 1932–

Mexican prose writer

The work of Salvador Elizondo chronicles in a very consistent—and persistent—manner the drama of writing. The stage, for most of the time, is the vast universe of literature, art and cinema. There is no Mexican Revolution, little or no local colour, very few rounded characters, and absolutely no social comment. Instead, we have a series of books, or literary projects, that continually mirror the act of writing, each project seeking to purify this act and cleanse it from the external world itself or from that literature which arrogantly boasts a faithful depiction of it. Needless to say, to take an active part in this rarefied world of writing on writing, the reader and the critic are obliged, in their turn, to participate in the purification process by throwing off old habits and acquiring the graceful stance of the scribe.

At an early stage in his writing career, certain critics turned Elizondo into the renegade of Mexican letters. It was a quickand-ready solution for those who had problems reading him or situating him within a recognisable literary context. A short autobiography Elizondo wrote for Bellas Artes in 1966 provided further comfort for the disconcerted: a demented writer fond of alcohol. That, they said, explained the macabre and sadistic world invoked in Farabeuf.

The variety of critical approaches to Elizondo’s work is due to the greater or lesser degree to which critics have sought to overcome inadequate methods and tackle what might seem, in the case of Elizondo, a much less attractive proposition, that is, to analyse the writings of a man who presents no specific social context nor easily identifiable themes.

Farabeuf was published in 1965, won the Villaurrutia Prize, and established Elizondo as one of Mexico’s leading writers. To piece together a storyline serves little purpose. Like an involved poem where the meaning behind the constellation of images is not immediately apparent, Farabeuf has to be read slowly and painstakingly. Certain scenes are repeated, over and over again, with slight variations each time. Like the woman at the end of the hallway of the house in Paris, the reader must be attentive to the changes, to the modifications in the text. Farabeuf does not ask the reader to suspend his disbelief—there are no traditional rewards for getting through the text - but instead to give himself or herself up totally to the experience of reading. Then, and only then, will the secret be revealed, will the emotion be undeniably felt.

For Elizondo the ideal novel would be that which reveals a prodigious and arduous interplay between the mind or spirit, on the one hand, and writing, on the other. Subsequently, the idea of genre assumes a much broader scope, encompassing not only possibilities defined within certain categories but any possibility whatsoever. In an introduction to Elizondo’s complete works, published in 1994 by El Colegio Nacional, Adolfo Castañón draws our attention to the author’s versatility in exploring a vast range of narrative forms and techniques, from the dialogue and commercial letter, to the simulated essay and taxonomical description. Indeed, in his writings Elizondo moves expertly in and out of the world of literature and styles, using the whole range of literary - and non-literary conventions to fabricate his own fictions. In Narda o el verano, 1966 [Narda or the Summer] and El retrato de Zoe y otras mentiras, 1969 [Zoe’s Portrait and Other Lies], he reveals unquestionable talent as a weaver of tales and fabulations, quite prepared at any given moment to subvert tradition and to declare greater loyalty to personal goals, while in El grafógrafo, 1972 [The Graphographer] the scribe has gone one step further, this time banishing the world of literature from his study and replacing it with a mirror: “Escribo. Escribo que escribo. Mentalmente me veo escribir que escribo…” (I’m writing. I write that I’m writing. Mentally I see myself writing that I’m writing…)

Refeshed by this literary purge, unburdened perhaps by an endeavour that can go no further unless it is the blank page, Elizondo adds significantly to his own literary tradition in subsequent years with Miscast, Cámara Lúcida, La luz que regresa [The Returning Light], and Elsinore. Whether it is theatre or autobiography, personal myth or invented machine, each piece of writing is developed and executed with consummate skill. In these later writings, furthermore, there is evidence of a more playful approach, a touch of light humour has crept into that on-going and utterly coherent meditation on the art and craft of writing.

DERMOT CURLEY

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 19 December 1932. Attended primary school in Mexico City. Secondary education in the US and Canada. Tertiary education in United Kingdom; Cambridge graduate. Spent time also in France and Italy. Returned to Mexico and studied plastic arts at La Esmeralda and San Carlos; studied English literature at Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM), Mexico City, 1952–53. Began to work at this university in 1964. Held scholarship of the Mexican Writers Center in 1963–64 and studied Chinese. Member of the editorial boards of two cultural magazines, Plural and Vuelta. Literary translator from English, French, German and Italian. Major awards include Villaurrutia Prize, 1965 for Farabeuf. Member of the Mexican Academy of the Language since 1976, and of the Colegio Nacional since 1981.

Selected Works

Because of the experimental nature of Elizondo’s creative writing, no attempt has been made to divide it into different genres.

Poemas, Mexico City: privately printed, 1960
Farabeuf, o la crónica de un instante, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1965; as Farabeuf, the Chronicle of an Instant, translated by John Incledon, New York: Garland, 1992
Narda o el verano, Mexico City: Era, 1966
El Hipogeo Secreto, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1968
El retrato de Zoe y otras mentiras, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1969
El grafógrafo, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1972
Miscast, o, Ha llegado la señora Marquesa: comedia opaca en tres actos, Mexico City: Oasis, 1981
Regreso a casa, Mexico City: UNAM, 1982
Cámara Lúcida, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1983
La luz que regresa, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1985
Elsinore: un cuaderno, Mexico City: Equilibrista, 1988

Other Writings
Luchino Visconti, Mexico City: UNAM, 1963
Salvador Elizondo: nuevos escritores mexicanos del siglo veinte presentados por sí mismos, Mexico City: Empresas Editoriales, 1966
Cuaderno de escritura, Guanajuato: Universidad de Guanajuato, 1969
Contextos, no. 79 of Sep-Setentas, Mexico City: Sepsentas, 1973
Teoría del infierno y otros ensayos, Mexico City: El Colegio Nacional/ Ediciones del Equilibrista, 1992

Further Reading
Bradu, Fabienne, “Cámara Lúcida,” Vuelta 83 (October 1983)
Curley, Dermot, En la isla desierta: una lectura de la obra de Salvador Elizondo, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989
Glantz, Margo, “Farabeuf: escritura barroca y novela mexicana,” in her Repeticiones: ensayos sobre literatura mexicana, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1979 Jara, René, Farabeuf. Estrategias de la inscripción narrativa, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1982
Ruffinelli, Jorge, El lugar de Rulfo y otros ensayos, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1980 [chapter on Elizondo]

Diamela Eltit 1949–

Chilean prose writer
Diamela Eltit has established an international reputation as a writer intent on testing the limits of language. The aggressive nature of her production, with its cultivation of “bad taste,” disturbs the reader. As a polemical intellectual, and as a member of the new literary scene of la avanzada (a cultural movement of resistance to the Pinochet dictatorship identified as the “progressive avant-garde”), Eltit provoked ambivalent reactions from the traditional critics of both the right and the left with her first novel
Lumpérica, 1983 [Lumpen/America] labeled as snobbish, obscure, and cryptic. Having written four fictional works under the Pinochet regime, and being part of the 1980 post-coup literary generation, Eltit confronts the official cultural space, and its essentialist, hegemonic, and authoritarian paradigms.

Eltit excludes from her texts mimetic representation, conventional modes of expression and the comfort of a linear plot. Thus,
Lumpérica places at the center of the narrative a female misfit who suffers from bleeding and convulsions. Through this character the author offers her vision of the contemporary metropolitan scene. Eltit uses cinematic techniques to describe grotesque events among the down-and-outs in a square in Santiago de Chile. As the text opens, a narrator, named diamela eltit, reveals the plaza as a public space, and illuminates its different faces at night. It focuses on “La Iluminada” (a character performing on camera under a neon light, described as “el luminoso”), who puts on display the promiscuity, solitude and marginality of these vagrants in a public square which is also the site of bestial and orgiastic rituals. Other fragments involve the interrogation of an anonymous character about the plaza’s inhabitants, a manifesto which uses a range of discourses (ludic, prosaic, poetic) about the formulation of a literary image, and the capricious deconstruction of multiple stories that might have taken place it the square. In another fragment of the text, the reader is presented with scattered phrases related to the act of writing, thoughts on an imaginary discourse about the plaza, and graffiti inscribed on the ground. In the next section, writing is explored as an act of protest, failure, fiction, official imprisonment. It is also reflected upon as an act of copulation, masturbation, escape, achievement, abandonment, and erosion.

Simultaneously, a rebellious voice at the bottom of the page cuts across the text telling another story which captures a lesbian scene. Abrupt cuts juxtapose interrogation, an inserted photograph of Diamela Eltit, alluding to her tortured sculptured-body, and the plaza as morning arrives.
Lumpérica demands alert readers who are required to reconstruct the plot and to be aware of their own dependency on official modes of representation when consuming cultural products.

In Por la patria [In the Name of the Fatherland], the mestizo protagonist Coya-Coa performs in her imagination an act of incest with the Father and the Mother. In the first part the poor are abused by soldiers, threatened by the arrival of tanks, and the continuous occupation of the shantytown by the police force. This culminates with Coya’s arrest. The second part depicts Coya and three other females who have been rounded up, as they are being held in a prison where they suffer torture and are interrogated by the villainous traitor, Juan. Women, the lumpen, and the American continent bring Latin American subjectivity into a carnivalesque political and ideological arena. This is a response to the dictatorship’s official discourse which demanded silent acceptance, sacrifice and imposed an official version of history in the name of the nation.

El cuarto mundo (The Fourth World) concerns an incestuous relationship between twins. At the same time, it dismantles the process of creating a novel. Feminine, masculine, and androgynous voices dramatize acts of violence and lust in a house, while transient miserable sudacas (derogatory term coined in Spain to refer to undocumented Latin American workers) invade the city. In El padre mío [Father of Mine] three fragments from 1983, 1984, 1985 (framed by the Preface of a certain diamela eltit), involve a soliloquy uttered by a schizophrenic indigent from the slum of Conchalí in Santiago. This experimental sociological text, of course, mocks the national mythology constructed by an authoritarian regime.

_Vaca sagrada (Sacred Cow)_ takes the form of an inquiry into identity and representation as the reader is required to associate different scenes, starting with the inscription of the bodily fluids of the female protagonist, and then moving on to the psycho-sexual relationship between her and Manuel, a walk in a demonic city, Manuel’s decision to return to the fearful South, and Manuel, Sergio, Ana, and Francisca’s meaningless relationships. Through the elusive characters, the text captures the range of representations of body, language, gender, culture and ideology.

_El infarto del alma [A Soul’s Shock]_ deals with madness, writing and culture, as it juxtaposes her prose with documentary photographs (by Paz Errázuriz) of indigent couples in a public hospital for the chronically insane.

Eltit’s most recent narrative, _Los vigilantes [The Vigilantes]_, is noteworthy for its elaborate visual compositions, and its experiments with fragmentary prose and disintegrating language which goes beyond _Lumpérica’s_ explorations. More than a narrative, this performance-text connects incoherent and contradictory scenes conveying the characters’ perceptions, and the reader’s assumptions. An oppressed mother exchanges letters with an absent father, writing impulsively and frenetically while her son, her former male companion, her mother-in-law, a man with a limp and the neighbours look on watchfully. Three chapters, “BAAM,” “Amanecer” [Dawn], and “BRRR,” which differ in length, style, point of view, subject matter, and treatment, tell the story of the mother. Predictably, the tone is grotesque, and the setting is one of urban decay; it is winter and the predominant colour is an icy blue.

Although Eltit embodies some of the innovations of the Latin American Post-Boom writers, a hallmark of her works is her use of artistic, cinematic, and video-clipping techniques, as part of her own aesthetic and political agenda. Deserving attention are her assimilation and transformation of Severo Sarduy’s Neobaroque marking of the text, and the use of the body as a multiple signifier, the ludic use of language characteristic of Guillermo Cabrera Infante, and the somber tones conveyed by Rulfo’s and Arguedas’s marginal characters.

MAGDALENA MAÍZ-PEÑA

Biography

Born in Santiago de Chile in 1949. Stayed in Chile after military coup; joined resistance groups and actively protested against the regime. Member of the 80s Post-Coup Generation (writers born between 1948–57, who started publishing under the dictatorship). Studied for an arts degree at the University of Chile. Performance and video artist known for her work with Santiago’s down-andouts; also a film director. A founder of CADA (Colectivo de Acciones de Arte / Political and Artistic Co-op). Organizer of El Congreso Internacional de Literatura Femenina Latinoamericana, the most important literary event during the dictatorship, Santiago de Chile, August 1987. Taught literary theory at Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, and at the National University of Chile. Promoter of the cultural project “Educación para la Democracia” (Education for Democracy); Cultural attaché at Chilean Embassy in Mexico when Patricio Alwyn was president of Chile. Currently professor at the Universidad Tecnológica

Selected Works

Novels
Lumpérica, Santiago de Chile: Ediciones del Ornitorrinco, 1983
Por la patria, Santiago de Chile: Ediciones del Ornitorrinco, 1986
El padre mío, Santiago de Chile: Francisco Zegers Editor, 1989
Los vigilantes, Santiago-Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1994

Short Fiction
“Lujuria: aunque me lavase con agua de nieve,” in Los siete pecados capitales, edited by Mariano Aguirre, Santiago de Chile: Grijalbo, 1995

Further Reading

The collection of critical essays edited by Juan Carlos Lértora is indispensable reading. It contains some of the best critical essays written on Diamela Eltit’s work by the editor, Julio Ortega, Sara Castro-Klarén, Nelly Richard, Raquel Olea, María Inés Lagos, Ivette Malverde Disselkoen, Guillermo García Corales, Marina Arrate and Fernando Moreno. Each of the essays illuminates Eltit’s writing either by focussing on one of her works or by postulating innovative theses. Critical information is contained in the outstanding bibliography compiled by Patricia Rubio.

Brito, Eugenia, Campos minados: literatura post-golpe en Chile, Santiago de Chile: Cuarto Propio, 1990
Lértora, Juan Carlos (editor), Una poética de literatura menor: la narrativa de Diamela Eltit, Santiago de Chile: Paratextos/ Editorial Cuarto Propio, 1993
Tierney-Tello, Mary Beth, “Re-Making the Margins: from Subalterity to Subjectivity in Diamela Eltit’s Por la patria,” Monographic Review/Revista Monográfica 8 (1992)

Interviews
Erotic and Homoerotic Writing

The literary expression of the erotic is through the body, which can be either the physiological or the textual body. Therefore, erotic writing can be thought of as the literary production focused on the materialization of the human body by depicting non-genitally-based sexual pleasure; in other words, pornography for the well-to-do. On the other hand, eroticism can be implied in the act of writing itself: the Barthesian pleasure experienced by the author while writing and the reader when facing the text. In works by the River Plate writers Julio Cortázar, Cristina Peri Rossi and Sylvia Molloy; the Cubans José Lezama Lima and Severo Sarduy, both conceptualizations of erotic writing are exemplified.

Studies by theorists such as Stanley Fish and Wolfgang Iser, emphasizing the creative role of the reader, have opened up new ways of viewing texts, even canonical ones. From this perspective, eroticism may be discerned in texts as far back as the colonial period, for example in works by Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz.

The Nicaraguan modernista poet, Rubén Darío, with his symbolic representation of sexuality and his erotic interpretation of the world, provides the most conventional representation of eroticism within the parameters of western culture, namely heterosexuality. Darío created a new poetic language for the expression of the erotic in Latin American literature which continued right through the 20th century. In his work the woman’s body is the object of male desire and is represented as an artificial construct. However, in later texts, for example, in the poetry of Pablo Neruda, the female body appears as a component of Nature and in harmony with it.

Women had to work against the grain of an entirely masculine canon and thus the inscription of an erotic female subject in Latin American writing does not appear until the first decades of the 20th century in the poetry of Delmira Agustini. The center of her texts is the search for a language to express eroticism outside the patriarchal tradition: a unique experience which is born in the woman’s body. During the 20th century the following Argentine writers: Griselda Gambaro, Silvina Ocampo, Alejandra Pizarnik, and Ana María Shua, have written erotic texts with the purpose of inscribing the female erotic, previously excluded from the canon. Similarly, as David Foster has demonstrated, homosexuality has been erased from the patriarchal linguistic and literary codes, although there exists now a considerable production which is creating a language appropriate to the homosexual erotic experience; both gay male and lesbian.

Influenced by the work of Monique Wittig and Hélène Cixous, some writers have depicted a non-phallic eroticism. Among them are the Mexicans Sabina Berman, Sara LeviCalderón, María Luisa Mendoza; the Mexican American, Cherríe Moraga, and Reina Roffi, Cristina Peri Rossi and Silvia Molloy from the River Plate countries. In Latin America, as elsewhere, lesbianism developed together with mainstream feminism thanks to intercontinental gatherings and an exchange of ideas from the late 1970s. This political basis opened a space for the representation of women bodies in literature, depicting either lesbian or male homosexual eroticism.

Although until recently homosexuality has been represented only timidly and obliquely in Latin American letters, homoerotism appears in 1895 in the novel, Bom-Crioulo [The Good Creole] by the Brazilian Adolfo Caminha. Also, during the 1920s, the Colombian Porfirio Barba Jacob wrote highly homoerotic texts. However, gays have been the “scapegoats” of oppressive regimes as appear in the texts by Mario Vargas Llosa (Peru), Manuel Puig (Argentina), and in the works of Reinaldo Arenas, who left Cuba in 1980 because he was unable to publish his works there. In particular, his homoerotic writing was distasteful in a highly militarized, macho society. A new homoerotic writing is being developed by writers such as Luis Zapata (Mexico), an author who explores textually the possibilities of fusing the erotic pleasure of writing with the act of writing about eroticism.

Erotic writing depicting either homosexuality or heterosexuality, represents a resistance discourse whose end would be to question the cultural construction of gender, sexuality and the body.

ANA MARÍA BRENES-GARCÍA

See also entries on Delmira Agustini, Rayuela (Julio Cortázar), Rubem Fonseca, Cristina Peri Rossi, El beso de la mujer araña (Manuel Puig)

Further Reading

Critical Studies
Foster, David William and Roberto Reis (editors), Bodies and Biases: the Representation of Sexualities in Hispanic Cultures and Literatures, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1995

Anthologies
Coutinho, Edilberto (editor), Erotismo no romance brasileiro, Rio de Janeiro: Editorial Nórdica, 1979
Giardinelli, Mempo and Graciela Glemmo (editors), La Venus de papel. Antología de cuentos eróticos argentinos, Buenos Aires: Beas, 1993
Jaramillo Levi, Enrique (editor), El cuento erótico en Mexico, Mexico City: Diana, 1975
Lovera De-Sola, R.J. (editor), Eróticos erotómanos y otras especies, Caracas: Alfadil Ediciones, 1983

Texts by Spanish American Authors
Berman, Sabina (Mexico), El teatro de Sabina Berman, Mexico City: Editores Unidos, 1985
The essay form acquired prominence in Spanish America in the second half of the 19th century, and it has flourished through most of the 20th. Traditionally classified as a minor genre, its perspectives and techniques are nevertheless apparent in works ranging from diaries and formal or informal letters to lectures and speeches, meditative poems and a variety of narrative forms.

Its pervasiveness is evident in as diversified works as José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi’s El Periquillo Sarniento, 1816 (The Itching Parrot), arguably as much a social essay as a social novel; José Gorostiza’s long poem Muerte sin fin, 1939 (Death without End); José Asuncion Silva’s posthumous novelas-diary, De sobremesa, 1925 [Table Talk]; many of Jorge Luis Borges’s short stories, Ernesto Sábato’s existential novel Sobre heroes y tumbas, 1961 (On Heroes and Tombs), and Gabriel García Márquez’s biographical novel El general en su laberinto, 1989 (The General in His Labyrinth).

In Latin America, then, the essay has always been more than a marginal form of writing; it is a frequently used exploratory procedure. From Christopher Columbus’s diaries and Hernán Cortés’s letters to Emperor Charles V to José Martí’s critiques of North American life in the 1880s and Julio Cortázar’s whimsicalities in La vuelta al día en ochenta mundos, 1967 (Around the Day in Eighty Worlds), the essay has been a basic though often covert literary practice.

Like both poets and philosophers, essayists explore more than they invent. The essay writer’s task could be defined as that of balancing inquisitiveness, insightful observation, and the skills of persuasion. By his title Essais (1580, and subsequent revised editions) Michel de Montaigne implies a process of inquiry akin to testing or trying out. He lays no claim to “knowledge” as such, demonstrating instead an insatiable curiosity. To think, Montaigne reminds us, is to inquire. Appropriately enough, pensador (thinker) and pensamiento (thought) are terms commonly applied in the Hispanic world to discursive writers and what they write. The pensador aspires to combine the philosopher’s quest for meaning with the moralist’s convictions and the literary or art critic’s judgment. Significantly, all the selections in José Gaos’s Antología del pensamiento en lengua española en la edad contemporánea, 1945 [Anthology of Thought in the Spanish Language in the Contemporary Era] are essays.

The relatively static, authoritarian colonial period (1500–1810) was not a propitious time or atmosphere for essayists, two memorable exceptions being the polemical Spanish missionary Fray Bartolomé de Las Casas (1474–1566) and Mexico’s leading intellectual of the 17th century, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (1651(?)-95) It is in the aftermath of Hispanic American wars for independence from Mexico to the Southern Cone that important essays begin to appear.

Political and social turbulence through most of the 19th century created both a precarious environment and a cultural incitement for Hispanic American writers, and much of the leading essayists’ work was produced in exile and in the context of quite bizarre power struggles in their homelands. Andrés Bello (1781–1865) of Venezuela, the Argentines Domingo Faustino Sarmiento (1811–88) and Juan Bautista Alberdi (1810–84), the Ecuadorian Juan Montalvo (1832–89), Puerto Rico’s Eugenio María de Hostos (1839–1903), and the Cuban José Martí (1853–95) all lived and wrote abroad for extensive periods.

The six authors just mentioned were also political activists. Bello helped Simon Bolívar organize his independence movement in northern South America; Sarmiento wrote Civilización y barbarie: vida de Juan Facundo Quiroga, 1845 (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants) in hopes of overthrowing the Argentine strongman Juan Manuel de Rosas. Sarmiento himself served as president from 1868 to 1874. Martí and Hostos were active organizers of the liberation, respectively, of Cuba and Puerto Rico from Spain. It is generally agreed that Sarmiento and Martí (also a poet) were the two most important Hispanic American essayists of the 19th century. Both showed a strong romantic temperament; both considered their chief function as writers—prolific as they were—to be an instrument of political action and cultural persuasion. Sarmiento’s best writing, apart from Facundo, is to be found in Viajes por Europa, Africa y América, 1845–1847, 1849–51, [Journeys through Europe, Africa and the United States] and in Recuerdos de provincia, 1850 [Memoirs of Provincial Life]. Martí lived in New York from 1879 to early 1895 (the year of his death in Cuba as a participant in a rebel military action against the colonial Spanish forces). Much of his production was collected posthumously under the titles Escenas norteamericanas and Escenas neoyorquinas [North American Scenes and New York Scenes]; his most frequently anthologized piece is “Nuestra America,” 1891 (Our America).

Bridgeing the gap between a predominant idealism among 19th-century essayists and the predominant skepticism of their 20th-century successors were the Uruguayan José Enrique Rodó (1871–1917) in Ariel (1900), the Mexican José Vasconcelos (1882–1959) in La raza cósmica, 1925 (The Cosmic Race) and Indología, 1926 [Indiology], the Dominican Pedro Henríquez Ureña (1884–1946) in Seis ensayos en busca de nuestra expresión, 1928 [Six Essays in Search of our Style]; the spiritual Peruvian Marxist José Carlos Mariátegui (1895–1930) in Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, 1928 (Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality), and the Mexican Alfonso Reyes (1889–1959) in Última Tule, 1942 [The Last Thule], which includes “Notas sobre la inteligencia americana,” 1939 [Notes on the Hispanic American Mind]. Most of what is thought and expressed in these works constitutes an ideological sequel to Martí’s above-mentioned essay, “Nuestra America.” In a judicious mixture of hope and foreboding they point to inherent differences between Americans of North and South and insist on the need for Latin American cultural autonomy.

Beginning in the 1930s, the major authors undertake a closer examination of Latin America’s history and its future, often arriving at a generally unfavorable comparison of its situation with that of Europe and the United States. Accordingly, a principal theme is cultural disillusionment, as in Antonio S. Pedreira’s skeptical assessment of Puerto Rico’s possibilities for the future in Insularismo, 1934 [Island Isolation], Radiografía de la pampa, 1933 (X-Ray of the Pampa) by Ezequiel Martínez Estrada (1895–1964) with his revisionist view of Argentina and the New World as a historical wasteland. H.A. Murena (1924–75), an Argentine compatriot and close reader of Martínez Estrada, is just as pessimistic in El pecado original de America, 1954 [Latin America’s Original Sin]. Carlos Rangel (1929) deplores a Hispanic American tendency to blame the United States for Hispanic America’s problems in Del buen salvaje al buen revolucionario, 1976 [From the Noble Savage to the Good Revolutionary].

On a more abstract and deeper existential level is Historia de una pasión argentina, 1937 [History of an Argentine Passion], a quest for a national (though not nationalist) sense of spiritual identification by the novelist and essay writer, Eduardo Mallea (1903–82). Sebastián Salazar Bondy (1924–64) unleashes an entertaining diatribe on Peruvian society in Lima la horrible, 1964 [Beastly Lima]. With his sensibility as one of this century’s most profound poets, Octavio Paz analyzes Mexicans’ personality “masks” from the conquest to modern times in El laberinto de la soledad, 1950 (The Labyrinth of Solitude). Posdata, 1970 (The Other Mexico: Critique of the Pyramid), serves as an appendix to El laberinto, and is a criticism of the repression that occurred in Mexico City in October, 1968. That violence also motivated an important testimonial work by Elena Poniatowska, La noche de Tlatelolco, 1971 (Massacre in Mexico). Paz’s best essays on poetics and the poet’s experience are El arco y la lira, 1956 (The Bow and the Lyre) and Los hijos del lino, 1974 (Children of the Myre). Jorge Luis Borges (1899–1986) also has original thoughts on literary creativity and on modern culture in Discusión, 1932.
Increasingly, the memoir and testimonial writing have become a significant variation of the Hispanic American essay. Among many other essays, Alfonso Reyes (1889–1959), the leading Hispanic American humanist of our time, wrote “Oración del 9 de febrero,” 1930 [Reflections on the 9th of February], Pasado inmediato, 1941 [The Immediate Past], Parentelia, 1954 [My Family], and a posthumous Diario, 1911–1930 (1969).

With a temperament and ambitions comparable to those of Domingo Faustino Sarmiento, José Vasconcelos reflects on his achievements and failures as an educator and politician in a four-volume Memorias (1936–39). It is rich in anecdote, autobiography, and biographical allusions. Critics are generally agreed that the first volume (Ulises criollo [A Mexican Ulysses]) is the most coherent and convincing.

Stylistically more refined than Vasconcelos and with keen perceptiveness, Victoria Ocampo (1890–1979) wrote and published ten series (i.e., volumes) of Testimonios [Testimonies] between 1935 and 1977; she also founded and directed the prestigious Argentine literary journal Sur (1931–80) in which the work of many of the world’s leading writers appeared. Her testimonies constitute an expansive and sensitive autobiography. The Venezuelan Mariano Picón-Salas (1904–65) wrote graceful impressionistic essays, e.g., Gusto de Mexico, 1952 [A Taste of Mexico], Comprensión de Venezuela, 1976 [Understanding Venezuela], and a lively and thoughtful testimony of his youthful years in exile, Regreso de tres mundos, 1959 [Return from Three Worlds]. Luis Cardoza y Aragón (1904–93), the Guatemalan poet and art critic, lived mostly in Mexican exile after 1944. In addition to Guatemala, las líneas de su mano, 1955 [Guatemala, the Lines on Her Hand], a historical revision similar in some ways to Paz’s El laberinto de la soledad, he wrote a long memoir that includes vivid portraits of many of his contemporaries, El río. Novelas de caballería, 1989 [The River. Chivalric Novels] and has virtually nothing to do with chivalric novels. Two other residents in Mexico, the Guatemalan Augusto Monterroso and the Puerto Rican José Luis González, have published lively accounts of their formative years, respectively, Los buscadores de oro, 1993 [The Gold Seekers] and La luna no era de queso, 1988 [The Moon Wasn’t Made of Cheese].

Four writers with an intense political view of Latin American problems are the Mexican novelist Carlos Fuentes, author of Tiempo mexicano, 1971 [Mexican Time] and the more personal Myself with Others (1988); Roberto Fernández Retamar, the Cuban poet who wrote a late sequel (and socialist reconstruction) of Rodó’s Ariel: Calibán: apuntes sobre la cultura en nuestra America, 1971 (Caliban: Notes on Culture in Our America); the Chilean Ariel Dorfman, who satirizes US cultural imperialism in La última aventura del Llanero solitario, 1979 and Patos, elefantes y heroes, 1985 [Ducks, Elephants and Heroes]; and Elena Poniatowska who wrote a many-faceted testimony of the 1985 earthquake in Mexico City, Nada, nadie, 1988 [Nobody, Nothing] that provides us with interesting reflections on Mexican society and authorities in a moment of collective stress.

As this survey has intended to show, the essay of the past two centuries has adjusted sensitively and well to the circumstances, preferences and crises of Latin American life.

PETER G. EARLE
Further Reading

Critical Studies
“Misión de los intelectuales en Hispanoamérica,” in his Estudios sobre letras hispánicas, Mexico City: Editorial Libros de Mexico, 1974
Gómez-Martínez, José Luis, “El ensayo y su función social,” Diálogos 69 (1976)

Levy, Isaac J. and Juan Loveluck (editors), Simposio: el ensayo hispánico, Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1984
Levy, Kurt L. and Keith Ellis (editors), El ensayo y la crítica literaria en Iberoamérica, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1970
Loveluck, Juan, “El ensayo hispanoamericano y su naturaleza,” in Los Ensayistas I (1976)
Picón-Salas, Mariano, “En torno al ensayo,” La Nueva Democracia 42. (1962)
Vitier, Medardo, Del ensayo americano, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1945

Anthologies of the Hispanic American Essay
Giordano, Jaime (editor), La identidad cultural de Hispanoamérica, Santiago de Chile: Ediciones del Maitén, 1986
Mejía Sánchez, Ernesto (editor), El ensayo actual hispanoamericano, Mexico City: Andrea, 1971
Early feminism in Latin America was first conceived as a feminist critique of society in that it was a political and social movement that struggled for women’s rights such as suffrage, labour laws to improve working conditions, obtain better wages, and access to education. This critique also examined the role of institutionalized religion in women’s lives and argued for less rigid religious views on women as well as for the passing of a divorce law. There were feminist movements that advocated similar programs in most countries and reached similar solutions, when successful as in the case of Argentina and Uruguay. The changes advocated by Latin American feminists were implemented gradually, and changes were incorporated into societies in diverse fashions.

In many cases, progressive movements were thwarted by the rise of the political right. This development, and/or the rise of militarism, manifested itself in social and political programs that eventually led to the exclusion of women from participation in public culture. Consequently, the advances that had been made were put on hold in many instances. As Francesca Miller argues in her article “Latin American Feminism and the Transnational Arena,” Latin American women’s contribution to feminism has been insistently “shrouded” in superficial assumptions on the nature of its originality, which has been underestimated.

The pioneers who participated in international activities and debates came from Argentina, Chile, Uruguay and Brazil. The most recent wave of feminism in Latin America has been partially influenced by similar manifestations in the United States and Western Europe in the 1960s, when new awareness brought women’s rights to the fore once more. This time, however, it came with a renewed sense of urgency and staying power, which may allow women’s lives to be altered more substantially in these societies. On the one hand, consciousness-raising activities have been unevenly practised in the subcontinent as women mobilized more openly in Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, Mexico or Cuba than in Honduras, Ecuador or the Dominican Republic; on the other, the Guatemalan Quiché activist Rigoberta Menchú has become a prominent universal voice against the excesses committed against her community, even though Guatemala’s manifestations of a feminist movement are insignificant. Menchú achieved international recognition, and in 1992 she was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for her unabated work against militarism, racism, sexism, and classism, the four feared male riders of Latin American women’s apocalypse.

Historically, there were feminist organizations and movements that began to develop in the last quarter of the 19th century and continued into the 20th century in most Latin American countries. However, more effective were those in Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, Mexico and Cuba, where upper and middle-class women joined the new European immigrants. Many of them were proponents of socialist, syndicalist, and/or anarchist ideas during the various waves of immigration to the American continent which accelerated its pace towards the end of the 19th century, reaching its peak early in the 20th century. Thus, it can be said that feminism is linked strongly to its European roots. The impact of feminist activities taking place in the US did not reach these movements until the 1920s. At its inception, Latin American feminists sought to better conditions for workers, including women (10% of the nonagricultural force) and children; fought for the improvement and expansion of the educational system; and struggled to obtain women’s suffrage. The last was granted in piecemeal fashion until fully passed in the 1940s and expanded throughout the American subcontinent.

Argentina was a pioneer in this regard, although suffrage was only incorporated into the national constitution in 1947. By the late 1860s Argentina had begun to develop a public school system intended to reach a large segment of the population. Women, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento argued during his presidency (1868–74), should be educated to become Argentina’s teachers because they are best suited for the profession. A culture, he said, is best judged by the level of education accessible to its female population.

When the Socialist Party was founded in Argentina in 1896, women were admitted as full members, and later they founded Socialist Women’s Centres. The Socialist Party advocated reforms in the Civil Code for universal suffrage and for the equality of rights of the sexes, divorce, legal equality for legitimate and illegitimate children. Feminism and socialism are strongly linked at this point in history. Socialist feminists such as Elvira López, Ernestina López de Nelson and Elvira Rawson de Dellepiane contributed to women’s education and helped enlarge the ranks of feminism.

Carolina Muzzilli, a factory worker, reported in La Prensa on the general working conditions facing female labourers, characterized by long hours, inadequate machinery, unhealthy conditions and physical and sexual abuse. A group of distinguished feminists of immigrant stock dedicated most of their lives to this movement. Among them were the medical doctors Alicia Moreau de Justo (France/Argentina, 1885–1986), Julieta Lantieri, Elvira Rawson and Cecilia Grierson, who attended the School of Medicine at the University of Buenos Aires. Alicia Moreau de Justo argued that industrial development had made of the feminist movement a necessity granted that women were entitled to profit from their own labour. Work, she pointed out, is not incompatible with motherhood and mothering. She criticized the Argentine-Spanish heritage that constructed the “child-doll personality” that denied women their inalienable civil rights.

In 1910—the year when several Latin American nations celebrated the centennial of their independence from Spain—the First International Feminist Congress of Argentina sponsored by the Argentine Association of University Women was held in February. Women from the interior of Argentina, from Uruguay, Chile, Peru, Italy and the United States attended this congress; in April, the National Council of Women also took place.
Julieta Lantieri founded the National Feminist Party in Argentina whose main objective was the franchise. Active in educational improvements for young women, feminists had substantial impact in this country’s quality of education. The Civil Code was finally amended in 192.6 to include women’s rights, the most important of the political gains of this movement.

The other area in which Argentine women contributed to the improvement of women’s and children’s lives was through philanthropy—The Society of Beneficence is the most notable example. Argentina’s early feminist impulse towards female education and civil rights gave women the platform from which to demand parity with men; however, not all classes were included in the movement’s leadership. None the less, the substantial gains obtained by the early wave of feminists set up the scene for the emergence of the Peronist feminist movement in the 1940s, during which suffrage and better pay were obtained. Under the charismatic Eva Perón, women entered the political arena with confidence, and were able to influence the drafting of progressive legislation for women.

Doctors Moreau and Luisi travelled throughout Latin America to help women’s organizations, and Dr Moreau addressed the International Congress of Women Workers in Washington, DC. She was an advocate of government-sponsored day-care centres, comprehensive maternity protection, equal pay and a forty hour working week. She spoke against the white slave trade in South America, about the opposition to sex education in public schools and in the army.

A different case is Brazil, an agricultural state, heavily dependent on slave labour systems. But during the second half of the 19th century, incipient groups of feminists began to have access to the printed media in South Central Brazil—the most progressive region of this country—to struggle for women’s rights, in spite of living in seclusion and being subjected to the authority of father, or husband. Some conditions improved when urban areas began to expand, and a new urban elite appeared on the social horizon. With modernization and industrialization, and São Paulo at the centre of progress, social changes began to take place. Women were offered for the first time limited access to education, and thus a small segment of the female population acquired literacy. According to the 1872 census in Brazil its population had reached ten million inhabitants of which about one million free men, half a million free women, less than 1,000 male slaves and 500 female slaves were literate. In Rio de Janeiro Joana Paula Manso de Noronha founded O Jornal das Senhoras [The Ladies’ Journal]—devoted to fashion, literature, fine arts, theatre and criticism—to educate the public, and women in particular, about women’s issues. She argued that women’s destiny was not located only at home with her husband and children, and as a means of acquiring wealth for men. She also issued an invitation to women to collaborate in her periodical, remarking, to make it easier, that contributions would be published anonymously. Women naturally reacted positively to this invitation, and the ensuing publication lasted four years. Violante Atabalipa Ximenes de Bivar e Velasco and Gervasia Nunezia Pires dos Santos were the other editors of this pioneering periodical, which closed in December of 1855. In 1862 a second publication entitled O Bello Sexo [The Fair Sex] appeared in Rio de Janeiro with a more progressive group of collaborators who did not need to hide their identity any longer. Other publications include O Sexo Feminino [The Feminine Sex] which appeared in 1873 and was edited by Francisca Senhorinha da Motta Diniz, a lady from Campanha in the state of Minas Gerais. This publication was directed “to the education, instruction, and emancipation of women.” Its objective was to demand rights for women by appealing to their support and by training them to change their attitudes toward themselves; only by changing oppressive conditions could women achieve parity with men. Miosótis [Forget-Me-Not] appeared in Recife in 1875. ECO das Damas [The Ladies’ Echo], edited by Amelia Carolina da Silva Couto, was published in Rio de Janeiro in 1879, and disseminated the United States model of moral and material improvement for women. By 1890 some improvement was noted in the most developed urban areas of coastal Brazil. Josephina Alvares de Azevedo was a member of a new wave of Brazilian feminists who objected strongly to the patriarchal structure of their society. She published a periodical entitled A Família [The Family], which encouraged women to take charge of their own lives. Feminism in Brazil was mainly concerned with improving the legal status of women, with the role of women in the family, access to education, the abolition of slavery, the introduction of female suffrage, and divorce. By 1891, when Brazil became a republic, women’s issues were brought to the constitutional convention. Suffrage was not achieved then, but the movement continued in Brazil, and the law was passed in 1932 making Brazil the third country in the Western Hemisphere to grant women the right to vote. The other two were the United States and Ecuador.

In Mexico, feminism manifested itself first in the State of Yucatan. The women’s liberation movement flourished there partly because of its contact with populous urban areas outside of Mexico City, partly on account of it being more open to European contact and thirdly, because the region was already a centre of revolutionary activity and social protest. In Mérida, the capital city of Yucatan, feminists pushed for women’s rights as early as 1870 when Rita Cetina Gutiérrez founded the feminist society La Siempreviva [The Everlasting Flower], which supported the education of women to enable them to become teachers of younger generations. Two feminist congresses were held in this city in 1916, where female teachers demanded an end to bigotry, intolerance, and religious conservatism. Some laws favouring women were included in the Mexican Constitution of 1917. Present at the first Pan American Conference of Women held in Maryland (1923) were Hermila Galiando, the most radical of Mexican feminists, and Elena Torres who was elected vice-president for North America of the Pan American league for the Elevation of Women. The Maryland congress, attended by professional women from the US, Mexico and Cuba, was dominated by the delegation from Yucatan led by Elvia Carrillo Puerto, that wanted to open a debate on birth control, female sexuality, sex education in the schools, and white slave traffic. Much was done to oppose them but they were able to open these serious issues to debate, although most were not accepted. The feminist struggle in Mexico intensified in the crucial period of social ferment in the early years of the 20th century. This spanned the end of the Porfirio Díaz regime, the outbreak of the Mexican Revolution and beyond it into the decade of 1930–40. Women were to be found in the middle of the armed struggle as combatants, as support groups for the armies, as drafters of plans and propaganda and as couriers. Their role of soldaderas (camp followers) has usually been highlighted in detriment to other central war activities outlined above. As María Antonieta Rascón points out, Mexican historiography has focused primarily on heroines and femmes célèbres, usually connected to famous men, thus minimizing the participation of working women and other women’s groups that are not linked to the dominant class. Women participated in the revolutionary war that started in 1910, the first social revolution of the century, before the Chinese Revolution of 1911 and the Russian Revolution of 1917. When the Mexican revolutionary platform became part of the constitutional text of 1917, however, women were not included in the definition of citizen. Most women’s issues remained unaddressed. Perhaps for this reason, women were also active as leaders of the backlash to the Revolution, the Cristero rebellion, that took place in the state of Jalisco at the end of the 1920s. (The role of the female leader in that political movement of the extreme right is represented melodramatically in Pensativa (1945), a novel by Jesús Goytortúa).

In the second wave of feminism, the goals and objectives of Western feminists shifted since the struggle now was to focus on the total liberation of women. As Simone de Beauvoir remarked in 1972, women had not won the struggle, and since 1950 women had not gained anything. The movement then became radicalized. For Latin American society in general, the decade of the 1960s presents a complex picture. On the one hand it saw an increase in militarism and a growing intolerance of liberation movements such as feminism. On the other, it experimented in populist political movements. The Cuban Revolution has succeeded in overturning the historical course for the island of Cuba. The oppressed masses began to express their plight more overtly, partly fostered by the discourse of the Cuban Revolution, partly by an opening in the ranks of the Catholic Church with a new message, that of the theology of liberation. In the early and mid 1970s, Argentina, Chile and Uruguay became the victims of a new totalitarian ideology disseminated by the military class; Central American countries were under strong dictatorships of the political right; others like Bolivia and Paraguay were under military regimes. None of these regimes favoured the cause of women. On the contrary, they became prey to the hardening rule of patriarchal power and, therefore, fighting these powers became a central concern of women affiliated to progressive political movements. It is in the 1980s, when elected democratic administrations come to power, that feminism is slowly revitalized in many of these nations. A great task ahead for Latin American feminists is that they need to confront the specific problems the region faces today. It is likely that feminism, currently under attack by the general rise of the political right in all Western countries, will be revitalized in Latin America in the near future.

MAGDALENA GARCÍA PINTO

Further Reading

For additional items see also the Further Reading lists for the entries on Feminist Literary Theory and Women’s Writing
Carlson, Marifran, ¡Feminismo! The Woman’s Movement in Argentina from Its Beginnings to Eva Perón, Chicago: Academy, 1988
Lavrin, Asuncion, Women, Feminism and Social Change in Argentina, Chile and Uruguay, 1890–1940, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1995
Feminist Literary Theory

Since the end of the 1970s feminist literary theory has played an increasingly important role in the development of contemporary Latin American cultural studies. During this time it has persistently interrogated androcentric critical assumptions and helped open up the canon to previously neglected women writers. In the British and North American academies the polemic surrounding the early advances of feminist criticism was eased by a more or less liberal consensus. In Latin America no such consensus existed and there were fewer women academics able and inclined to support its creation. These difficult beginnings have left their mark on feminism and feminist literary theory alike, and help to explain why so many of Latin America’s leading feminist writers—for example Sylvia Molloy (Argentina) and Cristina Peri Rossi (Uruguay)—continue to live and work elsewhere. Within Latin America, class has been the key analytic concept for the majority of radical academics since the 1960s, and early feminist criticism was censured as a bourgeois distraction from cross-gender analysis and activism. Although this tendency is less marked today, a number of leading feminist writers—among them Elena Poniatowska (Mexico) and Beatriz Sarlo (Argentina)—retain a clear class or anti-capitalist dimension in their work. For many younger critics in particular, however, this dimension is less crucial. Sarlo’s base at Buenos Aires University is also home to Lacanian-inspired psychoanalytic critics and a gender research group influenced less by Marx than by Michel Foucault and Judith Butler.

A rather different objection to feminism comes from writers like Julieta Campos (Cuba/Mexico) and Isabel Allende (Chile), who share some feminist concerns but see writing as an activity which they undertake as human beings rather than as women. Since its beginnings in the 1970s Latin American feminist criticism has challenged this view of writing as ungendered. Early examples used strategies adapted from Kate Millett’s Sexual Politics to expose patriarchal assumptions in Latin American male-authored texts. Results were uneven, however, and many readers were uneasy with this application of Northern critical procedures and categories to Latin American writing. The 1975 Congress of Latin American Women Writers soon gave a recognizably Iberoamerican inflection to individual feminist concerns, with its focus on women’s broader social roles. The conference also underlined the tension between two very different critical tendencies in Latin American cultural studies. One of these foregrounds the text’s status as a representation of (for example) gender relations and engages with those relations as words. The other treats these representations as a more or less transparent window onto the relations and events depicted. This second tendency has traditionally been more marked in Latin American non-feminist critical writing. It also appears in some feminist criticism, however, despite the basic feminist premise that analytic and representational categories are not transparent, objective or universal, but derive their authority from patriarchal networks of domination and exclusion.

This premise was the starting point for the feminist reconstitution of the canon. The process involved establishing a corpus of texts by new as well as previously neglected women writers, and included not only standard “authorized” genres but also previously marginalized ones (such as testimonials, autobiographies and private letters) particularly associated with women writers. Essential to this process were the many anthologies of Latin American women’s writing which began to be published from the late 1970s. As a result of what has been termed the continuing “boom” in women’s writing, such anthologies remain popular today, many of them in translation for Anglo-European consumption. The most recent and useful of these is Sara Castro-Klarén, Sylvia Molloy and Beatriz Sarlo’s Women’s Writing in Latin America: an Anthology, which combines a wide range of writers, texts and genres with excellent critical and biographical introductions. Collections of interviews—particularly those edited by Evelyn Picon Garfield and Magdalena García Pinto—have also been an invaluable resource for feminist critics.

One question which this process inevitably raised, and which many of these interviews addressed, was whether women’s writing was essentially different from men’s. Influential writers like Clarice Lispector (Brazil), Cristina Peri Rossi and Julieta Campos had all rejected the notion of a specific and clearly differentiated women’s writing. The 1982 Congress of Latin American Writers provided a platform for leading critics and writers to explore this question in detail. Rosario Ferré (Puerto Rico) and Josefina Ludmer (Mexico) were unwilling to accept the hypothesis of a fixed women’s nature that could be deduced from or reflected in stable stylistic differences. Other delegates underlined the risks of perpetuating women’s dependency by defining their writing in relation to men’s—for example as a marginal other. Sara Castro-Klarén took a rather different line. She began by observing that the large number of texts being produced by Latin American women writers had so far failed to generate any continent-specific theoretical positions. In fact, Josefina Ludmer’s own contribution, “Las tretas del débil” or “The Strategies of the Weak,” is widely acknowledged to have begun this process. Unlike Ludmer, however, Castro-Klarén urged feminists wishing to subvert patriarchal representational assumptions to adapt French feminist theories for the purpose.

Ten years later the application of non-Latin American feminist critical assumptions to Latin American texts is more wide-spread, but its remains controversial. However, critics like Jean Franco (UK) reject calls for theoretical purity as alien to the continent’s tradition of critical bricolage (a “do it yourself” approach). At the same time she reminds feminists who advocate non-theoretical, “common sense,” approaches to texts of the extent to which these approaches are themselves grounded in unexamined, patriarchally-influenced notions of distance and objectivity which feminist theory has helped to discredit. The publication in 1986 of Franco’s “Apuntes sobre la critica feminista y la literatura hispanoamericana” [Notes on Feminist Criticism and Latin American Literature] took this debate a stage further and clarified its terms. While criticism rescues lost texts or re-evaluates forgotten ones, she contended, theory has a broader, explicitly political, role in the exploration of power relations and for this purpose the critical application of any theory is warranted. Three years later her full-length study, Plotting Women, used a range of theories to link the claims of life practices and textuality, political power and marginality. Her analysis focused on the inherently political nature of women’s collective reality, at a time when women’s experience of a dislocated existence within male paradigms was increasingly seen as offering a standpoint for non male constructed knowledge.

The early feminist concern for solidarity had tended to minimize differences among women, focusing instead on differences between men and women or (in the case of psychoanalytically inspired feminism) on different aspects of individual women. However the 1980s saw a growing focus on the specificity of Latin American women and their writing. Chilean sociologist Hernán Vidal, co-ordinator of the 1988 Conference on Cultural and Historical Grounding for Hispanic and LusoBrazilian Feminist Literary Criticism, was one of several speakers to contrast the more privatized and individualistic concerns of Northern feminism and the more social, public and structural orientation of Latin American critics. As suggested above, such generalizations are inevitably reductive. At the same time they leave Latin Americanists who are also Northern feminists out of the picture—a key omission, since the only full-length studies towards a specifically Latin American literary theory have come from this group.

The first of these attempts came four years later with US critic Debra Castillo’s Talking Back: Toward a Latin American Feminist Literary Criticism. It starts from the undesirability of subjecting the diversity of Latin American women’s writing to a single, overarching theoretical framework. Instead (following Ludmer) Castillo takes such conventionally negative features of specific Latin American and Latino women’s texts as silences and superficiality, and redeploy them as ingredients in her critical recipe. Exploiting the work of poststructuralist, postmodern, postcolonial and French feminist theorists, she attempts to engage not only with women writers from the middle classes but also, by a complex process of double voicing, with urban poor, Indian and other less audible women.

In a 1992, essay, Jean Franco marks a critical shift away from the ethical and political complexities of representing other women towards a more pragmatic attempt to engage with them. This was in part a response to the growing importance for international feminism of Latin America’s new social movements. In her own full-length study of Latin American feminist criticism published a year later, US critic Amy Kaminsky’s emphasis on political practice and women’s agency takes this move towards engagement a stage further. Like Vidal she believes that the “political” and the “aesthetic” have been constructed as antithetical in the US academy and the “political” marginalized in its literary discourse. Suggesting that (particularly lesbian) sexuality has been similarly marginalized in Latin America, she attempts to bridge these differences by undertaking a feminist “demetaphorization” of the language of sexuality for Latin Americanists and a “dethetorization” of the language of politics for (North American) feminists.

Clearly, North/South tension has been a key factor in the development of Latin American feminist literary theory. However no survey of this theory can neglect the influential critique directed at such binary oppositions by Latin American women writers who have grown up in the US. By celebrating their hybrid status as latinas—and in the case of Gloria Anzaldúa and Cherrie Moraga as lesbian latinas—these women have opened up a rich vein of theoretical possibilities which has yet to be fully explored.

ANNY BROOKSBANK JONES
Further Reading

—— “Going Public: Rehabilitating the Private,” in On Edge: the Crisis of Contemporary Latin American Culture, edited by Franco George Yúdice and Ángel Flores, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993

Vidal, Hernán, Cultural and Historical Grounding for Hispanic and Luso-Brazilian Feminist Literary Criticism, Minneapolis: Institute for the Studies of Ideology and Literature, 1989 [See, in particular, the article by Naomi Lindstrom]

Special Issues of Journals

Macedonio Fernández 1874–1952

Argentine experimental prose writer

During the last few decades, Macedonio Fernández’s work has attained extraordinary renown and has become a real revelation to the younger generations of writers, who consider him the most authentic forerunner of the avant-garde break with tradition and the innovative linguistic features of the contemporary novel. Furthermore, knowledge of his aesthetic and philosophical theories—only partly disseminated until a few years ago—has opened up new research perspectives to critics, thus intensifying interest in his work in a remarkable way through studies and newspaper articles which try to grasp his complex creative activity from very different angles.
The renown which Macedonio’s personality has acquired is clearly justified as soon as we come into contact with the peculiar expressive subtlety of his theorizings and stories, which make him one of the most original writers of Argentine literature. The many and sometimes disconcerting nuances in Macedonio Fernández’s writing primarily surprise by the contrasting directions of their expression and by the dense network of theorising relating to artistic tasks which progressively become interwoven in the literary text itself. Fact and fiction are thus brought together on the same linguistic level, which from the basis of that duality, unexpectedly severs the usual relationships of discourse, and presents us with a fresh anti-rhetorical proposition opposed to conventional form.

Although in many passages of his theorizings Macedonio puts forward three specific genres—poetics, serious prose and humorous prose—he never places them in a regular order nor does he present them as inflexible or unquestionable models; instead they are linked only by the mutually exclusive procedures they share in their execution. He seeks to retain that which has not yet ended, that which flows creatively and, therefore, in the dynamic uncertainty of that which can continue because closure is not in sight. To develop all the time, not to reach a conclusion somehow, means giving in neither to the stillness of death nor to what it already closed and defined for ever. All his written work—not only that of literary intent, but also his newspaper articles, essays, speeches, toasts and even his letters—is in a fragmented and unorganized style but is essentially conditioned by a search for permanence which establishes an order beyond logical correlations and seemingly expressive subtleties.

Fernández’s preoccupation with renewal, so passionate and persistent, grows stronger in the course of time and is more obvious in his post-1940 work, where an inseparable fusion between his theories and technical achievements is evident. He displays at one and the same time two levels of writing: theoretical reflection and fiction—and he interrelates or confuses them intentionally. He thus puts forward a real questioning of his own task as a writer, showing it clearly even in its as yet unconnected primary material—in its interminable growth from the amorphism of the creative purpose—while he moves towards a concrete expression that is realized.

Apart from critical research and theories published independently, those observations on the task itself form part of his short stories or poems through insistent processes—notes, annotations, letters, postscripts, prologues, characters’ or narrators’ digressions etc.—which convey his articulation of the plot. This is a way of openly displaying the framework of the creative work and, at the same time, not throwing himself fully into the magic and liberating world of fantasy, ruled only by its fictitious implications.

Between what was promised and what was sketched, there are also innumerable prologues of his much proclaimed Museo de la Novela de la Eterna [Museum of the Novel of the Eternal], Here he feigns narrative weakness, and stubbornly perseveres in going beyond the limits of Aristotelian verisimilitude and mimesis so as to project himself towards a free and subjective concept of creative activity. That idealistic attitude, which challenges a true copy of the world around us, spurs him on to the purpose of capturing a bright and radiant memory of a higher reality free from spatial and chronological ties.

Not even causality or the sequential order of things is relevant to Macedonio in that illusory space achieved by “indirect techniques of emotional arousal,” where time can be turned back and the past, immersed in the present, constitutes an unceasing present in which reality and dreams, fact and fiction are fused into an enlarged experience that goes beyond the senses, without relativist frontiers. In it the author’s much desired relationship would at last take place with the hypothetical reader—“minimal,” “casual” “who reads only the first page” or “only one story” etc. Such a reader, on being incorporated into the novel as an additional character, allows the author to prolong his creative plan into an indefinable future, which will have to renew that interminable task with each new reader who identifies him or herself with the work, thus safe-guarding its perennial nature.

Macedonio Fernández is surrounded by an aura of legend that tends to make his work seem esoteric. This results from his self-denial as a professional writer, his lack of concern at having his work published, his determination to keep his writing uninfluenced by the trends of the time, his way of living, remote from literary circles—except during the years when he was connected with the Martin Fierro group and with the Neoromantic generation.

The reissue of his out-of-print books, as well as the appearance of previously unpublished material, offer a very different image of his aesthetic works and his literary output dating from the 1960s. In this sense, the dissemination of Museo de la Novela de la Eterna and of his Teorías has been of fundamental importance to clarify apparently obscure or unconnected aspects of his creative activity. These demonstrate his steadfast, though hidden, continuity of a task and an attitude which is forever dedicated to enquiry. From the very first of his publications, that analytical capacity, open to the provocative stimulation of philosophical meditation which is always part of his essential preoccupations, is concentrated on the search for a sense of purpose, as contrasted with the contradictory fortunes of our existence.

All the attempts at expression which Macedonio Fernández has left us in visible form are expressed on those basic lines. But what is visible is only a minimal portion of what can be surmised. His fundamental preoccupations spring from the need to decipher the mysterious interrelations which join life to death, sleep to waking, the past to the future, and our limited being to the radiant eternity which sustains us in some irrevocable way.

NÉLIDA SALVADOR
translated by Patricia James

Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 1 June 1874. Son of wealthy parents and thus had private income, but studied law at University of Buenos Aires. Taught himself philosophy and political theory. Doctorate in Jurisprudence, 1897. With Leopoldo Lugones and other friends decided to establish a socialist colony in Paraguay, but they lost heart en route and never reached their destination. Married Elena de Obieta in 1901. Corresponded with William James and began to think about the application to literature of a systematically irrationalistic philosophy. From an early age he published anti-Establishment articles. Withdrew from public life, but gave up his hermit-like existence for a time in the 1920s when Borges and others were forging the avant-garde in Argentina. Borges sought to involve him so that young writers might learn how a radical aesthetic might be developed, and appointed him co-editor of the literary journal Proa in 1922. Died on 10 December 1952, leaving a vast assortment of writings in a state of disorder.
Selected Works

No attempt has been made to place the works of this very experimental author in different generic categories.

No todo es vigilia la de los ojos abiertos, Buenos Aires: Gleizer, 1928
Papeles de recienvenido, Buenos Aires: Cuadernos del Plata, 1929
Una novela que comienza, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1941
Papeles de recienvenido; Continuación de la nada, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1944
Poemas, Mexico City: Guaranía, 1953
Museo de la Novela de la Eterna, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1967
Cuadernos de todo y nada, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1972

Compilations and Anthologies
Museo de la Novela de la Eterna, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1982 [A scholarly edition by César Fernández Moreno with extracts from all the author’s works]
Obras completas, 8 vols, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1974–89 [Includes previously unpublished works such as letters, and Adriana Buenos Aires; última novela mala]

Further Reading

Borinsky, Alicia, Macedonio Fernández y la teoría crítica: una evaluación, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1987
Isaacson, José, Macedonio Fernández, sus ideas políticas y estéticas, Buenos Aires: Belgrano, 1981
Jitrik, Noé, La novela futura de Macedonio Fernández, Caracas: Universidad Central de Venezuela, 1973
Kaminszain, Tamara, “Invenciones de Macedonio Fernández,” in her El texto silencioso: tradición y vanguardia en la poesía sudamericana, Mexico City: UNAM, 1983
Schiminovich, Flora, La obra de Macedonio Fernández: una lectura surrealista, Madrid: Pliegos, 1986
Tripoli, Vicente, Macedonio Fernández: esbozo de una inteligencia, Buenos Aires: Colombo, 1971
José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi 1776–1827

Mexican prose writer

Though it is for El Periquillo Sarniento (The Itching Parrot) that José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi is remembered, he also published three other novels, Noches tristes, 1818 [Sad Nights], La Quijotita y su prima, 1818 [Little Miss Quixote and her Cousin] and Don Catrín de la Fachenda (1832). When the freedom of the press was reinstated in 1820 Fernández de Lizardi began to support even more vigorously the Independence cause, and he joined the liberal-leaning Partido Federal, though his ideas were too radical for many of his contemporaries. Two months before his death he published a scathing pamphlet on the evils afflicting Mexico, a fitting testimony to the reforming zeal that characterized his life and work.

El Periquillo Sarniento is Fernández de Lizardi’s masterpiece and has been canonized as the first Spanish American novel. It echoes the picaresque novel (for example Lazarillo de Tormes) in that it describes the misadventures of a young man driven on by hunger and poverty to make a way in the world, in which he must cheat to survive; it also has a liberal amount of slapstick humour (good examples of which occur during his residency as a doctor’s assistant in Tula, and the episode when he attempts to steal jewellery from a corpse). Like the protagonist of Lazarillo de Tormes, Periquillo experiences a series of apprenticeships—in a ranch, a monastery, a barber’s shop, a pharmacy—thereby learning a variety of trades which range from the socially prestigious (doctor’s assistant, sacristan’s assistant) to the dubious (croupier, cardsman) to the illegal (thief). The important part of these learning experiences is that they are all based on deception. Those elements which El Periquillo Sarniento shares with the great Spanish classic are effective. However, unlike Lazarillo de Tormes, Fernández de Lizardi’s novel inserts long, moralizing passages which expatiate on the moral meaning of the events described and, for the modern reader at least, reduce their impact. Another important influence, evident to good effect in the prologue to the second volume is Cervantes; like Don Quixote, the second volume opens with a discussion between the editor and a personage called Conociemiento (Knowledge) about the reputation that Periquillo now has as a result of the publication of the first volume, as if to underscore that Periquillo is a real-life person.

The society which El Periquillo Sarniento describes is in flux. The second half of the 17th century in the Spanish colonies saw, in particular, a displacement of power from the hands of the church, the monarchy, and the land-owning elite to a new self-aware professional class of doctors, lawyers and merchants; a key date is 1778 when Charles III’s Decree of Free Trade allowed the twenty-four ports of Spanish America to trade between themselves directly without any need for Spain as an intermediary. El Periquillo Sarniento is sensitive to these changing social phenomena and gives a vivid picture of a society under the Bourbons (whose family succeeded to the throne in 1713) which, gradually, was becoming more economically and politically independent from Spain; an indication of this change of ambience is evident in the opening pages of the novel. The novel’s prologue describes an imaginary conversation between the author and a friend who tries at first to persuade the former to dedicate his work to a wealthy patron (preferably a member of the nobility) but then advises him to dedicate it to his readers since “ellos son los que costean la impresión, y por lo mismo sus mecenas más seguros” (they are the ones who pay for the printing, and are therefore more reliable sponsors). In El Periquillo we see at work what Perry Anderson calls “the national imagination” as encapsulated by the “movement of a solitary hero through a sociological landscape of a fixity that fuses the world inside the novel with the world outside.” It is not by chance that the first SpanishAmerican novel should refer to a new mode of production (capital-based entrepreneurial book production) and, by implication, to the new class from which it sprang, since the 19th-century novel is an outgrowth of the bourgeoisie. In Spanish America, as elsewhere, the growth of the new professional classes, including doctors, lawyers, merchants, suppliers and indeed, printers, was accompanied by a parasitic group of unqualified and dishonest professionals; it is these latter that El Periquillo Sarniento sets out to satirize.

Most critics agree that the main aim of El Periquillo is to identify the abuse of power in the professions in colonial New Spain. What is intriguing, however, is that the protagonist is used not so much as a means whereby the hypocrisy and corruption of others is exposed; rather he becomes himself a butt of ridicule. In Part I, chapter I, for example, the narrator, Pedro Sarniento, takes great pains to list the circumstances of his upbringing which explain his wayward ways: his parents’ lack of education, their lack of concern for his upbringing and, in particular, their frequent recourse to wet-nurses: what nowadays would be called an unsettled domestic environment. The didacticism underlying these details becomes only too clear when the narrator refers to the way in which old wives’ tales affected him as a young child, and the narrative beings to creak under its self-imposed burden of moralism: “estaba persuadido de que los muertos se aparecían a los vivos cada rato, que los diablos salían a rasguñarnos y apretarnos el pescuezo cada vez que estaban para ello, que había bultos que se nos echaban encima, que andaban las ánimas en purgatorio mendigando nuestros sufragios, y creía otras majaderías de esta clase que los artículos de la fe. ¡Gracias a un puñado de viejas necias que, o ya en clase de criadas o de visitas, procuraban entretenecer al niño con cuentos de sus espantos, visiones y apariciones intolerables! ¡Ah, qué daño me hicieron estas viejas! ¡De cuántas supersticiones llenaron mi cabeza!’ (I was persuaded that the dead appeared to the living at every opportunity, that devils popped up to scratch up and to throttle us with their tail any time they wanted to, that there were forms which jumped on top of us, that souls in purgatory wandered around begging for our intercessions, and I believed in other absurdities of the kind, apart from the articles of faith. Thanks to a bunch of foolish old women who, whether they were maids or simply visiting, sought to entertain the child with their stories of horror, visions and monstrous apparitions! Oh, what harm those old women did me! How they filled my head with superstitious notions!’ [Part I, chapter I]). It could be argued that the moralistic intention of this passage (which is typical of many others) is over-transparent, and Pedro Sarniento’s credibility as a narrator is diminished as a result.

The rationale behind the many episodes of Sarniento’s life emerges at the end of the novel. In Book III, chapter 3, the narrator is shipwrecked on an unidentified island in the Landrone Isles in the Pacific Ocean and he finds himself forced to justify the laws and customs of his native land to a sceptical Chinese chieftain (who may well be Fernández... de Lizardi’s spokesman). In describing his society’s customs, Pedro Sarniento manages to make them appear absurd (for example, the concept of a paid army, although, here, history supports New Spain rather than Fernández de Lizardi), and the notion that a nobleman cannot work: “yo soy noble en mi tierra, y por eso no tengo oficio alguno mecánico, porque es bajeza en los caballeros trabajar corporalmente” (I am a nobleman in my land, and thus I have no trade, for it is a sign of low birth to perform manual labour) (Part III, chapter 3). In addition to these absurdities, Pedro Sarniento’s stupidity is triumphantly revealed when, in the same chapter, he not only fails to recognise a plant but diagnoses its medicinal function in precisely the wrong way. The narrative of events finally runs against Pedro Sarniento and he is humiliated by the Chinese chieftain: “yo me fui bien avergonzado con mi protector, pensando cómo aprendería al cabo de la vejez algún oficio en una tierra que no consentía inútiles ni vagos Periquillos” (I felt ashamed of myself before my protector, wondering how I should learn some trade while now so old in a land which did not look favourably on useless, vagabond Periquillos). When we ask the question: at what or whom is the satire being directed?, the answer must surely be the European customs of SpanishAmerican society, since Europeans are specifically mentioned by the Chinese chieftain. In its rather heavy-handed way, there fore, Fernández de Lizardi is satirizing the European infrastructure of the Spanish colonies through the voice of the chieftain, and through the actions and words of Periquillo. The novel’s satire is clumsy as a result in that it is directed at the narrator of the story, Pedro Sarniento himself, who does not even try to justify the way he lives (surely not a human trait).

There are some scenes in the novel, however, which show Fernández de Lizardi’s consummate skill in allowing irony to emerge from events rather than commentary. A good example is the frequently anthologized scene in Part II, chapter 6, in which Sarniento decides to become a doctor, takes on Andrés as his assistant and, with the luck of the devil, manages to revive a tax-collector (alcabalerro) who is on his death-bed. Sarniento’s oft-repeated use of Latin to hoodwink his audience and hide his ignorance when faced with medical symptoms, is effectively done. In this vignette Fernández de Lizardi offers a convincing picture of colonial society in which half-learned Latin tags are used to confound the populace and fleece the poor.

STEPHEN M. HART

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 15 November 1776. Lizardi was of Spanish descent, a criollo in a racially mixed society. Although his father was a physician, the family lived in fairly poor conditions. Educated at the College of San Ildefonso, from 1793; possibly received his degree there; in 1798 he completed advanced course in Rhetoric and returned to Tepotzotlán. Little is known of his life over the next decade. Contributed to Diario de Mexico. Bought printing press, 1810. Viceroy’s representative, Taxco, 1810: Lizardi turned over the city’s arms and ammunitions to insurgent forces and was subsequently imprisoned in 1811. In October 1812, founded his own newspaper, El Pensador Mexicano [The Mexican Thinker], a name he also adopted as a pseudonym; through the paper’s columns Lizardi attacked corruption. Newspaper lasted until 1814. Worked as a political journalist during this period. Founded many other newspapers during his lifetime, including Las Sombras de Heráclito y Demócratico (1815), Alacena de Frioleras (1815–16) and El Hermano de Perico que Cantaba la Victoria (182.3). Published some 280 pamphlets. Imprisoned in March 1821; excommunicated from the Catholic Church, 22 February 1822. Spent his last years in abject poverty and suffered from tuberculosis. Died in Mexico City, 27 June 1827.

Selected Works

Novels

Noches tristes y día alegre, Mexico City: Zúñigar Ontiveros, 1818–19

La Quijotita y su prima, Mexico City: Zúñigar Ontiveros, 1818; modern edition, with an introduction by María del Carmen Ruiz Castañeda, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1967

Don Catrín de la Fachenda, Mexico City: Valdés, 1832; edited by Jefferson Rea Spell, Mexico City: Cultura, 1959

Plays

El fuego de Prometeo, Mexico City: Valdés, 1811

Auto mariano para recordar la milagrosa aparición de Nuestra Madre y Señora de Guadalupe, Mexico City: Valdés, 1813

La Pastorela en dos actos, Mexico City: Valdés, 1817

El Unipersonal de Don Agustín de Iturbide, emperador de Mexico, Mexico City: Ontiveros, 1823

El negro sensible, Mexico City: Ontiveros, 1825

El grito de libertad en el pueblo de Dolores, Mexico City: Ontiveros, 1827

La tragedia del padre Arenas, Mexico City: Ontiveros, 1827

Other Writings

Fábulas, Mexico City: Ontiveros, 1817

Ratos entretenidos, Mexico City: Ontiveros, 1819

Calendario histórico y político; por El Pensador Mexicano; para el año bisieso de 1824, Mexico City: Ontiveros, 1824

Calendario para el año de 1825, dedicado a las señoritas americanas, Mexico City: Ontiveros, 1825

Calendario histórico y pronóstico político; por El Pensador Mexicano; para el año del Señor de 1825, Mexico City: Ontiveros, 1825

Testamento y despedida del Pensador Mexicano, Mexico City: Ontiveros, 1827

Heroínas Mexicanas, Mexico City: Rea, 1955 [on women writers]

Testamento del Pensador Mexicano, Mexico City: Echániz, 1963

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras, 10 vols, Mexico City: UNAM, 1963–81

Further Reading

Altamirano, Ignacio Manuel, La literatura nacional: revistas, ensayos, biografías y prólogos I., edited by José Luis Martínez, Mexico City: Botas, 1949
Rosario Ferré 1942–

Puerto Rican prose writer, poet and feminist critic

During the 1970s in Puerto Rico, the impact of the international women’s movement was strongly felt. In addition, the growing prominence of Latin American literature and the questioning of national and social identities helped foster a new group of women writers, among them the highly regarded Rosario Ferré. As co-founder and editor of the literary journal Zona de Carga y Descarga [Loading and Unloading Zone] from 1971 to 1975, she published her first pieces of fiction and essays here, and actively engaged in literary debates. Along with the general trend in Latin American literature to incorporate fantasy as a means of questioning established concepts, and the tendency to ever greater precision and experimentation in literary language, Ferré and other women writers of the Island such as Olga Nolla, Ana Lydia Vega and Carmen Lugo, created new modes of figuring female sexuality and reversed many of the myths of female roles.

Doll*), a collection of stories and poetry characterized by humor, mystery, fantasy or grotesque touches. Her prestige has steadily increased as she has also proven her ability to write insightful essays, literary criticism, children’s stories and a short novel. Not only has Ferré mastered a wide range of genres, she writes about a large number of subjects and utilizes in-depth research in her literary studies. The complex literary resonances in her poems and prose have produced a growing body of Ferré criticism and an international reputation.

As younger writers like her begin to write in an increasingly ironic tone the story of love and politics in a decomposing society, Ferré makes the feminist view of the colonized body a central issue. Her mother’s patrician background made her privy to the nostalgic narrative of the land-owning classes’ “paradise island,” as well as the northward-looking view of her wealthy father, ex-Governor of the country, Luis Ferré.
Her writing also reflects the life experiences of a woman who dramatically altered her role as housewife and mother to venture into writing as a necessary source of meaning—a narrative about submission and rebellion woven into the political circumstances of her country. Her study of the Puerto Rican, Julia de Burgos’s poetry, and of the lives and works of so many feminists, including Sylvia Plath, Lillian Hellman, Virginia Woolf and Simone de Beauvoir, brings into focus a major preoccupation during her emerging self-definition as a woman and writer noted in Papeles de Pandora, and the collection of essays, Sitio a Eros (Besieging Eros), the second, expanded edition. The enigma of love which her title suggests, a version of the title of a book of essays written by the Russian revolutionary and writer, Alexandra Kollontai, is a central topic around which Ferré’s book revolves. The search for an ideal love in the face of the bourgeois constraints of marriage, and the impulse to create, which requires an independence from the fetters of most love relationships, provoke her sometimes into the use of scathing irony or parody, registers present in all except her most recent work. A daring use of sexual language, and a humorous, playful rhythm in a style suggestive of Nicolás Guillén, characterize some of her stories.

In the collection of poems, Fábulas de la garza desangrada, 1982. (Fables of the Bleeding Heron), Ferré sets out to rewrite women’s myths, particularly love myths, to some extent as a dialogue with 19th-century women poets like Christina Rossetti and others, in which even these poets expressed their eroticism as a reflection of the beloved, a point noted by José Miguel Oviedo. As Margarite Fernández Olmos has discussed, Ferré reinvents metaphors and characters from the Western tradition, including biblical figures like Salomé and Mary Magdalene, literary figures like Dante’s Francesca and Cervantes’s Dorotea, and classical protagonists like Medusa, Ariadne or Antigone, along with Puerto Rican literary figures such as Julia de Burgos or her own invented heroines: Catalina or Rosario. The many references to women in the broader tradition of Western culture of this collection is akin to Sitio’s discussion of the lives and work of women writers, often surprisingly productive and authentic despite the restrictions of patriarchal society.
The scrutiny of women’s images and their reverse projection, displays a distinctly personal and self-reflexive style, less explicitly political than her next works. The women who have traditionally been portrayed as the (sexual) object, become the subject (of sex), often taking on sexually aggressive roles or other deliberately transposed roles. In one poem “Odalisca,” the slave serving the sultan is transformed. Her breasts become eyes, linked to religious architecture, connoting identity, vision, self-scrutiny and the mirror image which is the central conceit of the book. The Other (the female) as created by the male imagination is examined and dismantled, while the seeing eye constructs its space. What remains after the act of love is the solitary breast/female I/eye (of god) as the center of the world and female writing. This goddess-like quality applies to other poems in Ferré’s collection; thus the poetic speaker of the poem “Fábula de la garza desangrada” engenders and multiplies herself. The entire female body is endowed with sight, all of her orifices and parts become a symphony of sensual eyes via the tactile, the expressive and the visual.

In other poems, the game of reversals also unites mirror images, sexuality and textuality, and plays between feminine and masculine grammatical gender or role stereotypes. Female body images become blurred with male images in an androgynous play that nevertheless retains the specificity of the female body. The Catalina of one poem has her own harem of men draped over divans for her pleasure. This female rides her men like horses, penetrating them from behind, in direct appropriation of a supposedly male prerogative. In a poem which refers to the Roman goddess of the arts of cooking and the hearth, the home is invested with everything but ordinary domesticity. Making love in that context becomes writing, a violent passion linked to death. Throughout the collection, the women rather than the men play the active roles and transgress against norms. In so far as Ferré demonstrates that we are all written by language, she also shows her male as subject to disappearance by the gaze and invention of the female. He too is a wounded heron, whose voice can become mute and whose blood can be dissolved in the ink of the poet’s pen. The lament against the image of the female in the mirror becomes a song dedicated to ephemeral versions and visions, fragmentary beings reflected and reconstructed in mirrors and pages.

The author’s next work, like the earlier Papeles, takes place within a clearly drawn Puerto Rican society. Maldito amor, 1986 (Sweet Diamond Dust) includes a short novel giving the collection its name, and three other stories, “El regalo” (The Gift), “Isolda en el espejo” (Isolda in the Mirror), and “La extraña muerte del capitancito Candelario” (The Strange Death of the Cute Captain Candelario). The narratives span nearly one hundred years, from 1898, the year of the United States invasion of the Island, and continue into an invented future. The novel tells a melodramatic family saga within the context of the Puerto Rico’s transition from a Spanish-affiliated, sugarcane agricultural base to an economy dependent upon the United States. The position of women vis-à-vis men, be it the father or husband, is implicitly paralleled to that of Puerto Rico as a colony. The precious, diminutive pearl-island, engulfed within the vast ocean, is like the first, feminine protagonist, the tiny Elvira with her bull of a man, Don Julio. Ferré parodies the romantic plot: the powerful attraction Elvira feels for the gallant male, the subordinate status of Elvira as the supportive mate, an overwhelming passion brought within bounds via the legitimation of marriage, and her eventual death—a final silence. The author’s ironic and humorous use of 19th-century plots and omniscient narration writes beyond the traditional marriage-or-death endings of romance.

Beneath the smug dominance of the older aristocracy associated with Spain and now with the American-affiliated upper class, the challenging gesture at the end of the novel, allies a marginal group which includes women, blacks and servants, linking the possibility of independence from the United States with the breakdown of racial and class barriers. The question of power (on the level of discourse, at least) is not unambiguously in anyone’s hands, since the last female narrator’s point of view undercuts the omniscient frame’s authority. The appropriation of voice, via the specificity of first person accounts and previously absent racial and class markers, signals the problematics of identity, both of the colony which does not know who/whose it is and of the women who likewise speak within the confines of a patriarchal society.

In her most recent work, Las dos Venecias, 1992 [The Two Venices], Ferré moves to a more tranquil space, at once the dreamlike place where wealthy, Puerto Rican honeymooners travel, the imagined paradise her mother evoked in her stories and the cradle song of the book’s title, and the place of writing. Papeles’s irate view of marriage and class divisions, and the parodic rebellion in Maldito amor against romantic myths, are replaced with the harmonious yet vital space of flowing water: canals, island, urban and female geography blending in a new writing. The collection includes autobiographical essays and poetry, and voyages through her childhood in Puerto Rico to evocations of a wide variety of paintings and literary works. The title of the book discussed in the first essay establishes her major thesis: the journey of marriage initiated in the honeymoon can endanger the fixed identity as conceived by a young woman enclosed in her father’s house, or it can be accepted as a rite of passage into the open space of the canal, of the house without walls. There she discovers the freedom of transformations of all kinds in opposition to stable identities and places. The author talks of her own fears of dispersion as her body became a place of passages rather than the self-sufficient adolescent body, feelings only relieved when years later she began to write. While writing did not restore her sense of wholeness, it allowed the adventure of interior voyages, into her own channels, making her dispersion flow as rivers and ocean waves, words leading to other words, just as her body’s birth canal brought other lives.

The Venetian bridge of Rialto is converted in Ferré's book into a feminine character (thus the masculine word “el puente” (the bridge) becomes a woman (Rialta) rowing through Venice, the apparently immobile becoming an impulse forward through the city, museums, experiences and dreams. The eternal transformations from mist, to rain, to bodies of water, tears, as well as the changes from life to death, or from reality to dreams, permit the author to consider a variety of topics, as her experiences through various residences, readings and paintings.

Here, as in Maldito amor, Ferré combines the interior, the emotions and passions of women with the social forces of the world exterior to the kitchen, a goal described in her essay “La cocina de la escritura.” In Venecias, she posits a relationship between the interior of women with the external, the political and geographic sense of Puerto Rico as a Caribbean island. In contrast to her earlier view that there is no discernible women’s writing style as such, rather only a propensity for certain themes as lived experiences, with this work, she implicitly embraces the fluid, multiple “feminine” writing which some French theorists have made their signature. The flow of geography and the dual character of the island people, who stand on the shore and are renewed by the forces of the visiting peoples, or are renewed by the voyages outward, expresses a more hopeful view of Ferré’s early themes. The contradictory, bittersweet ebb and flow of the relationship between men and women in all cultures, and between dominant and oppressed cultures, between stability and change, seemingly suggests new strengths and definitions of the self and other in her two most recent works.

MARIE MURPHY

See also entry on Ana Lydia Vega

Biography

Born in Ponce, Puerto Rico, 28 July 1942, (some sources say 1938 or 1940). Father a former governor. Attended Manhattanville College, Bronx, New York; University of Puerto Rico, San Juan, where she met Mario Vargas Llosa and the critic Ángel Rama; University of Maryland, College Park, awarded PhD, 1986. Married Benigno Trigo in 1960 (divorced); one daughter and two sons. Founder and editor of the journal Zona de Carga y Descarga, 1971–75, in which her first works appeared.

Selected Works

Short Fiction
Papeles de Pandora, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1976; as The Youngest Doll, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1991
El medio pollito: siete cuentos infantiles, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Huracán, 1976
Los cuentos de Juan Bobo, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Huracán, 1981
La mona que le pisaron la cola, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Huracán, 1981
La caja de cristal, Mexico City: La Máquina de Escribir, 1982.; as “The Glass Box,” translated by the author and Kathy Taylor, Massachusetts Review, 3–4 (Fall-Winter 1986)
Las dos Venecias, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1992,

Novel
Maldito amor, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1986; revised edition, as Sweet Diamond Dust, translated by the author, New York: Ballantine, 1988

Poetry
Fábulas de la garza desangrada, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1982
Sonatinas, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Huracán, 1989

Essays
El acomodador: una lectura fantástica de Felisberto Hernández, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1986
El árbol y sus sombras, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989
El coloquio de las perras, San Juan, Puerto Rico: Cultural, 1990
Cortázar, el romántico en su observatorio, San Juan, Puerto Rico: Cultural, 1991
Further Reading

——“From a Woman’s Perspective: the Short Stories of Rosario Ferré and Ana Lydia Vega,” in Contemporary Women Authors of Latin America: Introductory Essays, edited by Fernández Olmos and Doris Meyer, New York: Brooklyn College Press, 1983

Lagos-Pope, María “Sumisión y rebeldía: el doble o la representación de la alienación femenina en narraciones de Marta Brunet y Rosario Ferré,” Revista Iberoamericana 132–33 (July-December 1985)

Méndez-Clark, Ronald, “La pasión y la marginalidad en (de) la escritura: Rosario Ferré,” in La sartén por el mango, edited by Patricia Elena González and Eliana Ortega, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Huracán, 1984

Ortega, Julio, Reapropriaciones: cultura y nueva escritura en Puerto Rico, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Universidad de Puerto Rico, 1991 [Contains two articles on Ferré’s work]

Sotomayor Miletti, Aurea María, “Rosario Ferré: el revés del bordado,” in De lengua, razón y cuerpo (Nueve poetas contemporáneas puertorriqueñas): antología y ensayo crítico, San Juan: Instituto de Cultura Puertorriqueña, 1987

Interviews

Adonias Filho 1915–1990

Brazilian prose writer

The work of Adonias Filho focuses principally on the southern part of Bahia, a zone of cocoa-bean plantations. The preferred characters of his books are those rugged men and women who are trying to colonize the land and are involved in violent struggles against one another and against the nature that surrounds them. His works express a tragic sense of life by means of characters lacerated by love, violence and death.

The critic Fred Ellison has described Filho’s novels as “neonaturalistic.” In Corpo vivo, 1962, [Live Body], perhaps his best-known work, Cajango finally abdicates his determination to revenge his family when his love for Malva pacifies his hatred. The end of the novel is mythical: the couple will seek refuge in the mountains, a passage that is expressed by the future tense, a verbal form that, in Brazilian Portuguese, tends to translate a time that is not within our immediate reach.

This impression may be further developed by reading O forte, 1965 [The Fortress], a novel that portrays an old building erected during colonial times. It is now about to be destroyed by the engineer, one of the two main characters in the novel, the other being Olegário. The latter is a black man who helped to build the fortress, who took part in the wars in which the fortress defended Bahia against invaders, and who is still alive to witness its demolition. Since the novel covers a period of over two hundred years, its historical and documentary intent (even assuming that the story is invented and that such a fortress never really existed) is obviously compromised by the internal inverosimilitude of a character who is more than two hundred years old.

This contradiction helps us to classify Adonias’s fiction in a more intelligent way: instead of being regionalist (if by that we understand social and political commitment), the stage in which his novels and short stories take place is in fact a templum, a space in which mythical (and not historical) plots are narrated. In other words, this short-circuit opens the way for a more ideological reading of his novelistic production.

If one were to pursue this avenue, the probable conclusion would be that Adonias’s works are still tributaries of what we might call a patriarchal epistême (search for origins): in Luanda, Beira, Bahia (1971), the main character engages in a search for his father (and the African traditions of his ancestors) in Portugal and in Africa; in Corpo vivo, it is a family matter of family that detonates the narrative.

But maybe it is in Memórias de Lázaro, 1952 (Memories of Lazarus) that the quest motive is clearest: Alexandre leaves the valley seeking to repeat his father’s journey. The novel ends up by portraying an extremely closed society, in which the contrast between the two spaces (the violent valley and the jungle, where Alexandre first found love and compassion) are neutralized to install immobility.

Adonias Filho also wrote a book on the cocoa region of southern Bahia (which serves as a substratum to understand a large portion of his fiction) and essays on the writers of the 1930s. The latter suggest both his literary debts and his possible differences from that group of writers. His works may still be considered tributaries of that hierarchical and authoritarian pattern, the difference being that now, in light of the decline of the agrarian sectors, the only way of restoring the patriarchal order is by means of myths.

ROBERTO REIS

Biography

Selected Works

Novels
Os servos da morte, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1946
Corpo vivo, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1962,
O forte, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1965
As velhas, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1975

Short Fiction

Children’s Literature
Uma nota de cem, Rio de Janeiro: Ouro, 1973

Other Writings

Further Reading

Reis, Roberto, “A selva como templo,” Minas Gerais, Suplemento Literário 654 and 655 (1979)
—— A permanência do círculo—hierarquia no romance brasileiro, Niterói/Brasília: EDUFF/INL, 1987
Brazil

Brazil was the first country in Latin America to import the French cinématographe in July 1896. Since that time the Brazilian industry as well as other ones in the region have been in a dependent relationship to foreign, particularly US, film industries (a situation described in greater detail in the article on film in Spanish America). Given the intense competition from abroad, Brazilian films have often stressed the specificity of local culture, sometimes relying on the adaptation of national or regional literature. While sharing this preoccupation with other countries in the region, the Brazilian industry also has some unique features, particularly its tie to the local music industry and its recurring interest in carnival and carnivalesque parody.

As noted by John King in Magical Reels, the arrival of cinema coincided with the establishment of the Republic (1889) and a series of other changes like urbanization and Italian immigration that favored its sustained development. Spurred on by the modernization of Rio de Janeiro, the exhibition sector expanded quickly, supplied by imported films from France and Italy. When Brazilian filmmakers entered the business they focused on the local and immediate. First producing actualities, they then turned toward fictional films based on real-life crimes and sometimes adapted operas like Carlos Gomes’s O guarani (1916) and literary classics like José de Alencar’s, A viúvinha, 1914 [The Little Widow], Iracema (1917) and Ubirafara (1918). São Paulo had a thriving production center tied to its Italian immigrants and there were also a number of “regional cycles” in Cataguases, Recife, and other places. The film industry was so successful between 1908–1912, that critics have called it the Bela Época. The short-lived era ended when US companies penetrated the Brazilian market in the early 1910s and began to push their films more aggressively by establishing distribution franchises.

As in other countries in the region, the conversion to sound around 1930 had both positive and negative effects. Many of the undercapitalized production companies did not survive. At the same time, Adhemar Gonzaga’s Cinédia studio (established in 1930) rose on the basis of films that took advantage of the new sound technology. Some of Cinédia’s earliest sound productions A/ô, alô Brasil (1935) and Alô, alô carnaval (1936) capitalized on the success of two popular phenomena: carnival and radio. The titles themselves were take-offs on the opening address of contemporary radio programs. Both films had minimal plots and highlighted performances of popular carnival songs by radio stars like Carmen Miranda. Films featuring carnival crystallized into a genre called the cbanchada which became a mainstay of not only Cinédia but also of Atlântida studio. The broad appeal of the cbanchadas, which combined musical numbers and comic plots, guaranteed the survival and relative success of Brazilian production, given the overwhelming competition from the US. As the only Portuguese-speaking country in the region, the Brazilian industry also circumvented the challenge posed by the Argentine and Mexican industries whose strength came in part from exporting their films to the less-developed industries in other Spanish-speaking countries.

The success of the chanchadas did not please all Brazilians. In the late 1940s, a group of São Paulo businessmen, disgusted by what they saw as the vulgarity of chanchadas, established Vera Cruz studio to produce films with Brazilian themes and Hollywood production values. Like the recently established Museum of Modern Art and the Brazilian Comedy Theatre, Vera Cruz was an attempt to create a “high quality” national product. Given its goal, it is not surprising that some of its eighteen films were adaptations of national literature like Maria Dezzone Pacheco Fernandes’s Sinhá moça, 1953 [Young Lady] with Osvaldo Sampaio and Tom Payne. However, the Vera Cruz productions never achieved the popular success enjoyed by the chanchadas. Failing to recuperate their production costs quickly enough, the studio went bankrupt within a few years.

After the fall of Vera Cruz studio, Brazilian filmmakers lost faith in their ability to establish a national film industry through a system of mass production. While many established directors argued for the continued efficacy of commercial cinema at several conferences on national cinema in the early to mid-1950s, a number of young filmmakers proposed a more radical solution. Cineastes like Glauber Rocha, Carlos Diegues, Joaquim Pedro de Andrade, and Leon Hirszman called for small-scale films produced by individuals rather than by large companies. The films they made following this model became known as Cinema Novo (New Cinema). Never a cohesive movement, Cinema Novo defined a loose affiliation of directors who shared a common outlook on the way to revitalize Brazilian cinema. Influenced by leftist cultural organizations, they wanted to make films about and for the popular sectors and not for the middle classes as had Vera Cruz. They followed the lead of Nelson Pereira dos Santos whose Rio 40 graus, 1955 [Rio 40 Degrees] broke traditional filmmaking practice by foregrounding the life of the urban poor. Subsequent films by other cineastes dealt with other marginalized aspects of Brazil like the migrant laborers of the northeast (an extremely impoverished region), the historical experiences of African Brazilians, and the struggles of the urban working class. The young cineastes also experimented with formal strategies. In 1962, for example, dos Santos adapted a Graciliano Ramos novel Vidas secas (Barren Lives) from the 1930s, about a family forced to migrate across the drought-ridden sertão (backlands) in search of work and food. Luiz Carlos Barreto, the film’s cinematographer, did not use special lenses to filter the hard northeastern sunlight; as a result, the film appears overexposed and conveys the blinding force of the elements which so shaped the family’s destiny. Glauber Rocha called these formal innovations “Uma estética da fome” (“An Aesthetic of Hunger”) in his 1965 manifesto where he argued that truly revolutionary films must register the underdevelopment of Latin America not only in their themes but also in their structure and stylistic aspects.

By the late 1960s, however, the Cinema Novistas changed their approach as a result of poor box-office returns and increased political repression. Influenced by trends in the other arts (particularly music and theatre), Cinema Novo entered its “Tropicalist” phase. Films like the colorful Macunaíma (1969, Joaquim Pedro de Andrade), adapted from Mário de Andrade’s novel of the same name, resurrected the cannibalist metaphors at the center of the 1920s Modernist movement. They critiqued Brazil’s dependent position in the world economy through carnivalesque parody and allegory. Filmmakers increasingly used literary classics as a source for films: São Bernardo (1973, Leon Hirszman) based on the Ramos novel; Iracema (1974, Jorge Bodanzky/Orlando Senna); Lição de amor, 1975 [Lesson of Love], directed by Eduardo Escorel, also based on a novel by Mário de Andrade; Dona Flor e seus dois maridos, 1976 (Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands), directed by Bruno Barreto, Tenda dos milagres, 1977 (Tent of Miracles) by Nelson Pereira dos Santos, and Gabriela, 1983, by Bruno Barreto, all three based on novels by Jorge Amado. Many of those films expressed social critique in an allegorical format that appealed to audiences and also avoided direct confrontation with the military government.

The Brazilian film industry continued to produce adaptations in the 1980s, encouraged by a 1982 state directive establishing an annual prize for films based on literary works by deceased authors. In Magical Reels, King notes how the state strategy “neutralized ideological debates” by relegating any discussion of the present to the level of allegory. Nevertheless, there were some piercing critiques in films set in the past. Nelson Pereira dos Santos’s Memórias do cárcere, 1984 (Jail Prison Memoirs) based on the notebooks written by Ramos while in jail was a particularly acute discussion of state repression and cross-class alliance produced a year before the country’s return to democracy. The prize also may have encouraged directors to look outside the realm of politics to critique other sources of oppression as in Suzana Amaral’s A hora da estrela, 1985 (The Hour of the Star), an adaptation of Clarice Lispector’s novella about the experiences of a poor young woman from the northeast who emigrates to Rio. Literary adaptations also took advantage of the popularity of certain novels like those of best-selling author Jorge Amado to enhance their commercial appeal. The adaptations of Dona Flor and Gabriela also capitalized on the star-power of Sonia Braga and the conventions of the successful pornochanchada, a type of soft-core porn that emerged in the 1970s.

If directors like dos Santos used literary adaptations to appeal to a wider segment of the population, others featured the innovative work of top recording artists. Carlos Diegues’s latest film, Veja essa canção, 1994 (Rio’s Love Songs), is the most extreme example of how films have been shaped by the commercial success of contemporary Brazilian music; its four episodes are based on the lyrics to songs by Jorge Ben, Chico Buarque, Gilberto Gil and Caetano Veloso. The film industry’s reliance on music to increase its commercial viability is more important now than ever before as a result of increasingly high production costs, the loss of state subsidies, the rise of TV and, more particularly, of TV Globo, the fourth largest private network in the world. Unlike the situation in the US and more recently in Europe, the Brazilian TV industry has not relied on film production companies for their programming. Thus, while forging some alliances with the literary and music industries, Brazilian film has recently encountered competition inside its national borders.

LAURA PODALSKY
Spanish America

1996 marked the centennial anniversary of film in Spanish America. The cinématographe arrived in the region less than a year after the first public screening in Paris—appearing in Buenos Aires and Montevideo in July 1896, and in Mexico City one month later. Functioning as both projector and camera, the machines allowed the foreign cameramen who had brought them to make the first films in the region. Local entrepreneurs quickly entered the business as both filmmakers and theatre owners. In the one hundred years since its appearance, the cinema has become a major cultural force in every Spanish American country. While the types of films produced have varied over time and from country to country, the various Spanish American film industries share a number of characteristics relating to their status within the world market that make their development quite different from that of other cultural products like literature. Spanish American dependence on imported cinematic technologies did not wane after the 1890s. Today, Spanish American countries still import both raw film stock and other equipment essential to the production process. Thus, the regional film industry is greatly affected by shifts in the larger economy (e.g., changes in the balance of trade, the exchange rate, and the rate of inflation). Furthermore, within many Latin American countries, US distribution companies have dominated the local market since the late 1910s. The recent emergence of Blockbuster video outlets in major urban centers like Mexico City and Buenos Aires suggests a parallel development in the area of video distribution. Given this precarious position, local filmmakers have often made films which emphasized the specificities of local culture, demonstrating a recurring interest in both documentary forms and representing the nation.

These tendencies are also linked to film’s introduction to Spanish America at a number of interesting historical conjunctures. As noted by John King in his book Magical Reels, the early development of the industry coincided with the establishment of the independent republic of Cuba and with a more general period of modernization in Argentina as well as in Mexico. It was in countries like Argentina and Mexico that cinema spread most quickly, supported by the solidification of the local infrastructure (e.g., electrification for a stable exhibition sector and the growth of transport lines, both within and between urban centers, for the circulation of both films and cameramen) and by an urbanized population that provided ready audiences. In this early period, several local entrepreneurs became involved in multiple aspects of the growing industry—capitalizing on their success in the exhibition business to become film producers like Enrique Rosas in Mexico or distributors like Max Glucksmann in Argentina. The early films produced by local filmmakers emphasized local sites as well as important government events. This type of production crystallized into weekly newreels by companies like Film Revista Valle (1917–30) in Argentina and Revista Semanal de Mexico (established in 1919). Other filmmakers began making fiction films based on local crimes like La banda del automóvil gris [The Grey Car Gang], made in Mexico in 1919, by Enrique Rosas) and on nationalist themes found in local history or 19th-century literature like the Cuban El capitán mambí, 1914 [The Mambi Captain], directed by Enrique Díaz Quesada; Amalia (1914), an Argentine film by Enrique García Velloso, based on José Mármol’s novel of the same name; Nobleza gaucha, 1916 [Gaucho Nobility], made in Argentina by Eduardo Martínez de la Pera, Ernesto Gunche, and Humberto Cairo which used intertitles taken from José Hernández’s epic poem Martin Fierro; the Mexican Santa, 1918 [Saint], made by Luis Peredo and based on the Federico Gamboa novel of the same title; and María (Colombia, 1922., Alfredo del Diestro and Máximo Calino) based on the famous 19th-century novel by Jorge Isaacs. Despite their relative success, domestic productions were overwhelmed in number by French and Italian imports and, after World War I and the end of the Motion Picture Patents War, by US productions.

The introduction of sound technology in Spanish America concentrated the film industry by raising production costs to levels beyond the means of artisan-filmmakers and delivered a fatal blow to regional production (e.g., in places like Yucatan and Guadalajara). At the same time, the conversion to sound cut into Hollywood’s hold over Spanish-language audiences and a studio system arose in both Argentina and Mexico. The studios gained a foothold in the Spanish American market by doing what Hollywood could not; they produced films which foregrounded emblems of national identity like music and dance. In the early 1930s, Argentine filmmakers capitalized on the success of tango in dance halls and radio shows and made films which mixed melodrama and musical numbers. The success of these films was brief. During World War II, the already faltering Argentine industry was almost paralyzed when the US restricted the sale of raw film stock to Argentina to punish its supposed support of the Axis. While the Argentine industry stagnated, the Mexican film industry flourished with direct support from the US. The Mexican studios specialized in comedias rancheras (ranch comedies), family melodramas, and films about the Revolution of 1910. Having created a number of popular genres, the Mexican industry did not rely on adaptations of local literature during this “golden age” although there were a few exceptions [e.g., two other versions of Santa (1931, Antonio Moreno and 1943, Norman Foster) and one of Mariano Azuela’s Los de abajo (1939, Chano Ureta)]. In fact, Mexican films were successful not only within the country but also in the larger Spanish-language market. The Mexican government eventually created a distribution agency, Pel-Mex, in 1945 to aid further the exportation of their films to the rest of Spanish America. Other Spanish American countries produced films only sporadically. Like the Argentines and Mexicans, filmmakers in these countries tried to distinguish their productions from those of the competition by highlighting the specificity of national culture. Cuban films from both the 1930s and the 1950s featured African-Cuban rhythms while Bolivian productions often focused on indigenous culture. Unable to compete with imported films from the US and Mexico or to recuperate their production costs on the small domestic market, these efforts were short-lived. Even Mexico’s success was relative. While it was able to foster a healthy domestic industry as well as to corner an important part of the larger Spanish-language market, Mexico was never able to threaten Hollywood’s hegemony.

By the late 1950s and early 1960s, filmmakers in many Spanish American countries as well as in Brazil began to advocate a new type of filmmaking in response to both the crisis in local production and the contemporary political climate. Registering the revolutionary fervor present in Latin American following the 1959 Cuban Revolution, political groups in various Latin American countries criticized the influence of the US on the region, the structure of their national economies, and the marginalized status of the poor and of particular racial and ethnic groups. A new generation of filmmakers took an active role in the politicized atmosphere and used their medium to help shape the debate. They argued that the dominance of imported Hollywood cinema had an alienating effect on the local population and simply furthered US neo-imperialism. The young filmmakers also renounced the older Latin American cinema as merely imitative and called for a new type of cinema that would address the problems of their nations in a more “authentic” manner. Influenced by Italian Neorealism, they favored films informed by documentary impulses. After training at the Centro Sperimentale in Rome, Fernando Birri established a school for documentary filmmaking in Santa Fe, Argentina in 1956. For the next four years, Birri collaborated with his young students on films about the socio-economic conditions of the surrounding area. From 1959 to the mid1960s, filmmakers in Cuba produced hundreds of newsreels and documentaries about the progress of the Revolution and about regions of the country that had been previously ignored. The filmmakers in these and other countries shared a desire to use film to explore the issue of national identity and to unite the people of their country.

Despite these shared goals, their work emerged in and responded to very different social and political contexts. After 1959, Cuban cineastes placed their cameras in service of the Revolution which was radically restructuring both the social and the economic order of the island along socialist principles. The film industry itself was nationalized and all aspects of the business (production, distribution, and exhibition) were placed under the control of ICAIC, the state film agency. The antiimperialist stand of the Cuban Revolution served as an inspiration for leftist movements throughout Latin America. While many Latin American cineastes supported particular political and social movements in their respective countries, they often faced opposition from conservative administrations. Two Peronist militants in Argentina used film to protest the repressive actions of the military government (1966–73). Fernando Solanas and Octavio Getino produced La hora de los hornos, 1966–68 [The Hour of the Furnaces] to diagnose the social and economic ills of their country and to advocate the return to power of exiled leader Juan Perón. Solanas and Getino made their film covertly and screened it at secret locations to avoid government repression. This type of “guerrilla filmmaking” emerged from their belief that the camera should be used like a gun; by “shooting” the problems of society, films could further the fight for social justice and revolutionary change. Similar efforts by filmmaking collectives arose in the late 1960s and early 1970s in both Bolivia (Grupo Ukumau) and in Chile (Equipo Tercer Año or Third Year Team).

These national cinematic movements developed in relative isolation until the late 1960s. At that time, these filmmakers finally coalesced as a group during several film festivals held in different Latin America countries. At the 1968 festival in Mérida, Venezuela, various Latin American filmmakers drafted a resolution in which they called for a “cinema of reality.” Rejecting the notion of cinema as entertainment or escapism, the filmmakers felt that the medium should register the poverty and underdevelopment of the region and the very specific social and economic problems of each country. These principles formed the basis of what came to be called New Latin American Cinema.

While this generation of filmmakers agitated for social change, only the Cubans managed to restructure the film industry in their country. In other countries, the lack of structural change limited the radicalizing possibilities of the films. Often circulating on the margins of the commercial industry, the films of the New Latin American Cinema did not effectively challenge the domination of US imports. Eventually their inability to reach mass audiences on a consistent basis, the continuing difficulty of obtaining financing for stylistically experimental films, and a number of other factors forced filmmakers to redirect their efforts. The highly politicized atmosphere of the 1960s did not continue into the 1970s. Military governments seized power in Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, and Uruguay and violently repressed not only the more militant guerrilla groups but also numerous leftist filmmakers—many of whom went into exile. In the 1980s, democratic administrations returned to many Latin American countries but were strapped with an economic crisis that diminished the capacity of state film agencies like INC (Argentina, established 1956) and Embrafilme (Brazil, 1969–90) to support actively the local industry through low-interest loans and other types of subsidies.

In the face of this general crisis, filmmakers have tried different strategies in the 1980s and 1990s to overcome these multiple difficulties. Several filmmakers resuscitated older, popular genres like the melodrama in films like Camila, directed by María Luisa Bemberg (Argentina, 1984), and another Argentine film, La historia oficial, 1984 [The Official Version], directed by Luis Puenzo. Others experimented with newer ones like the thriller-adventure film as in Johnny Cien Pesos, or One Hundred Pesos Johnny (Cuba-Mexico-Chile, 1993, Gustavo Graef Marino). Films like these three managed to package social criticism in commercially-viable formulas. While still calling on their audiences to examine critically their own society, these films did not advocate immediate political action as did many Latin American films in the late 1960s and early 1970s. Instead, they made themselves more accessible to larger sectors of the population by using intense emotion or comedy to protest social inequalities and injustice. While attracting wider audiences, the technical sophistication of these films also raised production costs and forced filmmakers to find financial backing outside their own countries. At the same time, the film industry as a whole faced stiff competition from television and video. However, these trends have also created some new options. Recently some cineastes have financed their work through agreements with either film companies or TV stations in Spain, Germany, and England. A number of contemporary Latin American directors repeatedly finance their films this way like Ruy Guerra, Miguel Littín, and María Luisa Bemberg, whose film Yo, la peor de todas, 1990 [I, the Worst of All] was based on Octavio Paz’s Sor Juana, o las trampas de la fe (Sor Juana, or, the Traps of Faith). While providing both much-needed funds and access to wider distribution, the co-productions often need to address audiences across different borders. As scholars B. Ruby Rich and Kathleen Newman note, the rise of the co-production marks a turn away from the national toward the global—a shift linked to changes in the world economy.

Globalizing tendencies are also evident in the increasingly noticeable intersection of the literary and film industries, particularly evident in the rise of Gabriel García Márquez as a major force shaping Spanish American film. As mentioned above, the film industry has often drawn on the literary world. National literary classics were adapted to the screen from the 1910s onward and the classic Mexican industry claimed not only its own literary traditions (e.g., Los de abajo, Pedro Páramo) but also those of other countries (e.g., the Venezuelan novel Doña Bárbara; the Colombian María; and the French Nana). However, Spanish American writers never worked directly for studios as did US writers like James M. Cain and William Faulkner. It was only after the studio era that a significant number of writers became involved with the film industry—either having their work repeatedly used as a source for films (e.g., Augusto Roa Bastos, Beatriz Guido, Julio Cortázar, Manuel Puig, Gabriel García Márquez; being involved in the film-making process themselves as screenwriters, directors, or actors (e.g., Antonio Skármeta, Mario Benedetti, Manuel Puig, Carlos Fuentes, Gabriel García Márquez); or being fascinated by, and sometimes formally schooled in, film-making (e.g., Jorge Luis Borges; Guillermo Cabrera Infante, Manuel Puig). In many of these cases, the involvement of the Spanish American author in the film industry arose out of a general post-Boom celebration of literature as both industry and art form and a more specific positioning of the author as star. Those shifts in the field of literature dovetailed with the needs of both the contemporary Spanish-language and world film industries.

Gabriel García Márquez epitomizes these trends. In 1987, he was named head of the Fundación del Nuevo Cine Latinoamericano, a foundation designed to foster co-productions. While perhaps linked to his personal friendship with Fidel Castro, García Márquez’s position is attributable also to his canonical status in the world of literature and to his marketability, which lend prestige and his fund-raising capacity to the fledgling institution. García Márquez’s ability to bridge the literary and film industries was established the following year when he brokered a deal with Television Española (RTVE) to produce the Amores difíciles [Difficult Loves] series of six films which played on the success of the telenovela, the newest format for melodrama and a staple of Latin American television. Based on scripts written by García Márquez, the films were directed by prestigious directors from several Latin American countries as well as Spain (Colombian Lisandro Duque, Cuban Tomás Gutiérrez Alea; Argentine Fernando Birri; Brazilian Ruy Guerra; Mexican Jaime Humberto Hermosillo; and Spaniard Jaime Chavarri). García Márquez’s ability to anchor the interest of so many parties by seemingly guaranteeing both the artistic quality and the marketability of the individual films attests to his status in the international cultural marketplace.

Since 1988, producing films around a Spanish American literary star has become more commonplace not only in the Spanish-language world but also in the US: Argentine Manuel Puig’s El beso de la mujer araña became Kiss of the Spiderwoman (1985, Hector Babenco); Mexican Carlos Fuentes’s El gringo viejo, The Old Gringo (1989, Luis Puenzo); and Chilean Isabel Allende’s La casa de los espíritus, House of the Spirits (1993, Bille August). These films confirm that globalization is also a trend in Hollywood where many major companies are owned by Japanese and Australian media firms. Directed by prestige filmmakers with transnational credentials (Babenco is Argentine-born but lives in Brazil; Puenzo is Argentine; August is Swedish) and starring US actors, these films capitalize on the star-authors of their source-texts who are well-known to educated readers throughout the world and whose popularity helps to sell the films. These combinations of film and literature actually work to increase the sales of both products. This is particularly evident in two recent cases. The success of the film Como agua para chocolate, 1993 (Like Water for Chocolate), a Mexican production directed by Alfonso Arau, made the English-language translation of Laura Esquivel’s source novel a bestseller in the United States. Perhaps more provocative is Kiss of the Spider Woman, a virtual entertainment franchise. First a novel, then a film, the text re-emerged most recently in the form of a hit Broadway musical.

While not the only type of films being produced today, these adaptations indicate the globalization of cultural industries and, more specifically, the fostering of a pool of transnational writers and directors as well as a niche market of transnational elite audiences who act as both readers and spectators. The films produced in conjunction with US companies also demonstrate new hegemonic practices and place an ironic twist on the historical function of the literary adaptation. Cultural specificity is a feature of co-productions like Alsino y el condor, 1982 [Alsino and the Condor], a film directed by Miguel Littín which involved Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Mexico and Cuba, and Tangos, el exilio de Gardel, 1985 [Tangos: Gardel’s Exile], a Franco-Argentine production directed by Fernando Solanas. On the other hand, many of the US-backed productions coopt Spanish American literature and erase all cultural specificity. This is a far cry from the way that literary adaptations had been used starting in the silent era to distinguish the Spanish American films from their foreign competition.

LAURA PODALSKY

Further Reading

Fregoso, Rosa Linda, The Bronze Screen: Chicana and Chicano Film Culture, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993

King, John, Ana López and Manuel Alvarado (editors), Mediating Two Worlds: Cinematic Encounters in the Americas, London: British Film Institute, 1993

Rubem Fonseca 1925–

Brazilian prose writer

One of Brazil’s best-selling contemporary authors, Rubem Fonseca stands out as an urban satirist whose prose exposes the underbelly of society where white and blue collar crime symbolize the inequities of a corrupt and unjust world. Noted for his wry use of parody, intertextuality, humor, and profanity, Fonseca also dramatizes the role of the artist as an irreverent marginal, struggling to violate the image of the status quo in society as well as in art. Owing to his unabashed use of sex and violence, he has also become a very controversial writer, particularly due to his indefatigable defiance of oppressive standards of good taste and morality. In this vein, he can be considered an ethical and aesthetic vanguardist because his fiction challenges conventional notions of high culture and bourgeois codes that censure alternative lifestyles and forms of expression. Nowhere is this better dramatized than in his novel A grande arte, 1983 (High Art), a tour de force parody of “high art” in which the skill of wielding a stiletto becomes another kind of artistic expression. By infusing his prose with taboo words and actions, Fonseca affirms an anti-repressive stance that harbors socio-political agendas and fosters a radical aestheticism frequently associated with postmodern literature. In doing so, he provides a disturbing yet entertaining side to the Brazilian scene with the aim of offering other perspectives that will dislodge the reader’s customary optic.

Writing since the early 1960s, Fonseca gained notoriety during the repressive years of the military’s reign (1964–85), especially when his story collection, Feliz ano novo, 1975 (Happy New Year) was banned by General Ernesto Geisel’s regime. Watched over vigilantly by the regime’s censor during the 1970s, an era when fiction represented the only means for evoking the other reality behind the image and propaganda of socio-political order promoted by the military’s authoritarian program, Fonseca’s fiction, along with that of other writers of this period, experimented with new ways of demonstrating how tyranny, corruption, and evil were insidiously linked to the imposition of absolute power and control. By breaking through the crust of hierarchical behavior and jolting the reader into another way of thinking via an alien code of ethics, Fonseca deconstructs the notion of all absolutist postures. This stance dismantles rigid aesthetic and social codes, even to the point of implicating (authoritarian) artists who profess to be fair and impartial, as one of his protagonists states in Bufo & Spallanzani (1985), a novel about the abuses of all kinds of power. Creating characters who often operate outside the Law, Fonseca exposes the blind application of universal value and moral systems that do not accommodate the harsh injustices and singular circumstances of local realities. Also, in focusing upon the theme of cultural production, Fonseca subverts notions that Brazilian fiction should have to adhere to canonical Eurocentric standards of literature and so he has his prose engage in a playful intertextuality wherein foreign literature is shown to relate to Brazilian art and not vice versa.

A consummate storyteller, evident in his six best-selling collections, Fonseca has been consistent in his scatalogical thematics where the body becomes the vehicle for expressing uncanny sentiments about the fear and threat of modern urban living in a society of too many have-nots. However, most of his narratives juxtapose social criticism with metalinguistic commentary. In his famous collection, Feliz ano novo (Happy New Year), insights into Fonseca’s aesthetics may be gleaned from the story “Intestino grosso” (Large Intestine) which takes the form of an interview with a famous Brazilian writer. Here, the writer discusses his radical approach to fiction and his use of the body and eroticism which he explains is designed for the expressed purpose of disclosing to the reader a special kind of “carnal knowledge.” The fictional writer believes in confronting the forbidden, especially sexual desires and social taboos, instinctual behavior often camouflaged behind restrictive social conventions. This line of thinking is enhanced further with Fonseca’s deft use of metafiction which points to what is behind the mask of literary and political illusion, thereby also referring indirectly to the mechanics of censorship and exposing the logic of the censor’s mind. According to the writerprotagonist, the repression of the forbidden tends to justify and perpetuate the practice of many forms of censorship.

A staple in all of Fonseca’s narratives, metafiction also represents Fonseca’s continual dialogue with other literary voices. This practice is flagrantly developed in his collection, Romance negro, 1992, [Black Romance] where there appear innumerable allusions to internationally known writers such as Joseph Conrad, Stephen Crane and P.D. James. Of course, this volume’s title also pays homage to the other strong feature in Fonseca’s work, his appropriation of the detective novel genre. The elements of pulp and noir pervade Fonseca’s fiction and interestingly these flourish alongside discussions of erudite art. The juxtaposition of popular/mass culture and high art forces the reader to rethink the role of aesthetics within a social context and, by extension, the implied positioning and subjectivity behind the construction of all culture. In using the detective frame, Fonseca at the same time subverts this genre because invariably his detectives never get their man. In other words, the authoritative final ending, when all is supposedly solved, never occurs. Frequently the detection remains in the hands of the reader who realizes that there may be many truths behind all the deceptions. Even though Fonseca employs many of the devices common to the roman noir—fast action, pageturning plot, lurid violence—his self-conscious narrators are always involved in some form of artistic expression. His novel Vastas emoções e pensamentos imperfeitos, 1988 [Vast Emotions and Imperfect Thoughts] shows the relationship between dreams, art, reality, and the cinema in order to underscore how artistic truths emerge amid the montage of fantasy. Here, Fonseca also uses intertextuality to illustrate how various forms of art speak to each other.

Fonseca’s preference for narrative hybridity is also apparent in his mix of erudite art, popular detective fiction and the historical novel. In order to reread Brazilian history with other eyes while simultaneously illustrating how the problems of the Brazilian present are analogous to those of the past, Fonseca has written two novels that reflect this historical posture—Agosto, 1990 [August] and O selvagem da ópera, 1994.

With Agosto, Fonseca relates the corrupt dramas and political abuses occurring during the weeks prior to President Getúlio Vargas’s suicide on 2,4 August 1954 in order to mark this date as a turning point in Brazilian history between an old-fashioned type of politics and a modern but corrupt style of political intrigue and dishonesty. And with O selvagem, relating the vicissitudes in the life of Carlos Gomes, the 19th-century Brazilian composer of nationalistic operas such as O guarani, Fonseca again takes up the theme of artistic creation across several genres—historical biography, film script, and the novel. His work has been translated into several languages and transposed to other artistic mediums: for example, the story “Lúcia McCartney,” was adapted for the stage in 1987, and A grande arte was made into a feature length film in 1991, with an international cast. In these ways, Rubem Fonseca is not only reaching a wider audience, but is also crossing several artistic borders, an act repeatedly manifested in his dynamic prose.

NELSON H. VIEIRA

Biography

Born in Minas Gerais, Brazil, in 1925, to Portuguese parents. Family moved to Rio de Janeiro when he was eight. Later studied law at University of Rio de Janeiro and public administration at New York and Boston. Varied career which has included being a criminal lawyer, university teacher, researcher and executive in a multinational company. Has actively supported authors’ rights and served as Secretary of Culture for the state of Rio de Janeiro from 1980 to 1981. Awarded Brazilian Goethe Prize for Fiction in 1985.

Selected Works

Short Fiction
Os prisioneiros, Rio de Janeiro: GRD, 1963
A coleira do cão, Rio de Janeiro: GRD, 1965
Lúcia McCartney, Rio de Janeiro: Olivé, 1969
Feliz ano novo, Rio de Janeiro: Artenova, 1975
O cobrador, Rio de Janeiro: Nova Fronteira, 1979
Romance negro e outras histórias, São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1991 [anthology]

Novels
Vastas emoções e pensamentos imperfeitos, São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1988
Agosto, São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1990
O selvagem da ópera, São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1994

Further Reading

Sant’Anna, Sérgio, “A propósito de Lúcia McCartney,” Minas Gerais, Suplemento Literário, Belo Horizonte (December 1969)

Foundational Literature

The term foundational literature, generally refers to those works which seek to explain and evoke in imaginative terms, the birth of the modern nation state. In a concealed way, its function is therefore political and historical. Indeed, Andrés Bello, the 19th-century Venezuelan nationalist claimed that in the absence of adequate documents, and in countries where historical evidence was scattered, narrative literature became its substitute for history. Bello’s assertion is echoed in the opinion of a later essayist, the Peruvian, José Carlos Mariátegui, who claimed that the nation was an abstraction which could not be defined scientifically.

The more recent interest among Western scholars in the links between literary creativity and the evocation of national identity derive from Benedict Anderson’s linking of the emergence of print in newly independent states with the concept of an “imagined community,” which itself owes something to Ernest Gellner’s theory that nations do not exist prior to their invention by nationalism. Taking this idea a little further, Timothy Brennan concluded that the inventive process of national foundation, depends on “an apparatus of cultural fictions in which imaginative literature plays a decisive part.” In the specific case of Latin American literature, the most exhaustive study of the links between nationalism and creative literature is that provided by Doris Sommer, who sees the apparently domestic romances of the mid-19th century as reflecting, on an allegorical level, the conciliatory nationalism of the generation of writers following that of the leaders of independence.

Foundational literature, then, closely accompanied the consolidation of the still fragile nation state, and corresponded very closely with the Romantic movement, the influence of which was most strongly felt in Latin America between the 1830s and the 1860s. Romantic love, however, underwent a change on its journey across the Atlantic to the New World, for it divested itself of individualism, as well as of the impossibility of attainment. Preserving the sentimentality of Romanticism, writers gave erotic passion and emotion a public function: love of freedom and of country. Sometimes, as in the case of the Brazilian novels, O guarani, 1857 [The Guaraní Indian], or Iracema, 1865 (Iracema, the Honey-Lips, a Legend of Brazil) by José de Alencar, or of Enriquillo, 1882 (The Cross and the Sword) by the Dominican novelist, Manuel de Jesús Galván, the setting was the early colonial period, but the romantic relationships which form the central focuses of the works, represent an attempt to bridge a divide between apparently incompatible positions. Thus, in O guarani, the attachment between the Indian hero, Peri, and the white maiden, Cecilia, reconciles slave and mistress, nature and civilisation, paganness and Catholicism. The departure of the couple into the wilderness as orphans, and with the blessing of Cecilia’s father, a Portuguese nobleman who is to die a little later, serves as an allegory of Brazil’s essentially conciliatory independence process. Galván, for his part, delves back to the dawn of conquest to give us a vision of rebellion, romance and reconciliation, which points to the political disturbances of the Dominican Republic in the second half of the 19th century, as it was tossed politically between Spain, Haiti, and the United States.

Elsewhere, romance was situated in the contemporary age. In the Argentine José Mármol’s Amalia (1855), the love of Eduardo and Amalia symbolises the reconciliation between city and province, liberal Buenos Aires and conservative backlands, during and after the fall of Juan Manuel Rosas, whose role in the novel is to prohibit their love.

In some countries, the issue of the abolition of slavery was the wound inhibiting national unity, and this was reflected in novels such as Sab (1841) by the Cuban writer Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda, and A escrava Isaura, 1875 [Isaura the Slave Girl] by the Brazilian, Bernardo Guimarães. In the Cuban novel, the slave Sab, in his silent passion for his mistress, Carlota, is obliged to witness her marriage to the son of an English slave trader, who mistreats her. The novel allegorises the misguided alliance between the Cuban nationalists and the British, who were seen as using Cuba for their own interests, and posits a solution to national disunity through a more robust alliance of blacks and creoles, independent of the society of the latifundia, and which is symbolised by the garden which Sab creates and tends in the middle of the plantation.

In the Brazilian novel the situation is reversed in that it is the tale of lust on the part of a Rio coffee planter for a slave woman. Spurned by the woman he considers no more than chattel, he persecutes her, only for her to be rescued by an aristocrat from Recife, who ultimately takes her as his wife. The union of northeastern liberalism and a near white woman of proven conservative, Portuguese pedigree (her father is a “miguelista” who sought refuge in Brazil after the return of the liberals in Portugal), represents the reconciliation between south and north, native Brazilian and Portuguese, the old creole aristocracy and the more recent émigrés from the Old World.

Less often, the marriage of opposites as a symbol of national reconciliation, was lampooned. In Machado de Assis’s end of the century novel, Dom Casmurro (1899), the romantic engagement of rural aristocracy and urban petite bourgeoisie, in the form of the childhood sweethearts, Bento and Capitu, leads to jealousy and separation, reflecting to some extent the social changes which would find their political expression in the abolition of slavery, the overthrow of the monarchy, and the inception of the republic in 1889. Gone is the concept of a national family, mirrored in the reward of domestic bliss. Indeed, Machado’s novel portends the rather more parodic view of national foundation which is a feature of contemporary Latin American fiction.

Sommer suggests that foundational fiction does not die out with Romanticism, but is adapted to the more socially grounded literature of the 20th century, moulded by Realist and Naturalist priorities, and political populism. Thus, a novel like Doña Bárbara (1929) by the Venezuelan writer, Rómulo Gallegos, in the manner of Mármol’s work, effects a reconciliation between the modernising, liberal values of the city and the rural, anarchic world of the plains, in the characters of the city-educated, Santos Luzardo and the indomitable plainswoman, Barbara, but this only occurs after barbarism has been defeated, and the hero has established his conjugal rights over the land, by marrying Bárbara’s daughter, Marisela. What happens in Gallegos’s novel also occurs in the Colombian José Eustacio Rivera’s La vorágine, 1923 (The Vortex), or the Brazilian Jorge Amado’s Terras do sem fim, 1943 (The Violent Land): the emphasis is by this time on domination rather than reconciliation, the re-affirmation of patriarchy over the somewhat more feminised novels of the high period of foundational literature in the 19th century.

DAVID BROOKSHAW

Further Reading

Francophone West Indies

Although the countries of the Francophone West Indies—Haiti, Martinique and Guadeloupe—initially shared a history of French colonialism and African slave labour, their political and cultural paths have diverged over the past two centuries. The story of Haiti is one of extremes, epitomized by the dramatic shift from the cruelties of slavery to the triumphant expulsion of the French at the start of the 19th century, when Haiti became the first black republic in the world. These extremes continue to be evident in the violent topplings of regimes which have marked the decades of Haiti’s independence, and in the enormous socio-economic gap between the middle class and the vast urban and rural proletariat. The typical Haitian writer of recent decades has lived and worked in exile. In Martinique and Guadeloupe, where no slave revolt was ever successful, French cultural and political hegemony has always been a fact of life. France’s Eastern Caribbean possessions were maintained as sugar-producing colonies until the abolition of slavery in 1848, and prolonged in this tradition by indentured labour until the decline of the sugar industry in the present century. Today Martinique and Guadeloupe, now accorded the status of Overseas Departments of France, no longer produce wealth but are consumer societies wholly subsidized by the metropolis. The financial advantages of their quasi-colonial situation bring them into sharp contrast with the independent, but economically disadvantaged Caribbean states that surround them; and nowhere is this difference more marked than in Haiti, universally recognized as the poorest country in the western hemisphere.

These differences in socio-political background explain the differing tendencies in Francophone Caribbean literature. European influences were, however, very evident in the early stages of all French West Indian writing: metropolitan models set the tone for a curiously distanced presentation of the tropical landscape, while the racial hierarchies of the colonial era produced a particular sensibility alive to class and caste distinctions, to the oppressive interplay between power, birth and skin shade. At the same time, an undercurrent of loss has always been apparent in the themes of isolation, exile, and nostalgia for an Africa still discernible in folk tradition. Haitian writing also bears the particular imprint of black revolutionary triumph, proudly evoked, yet tempered by the desire for inter-national recognition. In the mid- and late 20th century, the theme of exile has taken on a different cast for considerable numbers of Haitian writers who have fled—mainly to Canada and the United States—in order to escape political tyranny and to seek freedom of expression. This North American dimension is largely absent in the literature of the French Overseas Departments, where, despite the privileged position of Africa at the height of the Négritude movement, Paris has remained the natural point of reference overseas. For these islands, France is the uncontested source of public education, media information, cultural trend-setting, scholarships and exchanges, as well as the chief agent for the publication and diffusion of literary works. Even those contemporary Martinican or Guadeloupean writers who deplore the detrimental effects of all-pervasive metropolitan French culture upon creole folkways and traditions, are generally obliged to do so through the medium of their Parisian publisher. Such cultural protest is, moreover, largely confined to intellectual circles; voting trends clearly indicate that the average French West Indian does not perceive close association with France as anything other than an advantage.

Literature and public affairs have long been intertwined in Haiti. The internal political turmoil which has marred her independence has also made her vulnerable to foreign intervention, most strikingly illustrated in the lengthy US military occupation (1915–34) which re-introduced a humiliating power hierarchy based on white superiority. The reaction of journalists and intellectuals to those years marked the birth of modern Haitian literature. Critical essays, anti-American poetry and militant fiction all contributed to the rise of the Indigenous Movement, dedicated to the promotion of national consciousness. A key factor in its doctrine was the necessity of solidarity between the largely mulatto Haitian elite—from which most writers came—and the generally darker-skinned, illiterate and impoverished masses that the bourgeoisie had traditionally ignored. The population was inadvertently drawn together by the colour prejudice of the US occupying forces, which knew no class distinctions. Alongside this internal spur to nationalist protest, many Haitians found a renewed source of racial pride through awareness of the intense wave of interest in African art and culture which occurred in Europe during the 1920s. Popularized by the Haitian journal La Nouvelle Ronde and then by such influential thinkers as Jean Price-Mars (Ainsi parla l’oncle, 192.8 (So Spoke the Uncle), this focus on African culture encouraged a poetic view of the Haitian proletariat and a flowering of such magazines as La Revue Indigène. The Indigenous Movement fostered the revival of the peasant novel, of which Jacques Roumain, with Gouverneurs de la rosée, 1944 (Masters of the Dew), was to become the finest exponent. Roumain discreetly deployed unique Haitian features such as Creole speech, traditional folklore and customs, and the centrally important voodoo religion in his portrayal of the neglected peasant majority. But overriding the nationalist theme of fidelity to African roots—and accompanied by grave doubts about the essential passivity of voodoo beliefs in a context crying out for social action—is Roumain’s conviction that Marxism offered the best solution to the glaring inequalities of Haitian society. Founder, in 1934, of the short-lived Haitian Communist Party, Roumain used Marxism in his political writings to justify his criticism of the Haitian regime and his vision of economic reform. The profoundly allegorical and didactic Gouverneurs de la rosée adapts Marxism to a rural Caribbean setting, stressing the need for individual effort, peasant solidarity, and full appreciation of the African heritage of dignity, strength and physical grace.

Roumain’s nationalist themes—together, paradoxically, with his ultimate move beyond Indigenism—and his long political exile made him a role model for successors like René Depestre, and for those still younger poets who felt themselves living the condition of exiles within Duvalier’s Haiti. Depestre and Jacques-Stéphen Alexis, both left-wing thinkers, both emotionally attuned to the world of the Caribbean folk, were both to be forced, like Roumain, into actual exile. In tribute to Roumain, Alexis created the character of Pierre Roumel, the idealized Marxist mentor of the naive slum hero in Compère Général Soleil, 1955 [Comrade General Sun], the first novel in which an urban proletariat strikingly replaces the peasantry as the focal point of ideological reform. The experience of forced expatriation enhanced these Haitian writers’ appreciation of the savour and variety of their native land, while also encouraging them to take a wider Caribbean view of their identity. Cubans, Dominicans and Puerto Ricans are sympathetically portrayed in Alexis’s novels, while Depestre, in Bonjour et adieu a la negritude, 1980 [Hello and Goodbye to Negritude], advances the concept of a pan-Caribbean identity which he calls, in a purely geographical sense, américanité [Americanness]. Strong parallels with modern tendencies in Latin-American literature are visible in Alexis’s theory of magical realism, on which he published a seminal paper, “Prolegomena to a Manifesto on the Marvellous Realism of the Haitians,” in Presence Africaine (8 October 1956). Alexis’s sense of national identity encompasses not only his African ancestry, but also the indigenous Indian ancestors whom he claimed as part of his spiritual legacy, and who in preColumbian times linked the Caribbean archipelago with Latin America. His brand of magical realism, which seems at home in a country where the supernatural and the everyday are frequently intermingled, is increasingly present in Haitian fiction, which infuses its portrayals of rural life with fantastic, dreamlike episodes that bring the Haitian novel close to many contemporary Latin-American counterparts.

The exterior circumstance of political tyranny has constantly intervened in the working conditions of Haitian writers. Roumain’s years of separation from his native land, the brutal killing of Alexis upon his attempt to bring about the overthrow of Duvalier, the imprisonment and frequently the torture of critics of the regime in power, have consistently maintained a climate hostile to intellectual freedom. It is not yet clear how literary life may be affected by the restoration to power of President Aristide in 1994. Rare was the dissenting voice that managed to make itself heard with impunity during the long Duvalier dictatorship. Marie Chauvet, Haiti’s best-known woman writer, was forced to leave for the United States after the publication of her trilogy Amour, colère et folie [Love, Anger and Madness] in 1968. Pierre Clitandre, editor of the opposition newspaper Le Petit-Samedi-Soir, was exiled to the United States in 1980, the year in which his Cathédrale du mois d’août (Cathedral of the August Heat)—a novel protesting conditions in the slums of the capital—appeared in Haiti. Young writers’ groups such as Haïti Littéraire disappeared altogether. Some eluded reprisals: the novelist Franketienne, for instance, whose denunciation of Papa Doc in Les Affres d’un défi, 1979 (Defiance and Dread) is effectively veiled in the rituals of the voudou temple and the cockpit. Other writers who remained in Haiti, such as JeanClaude Fignolé (Les Possédés de la pleine lune, 1987 [Those Possessed by the Full Moon], avoided directly political themes, focusing on lyrical evocations of peasant culture and spiritual beliefs. Jan J.Dominique, who left Haiti but chose to return, in Mémoire d’une amnésique, 1984 [Memory of an Amnesiac], used the device of a child eyewitness to present brutal events with a false naivety, all political commentary remaining implicit. Many artists opposed to the military regime of the early 1990s turned away from the dangerous written word to the less compromising medium of folksong and popular music.

Those who went into exile have not seen their geographical remoteness as a diminishing of their commitment to Haiti. Jean Métellus, who lives in Europe, has expressed in an interview his intimate sense of relationship with his own country: “In fact, I am a Haitian exile who has never left Haiti, and Haiti has never left me. For many years, my imagination has linked me to my native land.” Other writers have echoed his sentiments and developed socio-political themes which are key elements in Métellus’s work also: dispossession, political blunders and betrayals, the lyrical imagination and tenacious will of a vast, oppressed proletariat. Some, like the dramatist Syto Cavé, have returned home to resume contact with the popular culture from which their work springs. Others, like Roger Dorsinville after long years in Africa, came back tragically too late to find the Haiti they had lost. The journal Chemins Critiques [Critical Roads], launched in 1986 after the overthrow of the younger Duvalier, has attempted to create a zone of free debate for Haitian intellectuals. Important areas of discussion in literary circles, both in Haiti and abroad, include the function of the writer in a largely illiterate population, the appropriate place of Creole in literature, and the danger of being restricted to “exotic” subjects (voodoo, slum violence) in order to satisfy a foreign public in search of sensationalism. A recent remarkable example of the powerful, but not sensationalist, treatment of a voodoo theme is Lilas Desquiron’s novel Les Chemins de Loco-Miroir, 1990 [The Roads of Loco-Miroir]. The most striking feature of late 20th-century Haitian writing is the number of writers who are based in Francophone Canada. There is an older generation of established writers who fled to Quebec in the 1960s to escape Duvalierism: Emile Ollivier, whose novel Mère-Solitude, 1983 [Mother Solitude], is a rich backward glance at the complex essence of Haiti; Anthony Phelps, Gérard Etienne and others. A more disparate group includes the feminist novelist Nadine Magloire, and the provocative, ironic Dany Laferrière, author of Comment faire l’amour avec un Nègre sans se fatiguer, 1985 [How to Make Love with a Negro without Getting Tired]. A new generation of writers who have spent their formative years in Quebec, such as the poet Joel Des Rosiers, is now attempting to determine and express an emerging HaitianCanadian identity.

In Martinique and Guadeloupe, the longer period of colonial rule imposed French culture upon a population of mixed origins—African, Indian, Chinese, Syrian/Lebanese, as well as European. Although Creole is spoken everywhere, French is the educational and literary norm. Questions of race and language are thus tied to the issue of cultural identity, which has preoccupied successive literary movements in these islands. In the first half of the 20th century, the theory of Négritude, developed by three colonial students who had met in Paris: the Martinican Aimé Césaire, the Guyanese L.-G. Damas and the Senegalese Léopold Sédar Senghor, exalted an African cultural identity long repressed and despised in the West Indies, where the assumption of white superiority over black had been basic to the whole system of slavery. No subsequent Caribbean writer has escaped the influence of Césaire’s key text of 1939, Cahier d’un retour au pays natal (Return to My Native Land), which gave a poetic form to the militant demands of Légitime Défense and L’Etudiant Noir [The Black Student], movements launched by West Indian and African students in France in the early 1930s. Césaire was not the first 20th-century black writer to convey in violent images his anger at white colonial oppression, or to express his yearning, passionate desire for reconciliation with ancestral Africa. But his dense, searing text became the cornerstone of modern Francophone West Indian literature, and his theme of black cultural exile was picked up by many writers concerned with the search for identity: Xavier Orville, Vincent Placoly, the younger Simone Schwarz-Bart. The privileged position which Césaire accorded to Africa in his works—a step intended as a corrective to Europe’s long dismissal of African civilization—has been opposed, however, on the grounds that it encourages West Indians to bypass their own country in their quest for spiritual roots. This issue is still being publically debated by younger writers like Raphaël Confiant and Patrick Chamoiseau, whose Créolité movement regards Africa as a detour in the search for Caribbean identity (see, for example, Confiant’s controversial attack on Césaire’s ideology in Aimé Césaire: une traversée paradoxale du siècle, 1993 [Aimé Césaire: a Paradoxical Journey through the Century]. In the political sphere, Césaire’s approval of Departmental status for the islands—which, in 1946, appeared to be a vast improvement upon their colonial situation—has been criticized by more radical, pro-independence writers in later decades.

Another notion of cultural identity followed Négritude, and was to have a profound influence on the later Créolité movement. This was Antillanité (Caribbeanness), a concept put forward by Edouard Glissant, whose figure has dominated Francophone West Indian writing in the second half of the 20th century. Viewing the recovery of African identity as a practical impossibility due to the intervening, alienating centuries of slavery, Glissant has preferred to focus his attention not on a distant, imagined continent but on the real country of his birth. His vision of Martinique’s destiny is of a collective realization of national unity, composed of two sorts of solidarity: a self-reliant cooperation within Martinique to replace her increasing dependence on France, and a sense of fraternity and common purpose binding the Francophone islands to the entire Caribbean archipelago. Many of these ideas are resumed in his major collection of essays, Le Discours antillais, 1981 (Caribbean Discourse), and in novels such as Malemort (1975), La Case du commandeur, 1981 [The Driver’s Hut], and Tout-Monde, 1993 [All the World]; they are the core of the recurrent motifs in his fiction, poetry, drama and theoretical writings since 1956. In founding the journal Acoma in the early 1970s, Glissant provided a forum for psychological and socio-economic debate about Martinique and Guadeloupe. His own works aim at restoring, not the total emotional affiliation with Africa which was the goal of Négritude, but an understanding of the forgotten centuries of history and culture which belonged to the slaves of the Francophone West Indies and their descendants. For him, this supremely important past lies waiting to be rediscovered in a landscape which is emblematic of Caribbean authenticity, bearing the imprint of centuries of patient survival. Beyond reconciliation with the landscape itself lies the possibility of the birth of a Martinican nation.

Glissant’s insistence on certain themes—the value of history, the imperfections of Caribbean folk memory, collective destiny, independence and contingency, the effects of time and exterior influences upon a people’s culture and destiny—has had a marked effect upon succeeding generations of novelists, dramatists and essayists in this region. The Guadeloupean writer Daniel Maximin features in his novels L’Isolé Soleil, 1981 (Lone Sun), and Soufrières (1987), the theme of reconciliation with the past and the notion of an underlying cultural unity that links the islands in the Caribbean sea. Younger writers in Martinique today such as Patrick Chamoiseau and Raphaël Confiant acknowledge the influence of Glissant not only by direct allusions to his work, but also in their close attention to his directives regarding folk history and oral tradition. Chamoiseau and Confiant are particularly concerned with the promotion of the Creole language (long regarded as the vernacular of the ill-educated, fit only for comic usage) in serious literature, and the development of strategies for incorporating modified forms of Creole within works that, for financial reasons, must remain accessible to a non-Creole-speaking public. These writers share a preference for popular milieux the locus of choice for a panorama of collective history—and they show dazzling virtuosity in transforming a French narrative by the insertion not only of Creole expressions, but of “Creolized” French words, Creole social concepts and West Indian modes of thought. Chamoiseau’s novels—Chronique des sept misères, 1986 [Chronicle of the Seven Misfortunes]; Solibo magnifique, 1988 [Magnificent Solibo]; Texaco (1992)—and those of Confiant—Le Nègre et l’amiral, 1989 [The Black Man and the Admiral]; Eau de café, 1991 [Coffee Water]; L’Allée des soupirs, 1994 [The Path of Sighs]—afford a fascinating study of how two quite different stylists have come to grips with the triple challenge of remaining faithful to West Indian folkways, turning in a bravura linguistic performance and retaining an audience in France. Along with Jean Bernabé of Guadeloupe, Chamoiseau and Confiant coauthored in 1989 a short, provocative manifesto entitled Eloge de la Créolité (In Praise of Creoleness). In it they echo Glissant’s theme that the Francophone West Indian islands can never assume a true Caribbean identity unless they move beyond their present state of cultural and socio-economic dependence upon France. The notion of Créolité is based on the assumption of a natural affinity between Francophone Creole countries (Haiti, Guadeloupe, Martinique, St Lucia, Dominica and Guyane) whatever their political affiliations. A narrower concept than Glissant’s Antillanité, it is primarily the underpinning of a linguistic and literary programme which accords a privileged place to traditional oral culture, Caribbean racial diversity, magical realism, and the writer who speaks as and with the collective voice of the common people.

The two best-known women writers in the French West Indies, both from Guadeloupe, have not chosen to adhere strictly to a socio-cultural literary programme. Like their male counterparts, they are interested in questions of racial ancestry and cultural identity; but they pursue these questions in a personal and independent way. Simone Schwarz-Bart’s celebrated second novel, Pluie et vent sur Télumée Miracle, 1972 (The Bridge of Beyond), conveys the essence of a peasant community without ever actually employing Creole dialogue. Rather, the author’s richly metaphoric French text contains frequent echoes of Creole proverbs and habitual expressions that re-create the social ambience of rural Guadeloupe. Her play Ton Beau captaine, 1987 (Your Handsome Captain), relates the ending of a proletarian love story through a counterpoint of poignantly restrained French-speaking voices and insistent, wailing Creole song. Maryse Condé, probably the most prolific and idiosyncratic of Guadeloupean novelists, is sceptical and sardonic when she touches on the West Indian search for cultural identity. Yet a theme she has made particularly her own is the fate of the African diaspora in the New World: in novels such as La Vie scélérate, 1987 (The Tree of Life), or Les Derniers Rois Mages, 1992, [The Last Magi], she traces the attractions and misunderstandings that may arise between those linked by race but springing from different cultural backgrounds. There are indications that younger women writers may now be tending towards a more deliberate choice of literary school. Gisèle Pineau, for instance, has experimented with two types of text: one a short, realistic novella (Un Papillon dans la cité, 1992. [A Butterfly in the Housing Estate], about a young girl’s move from the West Indies to Paris, obviously intended for metropolitan consumption, with its few, carefully annotated snatches of Creole; and the other (La Grande drive des esprits, 1993 [The Long Wandering of the Spirits]), a richly detailed fictional history of a Guadeloupe peasant family, in some respects resembling the novels of the Créolité school through its frequent use of untranslated Creole dialogue, its pursuit of a multitude of different life stories, and its casual acceptance of the supernatural as a feature of everyday life.

While many contemporary Haitian writers have been forced to look beyond their country’s frontiers, adapt to exile, compromise with unfamiliar cultures, and find ways of assimilating a second identity, writers in Martinique and Guadeloupe are obliged to accept a de facto metropolitan French affiliation, since they depend on France for their literary survival. The current popularity of the Créolité movement shows, however, that there are fears in these islands that an essentially Creole social reality may be in the process of disappearing, submerged by metropolitan influences. There exists, therefore, an ardent desire to maintain in the Eastern Caribbean, and to promote in the wider Francophone community, a sense of Martinican and Guadeloupean cultural identity.

BEVERLEY ORMEROD

See also the entries on La Revue du Monde Noir and Tropiques under Journals

Further Reading

There is little work by critics that treats the Caribbean as a regional entity with a common colonial past and neo-colonial present. This results from a tradition of university departments that specialize in a particular language, such as French or Spanish. There is a real need here for a comparatist’s outlook.

Berrou, Raphaël and Pradel Pompilus, Histoire de la littérature baïtienne, 2 vols, Port-au-Prince, Haiti: Editions Caraïbes, 1975–77

Corzani, Jack, La Littérature des Antilles Guyane-Françaises, 6 vols, Fort-de-France: Désormeaux, 1978

— Le Roman Haïtien, idéologie et structure, Sherbrook: Éditions Naaman, 1982

Special Issues of Journals

Callaloo, vol. 15/2–3 (1992.) [Highly recommended for coverage of Haitian literature and visual arts]
Gilberto Freyre 1900–1987

Brazillian sociologist, writer and polymath

Few 20th-century Brazilian writers have had such a profound impact on the study of the nation’s social history and cultural development as Gilberto Freyre. A scholar of wide interests, his approach broke down traditional barriers between academic disciplines, to incorporate sociology, literature, anthropology, history and social psychology. The principal achievement of his most significant work was that, through the application of new theories in the social sciences, it presented a radical reassessment of Brazilian history, which offered a positive vision of the nation’s cultural formation. In doing so, it gave considerable impetus to a wide variety of research into all levels of Brazilian reality. However, it is also highly controversial work, both in terms of the methodology employed and the conclusions drawn, and it has generated heated debate between Freyre’s supporters and his critics.

Freyre was the descendant of a traditional, plantationowning family in northeast Brazil, and had to contend with the reality of social and economic decline in the region, with the disintegration of the traditional patterns of life which had revolved around the casa grande (literally big house) of the plantation owner. Much of Freyre’s work was a response to that process of regional decline, and, with it, the decline of his own social class. It was in this context that Freyre sought to reaffirm northeastern cultural values, and, at a time of intense debate over the question of national culture, demonstrate that the authentic spirit of Brazilian cultural identity was located in the rural interior of that region. It was, Freyre argued, a distinct identity forged by the social relations particular to the patriarchal plantation regime. Deep nostalgia for a past age orientated Freyre’s approach to his work, and frequently resulted in a romantic view of regional traditions. He saw the traditional plantation life of the northeast as having been essentially harmonious, centring on a more benign form of slavery. Such views would come under increasing attack from other scholars later in the century.

Shortly after returning to Brazil from his studies in the United States and Europe, Freyre launched the northeast Regionalist Movement in his native Recife, in 1926, with the objective of affirming and promoting the cultural values of the region. It succeeded in stimulating sociological enquiry into northeastern social life and cultural traditions, and played an influential role in the development of regionalist literature throughout the following decade. José Américo de Almeida and José Lins do Rego, for example, both acknowledged the importance which Freyre’s regionalist thought had for their writing. However, the movement was characterized by conservatism. Freyre saw the popular culture of the northeast, embracing living conditions, diet and art forms, as being in a state of steady decline, even extinction, suffocated by the relentless process of cultural massification, and thus in need of protection by those with the necessary intellectual and financial resources. For this purpose, he proposed regional museums, craft shops, folkloric festivals, and even a restaurant to promote the region’s culinary tradition. It was a paternalistic view of the popular classes and their particular forms of cultural expression, emphasising the notion of defending regional traditions from modernization and cosmopolitanism. The dynamism of popular culture, which explains its everchanging forms, was nullified, and what was promoted were folkloric traditions primarily... associated with a past age. There was a contradiction running through Freyre’s regionalist philosophy. Addressing the need felt to elaborate a distinctly Brazilian cultural identity, Freyre looked to traditional forms of popular culture to provide the necessary materials. He was, however, unable to extricate himself from the restrictive ideology of his social class in order to come to a deeper understanding of the conditions of life experienced by the social sectors largely responsible for the production of that popular culture. The result is a detached vision of the popular classes, which are frequently viewed as ingenuous and compliant.

Freyre’s reputation was largely established through the historical studies of patriarchal rural society which he published in the 1930s, especially Casa grande e senzala, 1933 (The Masters and the Slaves), which defined the main themes and preoccupations that would structure the rest of his scholarship. The book played a major role in combating negative interpretations of Brazilian reality through the positive promotion of the country’s culture and racial composition. Earlier writers had challenged the biological determinism which Positivist philosophy stressed as the major determinant explaining the differences between peoples, but Casa grande e senzala did much to consolidate the shift to cultural factors as the basis for explanation, as opposed to racial characteristics. It helped to provide a new sense of optimism and national pride, which many Brazilians were seeking. Freyre continued his historical research in Sobrados e mucambos (The Mansions and the Shanties), published three years later in 1936, this time examining the decline in the power of the traditional landed aristocracy and the expansion of the cities. Both works rely on detailed examination of daily social life, but are also characterised by a fluid literary style, intimate, even colloquial at times, which strongly conveys the author’s personality. Though admired by some critics, it was criticized by others who argued that it compromised the scientific basis of Freyre’s work. Most arguments, however, focused on the thesis of his writings. Freyre advanced the notion of an essential cultural homogeneity which had resulted from the process of miscegenation and which provided the basis for national integration and unity. He thereby contributed towards the elaboration of an ideology of national culture, which disguised the deep class and racial divisions within 20th-century Brazilian society. Indeed, Freyre played a major role in promoting Brazil as a “racial democracy;” a notion that was soon countered by others who produced evidence of racial inequality and prejudice at many levels of Brazilian society.

The central idea of racial, social and regional differences harmoniously integrated into a unified national structure was further developed in later works. The Portuguese, he argued, were well equipped to adapt to the new demands made upon them by life in the tropics, where, instead of simply implanting their own values and customs, they moulded themselves to the new natural and social conditions encountered, developing new perceptions, responses and values, which effectively constituted a new culture. In particular, Freyre alleged that the lack of prejudice of the Portuguese enabled them to mix freely with other races, and a symbiotic relationship developed between African and Portuguese which changed both. This was the basis for Freyre’s concept of Lusotropicalismo, developed in such works as O mundo que o português criou, 1940 [The World the Portuguese Created] and Integração portuguesa nos trópicos, 1958 (Portuguese Integration in the Tropics) promoting the cultural, and hence political, unity of the Portuguese speaking world. It became one of Freyre’s most controversial theories, and was strongly condemned by critics as a myth which, stressing racial and social equality, served to justify Portuguese colonialism. It was indeed used for precisely that purpose by interested parties in reference to Portuguese-speaking Africa. In the latter part of his life, Freyre and his ideas became increasingly associated with right wing political current, both in Brazil and abroad, further polarizing critical responses to his work. Freyre later turned his hand to fiction, writing what he termed “seminovels”: novels constructed within a historical framework. Dona Sinhá e o filho padre, 1964 (Mother and Son) and O outro amor do Dr Paulo, 1977 (Dr Paulo’s Other Love) examined human relationships against the backdrop of the political and social changes taking place in 19th-century Brazilian society, which he had covered earlier, and with considerably more success, in his historical surveys. It was as a social historian that he left his mark on Brazilian intellectual life. Many of his ideas have been effectively countered, some even discredited, but his pioneering role cannot be denied. His work established a firm basis for the sociological study of Brazilian life and culture for many decades.

MARK DINNEEN

See also entries on Fernando Ortiz, Regionalism: Brazil

Biography

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction

Dona Sinhá e o filho padre, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1964; as Mother and Son, translated by Barbara Shelby, New York: Knopf, 1967
O outro amor do Dr Paulo, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1977
Poetry
Talvez poesia, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1962, Gilberto poeta: algumas confissões, Recife: Ranulpho, 1980
Poesia reunida, Recife: Pirata, 1980

Sociological and Other Academic Works
Artigos de jornal, Recife: Casa Mozart, 1935
Mucambos do nordeste, Rio de Janeiro: Servico do Patrimônio Histórico e Artístico Nacional, 1937
Nordeste, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1937
Olinda: 2º guia prático, histórico, e sentimental de cidade brasileira, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1939
 Açúcar, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1939
Um engenheiro francês no Brazil, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1940; revised 2nd edition, 2 vols, 1960
O mundo que o português criou, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1940
Região e tradição, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1941
Uma cultura ameaçada, Rio de Janeiro: Casa do Estudante do Brasil, 1942
Inglês, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1942
Na Bahia em 1943, Rio de Janeiro: Artes Gráficas, 1944
Perfis de Euclides e outros perfis, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1944
Sociologia, 2 vols, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1945
Brazil: an Interpretation, New York: Knopf, 1945; revised edition as New World in the Tropics: the Culture of Modern Brazil, 1959 [written in English]
Quase política, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1950; revised edition, 1966
Aventura e rotina, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1953
Um brasileiro em terras portuguesas, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1953
Sugestões para uma nova política no Brasil: a rurbana, Recife: Secretário de Educação e Cultura, 1956
Integração portuguesa nos trópicos, Lisbon: Ministério do Ultramar, 1958; as Portuguese Integration in the Tropics, translated anonymously, Lisbon: Silvas, 1961
A propósito de frades, Salvador: Universidade da Bahia, 1959
A propósito de Morão, Rosa e Pimenta, Recife: Estadual, 1959
O Luso e o trópico, Lisbon: Committee for the Commemoration of the Vth Centenary of the Death of Prince Henry the Navigator, 1961
Vida, forma, e cor, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1962
Homen, cultura, e trópico, Recife: Imprensa Universitária, 1962

Retailhos de jornais velhos, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1964

Sociologia da medicina, Lisbon: Fundação Gulbenkian, 1967

Como e porque sou e não sou sociólogo, Brasília: Editora Universidade de Brasília, 1968

Oliveira Lima, Don Quixote gordo, Recife: Universidade Federal de Pernambuco, 1968

A casa brasileira, Rio de Janeiro: Grifo, 1971

Nós e a Europa germânica, Rio de Janeiro: Grifo, 1971

Além do apenas moderno, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1973

A presença do açúcar na formação brasileira, Rio de Janeiro: M.I.C., 1975

O brasileiro entre os outros hispanos, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1975

Tempo morto e outros tempos: trechos de um diário de adolescência e primeira mocidade 1915–1930, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1978

Heróis e vilões no romance brasileiro, São Paulo: Cultrix, 1979

Insurgências e ressurgências atuais: cruzamentos de sins e não num mundo em transição, Rio de Janeiro: Globo, 1983

Médicos, doentes e contextos sociais, Rio de Janeiro: Globo, 1983

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras reunidas, 12 vols, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1959–66

Seta para jovens de Gilberto Freyre, 1971; as The Gilberto Freyre Reader, translated by Barbara Shelby, New York: Knopf, 1974

A condição humana e outros temas, edited by Maria Elisa Dias Collier, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1972

Tempo de aprendiz, edited by José Antônio Gonsalves de Mello, São Paulo: Ibrasa, 1979 [articles]

Further Reading

Claudina, Assis, O monstro sagrado e o amorelinha comunista: Gliberto Freyre, Dom Helder e a revolução de 64, Recife: Opcão, 1985

Coutinho, Edilberto, A imaginação do real: uma leitura da ficção de Gilberto Freyre, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1983

D’Andrea, Moema Selma, A tradição re(des)coberta: o pensamento de Gilberto Freyre no contexto das manifestações culturais e/ou literárias nordestinas, Campinas: Unicamp, 1993

Loos, Dorothy Scott, “Gilberto Freyre as a Literary Figure: an Introductory Study,” Revista Hispánica Moderna 32 (1968)
A social history of northeast Brazil by Gilberto Freyre

The major work of Gilberto Freyre, Casa grande e senzala, published in 1933, launched a new phase in the study of Brazil’s social history. Armed with new anthropological theories obtained whilst studying abroad, Freyre reanalysed Brazil’s social and cultural formation. In the process he challenged existing negative interpretations of national identity, and presented an alternative view of a unique society in which miscegenation had produced a distinct, and favourable, Brazilian national character. Such was the impact of the work, and the acclaim which it received, that it was many decades before it was seriously challenged by critics, but eventually many would argue that the book idealized Brazil’s social development, and thereby concealed many of the conflicts and contradictions that it had generated.

The ideology of racial determinism still played an influential role in Brazilian intellectual life in the early decades of the 20th century. It appeared to prove scientifically the inevitability of the superiority of some races—and by extension some nations—over others. The racist dogma asserted that miscegenation weakened all races, but especially the white race, and led to degeneration. The logical conclusion was that the inferiority of the Brazilian mestiço would condemn the nation to perpetual underdevelopment. The theory was assimilated by many Brazilian scholars and writers, and engendered a pervasive pessimism with regard to the country’s future. Casa grande e senzala played a significant part in breaking such assumptions. Through his detailed study of the nation’s social history, Freyre argued that Brazil had benefited considerably from the distinctive contributions of the three formative races Amerindian, Portuguese and African—and the resultant culture was dynamic and full of positive potential. It was this optimistic interpretation, involving the rejection of any notion of the inferiority of certain races on the one hand, and the appreciation of the contribution of the previously denigrated negro on the other, that led to the book being hailed as innovative, and even radical, in the 1930s, when fascist doctrine was rife. Central to Freyre’s thesis was the work of the anthropologist Franz Boas, under whom he studied in the United States. Boas argued that the differences between peoples were not to be explained by innate racial characteristics, but rather by cultural factors. Perhaps the major contribution of Casa grande e senzala to Brazilian social history was that it consolidated the shift to culture as the centre of analysis, rather than race, highlighting the role of cultural rather than racial syncretism.

Unlike Boas, however, Freyre ascribed to all human groups certain psychological traits, which he saw as resulting from the interaction between race and environment. As a result, he conceived national identity, which he did not distinguish from race, to be formed essentially by psychological characteristics, which, though scientifically unverifiable, could be identified by intuition. The result is a highly subjective interpretation of Brazil’s cultural development, around which Freyre moulds his documentary evidence, undermining its objective value in the process. The high degree of subjectivity evident in Casa grande e senzala has been one of the most controversial aspects of the work. Although some critics have argued that it gives the work power and individuality, and produces a successful fusion of scholarly research and creative literature, others have demonstrated how it leads to significant distortions in Freyre’s interpretation, and results in the idealization of the social experience of the poor and oppressed sectors of Brazilian society.

Freyre’s assertion that the cultural behaviour of the Brazilian is largely determined by psychological qualities, rather than by socio-economic realities, permitted him to mask questions of class divisions in Brazil. Casa grande e senzala reinforces the mythology of an all inclusive national culture. The theme of a common psyche, developing through the process of miscegenation, to unify the race, and hence the nation, is repeated throughout the work. For Freyre, the basic psychological unity has been reinforced by certain objective factors that have further contributed to cultural homogeneity, namely the Catholic Church and the patriarchal family. It is this overall vision of unity, the harmonious formation of a national culture, that enabled Freyre to universalize his interpretation of Brazilian development, and present it, not as the perception that one particular social class has of its own history, but as an objective study of the Brazilian population as a whole. However, Freyre’s ideological approach can clearly be traced to his roots in the old, plantation owning aristocracy of northeast Brazil, a class being edged from power by new social forces. That provides the key for another interpretation of Casa grande e senzala: that it represents a reaction to the decline of Freyre’s own social class, and an attempt to redeem it through a favourable interpretation of Brazil’s social history. It is in this context that the work gives such prominence to the role of the traditional rural oligarchy in the process of national development. Freyre saw the old patriarchal regime, based on slave labour, as having been an essentially positive force in Brazil’s socio-economic history, laying down the foundation for national identity and the development of a unique racial democracy by creating an atmosphere that encouraged miscegenation rather than racial segregation. It was in the patterns of life which centred on the casa grande, Freyre argued, that the most authentic expression of Brazilian national character was to be found. The contribution of the rural elites is thereby projected into the future, linking them positively to the modernizing capitalist development that, by the 1930s, was reshaping the social and economic structures of the nation. Historical evidence that is incompatible with this vision of harmonious social evolution, such as social uprisings, class antagonism and the brutality of the slave system, is either ignored or incorporated into the work in an appropriately attenuated form.

The focus of Casa grande e senzala is very much the Brazilian northeast. However, Freyre could not isolate himself from national political realities, particularly with the process of centralization of economic and political power in the centresouth of Brazil exposing ever more clearly the decline and dependence of the northeast. Ultimately, Freyre has to express himself within a national context, and deal with the issue of national culture. Freyre, however, is unable to reach any real understanding of the process of articulation between the regional and the national, and tends simply to extend his conclusions on the northeast to the national level. In the preface to one edition of the work, he states that the observations he made in other regions of Brazil confirmed his findings on the northeast. That position inevitably results in contradictions. He argues at one point that different regions produce different psychological types, but still seeks to define the typical national character. Ideological restrictions hindered him from understanding the significance of northeastern socioeconomic development within a more global context, and his vision remained essentially parochial.

Casa grande e senzala presents an extremely detailed examination of life in the rural northeast, which gives new prominence to a wide range of cultural traditions, from practices of child rearing, to clothing, to cooking. More significantly, it emphasises the relationship between social classes, and recognizes the role that each has played in Brazilian history. It therefore offered a broader perspective of the nation’s cultural development than had hitherto been available. However, the theoretical limitations of the work, and contradictions in the methods applied, make it extremely problematical. For some critics, its main value resides in its literary merits, rather than in what it offers in terms of social and cultural analysis.

MARK DINNEEN

Editions

First edition: Casa grande e senzala, Rio de Janeiro: Maia and Schmidt, 1933

Further Reading

Carlos Fuentes 1928—

Mexican prose writer

Together with Juan Rulfo, Carlos Fuentes is the most important prose writer in 20th-century Mexico. Since the short stories of Los días enmascarados [The Masked Days], he has published twenty novels and collections of shorter fiction, as well as essays and plays. While his writing is often intensely Mexican in diction and theme, it is also characterized by a distinct cosmopolitanism both in its literary modernity and in its awareness of the relation between cultures. Mexican identity is often seen to be forged as a dialogue with other very different cultures, such as those of England, Spain, France and the US. Gringo viejo (The Old Gringo), for example, plays with the Hollywood vision of the Mexican Revolution (1910–17) and with the clichéd Mexican view of puritanical North American protestantism. Cumpleaños [Birthday] is set in London, while Una familia lejana (Distant Relations) presents a hypothetical Carlos Fuentes who has settled in France and writes in a gallicized, Proustian fashion. In the vast Terra Nostra it is the whole history and literature of Golden Age Spain which is seen as the living memory and hence future of Spanish America.

His first novel was La región más transparente (Where the Air is Clear), a brilliant and complex evocation of the Mexico City of the 1940s and 1950s as the aggressive capitalism of the Avila Camacho and Miguel Alemán regimes displaced the idealistic rhetoric of the post-revolutionary period. It makes ample use of the Anglo-American Modernism of Dos Passos, Lawrence and Faulkner to orchestrate a symphony of strikingly Mexican voices from all the social strata of the city. A further force in this novel is the shaping presence of Ancient Mexican mythology. He returns to the theme of Mexico City in the novellas of Agua quemada (Burnt Water) and at much greater length in his 1987 novel Cristóbal nonato (Christopher Unborn), a grotesque, bitterly satirical vision of post-earthquake (1984) Mexico projected onto a 1992, where much of the national territory had been lost, sold or invaded, and where the Spanish language itself is bursting at the seams with Anglicisms. The whole is saved by a nostalgic affection for Mexico and a fiercely inventive prose style.

Perhaps Fuentes’s best-known novel, La muerte de Artemio Cruz (The Death of Artemio Cruz) is a successful work which traces the path of a series of patriarchs and their families through Mexican history since Independence. The narration is separated into three alternating voices in the past, present and future, tenses, which gives an ambiguous and plural perspective on the career of Artemio Cruz, from bastard son of a Veracruz landowner through the Revolution to immense wealth and power as a tyrannical and corrupt business magnate. In many of his works the dilemmas of identity and freedom are played out in the arena of the family and over various generations, often involving complex questions of inherited memory and intricate doublings over time. In the same year as La muerte de Artemio Cruz, the novella Aura uses a haunting second-person narration to explore similar questions in a decidedly gothic or fantastic manner. A young historian, Felipe Montero, stays at the house of a very old lady, reminiscent of the old Empress Carlota of Mexico, in order to edit the memoirs of her husband, a general of Emperor Maximilian. The historian is seduced by the beautiful young Aura, who turns out to be a magical projection of the old witch Consuelo, and Felipe comes more and more to reincarnate the dead general. The whole question of literary genealogy, the rewriting of previous texts and traditions and the relation with the literary predecessor is metaphorically played out in such games.

In the late 1960s, Fuentes seemed to move in a rather different direction with a couple of novels, Cambio de piel (A Change of Skin) and Zona sagrada (Holy Place), which are far more carnivalesque, irreverent and mockingly selfreferential than anything before. And yet they combine this style with an often harrowing exploration of evil and violence throughout history and latent in every individual. In the first of these novels, the disquieting reversals, narrative inconsistencies and jarring combinations of style tend to deprive the reader of any stable position from which to view and judge. The authority of the author and reader is dramatized in the novel in scenes where an authoritarian ego figure is seen to enclose, annihilate or disqualify by turning into spectacle anything radically different or “other” which may threaten it. Women are seen as witches; the Jews enclosed in Treblinka are made to sing; the Mexican working class are reduced to picturesque mariachis; madness and violence becomes a spectacle to reassure the viewer of his own normality. Zona sagrada is an agile novelized version of the relation between the Mexican actress María Felix and her son. Here the conventional order is associated with the structures of Greek myth, to be mocked, reversed and fragmented by a narrative characterized by transformation, modern ritual and amusing juxtapositions of high and low culture.

Terra Nostra must surely be one of the most ambitious fictional enterprises in the Spanish language. It ranges from the Roman Empire at the time of Christ, Counter Reformation Spain, a mythical account of the Conquest of Mexico, guerrilla warfare in Veracruz, to an apocalyptic view of Paris in 1999. Principally, however, it is set in the severe, enclosing architecture of the monastery-palace of El Escorial, where King Felipe, an amalgam of various monarchs but strongly reminiscent of Felipe II, pits his notion of a unity of race and belief against a world which refuses to be still and unambiguous. Against the architecture of the monastery is set the dizzying combinations of the texts presenting the figures of Celestina, don Juan and don Quijote, while an inextricable web of narrators disallows any sense of centredness and stability.

Following this tour de force of erudition and stamina, Fuentes produced a spy thriller, La cabeza de la hidra (The Hydra Head), an amusing and exciting, lightly parodic novel about rival Arab and Israeli interests in Mexico’s oil reserves. The intricate doubling and twinning of the thriller plot become something altogether more high literature in the labyrinthine layering of identity and intentionality in the next novel, Una familia lejana. A Faustian pact to recover the past generates a maze-like quest over generations and between Mexico and France in which the plot reflects fragments of texts by a series of French writers, often of Spanish American origin, such as Supervielle.

Some of Fuentes’s more recent fiction has been realist in a more conventional but never naive manner. The four, loosely linked novellas of Agua quemada depict adolescents facing the future in four different areas and distinct social classes within Mexico City. Their semi-autonomous status within the collection reflects a fragmented society, held together mainly through the exercise of violence passed from one generation to another. La campaña (The Campaign) is the first novel of a planned trilogy on Continental Spanish American history, and follows the Independence movement through the adventures and travels of the protean Baltasar Bustos. There is a constantly ironic confrontation in the novel between the texts of the French Enlightenment which helped to inspire the movement and the complex racial and social realities which resist being interpreted through their prism. Other works, such as the shorter fiction of El naranjo o los círculos del tiempo (The Orange Tree) or Constancia y otras novelas para vírgenes (Constancia and Other Stories for Virgins), and especially the latter, parade their artifice in a much more openly postmodern way, with a vigorous often grotesque humour which combines memorably with a sense of tragedy, loss and exile.

Over the last twenty years or so, Fuentes has steadily published some major collections of essays. La nueva novela hispanoamericana [The New Spanish American Novel] is one of the clearest expositions of the concerns and interests of the novelists of the so-called Boom of literature in the late 1960s. Cervantes o la crítica de la lectura (Don Quixote, or the Critique of Reading) offers excellent insights into the writing of Terra Nostra, together with its bibliography, while Geografía de la novela [Geography of the Novel] situates Spanish American culture within a new decentred and plural cultural world.

STEVEN BOLDY

Biography

Selected Works

Novels

Cumpleaños, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1969

La frontera de cristal: una novela en nueve cuentos, Mexico City: Alfaguara, 1995

Short Fiction

Los días enmascarados, Mexico City: Los Presentes, 1954

Cantar de ciegos, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1964

Chac Mool y otros cuentos, Estella: Salvat, 1973

Plays

Todos los gatos son pardos, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1970

El tuerto es rey, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1970

Los reinos originarios, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1971 [includes Todos los gatos son pardos and El tuerto es rey]

Orquídeas a la luz de la luna, Barcelona, Seix Barral, 1982; as Orchids in the Moonlight, translated by the author, in Drama Contemporary: Latin America, edited by George W. Woodyard and Marion Peter Holt, 1986

Ceremonias del alba, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1991 [new version of Todos los gatos]

Poetry

Poemas de amor: cuentos del alma, Madrid: Cruces, 1971
Essays and Other Writings

La nueva novela hispanoamericana, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1969

El mundo de José Luis Cuevas, Mexico City: Tudor, 1969

Casa con dos puertas, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1970

Tiempo mexicano, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1971

Cuerpos y ofrendas, Madrid: Alianza, 1972

Cervantes o la crítica de la lectura, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1976; as Don Quixote or, the Critique of Reading, translated anonymously, Austin: University of Texas Institute of Latin American Studies, 1976

High Noon in Latin America, Los Angeles: Manas, 1983

Juan Soriano y su obra, in collaboration with Teresa del Conde, Mexico City: Institute of Fine Arts, 1984

Latin America: At War with the Past, Montreal: CBC Enterprises, 1985

Palacio Nacional, in collaboration with Guillermo Tovar y de Teresa, Mexico City: Presidencia de la República, Dirección General de Comunicación Social, 1986

Gabriel García Márquez and the Invention of America, Liverpool: Liverpool University Press, 1987 [lecture]

Valiente mundo nuevo, épica, utopía y mito en la novela hispanoamericana, Madrid: Mondadori España, 1990

El espejo enterrado, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1992

Geografía de la novela, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1993

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading

Ibsen, Kristine, Author, Text and Reader in the Novels of Carlos Fuentes, New York: Peter Lang, 1993

Velarde, Agustín, Carlos Fuentes y Las buenas conciencias”, Mexico City: Buena Prensa, 1962

[Bibliographies]

[Interviews]

[Special Issues of Journals]

---

Agua quemada

Collection of novellas by Carlos Fuentes

The title of Fuentes’s 1981 collection of four novellas, Agua quemada, refers us to Mexico City, and indeed it is one of three of his works dedicated to that city, together with La región más transparente, 1958 (Where the Air is Clear) and Cristóbal Nonato, 1987 (Christopher Unborn). One of the two epigraphs of the work indicates that the title comes from a poem by Octavio Paz, which talks of violence and alienation, and goes on to say “se rompió el signo” (the sign was broken) alluding to a fracturing of language. The other epigraph, from Alfonso Reyes, nostalgically asks “Is this ‘la región más transparente del aire’ (the place where the air is clearest). What have you done, then, with my high metaphysical valley?” The quotation links the collection directly to the earlier novel, and suggests a sense of loss. Whereas the first novel’s reference to von Humboldt’s description of the crystal-clear air of the city is somewhat ironic in the bustling metropolis of the 1950s with three million inhabitants, it is positively sarcastic for the smog-filled and traffic-congested city of eight million when the stories were set at the end of the 1960s, and even more so for the twenty million plus megapolis of the late 20th century.

The epigraphs underline the subterranean continuity of Fuentes’s work but also the change in his country. At the end of La región, an important scene of recognition brings together a large number of characters from this sprawling novel into an overall pattern of coherence. At the end of the final story of Agua quemada, Bernabé Aparicio sees his long-lost father in a cemetery, and chooses not to speak to him, musing: “Let him not come back. A vague memory, a not knowing is enough.” This loss and separation is reflected in the “narrative quartet” form chosen here in preference to the totalizing form of the novel. In fact three of his recent works have consisted of collections of short stories or novellas, linked internally by formal patterns and by often ironic parallels which mockingly ape a lost unity rather than unify. Whereas, however, the 1989 Constancia is a positively postmodern affirmation of a decentralized world, the tone of Agua quemada is altogether more elegiac.

Each of the four stories explores a family drama in a different, carefully mapped out area of Mexico City. In “El día de las madres” (Mother’s Day), the Vergara family came from a career in the Revolution and later administrations to farming and eventually to drug producing, and live in a mansion in the elite Lomas de Chapultepec. In “Estos fueron los palacios” (These Were the Palaces), the family of Luis has come down from an opulent background in Veracruz State to bureaucratic drudgery and a downtown vecindad, or tenement. In “Las mananitas” (Sunny Mornings), Federico Silva, the last member of a long-established semi-aristocratic family, lives in a traditional mansion in Colonia Roma hedged in by skyscrapers. In “El hijo de Andrés Aparicio” (The Son of…) the Aparicio family have been forced from their previous decent home to a shack in a shanty town on the dusty outskirts. The links between the families are documented in detail—two characters work in a petrol station owned by another; a character in one story used to be the maid of a family from another, etc.—but are so flimsy and so quickly disappearing as to point to dispersal rather than to any real community.

What does link the stories and families is the same thing which separates and fragments them: violence of various sorts. The unspoken political background to the collection is the massacre of many students by the authorities in Tlatelolco before the Olympic Games in 1968, which both went unpunished and was repeated on a smaller scale in 1971, an incident which is portrayed in “El hijo de Andrés Aparicio.” In each of the stories an adolescent or youth strives to affirm his freedom within a complex pattern of family inheritance and determinism. In the first Plutarco wishes to outdo his businessman father by emulating his grandfather, who was a hero of the Revolution. His final attempted act of liberation, when he humiliates a prostitute by having sex with her in front of a band of mariachis in full tune, simply confirms a pattern by repeating his father and grandfather’s earlier murder of his mother. Silva, in the third story, tries to avoid both children and the working classes in the street only to be murdered by his symbolic children, the hippies, when he insults their mother. The violence takes on its full political dimension in the final story when the youth from the shantytown ends up as a murderous fascist thug in the paramilitary group of the man who had been the life-long enemy of his father, a left-wing agrarian engineer.

STEFEN BOLDY

Editions

Further Reading

Van Delden, Maarten, “Carlos Fuentes’ Agua quemada: the Nation as Unimaginable Community,” Latin American Literary Review, vol. 21/42 (July-December 1993)

Aura

Novella by Carlos Fuentes
Sooner or later, everybody finds his or her “consolations” withered, the “aura” of hope fading, and some pages of life desiring to be revisited. Behind this age-old theme, Carlos Fuentes conjured a powerful artistic wizardry, a poetic vision, and a subtle art of narrative deception. His novella Aura has kept its readers spellbound since its publication in 1962.

Aura tells the story of a young historian, Felipe Montero, who stumbles on a lucrative advertisement for a private secretary which looks tailor-made for him. The next day, we find him reading the same ad and walking in the run-down old part of Mexico City, noting the confusion of street numbers accumulated from different periods. Felipe enters the dilapidated house on Donceles 815, “formerly 69,” and is summoned, through dark corridors, to an old lady, who seems to know that he is coming. He must stay to edit and “complete” the memoirs of her late husband, General Llorente, who left Mexico after the collapse of the empire of the ill-fated Maximilian in 1867, and who died in exile in France some-time at the end of the 19th century, “sixty years ago.”

Felipe notices a lot of strange things about the house. He becomes irresistibly attracted to the old woman’s young niece Aura, a dream-like figure who appears to act mechanically or in strange synchrony with her aunt, Señora Consuelo. His work on the General’s papers alternates with sensual thoughts and advances. At night, his nightmarish dream turns into Aura making love to him. The second day and night are full of rituals. Felipe is frightened by the strange behavior of both women as they sacrifice a he-goat; Felipe barricades himself in his room and dreams his second nightmare. That night he is invited to Aura’s bedroom. First, he examines the plants in the patio and recalls old psychoactive recipes for which they may be used. Aura now looks like a woman in her forties, but Felipe is not surprised; not even when he finds Consuelo present at their lovemaking ritual. Next morning he has a weird feeling that he has engendered his own double; but, as is usual with him, he goes back to some routine and forgets. Aura appears willing to elope with him, but he baulks. She will wait for him in her aunt’s bedroom. Reviewing the third batch of papers and photographs, Felipe realizes that Aura is the young Consuelo, and he is…General Llorente.

The first story only exists as a pretext for a second story, that of a startling self-discovery and a double “recovery.” The dead General’s memoirs appear as a part of this second story, leading Felipe towards his old identity. Historical, linear time, a lifetime, a century of time vanish into “bodiless dust.” When he enters the house, Felipe steps into a time warp, a world where present and past, history and fiction, the self and the other implode. Some wish to see in this a return to the Mother, to the womb. Does reality melt into fantasy here, or does it leap into the fantastic? The first story just opens the Pandora’s box of many other latent stories, depending on how the reader reads the story and its narrator-protagonist, Felipe Montero.

Criticism has celebrated Aura as a powerful love story: lovers, separated by death, are reunited; death and old age are exorcised. Yet, in the final scene, Felipe can embrace only his Aura turned Consuelo. The desired Aura is exhausted; Consuelo cannot keep her “alive” for more than three days. “Together” they will try to conjure back the fleeting aura of youth. The mismatch of the “lovers” could not be greater: under the romantic and gothic veil, Aura reveals a baroque and absurd face. Instead of the voluptuous 69 (the original number of the old house), the story ends with a kiss on the withered cheek.

One crucial strategic choice made by the author is the use of the “second person” narrative. This strikingly experimental technique has created considerable confusion. Who speaks to whom? Is Felipe the narrator? Is he the narratee? Is he a reliable whatever he might be? Is the text addressed to the reader? Like the seven blind men, critics have come up with all kinds of answers; some multiply possible speakers, others reduce everything to Consuelo’s or Felipe’s dream. Since the speaking “I” remains unveiled, besides Felipe, both General Llorente and Consuelo have been advanced for this “opening;” only Aura is sorely missing to complete the paradigm. There is no textual basis to cast General Llorente in this role; it would even contradict the stance he assumes in his memoirs regarding Consuelo’s “experiments.” Consuelo is, of course, the powerful mover behind the story; yet her powers seem limited: Aura ages fast; Felipe does not look or act like another aura of hers, and she needs to check his profile for its “fit.” More importantly, narrative discourse does not impress as a hypnotic, manipulative discourse, but rather as a reflection, from within, of the character’s consciousness: “Parece dirigido a ti, a nadie más. Distraído, dejas que” (It seems to be addressed to you and nobody else. Distraught, you let). Yet the “natural” conclusion—i.e., that Felipe speaks to himself—does not put the problem completely to rest.

The narrative follows the train of Felipe’s thoughts and actions, basically in the present tense: “Lees ese anuncio” (You read the ad). Occasionally, the future is used for immediate action: “Tú releerás” (You will read it again). The story is thus presented through Felipe’s immediate vision; he is groping for sense in the strange, yet familiar world he has immersed himself in. From the very beginning, the second person splits him into two selves; the unknown puts his sanity to the test. Is he reliable or not? According to the answer, the fantastic is swapped for dreams or madness. Felipe and the reader are left in the dark. It is this narrative irony that creates the uneasy alliance between them vis-à-vis Consuelo, who “knows,” not that any reader would mistake him or herself for the addressee of the second-person discourse. The reader is closer to grasping the sense of the strange signs reported by Felipe (e.g., the lovemaking ritual with black mass overtones); yet his final revelation comes as a surprise. This (mis) leading of the reader is fundamental to the narrative strategy of Aura.

This illusion of immediacy and of simultaneity between narrating and narrated times is broken only once, at the very beginning. The third paragraph summarizes, in the future tense and in less than a line, the rest of the first day: “Vivirás ese día, idéntico a los demás” (You will spend that day, just like the other days). There follows another ellipsis, this time without a summary, between his rereading of the advertisement the next morning and walking towards his destiny later that afternoon. This double ellipsis and one summary, intensified by the future tense, transgress the simultaneity of the narration. For Felipe, the omitted time is routine, oblivion; therefore, he could still be the narrator and protagonist in one person, speaking to himself simultaneously with the action. But the cleavage in the flow of discourse also creates an “opening” for manipulation “from behind” by a narrator who is or is not Felipe himself, though none of the other characters could fit this role. In the second case, Felipe as character would be the “center of consciousness,” engaged in a dialogue by either the distant, remembering self or some other narrator. These two or three possibilities are not reducible to any one: we find here a radical ambiguity and transgression, one of many carefully disseminated throughout the text.

The only thing we can discard at this point is the suggestion that Felipe is the narratee, i.e., the framing narrative function of somebody to whom the story is being told. True, he is engaged by the discourse, yet he is not the receiver of the story, but an actor-narrator or co-narrator within the story told in such peculiar way. The confusion between discourse and narrative functions, between primary and secondary modeling systems, comes from French structuralism.

Another detail, clearly beyond Felipe’s control in either narrative role, is the segmentation into chapters. Although there is an identical number of days and chapters (five), these do not coincide, creating (similar to enjambment in verse) an intricate rhythmic narrative pattern which helps to mix up the flow of “real” time. But this, together with other metatextual elements, such as the epigraph from Jules Michelet, the title of the novella, and any intertextual play beyond the knowledge of the narrator (and even of the “real” author), can be attributed to the “implied author,” which is for us the last authority within the text, controlling the semantic interplay of the subordinate levels and their elements.

The epigraph opens another Pandora’s box, that of intertextual play. Projected on the text, it strengthens the role of Consuelo. But it is also just the tip of an iceberg: it leads to Michelet’s La Sorcière, 1878 (Satanism and Witchcraft, 1939), a surprising Borges-like investigation of the “invention” of modern-day sorcery. The names of the characters, Felipe, Consuelo, Aura, are found there; the code of witchcraft as explained there is superimposed on the ordinary contemporary reality. But it would be an error to try to reduce the irreducible polysemy and guessing game to the triviality of one specific, determinate meaning, be it witchcraft or psychoanalysis. This is only one important facet of the playful expansion of the literary “reality” in Fuentes’s work. The absurd twists in communication recall the black humor of Rulfo’s Pedro Páramo (1955), for which Fuentes wrote the screen adaptation. On second thought, many more elements of this novel find their crafty “reincarnation” in Aura. The tragic story of love, death, and madness in the historical Maximilian and Carlota, and its Pirandellian stage version by Rodolfo Usigli, Corona de sombra, 1943 (Crown of Shadows), are also closer intertexts for Aura than James, Dickens, or Pushkin, identified by the author himself.

EMIL VOLEK

Editions

Further Reading

Hernández de López, Ana María (editor), La obra de Carlos Fuentes: una vision multiple, Madrid: Pliegos, 1988 [Contains items on Aura]
Standish, Peter, “Intention and Technique in Fuentes’ Aura” Iberoamerikanisches Archiv, vol. 6 (1981)
La muerte de Artemio Cruz

Novel by Carlos Fuentes

La muerte de Artemio Cruz, 1962, (The Death of Artemio Cruz) is one of the early and most popular novels of the Latin American Boom. Thematically, it explores the issue of Mexican identity whilst, stylistically, it experiments with new novelistic techniques associated with modern writers such as James Joyce. The novel consists of thirty-eight fragments. These fragments may be further subdivided into twelve groups of three fragments each (with two final fragments that close the novel). Each of these three fragments is characterized by a different form of narration: first person singular, present tense (Artemio’s stream-of-consciousness on his deathbed), second person singular, future tense (Artemio’s alter ego speaks to him reminding him of all the wrong choices he has made in his life), and third person singular, preterite tense (an omniscient narrator who objectively narrates past events). These last fragments are dated (ranging from 1889 to 1955) but do not appear in chronological order. Moreover, within each fragment episodes are non-chronologically narrated and superimposed upon each other without transitional statements.

When the novel opens, Artemio, seventy-one years old, is dying. As he lies in his bed suffering great physical pain, he reviews his life as a series of choices between what Joseph Sommers calls two almost equally unacceptable options with which life has presented him. According to Sommers in Yáñez, Rulfo, Fuentes: la novela mexicana moderna, it is this lack of any real choice that makes Artemio Cruz a tragic character. He consistently chooses the path of self-gain at the expense of others, because the forsaken choice, the path to love, selflessness, authenticity, would have almost always led to death or poverty. Artemio’s dilemma, while individual, is also collective: he is seen as representative of all Mexicans who, due to the country’s social and political development, must be either “chingadores” (motherfuckers) or “chingados” (fucked over). Variations of this word, “santo y seña de Mexico” (Mexico’s password), form an entire section on Mexican identity in the novel. The origins of this concept are found in Octavio’s Paz’s landmark essay of 1950, El laberinto de la soledad (The Labyrinth of Solitude), a reflection on Mexican identity, where the meaning of the word “chingar” is discussed and Mexicans are defined as “hijos de la chingada” (children of the fucked mother).

The novel traces Artemio’s participation in the 1910 Mexican Revolution and his rise to a position of wealth and power by taking advantage of the desperate situation of Don Gamaliel Bernal. The peasants refuse to work Gamaliel’s land because he refuses to give them any of their own to till; moreover, they stop repaying the loans they owe him. Artemio offers him a quarter of the profits if he turns the loans over to him. He also gets the peasants to till Gamaliel’s land by giving them dry farming tracts to cultivate under the guise of agrarian reform. Artemio marries Gamaliel’s daughter, Catalina, and thus gains control of Gamaliel’s estate, but there is never any genuine communication between them. Once again, his possibility for love and fulfilment is thwarted, just as his relationship with his first love, Regina, was cut short by her murder during the Revolution. Later in life he loses his chance for an authentic relationship with his mistress, Laura, because he doesn’t have the necessary integrity to leave his wife and commit himself to her.
Fuentes employs a variety of formal techniques characteristic of the Modern or “New Novel” to communicate meaning to the reader. These include a variety of different types of dialogue, interior monologues, leitmotifs, enumerations, sensorial descriptions, symbols, wordplay, oxymorons and cinematographic techniques such as flashbacks, fadeouts, and superimposition of images. The most interesting symbols and/or leitmotifs are the mirror and the mask. Both refer to the process of introspection that the characters—Artemio in particular—undergo.

The range of meanings Fuentes assigns to the mask is another novelistic element that originates in Paz’s essay, El laberinto de la soledad. The book’s second chapter titled “Máscaras mexicanas” (Mexican Masks) asserts that the Mexican is a being who “se encierra y se preserva” (locks himself up and saves himself) and that they always establish a wall between the self and reality. Fuentes repeats this mask motif both explicitly and implicitly throughout his novel, thus illustrating this interpretation of Mexican nature through the actions of his characters. Thus when Artemio visits Don Galamiel to seize his lands and usurp the place of Gamaliel’s son, Bernal, he thinks about the irony “de ser él quien regresaba a Puebla, y no el fusilado Bernal” (that it was he rather than the executed Bernal who had returned to Puebla), and this amuses him because it was “en cierto modo, una mascarada, una sustitución, una broma que podía jugarse con la mayor seriedad” (in a way a masquerade, a sleight-of-hand, a joke that could be played with the greatest seriousness).

This example leads us to perhaps the most important and least studied of the novel’s techniques: its use of oxymorons. Words are constantly paired with their opposites to convey a paradox. For example, when Catalina and Artemio meet for the first time we are told “Ella se extrañó de la fortaleza con que sucumbía, del poder de su debilidad” (She was surprised at the strength with which she succumbed, the power of her weakness). The oxymoron is not a mere stylistic device, but rather is used to convey the essence of Mexican identity as embodied in the character Artemio Cruz. In one passage, Artemio’s wish to have been born in the United States focuses on the essential differences between Mexicans and their northern neighbors: “por más que lo intentes, no puedes ser como ellos…¿Tu vision de las cosas, en tus peores o en tus mejores momentos, ha sido tan simplista como la de ellos? Nunca. Nunca has podido pensar en blanco y negro, en buenos y malos, en Dios y Diablo: admite que siempre, aun cuando parecía lo contrario, has encontrado en lo negro el germé, el reflejo de su opuesto: tu propia crueldad, cuando has sido cruel, ¿no estaba teñida de cierta ternura? (no matter how much you try, you cannot be like them…was your vision of things…ever as simplistic as theirs? Never. Never have you been able to think in black and white, good guys versus bad guys, God or the Devil: admit that always, even when it seemed just the opposite, you’ve found the germ, the reflection of the white in the black. Your own cruelty, when you’ve been cruel, hasn’t it always been tinged with a certain tenderness?)

Both Mexican identity and the choices with which Artemio Cruz is faced intertwine with historical events portrayed in the novel. Nelson Osorio in his article in Homenaje a Carlos Fuentes [In Honour of Carlos Fuentes] notes that Mexican history is depicted as a cycle in which the “users” obtain their wealth and power by taking advantage of the “used.” Ireneo Menchaca, the wealthy landowner who fathered Artemio with the Indian servant Isabel Cruz, obtained the Cocuya estate by joining General Santa Anna. Gamaliel Bernal obtained his land when Juárez auctioned off the properties formerly owned by the Catholic clergy, and Artemio acquires his property when Porfirio Díaz’s government falls, the Mexican Revolution triumphs, and the supposed agrarian reform is realized. He sells the revolutionary ideals short in favor of personal gain by giving the dry farming land to the Indians and keeping the best land for himself. His later business dealings, such as selling rights to exploit the sulphur mines to the United States for two million dollars, also show his betrayal of the principles of the Revolution. In each case the victors receive power and wealth, while the masses remain poor and abused. This reinforces the notion of Mexicans as either “chingadores” or “chingados.” It also places the character Artemio and his decisions within a historical and political context which is evaluated and criticized as much as the character is. Although Artemio Cruz is criticized throughout the novel, the character, product of the Mexican socio-political context, and painfully cognizant of the wrong choices he made in his life, is not a totally unsympathetic figure. He is the oxymoron Fuentes relies on so heavily in the novel: tender and cruel, weak and strong, tough and vulnerable: all of life’s opposites rolled into one tragic survivor. Artemio Cruz is both pitied and denounced in La muerte de Artemio Cruz.

HELENE CAROL WELDT-BASSON

See also entries on The Boom, El laberinto de la soledad (Octavio Paz)

Editions

Further Reading

Gyurko, Lanin, “Self, Double and Mask in Fuentes’s La muerte de Artemio Cruz, Texas Studies in Literature and Language, vol. 16/2. (Summer 1974)
Eduardo Galeano 1940–

Uruguayan essayist, journalist and historian

The work of Eduardo Galeano is perhaps one of the most problematical among recent Latin American authors in terms of categorisation and critical study, for he is neither simply an essayist, nor a journalist nor a historian, but rather a combination of the three whose writing has an undeniably literary quality. The virtual critical vacuum within which Galeano finds himself is due not to the quality of his work, for he has published two works, Las venas abiertas de America Latina, 1971 (The Open Veins of Latin America) and the trilogy Memoria del fuego, 1982–86 (Memory of Fire), which are widely recognised to be of seminal value. Instead, the reason appears to be the uncertainty with which literary critics confront works which are clearly documents of economic and socio-cultural history. Similarly, Galeano’s work carries too much of the creativity and conscious interpretation of events common to much of contemporary Latin American fiction to attract conventional historians. This unique vision of Latin America arises from Galeano’s experiences of life and the written word, central to which is a twelve-year period of exile, first in Argentina and later in Spain, to escape persecution by the increasingly brutal Uruguayan, and subsequently Argentine, military regimes of the 1970s, whose censure of him arose from his position as editor-in-chief of Epoca and his critical, politically committed journalism.

Despite the common motifs encountered throughout Galeano’s work, there are also clear lines of development. His global concerns might best be summarised by his own words in the foreword to Memoria del fuego, where he states that “quisiera contribuir al rescate de la memoria secuestrada de toda America, pero sobre todo de America Latina: quisiera preguntarle de qué diversos barros fue nacida, de qué actos de amor y violaciones viene” (I would like to contribute to the rescue of the kidnapped memory of all America, but especially that of Latin America: I would like to ask her from what earth was she born, from what acts of love and rape she rises). This he does in his early works through a denunciation of the economic, social and political injustices of the continent, while in subsequent publications the tone of the denunciation becomes less directly confrontational or negatory, and is modified to assimilate a more creative and literary aspect within the narration of historical events and cultural traditions.

Las venas abiertas de America Latina takes the form of a series of essays which represent critical analyses of the exploitation of resources such as gold, silver, sugar, rubber, cotton, minerals and oil since the arrival of the Spanish at the end of the 15th century. The essays frequently foreground the economic imperialism of first the European powers, and more recently of the United States, via a wealth of facts and figures which serve as the framework for sections that concern themselves with the political and social ramifications of such a system. Despite the subjectivity and informality of the narrative, evidenced in the use of deliberately loaded nouns and adjectives which correspond to emotional reactions, and despite Galeano’s own perception of the work as having been written “en el estilo de una novela de amor o de piratas” (in the style of a novel about love or about pirates), the sheer volume and density of the factual information, all of which is of equal importance to the overarching structure of the work, mean that Las venas is not a text whose reading can be undertaken lightly: it demands to be read from cover to cover with the same urgency with which it was written.

Memoria del fuego shares with Las venas a preoccupation with the portrayal of injustices, even if here the focus is more social than politico-economic, but the manner of presentation has an additional goal, as is outlined by the author in El descubrimiento de América que todavía no fue, 1986 [The Discovery of America that Still Has Not Been], namely that of contributing to “revelar la voz de los que no tienen voz” (bring forth the voice of those who have no voice). In order to achieve this Galeano synthesises works by scores of Spanish chroniclers, colonial authors, modern historians and anthropologists, and most importantly indigenous traditions, with his own vision of the Americas to produce challenging recreations of events and beliefs. The opening section of the first volume of Memoria del fuego, entitled “Primeras voces” (First Voices), goes beyond the scope and the chronological boundaries of Las venas to present the beliefs and traditions of the indigenous peoples in pre-Columbian times, thereby taking a significant first step in breaking away from conventional histories of the region and familiarising the reader with the perspective which permeates the three volumes. The structure of the work is similarly unconventional, each volume consisting of hundreds of self-contained scenes which portray events and conditions over the course of the region’s colonial history and republican independence, and while most have their source in the historical and anthropological documents mentioned above, a significant number are taken from non-literary sources, such as oral tradition, letters, songs, newspaper advertisements and graffiti, which are particularly relevant to the stated aims of the work. Galeano himself is aware of the manner in which this work, and others, defy easy categorisation. However, his conscious rejection of conventional literary forms, themselves products of the very culture whose dominance and vision he is challenging, comes over as a strength rather than a shortcoming, and represents a totally appropriate questioning of traditions of form which parallels the positing of an alternative vision of the continent, its peoples and its history.

The move away from the realm of the hard facts and figures which proved illuminating in Las venas abiertas de America Latina has led to a far more subjective mode of expression more suited to the rejection of objective (or pseudo-objective) history and the incorporation of more individual forms of cultural expression, such as folklore and oral narrative. This empowering of those who traditionally have no voice within the framework of the established cultural hierarchy reaches its height to date in Galeano’s recent work, the ambitious Las palabras andantes, 1993 (Walking Words), which selfconsciously attempts to produce a synthesis of oral tradition and concise insights into Latin-American reality through transcribed oral narratives and intercalated ventanas (windows), illustrated by prints from woodcuts typical of the popular literatura de cordel (literature on a string: it was thus displayed for sale). The prints are, however, more than mere illustrations, and their importance as cultural manifestations is equal to that of the texts they accompany. The inherent contradictions of recording modes of expression which are taken from outside the realm of the written word within what is ultimately a literary project are not easily overcome, but Las palabras andantes admirably serves to give a voice to a sector of the population who have traditionally been denied any form of access to the conventional vehicles of cultural expression, and to bring to the attention of the book-reading (predominantly middle-class) public a range of values and a culture which might otherwise have remained unknown.

One of the features of the structure of Galeano’s works is the ease with which the reader can gain access to individual texts and achieve a high level of engagement with relative facility. This is especially true of more recent works, in which the reader is presented with a series of short episodes or images that bind together to form the collage text. It is, however, possible to enjoy the individual elements in their own right as well as for their contribution to the orchestrated whole, owing to both the subject matter and the highly personal, even intimate, style which to some extent manages to recreate the context of their original production and overcome in part the contradictions mentioned above. Such a fragmentary view of Galeano’s recent works is supported by the author’s words in a television interview from 1992, in which he affirms that the stories of Memoria del fuego “me enseñaron a ver el universo por el ojo de la cerradura: descubrí la historia grande a través de las historias chiquitas” (taught me to view the universe through a keyhole: I discovered History through little histories).

The questioning of traditional Eurocentric perspectives which accompanied the recent quincentenary celebrations of the “Discovery,” and the consequent upsurge of interest in Latin American perceptions of their own historical process and culture, are fused in Galeano’s work with the narrative voice of one of the authors of the post-Boom, whose writings continue in the line of the acclaimed narratives of García Márquez, Cortázar, Fuentes and others. It must only be a matter of time before the ability of Galeano to unite these two threads, and give a characteristically Latin American voice to such topical concerns, leads to the considered appraisal his work calls for.

DAVID WOOD

See also entry on Marcha under Journals

Biography

Born in Montevideo, Uruguay, 3 September 1940, into a middleclass Catholic family of Welsh, German, Spanish and Italian ancestry. Son of Eduardo Hughes and Ester Galeano. Educated in Uruguay until age 16. Sold his first political cartoon at the age of 14 to socialist newspaper, El Sol. Worked at a variety of menial jobs in adolescence which gave him an early interest in trade union and socialist politics. Editor-in-chief, Marcha, Montevideo, 1961–64; editor of the daily, Época, Montevideo, 1964–66; editor-in-chief, University Press, Montevideo, 1965–73. As a result of the military coup of 1973, he was first imprisoned and then forced to leave Uruguay. Founder of Crisis magazine, Buenos Aires, Argentina, 1973, editor-in-chief, 1973–76. After the military coup of 1976 in Argentina, he received death threats. Moved to Spain where he lived until he was able to return to Uruguay in 1984. Continues to reside there in the 1990s. Principal awards include: Premio Casa de las Américas, 1975, for La canción de nosotros, and in 1978, for Días y noches de amor y de guerra; American Book Award of the University of Washington, Seattle, 1989, for Memoria del fuego. Las venas abiertas de America Latina has been translated into 20 languages and has well over 50 Spanish-language editions, making it one of Latin America’s best-selling books of all time.

Selected Works

Like a fellow-Uruguayan author, Mario Benedetti, and other Latin American writers of the Left, much of Galeano’s work transcends orthodox genres; thus no attempt has been made to place his works in different categories.

Los días siguientes, Montevideo: Alfa, 1963
China 1964: crónica de un desafío, Buenos Aires: Jorge Álvarez, 1964
Reportajes: tierras de Latinoamérica, otros puntos cardinales, y algo más, Montevideo: Tauro, 1967
Los fantasmas del día del léon, y otros relatos, Montevideo: Arca, 1967
Su majestad el fútbol, Montevideo: Arca, 1968 [anthology]
Siete imágenes de Bolivia, Caracas: Fondo Editorial Salvador de la Plaza, 1971
Violencia y enajenación, Mexico City: Nuestro Tiempo, 1971
Crónicas latinoamericanas, Montevideo: Girón, 1972
Vagamundo, Buenos Aires: Crisis, 1973
La canción de nosotros, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1975
Conversaciones con Raimón, Barcelona: Granica, 1977
La piedra arde, Salamanca: Lóquez, 1980 [children’s fiction]
Aventuras de los jóvenes dioses, Buenos Aires: Kapelusz, 1984 [children’s fiction]
Ventana sobre Sandino, Managua, Nicaragua: Raiti, 1985
Contraseña, Buenos Aires: Sol, 1985
El descubrimiento de America que todavía no fue y otros escritos, Barcelona: Laia, 1986
El tigre azul y otros artículos, Santiago de Chile: Amerinda, 1988
Amerindia para entenderte mejor: con Agustín Cueve en Panamá, Panama City: Universidad de Panamá, 1990
Úselo y tírelo: el mundo del fin, Buenos Aires: Planeta, 1994 [ecology]
El fútbol a sol y sombra, Madrid: Siglo XXI, 1995

Compilations and Anthologies
Palabras: antología personal, Buenos Aires: GenteSur, 1990
Amares. Antología preparada por el autor, Madrid: Alianza, 1993

Further Reading

Galeano’s work is often ignored in academic publications. The secondary bibliography is limited to a small number of articles which tend to focus either on his subjective view of history or on the political aspect of his writing in exile. The most substantial of these articles, together with two books, appear below.
Martin, Gerald, “Hope Springs Eternal: Eduardo Galeano and the History of Latin America,” History Journal Workshop 34 (1992) [Critical of Galeano’s more recent work for what is perceived as its false optimism]
—Silencio, voz y escritura en Eduardo Galeano, Frankfurt: Vervuert Verlag, 1995
Rosencof, Mauricio, El vendedor de reliquias. Sobre “Memorias del fuego” de Eduardo Galeano, Montevideo: Areá, 1992 [Written by a friend of Galeano who experienced the horrors of Uruguay’s military dictatorship]
Saad, Gabriel, “Eduardo Galeano: la literatura como una pasión latinoamericana,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 324 (June 1977)
Vogel, H., “Eduardo Galeano como historiador,” in Foro hispánico. La nueva novela histórica hispanoamericana, Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1991 [Highly critical of Galeano’s historiography]

Interviews
Rómulo Gallegos 1884–1969

Venezuelan prose writer

Rómulo Gallegos’s third novel, one of the few to have been translated into English, Doña Bárbara, 192,9, (drastically revised 1930) marks the peak of the regionalist novel in Spanish America. The regionalists’ aim was to try to explain and interpret the specifically Spanish American reality they saw, especially in the undeveloped interior of the continent. In performing this function, they tended to avoid obtrusive narrative experimentation, relying on the setting to provide novelty and attraction.

Doña Bárbara, then, is the paradigmatic novel of a quest for the “cultural essence” of some given area of Spanish America (and, by extension, perhaps of Spanish America itself). In Gallegos, signs of this quest began to appear twenty years earlier with his early essays in the Caracas magazine La Alborada [Reveille] on social and political themes, including the failure of the Venezuelan educational system to correct what he regarded as the pernicious cultural legacy of Spain: indiscipline, impulsiveness, self-indulgence, lack of moral responsibility, excessive individualism and the like. In his political essays Gallegos called for an end to violence as a factor in political change, civic consciousness and respect for law, and an end to dictatorship. In his early short stories he similarly criticized the use of arbitrary force to settle social differences, cynical dishonesty in public affairs and other forms of behaviour which he thought stood in the way of national progress. Already, however, we notice two features which were to survive in his later work. One is a tendency to confuse cultural with racial characteristics. The other is a certain ambivalence with regard to some of the features which he consciously intended to attack, especially individual force of character. With part of his mind he rejected it, but with another part he saw it as a sign of the abounding energy of a young society.

In his first novels Reinaldo Solar (1920) and La trepadora, 1915 [The Social Climber], written while he was, characteristically, earning his living as a teacher before his voluntary exile in 1931 for political reasons, Gallegos reached out towards a new type of semi-symbolic fictional character which could be used to illustrate aspects of the national situation and to incorporate an implicit lesson. Reinaldo Solar is young, attractive, cultured and idealistic, but afflicted with a sense of alienation and moral crisis which leads him to search for new values. He struggles fruitlessly to impose a direction on his life, but we are aware that, unlike them, it is only as a social being and a citizen that he would be able to achieve full self-realization. He fails largely because of personality defects which reflect the ills of the Venezuelan national character that Gallegos had postulated in his earlier writings. Nevertheless, he dies fighting for progress. In La trepadora the problem is expressed in terms of the taming of an imperfectly socialized, aggressively individualistic figure, Hilario Guanipa, by his wife and daughter, so that he eventually becomes a useful and responsible member of the directing class. The fact that his daughter, Victoria, successfully marries into the landed gentry, prefigures the theme of social integration (on a strictly limited scale) which also underlies the love-plot in Doña Bárbara.

Doña Bárbara was a best-seller for many years. Inspired by a surprisingly brief trip to the vast savannas of the Venezuelan interior where it is set, its theme is the threat to the country from the barbarous social conditions in the outback and the attraction exerted by their macho values on the young, intellectual elite of the country. Initially, it seems that the task confronting the hero, Santos Luzardo, is that of bringing the cattle-ranching economy of the plains under proper legal control and developing its productivity. But the reader’s attention is quickly diverted from this practical task to that of overcoming the primitive, violent and anti-social mentality and customs of the plains people and especially of their leading representative, the local landowner, Doña Barbara. The struggle between Barbara and Santos provides the dramatic interest of the novel, while the latter’s efforts to overcome the attraction of macho self-assertion, which exerts itself even more powerfully as the conflict develops, deepens the symbolism of his character.

The characters of Santos and Barbara evolve symmetrically, his towards greater machismo and potential violence, hers towards greater femininity and readiness to make concessions. A feature of the novel, however, is that these evolutions never really cross. There is only one real confrontation between the two characters, marking the central point of this exceptionally well-constructed plot. Santos, that is, never feels emotionally or sexually attracted to Barbara, which is a pity, since it would have been the ultimate test of his personality. As it is, Santos’s love is reserved for Marisela, Bárbara’s daughter, the symbol of all that is potentially salvageable in the soul of Venezuela. However, we should notice that by marrying her, after narrowly avoiding a descent into barbarous violence himself, Santos is marrying his cousin, a member of the landowning elite. This is not in any real sense symbolic of fusing either classes or races in Venezuela.

In his later work, Gallegos never again reached the creative level of Doña Bárbara. His subsequent novels were Cantaclaro (1934), Canaima, 1936, Pobre negro, 1937 [Poor Black], El forastero, 1942. [The Stranger], Sobre la misma tierra, 1943 [On this Very Earth], La brizna de paja en el viento, 1952 [The Wisp of Straw in the Wind] and the posthumous Tierra bajo los pies, 1971 [Earth under One’s Feet]. Already in Cantaclaro, now written in exile, the confident assertion of man’s mastery over nature and over his own natural instincts becomes more muted, and merely nostalgic, folkloric interest often takes first place. The railway, a symbol of progress in Doña Bárbara, gives way to a multiplicity of dirt tracks, none of which really leads in a positive direction. The plains as a “symbolic space,” that is, take on once more a threatening, unconquered and at times curiously unreal aspect, in which courage and sacrifice have little meaning. At the end of Cantaclaro, Martin Salcedo, the surviving figure of patriotic aspiration, leaves the plains to seek another, unidentified, path towards his country’s salvation. In Canaima, Gallegos fustigates the rape of natural resources in Venezuelan Guyana and once more explores the terrible attraction of violent self assertion in the hero, Marcos Vargas. We are conscious that Gallegos has receded from his belief in the relative ease with which national characteristics could be reconciled with progressive politics. He was to find that belief brutally contradicted in real life when, after the death of the dictator Gómez, he returned from exile in 1936 and resumed his interrupted political career, becoming Minister of Education in the new government of López Contreras. In 1947 he was elected President of Venezuela as the leader of the Democratic Action party with an overwhelming majority but after less than a year in office his government was overthrown by a military coup under Pérez Jiménez. It meant exile for the second time. He was not to return to Venezuela until 1958.

Symbolically, Pobre negro, whose theme is the need to integrate the blacks in Venezuela into the national family is set in the past and the issues are seen from a comfortable historical distance. Nevertheless, in the more discursive sections of the novel Gallegos sharply criticizes both the selfish greed of the old propertied oligarchy and the ideological bankruptcy of the progressives, which he saw as having perpetuated the country’s divisions. Interestingly, this is possibly the first novel in Spanish America written by a man to call for the liberation of women from their traditional passive social role. Gallegos’s remaining novels continue the pattern of “civic” writing already described. El forastero is concerned with local tyranny and its powers of survival and Sobre la misma tierra with the betrayal of the country for the benefit of foreign oil interests (which were to assist in engineering his fall from the Presidency in 1948). La brizna de paja en el viento, written in exile, applies Gallegos’s by now characteristic vision of Latin America as dominated by the struggle between forces of good and evil, idealism and greedy violence, civilization and barbarism, to the political revolutionary activity of Cuban university students in Havana in the 1940s (in which Fidel Castro first emerged as a figure of importance). But by now the formula had begun to seem naive and hackneyed and the structure of the novel too subordinate to the didactic intention. A similarly simple dualism is visible in Tierra bajo los pies, whose theme is the land problem in post-revolutionary Mexico.

Like the others in the regionalist movement, Gallegos seems nowadays to have seen Latin American reality too unambiguously. But Doña Bárbara remains the most important and popular Spanish American novel before García Márquez’s Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude).

DONALD L.SHAW

Biography

Prize for Literature, 1958; Alberdi-Sarmiento Prize (Argentina), 1959; America Prize (Mexico), 1967. The prestigious literary prize that bears his name was created by the Venezuelan government in 1964. Died in Caracas, 5 April 1969.

Selected Works

Short Fiction
- Los aventureros, Caracas: Bolívar, 1913
- La rebelión y otros cuentos, Caracas: Librería y Editorial del Maestro, 1946
- Cuentos venezolanos, Buenos Aires: Austral, 1949
- La doncella; El último patriota, Mexico City: Montobar, 1957

Novels
- El último solar, Caracas: Imprenta Bolívar, 1920; retitled as Reinaldo Solar in all subsequent editions
- La trepadora, Caracas: Tipografía Mercantil, 1925
- Doña Bárbara, Barcelona: Araluce, 1929; as Doña Bárbara, translated by Robert Malloy, Magnolia, Massachusetts: Peter Smith, 1948 [the most recent edition]
- Cantaclaro, Barcelona: Araluce, 1934
- Pobre negro, Caracas: Elite, 1937
- Sobre la misma tierra, Caracas: Elite, 1943
- La brizna de paja en el viento, Havana: Selecta, 1952

Essay
- Una posición en la vida, Mexico City: Humanismo, 1954

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading

Understandably, much of the criticism on Gallegos’s work concentrates on Doña Bárbara. Readers should refer to the essay on this novel for items concerned exclusively with it. The list given below is of more general studies.

Doña Barbara

Novel by Rómulo Gallegos

Rómulo Gallegos served his country as a teacher, Minister of Education, and briefly as President of the nation. As a writer, educator, and political figure, he epitomizes the struggle against tyranny in Latin America. Among his novels, Doña Bárbara (published in Spain in 1929) best represents his ideas and ideals. The conflict on the Venezuelan llanos (plains) between Santos Luzardo and Doña Barbara is a microcosmic re-enactment of Sarmiento’s archetypal struggle between civilization and barbarism. In Gallegos’s work, as in other Spanish American novels written around the same time, this basic dichotomy manifests itself in a series of duelling oppositions: urban versus rural, European (i.e. white) versus mestizo, rational thought versus superstition, progress versus tradition. Doña Barbara, the personification of the llanos, is one of the most memorable characters in all of Spanish American literature. From her base of operations at the ranch El Miedo (literally, “The Fear”) she exerts absolute control over her fiefdom by means of her sexuality, sorcery, and brute force. Santos Luzardo, on the other hand, is an idealized figure. Raised and educated in the city, he is the embodiment of Gallegos’s liberal agenda. His local efforts to preserve the decaying Altamira estate and bring the enlightened ways of the city to the benighted countryside mirror the novelist’s endeavors on the national level. Luzardo proposes to civilize the cacica (rural boss), Doña Barbara, and her illegitimate daughter, Marisela, just as he aims to restore order to the llanos. Along the way he falls victim to the spell of his adversary and the land itself, but eventually he prevails. Luzardo’s education of and subsequent marriage to Marisela is emblematic of national restoration and unification. Ironically, Gallegos’s nemesis, the dictator Juan Vicente Gómez, expressed great admiration for the novel. Failing to recognize himself in the portrayal of the tyrannical eponymous character, he was apparently unaware that the book’s subject matter was intended as a repudiation of his regime.

Gallegos wrote his next two novels, Cantaclaro and Canaima during his self-imposed exile in Spain. Both emphasize setting at the expense of other narrative elements. Cantaclaro, like Doña Bárbara, relates legends and superstitions, incorporates aspects of costumbrismo, and offers a poetic treatment of the landscape. Florentino, the roving singer of the title, seems a permanent fixture of the plains, inseparable from the environment of which he is a product. For Canaima Gallegos chooses a jungle setting in the Orinoco basin. Once again, he develops his narrative within the context of the “man versus nature” theme. Setting out from the city in search of adventure, the protagonist, Marcos Vargas ultimately enters the jungle and casts his lot with the Indians. The migration of his mestizo son back to the city reverses the path taken by Marcos, thereby signalling a victory for the forces of civilization. Both Cantaclaro and Canaima are characterized by folkloric and sociological content and a lack of structural unity. The novelist’s preoccupation with the problems of his country evidently outweighed his concern for narrativity.

In Doña Bárbara and other novels Gallegos utilizes many of the trappings of 19th-century Realism—linear narration, omniscient narrator, action scenes, lengthy descriptions, costumbrismo—but his style is poetic rather than strictly realistic. Although he grew up under the influence of Rodó and Spanish American Modernismo, he eschewed the escapist tendencies of that earlier generation, focusing instead on his country’s geographical, social, and political realities. His novels paint a portrait of Venezuela’s rural regions—the plains, jungles, and mountains—with their distinctive flora, fauna, climate, customs, popular legends, and superstitions. Despite nature’s seductive and bewitching aspects, the environment proves to be an inhospitable zone that must be tamed. Frequently, the influence of the landscape is so powerful that setting overshadows character development and plot.

Gallegos’s characters often resemble mere idealizations, personifications, or caricatures, rather than flesh-and-blood individuals. Doña Barbara, for example, is frequently referred to as “la devoradora de hombres” (the Devourer of Men), and Dr Payara in Cantaclaro is known as “el diablo del Cunaviche” (the Devil of the Cunaviche). Name symbolism serves as a primary rhetorical device in his novels; in the final analysis, however, rather than contributing to character development, it actually hinders his efforts by causing readers to notice characters more for what they represent than for what they appear to be. Besides the two most obvious examples, the names of the antagonists in Doña Bárbara, other symbolic appellations from that novel include the moniker of Mister Danger, a transparent reference to the threats posed by North American imperialism, and the names of the two ranches, Altamira (High Sights) and El Miedo, neither of which leaves the reader with any doubt as to its significance.

From the standpoint of literary history Rómulo Gallegos is considered an icon of the regional novel, a sub-genre that was one of the mainstays of Spanish American literature for much of the first half of the 20th century. The destiny of the Venezuelan nation, its progress toward the future, is the real theme of his work and the ultimate meaning behind his allegories. The solutions to the country’s problems, as set forth in his novels, lie in education and racial and political unification. In his selection of autochthonous themes and materials as subjects worthy of literary treatment, Gallegos employs one of the defining characteristics of regionalism and contributes to the creation of a national identity.

MELVIN S. ARRINGTON, JR

Editions

First edition: Doña Bárbara, Barcelona: Araluce, 1929
Translation: Doña Bárbara, by Robert Malloy, Magnolia, Massachusetts: Peter Smith, 1948 [the most recent edition]

Further Reading

Bermúdez, Manuel (editor), “Doña Bárbara” ante la crítica, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1991
Shaw, Donald L., Gallegos: Doña Bárbara, London: Grant and Cutler, 1972

Manuel Gálvez 1882–1962

Argentine prose writer, dramatist and poet

As the author of novels like La maestra normal, 1914 [The Training College Teacher], El mal metafísico, 1916 [The Metaphysical 111], La sombra del convento, 1917 [The Shadow of the Convent] and Nacha Regules (1919), Manuel Gálvez has gained a reputation in Argentine literary circles for presenting the social problems of his country in a convincingly realistic manner. As early as 1916, in a letter to Julio Cejador, the young Gálvez was already confirming the ambitious literary project then in hand: “From now on I will write only novels. I have a vast plan, and I intend to reflect the multiple life of this complicated country of ours.” This prudent decision to devote his life to fiction, despite his talents in the field of poetry, drama (less so) and of course the essay, was to the benefit of Gálvez and his country. In 1910 he had already formulated in essay form, in El diario de Gabriel Quiroga [The Diary of Gabriel Quiroga], an examination of the key themes of Argentine history (federalism versus unitarianism, immigration, civilisation versus barbarism and Buenos Aires versus the provinces).

The fruits of the seeds sown in the early essays began to appear thematically in the fiction published in the second decade of the century. Following his designated scheme, Gálvez situated his first novel, La maestra normal, in La Rioja province, which he knew well from his school-inspector travels. His treatment of the love affair between the sentimental schoolteacher Rasalda and the visitor Solís from Buenos Aires, captures the time and place through the use of costumbrismo and Social Realism while also introducing something of the converse idealism which was to be a characteristic of Gálvez’s later novels. Despite the praise of Miguel de Unamuno, La maestra normal provoked opposition from supporters of the system then in use in teacher’s training colleges for primary school teachers, and generated much antipathy between the provinces and Buenos Aires. The capital was to be the setting of El mal metafísico, subtitled Vida romántica [A Romantic Life], a realistic treatment of a phase in Gálvez’s own life. Between 1900 and 1910 Gálvez lived many of the experiences of the sentimental poet, Carlos Riga, in a bohemian group of artists (easily identified) struggling against the philistinism and materialism of porteño or city society. Riga, an apathetic provincial youth destroyed by the cold city, is yet another symbol of the idealism and spiritual love manifest in Gálvez’s early novels, characterised as, and much praised for their Social Realism.

As promised in his 1916 plan, Gálvez placed his next novel, La sombra del convento in yet another part of the country, this time in the provincial city of Córdoba, noted for its... beautiful churches and Jesuit-dominated schools, not to mention its religious authoritarianism and narrow-mindedness. The young protagonist José Alberto Flores, despite a series of struggles against these conservative forces, marries into one of these families after a felicitous conversion. In Nacha Regules Gálvez returns to the Buenos Aires setting to treat in Zolaesque fashion the ills of society, this time city prostitution. Despite the naturalistic tone of the work, Nacha is redeemed through the love of the saintly Monsalvat, who shares the romantic idealism of his literary predecessors and rescues Gálvez and his novel from bleak determinism, thus preparing the way for future (Catholic) novels.

Although La tragedia de un hombre fuerte, 1922 [The Tragedy of a Strong Man] belongs to this early period, and deals in a more subtle way with the long-term debate over civilisation and barbarism—in this case the struggle between the interior’s perceived espiritu estático and the coastline’s espiritu dinámico—one notes, beneath the surface of the socioeconomic problems, a growing awareness of Gálvez’s ideology, presented through the figure of the protagonist Victor Urgel. For the maturing Gálvez, moved by his own anguish in the face of the moral turpitude of his country during the década infame, Victor incarnates this awareness of metaphysical problems—the solitude described not only as a product of the geographical ambience (the isolation and the vastness of the pampa), but also as a universal phenomenon i.e. the spiritual solitude, expressed in all its existentialist dimensions (lack of communication, alienation, angst) as an essential part of the human condition. In this sense, La tragedia represents a subtle change in Gálvez’s fiction.

This exploration of the national character, coupled with his interest in the Argentine solitude which transcends geographical barriers, this weaving of the ideological strand with the metaphysical concerns, was not to appear again so fully drawn till 1938, with the publication of Hombres en soledad [Men in Solitude], a novel about the possible regeneration of Argentina by means of the 1930 military coup of General Uriburu. Gálvez was to take up again this theme of spiritual solitude and political regeneration in El uno y la multitud, 1955 [The Individual and the Multitude] in the final days of the Perón dictatorship—this time to narrate the events which Argentina suffered between 1942 and 1947, that is the conflict during World War II between the two opposed groups of neutralists and supporters of the Allies. In the last years of his life, the conservative nationalist Gálvez, who had flirted with fascism in the 1930s (Este pueblo necesita, 1934 [This Nation Needs]) and Peronism in the 1940s, was well into his “theological,” ultra-Catholic stage. Novels like Perdido en su noche, 1958 [Lost in His Dark Night], and La locura de ser santo [The Madness of Being a Saint], published posthumously in 1967, speak more to his own search for sanctity, which left him well out of step, not only spiritually and morally but also culturally and artistically, with the rest of his countrymen.

By the time of his death in 1962, some of the Boom novelists had already made their mark. There was no place, it appears, for a literary, ideological, conservative, religious dinosaur. More than thirty years later, at the end of the century, it seems time for a revaluation of Manuel Gálvez, whose sixty volumes of fiction, biography, poetry, essay and drama have made a significant contribution to Argentine life and letters. Recent news of the new Fundación Manuel Gálvez, plus plans for filming La maestra normal, and publishing new editions of Hombres en soledad and El uno y la multitud in the series Colección Identidad Nacional, may point the way to possible rehabilitation of this writer, who has in the past often been judged more for his politics and ideology, than for his imaginative gifts.

JOHN WALKER

Biography

Selected Works

Novels

La maestra normal, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Nosotros, 1914
El mal metafísico, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Nosotros, 1916
La sombre del convento, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Nosotros, 1917
Nacha Regules, Buenos Aires: Pax, 1919; as Nacha Regules, translated by Leo Ongley, New York: Dutton, 1922
La tragedia de un hombre fuerte, Buenos Aires: Biblioteca de Novelistas Americanos, 1922
Historia de arrabal, Buenos Aires: Agencia General de Librería y Publicaciones, 1922
El cánito espiritual, Buenos Aires: Agencia General de Librería y Publicaciones, 1923
La pampa y su pasión, Buenos Aires: Agencia General de Librería y Publicaciones, 1926
Una mujer muy moderna, Buenos Aires: Gleizer, 1927
Los caminos de la muerte, Buenos Aires: La Facultad, 1928
Humaitá, Buenos Aires: La Facultad, 1929
Jornadas de agonía, Buenos Aires: La Facultad, 1929
El gaucho de Los Cerrillos, Buenos Aires: La Facultad, 1931
El General Quiroga, Buenos Aires: La Facultad, 1932
Cautiverio, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Amigos del Libro Rioplatense, 1935
La noche toca a su fin, Buenos Aires: Cabaut y Compañía, 1935
Hombres en soledad, Buenos Aires: Club del Libro, 1938
La ciudad pintada en rojo, Buenos Aires: Instituto Panamericano de Cultura, 1948
La muerte en las calles: novela de las invasiones inglesas, 1806–1807, Buenos Aires: El Ateneo, 1949
Tiempo de odio y angustia, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe Argentina, 1951
Han tocado a degüello, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe Argentina, 1951
Bajo la garra anglo-francesa, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe Argentina, 1953
Y así cayó don Juan Manuel, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe Argentina, 1954
Las dos vidas del pobre Napoleón, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1954
El uno y la multitud, Buenos Aires: Alpe, 1955
Tránsito Guzmán, Buenos Aires: Theoria, 1956
Perdido en su noche, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1958
Me mataron entre todos, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1962
La locura de ser santo, Buenos Aires: Puma, 1967

Short Fiction
Los mejores cuentos, Buenos Aires: Patria, 1919
Luna de miel y otras narraciones, Buenos Aires: Biblioteca de Novelistas Americanos, 1920

Poetry
El enigma interior, Buenos Aires: privately printed, 1907
El sendero de humildad, Buenos Aires: Moen y Hermano, 1909
Poemas para la recién llegada, Buenos Aires: Theoria, 1957

Plays
El hombre de los ojos azules: comedia en tres actos, Buenos Aires: La Facultad, 1928
Calibán: tragicomedia de la vida política, Buenos Aires: privately printed, 1943

Biographies
Vida de Fray Mamerto Esquiú, Buenos Aires: Tor, 1938 Vida de Hipólito Yrigoyen, Buenos Aires: Tor, 1939
Vida de don Juan Manuel de Rosas, Buenos Aires: El Ateneo, 1940
Vida de don Gabriel García Moreno, Buenos Aires: Difusión, 1942
Vida de Aparicio Saravia, Buenos Aires: privately printed, 1942
Vida de Sarmiento, Buenos Aires: La Universidad, 1947
José Hernández, Buenos Aires: La Universidad, 1945
Don Francisco de Miranda, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1947
El santito de la toldería: la vida perfecta de Ceferino Namuncurá, Buenos Aires: Poblet, 1947

Essays
El diario de Gabriel Quiroga: opiniones sobre la vida argentina, Buenos Aires: Moen, 1910
Argentina, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Nosotros, 1913
La inseguridad de la vida obrera: informe sobre el paro forzoso, Buenos Aires: Alsina, 1913
El espíritu de aristocracia y otros ensayos, Buenos Aires: Agencia General de Librería y Publicaciones, 1924
Este pueblo necesita, Buenos Aires: García Santos, 1934
La Argentina en nuestros libros, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1935
España y algunos españoles, Buenos Aires: Huarpes, 1945
El novelista y las novelas, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1949

Memoirs
Amigos y maestros de mi juventud, 1900–1910, Buenos Aires: Kraft, 1944
Recuerdos de la vida literaria, Buenos Aires: Hachette, 1961
En el mundo de los seres ficticios, Buenos Aires: Hachette, 1961
Entre la novela y la historia, Buenos Aires: Hachette, 1962
En el mundo de los seres reales, Buenos Aires: Hachette, 1965
Other Writings

La vida multiple, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Nosotros, 1916
El solar de la raza, obra premiada por el gobierno de la República Argentina, Madrid: Saturnino Calleja, 1920
El espiritualismo español, Buenos Aires: Bayardo, 1921
La gran familia de los Laris, Buenos Aires: Universitaria de Buenos Aires, 1973

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras escogidas, Buenos Aires: Aguilar, 1949

Further Reading

After decades of neglect, Gálvez appears to have been receiving a little more attention from the critics in the last few years—a prerequisite for both rehabilitation and revisionary readings. To be appreciated by modern readers Gálvez’s work must be seen in the context of his period. Thus it is not surprising that the direction of more recent criticism is often ideological and political.

Agresti, Mable Susana, Literaturas y realidades: la vision del pais en algunas novelas de Manuel Gálvez, Mendoza: Universidad Nacional de Cuyo, 1981
Desinano, Norma, La novelística de Manuel Gálvez, Santa Fe, Argentina: Universidad Nacional del Litoral, 1965
Lichtblau, Myron I., Manuel Gálvez, Boston: Twayne, 1972
Olivari, Nicolás and Lorenzo Stanchina, Manuel Gálvez: ensayo sobre su obra, Buenos Aires: Agencia General de Librería y Publicaciones, 1924
Puente, Joseph E., Estudio critico-histórico de las novelas de Manuel Gálvez, Miami: Universal, 1975
Quijada, Mónica, Manuel Gálvez: 60 años de pensamiento nacionalista, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1985
Szmetan, Ricardo, La situación del escritor en la obra de Manuel Gálvez, New York: Peter Lang, 1994

Griselda Gambaro 1928–

Argentine dramatist and prose writer

Although Griselda Gambaro began her career as a fiction writer, she was to become best known as a playwright. But many of the themes developed in her plays have their origins in her narratives. The examination of violence in both its universal and national contexts, either as punishment for posing a threat to an existing authority or simply as a gratuitous act—this is the major concern present in all of Gambaro’s work to date. For reasons of brevity, this essay will focus on Griselda Gambaro the dramatist, but this in no way is meant to undermine the value of her significant contributions to the narrative genre.

In common with so many other contemporary dramatists in Latin America, in her plays Gambaro’s goal is a fusion of sociopolitical commitment with verbal and non-verbal expressions of violence. This is achieved by the portrayal of the harsh realities of societal repression and resistance—torture, both physical and psychological, the subsequent numbing of individual and communal responsiveness, and the ultimate collapse of basic human interaction. Violence becomes both an expression of the characters’ environment as well as an increasingly disturbing part of their own psyche. This is revealed in their own violent behaviour towards others or in their failure to control the violence around them. With their origins in the Argentine genre, el grotesco, or the grotesque, which is rooted in the works of Armando Discépolo (1887–1971), Gambaro’s dramatic production becomes combative theatre. It is theatre which demands the collaboration, the complicity, the active response and participation of its audience (the third element in the victim/victimizer triangle) in the expectation that the human condition can change or be changed by active intervention.

The perpetrators of violence are stripped of human attributes through demystification, buffoonery, ridicule and dehumanization, whilst passive bystanders (including the drama’s real-life audience) are equally condemned as accomplices of the oppressors. The identification between oppressor-oppressed, which results from the inability to see man’s inhumanity to man as a threat to the victim’s very survival, has tragic consequences as in Los siameses [The Siamese Twins] and El desatino [The Absurdity]. But when the oppressed unite against their oppressors, a sense of revolutionary optimism prevails as in La malasangre [Bad Blood] and Del sol naciente [The Rising Sun].

Since the 1960s Griselda Gambaro has studied what is for her a country suffering from schizophrenia, one that lives two lives. Thus in classifying her prolific theatrical production, Diana Taylor has aptly categorized Gambaro’s plays of the 1960s (including Las paredes, Los siameses, and El campo) as “theatre of crisis;” her work of the 1970s (Decir sí, El despojamiento, and Información para extranjeros), respectively “Saying Yes,” “Dispossession” and “Information for Foreigners,” as “drama of disappearance, obsessed with the ‘missing’,” and the more recent plays of the 1980s (including La malasangre, Del sol naciente, and Antígona furiosa) as “theatre of crisis analysis, differentiating victims from victimizers.”

While the earlier plays of the 1960s are in two acts, Gambaro’s later plays are fragmented, very short one-acts like Decir sí, El despojamiento, or the episodic Información para extranjeros (A Chronicle in Twenty Scenes, 1971–73, first published in 1987). Indeed, Gambaro depicts the birth of a national consciousness—an awareness of a country’s own social ills and the need to combat—the painful psycho-social growth of contemporary Argentina.

Gambaro’s dramatic theory took shape during her years in exile since in this time she was unable to write for the theatre. She has said that the dramatic text is born in an immediate confrontation with a locale and with the conflicts of that world: “Every theatre piece is a settling of accounts, an immediate encounter with the society.” And, underscoring the necessity of the audience for the appropriate rendering of the performance text, Gambaro stated in 1989 that theatre “is a learning experience and an exchange…with all the modes of expression of a community.” As a collective phenomenon, it is the physical presence of the audience that is necessary to complete a given performance text. But, as Gambaro herself asserts, theatre cannot be a panacea for the social ills it depicts. It is only when the audience is affected as individuals that change can be brought about. And it is within this framework of conveying a moving moral message on the personal level (i.e., a familiar universal tragedy brought to the level of each reader/spectator) that Gambaro’s Antígona furiosa can best be understood—a universal drama without temporal or spatial boundaries speaking to the individual conscience. The piece was written in 1985 and 1986, during and shortly after the trial of the Dirty War commanders when, out of political expediency, President Carlos Menem granted them an executive pardon. It deals with passivity in the face of repression, popular compliance with terror. As a retelling of the Sophoclean tragedy as well as a dramatization of the struggle by the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo to recover their children’s corpses, Antígona furiosa demonstrates that crimes of national conscience are not limited to Latin America or even to her native Argentina but move across cultural boundaries. The play represents a pivotal point in Gambaro’s dramaturgy in the sense that it demonstrates how her protagonists have developed from a state of passive acquiescence to authority in the roles of victim-accomplices to one of raised consciousness and even to being capable of rising above their desperate situations by acts of rebellion against repression even in the face of their own death.

As a playwright, Griselda Gambaro is keenly aware of the role of representation (social and theatrical) in maintaining or dismantling the political structure. Gambaro’s Información para extranjeros (written in the period 1971–1973) most acutely illustrates this sentiment. More so than in any of her other dramatic pieces, Información para extranjeros confuses art-as-truth and art-as-fiction as it interplays with the breakdown of the barriers between stage and audience. The dramatist describes this manipulation between “reality” and “theatre” as a “guided tour of the places of repression and indignity” due to the significance that leading, following, and bearing witness play as audience members are given personal “guides” with narration (“Explanation: For Foreigners,” readings of newspaper articles that appeared in the Argentine press during this period, the “official story” of events) through spaces used for detention and torture. As Gambaro gives new meaning to environmental theatre in this work by placing acts of political violence within familiar places—public streets, private houses, directly in the lives of audience members themselves—she exposes the secret and dark places of prisons and torture chambers hidden from view for all to see and, in some measure, “experience.” Due to its demanding staging requirements, not to mention a participabed at English-language workshops and readings in the tory audience, the only performances of this work to date have United States. The Argentine public has not been particularly receptive to a performance text that wages “assaults” against passivity and inaction, not to mention the implicit social criticism of a people who allowed government-sponsored terrorism in the form of kidnapping, torture, and death to paralyze them.

ELENA DE COSTA
Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 28 July 1928. Parents were Italian immigrants; father a Post Office employee. After leaving high school in 1943 she worked as a clerk for a publishing house and a sports club, 1947–56. Married the sculptor Juan Carlos Distéfano; two children, Andrea (b. 1961) and Lucas (b. 1965). Taught drama at the Universidad Nacional del Litoral, Santa Fé, 1969. Spent year in Rome, 1970. Associated with the Centro de Experimentación Audiovisual del Instituto Torcuato di Tella. Lived in Barcelona, 1977–80, to avoid the worst years of the military dictatorship. She had been forced into exile when one of her novels, Ganarse la muerte [Asking for Death] was banned by the direct decree of General Jorge Rafael Videla, such a ban amounted to a death threat. On her return to Buenos Aires she collaborated with the Teatro Abierto (Open Theatre) and produced political plays. Guggenheim Award in 1982 enabled her to travel to Mexico, the US and France. Recipient of numerous awards including the Emecé Prize, 1965, for El desatino, the Revista Teatro XX Prize in the same year for El desatino and four first prizes for her play El campo in 1968.

Selected Works

Plays

Madrigal en ciudad, Buenos Aires: Goyanarte, 1963

El desatino, Buenos Aires: Editorial del Instituto Di Tella, 1965

Una felicidad con menos pena, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1967

Los siameses, Buenos Aires: Insurrexit, 1967

El campo, Buenos Aires: Insurrexit, 1967

La gracia, in El Urogallo 17, Madrid (1972)

Nada que ver con otra historia, Buenos Aires: Noé, 1972

Sólo un aspecto, in La palabra y el hombre 8, Mexico City (1973)

El nombre, in supplement of El Cronista, Buenos Aires (September 1975)

Ganarse la muerte, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1976

Dios no nos quiere contentos, Barcelona: Lumen, 1979

Decir si, Buenos Aires: Editorial Teatro Abierto, 1981

Nada que ver. Sucedé lo que pasa, Ottawa: Girol Books, 1983

Lo impenetrable, Buenos Aires: Torres Agüero, 1984

Compilations and Anthologies

Teatro: Las paredes, El desatino, Los siameses, Buenos Aires and Barcelona: Argonauta, 1979

Teatro: Real envido, La malasangre, Del sol naciente, vol. I, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1984

Teatro: Las paredes, El desatino, Los siameses, El campo, Nada que ver, vol. 4, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1990

Anthologies in Translation

Novels and Short Fiction

La cola mágica, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1976 [stories for children]
Conversaciones con chicos, Buenos Aires: Timerman, 1976
Un poco de historia, Un río que sólo corre de noche, Buenos Aires and Barcelona: Argonauta, 1988
Después del día de fiesta, Buenos Aires: Seix Barral, 1994

Other Writings

“Disyuntivas de un autor teatral que se convierte en novelista,” La Opinion, Buenos Aires (March 1977)
“¿Es posible y deseable una dramaturgia específicamente femenina?” Latin American Theatre Review, vol. 12/2 (Fall 1980)
“Algunas consideraciones sobre la mujer y la literatura,” Revista Iberoamericana 51 (1985)

Further Reading

Feitlowitz, Marguerite, “Crisis, Terror, Disappearance: the Theater of Griselda Gambaro,” Theater; Yale School Drama, (Summer-Fall 1990)
Foster, David William, “Argentine Sociopolitical Commentary, the Malvinas Conflict, and Beyond: Rhetoricizing a National Experience,” Latin American Theatre Review, vol. 22/1 (Spring 1979)

Interviews

Betsko, Kathleen and Rachel Koening (editors), Interviews with Contemporary Women Playwrights, New York: Beech Tree Books, 1987
Picon Garfield, Evelyn (editor), Women’s Voices from Latin America: Interviews with Six Contemporary Authors, Detroit, Michigan: Wayne State University Press, 1985
Ventura García Calderón 1886–1959

Peruvian prose writer

Although Ventura García Calderón spent his early years in his native Peru, from 1906 until 1959 he lived in Europe and for the most part in Paris. As a youth García Calderón read José Enrique Rodó’s influential essay Ariel and Rubén Darío’s Prosas profanas, widely circulated works that could both underscore and create conflict for the Americanism which García Calderón consistently expressed in his literary endeavours. His work is of a transitional nature, having its beginnings in the Spanish American modernista or post-modernist period of Darío and Juan Ramón Jiménez.

García Calderón is a master of prose creation. He is best known as the author of La venganza del cóndor, 1924 [The Condor’s Revenge] and Cunetos peruanos, 1952 [Peruvian Stories] but was also extremely prolific in other cultural areas. He produced numerous articles of literary criticism and chronicles which were a cross between literary analysis, reviews of cultural events, historical reflections and fiction. His prose style was fundamentally modernista and attracted readers’ attention even in the presence of such contemporaries as Gutiérrez Nájera, Martí and Darío. The influence of D’Annunzian decadence is evident in Frívolamente, 1908 [Frivolously] and Cantilenas, 1920 [Ballads]. In the former one finds multifaceted portraits of the Paris he knew as an American observer, situated between Anatole de France and Paul Verlaine, by his own confession. The world described is one of sensuality; particularly in relation to women and other aspects of nightlife, and is suggestive yet restrained by subtle references to honour, love for country, and faith. The details of daily and artistic existence in the French capital are sometimes linked to the Hispanic, often to the concept of a Latin character, and a very sensitive human response to the immediate surroundings. Women figure frequently in García Calderón’s short articles and they range from the scorned (writers) to the idealized (mystics, female representations in works of art), but are always clearly portrayed from a patriarchal and conservative perspective. Cantilenas is a volume of mixed genres—prose and poetry—with modernista tones.

Although he may be considered weak politically, and less than faithful to his responsibilities, as a diplomat (he lost his post in 1921 and only regained it in 1930), García Calderón was true to his vocation as a writer and strove to show European readers that Latin Americans were more than picturesque individuals. One of the expressions of his commitment was a constant attention to American literary production. In 1910 he published Del romanticismo al modernismo, an anthology of Peruvian writers from Romanticism to Modernism accompanied by critical commentaries. In 1910 he published Dolorosa y desnuda realidad [Painful, Naked Truth], a collection of short stories influenced by Oscar Wilde, J.-K.Huysmans and Leconte de Lisle.

García Calderón became associated with the Revue Hispanique in Paris, which resulted in the publication of literary histories of Latin American countries. The five volumes which appeared include two authored or co-authored by him, these being considered the best of the collection: La literatura peruana [Peruvian Literature] and La literatura uruguaya [Uruguyan Literature] with H. Barbagelata. The twelvevolume Biblioteca de Cultura Peruana, 1939 [The Library of Peruvian Culture] was perhaps the culmination of the author/diplomat’s effort to create a respected space for American writing in Europe. Before and after this, numerous volumes appeared, including critical studies or editions of Latin American writers (Valle Caviedes, El Lunarejo), European authors (Montherlant, Wilde), creative fiction, chronicles and verse. Several of his works appeared in French: Danger de mort, 1926 [Mortal Danger], Couleur de sang, 1930 [The Colour of Blood], Le Sang plus vite, 1936 [The Swiftest Blood] and Amour indien, 1944 [Indian Love] are but some of these.

Ironically, but perhaps also to his liking, García Calderón is best remembered as the author of La venganza del cóndor, in which he views the Peruvian highlands from a distant Europe and through the lenses of Arielist cultural concepts and Riva Agüeró’s desire to foment a greater understanding of Peruvian culture. The Indian reality in these stories is beautiful, nostalgic and false. The suggestion of idealized forms and peoples resembles the world of Chateaubriand and potentially noble savages, but the content reveals a familiarity with the Quechua world that is only expressible by the author in terms of sadness and exoticism. The period of the conquest, with the display of military and sexual prowess on the part of Spanish soldiers, is the most valued, and thus validates the hierarchical perspective of historical violence as an inevitable result of the clash between superior European cultures and lesser native American ones. The fall from past glory of Peruvian civilization provides the perfect literary theme: mysterious, distant, imperial grandeur, tragic, lyrical, in a word, dramatic. This viewpoint, conflictive in its vacillation between delicate description and truculent action, presented from an external viewpoint, is in one sense a step backward in the development of a national Peruvian literature, and its ideology is vastly different from that of García Calderón’s contemporary, López Albújar.

While throughout his life García Calderón continued to investigate the American cultural identity and to illustrate his love for Lima through titles such as Vale un Perú, 1939 [Worth a Gold Mine], La Perichole, 1940 [Madam Perichola], or Instantes del Perú, 1941 [Peruvian Moments], in which a spicy humour prevails, he also is torn by his other cultural ties to the immediate context, which is illustrated by publications such as Cette France que nous aimions, 1945 [The France We Loved]. He forever revels in language—the mestizos’ contribution to Spanish in America—as evinced by the pamphlet El nuevo idioma castellano [The New Castilian Language], but perhaps did not truly understand the Peru to which he was always attached, if not by birth, by choice. On the one hand, his great aesthetic sensitivity a la Darío helped him imagine what was distinctly sad, and autochthonous about his distant country; on the other, his megalomania and bohemian nature left him suspended in a world that was Peruvian, Spanish and French, in changing order.

KATHLEEN N. MARCH

See also entry on Paris

Biography

Born in Paris, 1886, where he was to spend much of his life. Educated at the School of the Sacred Heart in Lima and later at University of San Marcos where he studied Law, Literature and Politics. Served in Peruvian consular service in various West European capitals. Later settled in Paris where he ran the Excelsior publishing house. Wrote and published in French as well as in Spanish. Represented Peru at League of Nations in 1930 and appointed Peru’s permanent Selected Works (in Spanish)

Novels
Baja el clamor de las sirenas, Paris: America Latina, 1919
Aguja de marear, Paris: Garnier, 1936

Short Fiction
Dolorosa y desnuda realidad, Paris: Garnier, 1910
Cuentos, Lima: Literatura Peruana, vol. I/II (1923)
La venganza del cóndor, Madrid: Mundo Latino, 1924 [Contains “La venganza del cóndor,” “La llama blanca” and 22 other stories]; as The White Llama, translated by Richard Phibbs, London: Golden Cockerell Press, 1938
Cuentos peruanos, Madrid: Aguilar, 1952

Other Writings
Frívolamente (crónicas), Paris: Garnier, 1908
Del romanticismo al modernismo: prosistas y poetas peruanos, Paris: Ollendorf, 1910
Cantilenas, Paris: Brujas, 192.0 [poems]
En la verbena de Madrid (crónicas), Paris: Ediciones America Latina, 1920
Semblanzas de América, Madrid: Biblioteca Ariel, 1922
Sonrisas de Paris (crónicas), Buenos Aires: Nuestra America, 1926
Los románticos, Paris: Desclée de Brouwer, 1938
La Périchole, Paris: n.p., 1940
Instantes del Perú, Paris: Garnier, 1941
Nosotros, Paris: Garnier, 1946

Compilations and Anthologies
Obra literaria selecta, prologue by Luis Alberto Sánchez, chronology and bibliography by Marlene Polo Miranda, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1989

Further Reading
Hommage a Ventura García Calderón, edited by Henri Lefèvre, Paris: Lefèvre, 1947

Gabriel García Márquez 1928(?)–

Colombian prose writer
Born in Aracataca in the northern, Caribbean, region of Colombia, Gabriel García Márquez was brought up by his grandparents until the age of eight. The influence of rural popular culture, which reached him above all through the stories he heard from his grandmother, has been primordial in his work. Another main source has been his grandfather, who fought with the Liberals in the War of a Thousand Days, a civil war that took place at the very end of the 19th century. After being sent to school in the cold highlands, he became a journalist, working for El Espectador, which included a period spent as European correspondent. These separations from the places of his childhood convinced him of his identity as a Caribbean writer. Subsequently, he has lived mainly in Barcelona and Mexico. He has had close contacts with Cuba, and unlike for example Mario Vargas Llosa, he continued to support the Cuban Revolution. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1982.

Márquez’s earliest writings consist of journalism, of which Cuando era feliz e indocumentado, 1973 [When I was a Young Unknown] offers a selection from the 1950s. Short stories written between 1947 and 1953 are collected in Ojos de perro azul, 1972 [Eyes of the Blue Dog]: the influences here are Kafka and Poe and it was not until he discovered the same tone of voice in his grandmother’s stories and in Kafka’s that he was able to find the language of his mature work, capable of conveying the natural and the supernatural, the everyday and the marvellous, without division. His first novel, La hojarasca, 1955 (Leaf Storm), establishes an aristocratic vision of Macondo, the imaginary region of much of his fiction of the 1950s and 1960s. The title refers to the arrival in the region of the “Banana Company” (historically, the United Fruit Company), which for the local aristocracy signifies the apocalyptic demise of their world, their values and of time itself. The key historical referents of El coronel no tiene quien le escriba, 1957 (No One Writes to the Colonel) are the War of a Thousand Days and the modern period of la Violencia, when civil war conditions dominated the country between 1949 and 1962 and left more than 2,00,000 dead. The Colonel of the title is still waiting, in 1956, for the state pension he was promised for fighting in the 19th-century civil war. The other source of hope, in a novel which counterposes the humiliating drudgery of survival under political and social oppression to the Colonel’s sense of transcendence, is a fighting cock, which “must win.” Amid sensations of history being as uncontrollable as the lottery or the weather, these two objects sustain symbolically the possibility of change. Humour and fatalism collide in this short but multi-layered book: in one discarded version the cock was to have ended up in a stew. The same atmosphere of oppressive political violence is explored in La mala hora, 1962. (In Evil Hour), but the emphasis is on satirical exposure of the corrupting penetration of power into everyday life. The political regime has come to rely more on social amnesia than military violence. It is the poor who remember those killed in political murders, who embody the truth masked by the “caring” language of the regime. The main characters are middle-class people, gente decente, whose concern for appearances is mockingly juxtaposed with the hidden violence of the social order. A collection of stories published in 1962.—Los funerales de la Mamá Grande (Big Mama’s Funeral)—deploys informal and carnavalesque aspects of popular culture for humorous demolitions of the pretensions of social authority. The title story, which is a mock sermon ridiculing power, directs a local oral sense of history against the distortions of official written history.

With Cien años de soledad, 1967 (One Hundred Years of Solitude), the history of Macondo is placed on an epic level, from its mythic/historical foundation to its final disappearance. This extraordinary novel stands in the same kind of importance for Latin American literature as Don Quixote does for Spanish. Reopening narrative fiction to earlier, pre-novelistic modes, it also exposes the bourgeois family chronicle, historical backbone of the genre, to the onslaught of other varieties of knowledge and experience which do not fit with the bourgeois notion of civilisation. Above all, it includes the vast world of popular beliefs and practices. Loose application of the term Magical Realism is not necessarily useful given the historical and social particularity of magic in this novel: García Márquez has stressed that everything that happens in it is perfectly normal in a Colombian context. The failure of epic foundation, played out as the destruction of a family through inward-turning incestuous desire, is in a sense the failure to found viable Latin American nation-states in the post-colonial period. The structure of fatalism in which the family are trapped collides with García Márquez’s socialist politics, as he was careful to stress in his Nobel Prize acceptance speech. On the other hand, the text can be read on many levels: as a Latin American satire on Western civilisation; as a compendium of the possibilities of Latin America; as a critique of the liberal (i.e. bourgeois) history of Colombia; as a “postmodern” exploration of the limits of narrative fiction.

The stories of La increíble y triste historia de la cándida Eréndira y de su abuela desalmada, 1972 (Innocent Erendira and Other Stories) continue to undermine the usual European, enlightened—division between the real and the irrational, for instance in the account of how a very old man with huge wings turns up on the beach after a Caribbean storm. The title story, a farcical allegory of capital accumulation, reveals García Márquez’s concern with the economics of regions marginally integrated into the world capitalist system. His next major work was a response to the historical legacy of dictatorship in Latin America, sharpened by a personal need to confront the isolation of personal fame by analysing desire for power. The dictator in El otoño del patriarca, 1975 (The Autumn of the Patriarch) is both a myth and an amalgam of actual historical figures. It is the voice of the people which supplies him with power by constructing him as dominant figure, but the same voice parodies and unmasks the imagery of power.

García Márquez’s declared fascination with Greek tragedy shows above all in the short novel Crónica de una muerte anunciada, 1981 (Chronicle of a Death Foretold), which recounts the murder of a man for allegedly violating the law of honour. Investigation reveals the whole town to be responsible. But it is the form of the plot, with its chains of coincidences that carries the tragic dimension, not people’s accounts of their actions. The result is all the more disturbing: the mechanism of fatalism is not in people’s consciousness. El amor en los tiempos del cólera, 1985 (Love in the Time of Cholera) appears to move in a very different direction. It celebrates a love affair without tragedy or wastage, one which flowers in old age, after a lifetime of waiting. Nevertheless, time as wastage haunts the edge of the scene, in the form of the forests being devoured as fuel by the river-boat where the lovers find themselves, revealing a recurrent concern in García Márquez’s writing with processes of decadence and renewal, both in the individual psyche and over the longer terms of history. In a subsequent novel, he continues to make the past his subject, but paradoxically regenerating the vision of Latin American unity. El general en su laberinto, 1989 (The General in His Labyrinth) traces Bolívar’s final journey down the Magdalena river, his destruction in soul and body as forces of division and dictatorship grow up around him, wrecking his plan of making Latin America into a single federated State, a massive force for an alternative vision of the future.
Doce cuentos peregrinos, 1992, (Strange Pilgrims) is a collection of short stories which deal with “the strange things that happen to Latin Americans in Europe” as events that place routine attitudes at an edge where securities of cultural interpretation become thin. Humour—as in all of García Márquez’s work, a key feature—is used to explore what those securities seek to control and the effects of time swing between devastation and repetition, without renewal. His recent novel Del amor y otros demonios (Of Love and Other Demons), is set in Colombia in the 18th century, towards the end of the colonial period, in a society that is both sumptuous and decaying and that in subtle ways continues alongside the modern world of the late 20th century. African religions brought by slaves, inquisitional Catholicism and loss of faith (a phenomenon of the changing times) coexist, and in their midst the miraculous, a theme that has interested García Márquez since he began writing, is handled ambiguously: it is both what cannot be explained or accommodated by belief systems and what the Church uses for authoritarian control. Fascination with religion in a society that is falling apart makes this clearly an end of 20th-century novel.

WILLIAM ROWE

See also entries on The Boom, Caudillismo and Dictatorship, The Historical Novel, Magical Realism

Biography

Selected Works

Novels and Novellas
La hojarasca, Bogota: Sipa, 1955
El coronel no tiene quien le escriba, Mexico City: Era: 1957; as No One Writes to the Colonel, translated by J.S.Bernstein, in No One Writes to the Colonel and Other Stories, New York: Harper and Row, 1968; London: Jonathan Cape, 1971
Isabel viendo llover en Macondo, Buenos Aires: Estuario, 1967
El negro qui hizo esperar a los ángeles, Montevideo: Alfil, 1972 [novella]
El último viaje del buque fantasma, Parets del Vallés: Poligrafa, 1976 [novella]
El rastro de tu sangre en la nieve: el verano feliz de la señora Forbes, Bogota: W. Dampier Editores, 1982 [novella]

Short Fiction
Ojos de perro azul: nueve cuentos desconocidos, Buenos Aires: Equis, 1972

Plays
Viva Sandino, Managua: Nueva Nicaragua, 1982; as El asalto: el operativo con que el FSLN se lanzó al mundo, 1983
El secuestro, Salamanca: Lóquez, 1982 [screenplay]
Maria de mi corazón (Mary My Dearest), in collaboration with J.H. Hermosillo, 1983 [screenplay]
Diatriba de amor contra un hombre sentado, Santafé de Bogota: Arnago, 1994

Other Writings
La novela en America Latina: diálogo, in collaboration with Mario Vargas Llosa, Lima: Milla Batres, 1968
Cuando era feliz e indocumentado, Caracas: El Ojo del Camello, 1973
De viaje por los países socialistas: 90 días en la “Cortina de Hierro,” Cali, Colombia: Macondo, 1978
Crónicas y reportajes, Bogota: Oveja Negra, 1978
Periodismo militar, Bogota: Son de Máquina Editores, 1978
La batalla de Nicaragua, in collaboration with Gregoria Selser and Daniel Waksman Schinca, Mexico City: Bruguera Mexicana, 1979
García Márquez habla de García Márquez, Bogota: Rentería, 1979
La soledad de America Latina; brindis por la poesía, Cali: Corporación Editorial Universitaria de Colombia, 1983
Persecución y muerte de minorías, in collaboration with Guillermo Nolasco-Juárez, Buenos Aires: Juárez, 1984
Textos costeños, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1987
Noticia de un secuestro, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1996

Compilations and Anthologies

Anthologies in Translation

Further Reading
Earle, Peter G. (editor), Gabriel García Márquez, Madrid: Taurus, 1981
Fuentes, Carlos, Gabriel García Márquez and the Invention of America, Liverpool: Liverpool University Press, 1987
Hart, Stephen M., Crónica de una muerte anunciada, London: Grant and Cutler, 1994
McMurray, George R., Gabriel García Márquez, New York: Ungar, 1977
McMurray George R., (editor), Critical Essays on Gabriel García Márquez, Boston: G.K.Hall, 1987 [Interesting selection of articles and reviews of works up to Crónica de una muerte anunciada]
McNerney, Kathleen, Understanding Gabriel García Márquez, Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1989
Oberhelman, Harley D., Gabriel García Márquez: a Study of the Short Fiction; Boston: Twayne, 1991
Ortega, Julio (editor), Gabriel García Márquez and the Powers of Fiction, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1988
Vargas Llosa, Mario, Gabriel García Márquez: historia de un deicidio, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1971
Williams, Raymond L., Gabriel García Márquez, Boston: Twayne, 1984

Bibliographies

Special Issues of Journals

---

El amor en los tiempos del cólera

Novel by Gabriel García Márquez

El amor en los tiempos del cólera is García Márquez’s version of the 19th-century romantic novel. For this reason the novel is much more traditional in form and, perhaps, considerably easier to read, than some of the author’s earlier major works. Set in the north of Colombia, in and around a town which bears much resemblance to Cartagena, its time sequence stretches over some sixty years between the late 1870s and early 1930s, covering most of the life of its two main characters. The narrative starts around 1930, recapitulating the events of the previous fifty years and then moves on to the conclusion two years later.

According to the romantic tradition on which García Márquez is drawing, the love affair central to the plot undergoes many vicissitudes and set-backs. In addition, the relationship between the two lovers is offset by the presence of a third, the heroine’s husband. In this triangle, however—and this is one of the many ironies of the book—the heroine is neither in love with the man she marries nor—after a very brief adolescent romance—with her lover. And the lover puny, myopic and constipated, and always attired in black spends half a century squandering his passion over more than 600 sexual affairs, while waiting for his beloved to come around to loving him. Which she finally does—as a seventy-two-year-old widow.

Thus romantic love is apparently debunked and debased by the author’s detached, humorous treatment. A famous example of this is an early episode in which the young heroine receives a love letter from the very hands of her passionate lover just as a bird dropping falls on it. To relieve her blushing embarrassment, however, the young man smilingly comments that it is meant to bring good luck. And the reader becomes aware of how many of the romantic clichés with which the narrative abounds are here repeated as a kind of private joke, a wink between the writer and the reader, a complicity of which the very characters seem to be apart.

This “tongue in cheek” style is evident from the very title associating love with cholera. In fact the symptoms of love dizziness, sickness and diarrhoea—are not unlike those of the illness often fatal and endemic in Latin America. For love and death, true to the romantic tradition, go hand in hand. Or do they?

In the initial episode we read of a suicide—a man misleadingly named Saint-Amour—and we are led at first to believe that he took his life because of unrequited love. That is not the case: it appears that he was well loved and that the suicide was prompted by his desire to die before being overtaken by the infirmities of old age. While Saint-Amour is never mentioned again in the course of the text, it becomes obvious that his death is intended to pose a challenge to the concept of love being stronger than old age and death. Yet this challenge is taken up and defied at the conclusion of the novel when the two lovers—now in their seventies—having finally consummated their bond, will remain on the boat going up and down the Magdalena river under the yellow flag of “Cholera aboard” for “toda la vida” (forever).

More romantic than the Romans the author, who has denied the capacity to love to so many of his earlier male characters, is presenting the protagonist Florentino as “todo amor” (all love). His outlandish sexual behaviour is a manifestation of his being “un solitario necesitado de amor” (a solitary man in need of love). Towards the end, confronted by his aging beloved, Fermina, he answers “de inmediato sin un temblor en la voz: Es que me he conservado virgen para ti” (without hesitation in a steady voice: “I have remained a virgin for you”). She chooses to accept this, even though she doesn’t believe him. On equal terms, the reader is asked to accept all these affairs were but a manifestation of his love. And such love seems to be García Márquez’s final answer to gerontophobia, when the aging couple finally realizes that “el amor era el amor en cualquier tiempo y en cualquier parte, pero tanto más denso cuanto más cerca de la muerte” (love was love any time and any place, but more solid the closer it came to death).

Readers of García Márquez will find in this book many of the traits which they have grown to recognize in the work of this writer, such as humorous hyperboles, an abundance of scatological details, liturgical dates encoding major events of the plot, and—here even more than previously—a choice of names whose meanings are clearly related to the characters: Fermina, the loyal steadfast wife; Florentino, the conquering lover and, incidentally, a reminder of Europe at the time of the Renaissance; America, his young charge whom—like the conquered continent—he seduces, exploits and then abandons driving her to death; Nueva Fidelidad (New Fidelity), the boat which will take the aging lovers on their journey to the end of their lives. Equally the readers will find in the descriptions of many journeys over the Sierra and across the wild selva, a rich background of vegetable and animal life, often endowed with a symbolic role. References to the act of reading, and even more so of writing, also abound: Florentino is an avid reader and a professional writer of love letters; hence the allusions to the “decoding of the message” when the lovers communicate by telegraph.
Less obvious perhaps than in other works, but still subtly present in the narrative are the allusions to the political life of Latin America—repeated references to wars and violence and the disturbing sight of the bodies of unknown victims. Of more prominence here, is the comment on Colombian society: the heroine’s husband, Urbino, a doctor and member of the upper classes is presented as a caricature of the servility to European cultural values—he reads Le Figaro. Urbino is confronted and replaced by the working class Florentino, member of the mestizo/mulatto population of Colombia, while poverty, filth and despair rage around the rich man’s house. Urbino’s parodic death is a symbol of the failure of the liberal dream in Colombian politics.

More novel is the apparently feminist line which García Márquez takes us in the denunciation of married life within the patriarchal system, an example of which is the one Urbino offers to Fermina. The sense of liberation and “finding herself” which she experiences upon his death is further illustrated by the recurrent image of the manatees. Spotted on the shores of the river, the manatees are both symbols of motherhood and of androgynty, for their species is said to be without a male.

The primary aim of the book remains, however, a celebration of life, of the spontaneity of human emotions and their illogicality. The symbol of cholera, of terror, is displaced by a symbol of love, “un estado de gracia” (a state of grace).

PSICHE HUGHES

Editions

Further Reading

Monsiváis, Carlos, “El amor en los tiempos del cólera: la novela extraordinaria de un Premio Nobel que no deja que ésto lo sojuzgue,” Mexico City, Proceso 477 (23 December 1985)

Cien años de soledad

Novel by Gabriel García Márquez
Cien años de soledad is an epic historical novel which charts the fortunes of a small Colombian town (Macondo) from its founding as an isolated outpost at the start of the 19th century, through its experience of civil and ecclesiastical authorities, the prolonged civil wars between Liberals and Conservatives, the invasion by the Banana Company which represents a period of neo-colonial domination by the US, the strike by the workers, the massacre and the slow erosion of the town in the 20th century until a devastating wind erases it from the face of the earth. While these events parallel a chronological period in Colombian history, the “cien años” also represent a metaphorical hundred years which reach back to the period of Discovery and Conquest as well as forward to postcolonial attempts to heal a history of fragmentation and oppression.

Central to this latter aim is García Márquez’s use of parody. At the same time as there is a demonstrable historicity to the events of the novel, the mass of information in the form of dates, names, events, wars, governments, family lines etc., reads like a parody of the historical novel which serves to undermine both the totalizing nature of the genre, and the metanarrative of “history” itself. As Michael Wood demonstrates in his study, Gabriel García Márquez: One Hundred Years of Solitude, the linear chronology of the historical novel is fragmented structurally, by sequences of loops and flashbacks and constant narrative interruptions, and also syntactically, by the use of multiple tenses in a single sentence. The novel’s opening sentence is typical of the way in which a notion of time is displaced to suggest the interconnections between past, present and future: “Muchos años después, frente al pelotón de fusilamiento, el coronel Aureliano Buendía había de recordar aquella tarde remota en que su padre lo llevó a conocer el hielo. (Many years later, as he faced the firing squad, Colonel Aureliano Buendía was to remember that distant afternoon when his father took him to discover ice).

The word “después” immediately provokes the question, “later than what?” and the search for the present time is further problematized by the phrase “aquella tarde remota” which sets in the distant past an event that is about to be described. Despite the immediacy of “frente al pelotón de fusilamiento,” the use of “había de recordar” again blurs the reader’s perspective, reminding us of our dependency on the narrator’s memory, and the power of prophecy. The verbal form “había de” is used throughout the novel and is, in some ways, its most characteristic device. It looks both forward and backward, pointing to a place where the future of the story will have become (what it always was) the past of the narrator and the present of the reader.

The reader experiences the novel, then, as a kind of schizophrenic journey backwards and forwards in time and this is further complicated by the blurred distinctions between the living and the dead, the physical and spiritual worlds. Various characters return from the dead to play a key part in the text, notably Prudencio Aguilar and Melquíades, while various of the Buendías retain the ability to communicate with an ancestral spirit world. Much of this journeying, or attempt to journey, beyond fixed categories is staged for comic effect, as with Amaranta preparing to carry the mail to the dead, or Melquíades’s return from death “porque no pudo soportar la soledad” (because he could not bear the solitude), and as Clive Griffin reminds us, it is important to remember the comic exuberance which uplifts the novel throughout, defining it as much as a celebration, as a critique, of character and event. Indeed, the ability to do both is central to its aims and it is perhaps the novel’s deliberate focus on simultaneous possibilities which has generated such diverse, and sometimes contradictory, critical responses.

Underpinning this method is the complex patterning of oppositional categories. Characters and events are structured through the pairing of oppositions, such as myth and history, oral and written traditions, scientific knowledge and intuitive wisdom. At the same time, these patterns are variously interchangeable which causes the disruption of binary thought and focus, instead, on their dynamic interplay. José Arcadio Buendía, the head of the family and the founder of Macondo, is the embodiment of the scientific method, meticulously working out schemes for social improvement and greater knowledge, and is directly contrasted with Úrsula, the enduring matriarch, who emphasizes the need to cultivate intuitive, even spiritual, insight. He plays the “masculine” to her “feminine” and his endeavours to subject every new discovery to strict rational criteria, such as stripping down the piano to discover its “magia secreta,” become the source of much comedy for the reader. The intimacy with which these two characters combine, however, reminds us that it is the interplay, rather than the separation of these categories which is dynamic. Colonel Aureliano and Remedios the Beauty are, in their different ways, lessons in the dangers of a single perspective; Aureliano representing the extreme isolation of the materialist while Remedios, unable to interact with the formal world, levitates as pure spirit out of Macondo and into the clouds. This lesson is reinforced by the presence of Melquiades who serves to cross-culturize notions of scientific knowledge and intuitive wisdom. He is introduced as a mysterious and supernatural being who “parecía conocer el otro lado de las cosas” (seemed to know the other side of things). But although he drifts in and out of Macondo in marvellous and unpredictable ways, his insights always remain rooted in the earth. As Floyd Merrell points out, Melquiades signifies a specifically Eastern knowledge which, though in direct contrast to José Arcadio’s Western framework, is none the less scientific. The limitations of José Arcadio’s scientific paradigms are exposed, then, through the intuitive (though not unscientific) perspectives of both Úrsula and Melquiades. These perspectives do not, however, invalidate José Arcadio’s struggle to comprehend reality, beneficial as it was to the modernization of Macondo. Nor can the characters of Úrsula and Melquiades be confined to the terms of this equation. Úrsula, for instance, also represents the oral tradition while Melquiades, as keeper of the archive, has been described as a figure of Borges.

Subject positions are constructed as mobile, then, with each new relationship serving to relativize a series of interconnected debates and ideas. Running parallel with the story of Úrsula, for instance, is that of Pilar Ternera, the prostitute and keeper of the brothel who is marginalized in the novel’s social structures but central to its narrative strategies. Not until the arrival of Amaranta Úrsula, the product of both Úrsula (her great, great grandmother) and Pilar Ternera (great grandmother), do we detect a disruption of the madonna/whore dichotomy that had separated her ancient grandmothers. But the novel rarely offers a synthesis of this kind and the need to find such resolution is symptomatic of the dangers of reading myth as history. Myth has a dual function in the novel—as a process of demystifying “myths” in the pejorative sense of “what is not real,” such as the Banana Company’s declaration that no one was killed in the historic strike; and as a structuring principle and genuinely alternative perspective to disrupt the closed linearity of the historical narrative. For at the core of the palimpsestic historical novel which is Cien años de soledad, lies a primitive creation myth founded in violence and incest which completes its circular trajectory in the transgression of taboo and the birth of a child with a pig’s tail. According to the myth, the act of transgression which, at the level of content, signals the destruction of community is also that which, at the level of form, instigates its transformation and evolution. The complexities of the novel’s metafictional/mythical/historical ending, and the multiperspectives it demands of the reader cannot easily be reduced, but it is as a myth that the final apocalypse of the Buendías, instigated by both Amaranta Úrsula and Aureliano Babilonia, can be read as a liberation and a renewal. This is consistent with the function of Melquiades’s manuscript which cannot be read by the Buendías until they have translated (transgressed) and decoded (deconstructed) historical parameters finally to reveal the perspectives through which the text/their own identity can be deciphered. It is these, formerly eclipsed, perspectives which generate the “magical realism” of the text—“lo real maravilloso” in a genuinely Carpenterian sense of a hybridized reality that responds to myth as well as history.

Critics who have preferred to stress the importance of history have tended to interpret solitude as alienation, or as nostalgia (Saldívar, Gerald Martin) rather than as “la soledad compartida” (shared solitude), or, as Michael Bell expresses it, solitude as solidarity. As critical attention shifts to García Márquez’s later work, Cien años will also inevitably be re-read in the light of this retrospective, perhaps more rigorously post-modernizing, lens (see Carlos J. Alonso). While negotiating such diverse critical contexts, the reader should perhaps remember Dorfman’s comment: “One Hundred Years of Solitude situates itself in the impossible middle between what is inside and outside, between life and death, between history and imagination. This means that the reader, ultimately, gets to choose.”

PATRICIA MURRAY

Editions

First edition: Cien años de soledad, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1967

Further Reading

Bell, Michael, Gabriel García Márquez: Solitude and Solidarity London: Macmillan, 1993
Ludmer, Josefina, “Cien años de soledad”: una interpretación, Buenos Aires: Tiempo Contemporáneo, 1972
El general en su laberinto

Novel by Gabriel García Márquez

Gabriel García Márquez’s El general en su laberinto, 1989 (The General in His Labyrinth) is a historical novel that portrays the life of Simon Bolívar. The action takes place in 1830, the year of Bolívar’s death and dwells on the journey by river that he made during the last few months of his life. The narration of this journey is constantly broken by evocations of earlier events. These “flashbacks” narrate in a non-chronological way the major episodes of both Bolívar’s political career and his personal life. There is a constant see-saw between Bolívar’s various loves and important historical events in the era of Latin American independence from Spain and Latin America’s subsequent formation into nation states. The present Bolívar: elderly, infirm, and no longer in power, is contrasted with the earlier Bolívar: young, vibrant, and heroic.

García Márquez’s choice of Bolívar, undisputed hero of Latin American independence, as the subject of his novel is an interesting one, because it breaks with the Latin American tradition of focusing on figures whose historical roles are ambiguous, such as Dr Francia in Augusto Roa Bastos’s Yo el Supremo (I the Supreme). Daniel Balderston in his introduction to The Historical Novel in Latin America asserts that traditionally the purpose of the historical novel in Latin America has been to elucidate the role of such ambiguous historical figures. Thus, García Márquez’s choice of Bolívar as a subject immediately raises questions about his intentions with regard to this revered historical figure.

Recent criticism on El general en su laberinto has divided itself into two opposing camps. On the one hand, Gerald Martin in Journeys through the Labyrinth and Seymour Menton in Latin America’s New Historical Novel state that García Márquez’s goal is to offer a historically accurate portrait of Bolívar without questioning the validity of the notion of history and the pretensions of his own text to simulate it. Others, notably Roberto González Echevarría in his article of 1991, “García Márquez y la voz de Bolívar” [García Márquez and Bolívar’s Voice], believe that the novel imitates historical texts in order to show the similarity between fiction and history in the process of textual production. According to González Echevarría, novels such as El general en su laberinto, largely based on historical documents, are “archival fictions” whose main topic is the reflection on the origins of narrative discourse.

Perhaps the reason for this dissension is that paradoxically, García Márquez attempts to accomplish both of these opposing goals at once: to provide historically accurate information about Bolívar and yet simultaneously to question the validity of the (supposed) objectivity of historical texts. With regard to the first goal, many critics focus on the importance of the issue of accuracy in historical fiction. For example, both Noé Jitrik and William Katra in their essays in The Historical Novel in Latin America, focus on the educational value of historical reference within fiction.
García Márquez employs various techniques in order to instruct the reader about historical fact. The chief tool that El general en su laberinto uses to teach the reader about the life of Simon Bolívar is the educational summary. For example, García Márquez compresses Bolívar’s actions over several years during the war for independence after his self-imposed exile in Jamaica into a single paragraph. Another example is the passage that summarizes Bolívar’s handling of money matters, both personal and professional, before and during his presidency.

A second important technique is the use of historically-based “paratexts” to aid the reader in the separation of fact from fiction. The literary theorist Gérard Genette in Palimpsestes employs the term “paratextuality” to refer to the use of any supporting materials in a literary work that comment upon it, such as prefaces, introductions, epigraphs, footnotes, blurbs, and illustrations. El general en su laberinto incorporates a number of paratexts: it begins with an epigraph, ends with a section titled “Acknowledgments,” includes a chronology of Bolívar’s life and a map of Bolívar’s travels during 1830 (the year of his death). These paratexts bear a relationship to history and ultimately serve the function of historical clarification.

In the “Acknowledgments” section, García Márquez thanks the historians Eugenio Gutiérrez Cely and Fabio Puyo and recognizes his debt to their book, Bolívar día a día [Bolivar Day by Day]. The direct reference to a historical source proves to be extremely important, for if readers decide to consult this book they can indeed distinguish between much of what is true and false in the novel. Bolívar día a día proves to be more than just a source of historical confirmation; it is a major historical intertext (a text either directly or indirectly alluded to within the novel).

None the less, it is entirely possible that the reader of the novel will not choose to delve into the novel’s historical sources, despite the very real incentives. Thus, García Márquez includes within the novel itself, a chronology of Bolívar’s life compiled by Vinicio Romero Martínez, another historian mentioned in the acknowledgments section. Most of the novel’s events are documented in this chronology and it even includes a few excerpts from Bolívar’s letters. In this way the reader can ascertain that much of García Márquez’s fiction has historical validity as well, without ever consulting historical sources outside the novel.

Despite all this emphasis on historical fact and accuracy, an in-depth analysis of El general en su laberinto also confirms the opposite viewpoint; García Márquez does indeed question the objectivity of historical texts by underscoring their similarity of construction to historical novels. In the “Acknowledgments” section García Márquez speaks of corrections designed to make El general en su laberinto conform to historical reality and maintain the so-called “rigor de esta novela” (the exactitude of this novel). However, if we compare the novel to historical sources such as Bolívar día a día, it becomes clear that García Márquez alters historical details in order to contradict his stated pretensions to historical accuracy, as well as to highlight his dedication to purely novelistic development.

Frequently, García Márquez uses a historical episode as a mere departure point for his novelistic development. Although there is a shred of historical fact at the core, the greater part of the passage is fictitious. This blending of fact and fiction contains an implicit statement about the nature of textual production, whether historical or novelistic. The two constantly overlap; there is no such thing as pure truth or history.
Some of the most incredible episodes of the novel are in fact historically-based and thus confirm the age-old adage that truth is stranger than fiction. This use of historical episodes that seem fictitious is another way in which the author blends history and fiction and thus shows how historical texts are similar to novels. Many of the details of the assassination attempt on Bolívar’s life in 1828 seem absurd, but are actually true, such as Bolívar’s escape through the balcony wearing his lover’s (Manuela Sáenz’s) rain slippers. Such details are authentic as recounted in a letter by Manuela reproduced in Bolivar día a día.

El general en su laberinto is a more complicated novel than it appears to be on the surface. García Márquez manages simultaneously to clarify history while he confuses the borders of history and fiction in order to underscore the similarities of construction between the two. Thus, the ultimate subjectivity of any text is brought to light, but with a technique so subtle as to be imperceptible to the reader unless he carefully compares the novel to its sources. García Márquez outlines historical sources in the novel precisely for this reason: he wishes to encourage the comparison between fiction and history. However, his debunking of history as absolute truth does not preclude the novel’s educational value. Most readers will learn something about Simon Bolívar, a hero both sung and demystified by this novelistic portrayal, just as history itself is both exalted and deconstructed within its pages.

To portray the tyrant in his decrepitude, as Márquez does in El otoño del patriarca (The Autumn of the Patriarch) is, of course, laudable in the eyes of Spanish American readers. But to represent a school text book hero well past his glory days is truly shocking.

HELENE CAROL WELDT-BASSON

Editions

Further Reading

Fina García Marruz 1923–

Cuban poet

Critical appreciation of the work of Fina García Marruz has tended to focus on her membership of the group of writers and artists who, under the tutelage of José Lezama Lima, were associated with the review Orígenes between 1944 and 1956. While it is true that García Marruz (married to fellow poet and critic Cintio Vitier) was certainly the only woman in the group, unlike her male companions she has not received the recognition she so clearly deserves. This is due to unwarranted diffidence on her part, to the fact that the kind of poetry she wrote did not fit easily into the post-revolutionary Cuban cultural scene, and that marriage to Vitier, who published her work, nevertheless reduced the scope for independent critical evaluation. A sense of propriety has restrained him, for example, from discussing her poetry at length. García Marruz published her first book of poems in 1942 but it was with the exceptionally beautiful Las miradas perdidas, 1951 [The Lost Gazes] that she first made her name in Cuba and Spain. It was on the basis of this collection that Carmen Conde included García Marruz in her book Once grandes poéticas hispanoamericanas [Eleven Great Spanish American Women Poets] in 1967. After the Revolution of 1959 García Marruz remained in Cuba and published a second outstanding collection, Visitaciones [Visitations], in 1970. Apart from a perceptive commentary by Eliseo Diego, however, the book passed virtually unnoticed. She would have to wait until the 1980s when, in a cultural climate more propitious for women writers, a selection of her poetry (Poesías escogidas, 1984) was published, giving rise to a spurt of critical analyses including the only book-length study of her work to date (Arcos, 1990). Her essays on poetry and poetics, some dating back to 1959, were collected and published in the same decade (Hablar de la poesía, 1986 [Speaking of Poetry]). This book includes insightful studies of the work of poets such as Bécquer, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz and José Martí as well García Marruz’s own discerning and somewhat cryptic reflections on poetry itself. The quality and significance of her work is now widely acknowledged in Cuba, particularly among younger poets who have rejected social realist paradigms in favour of the more esoteric aesthetics of the Orígenes group as a whole. Proof of their dedication and enthusiasm are the 2.00 booklets containing García Marruz’s more recent poems (“Créditos de Charlot,” 1990 [Charlie Chaplin Credits], produced by hand during the first phase of the “special period in peacetime” when publishing in Cuba came almost to a standstill.

As one might expect from a poet of her generation, García Marruz writes in the tradition of classical Spanish and Spanish American poetry. Like all the Orígenes poets she was much influenced by Juan Ramón Jiménez (whom she met when she was thirteen), by María Zambrano who lectured on poetry and philosophy at Havana University in the early 1940s, and by the master himself, José Lezama Lima. In Las miradas perdidas she cultivates the sonnet and, although in her later work she experiments more freely with form, her poetry is always polished and precise. However, quite unlike Lezama, she prefers a clarity of style, a certain lucid simplicity and penetrating vision which is more reminiscent of the poetry of Unamuno or Jorge Guillén. What García Marruz did share with the other Orígenes poets was their Catholic faith and their concept of poetry as a religion, a prophesy, a vehicle of spiritual knowledge. As she explains in her essays, for her, poetry is the revelation of divine grace, the Word made flesh; poetry is a gift which enables the poet to apprehend what is beyond the world of experience, to glimpse another dimension of reality, the underlying unity behind all diversity and change. But poetry is also manifested and made substance in the situations and objects of everyday life. In this sense García Marruz’s vision is rooted both in the transcendental idealism of St Agustine and in St Thomas’s reconciliation of reason with faith. She follows in the path of Catholic thinkers such as Henri Bergson and Simone Weil. Generally speaking, however, apart from some noticeable exceptions (for example, the much celebrated Transfiguración de Jesús en el Monte, 1947 [Transfiguration of Jesus on the Mount], whose subject is, in any case, epiphany) her poetry is not overtly devotional.

What is most striking about García Marruz’s poetry is its curious blend of the homely and the metaphysical. Her poetry is firmly grounded in a woman’s experience of ordinary, domestic routine yet it is interspersed with moments of profound philosophical insight. The overriding theme of La miradas perdidas is the fragility of memory (see, for example, “Versos del que se olvida” [Verses of the One who Forgets], “Recuerdos imaginarios” [Imaginary Memories]). The poems in this collection reconstruct a rosy (or rather lilac) vision of the childhood home with its magical interior spaces (interiores mágicos), its lamps, mirrors, portraits and windows looking out onto symbolical landscapes. The poet’s mother off to the theatre in her feathered hat, her aunt bringing her milk in the morning, the sound of the piano, the smell of bread, a walk through the city’s parks, are vivid scenes—snapshots in time—which, on reflection, offer the poet a dazzling glimpse of the secret of life (see “Una dulce nevada está cayendo / detrás de cada cosa, cada amante” [A sweet snowfall is falling/ behind each thing, behind each loved one]). The home and its contents thus function as a microcosm of the universe and acquire deep symbolic value, what García Marruz calls “lo misterioso en lo cotidiano” (the mystery of everyday life). Several poems foreground the constant struggle with language and autopoiesis itself (“Yo os amo, palabras, madres tristes” [I love you, words, sad mothers], “Me queda grande y chica la palabra” (The word is too big or small for me) although the poet avoids gratuitous experimentation with language. Her poetry is crystalline, written with maximum poetic economy without a hint of the darker, surreal or oneric aspects of reality.

Visitaciones is a more varied collection of poems and poetic prose and contains her widely acknowledged elegy “En la muerte de Ernesto Che Guevara” [On the Death of Che Guevara] written in 1966. Again the presence of the home and the family (mother, husband, sons, and friends) is crucial although the poet’s angle of vision is more panoramic. She describes local figures (the road sweeper, a drunkard, a child smiling, the housemaid) and intrinsically Cuban landscapes. She also includes poems to Martin Luther King and Ho Chi Minh, and poems written in Mexico and Spain. As in Las miradas perdidas, what is of particular interest for feminist critics is the way in which the childhood home is reconstructed through objects (clocks, jugs, lamps, plates) and spaces (patios, terraces, windows, doors) as a lost paradise. Of similar interest is the inscription of the poet’s elusive mother who is always associated with light, colour, openings, and the new day. In “Pequeñas canciones” [Little Songs] the mother’s hands are “luces tan perdidas / albas que vuelven / -vuelan y vuelven” (lights so lost/dawns that return/ fly and return); in “Alegres y cortas melodías” [Happy, Short Melodies] she enters the house in her flower printed dress, “¡Qué fuerte daba el sol! / Cómo entrabas en casa” (How the sun shone! / How you came in the house!); her protection and nurturance is represented by her bed, “tu lecho amplio y suave / allí quiero dormir” [your wide and soft bed/that’s where I wish to sleep] and in “Música ilusa” [Illusory Music] by her hands “¿Qué me sostiene?/El recuerdo / de tu mano / dándome algo / que he olvidado” (What sustains me? / The memory of your hand / giving me something/I have forgotten). Images of the mother are built up through repeated and detailed listings of parts of her body, material attributes, and domestic surroundings (hands, printed dress, long hair, multicoloured handbag, red sunshade), but her face is never mentioned. She is, after all, no more than the music of her piano, “los valses y canciones que sólo la memoria y el amor oyen ya” (the waltzs and songs that only memory and love hear now). Clearly, Julia Kristeva’s notion of the maternal semiotic—the music and rhythms of poetic language affording a momentary glimpse of the inexpressible pleasure of the pre-oedipal union between mother and child—is particularly relevant in this context.

Interesting in this respect are the explicit connections García Marruz makes between the home, the mother, and the mother tongue. The poem “Español” [Spanish] (in the section of Vistaciones dedicated to Spain) is a eulogy to the Spanish language whose words and rhythms are reclaimed and affirmed by the poet as her means of self-identification, her source of her strength:

…hínchame, tómame,
me vuelve a no sé que tiempo inmemorial
y ya no huyo: mécemee, la gran habla madre…
¿Cuándo insegura, trémula, niña aún, sin memoria,
busqué tu pecho de firmeza,
como se hunde la cabeza sollozante del hijo en el regazo innumerable? ¿Cuántas veces las marchas y oberturas, los dúos de la zarzuela que escuchaba a mi madre, en las tardes habaneras de distinta nostalgia, me sacaron de mi secreto huir, me devolvieron
al desafío alegre, el dar a lo hecho pecho, rompiendo las visiones nocturnas con el bregar de la casa, la limpieza del atareo matinal?

[fill me, take me,/to I know not what eternity/and I shall not flee: rock me, great mother tongue…/When did I unsure, trembling,/still a girl, without memory,/ seek your breast of strength,/like a sobbing child buries its head/in the bountiful mother’s lap? How many times /did the marches and overtures, the duos/and operettas that I heard/from my mother, in the Havana evenings /of a different nostalgia, draw me out of my secret hideaway, bring me back/to the happy challenge, gritting my teeth,/dissolving nighttime visions/in the wrangling house, the cleaning/of morning chores?]

Shy and retiring as ever, in the mid 1990s García Marruz is still writing in her Havana home. Her work urgently demands serious critical attention which focuses not so much on Catholic and Cuban issues but on the fact that the voice here is that of a woman.

Catherine Davies
Poem translated by Catherine Davies

Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, 2.8 April, 1923. Active member of Orígenes group of poets and contributor to their journal of the same name. Married to distinguished critic, poet and Martí scholar, Cintio Vitier. Awarded doctorate in Social Sciences by Havana University in 1961. Worked as a researcher at both the National Library and the Center for Martí Studies in Havana. Two children, Sergio, and José Maria, both composers. The latter wrote the music for the film version of Fresa y chocolate, 1992. (Strawberry and Chocolate). Principal awards include the Cuban Premio de la Critica and the Premio Nacional, 1990.

Selected Works

Poetry
Poemas, Havana: Úcar García, 1942
Transfiguración de Jesús en el Monte, Havana: Orígenes, 1947
Las miradas perdidas: 1944–1950, Havana: Úcar García, 1951
Visitaciones, Havana: Instituto del Libro, 1970
Los Rembrandt de l’Hermitage, Havana: UNEAC, 1992

Other Writings
Flor oculta de la poesía cubana: siglos XVIII y XIX, in collaboration with Cintio Vitier (editors), Havana: Editorial Arte y Literatura, 1978
Hablar de poesía, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1986

Compilations and Anthologies
Poesías escogidas, edited by Jorge Yglesias, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1984

Further Reading

Arcos, Jorge Luis, En torno a la obra poética de Fina García Marruz, Havana: UNEAC, 1990
[Reviews criticism on García Marruz’s work to date]
Juan García Ponce 1932–

Mexican prose writer and dramatist

Juan García Ponce is one of the most prolific writers in contemporary Spanish-American literature and a leading figure of the Mexican literary generation born between 1930 and 1940. A prize-winning dramatist, poet and essayist, García Ponce is mainly an author of prose fiction. Octavio Paz said of him “García Ponce is not an essayist who writes novels, but a novelist who writes essays.” García Ponce began his literary career within a group which eventually established the Revista Mexicana de Literatura [Journal of Mexican Literature; second era: 1959–65], assuming its directorship along with Tomás Segovia. Writing within thematic and formal contemporary European and North American literary trends, he avoided, along with other writers of his generation, the limitations of an isolating nationalism. His literary production is noteworthy not because of extravagant formal experiments, but because of its daring themes relating life and art. His narrative system revolves around solitude, the nostalgia of lost innocence, love, desire, and their confluence in eroticism. From Imagen primera, 1963 [First Image] to Inmaculada o los placeres de la inocencia, 1989 [Inmaculada or the Pleasures of Innocence], García Ponce explores eroticism as a means to a reality that transcends the original one to offer a glimpse of a truly sacred and profane love. The short story “El gato” (The Cat) included in Encuentros, 1972 (Encounters) is a classic example of his thematic uniqueness. A couple in the story find a cat and incorporate the cat’s intrusive presence into its erotic games. The cat, as a silent witness of their passion, becomes so indispensable in their love-making that the lovers cannot perform without it. The theme of a voyeuristic third, functioning as an element of erotic intensification and as a complement of the couple, reappears constantly in his narrative works. Variations on this theme fluctuate according to specific situations from homoeroticism to incestual relationships, as in the short stories, “Tajimara” in La noche, 1963 [The Night] and “Imagen primera” in the book of the same name, and in the novel Figura de paja, 1964 [Straw Figure]. Figura de paja explores the erotic relationship between two women and a man, dealing with situations such as homosexuality, masochism, sexual ambivalence, the moral ambiguity of desire, and tragic death through suicide. In García Ponce’s works, incest, a love triangle, or a compulsive voyeuristic ceremony, more that being a pretext to explore sexuality, become a means to explore the pluridimensionality of eroticism in the human condition. García Ponce reflects about transgression, deviation, and the presence of a third party as erotic alternatives of communication. Other novels such as La casa en la playa, 1966 (The House on the Beach), La cabaña, 1969 [The Cabin], La vida perdurable, 1970 [Enduring Life], La invitación, 1972 [The Invitation] and Unión, 1974 [Union] are focused on the limitations of individual identity, its consequences in erotic-sentimental relationships, and in the impossibility of fulfilment in the fragmentary monotony of everyday life. The novels relate sexual encounters and affective separations, presenting characters through the gaze of an obsessive narrator who filters their consciousness and projects their perceptions. Crónica de la intervención, 1982 [Chronicle of the Intervention] represents his most ambitious and successful narrative project. The text presents over-lapping public, private, intimate, historical and social spheres: the Tlatelolco massacre of students on the 2nd of October 1968, and the erotic-emotional experience of a middle-class group of friends in Mexico City. The main character, Esteban, tries to identify a woman he finds in a stack of fading photographs. Two identical women (María Inés/Mariana) with different identities, seem to become one. Is this a fusion effect, or is this the unification of complementary beings into one? Does the text imply that the superposition of photographs is melding a third identity in María Inés? The relationship between Mariana and her lover Anselmo, shared by Esteban later on, becomes an erotic ritual in which all participate, always being watched by an individual or a group. Mariana and María Inés become synthesized in a sacred form of eroticism, a sacramental bid of passion, body, blood, spirit, and mysterious presence who embodies the desires of others. García Ponce’s novel displays the simultaneous fusion and annulment of subjectivities as a couple copulates, while a third gaze registers their union, thus providing a totality. Crónica de la intervención combines García Ponce’s skills as novelist and critic. The metamorphosis of Eros makes his texts a direct or indirect homage to García Ponce’s literary tradition, from the erotic mystic San Juan de la Cruz of the 16th century to Robert Musil, Georges Bataille and Pierre Klossowski in the 20th.

García Ponce’s protagonists deal with obsessions, abandonment, fears, and phobias. Solitude, isolation, and despair are momentarily overcome by ecstatic instants of continuity. These instants are sacred, divine or poetic, according to the nature of the erotic particulars and participants. His characters, lonely, sad, depressed and unsatisfied, live empty lives while they witness other people like them who, in their own loneliness, are waiting for the encounter that will reveal an incomprehensible cohesiveness that brings together erotic and mystic unity. From García Ponce’s perspective, events, protagonists, situations, and places are not new but, rather, interchangeable. The situations he describes remain at best secondary in importance, symbols of something deeper: the manifestations of man’s inner life that is the source of what is unique and different in him. In this narrative world, the gaze of the third observer is what unites and separates narrator, characters, and world. The gaze filters the consciousness that relates the stories, registering the subjectivity of events and characters. García Ponce’s prose is clear, mysteriously transparent, and natural, his narrative techniques are indirect, and his dialogues are dense. Although one can say that he combines stylistic devices taken from painting and theater, his narrative disdains the spectacular experimental apparatus employed by other writers of the same generation. His predisposition to erotic themes, his unorthodox approach to characters, his exploration of the violation of the moral norms of the collectivity place García Ponce in the vein of the so-called contemporary vital irrationalists. It could be said that the most salient situation in his works is a fear to surrender to existential emptiness. García Ponce departs from the fact that solitude is inherent in the human condition; but instead holds that the search for wholeness with the world in modern times is not futile. Most of the ideas he explores emphasize the interpretation, rather than the description of human experience. The tension between rational encounters with fixed reality and experiences with an infinite domain of feelings inspire his personal treatment of the modern condition. His vital preoccupation centres on the situation that creates alienation, isolation and introversion. His protagonists are introverted and lonely people seeking for meaning, identity and completeness in their lives. His unease with the restraints of traditional social, political, ethical, and cultural systems gives his work endless possibilities. By positioning the reader between objective and subjective reality, between illusion and certainty, between rationality and emotions, he forces his audience to confront life as a venture of endless possibilities. García Ponce does not hide his desire to be controversial and to disturb the good bourgeois by portraying middle-class protagonists violating moral prescriptions. In his works the reader, the writer and the characters are fused in a literary ménage a trois, in which to witness lovemaking is as important as to participate in it. For García Ponce, literature like eroticism is an act of contemplation as well as an act of possession.

LUIS H. PEÑA

Biography

Selected Works

Short Fiction
Imagen primera, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1963
La noche, Mexico City: Era, 1963
Figuraciones, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1982
El gato y otros cuentos, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura / SEP, 1984
Tajimara y el gato, edited by Eduardo M. Vázquez, Mexico City: UNAM, 1986

Novels
Figura de paja, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1964
La casa en la playa, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1966; as The House on the Beach, translated by Margarita Vargas and Juan Bruce-Novoa, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994
La presencia lejana, Montevideo: Arca, 1968
La cabaña, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1969
La vida perdurable, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1970
El nombre olvidado, Mexico City: Era, 1970
La invitación, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1972
Unión, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1974
Crónica de la intervención, 2 vols, Barcelona: Bruguera, 1982
Inmaculada o los placeres de la inocencia, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989

Essays
Rufino Tamayo, Mexico City: Galería Misrachi, 1967
Desconsideraciones, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1968
La aparición de lo invisible, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1968
Nueve pintores mexicanos, Mexico City: Era, 1968
El reino milenario (Robert Musil, el hombre sin cualidades), Montevideo: Arca, 1970 Teología y pornografía. Pierre Klossowski en su obra: una descripción, Mexico City: Era, 1975
La errancia sin fin: Musil, Borges, Klossowsky, Barcelona: Anagrama, 1981 Imágenes y visiones, Mexico City: Vuelta, 1989

Further Reading
Batis’s study is an indispensable general overview. Bruce-Novoa explores the intertextuality of García Ponce’s production. Rama analyzes García Ponce’s work in the Spanish American literary tradition.
Batis, Huberto, “La obra literaria de Juan García Ponce,” Revista de Bellas Artes 21 (1968)
Bell, Steven M., “Juan García Ponce,” Hispamérica 43 (1986)

El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega 1539–1616

Peruvian chronicler
El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega has often been called “the first truly American writer,” in so far as he belonged to the first generation of mestizos (mixed European and Amerindian blood) born in Peru after the Spanish conquest; he was the first to celebrate this dual heritage in literature. In 1560 at the age of twenty-one, Garcilaso de la Vega left his native Cuzco for Spain and was never to return to his Peruvian homeland. The character of the literary vocation he developed some twenty years later was shaped by this fact, as well as by his residence, for his first thirty years in Spain, in the ancient Roman and feudal town of Montilla in the province of Córdoba before moving to the city of Córdoba about 1588–90.

His major literary works are his Castilian translation of the Italian text of León Hebreo’s Dialoghi d’amore [Dialogues of Love] (Madrid, 1590), his La Florida del Inca (The Florida of the Inca) (Lisbon, 1605), based on the oral accounts of survivors of the De Soto expedition as well as published sources, and his Comentarios reales de los Incas (Royal Commentaries of the Incas), based on his boyhood recollections, information gathered from childhood friends in Cuzco, and a host of published and unpublished writings on the conquest and cultures of Peru (Lisbon, 1609; Córdoba, 1617). The Diálogos de amor consist of three dialogues between “Filón” and “Sofía” in which love and its object are described, the concepts of the good and the beautiful analyzed, and the origin and birth of love are identified. The Florida, divided into six books, covers the six years of the expedition (1538–43), from Hernando De Soto’s receipt of a grant from the emperor Charles V in April 1538, to conquer Florida, through the discovery in October, 1543, by Diego Maldonado and Gómez Arias that the governor and more than half of the hundreds of men on the expedition had perished. The Comentarios reales narrates the rise and fall of the Inca empire, from the legendary dawn of its civilization through the Spanish conquest to the execution of the last Inca prince, Tupac Amaru, in 1572.

Always suffering a hiatus between the composition and publication of his works, by the late 1580s Garcilaso had translated León Hebreo’s Dialoghi d’amore and written his Historia de la Florida; the Primera parte of his Comentarios reales de los Incas was approved for publication by the Holy Office in 1604, and the Segunda parte was finished about 1612–13 and published posthumously under a title (Historia general del Perú; General History of Peru) that Garcilaso had not chosen.

The characterization of Garcilaso’s literary production has been disputed since the middle of the 19th century and particularly after the beginning of the 20th. What kind of relationship did his translation of Hebreo’s 1502 synthetic, neoplatonist treatise on love bear to his historical narratives? And how historically reliable were his narratives of the De Soto expedition to Florida and of Inca civilization and history? In the struggle to lend dignity to the occasionally embattled works of Garcilaso, literary critics have made exaggerated claims about the historicity of his narrative works or his contribution to Renaissance culture on the basis of his translation of Hebreo’s neoplatonist dialogues. Yet the unique and lasting significance of Garcilaso’s works does not lie in such conventional, canonical categories. Furthermore, to place undue weight on the fictional (sometimes fantastic) quality of his work is to trivialize the substantial contribution he made to Spanish American literary and cultural history and to assess incorrectly the power that his works hold for readers today.

The major thrust of Garcilaso’s works is as a memorialist, and the role of the celebration of memory is the key to their understanding. The critic Mariano Ibérico Rodríguez (quoted in José Durand, El Inca Garcilaso, clásico de América), is responsible for this little-studied insight, observing that the Comentarios reales consist not of the transcription of what Garcilaso read but rather “the transmission of what he heard in an atmosphere of emotionally charged recollection.” No doubt animated by this possibility in hearing Gonzalo Silvestre’s vivid accounts of his adventures on the De Soto expedition used for La Florida, Garcilaso then turned to his own recollections of the myths and legends of Inca origins he had heard from his maternal uncle in Quechua as a child. Using those moving accounts as a point of departure for his Comentarios reales, his prior study of León Hebreo helped him solve the problem of how to articulate mythic and allegorical understanding with literal accounts of historical events, allowing him to argue for the deeper meaning of such mythical accounts without insisting upon their credibility.

Also significant for the development of Garcilaso’s haunting representation of lost worlds was his affinity for certain aspects of learned tradition: philology for the study of language etymology and usage as a key to cultural understanding; the practice of interpretive commentary and gloss as the centerpiece of his literary vocation; and antiquarianism with its appreciative study of monuments and relics for their insight into the past.

Garcilaso’s vision was thoroughly an idealized one in his accounts of the firm and just establishment of civilization by the Inca lords in the Andes and of the heroism and bravery of the Spanish conquistadores in Florida and Peru. His identity as an heir to both the Inca dynasty and the Spanish nobility assured the heroic breadth of his vision. Nevertheless, his marginal status in aristocratic Spanish society (and no doubt his recollection of his Inca relatives considering him the son of an enemy) undercut this ideal vision of heroic duty and just reward, of honors received for honorable conduct, and of justice prevailing in spite of the vicissitudes of personal fortune.

The injustice of the destruction of the Inca empire—that realm “destroyed before it came to be known”—colors his recollected memories with more intense, richer, and also darker hues. Yet the highly modulated bitterness that occasionally shows through Garcilaso’s lines is not the anguish of a spokesman for “the Indians of Peru.” If he discovers common cause with them by the time he pens his prologue to the Historia General del Perú, it is not because he sees himself as one of them (as his rhetorical claims about his modesty as “an Indian” might lead the reader to believe), but rather because, despite being an Inca aristocrat, he feels that his experiences have put him in the same humble position as they. Notwithstanding the profoundly aristocratic bearing of the narrator Garcilaso, the enormous subtlety and affective range of his work—tempering rage with the poignancy of loss speaks meaningfully to readers today. His works are appreciated as emblems of cultural contradiction and cultural identity and as monuments to time, memory and loss.

ROLENA ADORNO

Biography

Born in Cuzco, capital of the Incan Empire, 12 April 1539; the illegitimate child of an Inca princess, Isabel Suárez Chimpu Ocllo and a Spanish captain. He left Peru for Spain when he was twentyone and never returned to his native land. His position in Spain was relatively privileged owing to his father’s status and he adapted to European ways without undue difficulty. Died in Cordoba, 23 April 1616.

Selected Works

Diálogos de amor de León Hebreo, translated by Garcilaso de la Vega, with an introduction and notes by Miguel de Burgos Núñez, Seville: Padilla Libros, 1989

La Florida del Inca, prologue by Aurelio Miró Quesada, bibliographical study by José Durand (editor), and notes by Emma Susana Speratti Piñero, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1956; as The Florida of the Inca, translated by John Grier Varner and Jeannette Johnson Varner, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1988

Further Reading

Durand, José El Inca Garcilaso, clásico de América, Mexico City: SepSetentas, 1976

Jákfalvi-Leiva, Susana, Traducción, escritura y violencia colonizadora: un estudio de la obra del Inca Garcilaso, Foreign and Comparative Studies/Latin American Series, No. 7, Syracuse, New York, Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, 1984

Miró Quesada, Aurelio, El Inca Garcilaso y otros estudios garcilasistas, Madrid: Cultura Hispánica, 1971

Varner, John Grier, El Inca: the Life and Times of Garcilaso de la Vega, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1988

Comentarios reales de los Incas

A personal account of Inca history by Garcilaso de la Vega

The Comentarios reales de los Incas of Garcilaso de la Vega narrates the history of the Incas from their legendary origins in an age of barbarity through the execution of the last Inca prince, Tupac Amaru. Published in Lisbon in 1609, the Primera parte (First Part) takes the story from the Inca establishment of civilization in the Andes through the death of the legitimate heir to the Inca’s throne, Huascar Inca, at the time of the Spanish invasion near the end of 1532. (At its apogee at that time, the Inca empire extended from the northern border of present-day Ecuador through the Andes to Mendoza in westcentral Argentina and the Maule River in central Chile.) The Segunda parte (Second Part), which appeared posthumously (Córdoba, 1617) under the title Historia general del Perú (General History of Peru), narrates the fall of the empire from the first Spanish efforts to reach Peru from Panama in the mid1520s and Pizarro and Almagro’s arrival at the Inca empire in 1532 through to the execution of Tupac Amaru by the fifth Spanish viceroy of Peru, Francisco de Toledo, in 1572. Garcilaso ended his account with notes concerning Toledo’s death in 1584 and that of Tupac Amaru’s captor, Martin García de Loyola, in 1598, as well as a reminder that the petitions he had sent to the Spanish court on behalf of the last descendants of the Incas, whom he had named at the conclusion of the Primera parte, had not been acted upon.

Emphasizing his identity as the son of an Inca (princess) and a Spanish conquistador, Garcilaso made the claim at the end of his work that in the First Part he had fulfilled his obligation to his maternal homeland and relatives, but that in the Second Part he had only partially completed the task of telling “the brave deeds of the valorous Spaniards who won that very rich empire.” In effect, the rise and fall of Inca civilization is the framework that embraces his narration of the Inca conquests of other Andean nations and, ultimately, the Spanish conquest of the Incas.

This structure of the work, however, does not reveal its generic character; the Comentarios reales is neither a history of the Incas nor a novelistic representation of the same. (In the wake of William Hickling Prescott’s 1847 assessment of the work as historically dubious, Marcelino Menéndez Pelayo identified it in 1894 as a “Utopian novel;” he rectified this view slightly but not substantially in his 1913 posthumous version in deference to the defense of the reliability of Garcilaso’s work as history by José de la Riva-Agüero.) Instead, the descriptive character of the title “Commentaries” and Garcilaso’s claims in the proem to the First Part to the effect that he intended to provide a “commentary and gloss” to the histories written by Spanish authors, offers the key to a more valid assessment.

With origins in antiquity and the Middle Ages, the commentary was recognized as an independent genre by the 16th century. Its chronological limits were commonly the author’s lifetime; unlike a formal history, it was free to add events to a narrative account, or to omit them, and it was not bound by a single thesis or theme. Ostensibly, its goal was to inform, not to explain or persuade. Not confined to the type of commentary defined by Julius Caesar pertaining to his own military exploits, as an interpretive work the Comentarios reales ranges broadly over a wide field of topics, correcting and contradicting accounts of other historians, complementing previously treated topics with additional information and adding altogether new topics of interest (such as the clusters of chapters devoted to the flora and fauna native to Peru and those brought to the Andes by the Spaniards).

The “text” that Garcilaso comments on is the body of extant writing on the Indies and particularly Peru and it includes the mythical and allegorical accounts of Inca origins that Garcilaso learned through the oral traditions of his mother’s relatives. Although the Comentarios reales stands as an independent work in its own right both then and now, it was understood by Garcilaso and the readers of his day as a contribution to a larger dialogue that debated such topics as the worthiness of Inca civilization, the right of the Spanish to conquer and colonize the Indies, and the aptitude of native Andeans to assimilate European customs and the Christian religion.

Despite its appearance as a grand history and an encyclopedia of Andean customs and cultures, Garcilaso’s Comentarios reales is a vast and highly personal essay on the character of Inca civilization and the consequences of its fall. The central question that Garcilaso addresses is therefore not “What happened?” but rather “What is the meaning of all that has happened?” His orientation is philosophical rather than historical or belletristic, and his translation of Leone Hebreo’s (Judah Abrabanel’s) 1502 Dialoghi d’amore [Dialogues of Love] from Italian to Castilian provides the key to his outlook. Hebreo’s work was not only a treatise on Neoplatonic love but, as John Charles Nelson indicates in his Renaissance Theory of Love, “a detailed analysis of philosophical doctrine centering on a restatement of the Neoplatonic position.” In translating the Dialoghi, Garcilaso studied not only how its author brought together the worlds of Hellenism and Hebraism but also how he articulated the epistemological systems of Plato and Aristotle, that is, the allegorical, mythical forms of understanding of the former and the encipherment of esoteric meanings and systematic logic of the latter.

Both in content and in method, the synthesizing conceptualization of Hebreo was appropriated by Garcilaso, who had learned its rationale and technique for articulating the meanings of the myths of the ancient Incas with their equivalents in the European tradition of documentary and written history. The heart of Garcilaso’s project was to bring together disparate Andean and European ways of conceiving the world, history and time, and of making the Andean world intelligible and acceptable to the European reader. Yet Garcilaso apprehended the lost Inca world more by appreciation than through understanding, and when he plunged into the narration of the reigns of the twelve Incas, he had probably exceeded his originally expressed goal of explaining Inca rites and Andean customs and correcting certain European misunderstandings about them.

A significant dimension of 16th-century commentary was that devoted to biblical and poetic exegesis. The philological character of these types of interpretation was likewise of great import to Garcilaso, who corrected European misunderstandings of Andean concepts and ideas through his analysis of Quechua etymology and usage. More than the occurrence or meaning of events that he had (or had not) witnessed and could (or could not) vouchsafe, the domain of his expertise lay with the recollected knowledge of his native Quechua and the effort involved to reveal Andean meanings. For Garcilaso, the word—not the event—was central to understanding and memorializing the synchrony of Inca society despite the imponderability of its historical fortunes.

For all of the above reasons, Garcilaso rightly called his work “Commentaries” and it is useful for late 20th-century readers to keep the concept in mind. Notable events in the history of the work’s reception include its official prohibition in 1782., when it was seen as subversive, having been implicated as promoting in the preceding years the most serious native Andean insurrection to threaten Spanish rule in the Andes during the entire viceregal period. In more recent times, the Comentarios reales de los Incas has been taken to represent the birth of criollo consciousness and it stands today as a sublime symbol of the contested and conflicted concept of mestizaje, the inauguration of a tradition of critical and metacritical American writing, and a call to Utopian thinking to question the history that has condemned the contemporary Andean to the margins of modern, “developed” society.

ROLENA ADORNO

Editions

Primera parte de los Comentarios reales, Lisbon: Pedro Crasbeeck, 1609
Historia General del Perú, Córdoba: Andrés Barrera, 1617
Historia General del Perú, Madrid: Oficina Real y a costa de Nicolás Rodríguez Franco, 1722
Elena Garro 1920–

Mexican prose writer and dramatist

Elena Garro began her writing career as a journalist; subsequently she has written novels, short stories and plays. Her first novel Los recuerdos del porvenir, 1963 (Recollections of Things to Come) which is also the first work she wrote, is undoubtedly her most important contribution to Spanish American letters in general, and to Mexican fiction in particular.

Garro’s work explores the magical and the fantastic as they coexist with objective dimensions of reality. In her early works (Los recuerdos del porvenir and the short stories of La semana de colores [The Week of Colors]), the pre-Columbian Mexican tradition, especially its conception of cyclical time, contribute to the creation of worlds which weave magic and myth with history. In her later novels—Testimonios sobre Mariana [Mariana’s Testimonies] and La casa junto al río [The House by the River]—the fantastic replaces myth, creating as in her earlier fiction, eccentric worlds characterized by the rupture of unity and the prevalence of multivalence. The ambiguity of her fictive worlds is underscored by the way in which surreal events are presented as if they were an integral part of ordinary or common experience.

Her treatment of time is one of the primary elements contributing to such diffuseness. The characters in several short stories of La semana de colores, for example, may simultaneously exist in two historical periods. Thus, in “La culpa es de los tlaxcaltecas” (Blame the Tlaxcaltecs), whose protagonist escapes an unhappy and oppressive marriage to join her imaginary Aztec lover in a remote past. The characters of “El día que fuimos perros” [The Day We Were Dogs] live in “one day which has two days inside.” Los recuerdos del porvenir is, however, the work which most decisively questions the linearity of time. Its characters experience multiple chronologies: the time of history corresponding to the Cristero War of the late 1920s which submits the inhabitants of Ixtepec to the indiscriminate violence of the invading army; the time of a forever lost Indian past which places the town “in a dimension of reality which remains still;” the timelessness of mythical time as experienced by Julia, the evasive lover of General Rosas, and Hurtado the outsider who rescues her after introducing the Moncada siblings to poetry and the realm of the imaginary; finally, the subjective time of the Moncadas who experience “a new and melancholic time where gestures and voices begin to move in the past.”

Felipe Ángeles and Y Matarazo no llamó [And Matarazo Did Not Call], much like Los recuerdos del porvenir, criticize the arbitrariness and opportunism of political power. Felipe Ángeles, a “documentary-drama” recreates the farcical trial of one of the greatest albeit forgotten heroes of the Mexican Revolution. General Ángeles was a salient strategist and diplomat whose intelligence and integrity were feared by his military peers and political rivals. Forced into self-imposed exile he returned to Mexico in 1919 only to be accused of treason by the Carranza forces and shot later that year. The play exposes the violation of his rights to due process, and bitterly criticizes the military leaders who sacrifice the revolutionary ideals, and the best individuals among them in their lust for power.

The main characters of her thriller Y Matarazo no llamó, which is probably her least successful novel, reveal the plight of two ordinary citizens who aid a group of workers on strike. Victims of their naïveté they are used by the political forces on the Left, and singled out as scapegoats by the security forces which are faced with increasing social unrest. Both characters are accused of committing crimes of which they are innocent. Appearances, however, prevent them from claiming their innocence, and they ultimately pay with their lives.

Some of her works of fiction, La casa junto al río, Testimonios sobre Mariana, Reencuentro de personajes [The Characters Meet Again] and the short stories of Andamos huyendo Lola [Lola, We Are on the Run], refer more specifically to the situation of women who despite their efforts often fail to find a space for themselves in a male dominated society. Both Mariana, the main character of Testimonios sobre Mariana, and Veronica, of Reencuentro de personajes, are destroyed by their male counterparts. The principal objective of Mariana’s husband, a brilliant, young Mexican anthropologist is to punish his wife for her silent but firm resistance to his overpowering personality. He submits her to physical, verbal and psychological abuse, constantly humiliating and harassing her in public. Veronica, on the other hand, becomes entangled in a sadomasochistic relationship with a bisexual man, who reduces her to passivity by means of constant harassment, verbal abuse and persecution.

The female characters of Andamos huyendo Lola suffer the effects of political forces and exclusionary government policies. Most of them are women in exile escaping persecution in their countries of origin, but unable to find a living space abroad. Unable to return to their homelands, they become the victims of poverty, isolation and uprootedness in foreign lands.

La casa junto al no tells the story of a Mexican women who returns after her father’s death to his home town in Asturias, hoping to renew the family ties severed by the civil war. She encounters, however, the hostility of the locals, understanding too late that her relatives will kill her in order to lay claim to her sizeable inheritance the existence of which she ignored. As with most of her other women characters, Consuelo is unaided in her struggle against forces which will ultimately defeat her.

A study of the stylistic richness and structural complexities of most of Garro’s work, especially of her novels, lies beyond the scope of this thematic survey. Her works, however, are best understood and fully appreciated in a thorough consideration of their technical and stylistic sophistication. Her fiction, especially Los recuerdos del porvenir, Testimonios sobre Mariana and the short stories of La semana de colores, are central to the understanding of the development of contemporary Mexican fiction in general, and of Mexican’s women’s writing in particular.

PATRICIA RUBIO

Biography

Born in Puebla, Mexico, 15 December 1920. Attended the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM), Mexico City. Married Octavio Paz (see separate entry) in 1937, one daughter. Choreographer for Teatro de la Universidad; writer and reporter, championing the disadvantaged. Accompanied Paz on his diplomatic posting to Paris, 1945–51. In Paris she associated with writers of the Surrealist group including André Breton. Divorced from Paz in 1959, lived in Paris until 1963 then returned to Mexico. Continued work as a writer and reporter. Named as one of the instigators of the student demonstrations in Tlatelolco and imprisoned for nine days, 1968. Fleed to the United States and then Spain where she lived in obscurity for several years. Returned to Paris in 1980. Awarded the Xavier Villarrutia Prize, 1964 for Los recuerdos del porvenir.

Selected Works

Novels
Testimonios sobre Mariana, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1981
Reencuentro de personajes, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1982,
La casa junto al río, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1983
Y Matarazo no llamó, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1991
Inés, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1995

Short Fiction
La semana de colores, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1964 [English-language version of “La culpa es de los tlaxcaltecas” is to be found in Short Stories by Latin American Women: the Magic and the Real, edited by Celia Correas de Zapata, Houston, Texas: Arte Público Press, 1990]
Andamos huyendo Lola, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1980

Plays
La señora en su balcón, Mexico City: Colección Teatro Mexicano, 1960
Further Reading

Galvín, Delia V., La ficción reciente de Elena Garro, 1979–1983, Querétaro, Mexico: Universidad Autónoma de Querétaro, 1988

Kaminsky, Amy, “The Uses and Limits of Foreign Feminist Theory: Elena Garro’s Los recuerdos del porvenir,” in her Reading the Body Politic, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993

Juan Gelman 1930–

Argentine poet

Since his first collection in 1956, Violín y otras cuestiones [Violin and Other Issues], Juan Gelman has published almost twenty books of poems, as well as numerous anthologies and compilations. His poetry impresses in the same way as that of Juan Ortiz, by its regularity, consistency and uniformity, and is comparable also because Gelman...
establishes in his early works the entire poetic universe which he went on to cultivate for more than twenty years.

This initial corporal unity in the output of Gelman applies to his first four works: from Violín y otras cuestiones to Gotán (1962). It is a unity that can be thought of literally as a human body, an extension of the poet’s physical anatomy. These first four works can thus be linked to the four fundamental schemes of Gelman’s poetry, namely: the senses, represented by Violín (1956); sensation and feeling, represented by El juego en que andamos, 1959 (The Kind of Game We’re In) and Velorio del solo, 1961 [Solo’s Wake]; the act of naming represented by Gotán (1962).

The rest of Gelman’s works can thus be divided into these three major schemes. De cólera buey, 1965 [About the Bullock’s Rage] to Relaciones, 1973 [Relations] is the poetry of naming, of speaking and assigning names to things, of showing. From Hechos y relaciones, 1980 [Deeds and Relations] to Hacia el sur, 1982, [Towards the South] is the poetry of sensations and, above all, of feeling: the poet does not merely establish a mode of feeling, but rather poeticizes feeling itself. In the phase from Composiciones, 1986 [Compositions] to the most recent work, the senses are rendered poetically.

According to this hypothetical division, each poetic scheme can also be linked to three verbal operations, which might constitute the substance of each of them: understanding, attending to and comprehending, respectively. Firstly the “understanding” of names, words, utterances; then the “attending” to sensations and the sensibility, paying attention, being attentive, alert, apprehending; and finally “comprehending” the senses, explaining them and applying them, rendering them and using them.

Gelman’s poetry combines the “very stuff of existence,” a prodigious sense of the commonplace, unsuspected meanings in the most trivial objects, an unerring verbal facility and the innocence we would all wish to derive from the flux of events. Such a perception is, of course, subject to evolution: Gelman has met each new development, each new social and poetic horizon, with grace and fortitude. He has thus encountered both success and failure, but above all he has been able to create a characteristic and original poetic idiom. The notion of poetry as the deployment of a language, rather than the art of composing lines or verses, is a conception Gelman originally derived from Juan L. Ortiz, and which he then passionately developed.

The poems of Gelman, following the pattern of his books, work on two levels. On the first level, language is used to translate a state, a situation, a feeling, an inspirational idea. This is manifested, at least until Gotán, by the use of colloquial forms and modes, and by the exploration of ulterior meanings in the realm of trivial and ordinary objects, in the pure dimension of the “day-to-day.” With great musicality and beauty, Gelman exploits the hidden significance of the commonplace. As the poet’s active engagement with Argentine politics increased, turning him into a public figure, this aspect of his work most clearly manifests itself as a choice of subjectmatter. Having withdrawn from political life, Gelman, in his recent works (e.g. Anunciaciones [Annunciations] and Salarios del impío), suggests a reappraisal of his former preoccupation with language and a reworking of his own experiences through poetic creativity, no longer as a choice of subject-matter but rather as the structure of a language for which Gelman justifiably claims all creative rights.

The second level is a constant throughout Gelman’s work which, although it has fluctuated according to his various aesthetic experiences, constitutes the backbone of his production: his poetry makes no claims to be placed in any established tradition, rather it constructs its own world, a private imaginary based particularly on two essential influences: César Vallejo and Juan L. Ortiz.

Gelman, the only contemporary of Borges who has managed to write without feeling the need to allude to his work, has created an open poetic universe, laying the foundations for a poetics, that is to say a word-stock, a grammar, an entire conception of poetic creation. Rather than simply writing poems, Gelman has established a poetic idiom with tones, nuances and varying degrees of felicity; this is his fundamental link with César Vallejo and Juan L. Ortiz. This level of linguistic expression ultimately manifests itself intellectually in the notion of “grammatical plurality” which Gelman defends and demands for Spain’s former colonies (and not merely for their literature). For Gelman, the coexistence of three or four different grammars in 17th-century Spain is what articulates his approach to literature: to create is to reinvent language itself from moment to moment and from era to era. Gelman thus shows his desire to overcome by practical means the disappearance of the cultural and philosophical context which sustained poetry in classical terms. Gelman, in this sense, is concerned more with the poetic sentiment than with poetry.

Gelman’s journalistic pieces, some of which date back as far as the 1960s, have generally been linked to the first of the two levels. His work as a translator and his preoccupation with language are related to the second level. Though these two expressive levels are constant throughout his poetry, Gelman perpetually renews them in his works. From his first publications in 1956 up to those of the 1990s, he has unceasingly explored poetic alternatives, for in attempting to invent a language it is as if he felt an imperious need to name poetically certain places in as many ways as possible.

Gelman is one of the few Argentine poets who has paid scant attention to classical verse forms, though he knows and can use them. Instead, he continually composes harmonious lines and stanzas whose value lies not merely in their being avantgarde (as is the case with much contemporary Argentine poetry), but rather in their balance, in the tone achieved by the combination of sound, of meter, of punctuation, of expressiveness (he has an unusual gift for exploiting the pictographic significance of a word, without resorting to the “concrete” excesses of certain so-called “avant la lettre” writing) and finally of meaning (the right term would be “language:” reading Gelman one senses that to signify is in fact to invent a language, not merely to favour an idiom.

Gelman’s proximity to the tango, to the English, French and Italian languages, and to painting, is evident throughout his work and further confirms the dual nature of his poetry. His lines on the tango, the echo of the milonga (another popular Argentine dance) in certain poems, the translations (both real and spurious), the considerable and undeniable influence of Proust and Quevedo, the enlightenment of many of his works and the plastic fashion in which many are written, all these are quintessential to this permanent exile, native of both Buenos Aires and Santa Fe, who has managed to see in each of his mundane homes, despite the misfortunes which have befallen him, the flowers of which Baudelaire spoke: “Criaturas o abandonos que // / me juntás siéndome / yo vivo // ya no yo / sino vos / paloma // que te dejás / das / transformás (Creatures or derelictions that you bring to me, myself being / alive no longer I / but rather you, / dove who releases / gives / transforms).
In short, Juan Gelman has created a language for “those secret catastrophes of the heart” which inhabit every corner of South America: “no es para quedarnos en casa que hacemos una casa // no es para quedarnos en el amor que amamos // y no morimos para morir // tenemos sed // y paciencias de animal.” (We are not building a house in order to stay at home”, he says in the poem Habits, “nor do we love in order to stay in love/nor die in order to die/we have thirst/and animal patience.”)

CLAUDIO CANAPARO
translated by Ian Craig

Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 3 May 1930. Imprisoned in early 1960s with other Argentine intellectuals. Editor of the magazine Panorama in 1969, and of the cultural supplement of newspaper La Opinion (1971); member of editorial staff of Crisis (1973). Fled to Europe in 1975. His two children and his son’s pregnant wife were kidnapped by a paramilitary group in Argentina. Gelman’s daughter, Nora Eva, turned up but his son and daughter-in-law were among the disappeared. Returned to Argentina in 1988; took up permanent residence in Mexico City, 1989. Awarded the International Mondello Poetry Prize, 1980.

Selected Works

Poetry

Violín y otras cuestiones, Buenos Aires: Gleizer, 1956
El juego en que andamos, Buenos Aires: Nueva Expresión, 1959
Velorio del solo, Buenos Aires: Nueva Expresión, 1961
De cólera buey, Havana: La Tertulia, 1965
Los poemas de Sidney West, Buenos Aires: Galerna, 1969
Fábulas, Buenos Aires: La Rosa Blindada, 1971
Relaciones, Buenos Aires: La Rosa Blindada, 1973
Hechos y relaciones, Barcelona: Lumen, 1980
Sí dulcemente, Barcelona: Lumen, 1980
Citas y comentarios, Madrid: Visor, 1982
Hacia el sur, Mexico City: Marcha, 1982.
Composiciones, Barcelona: Llibres del Mall, 1986
Anunciaciones, Madrid: Visor, 1988
Interrupciones, Buenos Aires: Libros de Tierra Firme, 1989
Cartas a mi madre, Buenos Aires: Libros de Tierra Firme, 1989
Salarlos del impio, Buenos Aires: Libros de Tierra Firme, 1993
En abierta oscuridad, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1994
Dibaux, Buenos Aires: Seix Barral, 1994

Compilations and Anthologies

Obra poética, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1975
Hacia el sur y otros poemas, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe, 1995
Further Reading

Boccanera, Jorge, Confiar en el misterio: viaje por la poesía de Juan Gelman, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1994

Interviews

Benedetti, Mario, “Juan Gelman y su ardua empresa de matar la melancolía,” in his Los poetas comunicantes, Montevideo: Biblioteca de Marcha, 1972
Mero, Roberto, Conversaciones con Juan Gelman: contraderrota, Montoneros y la revolución perdida, Buenos Aires: Contrapunto, 1987

Asomos

Poem from Hechos y relaciones by Juan Gelman

Asomos

podrías estar avanzando a empujones por un río de tristeza / con la tristeza al cuello / los ojos ciegos ya de tristeza / el alma como pez en tristeza / ninguna orilla a la vista / o calor o sol como mano o tibieza sobre la nuca / y entonces podría ser o saltar la poesía del fondo enredada en los pies/consolación / memoria / triste tal vez / pero ya no tristeza / dolor tal vez / pero memoria / consolación / abrigo / suavidad de los días o lomo

donde descansa el corazón salvaje y turbio y triste como la tristeza y furiosa cabeza
asomada a este viaje

Note: In the transliteration given below, two slashes (//) indicate a new line. A number indicates a new stanza. This system is necessary in order to respect the poet’s use of a single slash to break up the lines of the poem.

[You might be elbowing your way along a river of sadness / with // sadness at your throat/ your eyes // blinded now by sadness / your soul // like a fish steeped in sadness / not a (2) shore in sight / Nor // heat nor sun like a hand or warm breath on // the nape of the neck / and then poetry might be // or leap up from the depths entangled committing the whole self (3) solace / memory / sad perhaps / but no longer sadness / pain // perhaps / but memory / solace / shelter // the softness of the bareback days (4) where the wild heart rests // and turbid and sad like sadness // and furious head // looking out at this journey].

The poem suggests two readings; one following the graphic scansion of each line. For the sake of convenience we might term this the classic one; another in which the scansion is established by the slash [//]. This can be termed the alternative reading.

