The classic reading invites meaning, it awakens in us a curiosity of the senses (”la tristeza al cuello / los ojos”, “la nuca / y entonces podría”). We have the impression of a proliferation, one which we vaguely intuit has an order. This consists of enumerations, alternating between the description of actions or states of mind, blurring the two without providing a solution (“ser o saltar…”).

The alternative reading favours rhythm, scansion expressed as sound, and the power of the word. This reading brings together the meaning of those apparently unconnected lines offered by the previous reading.

It is by combining, alternating or approaching these two readings simultaneously that unexpected meanings arise which affect the poem’s rhythm. In addition, this counterpoint renders useless punctuation marks and the rules of standard grammar (such as words in upper or lower case) to such an extent that we barely notice their absence: the pauses, intakes of breath, the impact of the metaphors is made by combining the meaning of words (lexicon=idiol ect) and the two scansion (tone= music=voice). In this way an undoubtedly poetic effect is obtained: words uncover new possible scansion and the scansion uncover new meanings in the words. Thus the poem may be read and reread in different keys, since the two initial scansion have given way to a range of alternatives and words whose original meaning left no room for doubts and which now are ambiguous, moving fans.
In “Asomos,” each classic line represents a figure (figura), in general an “object” clad in feeling, affection or a state of mind, that is, personalized in some way. Furthermore, the alternative lines disintegrate (when they are submitted to close scrutiny) bodies, things and feelings so as to allow a semantic and morphological plasticity. Its paradoxical final destiny does not consist only of allowing us to participate in a physical proximity, but at the same time to reintegrate objects and beings, now merged and endowed with a whole range of visual and auditive senses. Thus, for example, the title which at the beginning of our (classic) reading is “Asomos” (to see something; place oneself above something; glimpse; see imperfectly; spy; hide bashfully; look out of) in a second reading, is: “Alsamos” (We can be; we are still what we were; we no longer are but we may be; ourselves in; we are for such a thing; in this we are). It would be possible to analyze “Asomos” in its entirety in the same way: “asomos” (state) and a somos (so we are) are constantly intermingled.

Metaphors appear as inverted or absurd representations: necks that carry sadness, rivers and eyes endowed with sadness, furious heads. And always inscribed as a state of mind and a feeling of being/existing/acting is sadness. To such an extent that sadness overcomes its own condition and abandoning its condition as name almost turns into a noun (or an adjective rendered as a noun): “triste como la tristeza” “triste tal vez / pero ya no de tristeza.”

The symbolic indentification between verbs expressing a state and verbs expressing an action (“ser,” to be and “saltar,” to jump or leap) renders in aesthetic terms a nebulous condition somewhere between sentir/querrer (to feel/to want). Thus poetry “wells up entangled giving everything it’s got.” Body, eyes, necks, hands, heart and head (the last signifying thought, of course) fight, argue and are linked to memories, forms of solace, days, journeys, forms of warmth, fish, sun and river banks.

In effect, to the tú/vos (Castilian “thou” and its colloquial Argentine equivalent) implied in the poem (the narrator addresses this person when he is not thinking aloud); that is to say, he may be addressing someone else or himself, two alternative present themselves. One is to let himself go:

…por un río de tristeza/con la tristeza al cuello/los ojos ciegos ya de tristeza/el alma como pez en tristeza/ninguna orilla a la vista…

The other is to pick up that state-of-sadness and make it speak, utter, chatter, offering solace, remembering, contemplating via memory:

donde descansa el corazón salvaje y turbio y triste como la tristeza y furiosa cabeza Heart (feeling); body (matter), memory, sadness and journey shape the poetic cycle: the ground is covered in the right direction or going the wrong way, wholly or partly, “asomamos” (we look out at) and our senses of smell, touch, hearing and sight are engaged. That very bitter taste, surely, can be left behind.

CLAUDIO CANAPARO
translated by Verity Smith

Editions

Mempo Giardinelli 1947–

Argentine prose writer

Mempo Giardinelli was born in Resistencia, a town in the Chaco province, but since culture in Argentina is so centralized, his career as a writer evolved in Buenos Aires. None the less, from his very first novel, the Chaco region’s own special history and language helped inform his writing. His first novel, La revolución en bicicleta, 1980 [Revolution on a Bicycle], tells of the patient wait of an old Paraguayan army major, who after having been involved in different skirmishes, ends up vegetating in exile in the north of Argentina. While he waits for the call to arms again, his life ticks away. It is the recurring theme of the old warrior stubbornly refusing to accept his fate, the best known fictional example of which is probably Gabriel García Márquez’s colonel in El coronel no tiene quien le escriba (No one Writes to the Colonel) who also lives “waiting” until the very end. In Giardinelli’s case, what distinguished La revolución en bicicleta was its humour as well as the wit and freshness of its prose. It was not actually the first novel Giardelli wrote. Toño tuerto rey de ciegos [Toño OneEyed King of the Blind] was his first, but for some obscure reason it was not published until 1983 when it appeared under the title ¿Por qué prohibieron al circo? [Why Did They Ban the Circus?]. The latter tells the story of a remote town in the north of Argentina, tightly ruled both by tradition and an ironclad political structure of exploitation. Set in the sawmills and cotton plantations, with workers enslaved by armed guards and administrative bureaucracy, it is typical of the neo-feudal landowning regime which gave birth to novels of social protest in the River Plate area such as Alfredo Varela’s El río oscuro (The Dark River) and Enrique Amorim’s Los montaraces [The Wild Ones].

El cielo en las manos, 1981 [Grasping the Sky] tackled more intimate themes, less social and political. It could be called a story of an erotic obsession, the tale of a voyeur in love with the feminine image he glimpsed as an adolescent, and which he rediscovers in a mature woman, not now as an image but as real flesh, blood and spirit. It illustrates the adolescent myth of the eternal woman, Aurora (the name is symbolic), who appears at the very dawn of the hero’s erotic sensitivity. This passion and confused sexuality reappear again in a detective novel which won the 1983 Mexican National Prize for the Novel: Luna caliente [Hot Moon]. It is both a tribute to the “noir novel” (a genre about which Giardinelli wrote a book) and Clouzot-style horror films like Les Diaboliques.

The period from ¿Por qué prohibieron al circo? to El cielo con las manos mirrors the author’s own personal circumstances. Giardinelli lived in political exile in Mexico from 1976 to 1984 and went through the agony of the writer who loses contact with his natural local audience and has to begin communicating with another, constructing different cultural and linguistic codes. Aware of the importance of language, knowing the novel is above all language, and in his case, language “in crisis,” Giardinelli has dealt intelligently with the novel itself as a theme. The narrator describes his generation, much as Giardinelli could describe his, as a “lost” generation and concentrates its crisis on the problem of language: “I now find that being a loser, frustrated, a friend to defeat, is unbearable. Only memories have any consistency. Like Argentina, Buenos Aires, or my province the Chaco, which are now pure memory. The same happens with language, diluted by Mexicanisms, despite efforts to maintain an Argentine identity. So we speak a hybrid mixture of Argymex or something of the sort. But we don’t pronounce Argentine properly, nor Mexican. That’s no use either. It’s not even useful for saying all these things.” The image of mass exile is also there, that of the Argentine diaspora of the 1970s caused by the military dictatorship: “Here we are, scattered round the world as if we came from an ant hill which someone kicked.” However, this realization of loss is a challenge for Giardinelli rather than a reason for defeat.

This is seen clearly in his next novel, Qué solos se quedan los muertos, 1985 [Lonely Are the Dead], which is a double tribute: to the country that offered him a home for several years and to the aforementioned hardboiled or “tough guy” US fiction. The Mexican stage of Giardinelli’s life ended in 1985. He returned to Buenos Aires when the dictatorship collapsed. Although he published his detective novel in Buenos Aires, it is a decidedly “Mexican” book, without doubt the best example of transculturation produced by the thousands of Argentines in Mexico between 1973 and 1985. Qué solos se quedan los muertos is, on the one hand, a novel about Mexican violence related to drug trafficking and gangsterism, and on the other, an examination of the vanity and self-worship of the Argentine exiles themselves, an analysis and discussion, if not of the essence, at least of the phenomenon of Argentine failure abroad. If Giardinelli can marry two such disparate aspects and do it persuasively and with ease, it is because he has the ingredients to hand. He tells the story of an Argentine journalist who is asked for help by a woman who was his lover ten years earlier. As he looks for this woman, from the time he gets her message, the hero is submerged in the Zacatecas underworld, caught up in an expected and violent intrigue of crime and drug trafficking.

In 1986, Giardinelli published La entrevista [The Interview] in Madrid, a small collection including three short stories written between 1979 and 1984. It is a book of secondary importance but at least one of the stories, with its strong references to Jorge Luis Borges, demonstrates that Giardinelli’s work is tending towards the baroque, further and further removed from his original realism, he is increasingly partial to literary references, and eager to show that literature is a “construct” not a register of reality. The first story seems like a Borgesian joke and is basically a tribute to Borges, a mixture of adoration and disdain, love and hate, for a classic father figure. It is clear from the very first lines when the narrator refers to “este viejo insólito al que tanto he admirado y, claro, tanto detesto todavía.” (this extraordinary old man whom I have admired so much and, yes, still hate). The story tells how an American editor asks the narrator to interview Borges, except that the ficticious Borges is 130 years old and we are in the year 2028.

In 1991 Giardinelli published his most ambitious, personal and beautiful work: Santo oficio de la memoria [The Holy Office of Memory]. It is, at the same time, the best example of his baroque writing. More than a novel in the traditional sense, it is a profound exploration of the experience of family life. Set in an Argentine family from the Chaco, it recounts their lives but is also a kaleidoscope of multiple aspects of the culture which makes up what we could call the writer’s own personal mythology. It contains, in greater or lesser detail, references to contemporary culture, probably more familiar to the writer than to his characters. They range from Gardel to García Márquez, the films of Eliseo Subiela, the poetry of T.S. Eliot, the literature of Armonía Somers and Tito Monterroso, as if a book of notes were mixed with the lives of his characters, creating an attractive, magnetic tale, in which writer and characters speak in unison with the reader. This novel received the 1993 Rómulo Gallegos Prize, the most prestigious prize for Latin American literature.

JORGE RUFFINELLI
translated by Ann Wright

Biography

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction
La revolución en bicicleta, Barcelona: Pomaire, 1980
El cielo con las manos, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1981
Vidas ejemplares, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1982
¿Por qué prohibieron el circo? Mexico City: Oasis, 1983
Luna caliente, Mexico City: Oasis, 1983
Qué solos se quedan los muertos, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1985
La entrevista, Madrid: Almarabu, 1986
Santo oficio de la memoria, Barcelona: Grupo Editorial Norma, 1991
Imposible equilibrio, Buenos Aires: Planeta Argentina, 1995
Compilations and Anthologies

Other Writings
El género negro, 2 vols, Mexico City: UNAM, 1984
A sí se escribe un cuento, Buenos Aires: Beas, 1992. [Collection of interviews with several Latin American writers]

Further Reading

Oliverio Girondo 1891–1967

Argentine poet

Oliverio Girondo epitomized the ways a poet adapted to the different avant-garde movements crossing over from Europe to Latin America from the early 1920s to the 1950s. Girondo was a perpetual experimenter who was never satisfied with a particular way of writing, and sought to push poetic innovation to the limits, without ever being a slavish imitator of European fashions, or sacrificing his poetic voice to mere stylistic originality. At the core of his poetics lay an attempt to search for his own elusive self and voice.

His first collection of poems, Veinte poemas para ser leídos en el tranvía, 1922 [Twenty Poems to be Read in the Tram], published in Paris, caught the modern mood of the times in its title, mocking a more serious view of poetry. The poems reflect the cosmopolitan Girondo’s travels (Venice, Seville, Brest, Rio de Janeiro, etc.) and read like photographic snapshots, often capturing absurd moments, and reveal his relish in shocking his readers with erotic outbursts. This is a visual poetry where the instant of perception is liberated from common sense and logic. Girondo was writing against his serious elders wearing what he called the solemn “frock coat.” He deliberately sought to express the new freedom and acceleration of modern city life following the French poet Apollinaire’s Cubist poetics of simultaneity, colloquial language and humour. Girondo was aware from the start of his poetic career that he was a Latin American who sought to “oxigenate” the Spanish language. Everyday life was what seized his imagination. In 1924 he said in an interview that his aim was “To look at the daily spectacle of life with our own eyes. To see what is moving, what is pathetic, what is unusual and what is grotesque in a pair of gloves.” The poem “Plaza” [Square], written in Buenos Aires in 1920, has the poet simply watching what happens on the street as people walk by. The last verse has a woman calling for help as “sus mellizos se están estrangulando en su barriga” (her twins are strangling each other in her belly). Jorge Luis Borges defined these demythifying poems thus: “Girondo is a violent man. He stares at things for a long time and then knocks them over with a slap."

Thanks to his wealth Girondo was able to travel and live abroad at whim as a typical bohemian of those days. He was the force behind the Buenos Aires avant-garde magazine Martin Fierro (1924–27), that united many of Argentina’s creative minds from Borges to the visual artist Xul Solar and Norah Lange, whom Girondo later married. Girondo wrote the manifesto for this group that appeared in number 4, 192,4, of the magazine. In this aggressive piece he defined the new sensibility as a preference for a Hispano-Suiza car over a Louis XV chair in a tone that derived from Spanish ultraiísmo and Italian Futurism.

However, Girondo was especially aware of the differences between Latin America and Europe, and sought to defend a native or criollo (creolist) modernity.

His next important collection, Espantapájaros [Scarecrow] appeared in 1932, and marked an impressive change in Girondo’s poetics from mocking comments on social life to prose explorations of his inner dreamscape. Girondo was a close follower of the French Surrealists, without ever adopting their orthodoxies or joining their groups. The book explores the poet’s realization of how pointless and false the world is, and how poetry should aspire to be “badly written” to catch inner realities. These prose poems are packed with vivid and contradictory self-dramatizations. Poem 8 summarises Girondo’s theory of poetic self as an unstable, ever-changing one: “I do not have a personality: I am a cocktail, a conglomeration, a mass meeting of personalities.”

From the 1940s to his death Girondo’s poetry became more sombre, and delved even deeper into the elusive self. Poem I from Persuasion de los días [Persuasion of the Days], 1942, ends: “No soy yo quien escribe estas palabras huérfanas” (It is not I who write these orphan words). This sense of breaking into deeper inner strata is confirmed in Girondo’s last magnificent collection, with its neologistic title, En la masmédula, 1954 [In the MoreMarrow], where Girondo takes up the challenge of César Vallejo’s Trilce (1922) and systematically shatters syntax and creates a new hybrid language to reach a more real and psychic voice in the rubble of conventional words. His poetics are summarised as “subvoces que brotan del intrafondo eufónico” (subvoices that burst from the euphonic intradepts) where the poet’s “egohueco” (Egohollow) shouts its “pure No.”

The title of another poem, “Invitación al vómito” [Invitation to Vomit], asks the reader to share the poet’s nausea with the world and language as it is, and sick it up in order to find perhaps some therapeutic rebirth. These difficult poems are close to Surrealist automatic writing where sound helps break down petrified sense in a liberational urge to go beyond the frustrations and impotences of social life. It is fitting that Girondo translated Arthur Rimbaud’s Una temporada en el infierno (Une Saison en enfer) with the Argentine Surrealist poet Enrique Molina in 1959, for by the 1950s Girondo had become the mentor to a group of younger, angry writers who collectively subscribed to the Rimbaudian formulation of poetry as a descent into the inner hell of the false social self.

JASON WILSON
Biography

Selected Works

Poetry

Veinte poemas para ser leídos en el tranvía, Argenteuil: Coulouma, 1922
Calcomanías, Madrid: Espasa Calpe, 1925
Espantapájaros, Buenos Aires: Proa, 1932
Persuasion de los días, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1942.
Campo nuestro, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1946
En la masmédula, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1954
En la masvida, Barcelona: Llibres de Sinera, 1972

Short Fiction

Interlunio, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1937

Compilations and Anthologies

Oliverio Girondo, edited by Aldo Pellegrini, Buenos Aires: 1964
Veinte poemas para ser leídos en el tranvía, Calcomanías, and Espantapájaros, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1966
Obras completas, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1968

Further Reading

Kaminszain, Tamara, El texto silencioso. Tradición y vanguardia en la poesía sudamericana, Mexico City: UNAM, 1983 [Chapter I is on Girondo]
Alberto Girri 1919–1991

Argentine poet and literary translator

Alberto Girri was the first Argentine poet to live professionally from poetry, which he was able to do from 1967 onwards. He began publishing poems in 1940, but only did so regularly as from his first collection, Playa sola, 1946 [Beach Alone]. From this point until his death he was to publish around forty different books. He also published stories, and was a fine translator of Anglo-American poetry with volumes on Robert Lowell, Wallace Stevens, Stephen Spender, Theodore Roethke, etc. Indeed, one of the principal themes of his work is the poet’s ethical response to art and life, with an austere, puritan rejection of what he called the Spanish Baroque tradition of verbosity.

Girri grew up as a poet under the shadow of Victoria Ocampo’s prestigious international magazine Sur to which he first contributed in 1948 and whose editorial board he later joined. He shared Jorge Luis Borges’s taste for literature in English, for defining the Argentine literary tradition as the whole Western literary canon, for writing from a critical metaphysical position, often alluding to philosophical texts or Buddhism or the Tao or Gurdjieff, and for creating a rigorous use of language, verging on aphorism. Girri’s debt to Borges was enormous, and offered him a literary space that was not typical in an Argentina that tended to look towards France (Surrealism) as a source for poetic models.

One of Girri’s key words is “consider” (another is “examine”) where he asks his reader to share a journey of introspection, akin to meditation, working away from the surface ego and social self that often ends with Girri’s liberating sarcasm or exasperation. At a level of poetics Girri views the poem as a mental space (epitomized in his collections Casa de la mente, 1970 [The House of the Mind] where the poet cleans language of its dross, sharpens mental perceptions, suggests a deeper reality open to the mental senses and close to silence. The phrase “investigating into reality” summarises his poetics. Many poems move from a general statement or abstraction or cultural premiss to a specific, direct insight or experiential truth; a move from idea to object. It has been called an intellectual poetry, which it is, but it is also a therapeutic poetry that restores to language its “attentiveness” to a reality outside words. Girri’s poetry explores the delusions of consciousness, and ponders the value of the poem itself, and the process of reading, and trying to make sense of life as in the title poem of the collection En la letra, ambiguia selva, 1972 [In the Letter, Ambiguous Jungle]. He often defined poetry as a “criticism of language.” The message of the poem “Cuenta regresiva” [Regressive Account] from Poesía de observación (1973) is “belief or metaphysics / (there is no reason for priority) / always derive / from the anguish of a body.” However, the language used is plain and colloquial, with a notable absence of figuration and obvious musicality close to prose, as Ezra Pound often recommended.

A critique of his poetry would have to address the monotony, the variations on a theme, and the sheer bulk, as well as the dense, even elitist cultural inter-textuality assuming a Borgesian richness of allusions. Later poets have also criticised Girri’s mentalist-spiritual leanings (though these affirm the concept of “nada” [Nothingness]), and his tendency to didactic endings. Girri listed his own failings in Diario de un libro, 1972- [Diary of a Book], as being too analytical, and writing too much about poetry itself.

The moral influence he exercised as the result of living a life of austerity as a poet in Argentina was enormous, despite his claim that poetry works beyond ideologies. His critical response to demolishing Spanish rhetoric and his dedication to a literal and faithful translation, with notes, of crucial AngloAmerican modernists have enriched the Latin American poetic tradition. As Saúl Yurkievich (1978) noted, Girri’s work transcends local circumstances and is an “antidote to certain Latin American failings” such as pompous tellurism, neo-popularism and confessional psychologism.

JASON WILSON

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry

Playa sola, Buenos Aires: Nova, 1946
Coronación de la espera, Buenos Aires: Botella al Mar, 1947
Trece poemas, Buenos Aires: Botella al Mar, 1949
El tiempo que destruye, Buenos Aires: Botella al Mar, 1952
Escándalo y soledades, Buenos Aires: Botella al Mar, 1956
Examen de nuestra causa, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1956
Linea de la vida, edited by H.A.Murena, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1957
La penitencia y el mérito, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1957
Elegias italianas, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1957
Propiedades de la magia, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1959
La condición necesaria, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1960
El ojo, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1964
Envíos, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1967
Casa de la mente, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1970
Valores diarios, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1970
En la letra, ambigua selva, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1972
Poesía de observación, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1973
Quien habla no está muerto, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1975
Bestiario, Buenos Aires: La Garza, 1976
El motivo es el poema, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1976
Árbol de la estirpe humana, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1978
Lo propio, lo de todos, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1980
Homenaje a W.C. Williams, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1981 [Includes Girri’s Spanish versions of poems by William Carlos Williams]
Los Diez Mandamientos, Buenos Aires: Estudio Abierto, 1981
Lírica de percepciones, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1983
Monodias, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1985
Existenciales, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1988
Juegos alegóricos, Buenos Aires: Fraterna, 1993

Other Writings
Diario de un libro, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1972
Notas sobre la experiencia poética, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1983
Cuestiones y razones, Buenos Aires: Fraterna, 1987

Compilations and Anthologies
Poemas elegidos, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1965
Coronación de la espera, Trece poemas, La penitencia y el mérito, Propiedades de la magia,
Buenos Aires: Centro, 1967
Prosas, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1977

Further Reading

Alberto Girri: homenaje, Buenos Aires: Compañía de A. Diaconú, 1993
Borinsky, Alicia, “Interlocución y aporía: notas a propósito de Alberto Girri y Juan Gelman,” Revista Iberoamericana 125 (1983)
Crespo de Arnaud, Barbara, “Alberto Girri,” in Historia de la literatura argentina, vol. 5, Los Contemporáneos, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1982.
Pascoe, Muriel Slade, La poesía de Alberto Girri, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1986
Suárez, María Victoria, Alberto Girri: existencia y lógica poética, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1987
Sucre, Guillermo, La máscara, la transparencia, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1975
Vittor, Luis Alberto, Simbolismo e iniciación en la poesía de Alberto Girri, Buenos Aires: Fraterna, 1990 Yurkievich, Saúl, “Alberto Girri: la elocuencia de la lucidez,” in his La confabulación con la palabra, Madrid: Taurus, 1978
“Alberto Girri: fases de su creciente,” in his A través de la trama: sobre vanguardias literarias y otra concomitancias, Barcelona: Muchnik, 1984

Interviews
Encuesta a la literatura argentina contemporánea, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1981
Margo Glantz 1930–

Mexican prose writer, critic and literary translator

As the critic Magdalena García Pinto has suggested, Margo Glantz’s literary production consists of two forms of expression which continuously overlap, sustaining an incessant intertextual dialogue: that of her creative writing, and that of literary criticism. In the latter she adopts a sociocultural approach which involves an obsessive reading of the body, memory, history and cultural practices. As a member of the generation of the 1950s, Glantz has not received yet the critical recognition that she deserves because she is a writer in the dissenting tradition.

As a student of the Chronicles of the conquest, the Baroque theater, English 19th-century literature, travel diaries, avantgarde European theater, and contemporary Latin American and Mexican literature, Glantz playfully incorporates the knowledge derived from her wide-ranging readings into her creative works. Ingenuity and wit overlap to make up original narratives full of extraordinary events, fictional, historical and mythological characters, with both unusual and ordinary endings. As Glantz has said in an interview with the Chilean writer Mercedes Valdivieso, her creative works reflect her relationship to the world, and to herself, equating states of mind and modes of writing.

Her first fictional work, Las mil y una calorías. Novela dietética, 1978 [One Hundred and One Calories. A Dietetic Novel], is an experimental exercise of the imagination that combines fragments of verse and fantastic stories for the reader to link together and to interpret according to their own taste and readings. “Historias de escrituras y cerebros” (Stories of Writings and Brains) is one of the best examples of her exuberant imagination, posing challenging questions related to the conceptualization of sexuality and writing. Doscientas ballenas azules, 1979 [Two Hundred Blue Whales] deals with an interior amniotic voyage in the placenta, and the feminine theme of interior productivity and instinctive consciousness are conveyed through a vast repertoire of visual and sensorial imagery. No pronunciarás, 1980 [Do not Invoke the Name], is a ludic narrative piece, which explores the act of naming using parody and irony. For Glantz, naming becomes a pretext to investigate the significance of the name, identity, biography, historical anecdote, cultural practice. This imaginary and analytical composition encompasses from the naming of animals by Adam, the associative power of names to qualities and disposition, the anecdotal interpretation of names at certain historical moments, the magical power of names, to cultural practices such as naming and colonization, naming and acculturation, marriage and the changing of names. Las genealogías, 1981 (The Family Tree) is her best-known work. It deals with personal and collective identity, memory, culture and the process of acculturation, the autobiographical impulse and the textual construction of the subject. Glantz gives voice to her father Jacobo Glantz, to her mother Lucía, to herself and her ancestors, and even to her daughter Renata entering a room while she listens to tapes, and edits the (auto) biography. The Other, the others, and the narrator/protagonist weave a textual tapestry on tapes with forgotten memories, real and imaginary stories, framed conversations, old photographs, and nostalgic recollections, while recording Jewish cultural history in the process of being Mexicanized. In La lengua en la mano, 1983 [The Tongue in the Hand] Glantz combines her skills as writer and critic elaborating a sophisticated study on eroticism centered on the representation of the tongue, hand, the foot, and their relationship to writing. Taking Georges Bataille and Roland Barthes’s studies into consideration, Glantz proposes an interpretative discourse debating the body and genre, the body and gender, the body and social class, the body and moral discourse in 19th-century Mexican literature. Her infatuation with the grammar of the body and cultural interpretation leads her also to investigate tattooing, mutilation and fragmentation. Her De la amorosa inclinación a enredarse en cabellos, 1984 [About the Loving Temptation to get Entangled in Hair], merges cultural articles, from the newspapers Uno Más Uno (Mexico) and Zona Franca (Caracas), regarding the hair as a symbol of love, eroticism and filial relationships. Her semiotic approach becomes a dynamic inquiry as she considers the hair as a symbol of love, lust, frivolity, repression, liberation, life and death. Her intellectual biography, Síndrome de naufragios, 1984 [Shipwreck Syndrome] depicts natural and personal calamities and misfortunes such as hurricanes, floods, epidemics and divorce. The text merges catastrophic events so that the biblical flood intrudes in a divorce. In this way Glantz conceptualizes the relationship of writing and fragmentary representation. Her cultural project El día de tu boda, 1982. [Your Wedding Day] is a sociological treatise and cultural essay on the postcard, the epistolary genre, and the love-letter. It ascertains her versatility, inventiveness and experimental aesthetic pursuit, being also an homage to Roland Barthes and Walter Benjamin.

Some of her most recent critical works include essays on Núñez Cabeza de Vaca, and on the Malinche myth. Glantz’s creative works provide the reader with valuable insights; each one has posed serious literary questions ahead of their time. Her texts encourage readers to be aware of the resistance of a text to be catalogued within a specific genre, and of the proliferation of demands intertextuality imposes on them. Her prose also questions the function of thematic obsession as an interpretative tool enhancing the semantic possibilities of the text, the sociological value of mixing discourses from different traditions and modes of expression, and the critical importance of reading a variety of cultural artifacts. It is important to note that Las genealogías, as Erna Pfeiffer suggests, pioneered the Mexican feminine genealogical novel centering on the problematics of identity and origin being followed by Las hojas muertas, 1987 [Dead Leaves] by Barbara Jacobs, Antes [Before] and Mejor desaparece, 1988 [Better That She Should Disappear] by Carmen Boullosa, La flor de Lis, 1988 [The Fleur-de-Lis] by Elena Poniatowska, La familia vino del norte, 1988 [The Family Came from the North] and Héctor by Silvia Molina, some short stories by Ethel Krauze, and La bobe (1990) by Sabina Berman. The value of her critical works is still hard to assess, but one can say that her preface to the anthology Onda y escritura en Mexico, 1971 [Writing and the New Wave in Mexico] is representative of her role as an avantgarde analyst of Mexican literature and as a leading literary critic in contemporary Mexico. Her introduction was considered one of the most polemical essays of the decade, igniting a cultural and political debate on the new defiant and subversive mode of expression she named “literatura de la Onda” (new wave literature).

As a first-generation immigrant, and a Judeo-Mexican writer, she has explored vital issues of this hybrid culture. Ahead of her contemporaries, Glantz called attention to the representation of the female body, the importance of the gaze within the text, and of how a phallocentric view of the world permeates the culture that she tries to understand, and from which she departs as she writes.
MAGDALENA MAÍZ-PEÑA

See also entry on Jewish Writers

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 26 January 1930 of Jewish parents from the Ukraine. Attended the Sorbonne, Paris, received doctorate, 1958; also studied history of art at the Louvre and English literature at Central London Polytechnic. Leading intellectual who has been involved in policy-making in significant cultural projects, through the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico and her work for several important publishing houses. Director, Cultural Institute of Mexico-Israel, 1964–67; director, literature program, Instituto Nacional de Bellas Artes, 1964–67; professor of literature at UNAM. Has taught at universities in the US and is a contributor to important cultural journals such as Filosofía y Letras and the Revista Iberoamericana. Has also translated works by Georges Bataille, Tennessee Williams, Henry Fielding and Antonin Artaud. Cultural attaché at the Embassy of Mexico in London, 1986–88. Recipient of the Premio Villaurrutia, 1984 for Síndrome de naufragios.

Selected Works

Novels
Las mil y una calorías. Novela dietética, Puebla: Premiá, 1978
Doscientas ballenas azules, Mexico City: La Máquina de Escribir, No pronunciarás, Mexico City: Premiá, 1980
Síndrome de naufragios, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1984

Short Fiction
La guerra de los hermanos. Leyenda de la Coyolxauhqui, illustrated by María Figueroa, Colección del Jicote Argüendero, Mexico City: Penelope, 1982

Essays
Tennessee Williams y el teatro norteamericano, Mexico City: UNAM, 1964
Onda y escritura en Mexico: Jóvenes de 20 a 33, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1971 [Critical edition with a lengthy introduction by Margo Glantz]
Repeticiones; ensayos sobre literatura mexicana, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1979
Intervenciones y pretextos; ensayos de literatura comparada e iberoamericana, Mexico City: UNAM, 1981
El día de tu boda, Mexico City: Cultura/SEP, 1982,
La lengua en la mano, Mexico City: Premiá, 1983
De la amorosa inclinación a enredarse en cabellos, Mexico City: Océano, 1984
Erosiones, Mexico City: UNAM, 1984
Borrones y borradores; reflexiones sobre el ejercicio de la escritura, Mexico City: UNAM, 1992.
Esguince de cintura, Mexico City: Consejo Nacional para la Cultura y las Artes, 1994
La Malinche, sus padres y sus hijos, Mexico City: UNAM, 1994
Further Reading

Agosín, Marjorie, “Dialogando Las genealogías de Margo Glantz,” Las hacedoras: mujer, imagen, escritura, Santiago de Chile: Cuarto Propio, 1993

García Pinto, Magdalena, “La problemática de la sexualidad en la escritura de Margo Glantz,” Coloquio Internacional: escritura y sexualidad en la literatura hispanoamericana, with an introduction by Alain Sicard and César Fernández Moreno, Madrid: Centre de Recherches Latino-Americanes / Fundamentos, 1990

Interviews

Miller, Beth, A la sombra del volcán: conversaciones sobre la narrativa mexicana actual” Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1990 [Contains interview with Margo Glantz]

Edouard Glissant 1928–

Martinican prose writer, poet and dramatist

Edouard Glissant is an outstanding example of the second generation of black Caribbean writers who have struggled to come to terms with the fragmented, unsatisfactory heritage with which they have to work, and whose efforts have gone into creating a language that attempts to rescue the past and offer fresh opportunities for the future. One of Glissant’s teachers at secondary school was Aimé Césaire, whose ideas on Négritude and revindication of a specific black Caribbean tradition have been taken a stage further by these younger writers. While continuing Césaire’s search for a specific Caribbean identity, they were unable to accept his sometimes simple oppositions, and have, as in the case of Glissant, found that there are no easy answers.

Another, very different writer from the Caribbean—Jean Rhys—wrote in her novel Wide Sargasso Sea: “how can rivers and mountains and sea seem unreal?” This is the drama that Glissant often enacts in his own work: how he, as a black writer on a small island, nominally a part of France, can come to feel so dispossessed. He feels uneasy with the sea because his ancestors were brought across it against their will: its presence serves as a constant reminder of the homeland of which they were robbed. The sea also emphasizes the distance with France, still governing Martinique and pretending, at least on some levels, that the island is no different from anywhere in metropolitan France. itself—“Of course there are problems here,” says a character in Malemort, “but a Frenchman’s a Frenchman, whether he’s a Breton, an Alsatian or a West Indian.” Glissant also finds himself cut off from the landscape of mountains and rivers of the Caribbean islands because, once again, his ancestors were never allowed to feel it belonged to them in any way.

This sense of the lack of a home extends in Glissant to the use of language itself. French is the tongue he has learnt from the masters, but which he stubbornly uses to name, to subvert, to create meanings that will serve him and his fellows rather than those who seek to control the language in order to reinforce their power. In this sense, Glissant learnt the subversive power of language from French Surrealist poets like André Breton or René Char, a power that he endows with a prophetic dignity and despair in many of his poems.

Although Glissant’s work has become increasingly pessimistic, his most influential work in many ways remains his early novel La Lézarde (The Ripening) which focusses more on the possibilities of revolt. Based on the events of 1945, when a generation of young Martinicans believed they could achieve political change through revolution, the novel traces the story of Thael from the hills, who has been chosen as the instrument of a revolutionary group to kill the reactionary Garin. As Thael, like the river moves down from the hills to the life of society in the plains, he acquires knowledge that is painful but at the same time unavoidable. The plot is summarized as follows by Beverley Ormerod in An Introduction to the French Caribbean Novel: “The fiction is built on traditional, archetypal motifs: the departure from a known region into the unknown; the encounter with an alluring woman; the questing journey through a mysterious forest; the descent, in darkness, to a magic spring; the tests of skill and endurance; the killing which frees imprisoned waters and lifts a curse from a community; the final, difficult return of the hero enriched and matured by his initiatory experiences.” As a whole, the book is remarkable for the way that the landscape and the characters are linked not only at the level of the plot but also at that of language and sensibility, through a style that is richly meditative.

Later novels follow a similar theme of quest. In Le Quatrième Siècle [The Fourth Century], the different choices of two families who arrived on the same slave ship from Africa are explored: one whose members accept their fate as slaves, the others who immediately flee to the hills and live the clandestine existence of marrons, or runaways. By the time of the later novel Malemort, the rebellion and cautious optimism of these earlier works has gone. Now the same river of La Lézarde is choked and overgrown, and has lost its way to the sea.

Glissant has also written plays in which he attempts to reclaim history for those who have suffered rather than dictated it. In the preface to his Monsieur Toussaint he wrote “For those who know of their own history only that obscure and diminished portion to which they have been relegated, the recovery of the near or distant past is an absolute necessity….a passionate determination to unveil the past which has been deformed or obliterated by others may sometimes give us a better sense of the meaning of the present”.

It is in Glissant’s poems, particularly in the collection Le Sel noir [Black Salt], that the reader is most aware of how this same process is enacted through language itself. Words in the poems carry their own weight of history, which is brought into the present and renewed through both a startling use of imagery and of poetic voice, endowing them with a sudden immediacy of poetic meaning.

NICK CAISTOR

Biography

Born in Sainte-Marie, Martinique, 2.1 September 1928. Attended the Lycée Schoelcher, Fort-de-France, and studied under Aimé Césaire, 1939–45. Moved to France in 1946. Enrolled at the Sorbonne and also studied ethnology at the Musée de l’Homme. Worked at the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, Paris. Contributor to Presence Africaine, from 1947; active in left-wing political and cultural groups from the early 1950s, including the Société Africaine de Culture. Co-founder, with Paul Niger, of the Front Antillo Guyanais, c.1959 until it was dissolved by Charles De Gaulle in 1961. Glissant was forbidden to return to Martinique from 1959 to 1965 and prevented from travelling to Algeria. Returned to Martinique, 1965; founder and director, Institut Martiniquais d’Études, from 1967; editor of the quarterly review Acoma, 1970–73. Awarded the Renaudot Prize, 1958 for La Lézarde and the Veillon Prize, 1965 for Le Quatrième Siècle.

Selected Works

Novels

Le Quatrième Siècle, Paris: Seuil, 1964

Play

Poetry

Un Champ d’îles, Paris: Dragon, 1953

Le Sel noir, Paris: Seuil, 1960

Essays

Soleil de la conscience, Paris: Seuil, 1956

Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda 1814–1873

Cuban prose writer, poet and dramatist

Although Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda was born and educated in Cuba, she spent most of her literary career in Spain. In her lifetime she was highly popular and acknowledged as an outstanding author in what was a male-dominated literary world, but her acclaim dwindled after her death. However, scholarly research in recent years has been shedding considerable light on her persona and literary output, resurrecting, to some extent, the critical esteem she still deserves within both Cuban and Spanish literature. All Avellaneda’s output reflects the personal conflicts in her unconventional early life, and the feelings and concerns she experienced as a woman torn between her instinctive individualism and eventual conformity.

Avellaneda first became known as a lyric poet in Madrid in the early 1840s. From the first, one of her main themes was love, both temporal and spiritual. In her poem “A él,” 1845 [To Him], written at a time when she felt an unrequited passion for a certain Ignacio de Cepeda, she identifies with and abandons herself to the power of amorous infatuation: “¡Poder que me arrastras! ¿Serás tú mi llama? / ¿Serás mi océano? ¿mi sierpe serás?.../ ¿Qué importa? Mi pecho te acepta y te ama, / Ya vida, ya muerte le aguarde detrás.” (Force that carries me away! Will you be my flame? / Will you be my ocean? Will you be my serpent.../ Who cares? My heart accepts and loves you, / Whether life or death awaits beyond). The pain provoked by her frustrated love appears in numerous poems: “La serenata del poeta” [The Poet’s Serenade], “El cazador” [The Hunter], “La venganza” [Vengeance], among others. As a consequence of her disillusionment with sexual love, Avellaneda entered a more spiritual phase which was similarly reflected in her poetry: “Las contradicciones” [The Contradictions], “Al mar” [To the Sea], “A una acacia” [To an Acacia], “Dios y el hombre” [God and Man]. Not only did many incorporate deep disappointments in her early amorous experiences, but they also demonstrated the melancholy sentiments she had for the idealised Cuban homeland she had left when she was twenty-two years old. These feelings are evident in the enthusiastic and constant references to the natural history of the island, and the unbridled admiration she lavished on her Cuban compatriots. Poems like “Al partir” [On Leaving], which she wrote when she first left Cuba in 1836, and “La vuelta a la patria” [Return to the Homeland], written twenty-three years later when she returned to Cuba, are packed with patriotic sentiments for Cuba expressed in exalting metaphors: “Perla del mar” [Pearl of the Sea], “Hermosa Cuba” [Beautiful Cuba], “Patria feliz” [Joyous Homeland], “Edén querido” [Beloved Eden]. All display the rose-tinted, and even somewhat mawkish, sentiments of the typical expatriate.

Avellaneda was also a popular and famous dramatist. She wrote numerous plays whose main themes were historical, such as Munio Alfonso, 1844, Egilona, 1845, or historical-biblical, such as Baltasar, 1858, Saiúl, 1849, as well as comedies, such as La hija de las flores [The Daughter of the Flowers], 1852, La aventurera, 1853 [The Adventuress], among others. Each demonstrates a preoccupation with the three major philosophical currents of the Romantic period: freedom, morality and justice. In many of her tragedies she used the subjects, characters and ideas of outstanding English, French and Spanish writers, such as Shakespeare, Byron, Emile Augier, Madame de Staël, George Sand, Manuel José de Quintana, and others. In La aventurera, Avellaneda defends the fallen woman as a victim of a chauvinist society in a serious attempt to condemn prevailing social canons. Avellaneda clearly identifies with her character, as she too had suffered the opprobrium of a censorious society when she rejected the restrictive cultural values that her own society attempted to place upon her. Her personal desire for independence encouraged her to defy conventional patriarchal society by refusing an arranged marriage. She indulged in love affairs and had an illegitimate child. In like vein, she did not restrain herself from voicing her emancipating ideas on marriage, divorce and chauvinism in a covert manner in some of her fictional work. While on occasion her plays and poems are devices for her anti-chauvinism, it is in her novels that her concerns are most consistently and directly expressed. Two novels, in particular, stand out: Sab, 1841 and Dos mujeres, 1842, [Two Women]. In Sab, Avellaneda uses slavery as a metaphor to denounce simultaneously the servitude of black people and white women alike. Sab, the mulatto protagonist, writes: “¡Oh, las mujeres! ¡Pobres y ciegas víctimas! Como los esclavos, ellas arrastran pacientemente su cadena y bajan la cabeza bajo el yugo de las leyes humanas. Sin otra guía que su corazón ignorante y crédulo eligen un dueño para toda la vida.” (Oh, women! Poor, blind victims! Like slaves, they patiently drag their chains and bow their heads under the yoke of human laws. With no other guide than their uneducated and naively gullible heart, they choose (when marrying) a master for life). In Dos mujeres, she goes still further and presents the idea of a man who genuinely loves two women, his wife, and his lover. In this, Avellaneda attempts to reveal the institution of marriage as something mutable, with the societal concept of adultery as a sinful and punishable act contrasted with the reality of simultaneous, virtuous and multiple love.
A strident feminism appears in Avellaneda’s later articles, collectively entitled “La mujer,” 1860 [Woman], for the literary magazine Album cubano, which she founded and edited when she returned to Cuba. These articles, both claiming and seeking to justify equality of rights, appear to have been written as a result of her application for membership of the Spanish Royal Academy being turned down on the grounds of her gender. In spite of her efforts to promote equal rights for women, Avellaneda was ultimately defeated by the very chauvinistic society in which, against the odds, she had largely succeeded and which she had so often attacked. Her novels Sab and Dos mujeres were not only banned in Cuba, because they were considered a danger to conventional notions of the moral fabric of society, but were also excluded eventually by Avellaneda herself from the final edition of her Obras literarias [Literary Works]. She possibly felt defeated by a censorious and critical society and thus obliged to exclude both works. It would seem that in her later years Avellaneda’s more strident feminism mellowed and she lapsed into populist prose once again. In the end she decided to accept the norms imposed by a patriarchal society, just as, of course, most of her fellow women did. Nevertheless, as her posthumously published autobiography and personal letters indicated, she privately continued to feel different from other women: “Ya he dicho mil veces que no pienso como el común de las mujeres, y que mi modo de obrar y de sentir me pertenecen exclusivamente.” (I have said a thousand times that I do not think like the rest of women, and that my ways of behaving and feeling belong exclusively to me).

The populist, sentimental works of Avellaneda, which appear now perhaps a little tawdry, should be seen in relation to their historical context. That same context ought, similarly, to show Avellaneda as a feminist pioneer in Hispanic cultures. She bravely attempted to challenge the discriminatory society in which she lived. And even if in the end the weight of social pressure forced her to conform, the reality of those anti-chauvinist works she did achieve, suffice to guarantee her critical acclaim.

BRIGIDA PASTOR

Biography

Born in Puerto Príncipe in the province of Camagüey, Cuba, 23 March 1814. Nicknamed “Tula.” Eldest of five children and only daughter, but only she and her brother Manuel survived. Was most fortunate in her education and among her tutors was the poet José María Heredia who encouraged her to write. Father died when Tula was nine and mother remarried ten months later. Tula disliked her stepfather. Family left for Europe in 1836. Stayed in Corunna where Tula was briefly engaged to Francisco Ricafort. Settled with her brother, Manuel, in Seville. Met Ignacio de Cepeda and began to publish poems using pen name “La Peregrina” (The Pilgrim). First play, Leoncia, produced in Seville in 1840. Had passionate love affair with Gabriel García Tssara and bore him a child, but he abandoned them, and the little girl died when less than a year old. Married Pedro Sabater in 1846; he died less than four months later and she sought solace in a convent in Bordeaux. In 1853 she applied for membership of the Royal Spanish Academy, but her application was rejected on account of her gender. (The first woman member was to be admitted in 1977). Married Colonel Domingo Verdugo y Massieu in 1855; he was stabbed and seriously wounded in 1858. In 1859 Verdugo attached to staff of new Governor General of Cuba. Couple travelled to the island where in 1860 Tula founded and edited the shortlived women’s magazine, Album cubano de lo bueno y lo bello [Cuban Album of the Good and the Beautiful]. Husband died in 1863, after which she returned to Seville. Moved to Madrid in 1869 where she died of diabetes on 1 February 1873.

Selected Works

Individual Works

Devocionario nuevo y completísimo en prosa y verso, Seville: D.A. Izquierdo, 1867

Poesías líricas de la Señora Doña Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda, Madrid: Leocadio López, 1877

El artista barquero, 2 vols, Havana: “El Pilar” de Manuel de Armas, 1890

Autobiografía y cartas de la ilustre poetisa hasta ahora inéditas, Huelva, Spain: Imprenta Miguel Mora, 1907

Cartas inéditas y documentos relativos a su vida en Cuba de 1859 a 1864, Matanzas, Cuba: Imprenta La Pluma de Oro, 1912

Diario de amor, Madrid: Aguilar, 1928

Critical Editions

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras literarias de la señora Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda, 5 vols, Madrid: Imprenta de M.Rivadenera, 1868–69

Obras de doña Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda, 6 vols, Havana: Imprenta de A.Miranda, 1914

Translations

Cuahtemoc, the Last Aztec Emperor, translated by Mrs Wilson W. Blake, Mexico: F.P.Hoeck, 1898

[Translation of Guatimozín, último emperador de Méjico]

[Translation of Baltasar]

Sab and Autobiography, translated by Nina M.Scott, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993

[Critical edition and excellent translation]

Further Reading

Figarola Caneda, Domingo and Doña Emilia Boxhorn, Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda: biografía, bibliografía e iconografía, incluyendo muchas cartas inéditas y publicadas, escritas por la gran poetisa o dirigidas a ella, y sus memorias, Madrid: Sociedad General Española de Librería, 1929

Antônio Gonçalves Dias 1823–1864

Brazilian poet

Antônio Gonçalves Dias was proud of the coincidence of his birth and that of a newly-independent Brazil: he was born in Caxias, in the province of Maranhão, just ten days after the last armed conflict of the independence process, a brief skirmish between Brazilians and Portuguese loyalists, took place in the same small city. He never publicly admitted another coincidence, however: he was the illegitimate son of a Portuguese immigrant and a caçuza (mixed African and Indian) mother, and was therefore, like Brazil itself, a product of the three national races.

Despite his illegitimacy, his mixed ancestry, and his decidedly Indian appearance, Gonçalves Dias enjoyed remarkable success in academic and public life. He attended the University of Coimbra, in Portugal, where he belonged to a group of student poets who styled themselves “medievalists.” He then went on to become the most famous Brazilian poet of his time, the nation’s first serious ethnographer, a leading specialist on education and on colonial history, a professor at the premier national secondary school, and a friend of the Emperor, Peter II. Gonçalves Dias visited Europe several times, usually at the Emperor’s expense, to research educational organization and Brazilian history. His works were widely known and admired in Portugal, France and Germany, and he was the first Brazilian writer to appear in a European encyclopedia of world literature. A key member of the prestigious Brazilian Institute of History and Geography, the oldest surviving learned society in Latin America, Gonçalves Dias was enormously influential in the process of constructing a viable national past for the new nation. He wrote a dictionary of the Tupi Indian language, and the native artifacts he gathered during a nine-month expedition to the Amazon formed the core of the collection of the Brazilian National Museum.

Most of Gonçalves Dias’s poetry appeared in four volumes between 1846 and 1857. In very general terms, his verse can be divided into three broad categories: Romantic set-pieces, largely autobiographical lyrics, and works dealing with the Middle Ages—but it is important to understand that this last category includes a sizable body of poems about what Gonçalves Dias defined as Brazil’s medieval past, the world of the Indian. The verses included in first of these categories are the least interesting. Obviously influenced by the poetry of Lamartine and Hugo, these verbose dramatic narratives and hymns to the beauty of nature are surprisingly un-Brazilian in both theme and detail.

The lyrics included in these volumes are very different indeed. Their language is simple and highly musical, purified of the ponderous adjectivization found in his more consciously romantic poems. Many of them deal with unhappy love, and reflect Gonçalves Dias’s miserable marriage and his enduring and unconsummated love for another woman, the sister of his best friend. Others sing the beauties of nature in Brazil and the poet’s longing, during his frequent stays in Europe, for his homeland. The tone, the vocabulary, and the metrics of many of these works are intensely non-literary and convincingly authentic; portions of several of these poems have passed directly into popular culture, recited or sung by individuals entirely unaware of their origins, and have been collected by 20th-century folklorists. The most popular and beloved of all Brazilian poems, in fact, is Gonçalves Dias’s “Canção do exílio” (Song of Exile), written while he was a student in Portugal, which almost all of the nation’s inhabitants know by heart.

The most complex and intriguing of Gonçalves Dias’s poetic works are his recreations of the medieval past. One group of recreations focuses on Brazil’s Indian past, both before and just after the arrival of the Portuguese in 1500, and includes both brief lyrics and narratives and his epic poem Os timbiras [The Timbira Indians], published in Germany in 1857; Gonçalves Dias described this last work as both an American Genesis and a Brazilian Iliad. His other medieval text, the Sextilhas de Frei Antão [Brother Antony’s Sextets], published in 1848, is a painstaking recreation of the language and society of 15th-century Portugal.

In all of these works, Gonçalves Dias has a double purpose: at one level, these poems are but one aspect of the central goal of his life—to use history to construct a distinctive national identity for Brazilians, and to create a literature capable of expressing that identity. His idealized knights and damsels, clothed in armor and damask or in breechcloths, housed in Portuguese castles or communal dwellings in the limitless forests of the Amazon, were all designed to give the readers of a new nation a sense of pride in their heroic transatlantic history. At the same time, Gonçalves Dias was acutely conscious of his non-European origins and highly sensitive to the racial prejudice he felt he encountered even among his friends. His Indianist poems, therefore, also allowed him to escape from the white-dominated society of the Empire into an imaginary realm, the world of his native ancestors. The poet’s intense personal identification with that world gives these works a unique power and authenticity; nothing comparable to the best of these poems was produced anywhere in the Americas in the 19th century. Gonçalves Dias wrote and published his Indianist verses well before his 1861 expedition to the Amazon and his encounter with the reality of native life in trading-posts and villages along the river, a reality very different from the world he had imagined and described; he insisted, in his diary of the expedition, that the natives he met were not real Indians at all, but half-breeds.

The same duality of purpose can be seen in the Sextilhas de Frei Antão. Writers in Portugal, some of whom resented the very idea that Brazil might possess a national literature of its own, had criticized the style and syntax of Gonçalves Dias’s early poems. In response, he immersed himself in medieval texts and produced these verse narratives in something approximating 15th-century Portuguese. The Sextilhas thus represent both a recreation of Brazil’s heroic Portuguese past and a reply to those who had questioned the validity of his work and of Brazilian literature in general. These verses, however, are also designed to continue the very personal project Gonçalves Dias had begun in his Indianist verses—the redemption, through poetry, of all of his ancestors, whether Amerindian, Portuguese or African. In Brother Antony’s narratives, both Christians and Moors are paragons of beauty, virtue, and heroism; love between Europeans and Africans is sanctified and even glorified by the Church and by society. Beyond his remarkable talent and originality, it is the inclusiveness of Gonçalves Dias’s vision of the national past that sets him apart as the greatest poet of 19th-century Brazil.

DAVID T. HABERLY

Biography

Born in Caxias, Maranhão, Brazil, 10 August 1823. Illegitimate son of a Portuguese shopkeeper and a cafusa (woman of mixed Indian and African race). Spent most of his childhood with his mother on a small cotton farm. Educated in Caxias, 1830–36. Visited Europe with father in 1837. Funded by his stepmother, he studied law and modern languages in Coimbra, Portugal. Read the French Romantics, Victor Hugo, Chateaubriand, and the Portuguese writers, Alexandre Herculano and Almeida Garrett. Travelled to Lisbon in 1838. Returned to Maranhão penniless in 1845 and concentrated on writing. Embarked on several unhappy love affairs; developed syphilis, before eventually marrying. Travelled around Europe and the interior of Brazil while employed on academic and diplomatic missions in the 1850s. Died in a shipwreck on 3 November 1864.

Selected Works

Poetry
Primeiros cantos, Rio de Janeiro: Tipografia Universal do Laemmert, 1846
Segundos cantos, Rio de Janeiro: Monteiro, 1848
Últimos cantos, Rio de Janeiro: Paulo Brito, 1851
Os timbiras, Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1857

Play
Leonor de Mendonça, Rio de Janeiro: Villeneuse, 1847

Other Writings
Dicionário da Língua Tupi, Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1858

Compilations and Anthologies
Cnts, 3rd edition, Leipzig: Brockhaus, 1860
Obras póstumas, 6 vols, edited by Antônio Henrique Leal, São Luís do Maranhão: Imprenta por B.de Matos, Tipografia do Rua da Paz, 1868–69
Further Reading

Despite his unquestioned importance, few major studies of Gonçalves Dias’s verse have appeared during the last decades.
Bandeira, Manuel, introduction to Gonçalves Dias’s Poesia completa e prosa escolida, Rio de Janeiro: Aguilar, 1959
Driver, David M., The Indian in Brazilian Literature, New York: Hispanic Institute, 1942, Manuel González Prada 1844–1918

Peruvian poet and essayist

Manuel González Prada represents the emergence of modern critical thinking in the history of Peruvian letters. In his speech in the Ateneo de Lima (1886), collected in Páginas libres [Free Pages], González Prada launched a polemical attack on the “archaic,” “reactionary,” “lackey” poetics of the Romantics and called for a radical, politically-minded literature that would address the problems of the nation. With the foundation of the progressive literary association “Círculo literario” (Literary Circle) in 1886, González Prada hoped to encourage the production of a modern, national literature which would lead the voices of dissent against the official liberal program. The virulent conflict, unleashed between the Romantics and González Prada following his speech, represents clearly the historical conflict of two divergent generations and of two radically different forms of literary poetics. González Prada and the writers that gathered around him, amongst them Clorinda Matto de Turner, had indeed, paraphrasing the celebrated writer of Tradiciones peruanas, Ricardo Palma, the “petulance” to militate for the political party of their ideological choice. González Prada believed that a writer should be a “soldier of truth” whose mission was to produce a “literature of combat” and he conceived artistic space as the battlefield where the political and economic elites were to be confronted by an army of subversive intellectuals. The Romantics, on the other hand, visualised literature as a neutralising space or “poetic retreat” where “sterile struggles” were conciliated, thus providing writers and readers with a refuge from the avatars of public life. González Prada disparaged delicacy of expression and demanded a tough, aggressive and “virile” language to counteract the “impotent” and “effeminate” language of the previous generation of writers. González Prada’s raging “literature of disillusion” as it came to be known later, emerged with overwhelming force in the midst of an intensely military and revengeful atmosphere after the War of the Pacific and its sequel of economic disaster, moral disintegration and profound humiliation.

In his essays he also developed a vision of an alternative anti-oligarchic modernity to the one proposed by the “Aristocratic Republic,” a term which in itself indicates the essential paradox of the period in which Prada lived and worked. He saw the official national discourse, with its images of a sovereign, egalitarian nation as a farce, “un remedo” (a poor imitation), which aimed at legitimizing the subordination of Indians not at emancipating them. A modern idea of nation, he claimed, was incompatible with the existence of immense structures of exclusion, of citizens with no rights, enslaved in colonial institutions masquerading under a modern name. In his essay “Nuestros indios” [Our Indians], collected in Horas de lucha [Hours of Struggle] he states that “nuestra forma de gobierno se reduce a una gran mentira, porque no merece llamarse república democrática un estado en que dos o tres millones de individuos viven fuera de la ley” (our form of government is nothing but a sham, because a state which includes two or three million subjects living outside the law does not deserve to be called a democratic republic). González Prada called for the incorporation of the indigenous population as the centre for the construction of a Peruvian, rather than a creole identity as clearly expressed in his “Discurso en el Politeama,” 1888 [Speech in the Politeama]: “no forman el verdadero Perú las agrupaciones de criollos y extranjeros que habitan la faja de tierra situada entre el Pacífico y los Andes; la nación está formada por las muchedumbres de indios diseminadas en la banda oriental de la cordillera” (the authentic Peru is not constituted by the group of creoles and foreigners who live in the strip of land situated between the Pacific and the Andes: the nation is constituted by the mass of Indians scattered on the eastern slopes of the mountains). González Prada takes the debate on the Indian question one step further by adding that the problem would not disappear with education but with land tenure and weapons: “a la violencia respondería con la violencia” (violence would elicit violence). He thus anticipated the political projects developed thirty years later by Haya de la Torre and José Carlos Mariátegui.

FRANCESCA DENEGRI

See also entries on Juana Manuela Gorriti, Clorinda Matto de Turner, Ricardo Palma

Biography

Born in Lima, Peru, in 1844. Father exiled to Chile where Manuel attended English School in Valparaiso. Transferred in 1857 to Santo Toribio Seminary, but found the regime very strict. Moved to Convictorio de San Carlos in 1860. Obliged to study law but preferred to dedicate himself to agriculture in the Valle de Cañete, 1870. Fought against the Chileans at the battle of Miraflores. Defeat of Peruvians in the war against Chile caused him to reflect on the negative characteristics of his countrymen. President of Literary Club, 1885. This became the National Union in 1891 and was a centre for political radicals. Appointed director of National Library in 1912, after Ricardo Palma retired. González Prada’s chief concern was the education of the unprivileged. Died in 1918.
Selected Works

Essays
Páginas libres, Paris: Dupont, 1894
Horas de lucha, Lima: Tipografía “El Progreso Literario,” 1908
Bajo el oprobio, Paris: Typographie L.Bellenand et Fils, 1933 Anarquía, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1937
Nuevas páginas libres, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1937
Figuras y figurones, Paris: Typographie L.Bellenand et Fils, 1938
Propaganda y ataque, Buenos Aires: Imán, 1939
Prosa menuda, Buenos Aires: Imán, 1941
El tonel de Diógenes, Mexico City: Tezontle, 1945
Ortometría: apuntes para una rítmica, Lima: Universidad de San Marcos, Dirección Universitaria de Biblioteca y Publicaciones, 1977

Poetry
Minúsculas, Lima: Cien Ejemplares, 1901
Exóticas, Lima: Tipografía de “El Lucero,” 1911
Trozos de vida, Paris: Typographie de L.Bellenand et Fils, 1933
Baladas peruanas, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1935
Grafitos, Paris: Typographie de L.Bellenand et Fils, 1937
Libertarias, Paris: Typographie de L.Bellenand et Fils, 1938
Baladas, Paris: Typographie de L. Bellenand et Fils, 1939
Letrillas, edited by Luis Alberto Sánchez, Lima: Milla Batres, 1975

Compilations and Anthologies
Poemas desconocidos, edited by Elsa Villanueva, Lima: Clépsidra, 1973
Sobre el militarismo: antología; Bajo el oprobio (selections), edited by Bruno Podestá, Lima: Horizonte, 1978
Cantos de otro siglo, Lima: Universidad de San Marcos, Dirección Universitaria de Biblioteca y Publicaciones, 1979

Further Reading
Chang-Rodríguez, Eugenio, La literatura política de González Prada, Mariátegui y Haya de la Torre, Mexico City: Andrea, 1957
___ “González Prada y el anarquismo,” in Opciones políticas peruanas, Lima: Normas Legales, 1987
Mariátegui, José Carlos, “González Prada,” in Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, Lima: Amauta, 1928; as Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality, translated by Marjory Urquidi, Austin, Texas: University of Texas Press, 1971
Rovira, Catherine, Semblanza y circunstancia de Manuel González Prada, Miami: Universal, 1993
Sánchez, Luis Alberto, Mito y realidad de González Prada, Lima: Villanueva, 1976
José Gorostiza 1901–1979

Mexican poet and critic
José Gorostiza is assured of a lasting place at the heart of the Mexican literary canon. He belongs to that select band of writers whose reputation rests mainly on one work and whose output, though slim, nevertheless manages to be a source of endless fascination. Muerte sin fin (Death without End), his 1939 poem, is among the finest in the Spanish language, and takes its place alongside Eliot’s The Wasteland (1922) or Valéry’s Le Cimetière marin (1920) as one of the pinnacles of sustained poetic achievement in the 20th century.

In the early part of the 20th century, debates on the virtues of championing a national discourse as opposed to articulating a universal literary language raged among intellectuals in Mexico. As one of the most prominent members of the Contemporáneos group of writers and thinkers, Gorostiza’s literary stance in the late 1920s and early 1930s was firmly on the side of the “universal” Western literary canon. Indeed the overwhelming impression left by Gorostiza’s work is of a language suspended in time and space, a literary landscape of absolutes. This is a poetry of timeless essences which commands our attention as an example of the triumph of the human intellect. The elements of Gorostiza’s eclecticism are many and varied: Catholic philosophy and esoteric mysticism; French poetry and German philosophy; Mexican images of death and the music of classical verse.

Gorostiza’s early work is characterised by certain key influences. As with many other young Latin American poets of the first decades of the 20th century, the influence of Dario and other modernistas is never absent. López Velarde casts an unmistakable shadow. In addition, Gorostiza’s profound interest in Eastern mysticism, fuelled both by readings of the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayam and of the work of Rabindranath Tagore, imbue even his earliest writings with a sense of religious transcendence.

Gorostiza’s first published collection of poetry, Canciones para cantar en las barcas, 1925 [Boating Songs], can be read as a poetic essay on the musicality of language. The art of prosody can seldom have appeared so effortless: there is rhythmic sophistication in these poems; their resonant counterpoints are as compelling as they are haunting. The language is brilliant in its simplicity, moderating flights of poetic fancy with an ear for the music of colloquial expression. It would be easy, therefore, to write off these early poems as youthful exercises in the rhetoric of poetry. But the simplicity is deceptive. In every stanza’s sparing use of language, a close reading uncovers layers of ambiguity. As the undulating ebb and flow of the rhythms lull us gently into a sense of the familiar, the image of something darker lurks indistinctly in the gloom. That something, inevitably, is death.

If death is never far away from Gorostiza’s early poetry, it becomes positively central to his mature output. Muerte sin fin, as its title suggests, represents an intense meditation on the topic. It is impossible to overstate the importance of this poem in Mexican literature. For over a decade, Gorostiza had published no verse, and when the poem appeared in 1938, it seemed to come from nowhere. Many of the concerns and the unmistakable voice were reminiscent of the work of other members of the Contemporáneos group, especially Xavier Villaurrutia. But from the outset, it was apparent that here was something more, a poem worthy of standing alone at the centre of the Mexican canon.

The poem has probably been subjected to more interpretation than any other single Mexican text, with the exception of Juan Rulfo’s Pedro Páramo. It is as complex as it is compelling. Its network of allusions spreads out from the image of a simple glass of water, and embarks upon a series of speculations on the “essences” of human existence: life, love, death and God. By specifically calling on human intelligence to guide him, Gorostiza creates a verbal texture in which such ideas become tangible. In an epic theological struggle with the infinite and with contingency, the poem’s interrogation of Being and of the essence of time is rigorous to the point of intellectual violence, every stanza glimpsing apocalyptic catastrophe. The insistent and inescapable call of death and the devil threaten throughout to send us spiralling into a nihilistic nightmare. But language, intelligence and irony remain intact in a conclusion which ultimately reifies poetry itself and the depth and penetration of its own peculiar logic. The meaning of meaning undergoes a radical, inexorable shift.

Muerte sin fin belongs to the tradition of long poetic explorations which includes Luis de Góngora’s Soledades (The Solitudes) and the Primero sueño (Sor Juana’s Dream) of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. It recalls the work of Eliot, Valéry and Guillén; but it also has philosophical antecedents. In the reification of concepts and the positing of a realm of the intellect, the pulse of a contemporary Platonism can be discerned, pumping new life into the sounds and images of 20th-century Mexico. Some have even convincingly suggested that the theological world of the poem belongs to a Cabalistic universe of divine emanations, in which at the court of transcendent divinity Intelligence presides majestically, and in which the World triumphs in its role in the fundamental principles of creation.

Such readings suggest that the poem is dealing with a universal set of ideas as opposed to evoking a Mexican reality. But the truth is that Muerte sin fin is without doubt a Mexican poem. Although the tone of the poem is suffused with the highflown and philosophical discourses of European traditions, there are constant references to the speech-patterns, sounds, sights and beliefs of Mexico. There is evidence that by the time of completing the poem, Gorostiza had modified the hostility which he had once felt towards the social-realists’ demands for a nationalistic literature, and it is fair to say that Muerte sin fin, amongst other things, stands as the consummate poetic act of balancing the universal and the Mexican.

Although some other poems appeared in 1964 in a retrospective volume entitled Poesía, Gorostiza’s poetic reputation rests chiefly on Muerte sin fin. Its influence has been farreaching, especially on Octavio Paz, whose Piedra de sol (Sun Stone), another high-point of Mexican learned poetry, is unquestionably indebted to Gorostiza’s poetics.

Apart from his poetry, Gorostiza also wrote lucid and uncompromising prose, in which the intellectual honesty of the poems is exercised on topics such as music, theatre, painting, and literary theory. The prose style is uncomplicated and yet refined. In Notas sobre poesía, 1955 [Notes on Poetry], Gorostiza articulates brilliantly his personal poetics in which poetic form is elevated to a position of singular pre-eminence, and in which the poet is like a prophet embarking on a delicate mission, enacting miracles in the name of the divine. From another writer, such a claim might seem bombastic or arrogant. Coming as it does from the author of Muerte sin fin, it seems eminently reasonable.
MAURICE BIRIOTTI

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry
Canciones para cantar en las barcas, Mexico City: Cultura, 1925
Muerte sin fin, Mexico City: Cultura, 1939; as Death without End, translated by Laura Villaseñor, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1969

Compilations and Anthologies
Poesía, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1964
Prosa, edited by Miguel Capistrán, Guanajuato, Mexico: Universidad de Guanajuato, 1969
Cauces de la poesía mexicana y otros textos, edited by José Emilio Pacheco, Mexico City: UNAM, 1988

Further Reading
Gelpí, Juan G., Enunciación y dependencia en José Gorostiza: estudio de una máscara poética, Mexico City: UNAM, 1984
Paz, Octavio, “Muerte sin fin,” in his Las peras del olmo, Mexico City: UNAM, 1957
Sheridan, Guillermo, Los Contemporáneos ayer, Mexico City: UNAM, 1985
Xirau, Ramón, Tres poetas de la soledad: Villaurrutia, Gorostiza, Paz, Mexico City: Robredo, 1955
Juana Manuela Gorriti 1818–1892

Argentine prose writer and feminist

A distinguished writer of narrative fiction and renowned organizer of 19th-century cultural life in Lima and Buenos Aires, Juana Manuela Gorriti, like so many other intellectual women of her time, has slipped into oblivion and only a few of her works are readily available to today’s readers. Born and brought up within a landowning family torn by the ideological conflicts of civil war, she learned early in her life about the relentless overlapping of the personal and the political, a conflict she explored later in her work. Her first novella, “La quena,” 1845 [The Reed Flute], included in her first collection of stories Sueños y realidades, 1865 [Dreams and Realities], found its source of inspiration in the historic theme of the conquest. However, unlike other contemporary Indianist romances where the conquest is treated as epic, Gorriti’s work attempted to rewrite history from the point of view of the marginalised: women and the Indians. Rejecting his father’s Christian, Hispanic tradition, the first generation mestizo hero identifies with his mother’s Quechua culture and is punished for it. Gorriti consistently used the family unit as an allegory of the nation. Hence in “La quena,” the potentiality of family relations is destroyed by conflicting ideological forces embodied in the struggle between Spanish father and mestizo son, and between Spanish father and creole daughter. Her reading of the problem of family life in a continent founded on rape and colonisation was extended to republican settings in her Peruvian story “Si haces mal no esperes bien” [Do Not Expect Good if You Do Evil] and in her Argentine battle narratives. In “El guante negro” [The Black Glove], “La novia del muerto” [The Dead Man’s Bride], “El lucero del manantia” [The Star of the Spring] and “El pozo del Yocci” [The Well of Yocci], the national struggle between the forces of civilization and barbarism is embodied in uncompliant wives, daughters and mothers who engage in dramatic and often violent confrontation with rosista patriarchs, not seldom paying with their own lives. Their dissenting voices enter the territory of the fantastic as their defeated ghosts appear in the epilogue roaming the deserted battlefields where the nation’s future was being fought out.

Gorriti’s work was also a critical response to the “Argentine Generation of 1837,” the liberal intelligentsia devoted to the project of national progress. By weaving the logic of dreams, intuition and Fatum into historical narratives, she was successful at undermining the chronological, rational discourse revered by liberal intellectuals, whilst at the same time writing women into national history. In the story “Güemes: recuerdos de la infancia” [Güemes: Childhood Memories], which purports to narrate the defeat of General Lavalle’s army by Rosas’s forces from a feminine perspective, the discourse of Fatum, rich in omens, dreams and presentiments, creeps in to undermine the progress of the chronological battle narrative which has no benefit of hindsight. As a result, the historical narrative is impaired as the signs of death are scattered throughout the text even before the hero prepares to march into the battlefield.

Gorriti was also successful in exploring the personal and private stories of women and inserting them into narratives about the nation’s historical past and present. Thus the ideological differentiation between the public sphere of men and the private, domestic sphere of women was blurred. This practice of deconstructing the distinctions established by the dominant binary system of thought is taken to the very heart of her narrative strategy in her novel Peregrinaciones de una alma triste [Peregrinations of a Sorrowful Soul], anthologised in Panoramas de la vida, 1876 [Panoramas of Life]. The heroine, a modern Scheherazade languishing in her domestic prison where she must remain under prescription of her authoritarian medical doctor, decides to take responsibility for her own health and to find a less oppressive cure. This she finds in travelling and writing about her experiences in her long journey across the subcontinent. The stories of the Mocovi and the Guarani Indians of the Chaco, the laments of women in search of their dead sons and husbands in the Argentine pampas, and the plight of the black slaves of Brazil, are all integrated in a kaleidoscopic narrative through the voice of the heroine/narrator who reminisces about her experiences for the benefit of her interlocutor/reader. The narrator/heroine’s journey into independent womanhood and health is thus achieved through direct contact with the different indigenous groups that she meets alone in her “peregrination.” These groups, represented within specific racial, religious, sexual and cultural identities, stand in opposition to the idea, so intensely explored by contemporary intellectuals, of unified and discrete national identities.

Although the concept of nation, modernity and progress is subtly dismantled in Gorriti’s narrative fiction, her later work explored modern themes particularly when they touched women’s lives. This is particularly clear in Oasis en la vida, 1888 [An Oasis in Life], where the argument for savings and investment is interwoven with a love story between a male writer and a working woman. However, much of Gorriti’s work deals with the irrational in history, and this is perhaps why it has not been included in a canon of Latin American literature written from a modern, positivist and masculinist perspective.

FRANCESCA DENEGRI

---

Biography

Born at Horcones ranch, province of Salta, in northwest Argentina, 15 June 1818. Both parents of Spanish descent. Father fought in War of Independence against Spain. Seventh of eight children. Early years spent on army base at Horcones where her father was the commanding officer. Self-taught because she did not take to the convent school where she was sent at an early age. Married Bolivian army officer, Manuel Belzú, in 1833 when she was fourteen. Couple settled in La Paz. Belzú exiled for conspiracy in 1845 and couple, with their two daughters, settled in Lima. When Belzú returned to Bolivia, Juana Manuela did not accompany him. Instead, she opened a primary school and another for young ladies to support her family. Two more children born to her while she was in Lima. Organized successful literary salon or “veladas literarias.” Unique occasions owing to the inclusion of women and their concerns: education and job-training. Belzú assassinated in La Paz where Gorriti pronounced an oration at his wake in the presence of a crowd of several thousands. Granted pension in Argentina as daughter of General Juan Ignacio Gorriti. Founded the newspaper La Alborada [The Dawn]. Died in Buenos Aires of pneumonia, 6 November 1892.
Selected Works

A detailed breakdown of the contents of each of the volumes listed below is to be found in Women Writers of Spanish America: an Annotated Bio-Biographical Guide, edited by Diane E. Marting, Westport, Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1987

- Un año en California, Buenos Aires: El Nacional, 1846
- Sueños y realidades, 2 vols, Buenos Aires: Casavalle, 1865
- Biografía del general Don Dionisio de Puch, Paris: n.p., 1868
- Panoramas de la vida; colección de novelas, fantasías, leyendas y descripciones americanas, Buenos Aires: Casavalle, 1876
- Misceláneas; colección de leyendas, juicios, pensamientos, discurcos, impresiones de viaje y descripciones americanas, Buenos Aires: Imprenta de M. Biedma, 1878
- El mundo de los recuerdos, Buenos Aires: Felix Lajouane, 1886
- Oasis en la vida, Buenos Aires: Felix Lajouane, 1888
- La tierra natal, Buenos Aires: Felix Lajouane, 1889
- Cocina ecléctica, Buenos Aires: Felix Lajouane, 1890
- Perfiles (Primera parte), Buenos Aires: Felix Lajouane, 1892
- Veladas literarias de Lima, 1876–1877; tomo primero, veladas I a X, Buenos Aires: Imprenta Europea, 1892.
- Lo íntimo de Juana Manuela Gorriti, Buenos Aires: Ramón Espasa, 1893
- El tesoro de los incas (leyenda histórica), Buenos Aires: Universidad de Buenos Aires, Instituto de Literatura Argentina, 1929

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading

Guerra-Cunningham, Lucía, “Vision marginal de la historia en la narrativa de Juana Manuela Gorriti,” Ideologies and Literature, vol. 2/2 (Fall 1987)

Graça Aranha, José Pereira da

See Aranha

Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala Died c.1615

Chronicler of the colonial period

The Nueva Corónica y Buen Gobierno (Letter to a King), a 1,200-page address to the King Philip III of Spain, was written shortly after the conquest, between the late 16th and early 17th centuries. It was rediscovered in 1908 at the Royal Library in Copenhagen. The details of its route to this unlikely resting place is only one of the mysteries surrounding the book and its author, Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala.

We know of Guaman Poma that he was a 16th-century Quechua-speaking ladino (or Spanish-acculturated) Indian from the Ayacucho region of the Peruvian southern Andes. Despite the scale of this work, and the space its author devotes to presenting himself and his background, little can be taken for granted as reliable autobiographical information. The reason for this has to do with the Nueva Corónica’s very discursive premise: Guaman Poma was moved to write to the king to complain of colonialist abuses, and to vindicate preColumbian Andean culture, as well as to better his own and his family’s position under the new regime. Therefore he indulges in much of the self-aggrandisement common in petitionary literature of the era. Among his family, he claims, is a “saint,” his half-brother Martin de Ayala: an ambassador and Inca’s “deputy”—his father Guaman Mallqui; and a Coya (an indigenous term usually, if inaccurately translated as “queen”) in the form of his mother, doña Juana. Guaman Mallqui, it is argued, represented the Inca Huáscar in welcoming the conquistador Pizarro on his first arrival in Peru. He also saved the life of a Spanish captain in battle, according to his son. Most of these claims, historians agree, are highly dubious. They are also arguably essential to the success of his enterprise.

The author, then, is speaking from a position, albeit false, of equal validity in both Andean and European cultures: he is close to religious sanctity (Martin’s “sainthood”), is linked to the indigenous nobility through both parents, and has associations with loyalty to the Spanish crown through both diplomatic and military channels. Accordingly, Guaman Poma is obliged to vindicate his position according to two quite disparate cultural traditions, primarily using the tools of the newly dominant culture: the Spanish language, which he handles with great inventiveness as well as some discomfort, and the technique of writing. European historiography is also employed, as are the humanist ideas of Bartolomé de Las Casas and other opponents of Spain’s exploitation of the Indies.

The Nueva Corónica is also notable for its illustrations: around four hundred ink drawings, displaying both European Baroque influences and the traces of indigenous visual codes, bolster the author’s main arguments. These can be summarised as follows: indigenous Andean culture is essentially valid despite alleged Devil-worship among the first Incas, protoChristian elements can be seen in native religious tradition. Guaman Poma supports his position with a wealth of ethnographic detail, including descriptions of ritual, Quechua song and dance, and agricultural cycles. He nevertheless defends the central authority of the Spanish monarchy as a global organising principle, and presents a Mapamundi arranged along the same lines as the Inca realm: divided into four parts, with a strong and immutable centre (Castile, rather than the Inca capital Cuzco). However, Guaman Poma is bitter and fiercely satirical in his attack on the crown’s representatives in the Indies: one of his drawings characterises both ecclesiastical and secular authorities as wild, rapacious beasts consuming the hapless Indian, whose depiction is similar to that given by Las Casas. Guaman Poma argues for ethnic segregation in order to preserve not only identity but also morality: only vice and corruption can result from the proximity of Indian and Spaniard. Into this equation comes the Negro, given a separate chapter in which Guaman Poma adopts a sympathetic tone, despite the usual role of African slaves as henchmen forcing the Indians to serve Spain.

Guaman Poma’s stance on most issues, then, is ambivalent. His defence of indigenous culture must be seen in contrast to his participation in 16th-century extirpation campaigns. The list of Inca rulers incorporated into the work implies approval of the dynasty, but favours certain rulers at the expense of others. Reasons for this are varied: the Incas had overrun Guaman Poma’s home province of Lucanas and made enemies there, as elsewhere in the Andes, and he had no interest in the kind of pro-Cuzco stance taken by Peru’s other great Andean mestizo chronicler, El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega, whose mother belonged to the Inca nobility. The author is also at pains to distance himself from those who opposed the Spanish invasion, although he maintains that indigenous resistance was minimal and factional. Paradoxically, Inca forms of social organisation are largely praised and often held up as a model for the future of the colony. However, the outlook is bleak and the author has recourse to the image of a “world upsidedown,” then common in European satire, to render the cataclysm which had befallen the inhabitants of Spain’s new possessions.

Other aspects of the Nueva Corónica, appear less selfcontradictory: the anticlericalism which might appear to undermine Guaman Poma’s claims to Christian rectitude was common enough in Spain and elsewhere in Europe at the time. This, like several of his stances, seems to have been borrowed from his reading of contemporary Spanish thinkers. As is the case with other indigenous writings or testimonies of the early colonial era such as those by Pachacuti Yamqui or Titu Cusi, Guaman Poma has to maintain a credible discursive position whilst appeasing those in power. This leads to a form of presentation which is eclectic and multi-faceted, using a gamut of literary styles and a sometimes bewildering juxtaposition of arguments. Nevertheless this is one of the most powerful and illuminating documents to have emerged since the conquest; voicing outrage and despair whilst addressing the future of the Andean region as inescapably subject to foreign domination; assimilating outside influences whilst minimising their damage. Guaman Poma’s document contains many of the salient features of later Latin American literature and is one of the most powerful examples of the indigenous use of writing as a response to the Spanish presence and an assimilation of new political and social realities.

KEITH J. RICHARDS
Biography

The available information on Guaman Poma’s life is very sketchy. His date of birth is not known and it is only thought that he died in Lima in 1615. He felt intensely the suffering and deprivations of his own (Inca) people and travelled around the viceroyalty of Peru recording his experiences. He only returned home in old age, declaring then that he wished to travel to Spain to make the king aware of the unjust treatment of his fellow Indians. But he was unable to realize this intention owing to ill health. The manuscript of his Nueva Corónica y Buen Gobierno was discovered in 1908 by Robert Pietschmann in the Copenhagen Royal Library.

Work

Further Reading

Adorno, Rolena (editor), From Oral to Written Expression: Native Andean Chronicles from the Early Colonial Period, Syracuse, New York: Syracuse University, 1982,

___ Writing and Resistance in Colonial Peru, Austin, Texas: Dolphin Press, 1986

___ Icono y conquista, Madrid: Hiperión, 1988

Ortega, Julio, “El cronista indio Guaman Poma y la conciencia cultural pluralista en el Perú colonial,” Nueva Revista de Filología Hispánica, vol. 36/1 (1986)

___ “Guaman Poma y la producción del texto,” in his Crítica de la identidad: la pregunta por el Perú en su literatura, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1988

Ossio, Juan M. (editor), Ideología mesiánica del mundo andino, Lima: Ignacio Prado Pastor, 1973

Guatemala

19th-and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

Guatemala is the largest of the Central American republics and the most Indian of all the countries of Latin America. Its landscapes—lakes, volcanoes, maize-planted valleys, cloud-forest—are among the most beautiful in the world. Yet its history must be reckoned one of the most violent and sombre in the region. In the 20th century, events have taken such a tragic turn that most writers have been forced into active political commitment. In few countries has it been more dangerous to record opinions in writing: exile or death have been the normal rewards.

Nevertheless Guatemala has a very rich cultural history for a country of its size. It was at the centre of Central American life throughout the colonial period: indeed, in a curious way it replicated within Central America itself the impact of Mexico on the whole of Middle America including Guatemala. Moreover Guatemala was the focal point of the maize-based Maya empire attacked and destroyed by Cortés’s most ruthless subordinate, Pedro de Alvarado, after 1524. It was there that extraordinary semi-mythological “chronicles” such as the Popol Vuh or “Quiché Bible” and “dramas” like the Rabinal Achi were written down in the decades after the conquest, and these works have formed a crucial point of departure for contemporary Guatemalan literature and culture which only in the 20th century has that country begun fully to assimilate. Their importance can hardly be overstated, however, precisely because the whole history of the country has been dominated by the desperate struggle of the “Ladinos” (whites first and mestizos later) to subjugate the “Indian” majority. Guatemalan literature reflects this struggle both materially—there have been few “Indian” writers, even though the country’s foundational works are, as we have seen, Indian—and thematically.

No other Latin American republic had either the cultural antecedents or the nascent literary tradition which Guatemala was developing during the colonial period. Not surprisingly, this allowed the growth of a distinctly conservative literary mode in the 19th century, despite the influence of leading independence intellectuals like José Cecilio del Valle (1777–1834, born in Honduras), and Pedro Molina (1777–1854). The outstanding Guatemalan writer of the period was undoubtedly José Batres Montúfar (1809–1944), who in his brief romantic life wrote accomplished lyrics and remarkable comic narrative poems called Tradiciones de Guatemala [Guatemalan Traditions] which in many respects anticipate the Peruvian Ricardo Palma’s much admired stories Tradiciones peruanas, and are scarcely inferior to them. Don Pablo and El relox [The Clock] are among the best known. Batres Montúfar’s only rival, in terms of literary achievement, is another Romantic poet, Juan Diéguez (1813–66).

Guatemalan fiction truly begins with Antonio José de Irisarri (1786–1868), author of two novels El cristiano errante, 1847 [The Wandering Christian] and Historia del perinclito Epaminondas del Cauca, 1863 [History of the Incomparable Epaminondas of the Cauca], and, more importantly, with José Milla y Vidaurre (1822–82), author of costumbrista and historical novels mainly based on the colonial period, though other works such as Un viaje al otro mundo pasando por otras partes, 1874 [A Journey to the Other World and Other Destinations] are also noteworthy. Milla is to Guatemalan literature what Dickens is to English literature, and it was he who invented Guatemala’s national representative figure, Juan Chapín. Guatemala also had, in Ramón A. Salazar (1852–1914), a novelist of Realist intentions; in Enrique Martínez Sobral (1875–1950), a disciple of Zola, with titles like Humo [Smoke] and El alcohol; and in Máximo Soto Hall (1871–1944), a similarly styled writer who initiated the antiimperialist novel with El problema (1899) followed by La sombra de la Casa Blanca [The Shadow of the White House] in 1927.

Central America, together with the Caribbean, was one of the focal points of Spanish American Modernismo, thanks largely but not uniquely to the joint influence, both complementary and contrasting, of the Nicaraguan Rubén Darío and the Cuban José Martí, both of whom made subsequently mythologized visits to Guatemala at important moments of their own lives. The major contributions made by Darío and Martí to poetry in Spanish, and the award to the Guatemalan Miguel Ángel Asturias in 1967 of the first Nobel Prize ever given to a Latin American novelist, have helped to ensure that the role of these small Balkanized or island republics has not been a minor one. Guatemalan modernista poets include Domingo Estrada (1928–39), and María Cruz (1876–1915); but Guatemala’s main claim to fame in this period was the work of the extraordinary Enrique Gómez Carrillo (1873–1927), undoubtedly the most influential prose writer of turn-of-the-century Latin America—despite the fact (or more likely because of it) that it was in Paris, not Latin America, where he spent most of his life. Reputedly a great lover and undeniably a scandalously fluent producer of facile but intoxicating chronicles about the delights of the Old World, Gómez Carrillo was the metaphorical seducer of an entire generation of young Guatemalan—and not only Guatemalan—would-be literati.

In the colonial period Guatemalan literature, like that of all Spanish America, was dominated by Spanish concepts not only of genre and style but also of what was considered appropriate and indeed permissible within the colonial context. In the 19th century other notions began to be more influential: Scott’s view of the historical novel, for example, or French ideas about literary schools and movements. Later, Modernismo arrived and provided a crucial miscegenation of French and Spanish American currents. After this writers began to be grouped into “generations”—showing the continuing influence of Spanish attitudes—and then, after the avant-garde decade of the 1920s, with its multifarious “isms,” they also became organized in “movements.”

The key writer of the 1910 Generation—the last pre-modern generation, one might say—was Rafael Arévalo Martínez (1884–1975). Although active in many literary forms—poetry, novel, essay, autobiography—Arévalo Martínez is immortalized as a short story writer, above all for “El hombre que parecía un caballo,” 1914 [The Man Who Looked Like a Horse], inspired by his relationship with the bohemian Colombian poet Porfirio Barba-Jacob. This curious work, transitional between the modernista short story and the fictions of Borges, has appeared in numerous anthologies of Latin American short fiction.

For all his success and influence within Guatemala, however, the prolific Arévalo Martínez is a transitional figure, not one installed within post World War I modernity. Guatemala had been gradually transformed between 1871 and 1885 by the Liberal policies of Justo Rufino Barrios, who had curtailed clerical power, modernized and centralized the economy, and initiated a new agricultural pattern based first on coffee and later on, bananas. Between 1898 and 1920 the country was ruled by the ruthless Manuel Estrada Cabrera, who carried out a “Porfirián” policy of severe repression combined with rapid economic modernization. It was his regime that Miguel Ángel Asturias later depicted in El señor Presidente, 1946 (The President). As early as 1904 Cabrera allowed the penetration of the United Fruit Company—permanently demonized, in its turn, by Asturias’s Trilogía bananera or Banana Trilogy. This consisted of Viento fuerte, 1949 (The Cyclone); El papa verde, 1954 (The Green Pope) and Los ojos de los enterrados, 1960 (The Eyes of the Interred). The company monopolized the route to the Gulf coast and its only port, Puerto Barrios, as well as controlling International Railways of Central America. After Cabrera fell, the 1920s saw a confused period of dubiously elected governments, usually headed by soldiers. In 1931 Colonel Jorge Ubico, a nationalist right-wing soldier, came to power and held it until 1944. Ubico, a fascist sympathiser, used vagrancy laws to direct Indian labour to seasonal work on the coast once the debt peonage system was ended.

It was this violent, ideologically confusing and disarticulated period which provided the background for the rise of the so-called Generation of 1920, without doubt the most important in Guatemala in the 20th century. It included César Brañas (1900–76), much admired inside the country though almost unknown elsewhere; Flavio Herrera (1895–1968), author of successful, melodramatically naturalistic novels like El tigre, 1935 [The Tiger] and La tempestad, 1935 [The Storm]; Alfonso Orantes (1898–); Carlos Samayoa Aguilar (1899–1978); Carlos Samayoa Chinchilla (1898–1973), author of Madre milpa, 1934 [Mother Maizefield] and the documentary El dictador y yo, 1950 [The Dictator and I] about his experience working for Ubico; Arqueles Vela (1898–1977); Alberto Velázquez (1891–1968); Carlos Wyld Ospina (1891–1956), author of the documentary El autócrata, 1929 [The Autocrat], about Estrada Cabrera, and several influential works of fiction, El solar de los Gonzagas, 1924 [The Ancestral Home of the Gonzagas], La tierra de las Nahuyacas, 1933 [The Land of the Nahuyacas], stories, La Gringa (1935) and Los lares apagados, 1958 [The Cold Hearths], stories; and two important writerjournalists, Clemente Marroquín Rojas (1897–1978) and David Vela (1901–).

Without a doubt, however, the two giants of the generation were Miguel Ángel Asturias (1899–1974) and Luis Cardoza y Aragón (1904–92), both of whom spent most of their adult lives outside Guatemala (as did the two outstanding writers of later generations, Mario Monteforte Toledo and Augusto Monterroso). Asturias is the author of Leyendas de Guatemala (1930), El señor Presidente, Hombres de maíz, 1949 (Men of Maize), an authentic Latin American literary monument, the Trilogía bananera (1950–60; mentioned above, and Mulata de tal, 1963 [Mulatta]. Asturias is unarguably the most important novelist to have emerged from Central America. Cardoza y Aragón was a leading poet, essayist and art critic, editor of the influential Revista de Guatemala after the 1944 Revolution. The essay Guatemala: las líneas de su mano, 1955 [Guatemala: the Lines of Her Hand] is probably his best-known work, though collections of poetry like Luna Park (1923), Pequeña sinfonía del Nuevo Mundo, 1948 [Brief Symphony of the New World] and Quinta estación, 1972 [Fifth Season] were also influential.

Several members of the 1920 Generation were able to escape the country and to profit from interaction with the international avant-garde. The 1930 Generation was less fortunate and was forced to live through the dark years of the 1930s under the dictatorship of Ubico (1931–44). It was at this point that a number of young writers formed a group called “los Tepeus,” which, without rejecting the 1920s avant-garde, took a more considered and programmatic approach to social and political matters through the development of a creolist, regionalist and indigenist mode. These writers included Alfredo Balsells Rivera (1904–40), the leading poet of the 1930s and author of El venadeado y otros cuentos [The Ambush and Other Stories], published posthumously in 1958; Francisco Méndez (1907–62), author of the much underrated Cuentos de Joyabaj, 1957 [Tales of Joyabaj]; Miguel Marsicovetere y Durán (1912–) and Oscar Mirón Álvarez (1910–38). However the best-known members of the generation were Mario Monteforte Toledo (1911–) and Manuel Galich (1913–), both of whom took an active part in the 1944 Revolution and both of whom eventually became government ministers.
Galich was a student leader in the 1940s, became a leading dramatist and testimonialist exiled after 1954, and spent his later years as an influential theatre critic and revolutionary doctrinaire in Cuba. Monteforte is one of Guatemala’s most colourful intellectual figures, an outstanding academic and essayist but best known for indigenist novels like Anaité (1948), Entre la piedra y la cruz, 1948 [Between the Stone and the Cross] and Y vinieron del mar, 1963 [And they Came from the Sea], and for political novels like Donde acaban los caminos, 1953 [Where the Roads End] and Una manera de morir, 1957 [A Way of Dying].

The “Acento” Group, founded in 1943 by members of the Generation of 1940, was perhaps the first explicitly political literary group in Guatemala and openly supported the 1944 Revolution. It included Otto Raúl González (1921–), director of the review also called Acento. He was exiled in Mexico after 1954, but was finally recognized as one of the nation’s leading poets when he won the Premio Nacional Literario Miguel Ángel Asturias in 1990. Other important members were Raúl Leiva (1916–75), assistant editor of Cardoza’s Revista de Guatemala, exiled in 1954 to Mexico and author of Palabra en el tiempo, 1975 [Word in Time]; Enrique Juárez Toledo (1922–), poet and diplomat; Carlos Solórzano (1922–), a playwright and teacher-critic who spent most of his adult life in Mexico; Carlos Illescas (1918–), an excellent poet and yet another writer forced into exile in Mexico; and Augusto Monterroso (1921–), widely considered to be Guatemala’s outstanding short-story writer of the century, author of astonishingly original collections like Obras completas y otros cuentos, 1959 [Complete Works and Other Stories], La oveja negra y demás fábulas, 1969 [The Black Sheep and Other Fables], Movimiento perpetuo, 1972 [Perpetual Motion] and several other important works. He is compared frequently—and never unfavourably—to Jorge Luis Borges and Juan José Arreola.

The 1944–54 Revolution, led by Juan José Arévalo and Jacobo Arbenz, was the most important political event in the history of 20th-century Guatemala. It allowed the belated assimilation of some of the literary discoveries of the 1920 Generation, including the combined effect of the 1920s avantgarde and, more particularly, the kinds of cultural policy initiated by the Mexican Revolution. The “Grupo Saker-ti” (1948–54), formed by the artists and writers of the Revolution itself, was perhaps the most cohesive and influential of all Guatemala’s literary groups, a liberal-left coalition associated closely though not exclusively with the Guatemalan Communist Party (PGT). The name means “dawn” in Maya-Quiché. Its 1950 manifesto called for a “democratic, nationalist and realist” art form. The group included Miguel Ángel Vázquez (1922–), a key writer of the Revolution, whose output included poetry and the 1976 novel La semilla del fuego [The Seed of Fire]; Abelardo Rodas (1930–80); Roberto Paz y Paz (1927–), author of the novel La inteligencia (1967); Julio Fausto Aguilera (1928–); and Oscar Arturo Palencia (1932–81), associated with the movement both as political activist and poet, exiled from his country and murdered on his return in 1981. Saker-ti was also supported by established writers like Monterroso, Leiva, Juárez Toledo and Illescas. Other writers of this period included a vigorous dramatist Hugo Carrillo (1928–), who adapted several of Asturias’s novels for the stage as well as writing plays of his own, the journalist and essayist Jaime Díaz Rozzotto, and one of the most popular poets of the century, Werner Ovalle López (1928–68).

The 1954 US-backed invasion and coup led by Castillo Armas was a decisive event in the history of Latin America—Che Guevara was an impotent spectator and drew farreaching conclusions—and a catastrophe for democracy in Guatemala for decades to come. It led inexorably to forty years of renewed violence and, eventually, to nationwide horror on a scale unknown since the conquest. A whole generation of Guatemalan writers went into exile, mainly to Mexico, most never to return for any significant period of time. The new generations were effectively orphaned; and they rebelled against their new masters.

For this reason the post-1954 generation has been called the “Committed Generation.” It united around the opposition to the military regimes which followed the Castillo Armas coup and remained a more or less cohesive group until around 1970. It coincided with the early guerrilla campaigns of the now legendary César Montes and Luis Turcios Lima of the FAR, Bernardo Alvarado Monzón of the PGT and Marco Antonio Yon Sosa of the MR-13 from the early 1960s. Writers included the essayists José Luis Balcárcel and Roberto Díaz Castillo; Arqueles Morales (1936–89), once Asturias’s secretary in Argentina, who lived in Nicaragua after the 1979 Revolution and died in Cuba; the poet Leonor Paz y Paz (1932–); and the campaigning social novelist José María López Valdizón (1929–75), author of La sangre del maíz, 1966 [Blood of the Maize]. However the great figure of the generation, and an example beyond the borders of Guatemala, was the poet Otto René Castillo (1936–67), a member of the PGT who, exiled in Eastern Europe, joined the guerrilla group FAR and was eventually tortured and murdered by the army in Zacapa. His oeuvre is a classic of revolutionary romanticism, including Vámonos patria a caminar, 1965 [Come Walk with Me, My Country], whose title poem has become a Guatemalan revolutionary anthem, and Informe de una injusticia, 1975 [Report on an Injustice].

After the death of Otto René Castillo in 1967, the “Grupo Nuevo Signo” was set up in 1968, oriented more to social and cultural matters generally than to politics as such, and turning again to Indian and regional concerns. Its founders included Luis Alfredo Arango (1935–), a neo-indigenist poet who won the National Literary Prize in 1988; Francisco Morales Santos (1940–), later the first president of the Community of Guatemalan Writers (1988), whose poetry is collected in Archivador de pueblos, 1977 [Archivist of Towns]; the younger poet Delia Quiñónez (1946–), author of Barro pleno, 1968 [Fullness of Earth]; and veterans José Luis Villatoro (1932–), poet of the everyday, non-magical Indian, as in Pedro a secas, 1968 [Just Pedro], Julio Fausto Aguilara (1929–), formerly of Saker-ti, and Roberto Obregón (1940–70), author of Poesía de barro, 1966 [Poetry of Clay], a member of the Committed Generation, like Castillo, who met a similar tragic fate when he disappeared on the Salvadoran border in 1981. Nuevo Signo was closely associated with the university journal Alero, one of Latin America’s best at the time, and sought a new form of social, colloquial, “unpoetic” poetry, as an antidote to the supposedly exotic view of the Indians conveyed by writers like Asturias.

Up to this point few women have been mentioned—indeed, it remains the case that women novelists are extremely rare in Guatemala. But there have been many women poets and, as elsewhere in Latin America in the 1970s, women’s writing began to take on a perceptibly feminist note. Important examples are Delia Quiñónez, already mentioned; Luz Méndez de la Vega (1929–), author of Eva sin Dios, 1979 [Eve without God]; Alaïde Foppa, born in Spain to a Guatemalan mother and an Argentine father, exiled to Mexico after 1954, author of the very audacious Elogio de mi cuerpo, 1970 [In Praise of My Body] and Las palabras y el tiempo, 1979 [Words and Time], and “disappeared” on a brief visit to the country in 1980; Margarita Carrera (1929–), who wrote Del noveno círculo, 1977 [About The Ninth Circle] and Siglo veinte, 1985 [Twentieth Century]; Aída Toledo, author of Realidad más extraña que el sueño, 1994 [Truth Stranger than Fiction]; Julia Esquivel, a poet both religious and political who has taken refuge in Mexico; and Caly Domitila Cane’k, a social worker and teacher who ran a Cakchiquel radio programme and is now exiled in the US. But undoubtedly the best-known recent woman poet is the redoubtable Ana María Rodas (1937–), whose Poemas de la izquierda erotica [Poems of the Erotic Left] exploded on the literary scene in 1973 and questioned the machismo not only of the right but of the heroic guerrillas in poems that were cynical, bitter and unyielding. She later became the third president of the Guatemalan community of Writers (1990).

A similarly sceptical group of poets formed the “Grupo Moira” in the 1970s, led by the charismatic Manuel José Arce (1935–85), who was also an excellent playwright and a polemical, crusading journalist; together with Luz Méndez, mentioned above, teacher, feminist poet and a key member of the “RIN-78” group later in the same decade. Other noteworthy poets of the last two decades are José Barnoya (1931–), Edwin Cifuentes (192.6–), Rafael Gutiérrez (1958–) and Enrique Noriega (1948–), iconoclastic author of Oh banalidad and Libreta del centauro copulante, 1994 [Notebook of the Copulating Centaur].
political commitment, sought their own new way of writing. Miguel Ángel Vázquez wrote La semilla del fuego, already mentioned, a retrospective assessment of the Ubico regime (a later novel, Operación Iscariote, 1989 [Operation Iscariot]—looked at the end of the Arbenz era). Carlos Cojulén Bedoya (1914–) wrote ¡ Violencia! (1979), a curiously melodramatic novel about the misadventures of a young Guatemalan girl of her times. The decisive work however was by Marco Antonio Flores (1937–), Los compañeros, 1976 [The Comrades], a largely autobiographical novel which expresses his disillusionment with the guerrilla dream of the 1960s. Flores broke with the revolutionary romanticism of the Cuban-inspired left and went into self-exile in Mexico, concentrating thereafter on poetry. By contrast Mario Roberto Morales (1947–) has wrestled more persistently with the tension between hedonism and commitment, mere juvenile rebellion and the call of the guerrilla struggle. Los demonios salvajes, 1978 [The Crazy Devils], El esplendor de la pirámide, 1986 [Splendour of the Pyramid] and Señores bajo los árboles, 1994 [Lords Beneath the Trees] record one of the most interesting trajectories in recent Guatemalan narrative. Edwin Cifuentes (1926–), an older writer, published the linguistically ambitious El pueblo y los atentados [The People and the Violence] in 1979. The best known of the younger novelists is Arturo Arias (1950–), whose Después de las bombas [After the Bombs] and Itzam na (1981) were perhaps the most ambitious new novels of the era. In 1989 Arias, who wrote the script for the internationally successful movie El Norte, published the even more audacious El jaguar en llamas [Jaguar in Flames]. Luis de Lión Díaz (1939–84), an indigenist—indeed, Indian writer—wrote a landmark novel entitled El tiempo principia en Xibalbá [Time Began in Xibalbá] shortly before he tragically “disappeared” in 1984.

Despite the efforts of creative writers to rise above the brutal realities of recent Guatemalan history, few have been able to do so for long. That is why Guatemala is one of the privileged homes of testimonio, that documentary style of first-person narrative which has been particularly potent in Latin America since the 1960s. The most famous example, without doubt, is Me llamo Rigoberta Menchú y así nació la conciencia 1983 (I, Rigoberta Menchú) by Rigoberta Menchú (1959–), daughter of a Quiché leader burned alive in the Spanish Embassy in 1980, she was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1992. Other examples of the genre are Los días de la selva, 1980 [Days of the Jungle] by the poet Mario Payeras (1937–95), about his experiences as a guerrilla with the EGP in the mountains, and the later El trueno en la ciudad, 1987 [Thunder in the City], which recounts his growing disillusionment with the revolutionary movement; Tiempo de sudor y lucha, 1987 [Time of Sweat and Struggle] by the journalist and PGT militant Miguel Ángel Albizures, about the epic strike by Coca-Cola workers in Guatemala City; and Testimonio, 1990 [Witness] by Víctor Montejo, a former rural teacher in Huehuetenango.

Despite, or even because of, the defeat of the guerrilla movements and the Indian “holocaust” of the last thirty years, it is difficult to believe that Guatemalan affairs can be quite as sombre in the decades to come. In literature two developments must be counted as positive. Firstly the legacy of Miguel Ángel Asturias, for many years now a conflictive figure on both left and right, has finally been assimilated into the culture and his influence is both managed and acknowledged with increasingly less controversy, not to say anxiety. Secondly, in addition to Rigoberta Menchú, one or two Indian poets and novelists have emerged at last, and many more can be expected to do so as time goes by. Enrique Luis Sam Colop (1955–), an Indian lawyer-poet from Quezaltenango, writes in Quiché; Luis de Lión, mentioned above, was an example of a successful Indian novelist; and Caly Domitila Cane’k is a Cakchiquel Indian who writes testimonial poems in Spanish. As we enter the new postmodern and deterritorialized world of the future, it may be that Guatemalan literature has the means to come to terms, just in time, with its national past.

GERALD MARTIN

Further Reading

Albizúrez Palma, Francisco, Grandes momentos de la literatura guatemalteca, Guatemala: Editorial José de Pineda Ibarra, 1983
Beverley, John and Marc Zimmerman, Literature and Politics in the Central American Revolutions, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990
Liano, Dante, Ensayos de literatura guatemalteca, Rome: Bulzoni, 1992
Zimmerman, Marc and Raúl Rojas, Guatemala: voces desde el silencio. Un collage épico, Guatemala: Palo de Hormiga, 1993

Guerrilla Poetry

The very designation “guerrilla poetry” raises difficult questions of definition. There was a generation of young people who became revolutionary guerrillas during the 1960s and 1970s; many of them were poets, though their work did not necessarily arise directly out of their experiences of armed struggle. What can be said is that their work, in its great diversity, had in common a profound idealism and a personal commitment to the struggle for change which, in a majority of cases, sadly brought their early death. This is also true of others, of course, who paid an equally high price for their political allegiances, albeit while they were involved in different arenas of political action.
There is a further common characteristic which gives the category of “guerrilla poetry” a less circumstantial meaning. Curiously, it is a feature more associated with Romantic poetry than with social or Realist writing—the perception of the poet, and the guerrilla him or herself, as a heroic but marginalised figure endowed with a great vision. That idea of change through sacrifice is embodied in the guerrillero/poet; and poetry is elected as the form most appropriate to visionary insight, rather than because of its brevity or ease of composition. Yet even within that frame, this body of work embraces great contrasts of style and language.

In 1959, the Cuban Revolution produced a new form of political organization—guerrilla warfare. The overthrow of the Batista regime at the hands of the 26th July Movement, led by Fidel Castro, transformed the political environment in the whole of Latin America, and placed social change on the historical agenda once again. For many young revolutionaries in Latin America the Cuban experience provided a new model of “armed propaganda” with which a small number of dedicated and well organized armed opponents could overthrow even the most entrenched regimes. This form of action was symbolised above all by one figure, Che Guevara, the Argentine doctor of medicine and second in command to Castro whose face became the icon of the young guerrilleros.

Guerrilla groups began to be formed in imitation of Cuba. They arose in Peru, in Colombia, Nicaragua, Argentina, Uruguay, Guatemala and El Salvador—and for a brief moment, in Paraguay. Each had their poets.

The Peruvian poet Javier Heraud was a university student before he joined the guerrillas of the Ejército de Liberación Nacional or ELN (Army of National Liberation). He was killed in 1963, when barely twenty-one. His poetry, of which there is a substantial amount, is urgent and lyrical, written in brief lines and in a direct and simple language. Much of it concerns the landscape of his native Peru, its rivers and mountains. In those mountains, of course, he lived his brief political life—and there he saw the country he was fighting to recapture. His actions and his poetry could perhaps both be encapsulated in his concept of “Arte poética”:—“la poesía es/un relámpago maravilloso, /una lluvia de palabras silenciosas…/el canto de los pueblos oprimidos, /…Y la poesía es entonces, /el amor; la muerte, / las redención de los hombres” (poetry is a wonderful bolt of lightning / a rain of silent words/the song of oppressed people /…so poetry is/love, death/the redemption of all men).

Otto René Castillo was a Guatemalan, born in 1936. He studied in Europe and was a recognised poet when he returned to fight with the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias or FAR (Armed Revolutionary Forces). He was captured and killed in March 1967. His poetry has a sharp sense of irony not unlike that of the Salvadorean Roque Dalton (with whom he shared a poetry prize in 1955)—best summarised in his satire on "Los intelectuales apolíticos." His best known work, however, is the title poem from the collection “Vámonos patria a caminar” [Come Walk with Me, My Country]. It is a kind of personal manifesto: “Vámonos patria a caminar, yo te acompaño / Yo bajaré los abismos que me digas / Yo beberé tus cálices amargos / Yo me quedaré ciego para que tengas ojos / Yo me quedaré sin voz para que tu cantes” (Come walk with me, my country, I’ll go with you / I’ll descend into whatever abyss you tell me to / I’ll drink your bitter cups / I’ll become blind so that you may see / I’ll lose my voice so that you can sing).
Roque Dalton was one of the most significant figures of the period. Incisive and broad in his writing, he spent time in Europe and in Cuba—experiences that find their place in his poetry. But his recognisable style marries a conversational tone, a sense of history and a savage sense of irony—sometimes directed even at himself. In “Buscándome líos” [I’m Looking for Trouble] he paints a poignant picture of his first political meeting...He also wrote under a number of different pseudonyms, to provide a kind of single-handed chorus to the development of resistance in his country, El Salvador. Tragically, and wastefully, he was killed by his own comrades in 1975, as a result of internal disputes. Dalton was an enemy of grandiloquent language—and excessive seriousness. It is the directness and the humour of his writing that gives it its special power.

Nicaragua has more than its share of guerrilla poets—indeed more than its share of fine poets for a small and culturally undeveloped country. Nicaraguan students were inspired, as others were, by Cuba—and particularly so since Nicaragua had been dominated by a single family dynasty—the Somozas—since 1936. The regime was remorseless in its repression of all opposition, so Nicaragua has a long list of dead poets—among them Fernando Gordillo, Ricardo Morles, Leonel Rugama—to add to those who continued to write until the Sandinista Revolution of 1979 overthrew the Somoza regime. Outstanding among the living was (and is) Ernesto Cardenal, the poet/priest who formed a generation of writers and artists. His non-symbolic exteriorista style embraced every language and experience in poetry; and Rugama, among others, skilfully used the language of advertising and journalism to denounce his own society. Since 1979, a new generation of poets—many of whom were involved in the struggles to overthrow Somoza—has emerged, most sensitive and searching among them the group of women poets like Rosario Murillo, Vidaluz Meneses and Gioconda Belli. Gordillo’s “Un joven muerto” [A Dead Youth] may stand as a commentary on a whole generation whose heroism cannot be questioned, even if the tactics they adopted proved to be often misguided or naive. “Un joven muerto, no hiere el corazón de un rifle. / Ni hace sufrir las sombras de la nada / pero por sus heridas, un poco de cada / uno se ha escapado, para no volver. / La soledad del héroe, es su mayor / martirio. / Hacedle compañía.” (A dead youth cannot pierce the heart of a rifle. / He cannot make the shades of nothingness suffer. / But through his wounds, a little from each / one has escaped never to return. / The solitude of the hero is his greatest / martyrdom. / Stay and keep him company).

There were other fine poets who died for their commitment to a political cause—Francisco (Paco) Urondo was killed, Juan Gelman lost his family, Jaime Suárez Quemain was murdered in El Salvador. The list is long and tragic. But it was not a mere coincidence that so many of them wrote poetry—what moved them all were the highest and most humane of ideals.

MIKE GONZALEZ

See also entries on Gioconda Belli, Ernesto Cardenal, Roque Dalton

Further Reading
Castillo, Otto René, Poemas, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1971
Nicolás Guillén 1902–1989

Cuban poet

Nicolás Guillén was born of two generations of mulattoes in 1902, but it was not until 1930 that he was born into his artistic fullness. His brother poet from the United States, Langston Hughes, was the spiritual midwife for this new birth. Confused by the systematic distortions spawned by slavery, the slave trade, and European colonial expansion, Guillén had lain slumped in what Amilcar Cabral, inspired by Frantz Fanon, has termed the “Capitulation Phase.” He saw himself as just another Latin American poet in the tradition of the great Darío. As the exaggerated liberalism of the 1920s roared in the north, in the south the US tightened its grip, and the young mulatto poet was shocked to see his race-based class privileges evaporate before his very eyes. So, in the words of Fanon in Les Damnés de la terre (The Wretched of the Earth) he began to “remember what he [was].” In January 1930 Hughes paid a visit to Havana, and the two met. Shortly afterwards, on the 20th of April, the Cuban spoke “en negro de verdad” [authentic Black] for the first time when his eight Motivos de son [Son Motifs] were published in the Ideales de la raza [Ideals of the Race] section of the Diario de la Marina newspaper.

The collection entitled Sóngoro cosongo, which appeared in 1931, was the poet’s first after finding the new voice that was sounded with his dramatic passing into the “Revitalization Phase,” according to the Cabral schema. Conscious of the immense significance of the work, Guillén opened it with a brief prologue defiantly proclaiming his artistically “born again” poetry to be “versos mulatos” permeated with quintessential Cubanness, “color cubano.” Mainstream critics consistently consider the works of this phase to be Guillén’s best, and indeed, these may well be the most representative of his artistic genius. He did, however, evolve into the “Radicalization Phase,” the fighting phase. The publication of his collection West Indies, Ltd. in 1934 marks his entry into this final phase of development for the native artist. “Sabás,” arguably Guillén’s most powerful poem, belongs to this collection. It was written in that very year and significantly was dedicated to Hughes.

In May 1937 the collection Cantos para soldados y sones para turistas [Songs for Soldiers and Sones for Tourists] was published in Mexico. Entirely consistent with the revolutionary, fighting phase of development it turned out to be the final expression of that particular period of the poet’s ongoing artistic evolution. In the very month of May, the poet, again in Mexico, wrote “España, poema en cuatro angustias y una esperanza” [Spain, a Poem in Four Anguished Voices and One of Hope]. The long work was published immediately in Mexico and then at the end of August in Valencia, Spain.
Significantly, there in Valencia that very same year, Guillén formally joined the Communist Party, thereby entering what might be termed the “post-colonial” phase.

In recent years there has been a major thrust in the United States to validate the category “biracial,” sometimes indistinguishable from “multiracial.” Even at his most radical stage Guillén, by opting for mulatez [mulattoness] over Négritude, fell short of developing what is viewed today as an African consciousness. Furthermore, by joining the Communist Party he officially subsumed his race consciousness—at best a mulatez—to a class consciousness, and would later expressly repudiate Négritude, the Afrocentricity of the 1930s. Richard L.Jackson, the first North American scholar in modern times to present a clear understanding of Latin American racism, equates mulatez, a form of mestizaje, with “ethnic lynching.” The fact is that the poet Nicolás Guillén is recognized in the circles of those who read and study literature today as a “black” Latin American poet. The works of his “Revitalization” phase are those that compel the interest of the academy. As was indicated in the entries on “AfricanCaribbean Literature” and “African-American Literature (Central and South America)” it is only by employing the analytical tools proffered by the new Afrocentric scholarship that the researcher will reap the full harvest of appreciation and hence enjoyment of the literary output of any Africanancestored writer.

If, as Derek Walcott would put it, “the poet never lies,” then Sóngoro cosongo should not really be different from the work of Guillén the post-colonial Poeta Nacional of Fidel’s Cuba. The poem “Sensemayá,” with the subtitle “Poem to Kill a Snake” first appeared in the 1934 collection West Indies, Ltd. and has become a signature work for the poet and for so-called “African-Cuban” poetry, but it has been shown to be remarkably similar in form and content to a poem of ancient Kemet that was inscribed indelibly (almost) in hieroglyphs on the walls of a pyramid tomb of Teta, a pharaoh of the Sixth Dynasty. It represents one of two instances when the Cuban poet was satisfied with the first version of a work: when he composed the original son poems written in the course of one night of true inspiration; and when “Sensemayá,” burst forth spontaneously but based on his recollection of carnival chants he had heard as a youth.

In marked contrast, the poet’s “Elegía a Jesús Menéndez,” written between 1948 and 1951 and finally published in the 1958 collection La paloma de vuelo popular [The Dove of the People’s Flight], is perhaps his most carefully crafted work. The poem is correctly Marxist-Leninist, rooted in the atheistic contemporary European intellectual tradition. However, the poet gets the best of both worlds for this modern Marxist hero is a suffering servant, a messiah in the cast of his divine namesake. Furthermore it is quite clear that Guillén consciously incorporates traditional West African religious symbolism into his aesthetic. Jesús Menéndez is presented as a manifestation of Shango, “the great Yoruba ancestor and military leader who has been raised to the ranks of the orishas (divinities)... becoming...the god of thunder.”

Henry Louis Gates, Jr is one of those contemporary mainstream scholars who have acknowledged the pivotal importance of another Yoruba orisha, Legba, the Trickster. Legba’s is the discourse of the “signifying monkey,” or in the popular parlance of the contemporary Caribbean: the “mamaguyer” the “broad-talker” the “shit-talker.” It is Legba who inspires those tea meetings in Nevis in the Leeward Islands which Roger D.Abrahams depicts as, “a remarkable combination of pageant, mock fertility ritual, variety show, and organized mayhem.” It is clearly Legba who inspired the poem “Digo que no soy un hombre puro” [I’m No Pure Man, I Say] that first appeared in 1968 and was included in the second edition of the 1972 collection, La rueda dentada [The Cogwheel]. In this poem “the artist’s purpose appears to be the signaling to the world that the old poet still retains the vibrancy of youth. It is this same purpose that prompted the extreme experimentation of the book El diario que a diario.” Legba’s connection to a book like El gran zoo (1967) is much more readily grasped. From the dawn of recorded history African civilizations have evinced a deep appreciation for the links between the supernatural and the various parts of the natural, this latter including the plant, animal, and human kingdom. So African literature throughout the ages is replete with totemic representations of the Trickster: the spider, the rabbit, the land turtle (jicotea), the (signifying) monkey, etc. Some of Guillén’s finest expressions of political satire are to be found in the pages of this book penned by the National Poet of a Communist nation.

El diario que a diario, 1972 (The Daily Daily), Guillén’s final book, is the same kind of work as the novel Mumbo Jumbo (1971) by the African American Ishmael Reed, a consummate parody. According to Gates, “In six demanding novels [including Mumbo Jumbo], Reed has criticized, through signifying, what he perceives to be the conventional structures of feeling that he has received from the African-American tradition.” Employing the selfsame pastiche format, the Cuban’s book parodies and signifies on our received notions of his nation’s history, and is sustained artistically by its irony and sarcasm. It is an experimental work, but the experimental form is not divorced from the content, as the poet is manifestly seeking a new way to express his central poetic vision.

Guillén is, then, more than just the token “Black” poet to be trotted out every time the specter of racism rises menacingly. He has, in fact, plumbed the depth of his “sous-réalité” to speak “en negro de verdad,” in an authentic African voice. In the course of Nancy Morejón’s Conversación con Nicolás Guillén, which was first published in 1970, the poet declared: “My poetry has always been internally consistent.” This, of course, is just another way of expressing the Walcottian declaration. Unfortunately this internally consistent, authentic African voice has yet to be fully understood by the mainstream.

IAN ISIDORE SMART

Biography

Chile, 1953, and, though based in Paris, 1955–58, continued travelling widely during the 1950s; lived in Buenos Aires, 1958–59. Returned to Cuba, from virtual exile, after the Castro Revolution in 1959, and thereafter combined career as writer with attendances at numerous international conferences, lectures, and cultural events, often in other countries of the socialist bloc, and often in an official capacity as Cuban ambassador at large or president of the Cuban Union of Writers and Artists (UNEAC) (appointed 1961); member, Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba, from 1975; had leg amputated, June 1989. Recipient of numerous awards including: International Lenin Peace Prize, 1954; Viareggio Prize (Italy), 1972; Cuban National Prize for Literature, 1983; Maurice Bishop Prize, 1989. Died in Havana, 16 July 1989.

Selected Works

Poetry

Motivos de son, Havana: Rambla, Bouza y Compañía, 1930
Sóngoro cosongo: poemas mulatos, Havana: Úcar García, 1931
West Indies, Ltd: poemas, Havana: Úcar García, 1934
España: poema en cuatro angustias y una esperanza, Mexico City: Mexico Nuevo, 1937
Cantos para soldados y sones para turistas, Mexico City: Masas, 1937
El son entero; suma poética 1929–1946, Buenos Aires: Pleamar, 1947
Elegía a Jacques Roumain en el cielo de Haití, Havana: Ayón, 1948
Elegía a Jesús Menéndez, Havana: Páginas, 1951
Elegía cubana, Havana: n.p.,1952
La paloma de vuelo popular. Elegías, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1958
Buenos días, Fidel, Mexico City: Gráfica Horizonte, 1959
Poemas de amor, Havana: Cuadernos de Poesía, 1964
Che comandante, Havana: Instituto Cubano del Libro, 1967
Cuatro canciones para el Che, Havana: Consejo Nacional de Cultura, 1969
La rueda dentada, Havana: Union, 1972
El corazón con que vivo, Havana: Union, 1975
Poemas manuables, Havana: Union, 1975
Por el mar de las Antillas anda un barco de papel, Havana: Union, 1977
Música de cámara, Havana: Union, 1979
Coplas de Juan Descalzo, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1979
Sol de domingo, Havana: Instituto Cubano del Libro, 1982
El libro de los sonetos, Havana: Union, 1984

Other Writings

Páginas vueltas; memorias, Havana: Union, 1982

Compilations and Anthologies
Sus mejores poemas, Havana: Biblioteca Básica de Cultura Cubana, 1959 [Contains selections from Motivos de son, Sóngoro cosongo, West Indies, Ltd., Cantos para soldados y sones para turistas, España, El son entero, and La paloma de vuelo popular]

Los mejores versos, Buenos Aires: Nuestra America, 1961

Antología mayor: el son entero y otros poemas, Havana, 1964

Antología clave, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1971

Summa poética, edited by Luis Íñigo Madrigal, Madrid: Cátedra, 1976

Anthologies in Translation

Man-Making Words: Selected Poems, translated by Robert Márquez and David Arthur McMurray, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1972

Further Reading

Studies that provide the cultural context for Guillén’s work

Kutzinski, Vera M., Against the American Grain: Myth and History in William Carlos Williams, Jay Wright and Nicolás Guillén, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987

——Sugar’s Secrets: Race and the Erotics of Cuban Nationalism, Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1993 [Chapters 5 and 6 discuss Guillén]

Studies of Guillén’s poetry

Ellis, Keith, Cuba’s Nicolás Guillén: Poetry and Ideology, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1983

Morejón, Nancy, Nación y mestizaje en Nicolás Guillén, Havana: Union, 1982

Pérez Firmat, Gustavo, The Cuban Condition: Translation and Identity in Modern Cuban Literature, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989 [Chapters 4 and 5 are on Guillén]
Sóngoro cosongo

Collection of poems by Nicolás Guillén

As from his first important collection of poems, Motivos de son, 1930 [Son Motifs], Guillén demonstrated an independence from the negrista poetry of his contemporaries (Ballagas, Palés Matos) in tone and style, while not entirely in thematic consideration. The son form which predominates in this volume, is one of the basic forms of Cuban music, containing African and Spanish elements, accompanied by guitar, its relative the tres, with three pairs of strings, which initiates the rhythm, bass, bongo drums, maracas, claves (two small rounded sticks of hard wood), and trumpet. The provocative and lively rhythms of the son musical form were appropriately adapted by Guillén in his poemas-son (sonpoems) in order to capture the spirit of the African-Cuban culture as well as to serve as a counterpoint to a people determined to be joyous despite the extreme poverty and racism in which they lived. The characters that inhabit his Motivos de son and subsequent works present themselves to us in their own language, using the unique rhythmic expressions of their musical heritage. Rather than being caricatures of what the black is perceived to be, they show us who he really is—a complex web of wants and needs left unsatisfied, potentials left unfulfilled by the social inequities the typical AfricanHispanic was forced to endure by the dominant white European culture in Cuba.

The following year marks the publication of Guillén’s second major collection of poetry, Sóngoro cosongo (1931), which, as its title suggests, continues the persistent and primitive rhythms of the previous book’s poem-sounds with its popular phonetics, folkloric resonances, and adaptations of motifs from popular songs and dances. The title of this second book is taken from the jitanjáfora (an extra-semantic phenomenon that relies heavily for meaning on context and on onomatopoeic association) that form the estribillo (refrain or chorus) of the poem “Si tí supiera” [If You Knew] of the first book. But the fifteen poems in Sóngoro cosongo give more emphasis to the sources of national unrest—racial disharmony, imperialistic intervention, and the socioeconomic impoverishment of oppressed blacks. In fact, the book opens with an admonishment to the reader that the poems will be upsetting to many because they deal with blacks and other popular classes. After identifying the verses as “mulatto” and stating that Cuba is culturally “mestizo,” Guillén closes his second volume of poetry on a hopeful note of a soon-to-be-realized day when “the definitive color” will be “Cuban color.” Thus, the thematic disunity and national unrest which mark the text come full circle in an ardent aspiration for harmony among all Cubans, regardless of color. So diverse is the treatment of subject matter in Sóngoro cosongo that the structure of the book itself may be viewed as a commentary on the social unrest and disunity that Guillén saw all around him. Some of the poems depict black life in its daily celebratory pursuits—physical celebrations which, all too often, serve as distractions to the black’s existence on the fringes of society (the poems “Quirino,” “Rumba,” and “Canto negro” serve as examples). The elemental beauty of the black woman, while celebrated in “Mujer nueva” [New Woman] and the two madrigals, is placed in jeopardy as the black woman becomes victimized by violent eruptions of repressed anger and frustrations on the part of the black man in “Chévere.” This point-counterpoint motif continues in the musical beauty with undercurrents of violence in the two poems “Velorio de Papá Montero” [Funeral Wake for Papá Montero] and in “Secuestro de la mujer de Antonio” [Abduction of Antonio’s Wife], not to mention the muscles (an allusion to the physical and violence) that have made the black boxer successful in Guillén’s portrayal of the boxer, whose physical prowess is overshadowed by the fact that he is perceived only as entertainment for others, in “Pequeña oda a un negro boxeador cubano” [Little Ode to a Black Cuban Boxer]. And the contrast between the African-Cuban prior to his transport to Cuba, stressing his African roots, and his initiation into slavery and social injustice is made apparent in the poems “Llegada” [Arrival] and “Canción del bongó” [The Song of the Bongo Drum].

But Guillén’s intent was not to divide Cubans further but, rather to unite them in his quest for a national identity in Sóngoro cosongo, while, at the same time, both singing the praises of his African heritage and denouncing the exploitation of the black by Cubans of European ancestry. In his controversial prologue to this second book of poetry, Nicolás Guillén proudly proclaims: “...these are mulatto verses. They partake perhaps of the same elements that enter into the ethnic composition of Cuba where we are all a little mixed...The African input into this country is...profound and...many capillary currents criss-cross in our well-irrigated waterways. I think therefore that a creole poetry among us will not be realized completely with the omission of blacks...The spirit of Cuba is mestizo. And from the spirit to the skin the definitive color will come to us. Some day they will say: “Cuban color.” These poems wish to hasten that day.” What Guillén accomplishes in his poetry is to fortify historical memory, to strengthen collective identity, and to create a new poetic circuit based on musical rhythms, linguistic discourse, and experienced realities (both past and present) of the African-Cuban. In this way his poetry validates and renews internalized recollections of an ancestral past, which have progressively receded through the experiences of displacement or exile, cultural assimilation, not to mention the experience of slavery. What Sóngoro cosongo achieves over Guillén’s first volume of poetry is a demonstration that the celebration of life that is so much of a part of the African heritage, even in the midst of adversity, can be shared with all Cuban citizens in the cementing of a national unity wherein cultural differences are recognized within the context of a common national Cuban identity, regardless of race.

Because of the political repression under Cuban dictator Gerardo Machado, who was in power from 1925 to 1933, aggravated by the social consequences of the Great Depression of the 1930s, Guillén’s writing, such as Sóngoro cosongo and West Indies, Ltd. (1934) began to delve more into social realism. Guillén’s African-Hispanic negrismo (blackness) therefore emerged largely against a backdrop of Caribbean selfreview and self-recognition. It served as an intellectual and cultural attempt to affirm a Cuban affinity with Africa as well as to express faith in a Caribbean national identity. Due, in part, to Guillén’s Négritude poetic discourse, a greater awareness of the shared heritage from Africa arose in Cuba and beyond—the black experiences vis-à-vis the European ordering of Caribbean society; the intellectual awakening of the marginalized blacks of the Caribbean and elsewhere; the more perceptible role of African customs, music, oral tradition and ontological systems; and the kindling of creativity among black poets nearly everywhere. In fact, Nicolás Guillén is a forerunner of present-day committed poetry. While Guillén was proclaiming his blackness in the Cuba of the 1930s and 1940s, there were few creative Cuban artists who viewed writing as a social responsibility and a discursive challenge to the mainstream ethos. And, from a stylistic perspective, Guillén’s poetry was antithetical to classical European literary tradition, representing, instead, a postcolonial oppositional discourse of the Third World with an identifiable African-Caribbean flavor. As Nancy Morejón proclaims in her book Nación y mestizaje en Nicolás Guillén Africa is not in but is part of Cuba and Guillén is merely voicing and validating this reality in his pre-revolutionary poetry. Guillén’s celebration of the black situation in Sóngoro cosongo is founded not just in contemporary Cuba, but in the Cuba of the last four hundred years. Each poem in this volume is linked to memories of either the immediate or remote past, as well as on reflections on the social and racial destiny of blacks in a context in which Africa encounters Europe, and exclusionary practices encounter the other in a spirit of hoped-for unity and common brotherhood for all Cubans.

ELENA DE COSTA

Editions

First edition: Sóngoro cosongo: poemas mulatos, Havana: Úcar García, 1931

Further Reading

Bernardo Guimarães 1825–1884

Brazilian novelist and poet

Bernardo Guimarães, born in the interior province of Minas Gerais, was sent to the Faculty of Law in São Paulo in 1847. He began his literary career there, one member of a group of student poets and bohemians who sought to imitate Byron and other European Romantics in both their verses and their lifestyle. Guimarães’s early poems, collected in Cantos de solidão [Songs of Solitude], first appeared in 1852, the year of his graduation. He spent much of the next fifteen years as a municipal judge in a small town in the very distant interior, in what is now the state of Goiás. In 1867, Guimarães moved back to Minas Gerais, where he found work as a schoolteacher. He continued to write and occasionally publish poetry, but after about 1865 concentrated on the production of prose fiction. Guimarães’s reputation today, as in his own time, is largely based on his 1875 novel A escrava Isaura [Isaura, the Slave Girl], one of the great best-sellers of 19th-century Brazil.

These biographical details are important because they tell us a great deal about Guimarães’s position within 19th-century Brazilian literature. Despite his education in São Paulo and a couple of forays to Rio de Janeiro, he preferred to spend his life in the interior—working a little, but primarily devoting his time to riding, hunting, fishing and conversation. His love of these rural pursuits comes through clearly, both in his poetry and his fiction. Moreover, Guimarães’s regionalism is very firmly based on real experience and on his affection for specific landscapes and ways of life; other regionalist fiction of the time, particularly that of José de Alencar, is primarily the product of a little reading and a great deal of imagination.

Bernardo Guimarães, unlike almost all other Brazilian writers of the 19th century, published substantial amounts of both poetry and prose. This division of labors, in part, reflects his constant desire for popularity; Guimarães did not begin publishing fiction until after other writers had established the Brazilian novel and created a market for national fiction. It is also the product, however, of his easy versatility. He appears to have been able to write, almost effortlessly, in any style he chose. His poetry is far more varied, in form and in content, than that of any of his contemporaries; the same versatility allowed him to produce Indianist fiction, historical novels, and novels set in both urban and rural environments. The downside of this versatility, however, is a certain technical and intellectual laziness, visible in both his poetry and his prose. One of Guimarães’s late poems, the “Hino a preguiça” [Hymn to Laziness], published in 1883, humorously pleads guilty to this charge. It is this fundamental unwillingness to challenge his readers’ expectations and to polish his texts that has relegated Guimarães, despite all his talent, to secondary status in both poetry and prose.

Thus Guimarães’s early lyrics, written while he was in law school, seem both artificial in tone and metrically sloppy, particularly when compared to the very similar works produced by his much younger friend and fellow-student, Manuel Antônio Álvares de Azevedo (1831–52), the great poet of their generation. Guimarães’s complaints of world-weariness and despair ring false, the product of his readings in European literature rather than real experience; in sharp contrast, his best poems of the period from 1847 to 1865 reflect his love of the good things in life (a good cigar, a comfortable hammock, for example) and his nostalgia for the world he had left behind in Minas Gerais—his favorite horse, a sunset, the landscapes that he loved. His later verse concentrates on these simple pleasures, but also contains a number of elegies for his friends and celebrations of family anniversaries or local political events.

As a novelist, Guimarães has often been described as above all a story-teller—equally at home swapping tales in a rural bar or writing simple narratives designed for unsophisticated readers. None of his novels really broke new ground, in theme or in style; structurally, even works written in the late 1870s are indistinguishable from Brazilian novels published thirty years earlier. His heroes and heroines are uniformly and wholly pure and noble; his villains are uniformly and wholly evil. Guimarães presents his characters, and the hero and heroine fall in love at first sight; the machinations of their enemies produce a few obstacles to happiness, but everything is quickly and simplistically resolved. The best of these texts are his regionalist novels, where the mechanical plots are interrupted by vivid descriptions of rural landscapes and customs.

The most famous of Guimarães’s novels, however, is A escrava Isaura, a work which may have been influenced by Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin (widely read in translation in Brazil) and, perhaps, by Dion Boucicault’s 1861 play, The Octoroon. Isaura, the incredibly lovely, cultured and noble mulatto heroine, is the color of ivory. She successfully rejects the lustful advances of her master, Leônicio, and is finally saved by her true love, Álvaro, a free-thinking aristocrat and millionaire who destroys Leônicio, frees her, and proposes marriage. A escrava Isaura is often described as an abolitionist work, but it is rather difficult to see how it contributed to the end of African slavery in Brazil. Guimarães does not appear to regard slavery, as an institution, as evil; the problem, rather, is that Isaura (unlike the other slave girls Leônicio owns) is fully white in appearance, character, and refinement, and therefore does not deserve to be enslaved.

The popularity of A escrava Isaura, despite its stereotypical characterization and hackneyed plot, is suggestive of certain realities in 19th-century Brazilian society and in Guimarães’s own life. The plot is driven by Leônicio’s obsessive efforts to seduce Isaura; her success in resisting his advances, thereby maintaining her purity for Álvaro, is one of the most unrealistic aspects of the novel. Real slaves, like Rosa (a minor character in the text), were unable to resist seduction or rape by their masters. The novel’s undercurrent of sexual exploitation and violence directed towards subservient women, whether white or of color, is a reflection of the realities of Brazilian life. That reflection, moreover, is far more explicit elsewhere in Guimarães’s life and work. As a young man in São Paulo, he was one of the founders of the student Epicurean Society, which hired local prostitutes for extravagant orgies of sex and violence; according to the recollections of some of the participants, those orgies led to the death of at least one of the women. Clear reflections of the darkest sort of eroticism appear in several of his poems as well—in the extremely pornographic “Elixir do pajé” [The Shaman’s Potion], which has circulated widely in manuscript form for at least a century, or in the published “Orgia dos duendes” [The Ghosts’ Orgy], works in which, as Antônio Cândido has noted (Formação da literatura brasileira, 1975), the combination of pan-sexuality and sadism recalls the paintings of Hieronymus Bosch.

DAVID T.HABERLY

Biography

Born Bernardo Joaquim da Silva Guimarães in Ouro Prêto in the state of Minas Gerais, Brazil, 15 August 1825. Studied law at University of São Paulo, where he founded the student Epicurean Society. After graduating he practiced law in Minas Gerais and Goiás where he got to know the hinterland. Spent some time in Rio, working as a journalist. Returned to Ouro Prêto in 1867, where he married and began his career as a writer. Earned his living as a teacher, journalist and lawyer. Died in Ouro Prêto, 10 March 1884.
Selected Works

Poetry
Cantos de solidão, São Paulo: Tipografia Liberal, 1852
Poesías, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1865
Novas poesias, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1876
Folhas de outono, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1883

Novels and Short Fiction
O ermitão de Muquém, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1866
Lendas e romances, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1871
O garimpeiro, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1872
Histórias da província de Minas Gerais, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1872
O seminarista, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1872
A escrava Isaura, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1875
Maurício ou os paulistas em São João del Rei, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1877
A ilha maldita, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1879
O pão de ouro, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1879
Rosaura, a enjeitada, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1883
O bandido do rio das Mortes, Belo Horizonte, Brazil: Imprensa Oficial de Belo Horizonte, 1904

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading
Relatively little has been published on Guimarães’s poetry and prose, as these listings suggest.
Magalhães, Basílio de, Bernardo Guimarães, Rio de Janeiro: Anuário do Brasil, 1926

A escrava Isaura

Novel by Bernardo Guimarães
Born in 1825, Bernardo Guimarães’s life spanned the heights of a Brazilian Romanticism which declined later than its European counterpart. His best known novel, A escrava Isaura, 1875 [Isaura, the Slave Girl] reflects many of the characteristics of the movement both in its general European parameters and in the specific way in which these parameters were adapted to convey a Brazilian reality. The work exhibits the contradictions which such adaptations invariably entailed.

A escrava Isaura is Bernardo Guimarães’s fifth novel. Together with his other writings, it is at present judged by most critics a minor manifestation of Brazilian Romanticism. However, it offers the attentive reader a fascinating insight into some of Brazilian society’s central contradictions at that time. The nation was then in the process of articulating itself as an autonomous geographical, ethnic and cultural entity in the first half-century after its political independence. Brazil declared independence from Portugal in 1822, and among the major political events that mark its emergence as a nation in the century that followed, can be included the abolition of slavery in 1888, and the declaration of the Republic in 1889.

The central themes of A escrava Isaura are slavery and abolition, with Isaura, its heroine, as the sublime martyr who, but for her slave status is indistinguishable from her paradigmatic European precursors. For example, in his novels, Samuel Richardson embarks upon what is ostensibly, and no doubt in good faith, an anti-slavery campaign which echoes similar abolitionist literary efforts in the United States of America prior to 1870. However, given its undisguised politically reformist mission, contradictions arise in the course of the Brazilian novel over the author’s treatment of themes such as enslavement and the human right to freedom. These point to the wider contradictions then plaguing a country which purported to have adopted European liberal convictions while continuing to rely on slavery as the basis of its economy.

Isaura is a beautiful and pious young slave who, thanks to the indulgence of her mistress, is also brought up to be educated and refined. Her physical appearance, it is repeatedly implied, owes little to the few drops of black blood responsible for her enslaved status, and much to a European (and Christian or Marian) canon of beauty which, in the course of the novel explicitly or implicitly reiterates that Isaura, while technically black, is in fact in heart and soul, and skin, as white as the then-prevailing racist assumptions of white superiority and black sub-humanity could require a heroine to be. Isaura’s sufferings escalate following the death of her kind (albeit enslaving) mistress, when she finds herself at the mercy of the latter’s lustful and evil son, Leôncio, now her master and intent upon besieging her indomitable chastity. Leôncio’s persecutions become increasingly violent and Isaura, herself in love with a well-to-do young man, Álvaro, undergoes many vicissitudes, which include her near-torture by Leôncio, her escape aided and abetted by her white father, recapture, and eventual rescue by Álvaro, who, exhibiting miraculous timing reappears just as events are reaching a desperate contingency. By means of the expedient of redeeming the various debts which Leôncio, inveterate gambler and dissipator of his inherited fortune has accumulated, Álvaro exercises his right to ruin the latter, thus acquiring absolute rights to his property, goods and chattels, including Isaura, whom he naturally releases and marries, leaving Leôncio to compound his sins by the ultimate one of suicide.

Isaura, the vehicle for enlisting a 19th-century audience’s sympathy in the cause of abolition, acts at the end of the novel as the cathartic means toward the moral end of the anti-slavery campaign. However, to a 20th-century reader, the novel’s plot and assumptions, even taking into account the readerly expectations of its contemporary audience, exhibit areas of ideological difficulty and contradiction which, for that very reason, render this work more complex, albeit unintentionally so, than its simplistic plot structure might otherwise indicate.

The author’s insistence upon Isaura’s whiteness, which according to the then-prevailing notions on the wider associations of race carries moral implications as well as pigmentational ones, exposes a persistent belief in the undesirability of any dimension of blackness pertaining to the heroine, in the view of even this self-declared abolitionist writer. This belief, almost universally apparent in the early abolitionist novel of the two Americas, results here in the creation of a heroine who is only indiscernibly black, vastly unrepresentative of the wider plight of slaves, and who could be said to amount to no more than an instance of special pleading on behalf of one single individual, one uniquely undeserving of an enslaved destiny, while leaving uncontested the fate of the larger collectivity of other slaves in the novel, and the moral standing of the institution as a whole.

Furthermore, Isaura’s own understanding of the significance of slavery leads her not only to apply to herself on occasion racist notions which classify her as—for example—unworthy of the love of a white man, but, equally, sometimes to see herself as distinct from other slaves. This is because she is whiter than they, and therefore especially or solely entitled to a right to freedom which does not automatically accrue to her darker and hence less deserving fellow sufferers. This separatist position reflects the views endorsed by other characters in the novel, including, remarkably, some of the other slaves.

This disturbing but unequivocal impasse in the novel’s abolitionist motivation is further confirmed by the characterization of Leôncio. The latter, irredeemably evil in a straightforward manner which is typical of Romanticism’s sometimes rather cardboardish attempts at psychological delineation, adds to his sins (he is a slave owner) others seen to be equally damning: gambling, dissipation of his inherited fortune, bad property management and libertine behaviour resulting in his failure to promote the welfare of the family as the nucleus of bourgeois stability. These flaws, undermining as they do the sacrosanct areas of marriage, work, property and inheritance, become, in the context of the novel, necessary elements in the construction of a case against Leôncio. In his depiction as a wholly reprehensible character, the fact that he owns and brutalizes slaves would not be seen as sufficiently damning in itself.

From a 20th-century perspective, Isaura begins and ends the novel in positions which only differ from one another technically: if, in its opening pages she is the oppressed slave acquired by purchase and stripped of her (white) heritage, freedom and right to identity, at its culmination she is the archetypal 19th-century wife, acquired by means of an equally clear slavemarket but also matrimonial purchase (by Álvaro). At the end she is stripped of her black heritage (whitened by marriage to the latter), and, by implication, deprived also of other dimensions of freedom and right to identity, namely the freedom to be black but not a slave, and the right to a black identity without stigma or oppression. Isaura’s technical release from slavery, therefore, purchased at the price of the erasure of her black roots, becomes analogous to the deaths through cultural consumption of the numerous Blacks and Indians who, in the pages of Brazilian Romanticism, disappeared beyond any possibility of recovery under the impact of a movement which, paradoxically, sought to reclaim them as its heroes.

MARIA MANUEL LISBOA
Editions

Further Reading

To date, A Escrava Isaura has received very little critical attention. Alphonsus, João, “Bernardo Guimarães, romancista e regionalista,” in O romance Brasileiro, Rio de Janeiro: O Cruzeiro, 1952

Casassanta, Mário, “A escrava Isaura, um panfleto político,” Mensagem 5 (15 September 1939)

Magalhães, Basílio de, Bernardo Guimarães (esboço biográfico e crítico), Rio de Janeiro: Anuário do Brasil, 1926

João Guimarães Rosa 1908–1967

Brazilian prose writer

Arguably the most important Brazilian fiction writer of the 20th century, Guimarães Rosa cultivated letters while serving as a medical doctor in his home state of Minas Gerais and subsequently as a career diplomat in Europe, Latin America, and Brazil itself. His production spans all fictional genres from the extremely brief and concise crônica (mini-essay) through short stories of all dimensions and novellas to the gigantic expanse of his single novel, Grande sertão: veredas, 1956 (The Devil to Pay in the Backlands). A polyglot, well read in numerous literatures both ancient and modern, he created via the pages of his fiction a series of stylistic and linguistic innovations akin to those introduced by James Joyce in English literature: neologisms of many kinds, a sort of “telegraphic syntax,” hyperbaton, widespread lexical borrowings from many tongues, and intermixing of multiple levels of language usage (from colloquial to erudite) in a single locution. He consistently favored an orally based story-telling style echoing medieval and ancient Middle Eastern patterns, and once said that the language he was really searching for was the one spoken by humanity prior to the Tower of Babel.

Guimarães Rosa’s works, in chronological order, are: Magma, 1934 (which won the Brazilian Academy of Letters Prize for poetry, but was never published); Sagarana, 1946: nine fairly long short stories; Corpo de baile, 1956 [Corps de Ballet]: seven novellas (subdivided, beginning with its third edition in 1964, into three volumes, with the titles Manuelzão e Miguilim [Big Manuel and Mikey], Noites do sertão [Nights in the Backlands] and No Urubuquaquá, no Pinhém [In the Urubuquaqua and Pinhem Area]); Grande sertão: veredas, 1956; Primeiras estórias (The Third Bank of the River and Other Stories), short stories published in 1962.; Tutaméia, 1967 [Nothing Much]: very short stories and essay-like “prefaces”; Estas estórias, 1969 [These Stories], published posthumously: short stories of a length similar to those of Ave, palavra [Hail Word, or Bird, Word], also published posthumously, in 1970: miscellanea of fictional pieces (crônicas), poetry, and very short stories. Publishing initially as a poet before embarking upon his illustrious fictional career, Guimarães Rosa shows in his last posthumous collection the permanence of the poetic vein in his writing. His prose works themselves are interlaced with snatches of verse, and sections of a number of his stories (when read aloud) are discovered to be written in iambic or dactylic rhythm, usually in imitation of sounds of nature such as the hoofbeats of cattle and horses.

The publication of Sagarana in 1946 was a “bombshell” in a Brazilian literary world characterized by picturesque regionalism that reproduced and interpreted the everyday life of the rural and urban masses in accordance with a fairly simplistic code of socioeconomic and/or political premises. While obviously a regionalist in theme, treating primitive human existence in the most remote areas of Minas Gerais and Bahia, Guimarães Rosa flouted all the stereotypes of regionalist fiction with his inclusion of introspective, metaphysical dimensions hitherto excluded from the genre’s paradigm. His stylistic innovations and reworking of the Portuguese literary language suggested a possible kinship with the Mário de Andrade of Macunaima (1928), but Rosa denied such an affiliation on the basis of Mário’s irreverent iconoclasm. Guimarães Rosa would come to be known as a “universal regionalist” or “surregionalist,” whose work was like no other and would be the watershed of 20th-century letters.

Sagarana’s nine stories, all set in the backlands of central Brazil, present the cowboys, politicians, animals, landscapes, tensions, problems and entertainment of the area. Its protagonists include a small donkey who saves the lives of a couple of humans during a flood, a wayward but irresistible husband, two old friends dying of malaria, two “man hunters” in a love triangle, a pair of chess-playing friends engaged in an equally slow-moving courtship, a voodoo practitioner and his taunting neighbor, a bully and the timid rival who bests him with the aid of a spell, a herd of talking oxen who wreak exemplary vengeance on their cruel master with the subconscious help of their child guide, and a cruel husband turned saint through the intervention of a pair of humble “good samaritans.” The last of these narratives—“A hora e vez de Augusto Matraga” (Augusto Matraga’s Day in the Sun)—has become a classic in its own right and has been made into a film. Sagarana establishes the author’s unflagging empathy for his region in its best and worst aspects and his confidence in the outworking of cosmic justice (with mercy) through the activity of children, animals and other unsung heroes. And set right in the middle of “São Marcos” (St Mark), a story of syncretistic religion and amorous doggerel verse, is an intercalated “position statement” on the logic of neologisms and the necessity for linguistic refreshing and renovation; this encapsulated mini-treatise proved prophetic of what Guimarães Rosa was to practice throughout his entire literary career, and finds an a posteriori echo in Tutaméia, the last collection published during the author’s lifetime.

Corpo de baile’s seven novellas show a degree of occasional interweaving, especially regarding several of their protagonists (e.g., Miguilim) who appear as children in the early pieces and as adults in later ones. Guimarães Rosa’s re-creation of the world as observed through the nonjudgmental perception of children is without equal in modern literature. His psychological sensitivity shows in the treatment of the superstitions, fears, fantasies, erotic urges, suspense and tenderness that flow through the collection as well as in the oneiric atmosphere that reigns in at least half of the pieces, giving them a surrealistic quality not present in most of Rosa’s other works.

Grandes sertões: veredas, published the same year as Corpo de baile in a veritable marathon of literary activity, is a 600-page monologued novel without chapter division, narrated in the first-person singular by its protagonist Riobaldo, a retired ex-bandit chief, to a presumed narratee of higher education, whose opinion he seeks especially regarding his (not) having made a pact with the Devil to defeat a rival jagunço leader and to avenge the death of his own former chief. Riobaldo’s lengthy blow-by-blow narration of his youth and outlaw career, with its numerous violent encounters and its psychological vicissitudes, is enriched by vivid descriptions of the landscape, fauna, flora and everyday rural life of Minas Gerais and Bahia. This work of epic proportions—sometimes classified as a Brazilian prose epic because of its themes of honor, the hero and his absent love, the quest involving purification through a series of journeys and trials, the appearance of a traitor, the homogeneous action of a heterogeneous group under an inspired leader, and the interpolation within the main narrative of numerous tangential episodes told for moralistic purpose or entertainment—may also be read as an allegory of the battle between Good and Evil. The secondary figure, Diadorim (also called Reinaldo), comrade of Riobaldo and eventual slayer of the villainous Hermógenes, arouses Riobaldo sexually while at the same time acting as his human “guardian angel,” Riobaldo’s anguish over his apparent homosexuality is transformed into despair of another sort when his best friend dies in the encounter with Hermógenes: Diadorim is a young woman, masquerading as adolescent male warrior to avenge her own father’s death.

Though this single monumental novel by Guimarães Rosa has attracted the majority of analytical commentary to date, his 1962 story collection, Primeiras estórias, ranks in second place. Marking the author’s definitive return to his preferred genre of short fiction, the delightful little stories of this collection are structured around “epiphanies” in the lives of children and other relatively powerless members of society. Courage to prevail in the face of adversity marks the careers of a number of these protagonists (e.g., Soroco with his demented mother and daughter, Uncle Man’Antônio and his motherless brood, the disfigured old war veteran whose horse drinks beer, the benevolent street-cleaning beggar woman, a bewildered child on an airplane between the stressful and the unknown, entry-level manual laborers in a starch company, and a frightened adolescent caught among feuding thugs), while other more liminal figures such as the “A menina de la” (The Girl from Beyond), “Um moço muito branco” (A Very Pale Young Man), the guiding cow of “Sequência” (Sequence), and the characters in “Nenhum, nenhuma” (No Man, no Woman) bring reconciliation, stability, and peace into a troubled world by their very presence. Two stories of the Primeiras estórias collection—“O espelho” (The Mirror) and “A terceira margem do rio” (The Third Bank of the River) challenge the reader with existential dramas and serious questions of conscience, while others such as “Pirlimpsiquice” (Hocus-Psychosis), “Partida do audaz navegante” (Voyage of the Audacious Navigator), “Famigerado” (Renowned), and “Darandina” display the hilarious results of childish and elderly creativity in a rather pedestrian world.

Tutaméia, subtitled “Third Tales,” is the last volume of fiction published in Guimarães Rosa’s lifetime and reveals his high degree of metaphysical sensitivity and artistic awareness. The forty tiny “anecdotes of abstraction” that comprise this volume, arranged... essentially in alphabetical order (except for the J-G-R of the author’s own initials), are intercepted at four points by longer essays (labeled “prefaces”) which treat theoretical or abstract qualities such as the nature of imagination and originality, the concept of the genre of estória (tale), the rationale of neologisms in everyday and erudite language, and the author’s own perspective on inspiration and the essence of life.

The posthumous collection of nine Sagarana-length short stories entitled Estas estórias was prepared in part under Guimarães Rosa’s supervision. These stories are not set exclusively in the interior of Brazil, as was most of the author’s previous prose, however, but expand to include a humorous coastal episode and a rather tense adventure in an Andean country. Nevertheless, their style, pace, and density approach those of Sagarana.

_Ave, palavra_, a posthumous miscellanea of prose and poetry, is comprised of fifty-five brief entries ranging from vignettes of zoos in Italy, France, Germany, and Brazil to memoir-like pieces of urban cosmopolitan setting as well as rural context, reflecting the author’s decades of professional diplomatic activity and his international consciousness. There is a “one world” quality about these literary titbits, among the least colloquial and most cerebral of his writings.

Guimarães Rosa has suggested that his works be read simultaneously on three levels: first, their underlying charm (enchantment); second, their “level-lying” common meaning; and third their “overlying” metaphysical idea. He has created a very personal, stylized Portuguese literary language involving a quintessentially oral base and a dynamically eclectic morphological/lexical component. He has revolutionized Brazilian regionalist fiction and has compassionately drawn into focus, without partisan program nor schematic simplification, a complex rural population previously almost ignored in the national literature, thus achieving universal status for the most authentic of Brazilian literary forms.

MARY L. DANIEL

Biography

Born in Cordisburgo, Minas Gerais, Brazil, 27 June 1908. Attended the Colégio Arnaldo, Belo Horizonte and the Medical School of Minas Gerais, Belo Horizonte from 1925 to 1930. Worked in the Statistical Service, Minas Gerais, 1929–31. Married Lygia Cabral Pena in 1930; two daughters. Doctor in private practice serving the rural population of Itaguara, Minas Gerais, 1931–32. Volunteered as military medical officer, Belo Horizonte in 1932. Served as a medical officer in the Ninth Infantry Battalion, Barbacena in 1934. In the same year he passed civil service examinations and joined Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Married Aracy Moebius de Carvalho in 1938. Posted to Hamburg as vice-consul in 1938. He was interned briefly in Baden-Baden, following Brazil’s entry into World War II, 1942. Secretary for the Brazilian Embassy in Bogota, Colombia, until 1944. Returned to Brazil and became Director of the Ministry of State’s Documentation Service. In 1946 he was secretary of the Brazilian Delegation to the Paris Peace Conference. Secretary-general, Brazilian Delegation to Ninth Pan-American Conference, Bogota, 1948; principal secretary, Brazilian Embassy, Paris, 1949–51; cabinet head, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Rio de Janeiro, 1953–58; head of Frontier Demarcation Service, 1962–67. VicePresident, First Latin American Writers Conference, Mexico City, 1967. Awarded the Brazilian Academy of Letters Poetry Prize, 1936; Carmen Dolores Barbosa Prize,

Selected Works

Short Fiction
Corpo de baile: sete novelas (contains Manuelzão e Miguilim; No Urubuquaquá, no Pinhém; Noites do sertão) 2 vols, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1956; 3 vols, Rio de Janeiro, 1964–66
Os sete pecados capitais, with others, Rio de Janeiro: Editora Civilização Brasileira, 1964
[novellas]
Campo geral, Rio de Janeiro: Sociedade dos Cem Bibliófilos do Brasil, 1964
Tumaméia: terceiras estórias, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1967
Estas estórias, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1969
Ave, palavra, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1970 [poetry and prose]

Novel

Further Reading
Coutinho, Eduardo de Faria (editor), Guimarães Rosa, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1991
Filho, Adonias, et al., Guimarães Rosa, Lisbon: Instituto LusoBrasileiro, 1969
Guimarães Rosa, João, Em memória de João Guimarães Rosa, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1968
Vincent, Jon S., João Guimarães Rosa, Boston: Twayne, 1978
Xisto, Pedro, Augusto de Campos and Haroldo de Campos, Guimarães Rosa em três dimensões, São Paulo: Conselho Estadual de Cultura, 1970

Grande sertão: veredas

Novel by João Guimarães Rosa
The work of Guimarães Rosa could be considered as the culmination of some of the most important trends of Brazilian literature. There is no doubt that his fiction portrays the “sertão dos gerais.” This consists of the inland part of his native state of Minas Gerais, the one that neighbours the states of Goiás in the west and Bahia in the north, and the human plethora that inhabits this region, especially the vaqueiros and jagunços (cowboys and bandits). Guimarães Rosa’s work is considered as a documentary of cultural habits, social practices, and dialects, as well as a farewell to a traditional and rural Brazil about to disappear.

But the landscape in Guimarães Rosa transcends the documentary dimension, as it is charged with metaphysical, symbolic and magical connotations. The two banks of the São Francisco river, for instance, delimitate two contrasting dimensions of human experience. It becomes an axis in the sertão while making it equal to the world itself (e.g., Sertão-Mundo). In this sense, Guimarães Rosa’s work is a tributary of the Brazilian regionalist novel, but it also surpasses this tradition, by giving to the picturesque detailed notations of the environment a universal and philosophical weight in which the most common dramas of human kind are enacted.

Also visible in Guimarães Rosa is the heritage of baroque language and the point of arrival of a baroque tradition within Brazilian literature. Guimarães Rosa explored the potentialities and the limits of the Portuguese language, by incorporating words from other languages (he spoke six and could read in fourteen other languages), revitalizing disused terms and expressions, utilizing the “dialects” of the backlands, creating neologisms, experimenting with alliterations, and forging new syntactical connections. The final result is that his diction is a trademark. Hard to imitate and impossible to translate without a considerable loss of its poetic force, it requires an effort of recreation into the target language. He turns Portuguese inside out, confers on it a new expressive stature, and liberates language, in his own words, “from the mountains of ashes under which it lay.”

But the care taken with language reaches beyond the aesthetic and the ludic in that, for Guimarães Rosa, language possesses a metaphysical dimension. To quote the title of a famous story of his, all of Rosa’s rivers have “three banks.” Words have their own “third bank.” Guimarães Rosa sees language as a weapon in the defence of human dignity. By renovating language, the world is renovated. The sense of life may be recovered via a reconstruction of language whereby the latter has restored to it its naming and creative power, the original act of poiesis by which being is founded through the word. Concomitantly, Guimarães Rosa rejects Cartesian rationality in favour of a greater role for intuition, revelation, inspiration, enchantment, and magic. As a consequence, there is a rejection of certain weaknesses of Western thought and its reliance on binary oppositions: reason versus emotion, good versus evil, and so on. Rosa shows how “everything is and nothing is,” how each thing carries within it its own contrary, and how the “third bank” may be seen as a privileged space, a Utopian territory in which contradictions are abolished. Neither this bank nor that bank and both at the same time, the “third bank” is the place where the subject wanders, where he explores the different-same waters of the river of life, free from the confines of temporality.

A recent study has added another aspect to this discussion, by affiliating Guimarães Rosa to the post-structuralist debate: according to Avelar (1994), in Rosa oppositions are problematized, but they are not resolved in a synthesis; instead, they are called upon to be in a constant contradictory and paradoxical tension. In other words, meaning is always deferred. In this regard, it may well be said that his writing goes against the mainstream of patriarchal writing, inasmuch as it decentres and problematizes meaning.

All the above remarks suit perfectly Grande sertão: veredas, the 460-page saga of Riobaldo Tatarana through the sertão, nurtured by his quest for the existence of the devil and for the meaningfulness of his life. An ex-jagunço, now a landowner, the narrator tells, in a long monologue, to an educated listener (who never replies explicitly, his reactions being understood by the protagonist’s discourse), the story of his life, his love for Diadorim, the difficulties of overcoming the Liso do Sussuarão (a sort of hell), his fights on the side of Zê Bebelo and against Hermógenes, an incarnation of evil, until he himself becomes Chief Urutu Branco. A poor translation of this incredible mosaic could reduce it to the level of a simple Western: adventures in the backlands of Brazil. But there is a parade of good and evil, life and death, love and hate, doubts and certainties, and a number of pairs that portray the human struggle in search of its ultimate meaning. All this is permeated by the attraction between Riobaldo and Diadorim. It is easy to imagine the transgressive quality of such love, since we are among jagunços, for whom manhood is an unquestionable matter of honour. But, at the end, Diadorim, murdered in a duel, reveals his true female identity. Perhaps paying tribute to the conservative nature of Brazilian society, Grande sertão steps back from the issue of homosexuality. Not many socio-critical studies on Grande sertão are available. It is hard to ascertain to what extent the novel underscores or installs a rupture with the patriarchal and seignorial tradition that prevails in most of Brazilian literature. Maybe this question also has its “third bank.” In this case, the novel is both rupture and allegiance at the same time, and its powerful poetics relies precisely on this point.

ROBERTO REIS

Editions

Further Reading

[Perceptive analysis of this novel]

Ricardo Güiraldes 1886–1927

Argentine prose writer and poet

Ricardo Güiraldes belonged to the Argentine land-owning elite, and he enjoyed all the luxuries of life that it afforded him, including extensive travel abroad. His travels literally took him around the globe, with periodic residency in Paris. His travel experiences are greatly evident in his works, either as direct portrayals of his adventures, or as influenced by foreign literary movements and authors. His status as a privileged member of society initially proved to be somewhat of a hindrance to him as an author: neither Güiraldes nor his early works were considered to be of any lasting value. Rather than being received as a serious author, he was more often criticized for being a member of the wealthy elite who could afford the luxury of dabbling in literature, for which he had little talent. Güiraldes would eventually align himself both ideologically and artistically with the Florida group of writers, whose members included Jorge Luis Borges, Leopoldo Marechal and Oliverio Girondo. The writers of the Florida group concentrated on the creation of a new literary aesthetic that departed from the conventions of Modernismo. In contrast to the bourgeois writers of Florida were the more proletarian writers of the Boedo group, who were far more intent on using literature as a social weapon than as an art form. In spite of the difficulties that Güiraldes encountered at first, he was a tireless writer and participant in the Buenos Aires literary scene. While he only published six books during his lifetime, eight more were published posthumously. His complete works include poetry, novels, short stories, journalistic commentaries and other miscellaneous items.

Güiraldes published his first two books in 1915: El cencerro de cristal [The Crystal Cow Bell], a collection of poetry and poetic prose, and Cuentos de muerte y de sangre [Tales of Death and Blood]. El cencerro displays the influence of the Franco-Uruguayan poets Jules Laforgue and Jules Supervielle, both of whom Güiraldes admired greatly. Both books were received poorly by the critics and the public alike, either meeting with complete indifference or outright disdain. The negative reaction to El cencerro de cristal caused Güiraldes in anguish to throw the remaining copies down the well at La Porteña, the family ranch. The volume contains forty-six pieces divided into five sections. The common theme is Nature, through rural descriptions, tales and sketches in which the author mixes impressionistic compositions with humor and irony. The poems are largely simplistic and lack both poetic depth and artistic creativity. None the less, the volume offers insights into Güiraldes’s early stages of writing. The stories included in Cuentos de muerte y de sangre—some of which were first published in periodicals such as Plus Ultra and Caras y Caretas [Faces and Masks]—follow a more folkloric vein in that they are meant to be read or told as camp-fire stories. Furthermore, many are not solely of Güiraldes’s own invention, but rather come from oral tradition. Events and figures from Argentine history are either alluded to or directly mentioned in the tales. In the story “Al rescoldo” [Huddled around the Embers], the figure of Don Segundo Sombra (protagonist of the famous novel by Güiraldes of the same name) first appears taking on his role as a master story-teller. Many of the stories revolve around instances of extreme violence and/or death. Following the campfire style stories are a series of other tales grouped under the subtitles “Antítesis” [Antithesis], “Aventuras grotescas” [Grotesque Adventures], four vignettes that are admittedly cursi (exaggeratedly emotive) to the point of being preposterous, and “Trilogía cristiana” [Christian Trilogy], three interesting stories that call into question the adherence to religious beliefs.

Rauch: momentos de una juventud contemporánea, 1917 [Rauch: Moments of Contemporary Youth] is a loosely autobiographical novel that Güiraldes began to write in 1911 while in Paris. Güiraldes referred to Rauch as “an autobiography of a diminished self.” It contains many events that the author himself experienced in his youth. The narrator recounts his experiences away from home while attending school, the summer vacations spent in the country and, later as an adult, the exotic tales of night life in the exclusive clubs of Paris that many young and wealthy Argentine men enjoyed surrounded by friends, women and frivolous excess. The novel, however, revolves primarily around the virtues of the land, in particular the Argentine pampa. Rauch is essentially a Romantic text by virtue of the focus on idyllic rural scenes, the valorization of a telluric force, and the purity of the pampa; likewise, the portrayal of the city as destructive and debilitating. The negative effects of the city experienced as a young boy attending school in Buenos Aires or as an adult in Paris, a city that literally causes Rauch to fall ill, are placed in direct contrast with the country and the healing properties of Nature. The pampa not only offers physical health, but more importantly soothes the soul and nurtures spiritual well-being. Rauch is not a significant contribution to Güiraldes’s works, mainly because of the rather simplistic view it presents by way of an unpolished narrative style. Nevertheless, the text offers an early example of the themes and technique that the author later perfected in his masterpiece, Don Segundo Sombra (see essay below). Rauch represents a concerted effort by Güiraldes to create a specifically Argentine text that attempts to define the national character as pertaining to creole tradition.

Rosaura, a novella, continues many of the same romantic tendencies that were put forth in Rauch. The text first appeared under the title Un idilio de estación [A Seasonal Idyll] in the 3 May, 1918 issue of El Cuento Ilustrado, a literary publication edited by Horacio Quiroga. Güiraldes republished the work as a separate volume under the title Rosaura in 1922. However, the dedication to his sister Lolita, indicates that it was completed in 1914. The plot is quite simple and highly sentimental in its depiction of events that unfold on the site of the train depot of a small town on the pampas. The progression of the plot corresponds to the seasons of the year. The author again pits the deceiving pretentiousness of city life against the simplicity of a rural existence. A principal and recurring symbol throughout the narration is the train that for Rosaura represents change and progress, as well as introducing adventure into the monotony of small-town life. It is also the agent of the innocent young protagonist’s destruction since Rosaura falls desperately in love with a stranger who arrives by train one day. The stranger, Carlos Ramallo, turns out to be a wealthy landowner who attends a ball where he dances with Rosaura. She allows her imagination to create an elaborate future with Carlos, but then discovers that it can never be. While in a hysterical emotional state, Rosaura meets her tragic end beneath the wheels of the train. There is a marked change in Güiraldes’s prose style in Rosaura in that the tone and discourse are much more sentimental. The author employs more delicate adjectives to create exquisitely lacy descriptions, and seems deliberately to avoid the use of more masculine expressions. For example, there is an obvious absence of discourse related to gaucho practices and earthy or rustic customs.

Xaimaca is considered to be one of the best novels written by Güiraldes, excluding Don Segundo Sombra. In 1916–17 Güiraldes travelled to the West Indies with his wife Adelina del Carril and another couple during which time he took extensive notes that later became the novel which he completed in 1919 and published in 1923. Xaimaca is structured around three separate narrative segments. The first is in the form of a travelogue in which the narrator provides lengthy descriptions of travel itineraries that record the journey’s progress from Buenos Aires to Mendoza, across the Andes mountains to Chile, from Valparaiso to Panama, on to Jamaica, and finally Cuba. The second part recounts the experiences of the travellers during the trip. The third segment establishes the novelistic plot involving the romance of Marcos Galván, the narrator, and Clara Ordóñez, which blooms rapidly, only to be suddenly disrupted by Clara’s brother. The novel is the most lyrical of all Güiraldes’s writings, and it is extremely impressionistic in its style and use of language. The novel displays a more polished discursive technique than in previous works, indicative of the author’s maturation as a narrator.

Following the death of Güiraldes, his wife sent two manuscripts, both collections of her husband’s poetry, to the publisher Colombo. The result was the publication in 1928 of Poemas solitarios [Solitary Poems], written between 1921 and 1927, and Poemas místicos [Mystic Poems]. Poemas solitarios is a collection of twelve poems of intensely reflective content. Poemas místicos is comprised of only seven poems of a prominently religious nature in relation to death. Jorge Luis Borges has commented that the poems are seemingly a “dialogue between Ricardo Güiraldes, a creole gentleman, and Jesus Christ.” El sendero [The Path] published in 1932 in Holland is a collection of short observations, commentaries and meditations that the author wrote down on cards. These personal notes were never meant for publication, but they provide an insight into the author’s feelings and emotions and reveal many of his motivations and influences. Pampa is a minor collection of six poetic compositions that reveal Güiraldes’s attachment to the land and environment that were central to his writing. Pampa was published in 1954 with a preface by Horacio Becco. The volume of his complete works, Obras completas (1962) is an invaluable collection of the author’s writings. It includes not only his literary texts, but also the notes, commentaries, and letters that Güiraldes exchanged with many of his contemporaries.

DARRELL B. LOCKHART

Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 13 February 1886. Member of landowning oligarchy. Spoke French before Castilian. Learned to play the guitar at a very young age. Preferred life on the pampas to school work. Finished secondary education in 1904 and entered Faculty of Architecture at University of Buenos Aires. Travelled to Paris in 1910 where he stayed until 1912. Married Adelina del Carril in 1913; considered a suitable (and successful) match. Travelled with friends to the Caribbean via Chile in 1916. Returned to Paris in 1919. Began to write Don Segundo Sombra in Paris in late 1920; published it in new wave literary journal, Martín Fierro. In 1923 he founded his own publication, Proa [Prow] which lasted two years. Hogkin’s disease diagnosed in 1926, the year which saw the publication of Don Segundo Sombra. Güiraldes amazed by novel’s success. Awarded National Prize for Literature in the same year. Last journey to Paris in March 1927. Died in Paris, 8 October 1927.

Selected Works

Short Fiction
Cuentos de muerte y de sangre; Aventuras grotescas; Trilogía cristiana, Buenos Aires: Librería La Facultad, 1915
Seis relatos, Buenos Aires: Proa, 1929

Novels
Raucho: momentos de una juventud contemporánea, Buenos Aires: Librería La Facultad, 1917
Rosaura, San Antonio de Areco, Argentina: Establecimiento Gráfico Colón, 1922, [novella]
Xaimaca, Buenos Aires: Agencia General de Librería y Publicaciones, 1923
Don Segundo Sombra, Buenos Aires: Proa, 1926; as Don Segundo Sombra, translated by Patricia Owen Steiner, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1994

Poetry
El cencerro de cristal, Buenos Aires: Librería La Facultad, 1915
Poemas místicos, San Antonio de Areco, Argentina: Establecimientos Gráficos Colón, 1928
Poemas solitarios, San Antonio de Areco: Establecimientos Gráficos Colón, 1928
Pampa, Buenos Aires: Ollantay, 1954

Other Writings
Semblanza de nuestro país, Mar del Plata: Talleres de la Escuela de Artes Gráficas “Pablo Tavelli,” 1972

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading

Ara, Guillermo, Ricardo Güiraldes, Buenos Aires: La Mandrágora, 1961
Battistessa, Ángel José, Ricardo Güiraldes: en la huella espiritual y expresiva de un argentino (1886–1986), Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1987
Bordelois, Ivonne, Genio y figura de Ricardo Güiraldes, Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1967
Curet de Anda, Miriam, El sistema expresivo de Ricardo Güiraldes, Río Piedras: Editorial Universitaria, Universidad de Puerto Rico, 1976
Ghiano, Juan Carlos, Ricardo Güiraldes, Buenos Aires: Pleamar, 1966
Liberal Villar, José R., Vida y obra de Ricardo Güiraldes: ensayo y antología, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1980
Soler Canas, Luis M., Güiraldes y su tierra, Buenos Aires: Castaneda, 1977

Special Issues of Journals
Chasqui, vol. 6/2. (1977) [Special issue dedicated to Güiraldes on the fiftieth anniversary of his death]
Don Segundo Sombra

Novel by Ricardo Güiraldes

Ricardo Güiraldes published his novel Don Segundo Sombra in 1926. Some seven years in the writing, it was his most accomplished work, earning him the prestigious National Literature award and marking the culmination of his career as a writer. On its release, the novel received the enthusiastic praise of such authors as Leopoldo Lugones (who had been ruthlessly critical in his dismissal of Güiraldes’s early works) and Jorge Luis Borges, along with other members of the Florida literary clan. Don Segundo Sombra quite literally became an instant classic of Argentine literature. Since its initial publication the novel has enjoyed innumerable reprints, is used as an essential text in virtually all Argentine schools, has been translated into more than ten languages (including Yiddish and Czech), and was made into a motion picture in 1969 by Manuel Antín.

Don Segundo Sombra is structurally and thematically a Bildungsroman, that is, a narrative about individual development. In this respect it resembles Rudyard Kipling’s novel Kim, to which it was compared by Borges. It is narrated in the first person by an adult narrator who nostalgically reminisces about the character-shaping events of his life. As a young orphan, Fabio Cáceres is taken under the tutelage of a much older and wiser mentor in the character of Don Segundo Sombra, the gaucho who guides Fabio through his apprenticeship on the rugged pampas and his initiation into manhood. The title character in the novel was loosely based on Segundo Ramírez, a ranch hand employed during Güiraldes’s youth on the family estancia (cattle ranch). Don Segundo Sombra tells the tale of Fabio’s voyage of transformation from the abandoned guacho (orphaned animal or illegitimate child) to the noble gaucho. The twenty-seven chapters of the novel are divided equally into a tripartite narrative structure that encompasses the three major time periods in the protagonist’s life. The first section is dedicated to the boy’s adolescent adventures in the small town where he has been left to live with his two aunts. The second describes in detail his association with Don Segundo Sombra, his progress towards becoming a man, a gaucho, and also his interest, to a certain degree, in the social and cultural aspects of life. In the third and final section, now a hardened gaucho, he learns the identity of his father, upon whose death he inherits both land and responsibility, neither of which he initially wants to accept since it would also mean the end of his freedom. In the end, however, Fabio foregoes the gaucho lifestyle to take on the responsibilities of his inheritance. Nevertheless, the character ends up with the best of both worlds; he has the heart and virtues of the gaucho and the wealth and power of an estanciero, most likely indicative of how Güiraldes viewed his own position. The novel is rich in detailed depictions of life on the cattle ranches, the various tasks of the ranch hands and the customs of the country folk, as well as lengthy descriptions of the awesome beauty and power of Nature.
Don Segundo Sombra contains far less of the flowery language, rhetorical ramblings and ornamentalism that characterized his earlier works. Nevertheless, the novel is highly lyrical in nature and the influence of Asian thought and culture (which Güiraldes studied in some depth) is evident in the subtle mysticism expressed not only through the characters, but also in the lengthy descriptions of the land. However, what is most evident about the work is that it directly reflects the general sociopolitical milieu of Argentina in the 1920s, from the perspective of the oligarchy. Don Segundo Sombra is an allegory of the country, detailing its past and prescribing a future based on telluric ideals. The text presents the basic perception that a redemption of Argentine identity—viewed as being seriously threatened by the large influx of various immigrant groups—must be based on a return to the values of Argentina’s rural past. While the text is in essence an elegiac farewell to a way of life that, in fact, had disappeared several decades before, Güiraldes proposes that Argentines can retain many aspects of that life. Without a doubt, Don Segundo Sombra presents a highly romanticized version of the gaucho way of life, one that had disappeared by the time Güiraldes published his novel. It presents the positive aspects of the ranch hands’ work, while negating the very destruction of the gaucho way of life brought about by the landed aristocracy to which Güiraldes belonged. This view is patently obvious in the character of Don Segundo Sombra himself. He is truly a shadowy figure, an anachronistic ghost from the past who was in actuality “más una idea que un hombre” (more an idea than a man). Don Segundo Sombra is the quintessential gaucho, the summation of all the heroes of the gauchesque literary tradition lionized by such authors as Hilario Ascasubi (1807–75), José Hernández (1834–86), Bartolomé Mitre (1821–1906) and Leopoldo Lugones (1874–1938). But Don Segundo Sombra also fits nicely into a much larger literary scheme in formation at the time throughout Latin America; that of the so-called “novela de la tierra” (novel of the land). In Don Segundo Sombra and other similar novels of the period like La vorágine (The Vortex) by Colombian José Eustasio Rivera (1889–1928) and Doña Bárbara by Venezuelan Rómulo Gallegos (1884–1969), the land is perhaps the principal protagonist of the text. These authors all sought to portray the land as having a life force of its own, capable of influencing or directly acting upon those who chose to inhabit the vast expanses of prairie or dense jungle from which seemed to emanate a spiritual energy, which can either make the human protagonists stronger and wiser, or lead them to their destruction. In the case of Don Segundo Sombra, the harshness as well as the beauty of the land play an active role in shaping the physical and spiritual development of the young character into a man. The idyllic symbiotic relationship of man to Nature is personified in the larger-than-life figure of Don Segundo Sombra.

Don Segundo Sombra is decidedly conservative in its justification of the privileged position of the oligarchy, politically charged in its anti-Liberal commentaries, and it is highly xenophobic in its portrayal of immigrants. In principle, the novel spoke eloquently to a wide audience of Argentines, who in the 1920s were experiencing drastic changes in the political and social physiognomy of the country, and many of whom felt that Argentina was changing for the worse. A return to the idyllic rural setting (much more a myth than reality), the rejection of modern urban living, and the recovery of rapidly vanishing creole values, traditions, and in particular hegemony, were seen as the solution to the growing pains the country was experiencing. Don Segundo Sombra is very much a text about men, masculinity and the continuity of patriarchal ideals. Furthermore, it is exceedingly misogynistic in its treatment of the female characters, almost all of whom are considered to be contemptible, irrelevant as human beings, or threatening to the freedom of men. The only young female character who is not associated with denigrating qualities perhaps suffers an even greater humiliation. Aurora, the young girl with whom Fabio has a romantic liaison, is nothing more than a symbol of his initiation into manhood, whereby rape is implicitly justified as necessary for the maturation of the male. Undercurrents of machismo, violence, authoritarianism and eroticism, all revolving around power struggles and death, permeate the narration. Homosexual relations between the male characters have also been the focus of contemporary interpretations of the novel (cf. Christopher Leland).

Despite modern readings that are quick to identify the often facile political motivations that underlie the narrative, Don Segundo Sombra continues to be valued for its outstanding literary merit. Güiraldes is most often associated with the Latin American avant-garde writers. Likewise, Don Segundo Sombra is one of the most representative and original novels of the period. However, the novel does not adhere strictly to a definition of the avant-garde because it does not incorporate the striking experimentalism and metaphoric expression characteristic of this movement. Güiraldes created a gaucho narrative that effectively portrayed an image of the national character long sought after. Don Segundo Sombra was one of the first texts to incorporate successfully authentic rural speech into a prose work that was artistically sound. Rural popular culture also predominates in several instances in the form of the musical couplets of the payadores (gaucho minstrels) that are bantered among the gauchos. Rural folklore is transmitted through Don Segundo Sombra, an accomplished story teller, through whom Güiraldes intercalates two folktales into the narration (chapters 12 and 21). The novel is replete with numerous costumbrista sketches of rural life, characters and nature, all of which are designed to endear the reader to the virtues of the pampas. The psychological development of the protagonists, by which the message of the exalted gaucho heritage is transmitted, comprises the prime motivation of the narrative. Through Don Segundo Sombra Güiraldes proposed a characterization of collective Argentine identity based on creole tradition, language and customs within a highly stylized narrative structure. The adult Fabio Cáceres who retells the experiences that formed him as a youth, does so with refined language and sophisticated modes of expression foreign to the gaucho, lending a sense of lyrical realism to the narrative that in fact consists of a false poetic portrayal of the real nature of gaucho life. None the less, the novel has stood the test of time as a work of art, continuing to attract readership and criticism both nationally and internationally. When praised for his work, Güiraldes proudly exclaimed “we have all written Don Segundo Sombra. It was in us, and we are elated to have it in print.”

DARRELL B.LOCKHART

See also entries on José Hernández and Martin Fierro, Regionalism: Spanish America

Editions

Further Reading

Dellepiane, Ángela B., introduction to her critical edition of Don Segundo Sombra, Madrid; Castalia, 1990

Rodríguez Alcalá, Hugo, Quince ensayos, Asuncion, Paraguay: Criterio, 1987 [Contains three relevant chapters: on Doña Bárbara and Don Segundo Sombra; Jorge Luis Borges’s opinion of this novel and, a third, on Güiraldes in the context of the intellectual ambience of the period]

---

Ferreira Gullar 1930–

Brazilian poet

Few Latin American poets of the 20th century have created such exceptional works as those of Ferreira Gullar. Among living Brazilian poets he has no equal. Vinícius de Moraes claimed that Gullar is the last great Brazilian poet, and Sérgio Buarque de Holanda wrote in Toda poesia that the only other modern Brazilian author of comparable greatness is João Guimarães Rosa, a writer of prose fiction.

Most Brazilians know Ferreira Gullar best as the author of Poema sujo, 1976 (Dirty Poem). Many others know him also for a career that spans decades of self-reflective innovation and endeavor not only as a poet but also as a playwright, journalist and art critic. In retrospect, he wrote much of what preceded Poema sujo in unknowing preparation for what was to become his most important work. For instance, A luta corporal, 1954 [The Body’s Struggle], reveals much of the ideological and esthetic framework of Poema sujo.

Gullar grew up in São Luís, Maranhão, in one of the poorest states of Brazil where large land holdings sustain a near feudal relationship between the rich and the poor. Some poems from A luta corporal, such as “As peras” [The Pears], suggest the injustice and inexorable decay implicit in a socio-economic system with a medieval taint. And other poems from the same book reflect his pursuit of what he calls “essential poetry.” This is poetry that he sees as existing outside of the bounds of preconceived form and that subverts normal syntax, as well as linguistic and literary conventions. In Indagações de hoje [Inquiries about Today] Gullar cited an example of this: “Cerne claro, cousa / aberta; / na paz da tarde ateia, bran- /co, /o seu incêndio.” (Pallid heartwood, solid / open; / in the peace of the afternoon fans, white- /hot, /your fire).
In the early 1960s Gullar joined the Centro Popular de Cultura [Popular Culture Center] a leftist popular arts organization. This provoked an esthetic revolution for Gullar, and he began writing folk ballads, a learned version of the traditional literatura de cordel. He hoped not only to reach another audience but also to discover a purity of expression unlike his earlier approach to “essential poetry.” Although his involvement in this organization was short-lived, his demotic commitment had the effect of altering his awareness of society and its relation to art.

Shortly after the military coup of 1964, the police closed the Popular Culture Center, and Gullar with others formed a theater company called Grupo Opinião (Opinion Group). From this association he became subject to searches, and in 1968 he was jailed for a time. In 1970 Gullar went into hiding, and in 1971 he left the country and began a six-year period of exile.

By 1975 he had published Dentro da noite veloz [Within the Rapid Night], with a stance more confrontational than anything that had preceded it. “Poema brasileiro” [Brazilian Poem], for instance, addresses the problem of infant mortality, “Não há vagas” [Not Hiring] notes the crushing weight of an inhumane economic system, “Exílio” continues his expose of Brazilian living conditions, and “Maio 1964” [May 1964] reflects some of the horror and fear that he has felt: “Estou aqui. O espelho / não guardará a marca deste rosto, / se simplesmente saio do lugar / ou se morro / se me matam. / Estou aqui e não estarei, um dia, / em parte alguma.” (I am here. The mirror / will not hold the image of this face, / if I just move from this spot / or if I die / or if they murder me. / I am here but some day / will not be anywhere).

By 1975, Gullar had little hope that he would ever see his family again. He felt it was time to assess his life and circumstances, and, in response, he composed his long, autobiographical Poema sujo. In combination with the esthetic and thematic content reminiscent of his previous works, the powerful intimacy and sense of desperation in Poema sujo galvanized a generation. It opens with a conspicuous reference to Gullar’s experimental verse of the 1950s. Where he would earlier work with the deep, dark sounds and associations of the blue sea in his neo-concretista period, and where he would earlier subvert clarity and convention to elicit a desired sensation as he was seeking the “essential poem,” on the first page of Poema sujo he returns to the style of his earlier work:

> turvo turvo / a turva / mão do sopro / contra o muro / escuro / menos menos / menos que escuro / menos que mole e duro menos que fosso e muro: menos que furo / escuro / mais que escuro: / claro / como água? como pluma? claro mais que claro claro: coisa alguma / e tudo / (ou quase) / um bicho que o universo fabrica e vem sonhando desde as entranhas / azul / era o gato / azul / era o galo / azul / o cavalo / azul / teu cu.”

[muddled muddled / the muddled / hand of the wind / against the wall / dull / less less / less than dull / less than supple and stable less than a well and a wall: less than a hole / dull / more than dull / bright / like water? like a feather? bright more than bright right: nothing at all / and all / (or nearly all) / a creature sired by the universe has been dreaming from its belly / blue / the cat / blue / the cock / blue / the colt / blue / your bum.]
Toward autobiographical completeness, he has begun at his watery beginning, suggesting the “essential” moment of his conception.

Tracing the events of his life, the poem moves from sequences of recall to moments of introspection. As it evolves, it gathers focus, clarity and detail and tells stories of innocence and experience in a poetic account of all that he judged formative. And, while the poem began with reliance on the ephemeral suggestiveness of words, it concludes with a sharply articulated statement on his exile: “a cidade está no homem / quase como a árvore voa / no pássaro que a deixa / cada coisa está em outra / de sua própria maneira / e de maneira distinta / de como está em si mesma / a cidade não está no homem / do mesmo modo que em suas / quitandas praças e ruas”. (A city is in a man / almost as a tree flies / in the bird that drops it / everything is in another / in its own / and different way / of being in itself / a city is not in a man / the way it is in these / plazas streets and trees).

By the time Gullar published Na vertigem do dia, 1980 [In the Dizziness of Daylight], he had passed the crisis that had precipitated the writing of Poema sujo, but many of the concerns he had remained with him. His magnificent “Bananas podres” [Rotten Bananas] strongly recalls his autobiographical work. In certain ways it surpasses and fills out the portions of Poema sujo to which it corresponds, as do other autobiographical elements that also appear in this collection.

Barulhos [Noises], published in 1987, reveals a subtle shift in his perspective. Where many of his works have focused on his past and on particularly outrageous conditions and events, Barulhos takes a look at death and at the way that the ones we most love keep slipping from our reach. In this vein, he gives clear voice to the classical ubi sunt motif in “Onde estão?” [Where Are They?]: “Mas e os mortos, / onde estão? / O Vinícius, por exemplo, / e o Hélio? a Clarice?” (But the dead, / where are they? / Vinicius, for example, / and Helio? Clarice?). And, although in both his life and works political militancy has receded in recent years, his sympathies and solidarity remain clearly expressed in this book, as well as in other writing, for those who have tried to change the world through political word and action.

LELAND GUYER

Biography

Born José Ribamar Ferreira in São Luís, Maranhão, Brazil in 1930. Married Theresa Aragão, three children. Lived in Rio de Janeiro, 1951–71. Worked mainly as a poet, journalist and art critic, his life has had a strong political engagement. Joined the Brazilian Communist Party in 1964; arrested for political reasons, 1968. In 1970 he began a year of clandestine existence. Left Brazil, 1971, and lived in exile in Buenos Aires, Lima, Santiago and Moscow. Returned to Brazil in 1977 and has been living in Rio de Janeiro since this time.

Selected Works

Poetry
Um pouco acima do chão, São Luís do Maranhão: privately printed, 1949
A luta corporal, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1954
Poemas, Rio de Janeiro: Edições Espaço, 1958
A luta corporal e novos poemas, Rio de Janeiro: José Álvaro, 1966
Dentro da noite veloz, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1975
Egberto Gismonti, Rio de Janeiro: Som Livre, 1979
Na vertigem do dia, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1980
Barulhos, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1987

Plays
Dr. Getúlio, sua vida e sua glória, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1968
Um rubi no umbigo, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1979
Se correr o bicho pega, se ficar o bicho come, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1981

Other Writings
Teoria do não-objeto, Rio de Janeiro: Edição SDJB, 1959
Cultura posta em questão, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1964
“A obra aberta e a filosofia da praxis,” Revista Civilização Brasileira, vol. 21/2.2 (1968)
Vanguarda e subdesenvolvimento: ensaios sobre arte, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1969
Arte brasileira hoje, Rio de Janeiro: Paz e Terra, 1973
Argumentação contra a morte da arte, Rio de Janeiro: Revan, 1982
Crime na flora, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1986
A estranha vida banal, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1989
Indagações de hoje, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1989

Translations

Compilations and Anthologies
Antologia poética, recording, read by the author, with musical accompaniment by Egberto Gismonti, Rio de Janeiro: Som Livre, 1979

Further Reading
Vilaça, Alcides, “Em torno do Poema sujo,” Encontros com a Civilização Brasileira 9 (1979)

Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera 1859–1895

Mexican poet and journalist Manual Gutiérrez Nájera, one of Mexico’s best-known writers of the 19th century, has traditionally been considered one of four precursors of the Modernist period of Spanish American literature (1875–1925). It was customarily believed that the genesis of Modernismo lay in innovations in poetry, thus it was Nájera’s poetic production that received the attention of the critics for a long time. In the past few years, however, after careful examination of the modernist writers’ prose works, scholars have discovered not only that the first signs of Modernismo are to be found in prose, but that Nájera’s major contribution to the modernist enterprise were his prose pieces. This self-taught journalist who published his first article when he was only thirteen years old, was responsible for introducing the crónica (a prose genre derived from the French chronique) in Mexico. Nájera’s literary production is divided into three genres: poetry, short fiction, and crónicas. An indefatigable writer who spent his entire life working for a multitude of Mexican newspapers and magazines, he is said to have published approximately 1,500 prose pieces under different pseudonyms. Of these, he put together only one collection of short stories in his lifetime: Cuentos frágiles, 1883 [Fragile Stories], a landmark in the evolution of the Spanish American short story. Nájera also contributed to the dissemination of modernista aesthetics with the publication of articles devoted to art (such as “El arte y el materialismo” [Art and Materialism]) and the foundation, in conjunction with Carlos Díaz Dufóo, of Revista Azul (1894), one of the most important modernista publications in Latin America. As regards his poetic production, el Duque Job (his favourite pen name) did not assemble his verses in book form; his first collection of poems was published posthumously by friends in 1896. As much in prose as in poetry, among Nájera’s major influences were the French Romantics Victor Hugo, Alfred de Musset and Gérard de Nerval, and the Parnassians Leconte de Lisle and José María Heredia. Because of Nájera’s love and admiration for the French writers of the period, he was often accused of being a Francophile who demonstrated little interest in national affairs, an accusation, it suffices to say, launched against most Spanish American modernistas which was far from the truth.

What credits Nájera with being the first important shortstory writer in the Spanish American Modernist period are principally the short stories that appear in Cuentos frágiles and the posthumous Cuentos color de humo, 1898 [Smoked-Coloured Stories]; thereafter, some eighty-seven other fictional pieces were added to these two collections. The core of his narrative production arises from personal experience plus diverse readings of foreign literature which Nájera was often in the habit of translating and adapting to his own needs. Many of these short stories began as crónicas or were inserted in the corpus of a crónica in order to make it more entertaining and alive to the public. In consequence, they display the formal aspects of the crónicas, like the presence of partially verifiable facts and manifold thematic unities, for instance. The writing of short stories liberated the writer’s imagination from the daily constraints of journalism. Nájera’s short fiction explores the psychological aspects of human existence, especially those that are located on the opposite pole of the rational, and occasionally delves into the psyche of a character or narrator, as for example in “La balada de Año Nuevo” [New Year’s Ballad], the first short story of Cuentos frágiles. Plot, in most of these stories, occupies a subsidiary position to the treatment of human emotion. In countless of them the narrator shows a unique affinity for women and defenceless children. Some of his best known short stories are “La mañana de San Juan” [The Morning of St John’s Day], “La novela del tranvía” [The Novel of the Streetcar], “Los amores del cometa” [The Loves of the Comet], “Historia de un peso falso [History of a False Peso] and “Juan el organista” [John the Organist]. “La mañana de San Juan” is indubitably his best story. In it the characteristically poetic nature of Nájera’s prose serves the purpose of reconstructing a rather dramatic story in which children meet a sad end. In another fine story, “La novela del tranvía,” the narrator, a passenger who by means of humorous language imagines the lives of fellow passengers as he observes them carefully, could be said to be the perfect incarnation of El Duque Job himself. The emphasis here does not reside either in what the passengers do for a living or in what they look like; what most interests the narrator is their possible thoughts and, most importantly, how he himself reacts to them.

The crónicas are undoubtedly the best part of Gutiérrez Nájera’s prose production. Given their large quantity as well as their varied scope, it is not easy to reach a coherent definition of this portion of his prose writing. It suffices to say, none the less, that the writer made ample use of the French chronique and adapted it comfortably to national aesthetic needs. Each of them constitutes a masterpiece, intelligently and elegantly crafted, but lacking in stylistic unity. Essentially, Nájera’s crónicas are literary (unlike Martí’s, which tend more to the political), not only because many of his short stories proceed from them, but because several are almost indistinguishable from prose poems. The writer did not express a strong interest in politics (even though he was for a time actively involved in them) and hence most of his crónicas are devoid of any clear ideological intent, this despite the fact that Nájera was writing at the heights of Porfirio Díaz’s long dictatorship. In a number of crónicas, however, Nájera does allude to some of the evils that were undermining society, such as unemployment, prostitution and alcoholism; but he never attacked directly the Mexican authorities. Far more important than informing the public was to entertain it with’ fantasies and exaggerations. Nájera published his crónicas under various pseudonyms: Fru-Fru, M.Can-Can, Fritz, Junius, Pomponet, Ignotus, Omega, among others. At the same time, he frequently transposed an isolated section of a crónica into another crónica through the slight alteration of the original text. Nájera went as far as using texts written by others but publishing them as his own. In the series of crónicas entitled “Platos del día [Today’s Specials], “Cosas que hacen falta” [Things that Are Missing] and “Pláticas doctrinales” [Doctrinal Chats], the narrator indulges in the use of humour and satire. Of great quality and sensibility are the uncounted crónicas dedicated to dramatic performances, literary essays and social events, composed with a simplicity and elegance worthy of any of the modernist writers that would come after him. Among his last crónicas are found two series of seven “sermons” called “Cuaresmas del Duque Job” [Duke Job’s Lent], written with a humorous and intelligent language and addressed to women. These “sermons” are characterized by a very personal style: in them, Nájera displays the full scope of his lexical knowledge and writes with a mellifluous rhythm that makes for a very enjoyable reading. In the mid-1990s a significant number of his crónicas have yet to be published.

With his poetry, Gutiérrez Nájera declared war on a poetic tradition that had run its course. To accomplish the uprooting task he had no choice but to turn to French literature. Aided especially by Musset, he was able to infuse a breath of fresh air into the tired verse of Spanish America. From Musset and other French Romantics and Parnassians, he learned to set his verses to music and to refine his poetic expression. It has even been claimed that, at least with respect to poetry, Nájera is more of a Romantic than a modernista, particularly because the major themes of his verse possess predominantly Romantic overtones and, ultimately, in view of the fact that he did not innovate Spanish metric. In most of his poems he, in effect, uses verses of eight and eleven syllables. It must be underscored that Nájera’s Modernism in poetry is demonstrated by his alacrity to create beautiful and colourful objects by means of words; similarly, there is a conscious effort on the part of the poet to resist rhetorical and classical models. As regards the constructing of his verse, Nájera followed, almost to the tee, Wilde’s dictums on aesthetics. He wrote poetry from 1875 until the very year of his death. In his youth, his beacons were Béquer and Campoamor; as time elapsed, Gautier, Mendès, Coppée, and the French writers aforementioned, began to exert their influence on him. Nájera’s poetry is marked by an existential angst encountered in all Spanish American modernistas; in addition to this, moreover, a permeating and more immediate note of pain and suffering fills his verse. Outstanding representatives of this elegiac phase include “Mis enlutadas” [In Mourning] and “Nada es mío” [Nothing is Mine]. Francisco G. Guerrero divides Nájera’s poetic production into various stages: love and religious themes play a key role in the first phase; in this phase there is no novelty in the use of adjectives and images. Later, however, Nájera’s poetry begins to display some of Modernism’s nascent attributes: heavy utilization of colours, especially white; insertion of French words in his strophes; use of synesthesia; and inclusion of elements of the Catholic rite in preponderately pagan contexts. Among his best poems are “La duquesa Job,” 1884 [Duchess Job], “Tristissima nox,” 1884 [Saddest Night], “Mariposas,” 1887 [Butterflies], “La serenata de Schubert,” 1888 [Schubert’s Serenade], and “De blanco, 1888 [In White].

J.AGUSTÍN PASTÉN B.

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 22 December 1859. Lived prosaic life. Never travelled abroad and seldom left Mexico City. Travelled, instead, in his imagination. Father a journalist, editor and man of letters. Mother instilled religious fervour into her son. Taught himself to read and write and had lessons from private tutors. Began journalistic career at the age of sixteen. In 1888, appointed deputy to National Congress for Texcoco. Married Cecilia Maillefert with whom he had two daughters: Cecilia and Margarita. Co-founder, with Carlos Díaz Dufóa, of the Revista Azul (1894) and director of the newspaper El Partido Liberal. In 1895 was elected president of the Associated Press of Mexico, but he died before being able to occupy this post.

Selected Works

Poetry
Poesías, Mexico City: Oficina Impresora del Timbre, 1896
Poesías completas, prologue by Francisco González Guerrero, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1966

Short Fiction and Sketches (crónicas)
Cuentos frágiles, Mexico City: Biblioteca Honrada, 1883
Hojas sueltas, prologue by Carlos Díaz Dufóa, Mexico City: Antigua Imprenta de Murguía, 1912
Cuentos color de humo y Cuentos frágiles, Madrid: America, 1920
Obras inéditas. Crónicas de “Puck,” selected by E.K. Mapes, New York: Hispanic Institute, 1943
Divagaciones y fantasías: crónicas de M.G.N., edited by Boyd G. Carter, Mexico City: Secretaria de Educación Pública, 1944
Cuaresma del Duque Job y otras artículos, edited by Francisco González Guerrero, Mexico City: Chapultepec, 1946
Crónicas y fantasías, prologue by Salvador Novo, Mexico City: W.M.Jackson, 1948

Compilations and Anthologies of Prose Works
Cuentos completos y otras narraciones, prologue, edition and notes by E.K.Mapes, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1958
Obras, Crítica literaria I: Ideas y temas literarios. Literatura mexicana, compiled by E.K.Mapes; edited by Ernesto Mejía Sánchez, Mexico City: UNAM, 1959
Further Reading

“Gutiérrez Nájera y Martí como iniciadores del Modernismo,” Revista Iberoamericana 2.8 (1962.)
——“The Pseudonyms of Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera,” PMLA 4 (1949)
——Genesis del modernismo: Martí, Nájera, Silva, Casal, Mexico City: El Colegio de Mexico, 1966

Martin Luis Guzmán 1887–1976

Mexican novelist, essayist and journalist

One of Mexico’s best observers of the Mexican Revolution (1910–20), Martin Luis Guzmán is known above all for three works: El águila y la serpiente (The Eagle and the Serpent), La sombra del caudillo [The Shadow of the Tyrant], and Memorias de Pancho Villa (Memoirs of Pancho Villa). Although he was offered high military rank by several revolutionary leaders, Guzmán steadfastly retained his civilian status, occupying administrative posts in both the army and the government during the upheaval. Thus, he was perhaps able to portray prominent military figures with greater objectivity. He also served as Villa’s personal secretary, a post that accorded him a unique vantage point for two of his books.

El águila y la serpiente has been referred to as a novel, but it is in reality an autobiographical chronicle of Guzmán’s experiences between 1913 and 1915. With a sharp eye for detail and a keen sense of psychology, the author describes, among many others, Generals Venustiano Carranza and Álvaro Obregón, the former emerging as an egotist interested only in political power and the latter eliciting the label “farsante” (charlatan). But Guzmán’s fascination with Pancho Villa stems from a mixture of awe, respect and fear. Portrayed as the incarnation of primitive instinct and destruction, Villa nevertheless displays unquestionable military genius and a deep sympathy for Mexico’s downtrodden. He also obviously respects Guzmán, allowing him to search for his family in the final pages of the book, but begging him not to abandon him as so many others had done. Guzmán’s does in fact abandon Villa and ends his chronicle shortly before the latter’s defeat by Obregón.

Several chapters of El águila can be read separately as short stories. These include “La fiesta de las balas” (The Fiesta of Bullets), in which one of Villa’s officers shoots three hundred prisoners; “Pancho Villa en la cruz” (Pancho Villa on the Cross), which describes Villa’s torment after being persuaded that his order to shoot a large number of prisoners is unjustified; and “La muerte de David Berlanga” (The Death of David Berlanga), depicting the stoic demeanor of a young man condemned to death for having censured the wanton behavior of Villa’s men in the Mexican capital. The eponymous eagle and serpent represent emblems of Mexico, suggesting not only the nation’s search for identity but also the idealism (eagle) and the earthy reality (serpent) of the Revolution.

A roman-à-clef, La sombra del caudillo dramatizes events that occurred during the regimes of Presidents Obregón (1920–24) and Plutarco Elías Calles (1924–28), the tyrant of the title being a composite of these two leaders. After a series of complex political machinations, Ignacio Aguirre, the protagonist and minister of war, announces his candidacy for president against the candidate chosen by “the tyrant,” an act that ultimately leads to Aguirre’s assassination. (Aguirre embodies characteristics of General Adolfo de la Huerta, who led an unsuccessful uprising against Obregón in 1923, and General Francisco Serrano, who was shot by Calles for declaring his candidacy for president in 1927.) Although the “tyrant” makes only rare appearances in the novel, his dark shadow shrouds the entire nation in a nebulous, unstable political ambience replete with shifting alliances, intrigues and violence. Guzmán’s principal theme is the betrayal of the ideals of the Revolution by politicians interested only in power and personal gain. Despite Aguirre’s fatal flaws (he accepts bribes and lacks political acumen), he emerges as a courageous protagonist whose relations with his idealistic friend and alter ego, Axkaná, increase his appeal to the reader. Thus, although the novel ends with the murders of Aguirre and most of his followers, the badly wounded Axkaná—and presumably the revolutionary ideals he represents—manages to survive.

El águila y la serpiente and La sombra del caudillo both depict love affairs in their introductory chapters that foreshadow and allegorize the future action, enhancing the structural unity of the two works. In addition, both books are characterized by the author’s masterful literary style, an artistic combination of luminous description, impressionistic imagery and classical elegance.

In order to write his Memorias de Pancho Villa, Guzmán consulted Villa’s service records, his personal files, documents in the national archives and the notes he himself took on the many personal conversations he had with Villa. Guzmán’s purpose in writing the memoirs was twofold: to present a panorama of the Revolution and to vindicate the memory of the oft-maligned leader who, in Guzmán’s view, fought solely for social justice. Presented as Villa’s first-person account, although Guzmán admits to having taken some liberties with the general’s use of language, the memoirs begin with Villa’s escape to the mountains when, at the age of seventeen, he shot a landowner for raping his sister. Soon thereafter he joined the Revolution under the banner of Francisco Madero and rose to the rank of general. The book ends in April 1915 shortly after Villa’s defeat by Obregón in the battle of Celaya. Memorable in these pages are Villa’s high esteem for Madero, his scorn for Carranza and Obregón, and his personal bravery in countless battles throughout northern Mexico. But the reader is also struck by the many acts of cruelty Villa committed, seemingly without remorse, during the bloodiest phase of the Revolution.

The winner of several major literary prizes, Martin Luis Guzmán remains one of Mexico’s most important writers of the 20th century. His works are among the most readable of his nation’s literature.

GEORGE R. MCMURRAY

Biography

Selected Works

La guerrilla de Mexico, Madrid: Imprenta Clásica Española, 1915
A orillas del Hudson, Mexico City: Botas, 1920
La sombra del caudillo, Madrid: Espasa Calpe, 1929
Aventuras democráticas, Madrid: Compañía Iberoamericana de Publicaciones, 1931
Mina el mozo, héroe de Navarra, Madrid: Espasa Calpe, 1932
Filadelfia, paraíso de conspiradores, Madrid: n.p., 1933
El liberalismo mexicano en pensamiento y acción, 15 vols, Mexico City: Empresas Editoriales, 1947–50
Muertes históricas, Mexico City: Compañía General de Ediciones, 1958
Islas Marías, novela y drama, Mexico City: Compañía General de Ediciones, 1959

Compilations and Anthologies
Obras completas, Mexico City: Compañía General de Ediciones, 1961
Further Reading

These studies concentrate on theme, style, structure and, in the case of La sombra del caudillo, on the real-life identity of the characters.

Bruce-Novoa, Juan, “Martin Luis Guzmán’s Necessary Overtures,” Discurso Literario, vol. 4/1 (1986)

Portal, Marta, Proceso narrativo de la revolución mexicana, Madrid: Editorial Cultura Hispánica, 1977 [Chapter 5 has a section on Guzmán]
Felisberto Hernández 1902–1964

Uruguayan short story writer

Felisberto Hernández’s bizarre stories have always attracted a small group of admirers as well as a number of detractors. In his lifetime, some critics celebrated Hernández’s originality, humour and subversiveness: so at first did Jules Supervielle (the Uruguayan-born French poet) and later Ángel Rama. But his stories were more negatively received by others who, like Emir Rodríguez Monegal in a famous review (1948), attacked Hernández’s flawed Spanish and the unorthodox sexuality depicted in his tales.

In the River Plate in particular, perceptions of Hernández’s work have often been related to perceptions of the man. The favourable accounts of his character tend to come from those who knew Hernández personally but who were not his sexual partners (e.g. the critics Norah Giraldi de Dei Casa and Washington Lockhart, and Hernández’s daughter Ana María Hernández de Elena). Less positive versions are expressed by those who were lovers or wives (Paulina Medeiros, Reina Reyes) or who wrote from the Left whilst bearing in mind Hernández’s involvement with anti-communist campaigns (the strongest example is Tomás Eloy Martínez’s lively 1977 article). The relevance of biographical information is invited not only by the parallels between Felisberto’s life and the tribulations of his characters, but also by the meditative and overtly personal tone of his writing. This led a contemporary critic, Carlos Martínez Moreno (1964), to open a well-balanced article on Hernández by noting the excessive use of the first person pronoun in his stories.

It is usual to divide the work of Felisberto Hernández into three roughly chronological groups. Three preoccupations characterise all of Hernández’s stories, although a particular one commands each period. They are the workings of the mind, memory and eroticism. His early work consists of “coverless books.” These comprise a set of short and cheaply produced texts, but the lack of covers also relates to the books’ goal to encourage the reader’s active participation, as stated explicitly in the second of them, called precisely El libro sin tapas, 1929 [The Book without Covers]. These early texts are concerned with matters of philosophy and psychology, and, in particular, issues of perception. They are also imbued with humour. “Historia de un cigarrillo” [The Story of a Cigarette], displays some common features. In this mini-story the narrator gradually allocates intention to his cigarettes, corresponding to their “pequeño espíritu” (small souls). He becomes preoccupied in particular by the behaviour of the one cigarette which manages to avoid being smoked first by falling flat on the bottom of the packet and eventually by dropping into a puddle of water on the floor. The narrator’s declared “obsesión” with this cigarette is consistent with similar preoccupations with shapes and patterns in other early texts (e.g., “El vestido blanco” [The White Dress], of the same collection). It is also an instance of the personification of objects which continues throughout Hernández’s work, a famous example being “El balcón,” 1945 [The Balcony], where the female protagonist falls in love with the balcony where she spends most of her time and through whose painted glass windows she perceives the world. Much of the early material can be understood at least partly by bearing in mind the dominance in contemporary philosophy of subjectivist theories such as those of Bergson, Whitehead and William James. Hernández knew their work, but he was probably more influenced by the ideas of their local counterpart, Carlos Vaz Ferreira (1872–1958), who was his mentor and friend.

The second group of texts is made up of three novellas, Por los tiempos de Clemente Colling, 1942. [For the Times of Clemente Colling], El caballo perdido, 1943 [The Lost Horse], Tierras de la memoria [Lands of Memory] (posthumous but probably of 1944). In these works Hernández reminisces over his childhood and adolescence. The difficulties involved in such an enterprise are dramatised in El caballo perdido, which, according to his daughter, was the author’s favourite text. Whilst the first half of the story is devoted to the experiences of the narrator as a boy in the living room of his piano teacher Celina, the second half is concerned with the problems of attempting to recover the boy’s perspective. The narrator recalls the child’s ability to perceive the whole through any one of its parts: “Cuando el niño miraba el brazo desnudo de Celina sentía que toda ella estaba en aquel brazo” (When the child looked at the naked arm of Celina he felt that all of her was contained in that arm). Although such experience is now difficult, it can occasionally be achieved when the viewpoint of the child is fleetingly reenacted: “Hay un solo instante en que los ojos de ahora ven bien: es el instante fugaz en que se encuentran con los ojos del niño” (There is only one instant when the eyes of today manage to see in the right way: the brief instant when they meet the eyes of the child). Much of Hernández’s work attempts to depict mental experience which is close to that of a child and which differs from the logical and goal-oriented thinking of the adult. The latter has lost the capacity to see the “mystery” of things: “Las partes han perdido la misteriosa relación que las une” (The parts have lost the mysterious links that keep them together). “Mystery” is in fact one of a set of key terms which Hernández uses to denote the gains of an alternative perception.

The celebration of childhood is consistent with a general picture of infantilism in Hernández which was already noted by Rodríguez Monegal in his early review. The phenomenon also occurs in the third phase of his production, where the texts seem more interested in telling a plot than in reflection. This last group of texts comprises the stories of Nadie encendía las lámparas, 1947 [No One Turned the Lights On] and a few others which were published separately afterwards. In these stories eroticism, which was already conspicuous in the first part of El caballo perdido (e.g., when the boy touches the bust of a statue of a woman in Celina’s living room), now often assumes a central role. Some of the bizarre situations depicted in the collection include the woman in love with her balcony already mentioned, as well as the female sleepwalker who steps on a man that is lying on the floor in a room full of glass cabinets (“El acomodador,” [The Usher]) and the man who touches girls’ faces and a set of mundane objects in a dark tunnel in his country house, with the aim of generating new meanings and sensations to be recollected. afterwards (“Menos Julia” [All But Julia]). The most outrageous text in this sense is “Las Hortencias” [The Hortencias], the story of a man who becomes increasingly interested in dolls as a replacement for his wife and who goes as far as having them filled with hot water to enhance their similarity to humans. Infantile too is the overt preference of the male protagonists of the later stories for large and passive matrons who are prepared to let the narrator desire them without making demands of mutuality in return. Two examples of this ideal woman are Ursula, in the eponymous tale, who is likened to a dairy cow, and Señora Margarita, of the last text published in Hernández’s lifetime, La casa inundada, 1960 [The Flooded House], whom the narrator splits into two: the innocent one who in his fantasy belongs to him alone, and the one who is still attached to the memory of her stranded husband. He prefers the former because “(en ella) mi imaginación podía intervenir libremente” (on her my imagination could intervene freely). When women refuse to act maternally and instead demand commitment on the part of the narrator, he tends to flee (as in “Las Hortencias” and “Menos Julia”).

The future of Felisberto Hernández studies seems bright. One current tendency in criticism focuses on the richness and ambiguity of his writing (a recent example is the article by Stephanie Merrim on the subject of the “other” in Hernández’s short fiction). There is still much to explore as regards the peculiarity of the mind depicted in his texts, an issue which continued to preoccupy Hernández until his death, as shown in his dense and unfinished Diario del sinvergüenza [Diary of the Scoundrel], where he ponders the relationship between his mind and his body (the scoundrel of the title). Reina Reyes’s short essay on the man Hernández, where she claims he was a schizophrenic, is an interesting source in this respect. A return to more negative evaluations of Hernández is also likely in the light of gender studies.

Two important monographs on Hernández are Lasarte (traditional) and Echavarren (Lacanian), both in Spanish. Although full-length studies in English are still to come, an international homage to Felisberto Hernández took place in Washington, DC, in April 1993. Part of the explanation for the relatively little attention Hernández’s work has received outside the River Plate lies in the lack of readily accessible editions of his work, until recently jealously guarded by Hernández’s family (see Ana María Hernández de Elena’s prologue to Hernández’s Narraciones fundamentales [1993]). Two editions of Nadie encendía las lámparas, one recent (Catedra’s Letras Hispánicas series) and the other imminent (Colección Archivos) will no doubt encourage teachers and critics to explore this unusual writer. It is fortunate that several of his collected short stories are now available in English since his quirky sense of humour and fondness for the absurd in “ordinary” urban contexts are bound to appeal to an Anglo-Saxon readership.

GUSTAVO SAN ROMAN

Biography

Born in Montevideo, Uruguay, 20 October 1902; father from Canary Islands, mother Uruguayan.

Attended primary school in Montevideo; no further academic training, although in later life he was befriended by the philosopher Carlos Vaz Ferreira and important local psychiatrists.

Learned piano from early age, tutored by teachers who appear in his stories. Played piano on tours around Uruguay and Argentina, often to accompany silent films at the cinema. In 1940s writing took over from piano as main activity. Worked intermittently as minor civil servant, but

Selected Works

Short Fiction

Fulano de Tal, Montevideo: José Rodríguez Riet, 1925
El libro sin tapas, Montevideo: Rocha: Imprenta “La Palabra,” 1929
La cara de Ana, Montevideo: Mercedes, 1930
La envenenada, Montevideo: Florida, 1931
Por los tiempos de Clemente Colling, Montevideo: González Panizza Hermanos, 1942
El caballo perdido, Montevideo: González Panizza Hermanos, 1943
Nadie encendía las lámparas, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1947
Las Hortensias, Montevideo: Imprenta La Gaceta Comercial, 1950
La casa inundada, Montevideo: Alfa, 1960
Tierras de la memoria, Montevideo: Arca, 1965

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras completas, 6 vols, edited by Norah Giraldi de Dei Cas and José Pedro Díaz, Montevideo: Arca, 1967–74

Narraciones fundamentales, edited by Walter Rela, Montevideo: Relieve, 1993 [Includes an up-to-date secondary bibliography]

Translations

“A Windy Morning” [Una mañana de viento], “El balcón” [The Balcony] and “Just Before Falling Asleep” [paragraph from “Mi primer concierto en Montevideo”], translated with an introduction by Luis Harss, Review 2.0 (Spring 1977)
Piano Stories, translated by Luis Harss, with an introduction by Italo Calvino, New York: Marsilio, 1993 [Contains Nadie encendía las lámparas, La casa inundada, Las Hortensias, and Explicación falsa de mis cuentos]

Further Reading

Martínez, Tomás Eloy, “Para que nadie olvide a Felisberto Hernández,” Plural, vol. 6/7 (1977)
José Hernández 1834–1886

Argentine writer and politician

José Hernández, a writer and political figure of the second half of 19th-century Argentina, is by far best known as the author of the great poem Martín Fierro. Hernández, who suffered as a child from pulmonary problems, was raised on a ranch near Buenos Aires where he came to know first-hand and for many years the gauchos who worked for his father’s cattle-raising operation. While Hernández was assuredly not himself a gaucho, he came to know their speech, customs and mannerisms as if he were, and his identification with rural life and the values the gauchos represented—freedom above all from the restrictions, oppression and subordination imposed by the nearby capital city—led him to defend the provinces in their struggle for self-determination against the inevitable domination of Buenos Aires. In this cause Hernández, who in time became a Senator, published a journal, El Río de la Plata, in which, although it lasted less than a year, he espoused his views and defended the rural way of life, whose traditions contained the national essence of Argentina. He also published in numerous other periodicals of the time. In his essays and addresses he not only opposed, in the highest Romantic tradition, forces which were almost certainly bound to defeat him and which for a time exiled him to Brazil, but also the most powerful and prestigious politicians of his time, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento and Bartolomé Mitre among them. His pro-countryside campaigns and writings moderated in his latter years, although it is not fully clear whether this is owed to a moderation of his social view or a simple recognition that change was on its way: that it could not be resisted, but merely accommodated and humanized as best as could be managed.

Hernández, in spite of a certain prominence in Argentine politics of his time, is nevertheless remembered as the poet who wrote Martin Fierro: so much so that the character of Fierro is often associated with Hernández himself, something which the poem itself would seem to encourage, due to brief moments of apparent authorial intervention. To whatever degree the relationship of Fierro to Hernández is valid as a projection fusing both his own aspirations and a view of Argentina’s past and future—it is said he was often called “Senator Martin Fierro”—it may be said that most readers know and care rather less about the author than about his creation: as with Cervantes and Don Quixote. Both authors’ realities are subsumed into those of their creations.

Hernández’s formal education was limited to elementary school, so that like so many Spanish American writers he was essentially self-taught. This fact underscores the credibility of his character Fierro, who also learned more from life itself than from other, indirect and hence unreliable, sources. (One may contrast here the outrageously picaresque world-view offered by the character Vizcacha with the moralizations and sage advice of Fierro to his sons near the end of the poem.) This difference between Hernández and other Latin American Romantics, such as those who authored the “cuadros de costumbres” (short sketches of local color and customs) is crucial, for in his great poem sheer intellect is always balanced and enriched by the Pampa and first-hand experience. Hernández thus avoids the dull ontological generalizations of certain other Romantic (and Neoclassic) writers. This “materialistic” quality of his poem is one of its major characteristics, and enables its relatively simple examples and teachings to achieve a credibility quite rarely, if ever, achieved by his more abstractly sententious contemporaries. It is also a major component of his work’s artistic value, which far surpasses that of earlier gaucho poems, a description which is hardly adequate to Hernández’s great Martin Fierro, for while it is, in setting, a gaucho poem, it goes far beyond the terrain explored by his predecessors to become a great deal more, being also a philosophy of life, a song from the heart of Argentina and a vision and a plan for the future.

Just as Hernández’s political program sought to defend a dual Argentina—countryside and city in approximate counterbalance—his poem sought and found a dual audience. The first part, the Ida [Departure] is principally destined for the reader in Buenos Aires, largely ignorant of life in the countryside and even more mistrustfully so of the gauchos whose basic manual labor provided their sustenance. He explicitly wrote of Fierro as a “type” (which he is, although a fundamentally different type from any known before) who would represent gaucho life and values to the city-dwelling reader and vindicate a tradition Hernández considered as valuable as it was unknown. The second and final part of the poem, the Vuelta [Return] was explicitly aimed at the gaucho as well as at the reader in Buenos Aires, for the advice Fierro gives his sons is also clearly given to the latter-year gaucho for his survival and integration into Argentina’s future. As Hernández wrote, one of his objectives was to bring even reading itself, long associated only with the upper classes and the cities, to the gaucho: the book is intended to “despertar la inteligencia y el amor a la lectura en una población casi primitiva, a servirle de provechoso recreo, después de fatigosas tareas, a millares de personas que jamás han leído” (awaken the understanding and the love of reading in a nearly primitive people, to serve as a useful entertainment, after arduous chores, for thousands of people who have never read). It is part of the popular tradition that the gauchos believed the poem to have been written by one of themselves, and that they would recite long passages from it. It is more certain that Hernández’s poem has both entered and helped form the Argentine national identity—not without conflict and inconsistencies, be it said, for Argentines, like their great narrator Jorge Luis Borges, simultaneously tend to be book-inspired intellectuals and dancers of tangos, both gaucho and political philosophers. Socio-economic history makes clear that Hernández’s side largely lost the struggle for Argentina’s development; cultural history makes equally clear that as long as Martín Fierro lives—as long as Martin Fierro is read—the gaucho’s and Hernández’s ideals will persist. The character Martín Fierro and the poem in which he is given birth give eloquent and moving expression to the contradictions and aspirations of the intimate life of his nation, and much of Latin America.

PAUL W. BORGESON, JR

Biography

Born in the hamlet of Caserío de Perdriel in the province of Buenos Aires, Argentina, 10 November 1834. His fortunes as a child were very mixed. First of all, because his parents travelled a good deal and left him with an aunt. José was separated from her at the age of six and developed a strong sense of orphanhood. Placed next in the care of his paternal grandfather close to Buenos Aires. Attended school run by a gifted teacher, Pedro Sánchez, in Barracas, 1841–45. But period of formal education was brief. His mother died in 1843 and he was then sent to live with his father in the pampas. Father in charge of vast cattle ranches and José was captivated by the prairies and the life of the gauchos. He learned the skills of the plainsmen. After the fall of Rosas (1852), Hernández was recruited into the Federalist army. For many years he lived equally by the sword and the pen. Fought against the Unitarians, who wanted to fashion a centralized nation state with all the power radiating from Buenos Aires. Worked also as a soldier, politician, civil servant and journalist. Fought in several battles against the Unitarians. This period of civil war was a painful experience to him and he referred to it as the “nine terrible years” (between the battle of Caseros, 1852, when Rosas’s forces were defeated, to Pavón in 1862). Married Carolina González del Solar in 1863 and worked as a lawyer and teacher of Spanish literature at a secondary school. Founding editor of the newspaper El Río de la Plata, Buenos Aires, August 1869 to April 1870. This was his most ambitious journalistic undertaking. As late as 1868 he took part in the armed resistance of Evaristo López, governor of the remote province of Corrientes. Went into exile in the south of Brazil in 1872 where he came into contact with the Brazilian gauchos. Forced into exile again, seeking refuge this time in Uruguay, when he fell foul of the Unitarian president of Argentina, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento. Returned to Argentina in 1875 and prospered as a landowner. Elected to Chamber of Deputies and later to Senate. Died 21 October 1886, while fulfilling his duties as senator.

Martin Fierro

Narrative poem by José Hernández

Martin Fierro is the greatest single work of Spanish American Romanticism, and among the very finest writings in Spanish at any time or in any country. Aside from its universally recognised merit as an outstanding work of literature, this long poem’s impact is such that for many readers it is one of two works (together with Domingo Faustino Sarmiento’s Facundo) which define Argentine national identity. The poem and its character are both born of specifically Argentine roots, and persist today as a firmly implanted symbol of the romantic side of the national psyche. In this sense, the poem may be compared, for example, to the relationship of Don Quixote or The Cid to Spain, for these, like Martín Fierro, are works which serve their respective countries as symbols both mythical and epic in character.

El gaucho Martín Fierro is the formal title of the poem published by José Hernández in 1872, although it is often referred to as the Ida [Departure], since at its conclusion the eponymous hero and his gaucho companion Sergeant Cruz have left white civilization in disgust at their mistreatment by the authorities, to live amid the Pampa Indians. Seven years later, Hernández published La vuelta de Martín Fierro [Martin Fierro’s Return] the continuation and conclusion of the entire work. The two sections together form a single poem which marks the passing of the 19th century (the Ida) and then in the Vuelta announces the beginning of the 20th century. For the Martín Fierro who returns to white lands (Cruz dies during their self-exile) is only in part the same gaucho who departed, and the conjoining of the two parts plaintively reflects both the melancholy of loss and the promise of the coming Modernity. In sum, it appears that the gaucho must “die”—that is, change, evolve, integrate himself—so that the new Argentine society, of which Fierro himself is among the first prototypes, may emerge. Hernández foresaw that neither the Indians, against whom the gauchos were conscripted to fight and whose values are portrayed as still more vile than those of the Spanish-speaking society, nor the traditional gauchos—indeed, independent, self-reliant, with a unique cultural, linguistic and even racial heritage—will survive the changes of time.

The evolution of Martín Fierro is clearly a paradigm of the changes already taking place in Argentina when the poem was written. As the result of government policy, by the 1880s the traditional gaucho and his way of life had been laid to rest. Hernández’s simultaneous lament for the Romantic past—valor, honesty, personal merit and the belief in justice—and the ambivalent welcome given to the inevitable future is one of the poem’s most fundamental and appealing characteristics, both as a work of poetry and as allegory of Argentine society at a time of transition.

The poem’s plot is typically Romantic in its reliance upon fortuitous encounters of characters and the loose stringing together of events, less a matter of causality than of the hope that the presence of the random in life may not preclude the finding of some sense and a personal place within it. Also much in the tradition of the Romantic movement, characterization is much more important and convincing than plot, that of Fierro foremost, but even that of Cruz, the black gauchos who appear in both parts and the vividly popular characters of Vizcacha and Picardía, the latter of whom turns out to be a long-lost son of Cruz. All major characters in Hernández’s creation both rely on recognizable typologies, which they then turn to the poem’s internal needs, and establish new types: Picardía and Vizcacha, notably, are traditional picarons who adapt to the changing and morally subjective experience of the Pampa; and Fierro, in his turn, has a good deal of the epic hero in him, yet this poem’s generic classification is elusive. Epic and picaresque characteristics have been mentioned, along with social criticism and historical underpinnings; yet even more obvious, and more enjoyable in the actual reading, are the highly lyrical passages in which Fierro, principally, sings—the entire poem is sung with guitar accompaniment—of love, loss, fate and faith. Plot, finally, becomes clearly secondary to both characterization and, best of all, the experience of language itself, the level at which Hernández reaches his greatest powers.
Martin Fierro is among the first serious poems written in what is largely popular Spanish, long considered by a society still stratified by class as unworthy of great themes and high literature. Hernández had lived among gauchos as a child, and had both learned much about their lives and absorbed their way of speech, which he remarkably makes the exclusive level of style for his poem. The radical nature of this departure should not be underestimated: for decades to come, popular language will (when it appears at all) tend to be relegated to a secondary, “picturesque” level of cultural curiosity. Yet Martin Fierro uses it to tell the entire tale, with no authorial intromission of the formal language of the Buenos Aires metropolis for which the poem—the Ida in particular—was in part written. Few authors indeed, until the works of Juan Rulfo in the 1950s, will use only spoken-style speech to achieve the degree of lyrical beauty which poetic tradition only associated with the speech of the educated. Hernández, through Fierro, teaches us that the untutored can see truths to which formal education can blind us; that we can express all human thought and emotion in language that is ours, not the Others’; that, finally, until language actually belongs to and is remade by its user, neither intellectual nor esthetic freedom can be achieved.

Several metrical forms are used in Martin Fierro, the most common being the “hermandina,” named for the poem’s author (although he did not invent the form). All forms are popular in use, with frequent open rhymes and an improvisational connotation proper to the spontaneous story-telling and “duels” of singers in the Pampa pulperías (bars). Rhetorical resources are believably modest, with a great reliance on simile rather than metaphor, especially those relating to Nature, the gaucho’s real guide and model for human life: Fierro’s young children are “como los pichones / sin acabar de emplumar” (like nestlings whose feathers haven’t yet formed); he himself, in his fury at their disappearance, wanders “como el tigre / que le roban sus cachorros” (like a jaguar whose cubs have been stolen). Yet for many readers the most revelatory moments of this marvelous poem’s expressive power come when Fierro, late in the Vuelta, wins an improvisational verbal duel with the brother of the black gaucho he had fought and killed in the Ida, posing and answering questions of each other until one finally cannot answer. Fierro here answers what “quantities” are, by saying that “Dios / no crió cantidá ninguna. / El ser de todos los seres / sólo formó la unidad; / lo demás lo ha criado el hombre / después que aprendió a contar” (God / created no quantities. / The Being of all Beings / formed only unity; / mankind made up the rest / after he learned to count). Fierro, simply and directly, tells us here that division and isolation, which he has lived in his own flesh for years, are creations not of God but of humankind. Similarly, he tells us in a simple and meaningful way what time itself is: no astrophysical or subconscious abstraction, but only “tardanza / de lo que está por venir” (the delay / in that which is to come). Fierro, finally, teaches the educated reader just as he does the gaucho himself, and becomes as much a model in understanding of life as he is the supreme gaucho.

One striking characteristic of Martin Fierro is its frequent use of humor, something hardly characteristic of the Romantic movement, which—when it is used at all—typically used it from outside the thing rendered comical, such as in the mockery of rustic simplenmindedness and unsophistication one finds in some gaucho poems which preceded Hernández’s masterpiece. In Martin Fierro, by contrast, humor not only provides necessary contrast between scenes and situations, but it always comes from within the gaucho subculture. It serves, then, not to distance but to conjoin and to allow the reader to share in the experience. (Vizcacha and Picardía, gaucho versions of the Golden Age gracioso, or comic servant, are the principal examples of humor, yet the reader is so “seduced” by Fierro’s gaucho ethic that we judge him from Fierro’s own point of view.) It is also to be noted that such are Hernández’s skill and resourcefulness that his use of humor in no way diminishes the lyricism of his portrait of nature or the heroism of his characters: Fierro himself uses it on several occasions and achieves a greater credibility, a richer humanity, for it.

Martin Fierro enjoyed unprecedented popular success, although critical reaction lagged somewhat behind. Within two years of publication it had gone through nine printings, and in its first three decades 60,000 copies had been sold. It is today one of the relatively few works, especially of poetry, not only to be known but actually to be read, by a wide readership of all classes. Its multiple dimensions, rich creativeness, fusion of traditional literary modes and insightfulness into human nature and historical and cultural forces and—above all—its marvelous, flexible and unmatched use of the language of real people, rendering its characters and their plights equally real, make of Martin Fierro one of the greatest literary creations of the Spanish language.

PAUL W. BORGESON, JR

Editions

First edition: El gaucho Martín Fierro. Contiene al final una interesante memoria sobre el camino trasandino, Buenos Aires: Imprenta de La Pampa, 1872
La vuelta de Martin Fierro, Buenos Aires: Imprenta de Pablo F. Coni, 1879

Critical editions: There are several. Among the more recent and accessible of both the Ida and the Vuelta is that by Luis Sainz de Medrano, Madrid: Cátedra, 1987

Further Reading

Aragón, Roque Raúl and J. Calcetti, Genio y figura de José Hernández, Buenos Aires: Universitaria de Buenos Aires, 1972
Azeves, Ángel Hector, La elaboración literaria del “Martín Fierro,” La Plata: Universidad Nacional de La Plata, 1960
Battistessa, Ángel, José Hernández y “Martín Fierro” en la perspectiva del tiempo, Buenos Aires: Academia Argentina de Letras, 1972
Borges, Jorge Luis and Adolfo Biyo Casares, prologue to Poesía gauchesca, Buenos Aires: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1955
Isaacson, José (editor), Martín Fierro: cien años de crítica, Buenos Aires: Plus Ultra, 1986
Martínez Estrada, Ezequiel, Muerte y transfiguración de Martín Fierro, 2 vols, Buenos Aires: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1948; revised edition, 1958
Julio Herrera y Reissig 1875–1910

Uruguayan poet, prose writer and dramatist

One of the major poets of 20th-century Uruguay, Herrera y Reissig also wrote essays such as “Conceptos de crítica” [Critical Concepts], “El círculo de la muerte” [The Circle of Death], short stories, “El traje lila,” “Delicias fúnebres” and “Mademoiselle Jacquelin (sic)” [respectively: The Lilac Dress, Funereal Delights and Mademoiselle Jacquelin], three plays, and other prose writings.

From a privileged background, and a member of a prominent political family, Julio Herrera was born with a serious heart condition that caused his premature and much regretted death at the age of thirty-five. None the less, in his short but eventful life he was one of the poetic voices of Spanish American Modernism that developed an original expressive system and who left an indelible mark on Modernist discourse in a manner not unlike that of Rubén Dario, the Nicaraguan poet whose personality and work shaped much fin-de-siècle poetic production.

Julio Herrera had read with great care the Latin and Greek poets during his formative years; he also had extensive in-depth knowledge of Golden Age Spanish and 19th-century French poetry, both of which provided an advantageous platform from which to elaborate and develop a poetic praxis to challenge the modernista canon. His poetry brings a stronger sense of formalism to Dario’s metrical, rhythmic and rhyme-innovative procedures in Spanish versification. He also reintroduced pastoral themes treated with parodic and humorous wit.

Herrera is considered a late modernista whose work illustrates well the contradictions of this important period of Spanish American literary history. As Gwen Kirkpatrick remarks: “Julio Herrera y Reissig filled his short life…with a dazzling output of verse and prose which startled its early readers and continues to evoke astonishment even among contemporaries.” Kirkpatrick is referring to his skilful mastery of versification, remarkable ability in the manipulation of language, and daring experimentation with classic and modern poetic forms. Herrera’s literary material incorporated elements from diverse and often apparently unrelated semantic fields with pleasurable irreverence when mixing elements from science, technology, mythic pastoral figures and the erotic. All are linked by a skilful management of sonorous lexical items, set by unexpected metaphors and original alliterations.

Herrera was strongly attracted to the poetry of French Symbolist Albert Samain (1858–1900), as other modernistas before him, but he remains a remarkably original creator in the use of tropes involving accumulation of detail to produce the effect of overloading, well exemplified in the poems of Los parques abandonados [The Deserted Parks].

In August, 1899, Herrera began to publish La Revista, a magazine of literature and science to provide the new generations of Uruguayans with a space where they might present new ideas. He published twenty-two issues; however, the magazine ceased to appear when the poet’s heart condition worsened, rendering him unable to continue with this worthy enterprise. His acute illness led him to find relief in morphine, a common drug used for heart disease. Herrera took advantage of this situation and romanticized the use of drugs. He spoke of the importance of experimenting with narcotics. In his short story “Delicias fúnebres,” he describes his experience with this type of artificial paradise.

He and a group of his friends and colleagues met to discuss their intellectual concerns in a place he named “The Tower of the Panoramas,” mostly an imaginary forum of Herrera’s creative imagination. It required, as Hugo Achúgar indicates, adherence to certain aesthetic-ideological principles that united these writers. Among its members were Horacio Quiroga, César Miranda and Roberto de las Carreras.

The books of poems compiled by the poet himself include the following titles and dates, according to the 1961 edition of the Poesías completas of Julio Herrera y Reissig by Roberto Bula Piriz: Los Peregrinos de piedra, 1903 [The Stone Pilgrims], Los éxtasis de la montaña. Eglogánnimas, 1904–07 [Mountain Ecstacies], La torre de las esfinges, 1909 [The Sphinxes’ Tower], Los parques abandonados, 1902–05 [The Deserted Parks], and Las campanas solariegas, 1907 [Manor House Bells]. Additional poems left unpublished by Herrera’s untimely death, and numerous new titles are included in this edition.

Herrera’s lyric production bears witness to the rapid transformation and modernization of Uruguay. In his valuable study of the impact of Modernismo on Uruguayan society, Hugo Achúgar attests to the importance of Julio Herrera y Reissig’s literary production thus: “His passion for Art, his aesthetic adherence and his zeal for certain canonical Modernism texts were fully assumed [by the poet]...[His poetic work] aims at the construction of a universe and at its very destruction”. This statement is best exemplified in his most remarkable collection of poems, Los peregrinos de piedra.

MAGDALENA GARCÍA PINTO

Biography

Born in Montevideo, Uruguay, on 9 January 1875. Sixth of nine children. Father lost his wealth in 1882. and family had to leave their luxurious home. Suffered from a heart condition from his childhood. Published first poems in 1898. In 1899 began to work as secretary of the Minister of Education (Instrucción Pública); resigned after 18 months. In 1904 made his one journey abroad, to Buenos Aires, where he spent five months and worked in the Census Office. On his return to Montevideo, appointed to editorial board of the newspaper La Democracia. Married Julieta de la Fuente in 1908. By 1909 he was gravely ill and living in poverty through being unable to work. Died in 1910.

Selected Works

Poetry
Los peregrinos de piedra, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1910; as Los éxtasis de la montaña, La Plata, Argentina: Calomino, 1943
Las pascuas del tiempo, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1913
La vida y otros poemas, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1913
El teatro de las humildes, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1913
Las lunas de oro, Montevideo: O.M.Bertani, 1915
Cíes alucinada, San José, Costa Rica: Alsino, 1916
Ópalos (poemas en prosa), Buenos Aires: Glusberg, 1919
Los parques abandonados, Buenos Aires: America, 1919

Other Writings
“Epílogo wagneriano” a “La política de fusión,” Montevideo: García y Compañía, 1902.
Prosa: crítica, cuentos, comentarios, Montevideo: García y Compañía, and Valencia: Cervantes, 1918
El renacimiento en España, Montevideo: García y Compañía, 1919

Compilations and Anthologies
Poesías completas y páginas en prosa, edited with an introduction by Roberto Bula Piriz, Madrid: Aguilar, 1961
Herrera y Reissig: antología, estudio crítico y notas, edited by Rogelio Mirza, Montevideo: Arca, 1975
Poesías, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1977
Poesía completa y prosa selecta, edited by Alicia Migdal, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1978

Further Reading
Achúgar, Hugo, Poesía y sociedad. (Uruguay 1880–1911), Montevideo: Arca, 1985
Amestoy Leal, Beatriz, Poética de lo imaginario: la mujer y su configuración imaginaria en la poesía de Julio Herrera y Reissig, Montevideo: Trilce, 1991
Bula Piriz, Roberto, introduction to Poesías completas y páginas en prosa de Julio Herrera y Reissig, Madrid: Aguilar, 1961
Hahn, Oscar, “Herrera y Reissig o el discreto encanto de lo cursi,” Texto Crítico 5 (1979)
Rama, Ángel, Las máscaras democráticas del modernismo, Montevideo: Arca, 1985
Sucre, Guillermo, La máscara, la transparencia. Ensayos sobre poesía hispanoamericana, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1975
Vilariño, Idea, Julio Herrera y Reissig, Montevideo: Técnica, 1974
Yurkievich, Saúl, Celebración del modernismo, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1976

Special Issues of Journals
Caballo Verde para la Poesía, Madrid, 5 (1937)

Fernand Hibbert 1873–1928

Haitian novelist and dramatist
Fernand Hibbert, a member of the Generation de la Ronde, stands out in the history of the Haitian novel by virtue of the eloquence of his satirical wit. The literary movement of La Ronde (The Circle), whose other members include Frédéric Marcelin, Justin Lhérisson and Antoine Innocent, falls between the Patriotic Movement (1860–98) and the Indigenous Movement formed after the American occupation in 1915. The Generation de la Ronde differs from its predecessors through the production of a literary discourse which aims for the universal and which draws from the French Realist tradition. The times of turmoil of the “bayonets,” which marked a period of economic and political disaster in Haiti, constitutes the socio-political background from which Fernand Hibbert draws the inspiration for his depiction of Haitian life during the years preceding 1914.

Strongly influenced by French literature, Hibbert’s writing evokes the skepticism of Renan as well as that of Anatole France. Likewise, following the example of Balzac, Hibbert creates an étude de moeurs. Further, the reappearance of some characters from novel to novel, or from tale to tale (as is the case of Masques et visages [Masks and Faces]), as well as, in particular, the opening scene of Les Thazar [The Thazars]—where the mansion Thazar is depicted with the same narrative technique as the Vaquer pension in Le Père Goriot (Old Goriot)—attest to the influence of the French master of the Realist novel over Hibbert. However, unlike Balzac, who varies his depiction of social classes from one novel to another, Hibbert sets his scenes primarily in Port-au-Prince and focuses almost exclusively on the greedy and malicious merchant bourgeoisie and on the corrupt and conspiratorial world of local politicians. Only a handful of characters, acting as the author’s spokesmen, retain a sense of dignity, in what may be called “scenes of Haitian life.”

The action, in Hibbert’s novels, often unfolds to the rhythm of conversations. These shed much light on the Haitian political, social and economic situation at the turn of the century. Whether trivial or serious, these conversations usually have the same objective: when illustrating the political or sentimental schemes of the bourgeois circles, they underscore the author’s latent criticism of the society, and when presenting the views of the writer’s spokesmen, they reveal equally caustic opinions. Some of these conversations may seem rather technical or philosophical, and therefore at first, not congruent with the smooth unfolding of the action. Yet, these same conversations often contain the very elements which feed the characters’ consciences and which guide the action to the final outcome. Therefore, in Sénà (1905), Hibbert’s first novel, while the eponymous character Sénà acts as the central figure in the first part, which takes place in Port-au-Prince, his role becomes overshadowed in the second part of the novel by the author’s spokesman, Dehli, as a consequence of the latter’s erudition and discursive power over his companions. The attention given to Dehli’s conversations is such that, by the end of the book, his discussions become the only real justification for Sénà’s rather sudden conversion to altruism.

The prevalence of social and political satirical discourse characterizes Hibbert’s works. His satirical vision finds its niche in a series of recurring themes: cases of adultery, matchmaking, political conspiracies, and financial schemes.

With regard to the social scene, Hibbert’s satire lends itself to several rather comical and finely crafted episodes. In the series of adulteries, the reader is at a loss when trying to figure out which character to pity the most—whether it be the husband, the wife, or the lover, since the author seems intent on ridiculing every single one of them. Thus, for example, in Les Simulacres, 1923 [The Pretenses], Hibbert’s last novel, Mr. Hélénus Caton, after having committed “several crimes” and having spent “a year…in the ministry,” to ensure his wealth for his late years, becomes cuckolded before being deprived by his wife’s lover of a healthy sum of money that he had himself acquired in not too honorable a fashion. The cheating wife, Céphise, after having made the most of her charms, is threatened with kidnapping by her handsome lover. Last, the Cuban lover Pablo Alcantaro is double-crossed by Dehli, the very man whose confidence he thought he had won, before being extradited to his own country. In conclusion, all of the characters have their fair share of misfortune, each time shattering the confidence they had in their actions.

In the series of matchmaking incidents, the union with a foreigner often stands as the common rule. This model recurs with some variations in Les Thazar, Séna, and in a few tales of Masques et visages. The most representative example is certainly that of the young Cécile Thazar who, preferring a German to the Haitian man she loves, justifies her actions in the following materialistic terms: “J’épouse Schlieden parce que je ne veux pas de la vie petite, mesquine, tracassière des ménages sans fortunes...Evidemment tu n’es pas un pauvre diable, mais tu es Haïtien, et ton petit avoir est a la merci du plus infime bouleversement” (I am marrying Schlieden because I do not want [any of] the bothersome, petty and small life of destitute households...Obviously, you’re not a poor devil, but you are Haitian, and your meager assets are at the mercy of the slightest upheaval).

Functioning as a variation on the theme of matchmaking with a foreigner, the subject of a journey to Paris occurs often. Many dream about it, some accumulate money towards realizing that transatlantic experience, and a few return from their voyage enriched or ruined. However, the theme of foreign experience becomes tainted with political nuances in Les Simulacres, Hibbert’s only novel written after the American occupation in 1915. Here, the author’s point of view is twofold. It first finds its voice in the spokesman Brion, who considers the American intervention to have occurred only to the extent that the government prior to the occupation consisted of “shams.” He points out: “en ce moment, nous avons la liberté d’écrire, les autres libertés viendront. Le développement du pays par le travail et le commerce es imminent (vu que les Américains y ont un intérêt sérieux par le fait qu’ils détiennent toute notre dette publique).” (at this time, we have the freedom to write; other freedoms shall come. The development of the country through work and trade is imminent [since the Americans have a vested interest given that they hold our public debt]).” The opinion of the second spokesman, Delhi, stands in counterpoint; he regrets “the situation prior to the Occupation” which after all was “not so bad” when considering the trade-off: “Ce pays n’a plus d’honneur, plus de vie publique, plus de commerce, plus de souvenirs, plus de littérature, plus de gaieté; tout a sombre dans l’Américain!” (This country has no more honor, no more public life, no more trade, no more memories, no more literature, no more mirth; everything has foundered before the American!)

In the public sector, the satirical wit of the Haitian author does not abate. On the Hibbertian political scene, each one in turn benefits from the advantages of his position until the next term, that is, most generally, until the advent of a new government. Although such a pattern recurs in Hibbert’s work, the turbulent political situation in Haiti at the turn of the century is displayed with the utmost cynicism in Le Caïman [The Caiman], a one-act comedy, unpublished until the 1988 Deschamps edition. The title already announces the misunderstanding, since the caiman does not refer to the animal, but to a Haitian meal prepared with lamb meat. Indeed, this meal plays a noteworthy role in the distribution of ministerial seats. Further, this very meal, once enjoyed by the future president Vilmoret at the Dametois’s table entitles the head of the household to a seat in the government. Thereupon, anything goes and even before the official announcement is given, Dametois is solicited for money in his own home by his future subordinates.

As for the financial schemes, they dominate Hibbert’s work, whether they take place in the family, government or administrative circles. The two-act comedy, La Reclamation Hopton [The Hopton Complaint], perceptively illustrates the administration’s financial meandering. After a false accusation of conspiracy, several months of being stranded, numerous encounters with lawyers and administrators, and several climatic developments, the Pennsylvanian Hopton fails to recover his two trunks impounded by the customs office. Hopton’s grievance results in $1,000 in compensation, on behalf of the state of course, in order to dismiss the wrongdoing of its own administrators.
However, as one of the characters exclaims, “If we didn’t laugh in this country, well…
we’d choke to death. We laugh so as not to choke. That is the question”

Humour is the next principal facet of Hibbert’s work. One finds humour in the circumstances, in the language, and in the onomastics, since humour is evidenced in every line and even between the lines. It is that humour which keeps Hibbert’s stories from becoming sordid. The circumstances have their own share of facetiousness, and several of these have already been mentioned. As for the language used, the following definition from Les Simulacres will provide us with better insight: “Par l’action du milieu, le français que nous parlons et écrivons n’est pas plus français de France que l’anglais des Etats-Unis n’est l’anglais des Iles Britanniques—et j’ajoute que rien n’est plus ridicule qu’un puriste haïtien…” (Through the influence of the environment, the French that we speak and write is no more the French of France than the English spoken in the United States is the English of the British Isles,—and I shall add that nothing is more ridiculous than a Haitian purist …). Indeed, the author uses creolisms, regional terms or expressions, and sometimes even a few americanisms, which invariably color his writing. As another source of constant humour, one finds the onomastic: the reader encounters incongruous nicknames (Rorrotte, Chacha), some strongly charged names (Lamertume [Bitterness]; Mme Veuve Dutemple [Mrs Church Widow]) and some unexpected famous names (Lafayette Oscar, Rothschild).

This brief exposition on the works of Fernand and Hibbert would be incomplete should mention not be made to the attention given to history. Hibbert’s work is most of all a testimony that intends to be realistic and objective, and there is no doubt that it offers an inexhaustible wealth of social and economic insights into Haitian life at the turn of the century. However, one must add to this testimony the account of an episode of Haiti’s history, the siege of Miragoâne in 1833, related in Romulus (1908). This historical novel recounts the ten-month civil war of opposition between Bazelais’s partisans and government troops. Although embellished, this work presents an important historical source on Haitian history, were it only for the notes at the bottom of the pages, which not only add more details, but also include excerpts from the Moniteur and from the Treasury Department’s report.

Yet the historical narration is intended to be more than a mere testimony. With equal respect to other themes presented in Hibbert’s work, the historical narration fits within Hibbert’s critical approach of Haitian politics. As illustrated in the following excerpt from Le Manuscrit de mon ami [My Friend’s Manuscript] (a sociological essay first published in 1910 as a series in the weekly journal Le Matin), to write is to commit oneself: “Si tu t’étais contenté de souffrir et de chercher en gémissant sans écrire, c’est a dire sans agir, ton existence serait ignorée aujourd’hui et ta chair pourrie se serait mêlée a la terre maternelle comme tant d’autres chairs d’hommes.” (If you had been content to suffer and to search without writing, that is, without acting, your existence would be ignored today and your rotten flesh would have mingled with the maternal soil as has the flesh of so many men).

Far from belonging to those quickly forgotten men, Fernand Hibbert initiates, along with his friends of La Ronde, a long tradition of political criticism widely embraced to this day.

MARIE-MAGDELEINE CHIROL

Biography

Selected Works

The volumes listed under Novels and Plays are to be found in the collection Esquisses d’hier, tableaux d’aujourd’hui, 7 vols, Port-au-Prince: Deschamps, 1988

Novels
Sêna, Port-au-Prince: L’Abeille, 1905; Port-au-Prince: Deschamps, 1988 [First published as a series in the periodical Le Soir]
Les Thazar, Port-au-Prince: L’Abeille, 1907; Port-au-Prince: Deschamps, 1988
Romulus, Port-au-Prince: L’Abeille, 1908; Port-au-Prince: Deschamps, 1988
Masques et visages, Port-au-Prince: L’Abeille, 1910; Port-au-Prince: Deschamps, 1988
Le Manuscrit de mon ami, Port-au-Prince: L’Abeille, 1923; Port-au-Prince: Deschamps, 1988 [First published in 1910 as a series in the periodical Le Matin]
Les Simulacres, Port-au-Prince: L’Abeille, 1923; Port-au-Prince: Deschamps, 1988

Plays
Une Affaire d’honneur; La Reclamation Hopton; Le Caïman, Port-au-Prince: Deschamps, 1988

Other Writings
“Une Mulâtre fille de Louis XIV,” La Ronde, Port-au-Prince, (July 1901)
“Le Néronisme de Rochambeau,” La Ronde, Port-au-Prince, (September 1901)
“Un Nègre a la cour de Louis XIV,” La Ronde, Port-au-Prince, (October 1901)
“La Bacchante,” La Ronde, Port-au-Prince, (15 January 1902)
The Historical Novel

Granted that almost two centuries have elapsed since independence, it is possible to affirm that the historical novel in Spanish America is one of constant production, with the variations that are characteristic of successive aesthetic trends, and which has currently achieved an important presence through the radical transformation of its concepts and structures. This fact is symptomatic of the persistent need to resolve questions of national identity in Latin America.

The production of the novel in Spanish America arises in relation to the organization of the nation-states, both because it is the space in which projects are proposed and because of the importance of creating a national literature. But perhaps the historical novel is the one which concentrates most directly on questions that are the result of the foundational reality, given the function of the historical as an interpretive model of real processes and, consequently, a legitimizer of the new status quo. According to 19th-century concepts of history, the novel can articulate an interpretation of time in which the study of the past serves to isolate the idiosyncratic features of each country. Representations of colonial society would allow authors to demonstrate weakness and strengths and thus integrate the role of each facet into the future social whole. The first example was the anonymous novel Jicoténcal, published in Philadelphia in 1826, and written following 18th-century models. However, the genre established itself in Spanish America via imitations of historical novels by European writers such as Sir Walter Scott, Alfred de Vigny and Alexandre Dumas père, among others, and with them also came the controversy concerning the consistency of such narratives. The long debate over the possible harmonizing of the opposite principles of historical truthfulness and fictional invention is well known. The subcontinent saw an early manifestation in the work of the Cuban José María Heredia, Ensayo sobre la novela, 1832 [Essay on the Novel], in which he posed and rejected this type of novel because of its irreconcilable terms. There was an abundance of historical narrative and there were wide, uneven debates over this issue. Argentine intellectuals of the Asociación de Mayo [May Association], statesmen, historians and writers were the ones who elaborated formulations of great relevance. During their period of exile in Chile, they participated in a widespread polemic concerning the historical theme. Soon after writing his historical novel La novia del hereje 1842, [The Heretic’s Betrothed], with a prologue that contains a definition of the genre, Vicente Fidel López wrote his Memoria sobre los resultados generales con que los pueblos antiguos han contribuido a la civilización de la humanidad [Historical Overview of the General Results with which the Ancient Peoples Contributed to Human Civilization] and Curso de Bellas Letras [Course in Fine Arts] in 1845, in which he explains his idea of history in relation to certain schools of historiography. He takes Walter Scott as his point of reference and following Thierry tends to favor a history that knows how to combine documentation with imagination. The historian, according to López, should be faithful to the facts, but should also know how to represent dramatic situations with art and style. In his 1882 polemic with Bartolomé Mitre, López notes that the historical novel and history should share the same goal.

The novel spread throughout the continent, as is shown by El Inquisidor mayor, 1852 [The Chief Inquisitor] by the Chilean Manuel Bilbao, to Enriquillo, leyenda histórica dominicana, 1882 (The Cross and the Sword) by the Dominican Manuel de Jesús Galván. However, in Colombia and Mexico there was a broader response, or it may seem so due to the existence of in-depth studies of the genre for these two countries. In Mexico the civil conflicts and the French invasion of Maximilian sharpened the interest in the past and the viewpoints that argued over the model of national construction. The novels of Justo Sierra, Juan A. Mateos and Riva Palacios, who were liberal politicians, usually deal with the theme of the Inquisition as a means of proclaiming the freedom of ideas and attacking the great power of the Catholic Church.

The new historical novel responds to the changes brought about by Postmodernism. Its importance is the symptom of a new crisis in the definition of the nation in Latin America, because the very concept of national identity is questioned. Now it is not a matter of knowing either what that past was like or what it teaches the present, but rather of invalidating cognitive worth and declaring that knowledge inconsistent. Theoretical goals of historiographical discourse as well as the values of the traditional historical novel have become relative. The first solution sought to harmonize truthfulness and fiction, but the current leveling of both discourses, considering the importance of the fictional in the historical discourse, allows the former to be diluted, and this now produces a text which is not faithful, and which admits the inexhaustible possibilities of the multiple. If the historical novel today, situated in the new sophistry of Postmodernism, from which it takes ideas such as the multiplicity of the self or the critique of the subject, does not overcome that neosophistic theoretical barrier, it will not have the ability to reach truth and will remain trapped in the dazzle of verbal pyrotechnics.

Alejo Carpentier is the writer who, in El reino de este mundo, 1949 (The Kingdom of this World), describes the passage from a documented narrative to another in which invention is dominant: Concierto barroco, 1974 (Baroque Concerto) and El arpa y la sombra, 1979 (The Harp and the Shadow). Nevertheless, the works which mark the point of no return are Yo el Supremo, 1974 (I the Supreme) by the Paraguayan Augusto Roa Bastos and Terra Nostra (1975), by the Mexican Carlos Fuentes. The younger exponents of this sceptical approach to history include writers such as Abel Posse, Fernando del Paso and Sergio Ramírez. Yo el Supremo is a historical novel which doubly questions historical representation and the representation of the novel itself. Undergoing a constant undermining of its narrative structures, it ends with the impossibility of affirming anything. Historiography and the historical novel are incapable of capturing truth and the only thing that is told is that something is being told. Thus history or the empty spots it leaves are rewritten through irony, parody, the grotesque, the collision of styles, anachronisms. This current tendency of fiction is accompanied by a critical revision of the colonial texts, particularly in the work of mestizo authors, focusing on their rhetorical complexities and relegating Positivist criteria to a secondary level.

In the same manner, certain critical tendencies deny both the existence of historical process and its theoretical representation. Consequently, their exponents do not accept the concept of the historical formation of a “nation.” Again, other critics have begun to develop a theory concerning national identities in Latin America and refuse to allow the concept of this historical process to be discarded. Their argument involves a rejection of monological principles, that is, a belief in a homogeneous and implicitly authoritarian reality. Instead, they propose a discourse which is articulated so as to portray the differences or heterogeneous features of national identity. Thus, the nation cannot be theorized according to its perceived essences or individual characteristics: “the Argentine” or “the Peruvian.” Its existence is affirmed, but it is defined in terms of the variety of characteristics, of factors which may appear and disappear, leaving their mark, yet not necessarily “eternal.”

LUIS MARTUL TOBÍO

See also the entry on Brazil: 19th-Century Prose and Poetry, for information about the Brazilian historical novel

Further Reading

Fiction
Gómez de Avellaneda, Gertrudis, Guatimozín, último emperador de Méjico, Madrid: Espinosa, 1846; as Cuauhtemac, the Last Aztec Emperor, translated by Mrs Wilson W.Blake, Mexico: F.P. Hoeck, 1898

Criticism
Balderston, Daniel (editor), The Historical Novel in Latin America: a Symposium, Gaithersburg, Maryland: Ediciones Hispamérica, 1986
Chang-Rodríguez, Raquel and Gabriela de Beer (editors), La historia en la literatura iberoamericana, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1989
Hermans, H. and M.Steenmeijer, La nueva novela histórica hispanoamericana, Amsterdam: Foro Hispánico, 1990
Menton, Seymour, Latin America’s New Historical Novel, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993
Meyer-Minnemann, Klaus, La novela hispanoamericana del fin de siècle, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1991 [Contains a section on La gloria de Don Ramiro]
Souza, Raymond D., La historia en la novela hispanoamericana moderna, Bogota, Colombia: Tercer Mundo, 1988 [See, in particular, the introduction, “La historia en la imaginación literaria latinoamericana”]
Honduras

19th-and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

Some literary historians have denied the existence of a specifically Honduran literature during the first decades of Central American independence, and have advanced social, economic and political instability to explain the paucity of literary production during the period from independence to the so-called liberal reform in the 1870s. One could argue, however, that it was precisely this instability regarding their future—whether they would become part of a Mexican empire, if they would join with the other Central American provinces to form a Central American federation, or to what extent they would become sovereign and independent nations—that was the reality and the raw material that informed and inspired the first literary expression of the Honduran people. The Central American provinces achieved independence from Spain in 1821. This date signified a transfer of power from the colonial elite to the wealthy and powerful provincial criollos, who then engaged in their own local as well as regional power struggles for several decades. These power struggles, as well as more altruistic meditations on themes of importance to the emerging nation, such as health, education, agriculture, laws and good government, inspired numerous poems, essays, tracts and speeches. One of the earliest and most important of these was the text of the last testament of Francisco Morazán (1792–1842), native of Tegucigalpa and fervent promoter of Central American union, who served as president of Central America from 1830–38, during its brief life as a regional federation. His last words, dictated to his son in the hours before his execution in Costa Rica, are an impassioned call to the youth of Central America not to let the flame of liberty die. He declares that he does not deserve to die for what he considers to have been patriotic deeds, and nobly forgives his executioners. Other examples of these historico-literary texts are the speech delivered by Dionisio de Herrera (1780–1850), Honduras’s first head of state, at the opening of the first legislative assembly (Comayagua, 1825), and “Meditaciones de un pueblo libre” [Thoughts of a Free People], written in 1822 by the illustrious statesman and president of Honduras from 1848–52, Luan Lindo (c. 1790–1857).

One individual stands out for his exemplary participation in regional politics as well as his voluminous writings on topics of practical and philosophical importance. José Cecilio del Valle (1777–1834), known as “El Sabio” [The Sage], was instrumental in drawing up the first Central American constitution in 1824. He was born in Choluteca, Honduras, studied in Guatemala, and worked and published in both Honduras and Guatemala. He wrote essays on a wide variety of topics, including laws and government, freedom of the press, statistics, agriculture, geography and astronomy, and maintained correspondence with intellectuals from England and America. His essay “Los maestros” [Teachers] is a good example of his vision, erudition and clarity of expression. In it he explains the importance of teachers to the well-being and progress of the nation, outlines a national plan for the preparation and evaluation of teachers, and argues for the establishment of a government fund to support public schools and teachers. He declares in favor of an organic approach to education in which theory is not divorced from observation of phenomena. In other essays he reiterates this concern. When he writes about “Estadística” [Statistics], for example, it is to exhort Hondurans not only to appreciate the importance of this science, but to compile statistical information about their own country, the better to know it, and consequently the better to govern it. Although his life and work are not as widely known as some of his contemporaries from other Latin American countries, he can be counted among such great 19th-century humanists as Venezuela’s Andrés Bello.

Two factors, one political, the other geographical, stand out as significant in having determined during the colonial period the nature of the geographical region that would become the nation of Honduras. These factors continued to be significant to cultural life in the 19th century. One was the political and cultural dominance of Guatemala, which had been the seat of government during colonial rule. The University of San Carlos in Guatemala City had traditionally been the preeminent institution of higher learning in Central America, and continued to be for many years after independence, until the other countries were able to establish and build up their own national universities. The Honduran National University was founded in 1847, but it took many years for it to grow to a size and prestige that would tempt young intellectuals to stay at home rather than go to study in one of the Guatemalan universities or the University of León in Nicaragua.

The second factor is topography and natural resources. Honduras was and continues to be the most sparsely populated of the Central American countries. The mountain range that cuts through the country effectively separates the north and south coasts and the rugged terrain has made transportation and communication difficult. The capital was moved in 1880 from Comayagua to Tegucigalpa, in the mineral-rich central mountains. Its location created a physical and cultural isolation that either kept Hondurans on the margins of regional and international cultural movements, or motivated them to leave the country to pursue an education or to be in touch with more cosmopolitan circles.

The years immediately following independence were characterized by a series of firsts in Honduran cultural life. In 1822 the first public elementary school was opened in Tegucigalpa. In 1829 the first printing press was brought to Honduras by Francisco Morazán, and it was used to print the first newspaper, La Gaceta del Gobierno [The Government Gazette], in 1830. Around this same time José Cecilio del Valle began Honduras’s first periodical, El Amigo de la Patria [The Friend of the Fatherland].

The leading cultural figure in Tegucigalpa at this time was the well-read and eloquent man of letters, Father José Trinidad Reyes (1797–1855). Besides being a tireless and prolific scholar, he was also a poet, playwright and gifted composer. He is remembered for having brought the first piano to Tegucigalpa, and he wrote the scores himself for his pastorelas. These were traditional plays to celebrate the Nativity. The opening scenes typically take place in the countryside, and Father Reyes used these scenes of dialogue among country-folk to moralize or to project his political opinions through his characters. He was also known for his cuando (whens), biting and witty satirical verses that get their name from the final word of each ten-line stanza. Among his essays, “Ideas de Sofía Seyers” [Sophia Seyers’s Ideas] is of particular interest for its clever defense of women’s education. His many accomplishments include the distinction of being the founder of the Honduran National University and the University Library.

The presidency (1876–83) of Marco Aurelio Soto (1846–1908) marked the beginning of the period known as the liberal reform. His attempt to organize, open and modernize the country led to an increase in foreign investment and the transformation from a subsistence to an export economy. In the socio-cultural realm, his government was responsible for the creation of the National Library and Archives and for improved transportation and communication due to the creation of a national postal and telegraph system and the construction of a southern highway. Soto’s advisors and ministers included noted intellectuals such as Ramón Rosa (1848–93) and Adolfo Zúñiga, (1836–1900), who worked indefatigably to establish public schools of primary and secondary education throughout the country, to reorient public education away from a clergy-dominated scholasticism and toward an emphasis on science and technology, and to create teachers’ colleges to train a new generation of educators. Rosa was an eloquent essayist and biographer. His biographical subjects include José Trinidad Reyes, José Cecilio del Valle and Francisco Morazán.

The willingness to devote public revenues to education and culture was a revolutionary concept in Honduras, and it soon bore fruit. The relative stability and openness of Honduran society at this time, as well as government sponsorship of study abroad, allowed for more international cultural exchange. This was reflected in the styles and themes adopted by the new generation of writers. The late 19th and early 20th centuries saw a proliferation of literate individuals who, while maintaining active participation in government, commerce or medicine, found time to write verses that reflected the themes and styles of Romanticism. Few poets devoted themselves exclusively to a literary occupation. The modern phenomenon of publishing companies did not exist then, rather, if financially able and so inclined, one might have one’s own book printed and distribute it among friends. Other ways of sharing one’s poetic expression were through literary periodicals of mostly ephemeral existence, such as El Guacerique, which survived for five issues around 1875, and by giving copies of one’s poems to friends or composing verses as gifts for special occasions or as remembrances in personal albums.

Among the late-19th-century poets are Adán Cuevas (1852–95), Carlos F. Gutiérrez (1861–99), Lucila Estrada de Pérez (1856–?), Josefa Carrasco (1855–1945) and Manuel Molina Vigil (1853–83). Critical opinion in Honduras often singles out from this group, José Antonio Domínguez (1869–1903), for the depth and quality of his poetry. His themes are quintessentially Romantic: beauty, freedom, idealism, the drama of nature, but the musicality of his verse connects him as well to Spanish American Modernismo. His most important work, “Himno a la materia” [Hymn to Matter], is an ambitious long poem that addresses the philosophical question of humanity’s spiritual and material nature.

Honduran writers at the turn of the century were aware of the then popular Modernismo, and many tried their hand at it, few with any great success, perhaps because its preciousness and exoticism were so far removed from their reality. One exception was Juan Ramón Molina (1875–1908), who achieved international acclaim and is considered one of Central America’s finest modernista poets. His collected lyrics were published in 1911 as Tierras, mares y cielos [Lands, Seas and Skies].

Hondurans in the first decades of the 20th century kept themselves informed of international literary trends largely through the efforts of their pre-eminent man of letters Froylán Turcios (1875–1943). He founded and/or directed numerous newspapers and literary journals, notably Esfinge [Sphinx] and Ariel, which published the work of Honduran writers as well as excerpts from classics of world literature, and the Boletín de la Defensa Nacional [Bulletin of National Defence], an important political paper that denounced the occupation of Tegucigalpa by US Marines in 1924. Besides novellas, short stories and poetry, Turcios chronicled his most interesting life in Memorias [Memoirs], published posthumously in 1980.

Narrative fiction made its appearance at the turn of the century with the publication of the first Honduran novel, by the prolific Lucila Gamero de Medina (1873–1964). A practicing physician, essayist, feminist and active Pan-Americanist, Doña Lucila published numerous novels during her long and productive life. The first two were published in Tegucigalpa in 1893: Amalia Montiel and Adriana y Margarita [Adriana and Margarita]. Her best known work is Blanca Olmedo (1903), a romantic novel that was controversial because of its open attack on the Catholic clergy. Carlos F. Gutiérrez’s novella, Angelina (1898), had enjoyed the reputation for being Honduras’s first novel, until it was shown that Gamero’s novels predated his.

Much Honduran prose, particularly but not exclusively of the first half of the 20th century, conforms to the styles and themes of costumbrismo, also known as criollismo, which delights in local color and folk ways and attempts to recreate the customs, language and landscape primarily of the countryside, although urban characters are treated as well. Noteworthy among the authors who have cultivated an anecdotal style that idealizes the Honduran country dweller is Víctor Cáceres Lara, whose short stories have been collected in Tierra ardiente, 1970 [Burning Earth]. Marco Antonio Rosa (1899–1983) in his novel, Tegucigalpa, ciudad de remembranzas, 1968 [Tegucigalpa, City of Memories], evokes a bygone time with romantic nostalgia, as he chronicles life in the Honduran capital when it was a sleepy provincial town with a well-defined class system. Daniel Lainez (1914–59) portrayed the literati and other urban eccentrics of Tegucigalpa with a touch of black humor in Estampas locales, 1948 [Local Sketches] and Manicomio [Insane Asylum], published post-humously in 1980. Medardo Mejía (1907–81), in Comizahual, leyendas, tradiciones y relatos de Honduras, 1981 [Comizahual, Legends, Traditions and Stories of Honduras], employs irony, sarcasm and humor to deconstruct the social patterns of Honduran society.

Also numerous have been narratives that combine the descriptive and folk-oriented impulse of costumbrismo with a denunciation of the exploitation of national territory by foreign interests, in particular the Standard and Cuyamel Fruit Companies on the north coast. Paca Navas de Miralda (1900–69), who had distinguished herself as a folklorist with the publication of Ritmos criollos, 1947 [Creole Rhythms], published in 1951, Barro [Clay], a novel set in a town newly established for workers of an international fruit company. It details the lives of families who leave their homes in the interior of the country, attracted by the hope of a more prosperous life on the coast. The novel weaves together scenes of traditional domesticity and daily life, and descriptions of the hard work and suffering of the transplanted families, with conversations intended to record the actual speech of this population. Other novels of this genre are more denunciatory, such as Trópico [Tropics], written in 1948 and published posthumously in 1971, by Marcos Carias Reyes (1905–49). Ramón Amaya Amador (1916–66), a self-taught writer and journalist from a working-class family, was himself a worker on the north coast banana plantations for many years. In 1943, he founded Alerta [Alert], a weekly newspaper dedicated to defending the interests of the workers. Due to subsequent political persecution by the government of Tiburcio Carias Andino, he lived much of the rest of his life in exile. His novel Prisión verde, 1950 [Green Prison], has become a classic example of socially committed writing in Honduras. Another novel worthy of mention is Peregrinaje (published in English as Enriqueta and I, 1944), by Argentina Díaz Lozano (1914–). Told from the point of view of a young girl who traverses Honduras with her widowed mother, a school teacher who moves from job to job until she finally settles in the capital, it is a charming blend of costumbrismo and autobiography. Díaz Lozano is one of Honduras’s most prolific authors, with over sixteen titles published, including poetry, novels and biography. Her forte is historical fiction.

Many contemporary fiction writers tend to be experimental in technique and wide-ranging in theme, although the Honduran milieu prevails. The short story remains the preferred genre, even though many accomplished short story writers have written novels as well. Marcos Carías Zapata (1938–), for example, began his career with a book of stories, La ternura que esperaba, 1970 [The Hoped for Tenderness], and has subsequently turned to longer fiction, of note, Una función con móviles y tentetiesos, 1980 [Performance with Mobiles and Roly-Poly Toys], a linguistic and structural tour de force that attempts to reflect the multi-level sensorial reality of contemporary Tegucigalpa.

While most of the current generation of fiction writers ascribe to a politically progressive ideology, they have as a group not expressed their commitment in propagandist prose. Some have dealt with political themes such as the war between Honduras and El Salvador of 1969, for example Eduardo Bähr (1940–) in El cuento de la guerra, 1973 [The War Story], and Julio Escoto (1944–) in Días de ventisca, noches de huracán, 1980 [Days of Blizzard, Nights of Hurricane], but language and narrative technique play an equally important role with political urgency, which was usually not the case with the committed writers of the past. The predilection for magical realism that infected so many Latin American writers influenced by García Márquez’s astounding fame, can be seen in contemporary Honduran narrative, but this tendency has developed national idiosyncracies that distinguish it from its predecessors and counterparts. Among these qualities are deeply complex if eccentric characters, trapped in a world bounded by poverty, historical misfortune and the absence of any real hope for change. One also finds an intriguing blend of the tragic and the comic, and the persistent and intrusive presence of the military. Among the best of the current fiction writers are Roberto Castillo (1950–), Horacio Castellanos Moya (1957–), Julio Escoto and Jorge Luis Oviedo (1957–). Of these, Julio Escoto has been the most prolific, and has achieved a well-deserved international reputation. His most recent novel, Madrugada, 1993 [Daybreak], is an ambitious work that explores the Honduran and Central American national identity throughout its history of conquest, colonization and exploitation.

Like the narrative, Honduran poetry has grown and changed during the 20th century, responding to internal realities as well as to international literary trends. The poets who came to be known as the Generation of 1935 participated in one of the most creative and diverse periods in Honduran literary history. Their penchant for gathering in local cafés and the bohemian self-concept they shared contributed to their group identity, although they published no literary manifesto, as was common among vanguard groups of the time. Inflamed by the Republican cause during the Spanish Civil War and personally affected by the dictatorship (1933–49) of Tiburcio Carías Andino, poets such as Claudio Barrera (pseudonym of Vicente Alemán, 1912–71), Jacobo Cárcamo (1916–59) and Daniel Laínez (1914–59) turned to social and political themes after an initial period of experimentation with avant-garde techniques. Laínez is known for his use of rural themes. and speech. Barrera and Cárcamo both fled the dictatorship and spent time in Mexico, as did many other writers, artists and intellectuals. Most of the poets of this generation experimented with the themes and rhythms of the then popular negrista poetry, which is not surprising considering the large African-Caribbean population on the north coast.

The work of the next important generation of poets, the Generation of 1950, is characterized by two predominant themes: the desire for social justice and the beauty, passion and complexity of the love relationship. Pompeyo del Valle’s (1929–) La ruta fulgurante, 1956 [The Shining Path] exemplifies this first tendency, while Oscar Acosta’s (1933–) Formas del amor, 1959 [Forms of Love] is an outstanding example of the latter. Roberto Sosa (1930–) is the most distinguished poet of this group. His finely crafted and deeply sensitive poetry has been widely translated. His work is permeated with compassion and a sense of sorrow and outrage at injustice. Among his volumes of poetry are Un mundo para todos dividido, 1971 [A World for All Divided], Los pobres, 1979 [The Poor], and Secreto militar, 1985 [Military Secret]. His collected works were published in 1993.

A firm footing in the country’s social and political reality is a constant in the poetry of the later 20th century. Following in the footsteps of Roberto Sosa, poets such as Rigoberto Paredes (1948–) and José Luis Quesada (1948–) never forget that they are Honduran, but their tone is significantly different from their predecessors. Paredes’s Las cosas por su nombre. 1978 [Things by Their Names] and Materia prima, 1985 [Raw Material] are informed by a mocking and ironic irreverence, while Quesada’s La memoria posible, 1990 [Possible Memory] is anguished, serious and reflective. José Adán Castelar (1940–), like the novelist Ramón Amaya Amador, is of humble extraction and worked on the banana plantations of the north coast. His poetry expresses the daily life and concerns of the Honduran working class and denounces their exploitation by the military and by foreign interests. Other active and noteworthy poets of this time are David Díaz Acosta (1951–), José González (1953–) and Juan Ramón Saravia (1951–).

Women writers of Honduras are still perceived as marginal or exceptional, although today’s young men and women are beginning to confront this prejudice. The first woman to publish a volume of poetry in Honduras was Clementina Suárez (1902–91), whose Corazón sangrante, 1930 [Bleeding Heart] brought her widespread notoriety. Recognized now as Honduras’s foremost woman poet, Suárez struggled throughout her life to create a place for herself in Honduran and Central American literary history. She began her career writing romantic sonnets, but later turned to free verse to express her social commitment and to celebrate love, sexuality, motherhood and freedom. She continues to be an inspiration to new generations of women writers who admire her lifelong dedication to her art as well as her strength and independence. Other women who have written noteworthy poetry in this century are Victoria Bertrand (1907–51), Eva Thais (pseudonym of Edith Tarrius López, 1931–) and Ángela Valle (1927–). Noteworthy among the current generation are Maria Eugenia Ramos (1959–), Aida Ondina Sabonge (1958–), Aleyda Romero and Yadira Eguiguren. Ramos’s Porque ningún sol es el último, 1989 [Because No Sun is the Last] expresses in language that is often colloquial, an acute social awareness. Sabonge’s first published volume, Declaración doméstica, 1993 [Domestic Statement], displays a strong, intelligent voice, conscious of her femininity and her feminism. Romero and Eguiguren, the youngest of this new generation of women poets, have not yet published their work in book form.
Finally, mention must be made of the work of three writerscholars whose efforts have been significant in the appreciation and professionalization of Honduran letters. Rafael Heliodoro Valle (1891–1959), poet, journalist, historian, anthologist and bibliophile, compiled numerous important bibliographies and wrote serious studies that have served scholars in their study of Honduran culture, among them, Historia de la cultura hondureña [History of Honduran Culture], published posthumously in 1981. Rómulo E. Durón (1865–1942) collected the literature of Honduras of the 19th century in Honduras literaria, 1896–99 [Literary Honduras]. And Helen Umaña (1942–) has contributed significantly to the understanding and appreciation of Honduran literature through her excellent critical studies, including Literatura hondureña contemporánea, 1986 [Contemporary Honduran Literature] and Narradoras hondureñas, 1990 [Honduran Women Novelists].

Further Reading

Argueta, Mario R., Diccionario crítico de obras literarias hondureñas, Tegucigalpa: Guaymuras, 1993
Cárdenas Amador, Galel (editor), Primer simposio de literatura hondureña, Tegucigalpa: Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Honduras, 1991
López Lazo, José D., Voces de la literatura hondureña actual, Tegucigalpa: Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Honduras, 1994
Martínez, José Francisco, Literatura hondureña y su proceso generacional, Tegucigalpa: Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Honduras, 1987
Sosa, Roberto (editor), Diálogo de sombras, Tegucigalpa: Editorial Guaymuras, 1993
Umaña, Helen, Literatura hondureña contemporánea (ensayos), Tegucigalpa: Guaymuras, 1986
—— Narradoras hondureñas, Tegucigalpa: Guaymuras, 1990
—— Ensayos sobre literatura hondureña, Tegucigalpa: Guaymuras, 1992

Vicente Huidobro 1893–1948

Chilean poet and prose writer

Although Vicente Huidobro is known primarily as a poet, his constant search for innovation led him to experiment with other literary genres, including fiction, drama, critical essays on film and literature, and journalism (as a World War II correspondent).
Huidobro even wrote a screenplay called “Cagliostro,” based on the life of an 18th-century mystic, for which he won a $10,000 prize in 1927. Because Huidobro was born into a patrician South American family (his family residence in Santiago de Chile at the corner of the Alameda and San Martín was a sumptuous, European-style palace), he was independently wealthy throughout his life. This biographical fact helps explain Huidobro’s mobility as a literary (and political) activist and tireless promoter of his own work. He was a ubiquitous figure, living in order to create aesthetic conflicts, to crusade for converts to his artistic ideals and to joust with anyone or anything (including the entire universe) in disagreement with him. His many travels between Europe and the American continent enabled him to remain in the public eye through conferences, controversial manifestos and literary magazines. He also appeared at key historical periods (e.g., in France during the artistic effervescence of Cubism, in Chile as the Popular Front came into being, and in Spain throughout the Spanish Civil War) and was able to insert himself with an uncanny, natural ease in these varied contexts.

Huidobro was a bilingual poet, who composed a third of his production in French, including early versions of his long poem Altazor (the title is an invention by Huidobro based on the Spanish words for “high” and “hawk”), a masterpiece of 20th-century poetry, which exists in a superb English translation by Eliot Weinberger (1988). Huidobro travelled to Paris in December 1916 and, over the next two years, began producing avant-garde literature in conjunction with Guillaume Apollinaire, Juan Gris, Pablo Picasso, Max Jacob, Jacques Lipchitz, Diego Rivera, Jean Cocteau, Pierre Reverdy, Robert Delaunay and others in works such as Horizon carré [Square Horizon], Poemas árticos (Arctic Poems), Ecuatorial [Equatorial], and Tour Eiffel [Eiffel Tower]. There is a facsimile edition of this last work included with the truly magnificent 400-page issue of Poesía dedicated to Huidobro, which was edited by René De Costa and published by Spain’s Ministry of Culture in 1989. Huidobro was not only an integral part of this pioneering epoch when Paris was the cultural capital of the world, but also, as Octavio Paz says, the bridge between the French vanguard and the poetry of the Spanish language.

Huidobro is a transitional figure as well in that he links the modernista aesthetics of Nicaraguan poet Rubén Darío (1867–1916) with the avant-garde poetics of the Hispanic American vanguardistas. For example, Huidobro’s “Arte poética” [Ars Poetica] from El espejo de agua, 1916 [The Mirror of Water] with its conception of the poet as “un pequeño dios” (a little god), is a reduced-scale version of Darío’s desperate hymn to artistic elitism in “¡Torres de Dios! ¡Poetas!…” [Towers of God! Poets!], which he wrote in Paris in 1903. Huidobro may have moved away from Darío’s traditional alexandrines and innovative rhythms in order to explore the new precisions of vers libre and concrete poetry, but something of Darío’s lyrical voice survived in his poetry, even in the fragmentation and collapse of language in Altazor. Huidobro’s first calligrammes (poems in the shape of a chapel and a triangle) resemble the typographical experimentation of Guillaume Apollinaire (even though, as René De Costa points out, they predate the 1918 publication of Apollinaire’s Calligrammes by six years), yet at the same time make use of Darío’s refined vocabulary, solemn tone and exotic themes.

Although fundamentally lyrical poems, Huidobro’s Ecuatorial (1918) and Altazor (begun in 1919, but not published until 1931) have a great deal in common in terms of their avant-garde method of composition. Huidobro’s preoccupation with metaphor as a way of joining the dissimilar as well as with word-collage, which he used to create striking, layered juxtapositions in addition to a new graphic sense of the printed page, led him to formulate the tenets of what he called creacionismo. Creationism was Huidobro’s poorly-defined and shortlived (late teens through the first years of the 1920s) attempt to militantly create an artistic movement around himself and his own publications as well as to expropriate an aesthetic already embodied in Cubism. Altazor might be considered the brilliant result of another kind of failure. René De Costa has called this long poem by Huidobro “a text in discontinuous progress, suddenly brought to a conclusion, frozen as an ‘open work’.” The long period of its composition (twelve years) and its rough, unfinished appearance bespeak a work that leaves literary difficulties unresolved, thereby creating a new, visionary poetics. This is one of the 20th century’s most radical poems in linguistic terms. There are powerful metamorphoses of the word operating in this work (which is divided into seven Cantos), especially in the “golondrina” (swallow) and “ruiseñor” (nightingale) sections of Canto IV. The metaphorical extravagance of the “molino” (mill) in Canto V is classic Huidobro. Since the subtitle of Altazor is “A Voyage in a Parachute,” it is only appropriate that Canto VII ends in a primal scream—as if the parachute (of faith in God and redemption? of belief in the poetic word?) had failed to open for Huidobro, the aerial poet. Indeed, as one critic has suggested, Altazor is an abandoning of the poetic modes of expression embodied in Symbolism, Modernism, Creationism and Surrealism. In Canto VII, this disarticulation of language becomes a new anti-language that is composed solely of sound and fragments of words.

Despite the preponderance of metaphysical and ontological themes in Ecuatorial and Altazor, Huidobro’s legacy is also one of playfulness. Huidobro’s marvelous experiments, as Eliot Weinberger has pointed out, are part of his conception of poetry as “a divine game of language.”

STEVEN F.WHITE

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry
Ecos del alma, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta Chile, 1911
Canciones en la noche, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta Chile, 1913
La gruta del silencio, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta Universitaria, 1913
Adán, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta Universitaria, 1914
El espejo de agua, Buenos Aires: Orión, 1916
Horizon carré, Paris: Paul Birault, 1917
Ecuatorial, Madrid: Imprenta Pueyo, 1918
Hallali: poème de guerre, Madrid: Jesús López, 1918
Poemas árticos, Madrid: Imprenta Pueyo, 1918; as Arctic Poems, translated by William Witherup and Serge Echeverría, Santa Fe, New Mexico: Desert Review Press, 1974
Tour Eiffel, Madrid: Imprenta Pueyo, 1918
Autonome régulier, Paris: Librairie de France, 1925
Tout à coup, Paris: Au Sans Parcifil, 1925
Altazor, o, el viaje en paracaídas, poema en VII cantos, Madrid: Iberoamericana, 1931 (originally published in various periodicals); as Altazor, or, a Voyage in a Parachute, translated by Eliot Weinberger, St Paul, Minnesota: Graywolf Press, 1988
Temblor de cielo, Madrid: Plutarco, 1931
El ciudadano del olvido (1924–1934), Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1941

Novels
Mío Cid Campeador, hazaña, Madrid: Compañía Iberoamericana de Publicaciones, 1929; as Portrait of a Paladin, translated by Warre B.Wells, London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1931; New York: Liveright, 1932
The Mirror of a Mage, translated by Warre B.Wells, London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, and Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1931 (English translation published before Spanish original); Cagliostro, novelafilm, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1934
Papá; o, el diario de Alicia Mir, Santiago de Chile: Walton, 1934
La próxima (historia que pasó en poco tiempo más), Santiago de Chile: Walton, 1934
Tres inmensas novelas, in collaboration with Hans Arp, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1935
Sátiro o, el poder de las palabras, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1939

Essays
Pasando y pasando: crónicas y comentarios, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta Chile, 1914
¡Finis Britannia! Une redoutable société s’est dressée contre l’impérialisme anglais, Paris: Fiat Lux, 1923
Manifestes, Paris: Editions de la Revue Mondiale, 1925
Vientos contrarios, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1926

Compilations and Anthologies
Saisons choisies, Paris: La Cible, 1921 [poetry and prose]
Últimos poemas, Santiago de Chile: Talleres Gráficos Ahués, 1948
Obras completas, 2 vols, introduction by Hugo Montes, Santiago de Chile: Andrés Bello, 1976
Poética y estética creacionistas, edited by Vicente Quirarte, Mexico City: UNAM, 1994

Translations
The Poet is a Little God, translated by Jorge García-Gómez, San Bernadino, California: Borgo Press, 1990 [Contains translations from El espejo de agua, Poemas árticos and Ecuatorial]

Further Reading

Admussen, Richard L., and René De Costa, “Huidobro, Reverdy and the editio princeps of El espejo de agua” Comparative Literature 24 (1972)
Camurati, Mireya, Poesía y poética de Vicente Huidobro, Madrid: Cambeiro, 1980
Concha, Jaime, “Altazor, de Vicente Huidobro,” Anales de la Universidad de Chile 73 (1965)
———, Vicente Huidobro, Madrid: Júcar, 1980
De Costa, René, Vicente Huidobro y el creacionismo, Madrid: Taurus, 1975
———, En pos de Huidobro: siete ensayos de interpretación, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1980
Schwartz, Jorge, “Vicente Huidobro o la cosmopolis textualizada,” ECO, 202/1 (1978)
Yúdice, George, Vicente Huidobro y la motivación del lenguaje, Buenos Aires: Galerna, 1978

Special Issues of Journals
Juana de Ibarbourou 1892–1979

Uruguayan poet and prose writer

Juana Fernández is known by her married name, de Ibarbourou, which is a Basque term meaning “head of the valley.” She was one of the pioneers of a literary tradition for women in Latin America, and her literary career spanned some fifty years. Her work is connected to the production of Alfonsina Storni (Argentina) and Gabriela Mistral (Chile) because all three of them wrote in the first decades of the 20th century and found a “room of their own” through their writing. They questioned the prejudices and conventions of the conservative middle class from within its own ranks. As women enclosed in a patriarchal society they wrote from the margins focusing on their own difference, creating a new poetic language on the margins of male poetic discourse.

Juana de Ibarbourou was a self-educated writer who started her literary career with a book of poems, Las lenguas de diamante, 1919 [Diamond Tongues], followed by a narrative text, El cántaro fresco, 1920 [The Fresh Earthen Vessel], and a second collection of poems, Raíz salvaje, 192.2. [Savage Root]. In her early poetry Ibarbourou used free verse and focused on the female body and its sensuality, as is exemplified in some poems from Las lenguas de diamante, such as “Salvaje” [Savage], “Ofrenda” [Offer], or in the verses from “Te doy mi alma” [I Give You My Soul]; “Desnuda y toda abierta de par en par / Por el goce de amar” (Naked and wide open / for the enjoyment of loving). The emphasis on female sensuality and erotic pleasure is also the main focus of one of her predecessors and fellow uruguayan, Delmira Agustini. They both break the silence of woman’s sexual desire by giving it a voice through their poems. In de Ibarbourou’s poems the female body becomes the place of receiving and giving in to the lover, and also the site where is conceived a harmony with Nature. In “La buena criatura” [The Good Creature], the subject of the utterance considers water to be her sister, and her hands literally to bloom in “El dulce milagro” [Sweet Miracle], The images of Nature fused with Culture within her body are constant, both in her poems and narrative, giving a sense of wholeness.

Juana de Ibarbourou had a son in 1917, Julio César Ibarbourou, and her experience of maternity became a source of creativity, as is shown through her Diario de una joven madre [Diary of a Young Mother], or in her autobiographical text Chico-Carlo, 1944 [Kid Carlo], where she recalls some of her own childhood friends and memories. The plays, Los sueños de Natacha, 1945 [Natacha’s Dreams], and Puck, are also examples of children’s literature. She also wrote her own version of some traditional children’s stories such as “Caperucita roja” [Little Red Riding Hood] or created new ones as in “La primera lección” [The First Lesson].

The passing of time and the inevitability of death appears as another of her themes, materialized in her poems from “Vida-Garfish” [Hook-Life], included in Las lenguas de diamante, to her later texts Perdida, 1950 [Lost], Elegia, 1967 [Elegy] and La pasajera, 1967 [The Woman Passenger]. Her battle against time is displayed in the theme of “carpe diem,” exemplified in “Laceria” [Wretchedness], and the famous verses “Tómate ahora que aún es temprano / y que llevo dalias nuevas en la mano” (Take me now while it is still early / and I carry fresh dahlias in my hand) from “La hora” [The Hour], both poems from her first book. Her own fight against death, added to the death of her father, mother and husband, generates the development of a religious mysticism appearing in some narrative texts, Loores de Nuestra Señora, 1934 [Praise to Our Lady], Estampas de la Biblia, 1934 [Bible Prints], and San Francisco de Asis, 1935. These narrative works have been the center of attention of literary criticism, to the detriment of her early texts.

As a feminist, de Ibarbourou gives a voice to bourgeois Latin American women by writing from that particular perspective. That is to say, by inserting her identity as a female lover and as a mother into the hegemonic literary discourses of the day. Her social status as a married woman meant that her personal discourse was accepted and integrated into the public one. Her success culminated in her election as the “Woman of the Americas” by the Union of American Women of New York in 1953 and through being nominated for the Nobel Prize in 1958.

ANA MARÍA BRENES-GARCÍA

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry
Las lenguas de diamante, Buenos Aires: Cooperativa Editorial Limitada, 1919
Raíz salvaje, Montevideo: Editorial Maximino García, 1922
La rosa de los vientos, Montevideo: Palacio del Libro, 1930
Perdida, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1950
Azor, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1953
Oro y tormenta, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1956
_Elegía_, San Juan: Universidad de Río Piedras de Puerto Rico, 1967
_La pasajera_, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1967

Prose Works
_El cántaro fresco_, Montevideo: Editora Uruguaya, 1920
_Loores de Nuestra Señora_, Montevideo: Barreiro y Ramos, 1934
_Estampas de la Biblia_, Montevideo: Barreiro y Ramos, 1934
_San Francisco de Asís_, Montevideo: Imprenta Rosgal, 1935
_Juan soldado_, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1971

Children’s Literature
_Chico Carlo_, Montevideo: Barreiro y Ramos, 1944
_Los sueños de Natacha_, Montevideo: Ediciones Liceo, 1945

Compilations and Anthologies
_Obras_, 5 vols, Montevideo: Instituto Nacional del Libro, 1992

Further Reading
Castro, Juan Jesús, _Cronología de la vida y obra de Juana de Ibarbourou_, Montevideo: El Galeón, 1992
Pickenhayen, Jorge Oscar, _Vida y obra de Juana de Ibarbourou_, Buenos Aires: Plus Ultra, 1975

Jorge Ibargüengoitia 1928–1983

_Mexican prose writer, dramatist and journalist_
A follower of Rodolfo Usigli—one of Mexico’s best-known dramatists—Jorge Ibargüengoitia began his literary career as a playwright. In 1954 his play _Susana y los jóvenes_ [Susana and the Young People] was performed with relative success, and was followed one year later by _Clotilde en su casa_ [Clotilde at Home]. These two works set the pattern found in most of his plays, dealing satirically with the daily life of the Mexican upper-middle classes and bourgeoisie. After this brief period of success, Ibargüengoitia wrote ten further plays, the great majority of which were not performed. The last in this little known series is _El atentado_, 1964 [The Assassination] which, despite receiving an award, also failed to reach the stage. In this play, Ibargüengoitia breaks with his previously preferred themes and tackles a historical subject for the first time: “The death,” according to the author himself,” in 1928 of a Mexican president (General Álvaro Obregón) at the hands of a Catholic.” This work, which lays bare the various machinations of the ruling classes and the military, was subject to government censorship for over fifteen years and could only be produced in 1975. This was Ibargüengoitia’s last play. It was, however, the documentary research undertaken for El atentado which inspired his first novel, Los relámpagos de agosto, 1964 (The Lightning of August).

This novel, written in 1962, and published in 1964, reconstructs a period of Mexican history through the “memoirs” of a revolutionary general. It is here that Ibargüengoitia finally succeeds in voicing not only a social criticism of established morality—already present in his dramatic works—but also, simultaneously and with great refinement, critically penetrating Mexican history—with all its myths and time-honoured truths - and the use of power by the governing classes. This novel displays all the concerns and themes which Ibargüengoitia develops with sustained quality in his prose works until his tragic death in 1983.

La ley de Herodes [Herod’s Law], his second prose work, was published in 1967, by which time Ibargüengoitia was also writing as a journalist. Despite being a collection of short narratives, this work is held together by a favourite theme of the author’s: the upbeat record of urban life and humour. In this book, he produces a detailed account of daily life in the Mexican capital, which includes various autobiographical elements.

Maten al león, 1969 [Kill the Lion], is his second novel. Intended originally as a film script based on El atentado, this is a classic in which Ibargüengoitia depicts, with heavy irony, the figure of the Latin American patriarchal dictator (as have, among others, Asturias, Roa Bastos and García Márquez). However, Ibargüengoitia differs in approach from the others by producing a farce in which the dictators appear as ridiculous and obtuse as their enemies. It is in this work, as with Los relámpagos de agosto, that Ibargüengoitia best elaborates one of his predominant themes: a caricature of the Mexican Revolution, an ironic and disrespectful reading of the disaster unleashed by it and the possible ideas and causes behind the event.

Estas ruinas que ves, 1975 [These Ruins You See], his third novel, continues the more or less autobiographical tone already begun in La ley de Herodes. “Estas ruinas que ves” notes the critic Jaime Castañeda Iturbe, “becomes a novelistic account of customs, whose common factor is eroticism, a subject which the author treats with the iniquity and humour that characterise his work. Indeed, the episodes and anecdotes described not only amuse and entertain, but possess the lucid and demythologising quality of his other novels.”

Las muertas, 1977 (The Dead Girls), the plot for which Ibargüengoitia alludes to in Estas ruinas que ves, is the narrative of a police incident involving a group of women from the Bajío area, dealing in the white slave trade, known as “Las Poquianchas.” Las muertas is without a doubt Ibargüengoitia’s most refined work, but perhaps not his most probing. The novel’s main virtue is its success in combining different time levels, not only when dealing with events which occur simultaneously within the plot, but in relation to the temporal diversity of the characters themselves. The means for achieving this is as simple as it is awkward: the story is divided into various temporal segments, each described by a different character.
Dos crímenes (Two Crimes), Ibargüengoitia’s fifth novel, published in 1979, is perhaps his most astute, probing and, from the point of view of narrative rhythm, his most sustained work. Despite dealing once again with the police, as he did in Las muertas, and despite being dominated throughout by intrigue, Ibargüengoitia succeeds in displaying humour, irony and a fluent narrative which constantly surprises the reader.

Los pasos de López, 1982. [Lopez’s Footsteps], his last novel, is set at the beginning of the Mexican War of Independence and originates, as did Los relámpagos de agosto, from a play entitled La conspiración vendida [The Bought Conspiracy] which Ibargüengoitia had been commissioned to write in 1959. In similar vein to his first novel, Los pasos de López explores a historical account. His aim, which he undoubtedly achieves, is, in his own words, “to reveal history as a Sphinx without a secret, a vacant or disproportionate pedestal; but without bitterness, without hate…” All the great myths of post-revolutionary Mexico are knocked off their pedestal and made to seem trivial and ordinary in a readable and amusing manner. The assertion which underlies the entire novel is a view which Ibargüengoitia defends lucidly and with humour: that the Mexican Revolution was a political movement, led from above and based on unclear principles.

Apart from his work as a novelist, Ibargüengoitia was a prolific journalist, but unlike other Latin American writers, came to journalism through his literature. He wrote for the Revista de la Universidad de Mexico, the cultural supplement of ¡Siempre!, Diálogos and other journals. However, his contributions to Excelsior and Vuelta had the most impact. His work as a columnist provided material for four anthologies. Viajes en la America ignota, 1972 [Travels into Unknown America] and Sálvese quien pueda, 1975 [Every Man for Himself] were both published during his lifetime. La casa de usted y otros viajes [Your House and Other Journeys] and Instrucciones para vivir en Mexico [Instructions for Living in Mexico] appeared posthumously.

In this dual role as novelist and journalist, Ibargüengoitia transformed the history of Mexico into a literary narrative, a series of novels. It was his main area of concern, be it through its characters or through the institutions which they exploited. This notion of a reality constructed through literature sets the author apart from his contemporaries and at the same time explains the misunderstanding which has resulted in his belated recognition as a storyteller. Las muertas, for example, seen by critics as the adaptation of a police report into a literary form, is in fact true historical narrative: the past in its only possible present form, that is to say, a tale of past events interpreted through the eyes of the present. Continuing with the same example, Las muertas is more than the literary version of an event recorded by the press, it is the construction of the event itself, the exploration of its meanings and the placing of the plot in historical perspective.

Ibargüengoitia wrote books imbued with humour and a rare talent, whose ironic, sarcastic and insistently critical plots do not diminish their effect but instead breathe life into and embellish the stories of contemporary Mexico. Ibargüengoitia’s books are among those where the literary is thought and written simultaneously and where the aesthetic aim is also a concept close to events, both past and future.

CLAUDIO CANAPARO
translated by Carol Tully
Biography

Born in Guanajuato, Mexico, 22 January 1928. Studied engineering and then switched to Faculty of Arts at Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM), 1951–54, specialized in drama and awarded MA in 1957. Granted scholarship by Mexican Writer’s Centre (1954) and by Rockefeller Foundation (1955), to study drama in New York. Professor of Dramatic Theory and Composition at UNAM (1955–56) and of Language and Literature at Monterrey Institute for Foreign Studies (1963). Taught at the University of the Americas, 1965–66, and at the University of California, 1968. Contributor to several cultural publications including Revista de la Universidad de Mexico and Excelsior. Member of the editorial board of Vuelta. Recipient of several national prizes for his plays and novels; twice winner of the Casa de las Américas prize: 1963 for El atentado, and 1964 for Los relámpagos de agosto. Died in a plane crash in Spain, 27 November 1983. Three other Spanish American literary figures—Ángel Rama, his wife Marta Traba and the Peruvian writer Manuel Scorza—died in the same accident.

Selected Works

Plays
Susana y los jóvenes, in Teatro mexicano, Madrid: Aguilar, 1955
Llegó Margó, in Teatro mexicano del siglo XX, vol. 2, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1956
Clotilde en su casa, in Teatro mexicano del siglo XX, vol. 3, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1956
Ante varias esfinges, in La palabra y el hombre 15 (July-September 1960)
El tesoro perdido, in Universidad de Mexico (August 1960)
El viaje superficial, in Revista Mexicana de Literatura (June-September 1960); in book form with Pájaro en mano, Veracruz, Mexico: Universidad de Veracruz, 1964
El loco amor viene, cultural supplement of newspaper Novedades (1961)
El atentado, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1964
La conspiración vendida, in Revista de Bellas Artes 3 (May-June 1965)

Novels and Short Fiction
La ley de Herodes, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1967
Maten al león, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1969
Estas ruinas que ves, Mexico City: Novaro, S.A., 1975

Journalism
Viajes en la America ignota, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1972 Sálvese quien pueda, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1975

Compilations
Jorge Icaza 1906–1978

Ecuadorean prose writer and dramatist

Jorge Icaza was a bookstore owner by profession. A resident of Quito, he visited his uncle’s Riobamba hacienda in the sierra in 1912. He attributed the inspiration for his best-known work, Huasipungo 1934 (The Villagers) to this contact.

The early years of the 20th century were ones of political and economic chaos in Ecuador. The liberal groups of the coast contrasted with those of the conservatives in the highlands. When cocoa prices plunged, the decades of the 1920s and 1930s saw numerous uprisings of peasants, workers and artisans. Some works, such as Luis A. Martínez’s Al la costa 1904 [To the Coast], portrayed the conservatism of the religious and land-owning groups. In the same year as the massacre in Guayaquil (1922), Pío Jaramillo’s El indio ecuatoriano [The Ecuadorian Indian] appeared.

Intellectuals, especially of the Generation of 1930, were located in the sierra and on the coast as well: Demetrio Aguilera Malta, José de la Cuadra, Gilberto Gil, Gallegos Lara and Pareja Diezcanseco in Guayaquil, and Humberto Mata, Fernando Chaves and Jorge Icaza in Quito. While the influence of Positivist thought on literature was slow in disappearing, new approaches became evident. Ecuador, a country whose population was mostly indigenous at the turn of the 20th century—and still is—had, previous to 1900, seen few works that dealt with this group. Of these, Cumandá (1879) by Juan León Mera, was the best known. This indigenista or romantic and religious perspective, was never able to provide an accurate portrayal of stark Andean economic and racial conditions. The Mexican and Russian Revolutions of 1910 and 1917, respectively, along with World War I, had brought social concerns to the forefront of literature as well, with indigenous rights entering debates in the 1920s. Icaza’s generation sought to produce an authentic Ecuadorian literature amid the cultural clashes. This literature would be one with greater focus on the plight of the mestizos, more in line with the Mexican José Vasconcelos’s La raza cósmica (The Cosmic Race) concept than the socialist José Carlos Mariátegui’s statements that an indigenous literature would develop when Indians wrote it, implying that such a literature could come into being.

Nevertheless, writers of the 1930s and 1940s in Ecuador have been considered members of the indigenista school in their treatment of native characters. It is in this aesthetic and political context that the emphatic, harsh style of Jorge Icaza first captured the attention of readers. When he began his career, Icaza declared that he had read Marx, Lenin, Freud, and Russian novelists such as Tolstoy and Dostoevsky, concerned with themes of social redemption. The plight and the language of Quechua Indians in Ecuador was taken by his public to be a daring portrait of national reality. While recognized as the author of short stories and plays, and although his novels show dramatic characteristics in the structure of scenes and dialogues, Huatapiungo continues to be the most widely cited work, and the one that established his fame primarily as a novelist. It has also contributed to his perceived role as “Defender of Indians,” in which capacity he traveled to other countries.

Huatapiungo is the story of the circumstances which provoke an Indian uprising, led by Andrés Chiliquinga after his mate Cunshi dies from eating tainted meat. The characters are representative of the main groups which live, work, and otherwise interact in the Andean highland. The landowner, Pereira, deals with the political and religious leaders in order to maintain his control over the Indian workers, and is aided by the cholo type who has lost his class and ethnic identity. The Indians are considered less than human, and are forced not only to work under the cruelest of conditions, but also to tend to the needs of the patron’s family, down to nursing his unmarried daughter’s child. They are starving and ignorant, the condition which leads to the retrieval of spoiled meat after it has been buried, and subsequently to Cunshi’s death and Andrés’s maddened rebellion. The final words of the novel, uttered in Quechua, have become famous as the expression of Indian protest, although it is admittedly difficult to feel much will come of any movement, given the negative characterization of the people throughout the novel.

Later works, except for Huairapamushcas (Hijos del viento), 1948 [Sons of the Wind], focus more on the figure of the mestizo or person of mixed-blood: Cholos, 1937 [Half-Bloods], En las calles, 1935 [In the Streets], a novel whose theme is the 1932 civil war, Media vida deslumbrados, 1942 [Blinded for Half Their Lives], El chulla Romero y Flores, 1958 [The Chulla Romero and Flores], and the trilogy Atrapados, 1972 [Trapped]. Icaza’s short stories—Barro de la sierra, 1933 [Sierran Clay], and Seis veces la muerte, 1954 [Six Times Death] are also set in indigenous communities. The mestizo characters are seen through a Freudian perspective which takes stock of the negative effects of the indigenous heritage—effects only justifiable from a middle-or upper-class viewpoint.

Icaza’s Indians and mestizos have come to represent character types which in turn represent social classes and collective behaviours. While the Quechuas are brutally oppressed, the mixed bloods are caught between the memory of that oppression and the hope of upward mobility. From the racial and economic elements derives a moral pattern, seen as one of inferiority complex (on the psychological level) and betrayal (on the ethical). Its is essentially the clash of guilt (caused by Spanish origins) versus shame (Indian heritage), also called ancestral ghosts. The style of expression that has become Icaza’s trademark includes the distortion of Latin American or Ecuadorian Spanish through phonetic, morphosyntactic and lexical features, to represent the Indians’ speech. The result reinforces the idea that communication and respect among social groups is difficult and does not take into account that to be truly realistic the Quechuas would have to be seen as speaking their native language rather than Spanish. Interestingly, this feature of Icaza’s fiction has also resulted in strongly contradictory evaluations by critics. One group of critics sees Icaza’s naked portrayal of injustice as an effective, realistic “call to arms.” Another sees his attitude as dehumanizing and too ambivalent, signifying a fatalistic, prejudiced belief in the eternal suffering of the Indians, an Existential condition as it were, part of an inherited and unalterable hierarchy. The contrasting viewpoints still question the role of violence, incoherent or nearly incoherent speech, and the ugliness of poverty in representing Latin American history by means of literary creation. How real is too real? Is there any hope for improvement in the conditions that are so negative? Can the Indians whose social awareness is so limited really become the social equals of other groups?

Icaza will always be read for his blatant style of portraiture, applicable to much of the Andean area, and for his unfor giving, insistent revelation of intergroup relationships as characterized by exploitation, fear and lack of communication. The highland population is comprised of the Indians, the mestizos, and the “unholy Trinity of the Indian,” as designated by the Peruvian Manuel González Prada: the clergy, the politicians, and the wealthy landowners. The author himself was satisfied that his work was a service to the lower-class people. Not every reader agrees.

KATHLEEN N.MARCH

Biography

Born in Quito, capital of Ecuador, 10 July 1906. After being widowed, Icaza’s mother married a politician who was persecuted by the government. Family fled to country estate of a relative. Studied medicine at Central University of Quito, but forced to abandon studies in 1924 on the death of his stepfather and mother. Entered civil service and worked in the Treasury of the province of Pichincha. Acted in the National Theatre (Compañía Dramática Nacional) where he met the most distinguished Ecuadorian actress of the period, Marina Moncaya, whom he later married. Wrote plays which were published in small editions and made no impact on the public. Around 1937 gave up job in civil service and bought a bookshop in Quito. Co-founder, with other writers, Ecuadorian Syndicate of Artists and Writers and was for several years its general secretary. Entered politics and joined the Concentración de Fuerzas Populares Travelled to China, USSR and Cuba. Awarded National Prize for Literature in 1936. Died 26 May 1978.

Selected Works

Novels

En las calles, Quito: Imprenta Nacional, 1935

Cholos, Quito: Litografía e Imprenta Romero, 1937

Media vida deslumbrados, Quito: Editorial Quito, 1942

Huairapamushcas (Hijos de viento), Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1948

El chulla Romero y Flores, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1958

Atrapados, 3 vols, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1972

Short Fiction

Seis relatos, Quito: Biblioteca de Relatistas Ecuatorianos, 1952

Compilations and Anthologies
Identity

There are entire library shelves stacked with studies on identity in relation to Latin America as to other parts of the world. There are so many factors that shape cultural identity: language, ethnicity, gender, geopolitical factors such as patterns of economic migration or prolonged periods of exile, with its concomitant immersion in another culture, that here it is necessary to be extremely selective. What will be provided is a historical mapping of the subject with a list of related entries given at the end. The latter includes authors who provide examples of the literary representation of different ethnic groups in the “New World.” Although the scope of this article is limited to Spanish America, much of it is relevant to Brazil, and for this reason some Brazilian writers figure also in the list provided at the end.

In forming an idea of Latin American identity it is essential to consider the continent’s history from pre-Columbian times. The European conquerors, over the generations, virtually destroyed the culture of the pre-Columbian civilizations: the Aztecs, Mayas and Incas. Thus the native Americans who survived this experience became acculturated because their collective historical memory was almost wiped out. Yet this process was never completed since the home, for example, became a site of resistance, a place where the family could have an informal altar to their old gods. In the same way, the palenques or fortified bush communities constructed by runaways, acted as sites of resistance to the slave-owning plantocracy. Cultural identity survived also through religious syncretism (which involved the appropriation of elements of Christianity by peoples of other cultures to mask their own magical beliefs), through local fiestas, the cult of Virgins with indigenous colouring (the Virgen de Guadalupe in Mexico; the Virgen del Cobre in Cuba) and the part played by the local curanderos (healers), sometimes described as “witch doctors.” However, as William Rowe and Vivian Schelling point out in Memory and Modernity, despite this process of counter-acculturation in which women played a prominent part because of its modest, domestic scale, what the indigenous survivors lost was “an organized semantic memory.”

Independence caused the liberal intellectuals of the creole elite to create new versions of the continent’s past. Thus Joaquín de Olmedo in his laudatory poem to Bolívar, La victoria de Junín, Canto a Bolivar, 1825 [The Victory at Junín, Song to Bolivar], evokes an ideal vision of the Indian past. Bolívar, for his part, like his fellow-liberator, San Martín, was disturbed by the fact that these Spanish Americans, now divided into separate nations, seemed to deny an “Hispanic” ideal as the two of them had visualized it. It was Bolivar who wrote in his Carta de Jamaica [The Jamaica Letter] in 1815: “…más nosotros…que no somos indios ni europeos, sino una especie media entre los légitimos proprietarios del país y los usurpadores españoles: en suma, siendo nosotros americanos por nacimiento y nuestros derechos los de Europa, tenemos que disputar éstos a los del país y que mantenernos en él contra la invasión de los invasores.” (… we are, moreover, neither Indian nor European, but a species midway between the legitimate proprietors of this country and the Spanish usurpers. In short, though Americans by birth we derive our rights from Europe, and we have to assert these rights against the rights of the natives and at the same time we must defend ourselves against the invaders).

The European invaders could not help Latin Americans in a self-defining process. Their earlier role was played out and, in theory, it was now left to Latin Americans to create (and in the case of the subject peoples, to protect) their own identity. But although the European powers accepted the hegemony of the US in their hemisphere, and settled for economic penetration instead, Europe continued to exercise considerable influence in the sphere of culture. This is because the creole elite looked to Europe for cultural models, adopting a “copy cat” manner which the Cuban writer Alejo Carpentier brings out extremely well in his novels El reino de este mundo (The Kingdom of this World) and El recurso del método (Reasons of State). The former is a key text on Latin American identity since it includes a reflection on how European culture is made incongruous by being introduced in an indiscriminate way into a setting alien to it. In El reino, Carpentier inverts the terms of Sarmiento’s Civilization versus Barbarism dichotomy by supporting the world picture of a people with magical beliefs (the black slaves), and criticizing the sceptical rationalism of the French. Finally, through his interpretation of the black tyrant, Henri Christophe, Carpentier considers the price that is paid by those who choose acculturation (as opposed to those who have it thrust upon them).

The efforts at nation-building in the post-independence period created a tension between the regions and the metropolis. In Argentina, Sarmiento fostered a racist ideology in which native Americans and those of mixed race were seen as accountable for the continent’s alleged backwardness. This was the thinking behind the genocide of the Indians of the Argentine plains, completed by General Roca in his military campaign of 1879. The modern nation state, in the opinion of Sarmiento and other like-minded Argentines, should be “whitened” by encouraging massive immigration from Europe. One result of this huge influx was that the cultural products imported from Europe in the 19th century by the elite, which were limited to its high culture, now had to compete with the popular culture introduced by the poor of Europe’s South. In the former slave-owning societies, a further ingredient was added to the continent’s already powerful racial cocktail by the arrival of bonded labourers from China and the Indian sub-continent, many of whom settled in Latin America after they had bought back their freedom.
United States hegemony has had a powerful effect on Latin American identity. This is partly because, like the continent’s two international languages, Castilian and Portuguese, it unites many of their people; in this case, in a common bond of hatred or deep resentment of the gringo who controlled the economy (and the politics) of the smaller Latin American republics, particularly of those in their “backyard.” In addition, the United States through its aggressive exportation of popular (mass) culture has tended at different periods to overwhelm different expressions of local culture, something which has applied notoriously in the case of cinema.

Yet at the end of the 20th century it is much more appropriate to speak of transculturation than of acculturation. The former is a term coined by the Cuban anthropologist Fernando Ortiz, which seeks to describe cultural transformation in terms of a synthesis of systems tending to produce new and differentiated cultural hybrids. Relevant here is the quiet reclamation by Mexicans of the southwest of the United States, a region that was formerly a part of their own nation. Relevant also are the other Hispanic “beachheads” in the US: Cubans in Miami and New York, Puerto/Nuyoricans and refugees from Central America and Haiti. Their presence in the US is not new but their numbers now permit them to alter the official culture of the host country by, for example, making parts of it bilingual. They are creating new versions of cultural mestizaje, having arrived from a continent always marked by cultural exchange and hybridity, even when authority attempted to stamp out these complex processes.

Another factor that affects identity is sexuality. The question of homosexuality was generally taboo until the 1970s (the Argentine author, Manuel Puig, was in the vanguard in this respect) but at the end of the 20th century it is debated openly. It is a factor which, allied with ethnicity, language and gender can tend to fragment the collective identity of formerly more cohesive (Hispanic) groups. Thus the writer Gloria Anzaldúa described herself in the following terms at a reading of her work given at the University of Kentucky in 1993: “a Chicana tejana feminist dyke-patlache poet, fiction writer and cultural theorist.” Yet, perhaps such fragmentation may be conceived positively in the context of Postmodernism, as a plurality of identities which incorporates difference.

VERITY SMITH

Listed here are some of the entries on authors who have written about ethnic groups, and topics that relate to this subject: America, the Invention of; José María Arguedas; Caliban; Alejo Carpentier (El reino de este mundo); Rosario Castellanos; Chicano Literature; Civilization and Barbarism; Film: Spanish America; Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda; Bernardo Guimarães; Indianism; Indigenism; Clorinda Matto de Turner; Juan León Mera, Fernando Ortiz; Octavio Paz (El laberinto de la soledad); Domingo Faustino Sarmiento; Transculturation; Juan Zorrilla de San Martin

Further Reading

Allen, Jr, David H., “Rubén Darío frente a la creciente influencia de los Estados Unidos,” Revista Iberoamericana, vol. 33/64 (1967)
Carpentier, Alejo, “Problemática de la actual novela latinoamericana,” in his Tientos y diferencias, Mexico City: UNAM, 1963 [A key essay on the problems faced by Latin American authors in representing their own culture(s) to those from beyond its boundaries]
Gutiérrez Girardot, Rafael, La imagen de America en Alfonso Reyes, Madrid: Insula, 1955
Indianism

Brazil

Indianism in Brazil, like other nativist tendencies in Latin American literature, owes its origins to European and, to some extent also, to North American influences. In Europe, the figure of the American Indian gained some prominence among the Romantics at the end of the 18th century. They in turn relied on more ancient portrayals of primitive man. The myth of the Noble Savage had entered the imagination of writers in Western Europe ever since the 16th century, via such works as Sir Thomas More’s Utopia, Michel Montaigne’s essay, “Des cannibales,” 1580 [About Cannibals], and Jean-Jacques Rousseau’s Julie ou la nouvelle Heloïse, 1761 (Eloisa: or, a Series of Original Letters). This was later transposed into the novels and plays of Chateaubriand and Victor Hugo in France, and in turn into the novels of James Fenimore Cooper, in North America. At the same time, visions of innocence and youthful romance within the bosom of Nature, were exploited by such writers as Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, whose Paul et Virginie (1788), was widely read by the Brazilian Romantics.

The influence of Romanticism was also felt more directly in Brazil, as a result of the visit of the French liberal idealist, Ferdinand Denis from 1816 to 1819. Denis was instrumental in urging local writers to take an interest in their own natural environment and their country’s aboriginal inhabitants. Not that there had been a total absence of Indianist literature before this. Indeed, Basílio da Gama’s Os Uraguai (1769), and José de Santa Rita Durão’s Caramuru (1781), were both epic poems modelled on Camões’s Os lusiadas, 1572 (The Lusiads) in which a nascent interest in and even admiration for the Brazilian Indian is discernible.

It is ironic that one of the first newspapers to be published in Brazil during the years when the Portuguese monarch was resident in Rio (1808–21), was named after the tribe of Indians which had once inhabited the area: O Tamoio. Equally ironic, perhaps, was the assumption of an Indian name, Guatimozim, by the first emperor of Brazil, the Portuguese born, Pedro I. However, native American names were fashionable in the early years of independence, indicating as they did, a separate tradition from that of the Old World.

It took two decades for the euphoria of independence to pass, by which time the creole elite, which had switched so painlessly from Portuguese to Brazilian sovereignty, began to seek to explain national identity as somehow deriving from a reconciliation of opposites: the European conqueror on the one hand, and the native American on the other. If the latter had all but disappeared from the seaboard area by the 19th century, he nevertheless performed a vital function in the myth of origin, by which the creole elite sought to legitimise itself.

The high period of Brazilian Indianism lasted from the mid-1840s, coinciding with the publication of Gonçalves Dias’s Poemas americanos, to the mid-1870s, and the appearance of José de Alencar’s novel, Ubirajara. Dias went on to compile a Tupi-Portuguese dictionary, and to begin an epic, Os Timbiras, which he never finished. Like Dias, whose mother was an Indian, Teixeira e Sousa was also a man of mixed descent, whose long, melodramatic poem, Os três dias de um noivado, 1844 [The Three Days of an Engagement], is set in the Indianist mould, but provides a more far-reaching criticism of the marginalisation of all people of colour in Brazil.

By the 1850s, Indianism received royal sanction when the emperor himself commissioned a work from the aristocratic “court” poet, Domingos José Gonçalves de Magalhães. The resulting A confederação dos Tamoios, 1856 [The Confederacy of the Tamoio Indians] was a highly conservative poetic medallion to the foundation of Rio de Janeiro, modelled to some extent on the Camonian epic. It is perhaps more well known for the harsh criticism it received from the author whose name would become synonymous with Indianism, José de Alencar.

Alencar is generally regarded as the father of the Brazilian novel, but is remembered most for his Indianist works, in particular, O guarani, 1857 [The Guarani Indian], and Iracema, 1865 (Iracema, the Honey-Lips, a Legend of Brazil). Both of these novels are set at the dawn of the colonial era, and the central focus of their plots is the mutual attraction between opposites: white heroine and Indian brave, in the case of the first novel, white soldier and Indian maiden in the second. Within the greater or lesser complexity of their respective plots, Alencar portrays the tragic consequences of miscegenation, colonial greed in the form of the bad colonizer, savage Indians who resist colonial rule, and are therefore contrasted with the good Indian, who allies himself to the colonial mission of introducing Christianity where pagan beliefs existed before.
Alencar betrays in his work the contradictions of a man who was deeply conservative in his social and political beliefs, but who at the same time was, as a northeasterner at the court of Rio, somewhat of a marginal figure. The dedication that the Indian, Peri, lavishes on the white girl, Ceci, in O guarani, corresponds to the devoted service a good slave shows for his mistress (fittingly Alencar opposed the rapid abolition of slavery during the 1850s). The attraction Peri feels is that of Nature personified in the face of Christian culture in its purest form: Ceci is no more than the Virgin Mary Peri glimpsed on a chapel wall. If the end of the novel sees them escaping into the wilderness, Peri’s terrain, we are left in little doubt that Ceci’s tutelage of her beloved will continue, that of an elder sister over a younger but dedicated brother. Moreover, the two flee with the blessing of Ceci’s father, the noble Portuguese “fidalgo,” Dom Antônio, in an allegory of Brazil’s essentially conciliatory independence process.

In Iracema, the Portuguese warrior, Martim, falls in love with the Tabajara virgin, Iracema, whose name is conveniently an anagram for America, and whose tribe is an enemy of the Portuguese. The two settle by the banks of a river, and have a child. In due course, Martim goes off to war again. By the time he returns, Iracema has died. Their son, Moacyr, has been saved, and is taken by his father to be brought up in the bosom of civilisation, the first true Brazilian. What has appealed to readers down the years is the tragic story of love between opposites. What the novel upholds, however, are the conciliatory and sentimental myths that underpin Brazil’s self-image as a racially democratic nation: miscegenation did occur, but this was balanced by an irreversible whitening process which somehow safeguarded the elite’s greater loyalty to European cultural values.

Ultimately, Alencar’s most lasting contribution to the development of Brazilian literature, was his use of language: by Brazilianising his written Portuguese, and by incorporating native terms into his novels, Alencar scandalised the academicians of Portugal, but set his country’s literature on an independent course, a feat recognised by subsequent generations of cultural nationalists.

Apart from Alencar and Gonçalves Dias, the only other writer who made an original contribution to Brazilian Indianism, was the poet, Joaquim de Sousa Andrade (Sousândrade), whose long poem, Guesa errante, 1874–77 [Wandering Inca] is at once a heartfelt defence of Indian culture and a condemnation of the effects of European colonisation, a diatribe against the imperial government and a defence of republicanism, and an anguished cry of exile from a man who spent many years of his life in the United States.

Nineteenth-century Indianism passed with the end of Romanticism after about 1875. On the one hand, the considerable influence of Social-Darwinist theories turned writers away from an idealistic portrayal of the Indians, towards one that tended to be openly disparaging of Brazil’s non-European ethnic components. On the other hand, in keeping with the new literary priorities of the Realists, more tangible symbols of a native identity were sought, such as the various forms of mestizo, and the mulatto. It was not until the Modernist movement of the 1920s that the Indian reappeared in literature, but by now writers no longer glorified the Noble Savage. On the contrary, under the influence of Freud, it was the cannibal who was used as a positive image in the struggle to affirm national cultural innocence and irreverence. Most representative of this trend was the Although Indianism as a movement was a phenomenon of the 19th century, authors have continued to focus periodically on the theme of the Indian, even in more recent times. Chief among these are Antônio Callado, whose cult novel of the 1960s, Quarup (1967), amalgamated indianist concerns with a criticism of the dictatorship, Darcy Ribeiro, whose novel, Maira (1976), reflects the author’s experience as an anthropologist, and João de Jesus Paes Loureiro, whose Amazonian poems, Cantares amazônicos (1985), are worthy successors to the poetry of Gonçalves Dias and Sousândrade.

DAVID BROOKSHAW

Further Reading

Driver, David Miller, The Indian in Brazilian Literature, New York: Hispanic Institute, 1942

Spanish America

Indianism, a term invoked to distinguish the romantic depiction of native American peoples, contrasts with Indigenism, a term coined to describe a more realistic assessment of native peoples within a national setting. A useful definition of both terms is found in José Carlos Mariátegui’s Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, 1928 (Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality): “Los indigenistas auténticos—que no deben ser confundidos con los que explotan temas indígenas por mero exotismo—colaboran conscientemente o no, en una obra política y económica de reivindicación—no de restauración ni resurrección” (Authentic indigenists who should not be confused with those who exploit indigenous themes for its mere exoticism—collaborate, consciously or unconsciously, for political and economic platform of vindication—not for a restoration or resurrection of the Indian).

From the first letter penned about the “New” World, a heavy dose of exoticism permeates the early images of the Indians. Columbus’s description of the peoples he encountered in the Americas now strikes the reader as exotic: the admirable orderliness of Indian communities, their generous giving of gifts, and their well-formed bodies. Later, of course, daily contact with these “amenable” savages would alter the overly idealized images. In the battles of conquest and invasion, the Spanish made contact with fierce warriors who often repelled their advances. Yet with the decimation of the indigenous populations due to disease and increased tribute demands, the image of the Indian in literature was portrayed against a backdrop of a nostalgia for the splendor of the ancient civilizations or of pristinely poetic, nomadic tribal units. As Hayden White notes: “It is significant, I think, that the idolization of the natives of the New World occurs only after the conflict between the Europeans and the natives had already been decided and when, therefore, it could no longer hamper the exploitation of the latter by the former.”

European philosophers shaped reconsideration of the native of the Americas for, with allusions to the natural state of the Indians, European manners and institutions were held up to criticism. Thus, in the 18th century, in the writings of Rousseau, the theme of the Noble Savage is firmly established and the natural goodness of an indigenous egalitarian society becomes the ideal. Chateaubriand’s search for this ideal society stimulated his travel in North America; his failure to encounter the ideal community did not dissuade his efforts to create a literary version of his romantic vision. His novel Atala provided a model for subsequent mention of Indians in narrative and verse.

Literary works which celebrated Indianism proliferated in 19th-century Latin America, when the break with Spain was declared and the newly liberated authors were intent on defining their particular vision of American lands and native peoples. José Joaquín Olmedo’s use of the Incan ruler Huayna Capac in his “Canto a Bolívar,” 1825–26 [Ode to Bolivar] competes with the heroism of the rebellious commander Bolivar. In the poem, the Inca yearns for a just and beneficent government to rule in the recently liberated colonies, one in which Indians and those of Spanish descent will be equal: “¡Oh pueblos, que formáis un pueblo solo / y una familia, y todos son mis hijos!” (Oh peoples, who form one nation / one family, all of you my children). Of course, this prophecy did not come to pass. Esteban Echeverría’s La cautiva, 1837 [The Captive] documents the actions of the “indio malón” (the ransacking and raiding Indian) who roamed the pampas.

The attempt to forge a new Latin American identity separate from the legacy of Spain fostered reconsideration of the continent. Writers observed the countryside surrounding them and found less reason to constantly compare nature in the Americas to that of Europe. Instead, with evocative descriptions of tropical forest scenery and of majestic Andean peaks, poets and novelists captured the interest of both Europeans and their own South American reading public.

Thus, the Amerindian customs of the native inhabitants likewise are observed and written down, conceived as an original contribution to creation of a particularly South American literature. The assertion by the Ecuadorian Juan León Mera that Indian themes are worthy of literature now strikes us as anachronistic, yet in the 19th century his comment represented a departure from accepted topics: “Todo lo indígena existe como recuerdo y como historia, y no veo inconveniente para que pueda servir en una obra poética, sea como tema principal, sea accesoriamente” (All Indianness exists as memory and as history and I do not see any problem in its appearance in works of poetry, as a main theme or as a secondary theme). Mera’s statement also reveals a major shortcoming of the indianist orientation; they often chose to depict historical themes and nostalgic remembrances of vanished peoples. The Cuban writer Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda is intrigued by the Aztec past in her novel Guatimozín (1846) as is her compatriot Gabriel de la Concepción Valdés who idealizes Incan royalty in Cora.

One of the best examples of the historical use of Indian themes to create a national identity is José Joaquín Pérez’s Fantasías indígenas, 1877 [Indian Fantasies] where the natives are innocents, slaughtered by the cruel Spanish soldiers on the island of Santo Domingo. Similarly, the Uruguayan writer Juan Zorrilla de San Martin laments the fate of another “disappeared” race in his Tabaré (1888): “Ni las manchas siquiera / de vuestra sangre nuestra tierra guarda” (Not even one drop of your blood remains in our land). The Indian protagonist, Tabaré, rather much embodies this assertion, for he is described by Zorilla as a blue-eyed melancholic warrior who does not wear warpaint or pierce his lips as the other males of the tribe. His soul is Christian, for his mother—blond and blue-eyed as well—has raised him in the faith despite her liaison with the mighty Indian chief Caracé. His fate is sealed, within the confines of the poem that is, when he falls in love with Blanca, a non-Indian. He dies in her arms, in the end, “an unfortunate mestizo who would like to forget the Indian half of him and is desperately attracted to the fair race,” to quote the critic Carmelo Virgillo.

Similar plotting is found in the Ecuadorian novel of nation, Cumandá (1879), written by Juan León Mera. Here, the Indian protagonist, Cumandá, in living with the Záparos, allows the author to fill the narrative with picturesque details of indigenous customs (funerary rites, courtship, settlement patterns). The reader might suspect her true origins, for as Tabaré, she is described by means of non-Indian markers, light skin and a “civilized” demeanor. It comes as no surprise that she turns out to be the abducted daughter of an Andean landowner, torn from the bosom of her family in a raid of revenge by the highland Indians. Her death late in the novel also buries the controversial themes of racial integration and incest which are latent in the novel, for Cumandá (the supposed Indian) is in love with her own brother, Carlos (a non-Indian), from whom she was separated in childhood.

In assessing Indianist perspectives it may benefit us more to “look attentively at representational practices” rather than to distinguish between good and false representations of indigenous peoples, as Stephen Greenblatt suggests in Marvelous Possessions. Thus, in the creation of Tabaré or Cumandá there lingers the European-derived sense of superiority coupled with a sensitivity to the passing of an age of innocence. Indigenista writers such as Clorinda Matto de Turner, Jorge Icaza and José María Arguedas in the 20th century would go forth to probe the confines of race. Unlike the indianists, the endings to their indigenista novels provide a narrative of the future embroiled in conflict and turmoil, with no easy answers.

REGINA HARRISON

See also entries on Juan León Mera, Juan Zorrilla de San Martin

Further Reading

Sommer, Doris, Foundational Fictions: the National Romances of Latin America, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991
Indigenism

Indigenism is a term used especially in art and literature, and it refers to the portrayal of the status, identity and culture of indigenous peoples. A concern among writers with the plight of Indians in Latin America is first evident in Fray Bartolomé de Las Casas’s tale of the destruction of the Indies (1542), an account of the cruelty and abuses perpetrated by the conquering Spaniards that gave rise to what became known as the “leyenda negra.” The 16th and 17th centuries also saw Ercilla y Zúñiga’s epic of the wars with the Araucanians and the Comentarios reales (Royal Commentaries of the Incas) by Garcilaso de la Vega, often referred to as “el inca Garcilaso” because he was son of a Spaniard and an Inca princess; his text is a recollection of the pre-conquest Inca world. Also significant is a long illustrated letter, addressed to Philip III by another Inca, Guaman Poma de Ayala. However, indigenismo is a term primarily used in reference to the late-19th and 20th centuries, and Clorinda Matto de Turner, specifically her novel Aves sin nido, 1889 (Birds without a Nest) is usually credited with being its first major exponent.

Indigenist writing seeks to portray and in some way reassert the values and importance of indigenous peoples of Latin America. Not surprisingly, these countries with the largest Indian populations have produced most of the writers concerned. The term indigenism is sometimes restricted to the Andean countries and to a particular period in their literary history: roughly the 1920s and 1930s. Notable novels from that time are the Bolivian Alcides Arguedas’s Raza de bronce, 1919 [Bronze Race], the Ecuadorian Jorge Icaza’s Huasipungo, 1934 (The Villagers), the Peruvian Ciro Alegría’s El mundo es ancho y ajeno, 1941 (Broad and Alien is the World). However, such temporal and geographical limitations are rather false: José María Arguedas and others have continued the tradition of indigenist writing in Peru, while Central America and Mexico are clearly an equally relevant part of the picture, having produced novels such as Miguel Angel Asturias’s Hombres de maíz, 1949 (Men of Maize) and Rosario Castellanos’s Balún Canán, 1957 (The Nine Guardians) and Oficio de tinieblas, 1962 [Tenebrae]. Perhaps, too, certain works of what is now called testimonial literature, straddling the documentary, or quasi anthropological approach and the imaginative one, should be considered manifestations of indigenist writing: Ricardo Pozas’s Juan Pérez Jolote (1948) was first published in an anthropological journal, and purports to be the story of an Amerindian told by himself; Rigoberta Menchú, the Mayan woman who won a Nobel prize for peace, tells her story through Elisabeth Burgos in Me llamo Rigoberta Menchú, 1985 (I, Rigoberta Menchú).

For the most part, however, the Indians have not spoken for themselves, but instead Spanish-speaking writers have attempted to speak for them. The results have sometimes been patronising, or over-exotic, quite frequently romanticising (the term Indianism is sometimes used in this regard); at worst the works are social tracts rather than novels. One of the most controversial was Huasipungo, which, while raising public awareness of the hard facts surrounding the exploitation of Indians, also portrayed them in a distasteful light. Yet many such writers were aware of these pitfalls and strove to find innovative ways of bridging the cultural divide. Thus legends, myths and concepts from Indian life are incorporated, the individual is downplayed in favour of the collective, and, more adventurously, attempts are made to reshape Spanish as a means of expressing Indian language and thought (rather than simply peppering the narrative with Indian words). most innovative and fruitful works have been those of Asturias and José María Arguedas: Los ríos profundos (Deep Rivers), Yawar fiesta (Yawar Fiesta), Todas las sangres (Everyone’s Blood). Arguedas was himself a product of two cultures, and spoke from the heart. Vargas Llosa, a great admirer of Arguedas, makes his own attempt at conveying an Indian world view in El hablador, 1987 (The Storyteller), with some success. Manuel Scorza’s cycle of five novels, the last of which, La tumba del relámpago [Requiem for a Lightning Bolt] was published in 1979, is an attempt to portray a political struggle from an Indian perspective by the use of mythical narrative.

PETER STANDISH

Further Reading

Bigas Torres, Sylvia, La narrativa indigenista mexicana del siglo XX, Guadalajara, Mexico: Editorial Universidad de Guadalajara, 1990 [Chapter I is an introduction to the subject in Spanish America; chapter 2 introduces the subject in 20th-century Mexico]

Díaz Polanco, Hector, Indigenismo, modernización y marginalidad: una revision crítica, Mexico City: Juan Pablos Editor, 1979

Lindstrom, Naomi, Twentieth-Century Spanish American Fiction, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994 [Chapter 4, “Realism and Beyond,” is relevant to this subject]

Jorge Isaacs 1837–1895

Colombian novelist and poet

Like most Colombian writers of the 19th century, Jorge Isaacs considered himself a poet. But he only published one slim volume of verse and his fame rests solidly on his extraordinary novel María, in which we can clearly detect poetic elements. Indeed, this powerful work of Romanticism shimmers with a tremulous lyricism, and in the tradition of sentimental literary works, overflows with emotion. The author tells us that he himself felt this emotion deeply. Before publishing the book in 1867, he confessed to some friends: “I have experienced the emotion of my book, but will the public feel it too?” The answer has been a resounding yes. Ever since María appeared, both reading public and critics have welcomed the novel enthusiastically. Its editorial success has also been phenomenal, with countless editions appearing in Latin America and in Spain; it is undoubtedly one of the most widely read books of Hispanic literature. For many years critics were moved by its thematic features, the romantically tragic love story. Since about 1950, they also have begun to appreciate more and more the virtues of its narrative technique. At the end of the 20th century, some feminists and other critics like Doris Sommer, have begun to raise serious questions about Isaacs—his role in society—and María, questioning both, when earlier the critical voices were all but unanimous in their praise. While recognizing that some things in the book have become hopelessly dated, like the raven of ill omen which appears croaking in various scenes, María can still interest and move readers deeply.

Many aspects of the novel have an autobiographical slant, beginning with the confessional first-person narration by Efrain, who serves the dual role of protagonist and narrator of the entire volume. Isaacs’s father, like Efrain’s, was Jewish, emigrated from Jamaica, and converted to Catholicism when he married a Colombian lady of the landed upper class. It seems significant that the protagonist, Efrain, has a Jewish name, as did Maria before her conversion (Ester). Doris Sommer dwells on this Jewishness, pointing out perspicaciously how it pervades and gives another dimension to the text. Isaacs lived during his formative childhood years in a beautiful country estate bought by his father called “Paradise,” and he repeatedly and nostalgically evokes this lovely countryside in María. Near the beginning of the novel—in Chapter 2—we are told by Efrain that “Así el cielo, los horizontes, las pampas y las cumbres del Cauca, hacen enmudecer a quien los contempla.” (The sky, the horizons, meadows and peaks of the River Cauca leave those who contemplate them speechless). Allusions to nature recur throughout the novel, most often in a Romantic fashion, reflecting the joy or the sadness felt by Efrain and María. Isaacs captures nature in all its beauty and power, but in this essentially tragic story fraught with obstacles and perils it comes across most frequently as somber, echoing the sobs and the weeping of the characters.

The love story told in retrospect by Efrain some years after the event makes up the heart of the novel. The love between Efrain and María is based on the clearest precepts of Romantic ideals: it is a first love for both of them and this mutual attraction emerges when they are still children. Second cousins, they grow up in the same happy household. But, as the reader soon learns, their love is doomed never to be consummated in a physical union of the two lovers. From the beginning of the novel, María’s fatal illness (epilepsy) and premature death hover menacingly throughout. The initial scene, describing Efrain’s leaving to go to school in Bogota, is filled with foreboding and copious tears—an important leitmotif in the novel - and prefigures his last leave-taking, the journey to London to study medicine, across the immense ocean which separates the lovers forever. Both young people’s love is unconditional, another strong Romantic element. Efrain swears to love María forever, and now, some years later, he is still bitterly lamenting her loss. María’s love for Efrain is undying: she goes to her grave before her loved one, hastening home from England, can reach her side. Throughout the book, the reactions of Efrain and his beloved María to external factors become converted into the main action in this sentimental romance.

The secondary action of the novel describes realistic scenes of local customs. Large chunks of María are devoted to these descriptions of local color, often found in the Romantic 19th-century Spanish American novel. If we examine these realistic episodes carefully, which seem at first glance to break the novel’s unity or distract from the main sentimental story, we find that they are interlaced with the other parts of the book. Most of them have to do with other pairs of lovers who marry happily, contrasting cruelly with Efrain and María, or in the case of the wretched African lovers Nay and Sinar, whose love is consummated physically, but who are separated forever by the sea, a sad comparison with what happens to Efrain and Maria. The parallel romantic and realistic currents in the 19th-century novel fuse harmoniously here.

There is a whole range of characters representing the various inhabitants of the Cauca Valley where the novel takes place: Jose and his family represent the humble, hardworking honest criollo; in Bruno and Remigia we are given a slice of life of two black slaves, and with Custodio and his daughter Salome mulattos are described. In addition, there are two wealthy landowning families, Carlos’s and Emigdio’s—both friends of Efrain who contrast with him and his romantic impulses, especially Emigdio, who has gone rather native and wallows in realism. All the most important characters, however, form part of the protagonist’s family, typical landowning proprietors with strong familial bonds, dominated by the figure of the father. This paternalistic structure assumes an important role in the novel’s plot, for Efrain unquestioningly obeys his father, even when he doesn’t want to. The only racial element unrepresented in Maria are the Indians.

Almost all these characters with the exception of Efrain are stereotypical figures. They are also idealized, like Maria’s black nursemaid Feliciana/Nay, whose tragic history is recounted in a dramatic short novel interpolated in the main novel (a technique reminiscent of that used by Cervantes in Don Quixote). And because we see everything through Efrain’s narrative eye, Maria has scant opportunity to show herself: only in conversations, and in parts of letters she writes to Efrain while he is studying in London which are reproduced in the text. All the characters serve as background or frame for the two lovers, especially Efrain.

Another remarkable quality of the characters in Maria is their good nature, their kindness. Unlike the realistic novels of the period, where many of the characters are bad or marred by flaws, here nobody has execrable characteristics. This is especially true of Efrain and Maria; their extreme goodness puts into relief even more their tragic destiny. One might assume that their personalities remain static and unchanged. However, by the novel’s end, Efrain has changed from a happy adolescent to a grieving mature man.

Joy or sadness is determined in both principal characters by external forces. Human relationships in this novel all seem exempt from serious problems or conflicts. The real antagonists facing Efrain are Maria’s fatal illness and death. The novel, then, can be reduced to Efrain’s confrontation with the existence of evil, translated into terms of pain, grief, sickness and death. We watch Efrain’s stumbling process, the passage marking an adolescent’s steps toward maturity. The novel thus can be read as a process of maturation taken by a young man confronting the frightening presence of death in his life. This reading contradicts those critics who dismiss Maria as a lachrymose, overly-sentimental romance and one can understand why the novel continues to be read with pleasure, for it deals delicately with a theme of great universal impact.

Isaacs shows skill in portraying his characters. They all speak naturally, whether in elegant, simple or realistic language. The novel is also full of what Anderson-Imbert calls “the physiology of love:” tears, swoons, blushes and blanching. Maria is the typical pale romantic heroine. Still, we get to know her not only through Efrain’s doting eyes, but also as she takes part in the novel’s action: putting flowers in her beloved’s room, caring for the father when he falls seriously ill, playing with the youngster Juan, in her letters, and when she listens mesmerized to Efrain’s reading from Chateaubriand’s Atala (another significant prefigurative scene of the tragedy to come near the beginning of the book).
Despite the title bearing her name, it is Efraín, rather than María, who is the protagonist of the novel. It is his life’s story being unfolded in retrospect and he appears in practically every scene, while María is often absent. We watch Efraín in action, we see him happy and sad, we watch him suffer, doubt and love. Nobody else comments on him, for he is the sole narrator. As the novel advances, we get a good spiritual portrait of Efraín, who is just like many other Romantic young men his age, so we can sympathize and perhaps identify with him. The novel has thus attained what Isaacs sought to do: it recounts for us the tragic story of two adolescents. We contemplate their ill-fated love, take pity on them with all their suffering, and in the end, we have traversed a rather complex road of universal human experience.

GEORGE D. SCHADE

Biography

Selected Works

Novels
Maria, novela original, Bogota: Gaitán, 1867; as María, a South American Romance, translated by Rollo Ogden, New York: Harper, 1890
“Camilo,” 6 chapters of an unfinished novel, Boletín de la Academia Colombiana, Bogota, vol. 2 (1937)

Poetry
Saulo, Bogota: Echeverría, 1881

Plays
“Paulina Lamberti,” Bolivar, no. 12 (1952) [Unpublished in Isaacs’s lifetime]

Other Writings

A mis amigos y los comerciantes del Cauca, Cali: Hurtado, 1875
La revolución radical en Antioquia, Bogota: Gaitán, 1880

Compilations and Anthologies

Poesías de Jorge Isaacs, Bogota, Imprenta de El Mosaico, 1864
Poesías completas, Barcelona: Maucci, 1920
Obras completas, 2 vols, Medellín, Colombia: Montoya y Montoya, 1966

Further Reading

Anderson-Imbert, Enrique, prologue to María, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1951; also published as “La romántica María de Isaacs,” in his Crítica interna, Madrid: Taurus, 1960
Zanetti, Susana, Jorge Isaacs, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1967
Ricardo Jaimes Freyre 1868–1933

Bolivian poet and historian

Ricardo Jaimes Freyre’s literary output includes poetry, plays and short stories. An outstanding example of the last is “Justicia india” [Indian Justice], also known by the title “En las montañas” [In the Mountains]. In addition, he published a treatise on metrics, Leyes de versificación castellana [Rules of Spanish Versification], the only tract of its kind written by a practitioner of Spanish American modernista poetry. Seeking to liberate Hispanic verse from the stifling regularity of its metrical patterns, he defended free verse and called for a new method of scanning a line—by measuring feet rather than simply counting syllables. He was a socialist, and occasionally, as in “Justicia india,” he revealed a concern for societal problems. But it was as an “ivory tower” modernista poet that he made his most enduring contributions. Not at all modest when speaking of his achievements, he once observed: “hubo tres grandes innovadores de las letras en America: Rubén Darío, Leopoldo Lugones, y Yo” (There were three great innovators in Spanish American literature: Rubén Darío, Leopoldo Lugones, and I).

The appearance in 1899 of Castalia bárbara [Barbarous Castalia], his first and most famous poetry collection, coincided with the apogee of the first phase of Modernismo. The title recalls Leconte de Lisle’s Poèmes barbares, a work published in 1862 that evoked legends and traditions from other cultures, including the Nordic. Inspired by this French volume, Jaimes Freyre introduced a new strain of escapism into Hispanic poetry, the world of Scandinavian mythology. Castalia was the fountain that flowed from Mount Parnassus, the mythic source of poetic inspiration for the Greeks. However, Jaimes Freyre’s Castalia was not the serene spring of classical Greece but, rather, a barbaric one that proffered violent motifs from Norse mythology.

In these poems, especially in the first section, also called “Castalia bárbara,” he summons the Norse gods and recreates Valhalla and other thematic material from the Wagnerian cycle. “Aeternum Vale” [Eternal Farewell] is an apocalyptic vision of the twilight of the old gods—Odin, Thor, etc.—and the coming of a new deity, “un Dios silencioso que tiene los brazos abiertos” (a silent God with open arms). In “Los heroes” [The Heroes] he offers a hyperbolic portrait of fierce Germanic warriors as if they were comic book supermen: “los anchos pechos, los sangrientos ojos / y las hirsutas cabelleras blondas” (broad chests, bloodthirsty eyes, and bristly blond hair). “El Walhalla” captures the sights and sounds of battle and furnishes a textbook example of synesthesia, a favorite modernista device, in its opening phrase “Vibra el himno rojo” (The red hymn echoes). The poem concludes with an orgiastic scene in the great hall: “Hay besos y risas. / Y un cráneo lleno / de hidromiel, en donde apagan, / abrasados por la fiebre, su sed los guerreros muertos.” (Amidst laughter and kisses, the dead warriors, parched with fever, quench their thirst from a skull filled with mead).

Erotic imagery and themes dominate the second portion of this collection, “País de sueño” [Dream Country]. Several poems in this section treat the Middle Ages, a period attractive to Jaimes Freyre precisely because of its historical and spatial remoteness. The centerpiece of Part Three, “País de sombra” [Shadow Country], is “Las voces tristes” [The Sad Voices], in which he sketches a frigid, inhospitable terrain that lacks human warmth. The sensation of physical and emotional coldness conveyed by this poem is a by-product of his literary elitism and aloofness. Here, the harshness of the climate has a direct bearing on tone and outlook: “sobre el vasto desierto / flota una vaga sensación de angustia, / de supremo abandono, de profundo y sombrío desaliento” (floating over the vast desert is a vague sensation of anguish, of supreme abandonment, of deep, dark discouragement). “Las voces tristes” also clearly illustrates one of Jaimes Freyre’s favorite techniques, the irregular combination of long and short lines, with verses ranging in length from two syllables to eighteen.

One final poem in Castalia bárbara, “Siempre” [Always], often identified by its initial verse, “Peregrina paloma imaginaria” (Imaginary Wandering Dove), merits comment because it encapsulates one of the major tenets of the modernista aesthetic, the obsession with the pursuit of a lofty, elusive ideal. The linking of whiteness, the dove’s flight, and images of light and the sacred points to a higher plane beyond the grasp of mere mortals who bathe in “el mar glacial de los dolores” (the glacial sea of sorrows).

Jaimes Freyre’s second and final volume of poetry, Los sueños son vida, 1917 [Dreams Are Life], conveys traditional themes such as love, beauty, and human emotions utilizing an assortment of verse forms. His subject matter ranges from Greek mythology and native American civilizations to a panegyric on Tolstoy. These poems also contain some of the best examples of his modernista imagery: “un collar de perlas” (a pearl necklace), “los senos de Cleopatra” (Cleopatra’s breasts), “princesa errante” (errant princess), “viviente escultura” (living sculpture), “sueño de mármol” (dream of marble) and “rostro níveo” [snow-white face]. Lexical items such as “talisman” and the titles “Eros” and “El rubí” [The Ruby] also place this collection firmly within the modernista camp. “Lo fugaz” [That Which is Fleeting], the best-known selection, juxtaposes the rose, one of the most readily-identifiable images of beauty in all of poetry, with its antithesis, a dark, muddy swamp. As the flower dies, its scattered petals give off a perfume that sweetens the noxious waters. Despite the transitory nature of life, ideal beauty, symbolized by the rose, is eternal.

Ricardo Jaimes Freyre, the intellectual of the modernista group, created a poetic world detached from the common experiences of daily life. His fantastic settings were geographically and temporally remote from and thematically antithetical to the Spanish American social and political realities of his time. Jaimes Freyre’s poetry is rich in its variety of musical sounds and metrical forms, including free verse. In the history of Spanish American literature he is best remembered for his unique themes based on Nordic mythology, his formal and technical renovation of Hispanic poetry, and his theoretical formulations on versification.

MELVIN S. ARRINGTON, JR
Biography

Born in Bolivia, 12 May 1868. Both parents were writers. Much of his life spent in Argentina, his adopted country. Close friend of Rubén Darío with whom he founded the Revista de América, 1894. Moved to the province of Tucumán in northwest of Argentina in 1900, where he taught literature and history at the University of Tucumán. Interest turned increasingly to early history of this province. Returned to Bolivia in early 1920s where he held a number of high-level government posts including those of Minister of Education and of Foreign Affairs. Also served as ambassador to United States, Chile and Brazil, as well as being Bolivia’s representative at the United Nations. Died in Argentina, 24 April 1933.

Selected Works

Poetry
Castalia bárbara, Buenos Aires: Juan Schurër, 1899
Los sueños son vida, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Editorial Limitada, 1917

Prose Narratives
Note: It is not possible to provide full publication details for the items listed below because at the time of publication there is no collection of Jaimes Freyre’s prose fiction.
“Zoe,” Buenos Aires, 1894
“Los viajeros,” Buenos Aires, 1900
“Zaghi, mendigo,” Buenos Aires, 1905
“En las montañas,” Caracas, 1906
“En un hermoso día de verano,” Buenos Aires, 1907
Los jardines de Academo [unfinished novel], n.d.

Plays
La hija de Jefte, La Paz: Tipografía de El Siglo Industrial, 1889
Los conquistadores, Buenos Aires: Perroti, 1928

Other Writings
Historia de la edad media y de los tiempos modernos, Buenos Aires: n.p., 1895
Tucumán en 1810, Tucumán, Argentina: n.p., 1909
Historia de la República de Tucumán, Buenos Aires: Coni Hermanos, 1911
Leyes de la versificación castellana, Buenos Aires: Coni Hermanos, 1912
El Tucumán del siglo XVI, Buenos Aires: Coni Hermanos, 1914
El Tucumán colonial, Buenos Aires: Coni Hermanos, 1915
Historia del descubrimiento de Tucumán, Buenos Aires: Coni Hermanos, 1916

Compilations and Anthologies
Poesías completas, edited by F. Díez de Medina, La Paz: Ministerio de Educación y Bellas Artes, 1957

Further Reading
Carrilla, Emilio, Ricardo Jaimes Freyre, Buenos Aires: America, 1963
Jewish Writing

Mexico, Central America and the Spanish-Speaking Caribbean

In the early 16th century, the New World was known as a safe-haven for Latino-speaking Jewish colonists escaping the Holy Inquisition. Many were conversos and marranos (e.g., crypto-Jews) who had come with Columbus looking for a promised land, while others simply had Jewish blood in their veins, which they were afraid to acknowledge. Cuba and Mexico in particular were considered places where the lack of pure blood (“pureza de sangre”) was common. And while these escapees seldom declared their Judaism, people like Juan Ruiz de Alarcón and even Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz were rumoured to have Jewish ancestors. The literature of the time available to us is in the form of theological tracts, diaries, correspondence, family chronicles and edicts. It refers to personalities like the Carvajal family in Mexico, whose odyssey was recorded in book form, in 1944, by the historian Alfonso Toro. But the growth of a solid Jewish literary tradition, from the Río Grande to Panama, as well as in the Spanish-speaking Caribbean, is not a result of an Iberian-Jewish presence, which had all but disappeared by the time the US-Mexican war was declared. Instead, it was a product of Yiddish-speaking Eastern-European immigrants arriving from the end of the 19th century to the end of World War II. They came from small rural towns, known as shtetls, and were fervent readers of novels by Sholem Aleichem and I.L. Peretz. While the switch to Spanish took place immediately, it wasn’t until the second and third generation that distinguished novelists, essayists, playwrights and poets began to flourish in the region.

Yiddish poetry flourished in Mexico City and Havana in the early decades of the 20th century, a time when the Jewish community was important enough to have daily newspapers in Yiddish, as well as publishing houses. The first works of fiction by Jewish writers in Spanish were published in the 1960s but, unlike their US counterparts, they were not widely read and had trouble getting published. But just as Cuba was becoming an established Jewish cultural centre, things changed radically with the Revolution of 1959. Most Cuban Jews, granted their prosperity, chose exile, and whatever infrastructure has been created then was dismantled. Instead, Mexico, with a wealthy community of 50,000 members, has, since the 1960s, become an attractive magnet to Jewish writers, second only to Argentina and Brazil.

Ironically, most of what is available by Jewish writers in Mexico is eclipsed by the work of gentile ones with crucial Jewish motifs: Carlos Fuentes, for instance, is responsible for several novels that have a Jewish cast or Jewish symbols, including La cabeza de la hidra (The Hydra Head). Likewise, Homero Aridjis’s 1942: Vida y tiempos de Juan Cabezón de Castilla [1942: the Life and Times of Juan Cabezón de Castilla] is a well-known novel on the arrival of conversos in Mexico, while José Emilio Pacheco’s Morirás lejos [A Distant Death] is an exploration of the Holocaust in a Mexican setting. Because of their authors’ fame, books like these have eclipsed important works by Jewish writers. Among the most prominent Jewish writers in Mexico are three women: Margo Glantz (b. 1930; see separate entry), Angelina Muñiz-Huberman (b. 1937), and Esther Seligson (b. 1941). While space limitations make it impossible to offer an analysis of their work, it is important to mention that the first, a daughter of the Yiddish poet Jacob Glantz and the author of Genealogías (The Family Tree: an Illustrated Novel), is mainly a literary critic and recorder of the past, whereas the other two are best known as novelists and short-story writers. Muñiz won the prestigious Xavier Villaurrutia Prize for Huerto cerrado, huerto sellado [Enclosed and Sealed Garden]. Her themes are metaphysical: an alchemist’s search for God; the inner sexual thoughts of Sor Juana; and the redemptive quest of a man who is challenged to cross a river. Muñiz is a writer highly influenced by Borges and also by Rabbi Nahman of Bratslav, a leader of existential Hasidism. She has also edited anthologies and critical volumes on Kabbalah in the Hispanic world. Seligson, on the other hand, is a theatre critic; she is also the author of La morada en el tiempo, 1982 [A Dwelling Place in Time], an attempt to rewrite the Bible. Her writing is metaphorical, obscure, perhaps even evasive. Like the creatures of Frida Kahlo, herself a descendant of Hungarian Jews, Seligson’s characters are not bound by the physical laws of time and space and perceive fantastic visions of eternity. Among the younger Mexican Jewish writers is Ilan Stavans (b. 1961), an essayist and short-story writer who settled in the United States. He is the author of Talia y el cielo [Thalia and the Sky] and La pianista manca (The One-Handed Pianist and Other Stories), both of which exemplify his passion to establish a bridge between Eastern European letters and the Latin American imagination.

The most distinguished of all is José Kozer (b. 1940), a major poet to emerge from the Cuban diaspora since the Cuban Revolution. Starting with Padres y otras profesiones [Parents and other Professions], published in his thirties, he has produced a solid poetic oeuvre of more than half a dozen collections. His work often deals with his early life in Santos Juárez, a neighbourhood in Havana where he grew up, but not with New York, where he has resided since he went into exile in 1960.

When compared to Mexico and Cuba, the Jewish communities in Central America (Costa Rica, Honduras, Panama, Guatemala) have always been small. Their sharpest increase took place before and during World War II, when governments accepted small numbers of refugees from Eastern Europe. As a result of its small numbers, literature among members of these communities has remained a local affair. As in the case of Mexico, gentile Central American writers have also dealt with Jewish themes and their work is considerably more prominent than that of their Jewish counterparts. For instance, Rubén Darío, the celebrated modernista poet, wrote in the following stanza from his poem “Canto a la Argentina” [Song to Argentina] these lines which are much better known than anything by a native Jewish author from this area:” ¡Cantad judíos de la pampa! Mocetones de ruda estampa, dulces Rebecas de ojos francos, Rubenes de largas gudejas, patriarcas de cabellos blancos, y espesos como hípicas crines; cantad, cantad, Saras viejas y adolescentes Benjamines, con voz de vuestro corazón: ¡Hemos encontrado a Sión! [Sing Jews of the Pampa! Young men of rugged appearance, sweet Rebbeccas with honest eyes, Reubens of long locks, patriarchs of white, dense, horse-like hair. Sing, sing old Sarahs and adolescent Benjamins with the voice of our heart: We have found Zion!].

Jewish writers from Central America include Samuel Rovinski (b. 1936) and a couple of Guatemalans of distinction: Victor Perera (b. 1934), a Sephardic Jew who emigrated to the United States at an early age, is the author of Rites. A Guatemalan Boyhood, and is also respected as an activist who defends the rights of native Indians on the Guatemala-Mexico border. The second is Alcina Lubitch Domecq (b. 1953), another Guatemalan who is responsible for El espejo en el espejo: o, La noble sonrisa del perro [The Mirror’s Mirror: or, The Noble Smile of the Dog] a novel clearly influenced by Lewis Carroll and Borges, which describes the adventures of an eight-year-old Jewish girl left alone in a battlefield, and Intoxicada [Intoxicated], a collection of what the American critic Irving Howe once called “short shorts.”

There is little indication that Jewish writers from Latin America as a whole have read and are influenced by each other. When acknowledged, their role models come from abroad (Eastern Europe, Russia, the US), and are often writers like Sholem Aleichem, Isaac Babel, Franz Kafka, Bruno Schulz and Isaac Bashevis Singer: Americans like Saul Bellow and Phillip Roth; or contemporary Israeli writers such as A.B. Yehoshua and Amos Oz. But as the Jewish communities in the region come of age, a sense of maturity and stylistic development can be felt among the new literary generation. Happily, young writers in the 1990s are beginning to look to their native Jewish predecessors as cornerstones in the shaping of a Hispanic-Jewish literary identity.

ILAN STAVANS

Further Reading

See the Further Reading section at the end of the following essay for critical studies in this field. Provided below are creative works only.

Kozer, José (Cuba), Padres y otras profesiones, New York: Villa Miseria, 1972

—De Chepén a la Habana, in collaboration with Isaac Goldenberg, New York: Bayú-Menoráh, 1973

—La garza sin sombras, Barcelona: Llibres del Mall, 1985

—De donde oscilan los seres en sus proporciones, Tenerife, Canary Islands: H.A.Editores, 1990

Lubitch-Domec, Alcina (Guatemala), El espejo en el espejo: o La noble sonrisa del perro, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1983

—Intoxicada (Mexico), Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1988

Muñiz-Huberman, Angelina (Mexico), Huerto cerrado, huerto sellado, Mexico City: Oasis, 1985

—De magias y prodigios, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1987

Seligson, Esther (Mexico), La morada en el tiempo, Mexico City: Editorial Artifice, 1981

Stavans, Ilan (Mexico), in collaboration with Zuri Balkoff, Talía y el cielo: o El libro de los ensueños, Mexico City: Plaza y Valdés, 1989
South America

Jewish writing in South America did not really begin until the 20th century. Yet it is important to recognize that since the Spanish Conquest there has been a Jewish presence in Latin America, manifested in the writings of scholars and theologians. The history of the Sephardim during the Inquisition is retold and imaginatively reinterpreted by contemporary Jewish writers.

Religious animosity towards New Christians had been eroded by the late 19th century, when Latin American countries achieved independence. In Colombia, Jorge Isaacs, of Sephardic-English descent, wrote María (1867), considered the finest example of the Romantic novel in Spanish America. Although María is a Catholic, her bucolic romance with her Christian cousin is doomed to failure. María has been explained as a parable, with an undercurrent of lyricism and fatalism that stems from the Jewish tradition.

The corpus of Jewish writings in South America—from the beginning of the 20th century, spans three to four generations - and is mostly made up of Eastern European Ashkenazi writers who enriched the process of cultural adaptation by adding their experience directly to the literary heritage of their adopted countries. Most writers are Argentine, because Argentina has by far the largest Jewish community. Its most celebrated author was Alberto Gerchunoff, a journalist for the Buenos Aires liberal paper La Nación. Gerchunoff wrote Los gauchos judíos, 1910 (The Jewish Gauchos of the Pampas), on the occasion of the country’s first centenary: These twenty-six vignettes have become a classic of Argentine literature. The preface idealizes life in the early Jewish settlements by emphasizing the virtue of honest work on the land, far from pogroms and persecution.

Gerchunoff’s descriptions of man’s struggle with nature and the brutal conditions of rural life were followed by the works of Rebeca Mactas, José Pavlotzky, Marcos Alpersohn, Samuel Tarnopolsky and José Rabinovich. Rabinovich was a prolific novelist and playwright, noteworthy for his testimonial, caustic style. These writers also evoked Hispanism, hoping to give respectability to the immigrant and help him integrate his national allegiance with his Mediterranean-Hispanic-Hebrew tradition.

The Yiddish language of this first generation leaves the intimacy of the shtetl, and under a renewed cultural impetus becomes a polished, literary language. Yiddish papers thrive, Yiddish theatres increase their repertoires.

The generation of the 1940s and 1950s, from the rapidly growing Jewish centers, contributed to new literary trends. Among the social critics, Bernardo E.Koremblit is prominent for his erudite analyses of the intellectual’s role in working towards reform. Among the novelists, Bernardo Verbinsky’s Es difícil empezar a vivir, 1941 [It’s Hard to Start a Life], portrays Jewish life in Buenos Aires in the 1930s, when fascism was on the rise. Through the eyes of a curious adolescent, Verbitsky unfolds a life of corruption and anti-Semitic injustices.

In addition to broadening the social vision of Latin American literature, Jewish authors strongly contributed to a new genre: psychological drama. Its major exponent, Samuel Eichelbaum, designed careful plots for his “superrealist” dramas that dwell on the hidden aspects of the human psyche and on universal dilemmas. Of his plays on Jewish themes, El judío Aarón, 1926 [Aaron the Jew], probes the polemics among agricultural colonists, and Nadie la conoció nunca, 1926 [No One Ever Knew Her], touches upon Jewish prostitution.

In his plays El teatro soy yo, 1933 [I Am Theatre], and Pan criollo, 1938 [Creole Bread], César Tiempo (pseudonym for Israel Zeitlin) develops conflicts with dramatic force and realism. His poems idealize the harmony of Argentine and Jewish culture, and glorify the Sabbath day.

The pseudonym of Samuel Glusberg—Enrique Espinoza, honoring Baruch Spinoza and Heinrich Heine, as befits a cosmopolitan thinker closely attached to his heritage. An eminent essayist, Glusberg also edited two reviews, America and Babel. His short stories about Jews in Buenos Aires are collected in La levita gris, 1924 [The Grey Coat].

In Mester de juderia, 192.4 [Crafted Jewish Verse], Carlos Grumberg directed his rage at the world’s indifference to the extermination of the Jews during the Holocaust. The writings of Lázaro Liacho in Pan de Buenos Aires, 1935 [Bread of Buenos Aires], depict relationships between Jews and Christians in Argentina; in later years Liacho turned to metaphysical and religious themes.

The polemical style of David Viñas is illustrated in Los dueños de la tierra, 1959 [The Owners of the Land], an ideological examination of the governing classes, based on a historical incident. Like Viñas’s own father—a judge under President Yrigoyen—the protagonist is sent to mediate a labor conflict. When the army intervenes and massacres the workmen, they become, ironically, the real “owners of the land” where they are buried.

While earlier writers were careful to maintain a “purebred,” classical language—Spanish or Portuguese—in order to establish their credentials as legitimate Latin American authors, the second generation (of Pedro Orgambide and Noé Jitrik) no longer felt the need to justify themselves for their Jewishness, and came to be perceived in subtler, more universal terms.

The third wave of writers, from the 1960s onward, experienced a return to centuries-old roots as a way to reconnect with their past. Those who sought to insert themselves into a national discourse that excluded them, linked various periods of political strife and inserted their individual “petite histoire” into the collective history of their country. They invented myths of illustrious ancestors, and utopian dreams of assimilation into a space that history had previously denied them. Most representative, and ahead of his generation in Argentina, was Germán Rozenmacher, whose “knight of the Indies,” Simon Brumelstein (1987), escapes from his drab existence into his imaginary kingdom of Chantania. Similar solutions are sought by the protagonist of Jorge Goldemberg’s Krinsky (1977) and of Osvaldo Dragún’s Arriba, Corazón, 1987 [Forward, Corazón], who break linear chronology as they trace their Ashkenazi ancestry. Mario Szichman in A las 20:25 la señora entró en la inmortalidad, 1981 [At 20:25 the Lady Entered Immortality], provides an apocryphal aristocratic lineage for his Jewish immigrant characters. Moacyr Scliar in A estranha nação de Rafael Mendes, 1983 [The Strange Nation of Rafael Mendes] and Marcos Aguinis in La gesta del marrano, 1992 [The Saga of the “Filthy Pig”], draw on real events of Sephardic history to write their novels. With Mil años un día, 1986 [A Thousand Years One Day], and against the background of the military repression in Argentina, Ricardo Halac gives a modern twist to the meaning of the 1492 Edict of Expulsion against the Jews. Isaac Chocrón introduces Sephardic values and customs into Venezuelan sensibility in his plays Clíper; Animales feroces, 1963 [Wild Animals], and novels Rómpase en caso de incendio [Break in Case of Fire].

The devastating impact of the Chilean and Argentine military dictatorships among Jewish writers is reflected in the plays of Ariel Dorfman and Aída Bortnik, and in the poetry of Marjorie Agosín, and Alicia Portnoy. Mario Goloboff succeeds in recreating the atmosphere of anguish resulting from a century of repression, within the Jewish gaucho tradition initiated by Gerchunoff. Goloboff advances the saga of the Jewish pioneers into the 21st century with his novel Comuna Verdad, 1995 [“The Truth” Commune].

A long tradition of journalism has resulted in research on Jewish communities by Argentine historians like Boleslao Lewin, by essayists Bernardo Korenblitt, Ismael Viñas, Jacobo Timerman, León Rozitchner, and Elio Brailovsky, and by the highly poetic essays of Santiago Kovadloff. In Brazil, journalists Zevi Guivelder, Alberto Dines, and Patricia Finzi are also editors of leading journals. Their topics range from analyses of the effects of Nazism to reflections on the contemporary alienation of Jewish youth.

Over the past three decades, as South American countries witnessed a growth in extreme nationalism, anti-imperialism, and anti-Semitism, Israel became a strong presence in the consciousness of Jewish writers like Ricardo Feierstein, author of Mestizo, 1993, who regards himself and his contemporaries as those of the “Generation of the Desert,” deprived of active participation in the shaping of Jewish history yet bearing its burden.

A great number of authors who reside abroad through forced or voluntary exile continue writing in their own tongues. Far from losing their identity with their country, they strengthened it, and at the same time, they reaffirmed their links with Judaism: in France, Alicia Dujovne-Ortiz, Luisa Futoransky, Mario Goloboff; in Spain, Arnoldo Liberman, and Mario Satz; in the US Alicia Borinsky, Marjorie Agosín, Nora Glickman; in Mexico, Juan Gelman; in Israel, Samuel Pecar and Oded Sverdlik.

A preference for religious, biblical, kabbalistic and metaphysical poetry characterizes the works of Eliahu Toker (who still writes in Spanish and in Yiddish), José Isaacsen, Manuela Fingueret, Rubén Kanaelestein and Humberto Costantini.

Humor has been a constant feature among South American Jewish writers, exemplified in Samuel Pecar’s sketches of Buenos Aires’s Jews and in Isaac Goldemberg’s picaresque adventures of a Peruvian Jew in La vida a plazos de Jacobo Lerner, 1976 (The Fragmented Life of Don Jacobo Lerner). The parody of the “Yiddishe mame” stereotypes is presented in Alicia Steinberg’s novel Cuando digo Magdalena, 1992 [When I Say Magdalena], and in Diana Raznovich’s play Casa Matriz [Matrix House]; the depiction of Jewish immigrants’ machinations in a drug-ridden Colombia is illustrated in the novels of Azriel Bibliowicz; the happy combination of Brazilian magical realism with Jewish irony is unanimously praised in the novels of Moacyr Scliar, like O exército de un hómen só, 1973 [The One-Man Army].
The boom in women’s literature since the 1960s includes a high proportion of Jewish writers who chose to reveal their conflicted identities in autobiographical, satirical, intellectual fiction, though never at the expense of intimacy and conviviality. Brazilian novelist Clarice Lispector and Argentine poet Alejandra Pizarnik increased their international reputation posthumously. As professionals and intellectuals, Jewish women experiment in various genres. Venezuelan journalist Alicia Freilich-Segal wrote the novel Cláper (1987), to observe her father’s generation as it related to her own. Women writers have recently begun to fill anthologies and are now the subjects of numerous critical studies. These include: Luisa Futoransky, Tamara Kamenszain, Alicia Steinberg, Alicia Dujovne-Ortiz, Aída Gelbrunk, Nora Glickman and Ana Maria Shúa.

NORA GLICKMAN

Further Reading

Kaminszain, Tamara, “Dos apéndices,” in her El texto silencioso: tradición y vanguardia en la poesía sudamericana, Mexico City: UNAM, 1983
Senkman, Leonardo, La identidad judia en la Argentina, Buenos Aires: Editorial Pardés, 1983

Special Issues of Journals

Journals

It must be emphasized that all it is possible to offer here is a tiny selection of the many interesting cultural journals of Latin America, both past and present.
Marcha (1939–1973)

Marcha was founded in Montevideo, Uruguay, on 23 June 1939 by the economist and journalist Carlos Quijano. From its early days, in a tide of anti-fascism, it was the proponent of a fusion of economic, political and aesthetic debate. Quijano himself had been both a member of parliament and a professor of political economy, and was the cohesive force around whom, in the pages of Marcha, the post-war generations of Uruguayan writers would form. Anti-imperialist, nationalist, with an emphasis on Latin American rather than European culture, and (when the time came) pro-Cuban, this weekly magazine was to become an enduring and influential left-wing rallying point for Latin American intellectuals over the next three decades or more.

Together with its importance in creating a platform for free-thinking commentary and analysis within Uruguay, Marcha was in a position to greet, and nurture, the new tide of innovative writing that was to flourish in Latin America as the Boom of the 1960s. Juan Carlos Onetti had joined the newly founded weekly in 1939 as literary editor, with his own humorous column, and the eminent Uruguayan critic Emir Rodríguez Monegal, later to become one of the foremost commentators of the Boom, was literary editor from 1944 to the mid-1950s. From 1958 to 1968 the position was held by Ángel Rama, notoriously an adversary of Monegal’s “literato puro” stance, and an advocate of the re-evaluation of literature and culture from a sociological, Marxist-theoretical standpoint. In the early 1960s the magazine was directed by a youthful Eduardo Galeano (1961–64) and towards the end of the decade Marcha could count on regular contributions from writers such as David Viñas, Mario Vargas Llosa, Mario Benedetti, Manuel Maldonado Denis and Roberto Fernández Retamar. This kind of range, together with the breadth and scope of Quijano’s editorial columns, and Rama’s ground-breaking analyses of Latin American culture, were to earn Marcha’s reputation as one of the great 20th-century magazines to come out of the continent.

Marcha’s demise was one of the results of the horrific military coup of 27 June 1973. The Marcha team were already aware that in the prevailing climate of repression and censorship the magazine’s fate was probably sealed, and the time came towards the end of that year with the publication of the winning entry of a Marcha short story competition. The story, “La guardaespaldas” by Nelson Marra, was taken by the military to be a direct indictment of the regime, and Marra was arrested, closely followed by Quijano, Onetti, and Hugo Alfaro, the chief editor of the magazine. Another competition judge and a notable contributor, Jorge Ruffinelli, was in Mexico at the time of the arrests and judged fit not to return. The most chilling aspect of reprisals relating to Marcha personnel was the disappearance in August 1977 of the magazine’s deputy editor, Julio Castro. Following his release Carlos Quijano went into exile in Mexico, where he later renewed the magazine as Cuadernos de Marcha, which continued to publish items from earlier collaborators such as Rama.

FRANK MCQUADE
Further Reading

Alfaro, Hugo (editor), Antología de “Marcha” (1939), Montevideo: Biblioteca de Marcha, 1970
Ruffinelli, Jorge, “Ángel Rama, Marcha, y la crítica literaria latinoamericana en los años 60,” Casa de las Américas, vol. 34/192 (July-September 1993)

Mundo Nuevo (1966–1971)

Founded in Paris in 1966 by the noted Uruguayan literary critic Emir Rodríguez Monegal, Mundo Nuevo was the flagship for the latest writing of the 1960s in Latin America. Its purpose was to provide a critical forum for discussion of the avantgarde writers of the period, and this in large part meant a celebration of the so-called Boom. In its earlier days at least, under the direction of Rodriguez Monegal, the review was an elegant showcase of new Latin American writing, and its wide-ranging newsletter sections, Brújula [Compass] and Sextante (appropriate metaphors of navigation and exploration in the context of the magazine’s self-styled role as a vehicle for cultural debate) brought together items concerning conferences, translations, literary awards, and critical reviews. The opening “Presentación,” and the first article of the first issue, a dialogue between Rodriguez Monegal and Carlos Fuentes, set the pace for the review, with its emphasis on the new cultural dawn of Latin American letters, the cosmopolitan perspective of the Latin American intellectual, with a certain Eurocentric celebration of Latin America most obviously underpinned by Monegal’s insistence that the magazine should be based in Paris, to avoid the possible cultural parochialism that might result from projecting it from a more obvious Latin American base such as Mexico City or Buenos Aires. The magazine’s declared ideological neutrality did not prevent it from including political issues, some polemical, such as Vargas Llosa’s open letter concerning the Siniavski-Daniel censorship affair in Russia, and the United States’ involvement in Vietnam and Puerto Rico. Mundo Nuevo was notable for its presentation of new pieces of Latin-American literature, often before their full publication. The second issue includes a chapter from Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude), and later issues would include forthcoming works by Severo Sarduy, José Donoso and Cabrera Infante.

In spite of its claims to ideological neutrality in the name of liberal, artistic purity, the magazine was dogged almost from the outset by attacks from the Left, particularly in Cuba. In 1966 the New York Times broke the story of the infiltration of supposedly liberal intellectual journals by the CIA, by means of allegedly dummy funding organizations, such as the Congress for Cultural Freedom. This body did indeed fund in part the magazine, and was shown to have backing itself from the CIA. In spite of Monegal’s repeated claims in an extensive defence in the magazine, and in subsequent years, the ideological mud stuck. In its first few years Mundo Nuevo continued to be a rich promotional vehicle for Latin American writing and literary debate, but its quality deteriorated with the removal of the magazine to Buenos Aires in 1968, and Monegal’s resignation. In spite of some interesting debates on, for example, “la nueva novela” in Latin America, it ceased to be a force after this time, and the magazine folded with issue 58 when the Ford Foundation withdrew its support in 1971.

FRANK MCQUADE

Further Reading

McQuade, Frank, “Mundo Nuevo: la nueva novela y la guerra fría cultural,” America (Cahiers du CRICCAL), vol. 9/10 (1992.)

Orígenes (1944–1956)

This influential arts review, the most prestigious of its day in the Spanish Caribbean, was an extension of the literary group, mainly poets, headed by José Lezama Lima. The magazine was founded in Havana by Lezama and José (Pepe) Rodríguez Feo in 1944, and ran to a total of forty-two issues until its demise in 1956. Its early editors comprised Lezama Lima, Rodríguez Feo, Mariano (Rodríguez) and Alfredo Lozano. With the thirty-sixth issue, the wealthy Rodríguez Feo, who funded the review, withdrew his patronage after an editorial conflict with Lezama (concerning the publication of an article by Juan Ramón Jiménez).

Orígenes provided a focal point for many of the most promising poets and critics in Cuba in the 1940s and 1950s, and featured poetry, short stories and critical essays on contemporary art, music and philosophical trends. Also included were numerous illustrations by notable Cuban artists of the day, and cover illustrations include work by Amelia Peláez, Wifredo Lam, René Portocarrero, Alfredo Lozano, and “Mariano.” This variety and vitality was informed, however, by a coherent and unifying aesthetic vision, principally that of the transcendental status of the creative artist, and the durability of artistic creation in the face of the taints of the outside world; in essence a hermetic and apolitical position. The opening editorial, penned by Lezama, is a strident assertion of the supremacy of pure artistic creation:

No le interesa a ORÍGENES formular un programa, sino ir lanzando las flechas de su propia estela…La libertad consiste para nosotros en el respeto absoluto que merece el trabajo por la creación, para expresarse en la forma más conveniente a su temperamento, a sus deseos o a su frustración, ya partiendo de su yo más oscuro, de su reacción o acción ante las solicitudes del mundo exterior, siempre que se manifieste dentro de la tradición humanista, y la libertad que se deriva de esa tradición que ha sido el orgullo y la apetencia del americano.
Orígenes is not interested in establishing a platform but, instead, in dispatching the arrows of its own shooting star trail...Freedom, for us, consists in the total respect that creative work deserves, to express itself in the form most appropriate to its temperament, desires or frustrations, either taking as its point of departure the darkest recesses of the subject, its reaction or action in the face of the demands of the outside world, so long as it expresses itself within the humanist tradition, and the freedom derived from this tradition which, for Americans, has been a source of pride and yearning.]

Orígenes published only original work, by both Cuban and foreign writers. Apart from the extensive contributions of its editorial committee, it also published pieces by Alejo Carpentier, Roberto Fernández Retamar, Samuel Feijóo, Eugenio Florit, Enrique Labrador Ruiz, Lydia Cabrera, Virgilio Piñera, to name but a few. Among its foreign contributors were Juan Ramón Jiménez, Vicente Aleixandre, Albert Camus, Luis Cernuda, Macedonio Fernández and Carlos Fuentes. The cosmopolitan and international edge to the magazine was enhanced by Rodríguez Feo’s extensive translation work, of writers such as Georges Braque, Albert Camus, T.S. Eliot, Anaïs Nin and Wallace Stevens.

Issue thirty-five appeared in two forms as the result of the editorial split between Lezama Lima and Rodríguez Feo. The rift was complete when Lezama succeeded in registering the magazine under his directorship, and Rodríguez Feo went on to found his new, short-lived but significant magazine project, Ciclón. This review, in its brief life from 1955 to 1958, continued the work of Orígenes in the late 1940s in one important respect: it published the newest and most innovative writing. However, funded by a gay man, it was for its time quite bold on the subject of homosexuality and published the work of a group of young Cuban homosexual writers such as Calvert Casey, Antón Arrufat and Severo Sarduy.

Orígenes was to have continuing financial problems in this period until its demise, with its fortieth issue, in 1956.

FRANK MCQUADE

Further Reading

The entire run of Orígenes: revista de arte y literatura, is most readily available in the facsimile edition by Equilibrista, Mexico, and Ediciones Turner: Madrid, 1989, with an introduction and author index by Marcelo Uribe.

García Vega, Lorenzo, Los años de Orígenes, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1978

Rodríguez Feo, José, Mi correspondencia con Lezama Lima, Havana: Union, 1989
Plural (1971–1976)

Plural appeared in October 1971, under the directorship of the renowned poet and critic Octavio Paz, as a monthly cultural journal funded by the leading Mexican newspaper, Excelsior. It was forced to close in July 1976 when the government of Luis Echeverría intervened in Excelsior to change its political focus. Until that moment, Octavio Paz had full editorial control over Plural and its orientation reflected in great measure Paz’s “pluralist” interests in literature, criticism, art, philosophy, and political and historical movements. The immediate historical context helped to define the debates on contemporary issues in the magazine. Paz had resigned his ambassadorship in India in 1968 as a protest at the massacre of students in Tlatelolco and he kept a critical distance from the new president of Mexico, Echeverría, who sought to heal the breach with the intellectual community in the aftermath of Tlatelolco by pouring money into intellectual and cultural activities. Many writers were convinced by Echeverría’s cultural and political policies (Carlos Fuentes became ambassador in Paris), but Paz warned against intimacy with the “philanthropic ogre,” his name for the Mexican state. Some of Mexico’s most prominent intellectuals—Paz himself, Fuentes, Daniel Cosío Villegas, Gabriel Zaid, Gaston García Cantú, Victor Fores Olea and Luis Villoro—analysed the Mexican political system, the need for reform in the Partido Revolucionario Institucional, the role of the intellectual, in trenchant fashion. Events in Latin America, in particular the spread of authoritarian regimes, were also featured and a strong criticism was made of the repressive nature of state socialism in the USSR and the Eastern bloc countries.

Plural was primarily a cultural journal, publishing new writing and criticism in the arts. A group of Mexican and Spanish American writers—Juan García Ponce, Salvador Elizondo, Alejandro Rossi, Mario Vargas Llosa, Severo Sarduy, Damián Bayón—was joined by the most significant names in contemporary criticism: Roman Jakobson, Claude Lévi-Strauss, George Steiner, Roland Barthes, Norman O.Brown, Susan Sontag, Harry Levin. Paz’s international reputation and contacts, the editorial skills of the magazine’s staff, which included the critics Tomás Segovia and José de la Colina and the artist Kasuya Sakai, and the resources of Excelsior all helped to guarantee the quality of the contributors and made Plural one of the world’s finest journals in its day. With the closure of Excelsior, Paz started up the magazine Vuelta with certain members of the Plural group and Vuelta continued under his editorship into the 1990s.

JOHN KING

Further Reading

In November 1994, the Argentine cultural journal Punto de Vista brought out its fiftieth issue. This marked more than sixteen years of unbroken publication, a considerable achievement in a cultural field of short-lived little magazines. Since its outset, the journal has been the project of Buenos Aires-based intellectuals, under the directorship of the cultural critic Beatriz Sarlo. It began in March 1978, as a response to one of the darkest moments in Argentine history, when a brutal military dictatorship had fractured the cultural field, imposing strict censorship. It was one instance of the development of a “catacomb” culture, where small groups sought to keep intellectual discussion alive in the interstices of state terror. No names of editorial staff appeared on the first issues, for security reasons. Issue 6 (July 1979) published the name of Sarlo as managing editor, whilst the less severe political conditions of the early 1980s allowed for the appearance of the journal’s first editorial (Issue 12, July 1981). This spoke for the first time openly, about the need—in a situation of economic, political and ideological crisis—to develop “points of view,” to open up new spaces for the discussion and circulation of ideas. There was also an urgent need to reconceptualise socialist culture in Argentina, in the aftermath of the populism, ideological Manicheism, and political radicalism of the early 1970s, which had been caught up in a spiral of violence and culminated in military dictatorship (1976–82). In these first issues, the emphasis was on a rereading of Argentine literature in a nuanced way and the introduction to Argentina of critics such as Raymond Williams and Richard Hoggart who offered a way out of linguistic or semiological formalism and traditional sociology through a complex analysis of the relationship between literature, ideology, language and experience.

As dictatorship was replaced by democracy, the journal could develop its strategy of avoiding the “simplistic versions of history” and “clichés of populism,” terms which appear as a leitmotif in many issues. It has intervened in political discussions, speaking out against the Falklands/Malvinas war, supporting the early democratic openings of President Alfonsín (1983–88), contesting the harsh neo-liberal reforms and media manipulation of President Menem (1989–), and promoting the opposition to Menem, the “Frente Grande,” in the 1995 elections. It has also carried forward important debates about modernity and postmodernity in the cultural field. The core group of contributors, Beatriz Sarlo, Carlos Altamirano, María Teresa Gramuglio, Juan Carlos Portantiero, Hilda Sábato and Hugo Vezzetti have continued this work of critical “modernisation” and have been joined by a number of younger critics in the fields of literature, history, philosophy, plastic arts and media studies.

JOHN KING

Further Reading

La Revue du Monde Noir (1931–1932)

As a student in Paris in November 1931, the Martinican Paulette Nardal with the help of Haitian Dr Léo Sajous, established the international, bilingual (French/English) periodical La Revue du Monde Noir / The Review of the Black World, whose six issues were unprecedented and audacious. The review proposed to serve as a voice for black intellectuals and friends of Blacks, to express the cultural richness of Africa and black civilization, and to create a moral and intellectual bond among Blacks throughout the world without distinction of nationality. The underlying assumption of this ambitious project was that a return to the authentic values of Africa the “awakening of race consciousness,” as Paulette Nardal put it—would ensure a repossession of black pride that had always been denied by the white world. Revalorization of black culture thus became linked to a racial anthropology.

“The Nardals were Négritude at work,” remembers the Martinican novelist Joseph Zobel, who named Paulette “the godmother of Négritude” Indeed, Paulette Nardal and her sisters Andrée and Jane (under the pen-name Yadhé) can be considered the precursors of the Négritude movement which reached its peak in the late 1930s with the literary and philosophical works of Aimé Césaire, Léon Gontran Damas and Léopold Sédar Senghor.

The review counted such contributors as the Haitian “indigenist” Jean Price-Mars; the anthropologists Delafosse of France, Frobenius of Germany, and Bernelot-Moens of the Netherlands; the Antillean intellectuals Louis Achille, Felix Eboué, Gilbert Gratiant, René Maran; and Americans Georges Gregory, Langston Hughes, Claude McKay and John Matheus. Among the women contributors, aside from the Nardal sisters, were Roberte Horth from French Guyana, Magd Raney (or Marie-Magdeleine Carbet) from Martinique, and Margaret Rose Martin and Clara Shepard from the United States.

Articles ranged from literary and artistic subjects to the social, political, scientific and philosophical. Despite Paulette Nardal’s later claim, the goal of the editors and contributors was more political than literary. They challenged the historical ambiguities based on racial, social and cultural prejudices. Their search for identity was based on racial solidarity and its power for change. Articles on African anthropology prevailed, followed by those signed by black writers from the United States, who published samples of their own work and wrote about the “negro” artistic happenings in Paris. They also introduced the Cuban writers Regino Pedroso and Nicolás Guillén.

Paulette Nardal had planned to publish an edition of The Review of the Black World in Spanish, but the periodical had to be abandoned in April 1932 for lack of financial support. Some suspected that, in spite of its moderate and conciliatory tone, colonial pressure hastened its end. The review, however, paved the way for two provocative Martinican journals, the one-issue Légitime Défense [Legitimate Defence] founded in...
Paris in 1932 by René Ménil and Etienne Léro, and the more moderate L’Etudiant Noir [The Black Student] published in 1934, also in Paris, by Césaire, Damas and Senghor. Despite the lack of unity of the articles, The Review of the Black World did try to raise among black intellectuals of all origins the consciousness of their common blackness and its potential as a unifying force, as well as of the richness and diversity of their cultures.

MARIE-AGNÈS SOURIEAU

Sur (1931–1970)

The Argentine magazine Sur was published regularly between 1931 and 1970, and irregularly thereafter, until the death of its founder, Victoria Ocampo, in 1978. It was one of the longest running, and certainly the most significant cultural journal to appear in Argentina and, arguably, in Latin America, in the 20th century. Although it was conceived primarily as a literary magazine, its scope was always broader, offering an elegant fusion of fiction, philosophy, plastic arts, history and social commentary. Sur defended a tradition of aristocratic Argentine liberalism, inherited from the 19th century, against attacks from nationalist and authoritarian regimes at home and abroad: the spread of totalitarian regimes, both Nazi and communist, during the 1930s; the threat of Hitler in the war years; the growth of what contributors perceived as fascism in Argentina under Perón; the Marxist shadow in Latin America after the Cuban Revolution. In Sur’s view, the intellectual had a right to protect the conditions in which art could act as a civilising force, yet these cultural standards could only be maintained by a like-minded clerisy, a “spiritual” aristocracy.

Victoria Ocampo conceived of the journal as a “bridge” between the cultures of Argentina and, by extension, Latin America, and those of Europe and North America. In order to open up the cultural field to new currents in literature and culture, Sur translated and published the key writers and intellectuals of the 20th century, from Faulkner and Virginia Woof to Sartre and Malraux, from Le Corbusier to Lacan. Whilst the bulk of these translations were of European authors, North American writers and movements were also covered extensively. Latin American authors, outside Argentina, were not published systematically, especially in the Boom years of the 1960s.

Sur also disseminated the work of the finest Argentine writers of the period: the short stories of Jorge Luis Borges, Adolfo Bioy Casares, Silvina Ocampo and José Bianco, who ran Sur’s editorial office. The poetry of Alberto Girri; the essays of Eduardo Mallea, Julio Cortázar and H.A. Muren; the literary criticism and testimonios of Victoria Ocampo. It also included and encouraged younger critics. As the magazine developed into a cultural institution with considerable power, it became the butt of strong criticism, especially in the ideologically and politically polarised climate of the 1960s. Yet its detractors provided no lasting alternative strategy, and Sur can be seen today as one of the most significant publications in Latin American culture.

JOHN KING
Further Reading

Tropiques (1941–1945)

During World War II, back in Martinique after eight years of study in Paris, Aimé Césaire, with his wife Suzanne and René Ménil, founded the journal Tropiques. From April 1941 to October 1945, fourteen issues, of sixty to eighty pages each, appeared in Fort-de-France under extremely difficult material conditions. Though isolated because of its geographic insularity, the economic blockade and the Vichy government censorship, the journal had a profound impact as the hidden voice of Négritude aimed at all the colonized people in the world.

While in Paris in the 1930s, Aimé Césaire, René Ménil and many Antillean intellectuals became aware of belonging to a larger community and an ancient heritage and of the need to overcome alienation. They discovered the Harlem Renaissance writers along with Leo Frobenius’s anthropological work on the grandeur of African civilization. In L’Étudiant Noir [The Black Student] Césaire began to articulate the political and cultural identity of the black people, which he called Négritude. And a few years later, in his celebrated Cahier d’un retour au pays natal, 1939 (Return to My Native Land) he expressed the intolerable reality of his people, their “negritude,” through a new poetic language that tapped the forbidden zones of the unconscious.

Because of fascist domination of Martinique, Tropiques could not be overtly political. It was founded as a cultural or indigenous review whose purpose was to raise native consciousness of and pride in Martinique’s unexplored African heritage and its autochthonous richness. But the hidden political goal of the editors was to liberate their people from their traumatized past, and educate them in the rich potential of their culture. Therefore, the first objective of Tropiques was an existential quest aimed at finding concrete answers to the specifically Martinican psychology and natural environment. Articles ranged from anthropological to folkloric to fauna and flora-related subjects. The contents of Césaire’s poems and of René Ménil’s essays were very similar in their celebration of life, their questioning and Surrealist approach to existence. Indeed, Surrealist techniques allowed the uncovering of what had been repressed by shame and, therefore, had a reintegrating power.

Further, Surrealism became a method to critique rational bourgeois Western philosophy. Upon fleeing the Vichy regime for the United States, André Breton, author of Manifeste du surréalisme (1924) came across the first issue of Tropiques: there he found an affirmation of his own values. Césaire recalled his meeting with Breton in a 1978 interview with Jacqueline Leiner: “Breton brought us courage . . . he shortened our research and our hesitations. I realized that most of the problems I was struggling with had been resolved by Breton and Surrealism . . . The meeting with Breton was a confirmation of the truth that I found on my own.” Indeed, Césaire’s Surrealist poems published in the journal were eventually collected in the volume Les Armes miraculeuses, 1946 [The Miraculous Weapons]. The philosopher Rene Ménil published Surrealist-framed essays such as “Introduction au merveilleux” [Introduction to the Marvelous], while Suzanne Césaire wrote articles praising Breton, the “maître penseur” (mastermind), and his poetic influence on the social and aesthetic identity of the Antilleans. Thus, the concept of Négritude coincided with the Surrealist quest of putting humankind in touch with its deepest, repressed desires: for the Martinicans, this quest led to their black, African, Antillean specificity. Numerous texts or poems by Breton, Lautréamont, Mallarmé, Péguy, McKay and Picabia expressed the universality of the Surrealist experience and its meaning for Martinican consciousness.

Moreover, Tropiques wanted to echo the intellectual developments of the New World and put Martinique at the center of international exchanges. Thus, literary news from Venezuela, Curaçao and Mexico was reported. Cuban writers and artists such as Lydia Cabrera, Wilfredo Lam, Alejo Carpentier, and the Chilean Jorge Cáceres published short stories and folktales.

Against colonization and its coercive assimilation, Tropiques attempted to define the identity of “this ambiguous being, the Antillean,” to borrow Suzanne Césaire’s words. Despite its limitations in history and anthropology, the journal opened new avenues for rethinking Antillean culture and society, and, in particular, the political situation of the region.

MARIE-AGNÈS SOURIEAU

Vuelta (1976-)

Founded in November 1976 in Mexico by Octavio Paz, Vuelta -in the mid 19908—is one of the most prominent and dynamic cultural journals in Latin America, and embodies some of the typical struggles and dichotomies of a modern liberal magazine as it attempts to protect its aesthetic values from the temptations of political doctrine. After five years of nurturing the innovative monthly Plural, funded by and linked with the newspaper Excelsior, Octavio Paz was able to draw on the support of former contributors and subscribers to create a new magazine following the complex shift of allegiances in the aftermath of the resignation of the newspaper’s editor Julio Scherer. Vuelta is in many ways a continuation of Plural, being essentially a literary magazine, with an additional range of items on the other arts, politics, current affairs and historical issues, notably in the essays of Enrique Krauze. Paz himself is a regular and vigorous contributor of his poetry, essays on art and culture, and extensive personal memoirs, and other regular contributors have included Gabriel Zaid, Juan García Ponce, Guillermo Sheridan and Guillermo Cabrera Infante. When making claims for the journal, Paz is reminiscent of other magazine directors (for example, Rodríguez Monegal with Mundo Nuevo) in declaring the freedom and integrity of his publication in the face of ideological pressures. Such claims for aesthetic autonomy may be sustainable, but always emerge a little battered in reality, and Vuelta has irked the Latin American Left with its criticisms of the Sandinistas, and the Castro regime in Cuba. Paz has expressed exasperation at this perception of the magazine as adversarial or elitist in tone, and urges that it be seen as a totality, and most importantly as a dialogue. In this respect Vuelta is an extension of Plural, which itself was in the tradition of earlier 20th-century Mexican publications such as Contemporéaneos, Tierra Nueva, Taller and Revista Mexicana de Literatura. In its concentration on literary and aesthetic values of a “high” order it is challenged in the field of Mexican letters by the more sociological and current affairs-centred journal Nexos. Paz clearly sees his own and other comparable liberal intellectual journals as the conscience of the intellectual elite, promoting national culture, and opening up world literature to Mexico, in an atmosphere of debate and exchange, free of ideological complacency and dogma. This is an old polemic, which in Mexico is compounded by the posing of a “liberal” identity in a context where this can be seen to be a reaffirmation of the old order, and Paz’s skirmishes with PRI in the 1960s and his series of essays in Vuelta in the mid-1980s are complicated by his later realignment with a now-discredited Carlos Salinas. The longstanding belief, however, in the intellectual journal as a powerful communicator of ideas, and a safeguard against doctrinaire inflexibility, is still forcefully presented in this eloquent and elegant literary showcase of contemporary Latin American letters.

FRANK MCQUADE

Further Reading

King, John, “The Periodicals: Vuelta” Times Literary Supplement 4541 (1990)

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz 1651(?)-1695

Mexican writer and woman of ideas

The Spanish colonies in America, although established by military conquest and built upon the ruins of the Aztec and the Inca empires, had brought from Europe certain Utopian and pastoral dimensions, allowing Spanish missionaries to set up new experimental communities, and Spanish women, as well as their criollo daughters, to run plantations and businesses, and to assert their financial and social independence in ways not often possible in metropolitan Spain. In the sphere of letters, however, few texts written by colonial women have survived, and most of these were produced in convents, where women had more opportunity to educate themselves, to read, and to write. A Jeronimite convent near the viceroy’s court in Mexico City provided a home, a library and a study for one of the greatest of all colonial writers, who was also a woman: Juana Inés Asuaje y Ramirez, more generally known by her religious name, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. A viceroy’s wife, her beloved friend Maria Luisa Manrique de Lara—Countess of Paredes in her own right, and Marchioness of Laguna by her husband—and other admirers made sure that her works were published in Madrid: Inundación castálida, 1689 [Castalian Inundation], the first edition of the first volume of her works, sold well and was highly appreciated, winning for Sor Juana fame and recognition as a learned woman in her own times. Her work is a reflection of both her erudition and of the struggle she carried on to win general acknowledgement of the intellectual equality between the sexes.

Except for a few poems published in Mexico, the bulk of Sor Juana’s works were published in Spain in three different volumes: the first in 1689, the second in 1692, and the third posthumously in 1700. All of these editions were frequently reprinted, which gives an indication of the extent of the readership she had in the late 17th and early 18th centuries. Her works are evidence of her wide readings in philosophy, theology, history, science and literature. We can also clearly perceive her concern with the status of women and of New World culture. As a poet, she cultivated a wide range of forms, meters and themes, most of them typical of the period; her witty plays on words and ideas—also typical of the conceptismo and culteranismo of Baroque literature, and with an ornate style marked by conceits—are an integral part of her poetic personality, which has an unusual freshness and enthusiasm.

Her works include many different types of poetry, dramatic works in verse, and prose works of a more doctrinal or autobiographical sort. Her secular lyric poetry is her best-known and most important form. For example, there are such highly original works as her verse portrait of the Countess of Paredes; her sonnet on a painting of herself considered as a vain attempt to save her body from annihilation; the Baroque fascination with complex machines, as is the case of a poem devoted to a marquis on his birthday, concerning a clock or hourglass, which mechanically measures the ineffable passing of human time; several “carpe diem” sonnets centered on the image of the rose; poems on hope and the vanity of human illusions; verses on fidelity in love, always seen as a feminine characteristic (she, significantly, devotes five of her sonnets to female heroines who sacrificed their lives for their honor: Porcia, Lucretia, Julia and Tisbe); the many stanzas of the romance (ballad) to the Duchess of Aveiro where she expresses her “feminism” and her criollismo and the ones belonging to the “Villancicos de Santa Catarina” [Carols to St Catherine of Alexandria]; poems on absence and the sufferings of love, reflected in Nature, despite its appearance of insensitivity; or, on love’s passion resolved in the rhetoric of tears; and poems on our imagination, within which we can imprison a beloved person. Her most famous and popular poem is a bitingly witty criticism of men’s unfairness in blaming women for the sinfulness that men themselves provoke and promote.

Among her devotional writings are the Ejercicios de la Encarnación [Exercises on the Incarnation], in which she presents in prose the Virgin Mary as a model of feminine power and wisdom, almost on the same level as God. Her “villancicos,” or carol sequences, written for festive performance in cathedrals, allow us a glimpse of her religious and social sensibility; this popular genre, with many different voices, permitted the poet to speak for marginal social groups such as blacks, Indians and women, and to make fun of masculine clerical types such as arrogant students: the consciousness of her own marginality, as a woman, as a criolla, and as an illegitimate child, gave her an understanding of what it meant to be discriminated against. In such songs, then, she presents religious women as both intellectual and devout, as in the portrayals of the Virgin Mary and of St Catherine of Alexandria in her carols mentioned before. Her black voices speak a special dialect of Spanish, and her Indians speak Náhuatl, to address God. and to complain about how they are treated by Spanish representatives of the Church or State.

Sor Juana’s long poem entitled El Sueño (Sor Juana’s Dream) occupies a unique place among her works. In her highly significant autobiographical Respuesta (The Answer, see separate essay, below) she refers to the Sueño as the only poem that she had written for her own pleasure. It is a compendium of contemporary scholastic and scientific knowledge, ranging from the Ancient philosophers and the Church Fathers to Florentine hermetic wisdom and the then recent ideas of Athanasius Kircher and perhaps even of Descartes. It draws on Renaissance poetic topology or commonplaces, recast in Spanish Baroque forms. The narrative structure of the Dream consists of three steps of falling asleep, dreaming, and waking up and its protagonist, the Soul, struggles with the problematic of scientific knowledge. It concerns the intellectual adventure of the Soul searching for total comprehension of the universe, an enterprise that represents the highest ambition growing out of human love for scientific knowledge. (See my essay on this poem, below.)

In 1690 the Bishop of Puebla published and sent to Sor Juana her critique of a Portuguese Jesuit’s sermon, along with a letter of his own, with the pseudonymous signature of a nun. In her critique (Carta atenagórica or Crisis sobre un sermon) [Athenagoric Letter or Crisis over a Sermon], Sor Juana had refuted, in a highly sophisticated and learned way, the argument of Father Antonio de Vieira, in which he rejected interpretations by the Church Fathers and proposed his own. The Bishop—a typical cleric of his time—reveals in his letter, although it is subtly ambiguous, his admiration for Sor Juana’s intelligence as he urges her to use it in the study of divine rather than secular matters. All of this provided her with an excuse for a full-scale defense of her life and literary career in La respuesta a Sor Filotea. This eloquent and warmly human document explains fully the nun’s intellectual vocation by recalling her childhood eagerness to learn to read and write, her adolescent rejection of marriage and her choice of the convent as a place to study; she cites many famous women from the Bible and from classical antiquity in her defense of feminine access to study and to writing. She implies that women as scientists have empirical advantages when she asserts, “If Aristotle had done some cooking, he would have written even more.” All of this is relevant to the Bishop’s apparent reprimand; it is a feminist apologia that was unique in the 17th-century Hispanic world: she claimed the right to dissent from the opinions of Father Viera, just as everybody else had the right to differ from her opinions. (And in the Carta de Monterrey [Monterrey Letter], a letter discovered relatively recently (by Father Aureliano Tapia Méndez), which Sor Juana wrote to her confessor Father Antonio Núñez de Miranda, long before writing her Respuesta, we find her defending her rights in even stronger terms.)

Neptuno alegórico [Allegorical Neptune], a very Baroque piece of writing, is, for the modern reader, a difficult work; it is an official “relación” or explanation of the triumphal arch erected in November of 1680 for the reception of the new viceroy, the Marquis of La Laguna, and his wife. In her poetic description of the arch Sor Juana presents the mythological figure of Neptune as an allegorical model for the viceroy. This is a highly learned text in which she displays her most arcane erudition and ingenuity.

Sor Juana’s theatrical works consist of several loas (short dramatic prologues), largely mythical and allegorical; three autos sacramentales, or allegorical dramatizations of sacramental theology in the Calderonian tradition (even surpassing Calderón in Divino Narciso), written, with their loas, for the feast of Corpus Christi; and two full-length “cape and sword” plays in the tradition of Lope de Vega. The loas that precede her autos are especially interesting for their presentation of Aztec feminine characters, who defend pre-Christian religious practices. El cetro de José [Joseph’s Sceptre] is based on a story from the Bible; El mártir del Sacramento San Hermenegildo [The Martyr of the Sacrament St Hermenegildo] is hagiographic; and Divino Narciso [Divine Narcissus] is an ingenious allegorization of the pagan mythological Narcissus as the redeeming Christ. In Divino Narciso the Narcissus (Christ), having rejected the advances of Echo (the Devil), who is the rival of Human Nature, sees the latter reflected in the Fountain of Grace (the Virgin Mary), which unites God with Human Nature at the moment of the Incarnation; then Narcissus, in love with himself as reflected in Human Nature, falls into the fountain and drowns, allegorically crucified.

The three loas, or dramatic prologues, written for these autos sacramentales have a particular importance for us, for in those belonging to El cetro de José and Divino Narciso we can hear the voice of Sor Juana as very much that of a woman born in the New World; we see the world of Aztec culture in female allegorical figures: women here have political roles, and represent the historical voices of their communities. In the loa for San Hermenegildo Sor Juana presents herself among a group of students as an able scholastic teacher; she criticizes the traditional dogmatism of antiquated European ideas devised by men and shows how new ideas and discoveries displace them; she emphasises the value of doubt as a basis for the advancement of science.

One of the secular plays, Amor es más laberinto [Love is More a Labyrinth], was written in collaboration with Juan de Guevara; the other, Los empeños de una casa [Trials of a Noble House], has strong leading female characters, especially that of Leonor, an autobiographical figure. The comic character Castaño, a mulatto servant from the New World, speaks satirically of the machismo of white Spaniards in a metatheatrical scene parodying the “cape and sword” comedy as a literary genre.

From the baroque intellectual world of her convent cell Sor Juana wrote about her deep concerns as both a woman and a criolla. She is a key figure for the understanding of colonial Mexico; and her lucid and advanced ideas remain exemplary for us today.

GEORGINA SABAT DE RIVERS

Biography

Born Juana Ramírez de Asbaje (or Asuaje) in San Miguel de Nepantla, Viceroyalty of New Spain (now Mexico), 12. November 1651 (some sources give 1648). Largely self-educated. Invited to attend the court of the Spanish Viceroy, the Marquis of Mancera and his wife Doña Leonor Carreto, in Mexico City, c.1659, and subsequently wrote poetry for official events. Entered the Carmelite convent in Mexico City on 14 August 1667 but stayed for only three months. In 1669 she entered the Jeronymite Convent of Santa Paula, Mexico City, and adopted the religious name Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Continued her intellectual pursuits and her international reputation grew. Around 1690 came under increasing pressure from the Church authorities to concentrate on theology and cease writing profane works. Chose to abandon writing and lead a life of complete seclusion c.1693. Died of the plague, 17 April 1695.
Selected Works

Collected Works
[Works] 3 vols, 1689–1700
Volume 1: Inundación castálida, Madrid, 1689 [includes verse and the play El Neptuno alegórico]; as Poemas, Madrid, 1690
Volume 2: Segundo volumen de las obras, Seville, 1692. [includes “El sueño”; the autos El cetro de José, El mártir del Sacramento San Hermenegildo, Divino Narciso; the comedies Los empeños de una casa, Amor es más laberinto; and Crisis sobre un sermon: Carta atenagórica]
Volume 3: Fama y obras póstumas, Madrid, 1700 [includes La respuesta a Sor Filotea]

Compilations and Anthologies
Obras completas, edited by Alfonso Méndez Plancarte, 4 vols, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1951–57
Poesía, teatro y prosa, edited by Antonio Castro Leal, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1965
Obras selectas, edited by Georgina Sabat de Rivers and Elías L. Rivers, Barcelona: Noguer, 1976
Obra selecta, edited by Lusi Sáinz de Medrano, Barcelona: Planeta, 1987

Anthologies in Translation
Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: Poems, edited and translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, Binghampton, New York: Bilingual Press, 1985 [bilingual edition]
Selected Sonnets, translated by Sandra Sider, Saskatoon: Peregrina, 1987

Further Reading
Aguirre, Mirta, Del encausto a la sangre: Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1975
Alfau de Solalinde, Jesusa, El barroco en la vida de Sor Juana, Mexico City: Instituto de Estudios y Documentos Históricos, 1981
Bénassy-Berling, Marie-Cécile, Humanismo y religion en Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, translated by Laura López de Belair, Mexico City: UNAM, 1983
Cox, Patricia, El secreto de Sor Juana, Mexico City: Populibros La Prensa, 1971
Flynn, Gerard C, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, New York: Twayne, 1971
Galeano Ospina, Carlos E., Juana de Asbaje: aproximación a la autobiografía de la décima musa, Medellin, Colombia: Secretaría de Educación y Cultura, 1976
Guilarte, Cecilia G. de, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: claro en la selva, Buenos Aires: Ekin, 1958
Maza, Francisco de la and Elías Trabulse, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz ante la historia, Mexico City: UNAM, 1980
Divino Narciso

Auto by Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz

The Spanish word auto is a generic term applied to a religious drama, usually dealing with Christmas and Eucharistic themes; auto is a form of the word acto or act, used for other theatrical productions and their subdivisions. The auto was derived from the liturgy in the Middle Ages, from scenes or “mysteries” that were dramatized in monasteries and churches. Characteristically, a cart or wagon was used in them for carrying religious paintings and images in procession. Valbuena Prat has given us a clear-cut definition of the auto as “a dramatic composition, in one act, which is allegorical and refers to the Eucharist.”

Between 1680 and 1691, at the latest, Sor Juana wrote three autos sacramentales, preceded by their loas: El mártir del Sacramento San Hermenegildo [The Martyr of the Sacrament St Hermenegildo], Divino Narciso, and El cetro de José [Joseph’s Sceptre], probably in that order, to judge by the growing attention paid in the loas to the discovery of America and to Aztec culture. But Divino Narciso was published before the others (and perhaps this indicates that its literary superiority was immediately recognized).

In this auto the author introduces us to the Aztec world with the characters named Occidente, who is dressed as an Indian youth, and America, a strong, brave Indian maiden in fancy costume. Sor Juana mentions clothing typical of the Indians, blankets and huipiles (women’s tunics) and a dance called “tocotín,” as well as feathers and rattles, showing that she was familiar with the Indian customs of her native land. Her musical choruses present an apologia for ancient Mexico in the ceremony of teocualo or the eating of the god, which the nun presents as an Aztec rite that prefigures Christian communion. In this rite an image of the god Huitzilopochtli was raised up and on it was made a dough combining grains and seeds with human blood, which was then handed out in small pieces to those present. We also find the characters named Christian Religion and Zeal, the latter dressed as a military officer surrounded by soldiers, giving us an aggressive view of religion. In the subsequent dialogues between the two groups, the Spaniards echo the sermons of religious chroniclers, denouncing the diabolical character of the false pagan rites, such as teocualo, as well as other commonplace such as the power of Occidente and the beauty and wealth of America.

In their speeches, America and Occidente protest against the inequality of the two groups’ forces, which pitch “monstruous Centaurs,” or men on horseback, and “fiery balls of lead” against mere arrows; and they defend their gods and their own freedom to continue worshipping them. We should note that in this whole passage Sor Juana deliberately endows her Indians with the same kind of free will that was being discussed by European theologians, as well as the same qualities of rational knowledge which the latter presupposed were theirs exclusively. What the nun makes obvious is the impossibility of communication between the two cultures; she also questions the right, so often disputed by Spanish theologians, of the Crown and the Church to conquer and evangelize the new continent. The loa ends, as might have been expected, with America and Occident consent ing to attend the auto to become better informed about the meaning of the Christian Eucharist; thus the loa leads directly into the following auto. The final words of the loa, nevertheless, sung during an Aztec dance performed by all the cast—Indians and Spaniards together may well disconcert us: “¡Dichoso el día / que conocí al gran Dios de las Semillas!” (Happy the day that I came to know the great God of Seeds), the God that has been mentioned throughout the loa with the name Quetzalcoatl-Huitzilopochtli, in this ambiguous hymn, is now being converted into the Christian God.

In Divino Narciso we find ideas taken from Ovid’s Metamorphoses combined with passages from the Bible, especially the Song of Songs, and lines from St John of the Cross, as well as from Calderón, the 17th-century Spanish dramatist who raised the auto sacramental to its highest level. Sor Juana gave form to revisionist ideas about Narcissus, circulating in her time, which transformed this traditionally frivolous and selfish figure into that of Christ. She presents him as falling in love, not with his own reflection in the water, but with Human Nature, who is hidden behind him and whom he sees reflected; all of this takes place in an Arcadian, pastoral world of Paradise, in which, nevertheless, Evil also exists. Human Nature, a feminine character, is representative of the human race created in the image and likeness of God; Narcissus tells her at one point, “and I kept thee as precious to my eyes.” Echo represents fallen angelic nature, that is, Lucifer. In this play, Echo and Human Nature both appear as shepherdesses competing for the love of Narcissus (Christ). Echo retains the attributes that, according to Greek mythology, Juno had given her as a punishment: she is presented as incapable of expressing her own ideas and able only to repeat the final words of those speaking to her (hence her name); she is, as Octavio Paz says, “God’s monkey.” She is also mute like the evil spirit of the New Testament whom Jesus silenced. Echo is accompanied by two characters, Pride and Self-Love, who sum up the sins most to be feared by any Christian since they led the most intelligent and beautiful angel, Lucifer, to attempt to compete with God. Human Nature, on the other hand, is presented within the biblical tradition of man’s fall from grace in Paradise, the source of original sin, as well as of other subsequent betrayals.

Narcissus, weary of fleeing from Echo, reaches a spring or fountain (the source of grace), the waters of which have never been muddied, and he sings the song that begins:

\[
\text{Ovejuela perdida,} \\
\text{de tu dueño olvidada,} \\
\text{¿a dónde vas errada?} \\
\text{[Little lost sheep,} \\
\text{forgetful of thine owner,} \\
\text{where dost thou wander?]}
\]

This is just a sample of the lovely poetry found in the play. As he approaches to have a drink of water, he sees the reflection of Human Nature hidden in the bushes behind him and falls in love with her, which is to say, in terms of the fable, he falls in love with himself at the same time, since she has been created in his image and likeness:

\[
\text{De mirar su retrato} \\
\text{enamorado muere} \\
\text{que aun copiada su imagen} \\
\text{hace efecto tan fuerte.}
\]

[From looking at her picture / he is dying of love / for even a copy of his image / has a powerful effect.]

Narcissus plunges into the spring and at that moment is transformed into a white flower, the narcissus or Eucharistic Host. Thus Narcissus-Christ dies for Human Nature, in a metaphor of the Crucifixion, in order to redeem her from sin and to make possible her return to Paradise. The knowledge of one’s self, reflected in the spring, which led (according to Tiresias’ prophecy) to the death of the mythological Narcissus, in Sor Juana’s play leads him to resurrection. As Paz expresses it: “knowledge does not kill: it brings back to life.” And Christ continues, in sacramental form, to give strength to the human race throughout the ages.

The fountain of grace, which is the source of baptismal water, cleansing the human being from original sin, is also the personification of the Immaculate Virgin Mary, born without original sin, through whom redemption is achieved by means of the Incarnation. Mary, always pure, conceives Jesus by the Holy Spirit; Christ combines divine and human nature within his single person. In this way Sor Juana emphasizes the importance of Mary’s role as partner in the redemption of the human race.

Finally, after the elevation of the Host, the play ends with the Latin liturgical hymn “Pange, lingua, gloriosi / Corporis mysterium” written by Thomas Aquinas for the celebration of Corpus Christi. The nun’s deep respect for sacramental doctrine probably inhibited her from introducing the usual comic character, or “figura del donaire,” which we find in Calderón’s autos sacramentales, despite her great ability to merge the sacred and the profane. At the same time, Vossler draws our attention, in this auto, to a diffuse sensuality which brings a note of everyday simplicity to the seriousness of the subject-matter.

Sor Juana’s open, syncretistic spirit, in the Jesuit tradition, brought in, at the beginning of this play, characters named Synagogue and Paganism, whom Human Nature claims as her children. They represent human beings whose choruses sing (in the case of Synagogue), “Praise the Lord of all men,” and (in the case of Paganism), “Applaud Narcissus, ye streams and flowers,” reminding us of her use in the loa of the Aztec hymn to the God of Seeds. By bringing in Synagogue and Paganism, the author emphasizes the teachings of the Old Testament as well as the pagan source of the original Narcissus story.

Divino Narciso contains a wide range of poetic forms and meters; in the play we find some of the most beautiful verses that Sor Juana ever wrote. Here her poetry, although in tone closer to that of Garcilaso de la Vega than to that of Calderón, nevertheless has the Baroque intellectual trademark of the latter. Sor Juana created, in her Divino Narciso, one of her three masterpieces, along with the Sueño (Sor Juana’s Dream) and the Respuesta (The Answer). The Mexican nun’s ability to synthesize the elements of her wide range of knowledge takes us from an Aztec religious rite, as prefiguration of the Eucharist, to the myths of ancient Greece, and from there to the familiar theological world of her scholastic education, producing this masterpiece of the Baroque allegorical auto sacramental.

GEORGINA SABAT DE RIVERS

Editions

First edition: Divino Narciso, Mexico City, 1690
Critical edition: Obras completas de Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, vol. 3, edited by Alfonso Méndez Plancarte, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1951

Further Reading

Merrim, Stephanie, “Narciso desdoblado: Narcissistic stratagems in El Divino Narciso and the Respuesta a Sor Filotea de la Cruz,” Bulletin of Hispanic Studies, vol. 64 (1987)

Primero sueño

Poem by Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz
This poem, almost one thousand lines long, is Sor Juana’s most important and significant work in verse; she herself remarks on its unique character in her Respuesta, 1691 (*The when she calls it, probably exaggerating, the only one of her works that she had written on her own initiative and for her own pleasure. The Primero sueño was first published in 1692, in the second volume of Sor Juana’s complete works. We do not know exactly when it was written, but given its high level of intellectual and poetic sophistication it must belong to the fully mature period of her life.

The Sueño is written in a Spanish metrical form known as the silva, an irregular combination of 7- and 11-syllable lines without consistent rhyme-schemes or stanzas. In her poem Sor Juana draws on all her readings in science and poetry; she gives us a wide-ranging sample of scholastic philosophy, modern technology and scientific theories, and her own personal experiments and thought. In this respect the Sueño and the Respuesta are closely related and shed light on one another from the point of view of the author’s intellectual development; both of them reflect her most vital concerns and interests, one in the form of poetic fiction and the other in more literal autobiography. It is worth considering first the literary tradition on which Sor Juana draws in the Sueño, and then indicating her more personal concerns, especially a woman’s concerns, as they are reflected in the text.

One of the primary ancient traditions from which Sor Juana’s poem derives is that of the dream/vision, with its view of the world and human life from on high, at a philosophical distance. Other classical commonplaces on which writers drew were the battle between light and darkness, personified by the Sun and the Night; the ideas of sleep as the illusory cure for one’s waking ills and of sleep, like death, as the leveler that comes to all of us, regardless of social rank. In addition to these classical topoi, in Sor Juana’s Sueño we find many others that are typical of Renaissance poetry, related to the law, to astrology, to history, mythology and religion, and even to anatomy.

We should take note of the ambiguity of the word “sueño” in Spanish. Deriving simultaneously from the Latin words “somnium” (dream) and “somnus” (sleep), it does not always distinguish clearly between these two meanings: in modern Spanish, “tengo sueño,” for example, means “I am sleepy,” while “tuve un sueño” means “I had a dream.”
Thus “sueño” is as often the image of death (somnium imago mortis) as of life (life as a dream, as in the case of Calderón’s famous play La vida es sueño, from which Segismundo may awaken into eternity); the human subject is not always sure whether he or she is dreaming. This motif is frequently related to themes of love, such as the fulfilment of erotic desires while one is asleep; it is also related to moral and philosophical questions concerning life, its brevity and its anguish. Dreams may seem to warn us of an impending disaster or to anticipate future happiness; as a temporary death they teach us how to make the most of life or to achieve eternal glory. This whole familiar and complex Renaissance tradition is touched upon, either explicitly or allusively, in Sor Juana’s Sueño, adapted innovatively to a dream that is neither amorous nor mystical, but intellectually scientific: Sor Juana’s dream, while she is asleep, is an attempt to resolve an inner crisis concerning the possibilities of knowledge and concerning her own identity as a woman, a crisis that vitally preoccupies her while she is awake.

Sor Juana’s work is the only great poem in 16th- and 17th-century Hispanic literature that is clearly devoted to turning scientific thought into poetry, a poetry in some ways comparable to that of Lucretius’ De rerum natura (On the Nature of the Universe); it brings into sharp focus vaguely scientific ideas that appear in a scattered way in previous Renaissance and Baroque poetry written in Spanish. The value of her poem lies not so much in the validity of its scientific ideas as in its problematic epistemology, the human mind striving in a dynamic way to comprehend the universe.

The poem begins with a densely Baroque description of nightfall, deriving from geometric shadows in planetary space: “Piramidal, funesta, de la tierra / nacida sombra, al cielo encaminaba / de vanos obeliscos punta alta / escalar pretendiendo las estrellas…” (A pyramidal, funereal shadow born of the Earth pushed its sharp point of empty obelisks toward Heaven, trying to climb to the stars…). The Earth’s shadow slowly invades the elemental domains of the animals (earth), of the fish (water) and of the birds (air) with a sleep that overwhelms them all. We should note that the poet features, from the start, cosmic entities that are mythologically or grammatically feminine; and some of these nocturnal figures are well known for having broken laws established by masculine figures, “the law of the father.”

As we read on, the stillness of the external world invades the human body, which is now “muerto a la vida y a la muerte vivo” (dead to life and alive to death); as it sleeps, only its heart, lungs and stomach maintain life “con mudas voces” (with silent voices). The inner world of human dreams, continuing the activity of the mind while awake, gives rise to the elaboration of new images. Sor Juana explains this in her Respuesta with the following words:

ni aun el sueño se libró de este continuo movimiento de mi imaginativa; antes suele obrar en él más libre y desembarazada, confiriendo con mayor claridad y sosiego las especies que ha conservado del día, arguyendo, haciendo versos, de que os pudiera hacer un catálogo muy grande, y de algunas razones y delgadezas que he alcanzado dormida mejor que despierta.

[not even sleep freed me from the continual movement of my imagination; on the contrary, it usually moves more freely and unobstructedly in sleep, bringing together more clearly and calmly the impressions that it has retained from daytime, creating arguments and verses of which I could make you a long catalogue, as well as of some subtle processes of reasoning that I follow better while asleep than awake].

The central section of the poem, coming after this, is dense and difficult as it recounts the Soul’s problematic search for knowledge. This epistemological investigation is carried out on two levels, one abstract and the other personal.

As the body goes to sleep, the Soul, grammatically feminine but functionally asexual and created in the image of God, begins its solitary adventure. (In other literary dream-journeys, such as that of Dante’s Divine Comedy, for example, the protagonist usually has a companion or guide.) The Soul is presented as being primarily an intellectual entity with Aristotelian characteristics; with the help of the imagination it converts into mental concepts fragmentary images that have been received through the senses, a process that the poet compares with what “la azogada luna,” or mirror, on top of the Pharos of Alexandria, does with the images of ships at sea. The Soul, now completely separated from its body, rises to cosmic heights and is able to look at everything, even itself; from such heights, compared to Atlas and Olympus, the Pyramids and the eagle flying up toward the sun, the Soul strives to embrace, to comprehend, in an intuitive Platonic vision, the whole of creation; but, dazzled by the Sun, it strives in vain “y por mirarlo todo, nada via” (and because it stares at everything, it sees nothing).
The Soul slowly recovers from this first failure and tries again, using this time a discursive method based on Aristotle’s ten categories, moving systematically from the simple to the complex, rising step by step, inductively arriving at general ideas. In this way Sor Juana begins to explain the limits of human understanding. The poem now moves slowly upward, from mineral to vegetable to animal; the Soul seems to be succeeding in its attempt to reach the peak of knowledge, but then falls back, only to attempt to rise again. It finally falls into disillusion: the human intellect is excessively daring in trying to understand everything, for it cannot really comprehend even the simplest phenomena: the subterranean flow of water, the color and perfume of a flower. Such phenomena are associated with mythological figures that are female, such as Arethusa, Proserpine and Ceres, frustrated by the male figures of Alpheus and Pluto: there is a feminist agenda underlying this scientific quest, making it clear to the modern reader that Sor Juana, as a woman, was protesting against the intellectual barriers raised against her by male ecclesiastics and their well-established misogynistic tradition.

To compensate for defeat in the search for full knowledge, the poet evokes the mythological figure of Phaeton, the illegitimate young son of Apollo, the sun god: Phaeton had failed in his attempt to control the Sun’s chariot, but was nevertheless glorious in defeat. Similarly, intellectually daring, the nun’s challenge to authority and incomprehensible reality, although condemned in advance to defeat, is a glorious attempt that, when punished, inspires further daring: “Tipo es, antes, modelo …/ que alas engendra a repetido vuelo / del ánimo ambicioso” (He is, rather, a model and example...which gives wings to further flights of the ambitious spirit). Phaeton not only represents the overcoming of Sor Juana’s own illegitimacy in her struggle against her father, but sets an example of rebellion for her “arrogant spirit,” which can be applied to the defense of her status as a woman and a native of the New World (criolla).

The dawn epilogue of the Sueño balances in perfect symmetry its nightfall prologue. But before the arrival of the Sun (mentioned without the proper name of Apollo or Phoebus), Venus and Aurora appear, preceding him as they bring light to the world. Before the Sun imposes himself once more as the source of daytime, there is a battle between him—personifying the authority of the absent, nameless father—and Night, the perhaps terrible mother, but nevertheless the person who has given birth to the dream. Night, an Amazon armed with an awesome scepter, loses her battle against the Sun, but her defeat, like the defeat of Phaeton by the same Sun, is not definitive: she “segunda vez rebelde determina / mirarse coronada” (in rebellion once more decides to achieve her crown), and to do so, taking courage from defeat, she withdraws to the other side of the globe that the Sun has left unprotected (“la mitad del globo que ha dejado / el Sol desamparada”). If the Sun represents masculine authority, Night represents its female counterpart; if daytime has been occupied by the Sun, Night rules over a shadowy world of dreams in regular cosmic rotation. This is the solution that, in a patriarchal society, the nun proposes, in order to support her profound conviction concerning the intellectual equality of man and woman. The tense Baroque alternation of light and darkness with which Sor Juana concludes her dream-poem, rejecting paternal authority and asserting herself as a combatant in the figures of Phaeton and Night, will continue to take place, night after night, as a projection of the experiences of her daily life. Hence, in the final line of her long poem, Sor Juana’s voice shifts from the generic human Soul to her own first-person self, in the feminine gender, when the sunlight awakes her and she becomes... fully conscious that a new day has arrived: “quedando a luz más cierta /el mundo iluminado, y yo despierta” (leaving the world illuminated / by a more positive light, and me awake).

Finally, this poems contains many of Sor Juana’s personal concerns, as a criolla woman, as a colonial subject. The presence of the eagle and of nocturnal birds in the poem may well be related to Aztec mythology; the mention of two pyramids: “montes dos artificiales” (two artificial hills), and not the three Egyptian ones, may well indicate that she was thinking of Teotihuacán, with its pyramids of the Sun and of the Moon. In any case, Sor Juana, as a woman and as an intellectual, takes on in this poem the loftiest and most problematic aspirations of the human mind: the desire to understand the whole of reality. Her defeat and her victory belong to all of us. The Primero Sueño sums up a splendid tradition and is a link joining the Iberian peninsula to the magic world of America, and its future literary development.

GEORGINA SABAT DE RIVERS

Editions
First edition: Segundo Volumen de las Obras, Seville, 1692.
Critical edition: Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. El sueño, edited with an introduction and notes by Alfonso Méndez Plancarte, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1951

Further Reading
Arrayo Higaldo, Susana, El primero sueño de Sor Juana: estudio semántico y retórico, Mexico City: UNAM, 1993
Sabat de Rivers, Georgina, El sueño de Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: tradiciones literarias y originalidad, London: Támesis, 1977

Respuesta a Sor Filotea

Epistolary autobiography by Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz

Entréme religiosa, porque aunque conocía que tenía el estado cosas…muchas repugnantes a mi genio, con todo, para la total negación que tenía al matrimonio, era lo menos desproporcionado y lo más decente que podía elegir en materia de la seguridad que deseaba de mi salvación…

[I became a nun, because even though I was aware that that state had many aspects…that were in opposition to my character, it was the most fitting and seemly state I could choose with respect to the assurance of my salvation that I desired…]

The above passage is one of the most famous from the epistolary autobiography Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz wrote to “Sister Philotea” in March of 1691. Her explanation as to why she entered the religious life is startling in its candor; her recounting of what she had to relinquish in the process is heartrending: “cedieron y sujetaron la cerviz todas las impertinencillas de mi genio, que eran de vivir sola; de no querer tener ocupación obligatoria que embarazase la libertad de mi estudio, ni rumor de comunidad que impiediese el sosegado silencio de mis libros.” (all the impertinent little quirks of my character bowed their heads and surrendered, which were to live alone; not to have forced obligations which would interrupt the freedom of my study, nor the noise of a community which would interfere with the tranquil silence of my books). What is clear from the quotation is that she entered the convent not because she had a strong religious calling, but because it was the one place where she could continue her studies.

The Respuesta a Sor Filotea is one of the most passionate and unique documents to come out of Western literature, the cry of a supremely intellectual woman for the right to use her mind in the way men of her time could. Before discussing its content it is important to establish the circumstances under which this document came to be.

Sor Juana’s fame as one of the leading intellectuals and poets of the viceroyalty of New Spain had been established long ago. She wrote a great deal of the religious literature nuns were expected to produce, but she was also ambitious and vitally interested in matters outside the Church. She wrote courtly love poetry, secular drama and witty satiric verse that often deeply offended the churchmen that were her superiors, most especially the overtly misogynistic Archbishop of Mexico, Francisco Aguiar y Seixas. Sor Juana had for years endured stinging criticism of her literary activities, but around 1690 this became increasingly strident. One ally in the Church hierarchy was the Bishop of Puebla, who had published a religious treatise Sor Juana had composed, but simultaneously sent her a letter of admonition to mend her ways. Since God had given her a supreme intellect, he wrote, she had the obligation to devote it exclusively to His service. Should the nun fail to remember this, her mortal soul stood in danger of condemnation. The Bishop knew that his message was a strong one, and, in order to soften the impact, he signed it with the name of “Sister Philotea,” making it appear that here was one nun speaking to another. When Sor Juana drafted her reply, however, she was fully aware that she was being spoken to by a male superior, but for tactical reasons she continued the fiction of the female addressee. It is important to remember that these were not private letters, but ones that would circulate among many readers. Both “Sor Philotea” and Sor Juana were fully aware of this, and it conditioned their respective responses.

In spite of his admonitions, the Bishop may have been giving Sor Juana the opportunity to apologize for her past offences and promise to mend her ways in the future. If this was his objective, it failed. Instead of an apology, she went on the offensive in an all-out attempt to justify her right to an intellectual vocation. In so doing, she has left us an extraordinary autobiography.
The uninitiated reader may at first find her style daunting: long, convoluted sentences, and an apparent lack of inner organization. Perelmutter Pérez (1983), however, showed that in fact Sor Juana adhered closely to Quintilian’s rules of rhetoric: her letter has an introduction, a narration of the facts of the case, proof of her own position and refutation of countercharges, and a conclusion.

In the introduction (paragraphs 1–5) there are conventional phrases of gratitude and humility at the favor Sister Philotea has done Sor Juana by writing to her. She says she can find no way to reply to “vuestra doctísima, discretísima, santísima y amorosísima carta” (your overwhelmingly learned, prudent, holy and loving letter). The English translation in no way renders the excessiveness of the string of superlatives of the original. Is Sor Juana being overtly humble or covertly mocking?

The narration (paragraphs 6–29) is the most extensive part of the epistle. There are various recurrent themes, but front and center is Sor Juana’s appropriation of the Bishop’s reason for admonishing her: that her intellect is a gift of God. She refers to “este natural impulso que Dios puso en mí” (this natural impulse God installed in me), implying in several places in her letter that if God is the author of her intelligence, then how can it be sinful to make use of it? Sor Juana establishes that an insatiable hunger for knowledge was with her from the moment she began to think rationally, and that she was prepared to risk all in order to learn. There are two telling episodes in her childhood that illustrate this. When she was barely three, she sneaked off to school with her older sister, lied to the teacher that her mother wanted her to learn to read, and proceeded to master this skill with lightning speed; she said nothing to her mother until the deed was done, although she feared being whipped for her lie. When she was eight, she heard that there was a university in the capital, and begged her mother to let her dress as a boy and go; on being turned down, she devoured the books in her grandfather’s library in spite of frequent scoldings and punishment. Several important lessons were thus learned early: hunger for knowledge involved punishment, which she risked; she was prepared to lie to get what she wanted; her gender was the main obstacle to her intellectual goals.

In the narration Sor Juana recounts the problems she had in deciding on the religious life, the stresses involved in living in community, and her immense solitude at always having to study alone: “teniendo sólo por maestro un libro mudo, por condiscípulo un tintero insensible” (having but a mute book for a teacher, an unfeeling inkwell for a fellow student). The nun defends her interest in secular matters by noting that they are the stepping stones to theology, the highest science, and recounts the unrelenting criticism she has suffered over the years. To prove that she cannot stop using her mind, she cites how when she is cooking, she observes the interaction of ingredients in a scientific way, thus turning the kitchen, that archetypal female space, into a laboratory. “Pero Señora,” she slyly asks her fictitious counterpart, “¿qué podemos saber las mujeres sino filosofías de cocina?” (But my Lady, what can we women know except kitchen philosophies?)

In the proof section (paragraphs 30–45), Sor Juana first enumerates a long list of illustrious women predecessors, a familiar tactic many early women writers used to legitimize actions the world might see as aberrant, then goes on to the crux of the problem: the Church’s inconsistent stand on the role of women within its ranks. She goes straight to St Paul’s dictum for women to be silent in church, manipulating both St Paul and St Jerome’s words to suit her purposes. To her credit, Sor Juana was concerned not only for her own intellectual life, but for that of other Mexican women of her class. Many parents feared that daily contact with male tutors might ruin their daughters’ reputations, and thus left them illiterate; Sor Juana was appalled by this, and suggested using older learned women as instructors, a pedagogical concern that was, predictably, ignored.

She also took exception to the criticism levelled at her for critiquing the sermon of Antonio Vieira, a famous Jesuit preacher. “Mi entendimiento tal cual ¿no es tan libre como el suyo, pues viene de un solar?” she queried. (My mind, such as it is, is it not as free as his, as both come from the same source?) Sor Juana also claimed that almost all she had ever written had been because others had demanded this of her patent falsehood.

In the conclusion (the last two paragraphs) Sor Juana very cleverly covers herself by begging Sor Philotea’s pardon for being so familiar with her: “que a veros sin velo, no sucediera asi” (for had I seen you without your veil, it would never have happened like this). Sor Juana gives her sister licence to adjust the style of the letter, and thus avoid any possible affront. This brief summary cannot begin to do justice to the conceptual, stylistic and human richness of the Respuesta. It is a document that has inspired and challenged critics for many years, and will continue to do so.

NINA M.SCOTT

Editions
First edition: in Fama y obras póstumas del Fénix de Méjico, Madrid, 1700

Further Reading
Perelmuter Pérez, Rosa, “La estructura retórica de la Respuesta a Sor Filotea, ” Hispanic Review 51 (1983)
— “‘La gran turba de las que merecieron nombres:’ Sor Juana’s Foremothers in La Respuesta a Sor Filotea, ” in Coded Encounters: Writing, Gender and Ethnicity in Colonial Latin America, edited by Scott, Francisco Javier Cevallos Candau, Jeffrey A.Cole and Nicomedes Suárez Araúz, Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1994
Land and Literature

The identification with a specific geographic space is the main component of the identity of a community. In the case of Latin American countries, the land between the Straight of Magellan and the Mexican border with the US, has been the focus of its most significant writers in marking their American difference. The Argentine pampa, the jungles of Central America and Brazil, the Andes in Chile, Peru and Bolivia, the Amazon river, or the coffee and banana plantations of Colombia have figured prominently in the works of Spanish American writers, who have endowed nature with a range of significances and created symbolic landscapes. The land connected to literature depends on the perspective, or the “gaze” of the author who depicts it: it can be observed from outside or from inside, as the Other to be dominated by the western subject, or as the source of life to be protected from the barbarism of civilization.

The first texts by Europeans about Latin American land are written by 16th-century travellers: outsiders who are impressed by the landscape and depict it as a new place to be possessed, as in the texts by Christopher Columbus. During the colonial period, travellers, missionaries and conquerors centered their writing in the American land. Among these are Bernardo de Balbuena, el Inca Garcilaso de la Vega, Juan de Castellanos, Pedro de Oña, Juan de Ercilla, Sebastián da Rocha Pita, and Gonçalves Dias.

However, the Venezuelan humanist Andrés Bello is considered the first Latin American author to transform the land into literature from an insider’s view in his poems, La agricultura de la zona tórrida [The Agriculture of the Torrid Zone] and America. Naming the elements that constitute the American land, he proposes a conscious intention of literary emancipation parallel to the political one in such verses as: “tiempo es que dejes ya la culta Europa / que tu nativa rustiquez desama / y dirijas el vuelo donde te abre / el mundo de Colón su grande escena” (it is time for you to leave educated Europe / that your native rusticity disloves / and to direct your flight to where Columbus’s world / opens its great scene for you).

During the 19th-century period of independence from Spain, the land is the main element consolidating the different national identities, and the principal writers of each emergent country devote parts of their production to the evocation of their native land. Among these are José Martí (Cuba), Juan Bautista Alberdi and Domingo Faustino Sarmiento (Argentina), Jorge Isaacs (Colombia). Towards the end of the 19th century, however, the trend among Spanish American modernista writers was either to neglect the representation of their own natural sourroundings in favour of others perceived as exotic (Europe, the Orient) or to construct picturesque preColumbian settings.
A narrative with a telluric tendency develops afterwards. It is called “the novel of the land” and starts with La vorágine, 1924 (The Vortex) by José Eustasio Rivera, where the Amazon jungle controlled by unknown laws dominates human beings, and ends by devouring them, as is shown in the last words of this novel: “¡Se los tragó la selva!” (The jungle swallowed them!). This tendency is continued by Teófano Cuéllar (Bolivia) in La borrachera verde, 1937 [The Green Drunkenness] and by Jorge Amado (Brazil) in Terras do sem fim, 1943 (The Violent Land). Also, rural Mexico provides the setting for Mariano Azuela’s account of the early years of the Revolution, Los de abajo, 1916 (The Underdogs), and one of the main characters of Doña Bárbara, 1929 and Canaima, 1935, by Rómulo Gallegos the Venezuelan, is American Nature. These are novels in which certain “primitive” elements associated with nature (through gender, ethnicity or poverty) are seen as obstacles in the formation of the modern (masculine) nation state.

The relationship between land and human beings has taken different paths in the last decades. In Los pasos perdidos (The Lost Steps) by the Cuban writer Alejo Carpentier, the jungle is no longer an uncontrollable being, but its characteristics alter according to individual perception and perspective (according to how it is “read”), factors which can transform it into a paradise or hell. Other 20th-century writers: Miguel Ángel Asturias (Guatemala), João Guimarães Rosa (Brazil), Horacio Quiroga (Uruguay) and Ciro Alegría (Peru), have developed a different perspective to look at the land, what Fernando Ainsa calls a literary “colonization” from within, and what could be considered as a fusion between the Subject and the Other. For example, in the texts by Asturias written from the perspective of the Maya Quiché Indians, human beings have a bush soul, they are born as plants, the land is the mother, origin and end of life; maize is sacred and should not be grown as a cash crop. This relationship is also obvious in the texts by Ciro Alegría who affirms in one of his poems: “Pacha Mama, a ti te hirieron mil pedruscos / destrozando tu ternura de madre, / desde entonces te volviste amarga de lágrimas indias / y tu alegría de dar la estamos buscando” (Pacha Mama, a thousand stones hurt you / destroying your motherly tenderness, / since then you have grown bitter with Indian tears / and we are searching for your happiness of giving). This same connection between women and land has been part of Latin American literature in Juana de Ibarbourou’s texts since the first decades of the 20th century, and it is notable in works by the Nicaraguan poets Gioconda Belli and Rosario Murillo. The former is author of the poem “Metamorfosis,” where the female subject becomes part of nature, “metamorfoseada, / espinosa, / sola, / hecha naturaleza” (and in my metamorphosis / thorny / alone / at one with nature). Also in Nicaragua, Pablo Antonio Cuadra analyzes the landscape in Tierra que habla [Land that Talks], and tries to recover native culture and its implications with the land in El jaguar y la luna [The Jaguar and the Moon].

Contemporary ecological concerns about the destruction of the Earth and of humanity with it by “civilization,” cross national boundaries and universalize land as the place where we all live. This thinking is apparent in the works of the Mexican Homero Aridjis, author of “Descreación” [Uncreation] and “Murió el último caballo” [The Last Horse Died], and in poems like “12.34” by Roberto Juarroz. The two writers consider both the barbarism implicit in our civilization and the ignorance of the land: “acepto mi pobreza de hombre / sin dios en el firmamento y sin futuro en la vida” (I accept my poverty as a man / without god in the firmament and without a future in life) or “ignoramos la función de la tierra” (we ignore the function of the land).
Further Reading

Critical Studies
León Hazera, Lydia de, La novela de la selva hispanoamericana, Bogota: Instituto Caro y Cuervo, 1971
Seminario Internacional de literatura Hispanoamericana, La naturaleza y el hombre en la novela hispanoamericana, Antofagasta, Chile: Universidad del Norte, 1969

Fiction
Aridjis, Homero (Mexico), Imágenes para el fin del milenio, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1990
Columbus, Christopher, Textos y documentos completos, edited by Consuelo Varela, Madrid: Alianza, 1982
Murillo, Rosario (Nicaragua), Las esperanzas misteriosas, Managua, Nicaragua: Vanguardia, 1990

Norah Lange 1906–1972

Argentine poet and prose writer
A certain notoriety came early to Norah Lange. From the cultural gatherings held at the family home on Tronador Street, immortalized in Leopoldo Marechal’s novelized memoirs Adán Buenosayres (1948), came the intimacy with her cousin, Jorge Luis Borges, and others in the Argentine vanguard movements. This led to Lange’s consecration as “the Muse of the Ultraists” on the publication, in 1924, of her first collection of poems, La calle de la tarde [The Street at Evening]. After a first meeting in 1926 with fellow poet and rich playboy, Oliverio Girondo, the brilliant bionomy “Noraliverio Olinora” enlivened Argentina’s literary scene throughout the 1930s with unbridled gaiety as, together with the Martín Fierro group, they waged “war against solemnity” in their attempts to reintegrate art in the praxis of life. Quite typical of those years were Lange’s mock serious banquet speeches, later collected as Estimados congéneres, 1968 [Esteemed Companions], outrageous performances by the orator who blended nonsense, metaphor and cacophony into a true live art experience. The long relationship with Girondo, her acknowledged first and most demanding critic—they were eventually married in 1946—also provided the leisure and the discipline Lange needed to polish the subtle, innovative writing style of her mature novels published in the 1950s.

Superficially, little in theme and subject matter distinguishes Lange’s three books of poetry from the conventional aesthetic of the Latin American “poetesses” in the period 1916–30, which predominantly male critics have typified as a subjective, monotonous infantilism. Lange creates an intimate, enclosed world of house and garden wherein the female subject, languidly awaiting the dynamic presence of the male other, is doomed to view from window or doorway the city only he possesses because her external reality never reaches beyond the crucifixes, rosaries and altars that translate the suffering of her adolescent love. Nevertheless, if Borges chauvinistically pointed out the “little girl” quality here, he also, and quite rightly, praised “the noble prodigality” of Lange’s metaphors and “the sparseness” of her poetry, both characteristics she would make the virtues of her prose.

In her later years Lange disclaimed as “bad” and “superficial” her first incursions into prose, Voz de la vida, 1927 [Voice of Life], and 45 días y 30 marineros, 1933 [45 Days and 30 Sailors]. The former is an epistolary novel exploring passion and adultery from the woman protagonist’s point of view, whilst the latter (and the only writing by Lange not in the ambiguous first person she found so “comfortable”) describes the sexual tightrope walked between the Captain, officers and crew by the lone woman passenger on board the ship from Buenos Aires to Oslo. Published to mixed reviews on account of what was perceived as their unsuitable subject matter for a lady novelist, these learning exercises are not without interest today, precisely on account of their vanguard feminism. They also point to what Lange would develop further: the autobiographical theme, a gendered discourse, and the valuable lesson that “I could do what I wished with language.”

Cuadernos de infancia, 1937 [A Childhood Scrapbook], is undoubtedly Lange’s best-known work. Unanimous critical acclaim led to official recognition and prestigious prizes for what would become a recommended reader for several generations of Argentine schoolchildren. Like the later, less overtly autobiographical, Antes de que mueran, 1944 [Before They Die], Cuadernos de infancia is a series of vignettes or flashback memories of Lange’s early childhood, dating from the family move to Mendoza late in 1910 or early 1911 until the return to Buenos Aires on her father’s death in 1915. Although the first-person narrator is without name, her five sisters and brother are strongly reminiscent of Lange’s own large family, prompting critics to wax enthusiastic about a tenderly poetic evocation of growing up in an exceptional and unorthodox family. Sylvia Molloy’s thought-provoking analysis in At Face Value: Autobiographical Writing in Spanish America suggests, however, that Cuadernos de infancia has been widely misread. Rather than writing a “safe,” feminine fiction in line with the conventional memoir of childhood that is tinged with smug nostalgia for a pre-adolescent golden age, Lange made over into narrative strategy the ultraist flair for the truncated metaphor, the visually disturbing, and the linguistic experimentation, that is her hallmark. This is a performance similar to her contemporaneous speeches or self-styled “anatomical essays,” in that she foregrounds eccentricity rather than conformity, defiance not passivity, and fragmentation as opposed to consolidation. It signals a deliberate and noteworthy break with the recurring patterns in Argentine autobiographical writing that, for example, a contemporary of Lange, María Rosa Oliver, prolonged so effectively in Mundo, mi casa, 1970 [World, My House], Cuadernos de infancia begins with disruption as Lange describes the move to Mendoza that triggers her childhood memories, which are here characterized as “cutouts” and seen as if through “a fogged window.” This arbitrary, ludic design continues throughout the multi-fissured text which has no dates and only a single, fleeting reference to any historical context, distorts genealogy and patronymics, and is systematically unsentimental in avoiding any depiction of home and the daily routine as a protected and protective space. The child’s spying eye acts as an unexpectedly candid camera and the resulting snapshots intrigue rather than explain, enticing the reader to enter into this game of literary voyeurism that centres on the elucidation of disquieting private fears and personal manias.

In reinscribing her vanguard self into her childhood memories Lange elaborated a narrative technique based on her “favourite pastime: spying on others’ intimacy.” She exploited this to great advantage in the ritual of the quotidian, “the possibilities that move behind the words,” and the deft depiction of psychological undercurrents in her last two novels, Personas en la sala, 1950 [People in the Drawing-Room] and Los dos retratos, 1956 [The Two Portraits]. These works placed Lange alongside José Bianco, Felisberto Hernández and Juan Carlos Onetti, as practitioners of the “novel of ambiguity” that explores the problems of self and identity. Both novels are about literary creation by women: the anonymous adolescent in Personas en la sala imagines, elaborates on and annotates the story behind the faces of three women outlined one stormy night in the window of the empty house opposite. Another adolescent, Marta in Los dos retratos, peers into the mirror that reflects both the faces of the family and those depicted in two photographs hung in the dining-room in order to reconstruct what happened on the afternoon the photographs were taken. Each retires to a room of her own in which to pursue a succession of fantasies that answer a compulsive need to visualize her own self. As each character builds up her story, at once ambiguous and ambivalent as it moves between reality and dream, different moments in time and space, first and third person narrative, and the enigmatic, symbiotic relationships between the characters, the narrator’s self is fractured or splintered in what becomes an open-ended text which may be read in a variety of ways. Thus, in Personas en la sala, the three women are projections of the narrator which point up the repression, solitude and boredom typical of female marginalization and silence that gradual empowerment (the act of narration) ends (as the narrator eliminates the women at the end of her narration). Similarly, in Los dos retratos, Marta corrects her own “off-centre” position, as too young to be reflected either at the family table or in the photographs. What she does is to construct her version of love, intrigue and jealousy between family members, in a text at play with itself as Lange explores the complexity of the creative process which authors a female identity. Lacanian psychoanalytical criticism will certainly enrich any reading of Lange’s obsessive use of dreams, mirrors, portraits and photographs to frame the textual construction-deconstruction-reconstruction carried out in these novels, but no single interpretation should strait-jacket what the author herself saw as the possibilities of “magic” in her “pure voyeurism.”

If both her poetry and prose were on the whole well received by their contemporary readers Lange has, nevertheless, been a victim of her own legendary literary status, for scholarly evaluation has come late, and from outside Argentina. With the advent of feminist criticism Lange is now credited, together with María Luisa Bombal and Teresa de la Parra, with writing from a vanguard perspective that both subverts and transforms the traditionally male codification of the Latin American novel in accordance with the lineage, place and language of power. Yet to come are the English translations of her novels and the wider recognition Lange’s finely-crafted writing deserves.

K.M. SIBBALD

Biography

Born in Argentina, 23 October 1906; of Norwegian descent. Published first volume of poetry, La calle de la tarde, at the age of 18. Early member of the ultraísta movement, centred around Borges in Buenos Aires during the early 1920s and 1930s. Married the avant-garde poet Oliverio Girondo (see separate entry) in 1946. Their home in Buenos Aires became the centre of avant-garde activity. Contributed to the journals Martin Fierro and Proa. Awarded Buenos Aires Literary Prize, 1937 for Cuadernos de infancia. Died on 6 August 1972.

Selected Works

Poetry
La calle de la tarde, prologue by Jorge Luis Borges, Buenos Aires: J.Samet, 1924
Los días y las noches, Buenos Aires: El Inca, 1926
El rumbo de la rosa, Buenos Aires: Proa, 1930

Prose Works
Voz de la vida, Buenos Aires: Proa, 1927
45 días y 30 marineros, Buenos Aires: Tor, 1933
Cuadernos de infancia, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1937
Discursos, Buenos Aires: Ediciones CAYDE, 1942
Antes de que mueran, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1944
Personas en la sala, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1950
Los dos retratos, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1956
“El parecido,” Claudia 113 (October 1966)
Estimados congéneres, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1968
“La mano en el retrato,” La Nación (28 December 1969)

Further Reading

Enrique Larreta 1873–1961

Argentine prose writer and dramatist

Enrique Larreta’s family had a financially secure position which allowed the author to travel to Europe as a youth and to develop aristocratic tastes and sensibilities; these inclinations are artistically conveyed in his writings. Larreta’s first novel, a short work entitled Artemis, dealt with life in ancient Greece; it appeared in 1896 in the periodical La Biblioteca. On a trip to Spain in 1903 he visited Avila, where he painstakingly researched his most famous novel, La gloria de don Ramiro (una vida en tiempos de Felipe II) (The Glory of Don Ramiro. A Life in the Times of Philip II), a work he completed and published in 1908. His next significant novel, Zogoibi (192.6), a depiction of gaucho life on an estancia (ranch) in Argentina, contrasted the snobbery of the upper classes with the simple customs of the country people. Larreta also produced a handful of non-fiction works and dramas, most of which he wrote in the 1920s and 1930s. His volume of poems, La calle de la vida y de la muerte, 1941 (The Street of Life and Death), combines characteristics of Symbolism and Impressionism. He also went on to write several other novels but none of his works achieved the critical acclaim and popularity of La gloria de don Ramiro.

Larreta’s masterpiece, an impressionistic work written in an elegant, ornate style, is widely recognized as the most outstanding novel of Spanish American Modernismo and one of the best historical novels in the Spanish language. In it he presents the theme of the eternal struggle (in Christian cultures) between the flesh and the spirit. Ramiro, who embodies this conflict, is caught between the two career options for pursuing personal glory in Golden Age Spain, the way of the cross (as a monk) or of the sword (as a conquistador). La gloria de don Ramiro attempts to recreate the language, the tense coexistence of cultures—one Christian and the other Islamic and the heroic spirit that typified the age of Philip II.

The novel tells the story of Ramiro, the son of a Castilian woman and a Moor. Born in 1570, Ramiro (who would have been a contemporary of another character of fiction, Don Quixote), receives a strict education in preparation for an ecclesiastical career but forsakes the calling when he falls in love with Beatriz. Enlisted to unmask a conspiracy hatched by the moriscos (Moorish converts to Christianity who were often suspected of secretly adhering to their former faith), Ramiro comes under the influence of Aixa, a morisca seductress, and subsequently gets a taste of witchcraft, astrology and the black arts. He returns to the Christian sector and tries to win the affections of Beatriz, but she rejects him. In a highly charged emotional scene, Ramiro strangles Beatriz with her rosary. He flees to Toledo and there witnesses an auto da fé and the burning of the beautiful Aixa. After this incident he withdraws from the world and attempts to lead the life of an ascetic. Soon, however, he feels the call of adventure and sails to America as a soldier of fortune. At the age of thirty-five, after repenting and expiating his sins, he dies. The novel’s final scene takes place in Lima where Santa Rosa prays over Ramiro’s body.

Thanks to his eye for detail and obsession with historical accuracy, Larreta succeeds in conveying through colors and other sense impressions the feel and essence of Spanish life in the last quarter of the 16th century. The novel rings true especially in its use of the language of the period. Forms such as fiyo (hijo, son); quitalles (quitarles, to take away from them); the phrase harto años ha (hace muchos años, many years ago); aina (an obsolete word meaning “quickly” or “immediately”); mesma (misma, same); codícia (codicia, greed); bisagüelo (bisabuelo, great-grandfather); agora (ahora, now) and other archaic usage help make the work convincing as a historical novel. However, Larreta’s cultivation of archaic language distances modern readers from the text.

The best examples of modernista prose are found in descriptions of art objects, fabrics, etc., and in passages that relate Ramiro’s erotic escapades among the moriscos, specifically his relationship with the enchanting Aixa. As Ramiro watches her bathe, he becomes fascinated with her beauty and eventually submits to the desires of the flesh. These sensually charged scenes culminate in the bewitching dance Aixa performs for Ramiro. The novelist describes her rhythmic movements with carefully selected olfactory, visual and auditory imagery. Aixa enters a trance and the dance ends when she swoons, a sequence that implies close parallels between erotic ecstasy and mystical rapture.

Larreta, like all the other modernistas, viewed literature as its own justification rather than as a tool for achieving social or political goals. Advancing the slogan “art for art’s sake,” the modernistas devoted themselves to the pursuit of an ideal (always unattainable) and the exploration of things far removed from routine experience. In their search for absolute beauty and perfection of form they openly expressed their disdain for the mundane. This escape from reality led to a cultivation of the erotic and the exotic (foreign and distant). Inevitably, eroticism and exoticism came to be associated with the Other. Despite his attention to detail and concern for accuracy in describing places, buildings, interior designs, etc., Larreta’s evocation of Spanish settings and Moorish culture bears the unmistakable imprint of his cultural preconceptions regarding alterity. In other words, the moriscos of Golden Age Spain were “exotic” precisely because of their otherness. This notion of what constituted the exotic defines the tone of La gloria de don Ramiro. The novel’s exaltation of sensuality and its assault on the senses make it the modernista novel par excellence.

MELVIN S. ARRINGTON, JR

Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 4 March 1873, into a privileged family of Uruguayan and Basque stock. Secondary education at the Colegio Nacional in Buenos Aires. Obtained doctorate in law. Taught medieval and modern history at the Colegio Nacional. Travelled to Spain with his wife

Selected Works

Short Fiction

Artemis, Buenos Aires: La Biblioteca, II, 1896

Novels

Zogoibi, Buenos Aires: Roldán, 1926

Orillas del Ebro, Madrid: Espasa Calpe, 1949

El Gerardo; o la torre de las damas, Buenos Aires and Madrid: Aguilar, 1953

En la pampa, Buenos Aires and Madrid: Aguilar, 1955

Poetry

La calle de la vida y de la muerte, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe, 1941

Plays

La lampe d’argile, Paris: n.p., 1915

El linyera, Buenos Aires: Roldán, 1932

Santa María del Buen Aire, Madrid: Suárez, 1935

Pasión de Roma, Buenos Aires: Rosso, 1937

La que buscaba Don Juan, Buenos Aires: Rosso, 1937

Tenía que suceder, Buenos Aires: Al Ateneo, 1943

Jerónimo y su almohada, Madrid and Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe, 1944

Clamor, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe, 1959

Essays

Historiales, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1921

Las dos fundaciones de Buenos Aires, Buenos Aires: Viau y Viau, 1933

Tiempos iluminados, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe, 1939

La naranja, Buenos Aires: Al Ateneo, 1947

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras completas, Madrid: Plenitud, 1948 [Carelessly edited; reproduces errors of Austral editions]

Obras completas, 2 vols, Buenos Aires: Claridad, 1959

Further Reading

The majority of studies on Larreta that have appeared to date have a disappointingly old-fashioned critical apparatus. An exception is the study by Gabriela Ibieta, which recognizes the relevance of Edward Said’s Orientalism to aspects of La gloria de don Ramiro.
José Lezama Lima 1910–1976

Cuban poet and prose writer

José Lezama Lima’s production is among the most complex and disquieting to have emerged from the literature of Spanish America. His verbal scheme is based upon the formulation of a poetic system in which the image appears as the substance of the creative will. His literary work constitutes a prodigious textual edifice where poetry, the essay, short stories, and the novel are structured around an organising nucleus which is Lezama’s poetics. Furthermore, this represents the thematic centre of all his work that develops out of itself with an ever widening and integrating movement through a dazzling multiplicity of images whose internal logic would prove almost imperceptible to the majority of the writer’s contemporaries: this would confer on Lezama the title of Neobaroque writer, and the accusation of being almost incomprehensible.

This concept of poetic writing radically contradicted the process of continuity which, stemming from a point of ephemeral vanguardism and going through solid pure poetry - Mariano Brull, Eugenio Florit and Emilio Ballagas—had established itself as a patently perceptible condition in the Cuban lyric poetry of the period.

The first stage in the work of Lezama Lima consists of the poem Muerte de Narciso, 1937 [The Death of Narcissus] and the book Enemigo rumor, 1941 [Hostile Rumour]. It is characterized by a luscious use of language, which extends through a successive series of metaphors whose sense, often hidden behind the beauty of the verbal forms, nevertheless responds to a perfectly fathomable logic. In both texts, the poet’s discourse settles on two planes that reflect each other—deciphering and obfuscating one another at the same time, like Narcissus before the mirror: the mirror of sexual experience and of poetic experience, taken on like the two poles between which a powerful creative current is formed. All the language of Enemigo rumor seems to hide and reveal this complementary polarity, and the subsequent tensions with which the poetry occupies that space, expressing and extending its limits in order to offer itself new methods of resistance.

The second stage of Lezama’s work encompasses three titles: Aventuras sigilosas, 1945 [Stealthy Adventures]; La fijeza, 1949 [Fixedness]; and Dador, 1960 [Giver]. During this period, the reader’s growing difficulty in understanding Lezama’s writings is accentuated. It is a difficulty that responds to the author’s essential outstanding literary quality and which does not reside only in a deliberate desire to write poetry out of new formal concepts, but in the need for consciousness and for spiritual transcendence, which runs throughout his work, and which appears to come to him from a radiating centre of intense originality. The reliance on metaphors that has been highlighted by the critics of Lezama’s work is one of the forms in which this thirst is manifested.

In Aventuras sigilosas—a poetry collection that, like Dador, refers back to the field of narrative or drama—the poet explores, using a rich variety of images, the unconditioned creative path that comes to constitute poetry, according to the system devised by Lezama. In these books, Lezama Lima’s thought process is unfolded—with absolute coherence—around a fundamental concept: “el genitor por la imagen” (the begetter through the image), the being that acts outside causality and creates starting from within himself. “Impregnation, conjugation, germination,” affirms Lezama, “are more subtle forms of creation than causal developments.” Mastery over these forms leads “the begetter of the image,” that is to say, the poet, to adorn the quasi-divine condition which some primitive communities bestow upon him, attributing to him a fecund knowledge that, in the same fashion as St Augustine’s logos spermatikos, bursts into the culture: “como un toro germinativo” (like a breedingstock bull), as Lezama says. The idea concerns a concept based on the creative force of the word, that itself refers back to St John’s formulation (“In the beginning was the word”), a coming together of Christian faith and Greek thought at the outset of an innovative vision of the world.

The language of these three books—in which Lezama exhibits and develops the elements that form his poetic practices—is exceptionally rich. This can be traced to that kind of “transcendental materialism” on which his aesthetic concepts are grounded, which culminate in a formulation of a philosophical quality. Only in this manner can the far-reaching element that he attributes to his own system be explained; an element that aspires to establish itself in a real poetic reinterpretation—that is to say, essential—of the world. We find ourselves faced with a case of exceptional quality: that of a contemporary poet who not only draws on the great myths in order to extract from them features of literary value long since abandoned by Western culture, but who utilizes those same features freely, integrating and modifying them according to the hypotheses of a thought process that, though it may appear delirious at root level and in its proposals—nothing less than advocating the poetic systematization of the world—is irrefutably logical within its own terms of reference.

A type of poetry that barricades itself in, it reveals its codes and apparently arbitrary means throughout the second stage of his literary career, transforming itself into a language as oracular as it is coherent. Poetry, assumed by Lezama as a metaphor for creation, aspires to embody the reality of this creation, governed by its own laws that transcend causality as a creative factor.
The publication in 1966 of his novel Paradiso brought Lezama international critical attention, and the censure of the Cuban authorities, who rejected the strong erotic content of some passages in the novel, and, above all, the important space occupied by homosexuality among his other themes. Strictly speaking, the novel constitutes the exposition of the author’s philosophy, organized around his poetic system of the world.

In the same year, Julio Cortázar published an essay “Para llegar a Lezama Lima” [To reach Lezama Lima], analyzing Paradiso. “Lezama is not only hermetic in the literal sense,” writes Cortázar, “for which reason the best of his work proposes the seizure of essences by way of the mythical and the esoteric in all of their historic, psychic, and literary forms, vertiginously combined within a poetic system...but he is also hermetic in a formal sense, as much because of the candour which makes him believe that the most heteroclitic of his metaphorical series will be perfectly understood by everyone, as because of the fact that his form of expression is of baroque style of an original nature.”

The third and last stage of Lezama’s work comprises two works published posthumously: the novel Oppiano Licario, dedicated to the character that dominates the end of Paradiso, and who reappears in this new text as the embodiment of the author’s thoughts; and the poem collection Fragmentos a su imán [Fragments to Their Magnet], where he opens up, through the use of the traditional Lezamian style, a sense of communicative urgency which appears to transcend the coordinates of the writer’s poetic system, when, in reality, it actually takes it to its culminating point.

The full development of his ideas and of his poetic discourse allows Lezama access, in Fragmentos a su imán, to a level of communication that appears to contradict, at certain points, the hermeticism of his previous books, when, in fact, the conversational texts of this collection of poems are the last result of that hermeticism. It is presented in Fragmentos a su imán as the unveiling and delivery of the author’s thoughts, guided by the all-consuming desire to reach an absolute, a palpable possession in its verbal manifestation; as if the text were able to become texture, in flesh that becomes habitable like a body.

EMILIO DE ARMAS
translated by Luís González Fernández

Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, 19 December 1910 (some sources give 1912.). Grew up in the Fort Barrancas military camp, Pensacola. Educated at the Instituto de Havana, until 1928; University of Havana, degree in law 1938. Worked briefly in private law practice after graduation; worked for the Higher Council for Social Security, from 1938; director, Department of Culture, Ministry of Education, from 1945. Travelled to Mexico, 1949, Jamaica, 1950. Director, Department of Literature and Publications, National Council of Culture, Havana, from 1959, and adviser, Cuban Centre for Literary Investigation. Editor or co-editor, Verbum (with Guy Pérez de Cisneros), 1937, Espuela de Plata, 1939–41, Nadie Parecía, 1942–1944, Orígenes, 1944–1956. The last of these was a most important literary journal, funded by the wealthy José (Pepe) Rodríguez Feo, a Harvard graduate with a marked interest in literature. It was because Rodríguez Feo and Lezama Lima fell out that Orígenes ceased publication. One of six vice-presidents, Cuban Union of Artists and Writers (UNEAC), 1959–1962. Married María Luisa Bautista in 1965. His novel Paradiso withdrawn from circulation after its publication in Cuba. As creative writing in Cuba grew ever more bureaucratized and sovietized, so Lezama Lima fell out of favour. Died (obscurely) on 9 August 1976. There was a great revival of interest in his work, particularly among young writers in Cuba, in the late 1980s.

Selected Works

Poetry
Muerte de Narciso, Havana: Úcar García y Cia, 1937
Enemigo rumor, Havana: Espuela de Plata, 1941
Aventuras sigilosas, Havana: Orígenes, 1945
La fijeza, Havana: Orígenes, 1949
Dador, Havana: Instituto Nacional del Libro, 1960
Fragmentos a su imán, Havana: Arte y Literatura, 1977

Novels

Essays and Other Writings
Coloquio con Juan Ramón Jiménez, Havana: Dirección Nacional de Cultura, 1938
La pintura de Aristides Fernández, Havana: Dirección Nacional de Cultura, 1950
Analecta del reloj, Havana: Orígenes, 1953
La expresión americana, Havana: Instituto Nacional de Cultura, 1957 [lectures]
Tratados en La Habana, Havana: Universidad Central de la Villas, 1958
Las eras imaginarias, Madrid: Fundamentos, 1971

Compilations and Anthologies
Antología de la poesía cubana, 3 vols, Havana: Consejo Nacional de Cultura, 1965
Lezuma Lima: los grandes todos, Montevideo: Arca, 1968
Poesías completas, Havana: Instituto del Libro, 1970
Obras completas, edited by Cintio Vitier, 2 vols, Mexico City: Aguilar, 1975–77
El reino de la imagen, edited by Julio Ortega, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1981 [selected essays]
Poesía completa, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1985

Further Reading

Goytisolo, José Augustín (editor), Posible imagen de José Lezama Lima, Barcelona: Llibres de Sinera, 1969

Márquez, Enrique, José Lezama Lima: bases y genesis de un sistema poético, New York: Peter Lang, 1991

Moliner, Rita V., José Lezama Lima, o el hechizo de la búsqueda, Madrid: Playor, 1989

Pellón, Gustavo, José Lezama Lima’s Joyful Vision: a Study of “Paradiso” and Other Prose, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1989

Santí, Enrico Mario, “Párridiso,” Modern Language Notes, vol. 94/2 (1979)

Simon, Pedro (editor), Recopilación de textos sobre José Lezama Lima, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1968

Suárez Galbán, Eugenio (editor), Lezama Lima, Madrid: Taurus, 1987

Valdiviesco, Jaime, Bajo el signo de Orfeo: Lezama Lima y Proust, Madrid: Orígenes, 1980

Vitier, Cintio (editor), Paradiso, Madrid: Archivos, 1988 [Contains essays by leading scholars and writers]

Vizcaíno, Cristina and Eugenio Suárez Galbán, Coloquio internacional sobre la obra de José Lezama Lima, 2 vols, Madrid: Fundamentos, 1984

Bibliographies

Ulloa, Justo C., Sobre José Lezama Lima y sus lectores: guía y compendio bibliográfico, Boulder, Colorado: Society of Spanish and Spanish-American Studies, 1987 Interviews

Bravo, Armando Álvarez (editor), Órbita de José Lezama Lima, Havana: UNEAC, 1966 [interviews and selected texts]
Justin Lhérisson 1873–1907

Haitian prose writer and poet

Although he also wrote poetry and was an amateur historian, Justin Lhérisson’s place in Haitian letters is assured by his two short novels, La Famille des Pitite-Caille, 1905 [The Pitite-Caille Family] and Zoune chez sa ninnaine, 1906 [Zoune at Her Grandmother’s].

The plot of La Famille des Pitite-Caille (in Créole pitit-kay means “intimate friend of the family” or “one of ours”) is simple: a man of the people, Éliézer Pitite-Caille becomes rich thanks to the skill of his wife Vellèda, a renowned fortuneteller and brewer of love potions, whose clients include high society ladies. The Pitite-Cailles move to a fashionable neighborhood and send their children to be educated in France. Disaster strikes when Éliézer decides to run for the Chamber of Deputies. Boutenègre, an unscrupulous ward heeler, exploits his ambition and cheats him out of his fortune. His popularity disturbs the clique in power, and they have Pitite-Caille arrested, beaten and thrown in jail. When, prematurely aged by his stay in prison, he is finally allowed to return home after the election, he swears to give up politics. But, falsely accused of plotting against the government, he is arrested and abused once again. Éliézer Pitite-Caille is finally released but dies of apoplexy soon after. What is left of his fortune is squandered by his children, and his widow is forced to become the concubine of an army general.

Pitite-Caille’s adventure allows Lhérisson to depict (for the first time in Haitian literature) the details of an electoral campaign, with its required masonic initiations, recruitment of bodyguards and political workers, organization of “spontaneous” support rallies, and sponsoring of banquets and openair dancing for the voters. All this is recounted with a broad humor that provokes guffaws and belly laughter but constitutes also, for the attentive reader, a penetrating and anguished critique of the unsavory nature of Haitian politics. The plot of Zoune chez sa ninnaine can be summarized in a few sentences: Mme Florida Boyotte, a Port-au-Prince store-keeper, takes in and raises her goddaughter Zoune, the daughter of poor peasants from the hills. Once the child has grown into an attractive adolescent, she is coveted by Mme Boyotte’s good-for-nothing lover, police officer Cadet Jacques. Despite entreaties, gifts and threats, Zoune rejects Cadet Jacques’s attentions. She finally complains to her godmother after he attempts to rape her, but the wretch claims that the girl encouraged him and Zoune is thrown out by her ninnaine (“godmother” in Créole).

La Famille... and Zoune... are novellas rather than true novels. More than the works of those of Lhérisson’s contemporaries (Frédéric Marcelin, Fernand Hibbert and Antoine Innocent) who have been dubbed, like him “national” or “realist” writers, they mark an important stage in the quest for literary “Haitianness.”

Lhérisson is the first novelist to have chosen his protagonists not from the upper classes but from the commercial petty bourgeoisie whose daily life and particular manners he chronicles. For example, La Famille... includes the first description not only of electoral practices and malpractices but of a whole series of Haitian traditions, such as the promise made to the voodoo spirits to provide, as an expression of thanksgiving for a prayer answered, a good meal (in Créole tchiampan) to prisoners in the central jail. This allows Lhérisson to describe in detail the appalling living conditions and the abuses of all kinds that are inflicted on the inmates. After La Famille…, and up to the present day, numerous Haitian writers have followed suit and protested against arbitrary arrest and the disgraceful conditions which reign in the penal establishments.

Before Lhérisson, if peasant life was described at all, it was in an edulcorated manner, as far removed from reality as the pastoral novels and poems of the Baroque period. In the first pages of Zoune…, rural life is for the first time described as it was (and remains) in actuality: exhausting, precarious, brutalizing, and steeped in distrust, ignorance and superstition. To be sure, Lhérisson’s voice remains sardonic: he thus chooses ridiculous names for Zoune’s parents: Maréchal Ticoq for her father, an indefatigable womanizer and Sor Poum (Madam Fart) for her mother, who is afflicted with chronic flatulence; but that does not prevent the novelist from exposing the great and criminal injustice of which our peasant brothers are the unfortunate victims: everything for the city folk, nothing for the country people; everything for our sarcastic and lazy urbanites and nothing for the “black hands who give us our white bread.”

But above all, Lhérisson’s fame rests on having created a new genre, the literary audience. What Haitians call audience is the custom of getting together to comment on the latest happenings in the neighborhood or in the Republic, to exchange gossip and to tell stories and jokes. The talent of the audiencier consists of finding an original point of view, in selecting picturesque images, in modulating the levels of expression, in sprinkling pauses and changes of rhythm in the delivery, in alternating seriousness and buffoonery, high rhetoric and pungent colloquialisms. Since audience is by nature oral and performative, its written version cannot help but consist in large measure of either monologue or dialogue: under Lhérisson’s pen, the genre constitutes itself half-way between narrative and theater. By transcribing this authentically Haitian “oraliture,” by adopting its apparent artlessness and its verbal acrobatics, and even by incorporating the onomatopoeias and suggesting the mimicry which are essential components of any good audience, Lhérisson founded a tradition which writers of the next generation, such as Jacques Roumain, Jacques-Stéphen Alexis, Francis-Joachim Roy and later Gary Victor would illustrate brilliantly and which, in more or less explicit ways, informs most modern Haitian fiction.

Being informal, audience in its oral and written forms requires the use of vernacular, that is to say of Créole, either in its “pure” form or mixed with French and preferably with Haitian French, in accordance with the speaker’s place in the social scale. Justin Lhérisson, an extraordinarily gifted audiencier, perfected the technique consisting of amalgamating French (especially for the narrative voice) with créolised French and pure Créole for most of the dialogues. The drawback (if it is a drawback) is of course that Lhérisson’s audiences are completely intelligible only to Haitians and to those rare foreigners who understand Créole. This explains why, in contradistinction to most Haitian works of fiction, Lhérisson’s novels were not published in Paris but in Port-au-Prince. His public was for all intents and purposes limited to his compatriots, not composed of the broad spectrum of readers of French, whatever their nationality.

To be sure, La Famille des Pitite-Caille was published with explanatory footnotes provided by the author; but these notes, which gave the French equivalent of certain lower-class popular expressions, were aimed at Haitian readers who, belonging by definition to the literate aristocracy, might not be familiar with them. In the same way mutatis mutandis, Victor Hugo and Balzac had annotated for their middle-class readers certain Parisian underworld slang expressions. The intrusion of Créole into Haitian literature, for which purity and elegance of French were a matter of principle and pride, did not, of course, please everyone. Reviewing Zoune for the December 1906 issue of Le Petit Haïtien, Édouard Fanfant wrote: “We understand that in a Haitian novel, in a novel which describes our way of life, some Créole words can find their place...But that they should be lavished indiscriminately, under the pretext of local color, of national literature is inadmissible. No, national literature does not consist in peppering the French text with Créole expressions. That would be too easy! And besides, when larded with Créole phrases, the style takes on a grotesque tone.”

For a long time, the writers who followed Lhérisson’s example risked being accused of contaminating French elegance with Créole vulgarity. Only recently have Haitian novelists (and even poets) felt justified in amalgamating in the same text their country’s two official languages.

It should be noted in passing that, while vodûn is hardly mentioned in Lherisson’s fiction and in that of most of his contemporaries, he published a seminal article in 1905 entitled Le Marronnage et le vaudou [Runaway Slaves and Vodûn], which affirms and celebrates the role of the folk religion under the colonial regime in inspiring resistance to slavery and the struggle for national independence.

Lhérisson’s two short novels have become classics and have often been reprinted in Haiti and even abroad. As Pradel Pompilus pointed out:

Haitians are attracted to Pitite-Caille and to Zoune because they find in them the true expression of their national identity, and foreigners by the evocation of a landscape and society profoundly different from their own.

LÉON-FRANÇOIS HOFFMANN

Biography

Born in Port-au-Prince, Haiti in 1873. He studied at Lycée Pétion, the country’s top public secondary school, where he later taught the history and geography of Haiti. After obtaining his law degree, while only twenty years old, he founded in 1893 a literary and humoristic review, La Jeune Haïti [Young Haiti], to which he contributed poems, as he did to the famous La Ronde [The Circle]. Founder and editor, until his death, of an important daily newspaper, Le Soir. Became famous for the articles, filled with double entendres, in which he subtly criticized and satirized the government, and for his penetrating literary criticism. Published two undistinguished collections of poetry in the Parnassian mode, and wrote the words to La Dessalinienne (music by Nicolas Geffrard) which was adopted in 1903 as Haiti’s national anthem. Died in 1907, while composing a sequel to his 1906 novel Zoune chez sa ninnaine.

Selected Works

Poetry

Myrtha, poème érotique, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie Haïtienne, 1892
Les Champs de l’aurore; primes rimes, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie de la Jeunesse, 1893
Passe-temps; poésies, Tours: Imprimerie Deslis Frères, 1893
Novels

La Famille des Pitite-Caille, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie Auguste A. Héraux, 1905

Other Writings

Manuel d’histoire a l’usage des écoles de la république, in collaboration with Wilson Bellegarde, Port-au-Prince: n. p., 1907

Further Reading

Pompilus, Pradel, “Permanance de Justin Lhérisson,” Conjonction, Port-au-Prince, 143 (May 1979)

Roméus, Wilhem, “En lisant Justin Lhérisson,” Le Nouvelliste, Port-au-Prince (23 and 27–28 August 1977) [Stresses the subversive dimensions of Lhérisson’s writings]

Libraries

Major Research Collections

The largest Latin American research collections are, of course, in the United States. The Library of Congress, in Washington, DC, is estimated to contain around a million titles relevant to Latin America and the Caribbean, over 60,000 of them in the fields of languages and literature. The Library’s Hispanic Division also maintains the Archive of Hispanic Literature on Tape (see below). Also in Washington is the Columbus Memorial Library of the Organization of American States, with approximately 300,000 monograph titles in all, 25,000 of them in languages and literature.

The New York Public Library was recorded in 1991 as having over 36,000 titles classified as Latin American literature, followed closely by the University of California, Los Angeles, with over 33,000, and the University of Wisconsin (Madison), with over 29,000, whilst the Nettie Lee Benson Collection at the University of Texas (Austin), the largest collection in total of Latin American titles after the Library of Congress, reported over 25,000. Other specialist Latin American collections with strong holdings in literature are at the Universities of Indiana and New Mexico, with over 24,000 each, the University of North Carolina (Chapel Hill), the Widener Library at Harvard University, the University of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania State University and the University of Illinois.

Partly as a consequence of cooperative acquisitions policies such as the Farmington Plan (1948–73) and the Latin American Cooperative Acquisitions Program (LACAP) (1961–73), many of these libraries have particular regional strengths; Florida and Miami, for instance, in Caribbean materials, Tulane in Central America, Cornell in the countries of the Southern Cone, Texas in Mexico. The Library of Congress, Columbia, New York University and Wisconsin have good coverage of Brazil, whilst the Morland-Spingarn Research Center Library at Howard University, in Washington, DC, has strong holdings of Haitian, African-Cuban, and African-Brazilian publications. Chicano material is collected by San José State University, and Mexican pulp literature at the University of Minnesota. The University of New Mexico (Albuquerque) collects Brazilian “literatura de cordel” and small press publications (largely little magazines, alternative press and avant-garde material). Latin American drama is well represented at the University of Kansas, whilst the Ruth S.Lamb Collection of Latin American Imprints (predominantly theater and drama) is housed in the Ella Strong Denison Library at Scripps College, Claremont, California, and the Frank Melville Memorial Library of the University of New York at Stony Brook contains the Amunátegui Collection of [Chilean and Latin American] Theatre Pamphlets. For contemporary Latin American literature (but especially Modernismo), the major resource (after the Library of Congress) is the New York Public Library. The University of Illinois maintains a major specialist collection of works by and about Gabriel García Marquez and the University of Virginia (Charlottesville) has a Jorge Luis Borges collection. A descriptive catalogue of this collection was published in 1993. The Library of Caribbean Research of the Research Institute for the Study of Man (New York) collects systematically in the area of English-speaking Caribbean literature.

Incunabula and early materials are held at Harvard University Library, the John Carter Brown Library of Brown University, the Lilly Library at the University of Indiana, the Newberry Library, Chicago, and Yale University Library. The Godoy Collection of Paraguayan Letters is at the University of California, Riverside, and the José Toribio Medina Collection is at the University of Connecticut. Finally, Princeton University Library possesses an outstanding collection of modern literary manuscripts and correspondence, including major collections of the papers of Reinaldo Arenas, Miguel Ángel Asturias, Guillermo Cabrera Infante, José Donoso, Jorge Edwards, Mario Vargas Llosa and others.

As far as European libraries are concerned, the available statistics are much less informative; they cover total holdings, but do not distinguish specific subject areas. However, a survey of European collections published in 1978 identified the Iberoamerikanisches Institut Stiftung Preussischer Kulturbesitz in Berlin as the largest European collection of Latin Americana, with an estimated total of 470,000 books and 2,700 periodicals, followed by the library of the Centro Iberoamericano de Cooperacion in Madrid, with approximately 450,000 books and over 7,000 serials. In 1987 a survey of the British Union Catalogue of Latin Americana (BUCLA), which, unfortunately, contains relatively little information about holdings acquired before 1965, indicated, nevertheless, that the largest British collections were to be found at the University of Oxford (in the Bodleian Library, together with the Taylor Institution Library, which specialises in languages and literatures, and the Library of the Modern Languages Faculty), the British Library, the Albert Sloman Library at the University of Essex, the University of London Library, and the Library of the Hispanic and Luso-Brazilian Councils, at Canning House, London. In France the largest Latin American holdings were to be found in the Institut des Hautes Études de l’Amérique Latine, Paris, and in Italy at the Istituto Italo-Latinoamericano, Rome.
Though most of these collections will have continued to grow in the last fifteen years, it seems unlikely that their relative rankings will have changed very much. However, libraries vary in their collecting patterns, and the largest collections in terms of total numbers of volumes or titles may not always have the richest holdings in the field of literature. Nevertheless, it is safe to say that in the UK the most important collections of incunabula and early material as well as modern publications are held in the British Library and the Bodleian Library, Oxford. Good collections of modern Latin American literature are also to be found at the Taylorian Institution (University of Oxford), the University of London Library, King’s College, London, University College, London, and the John Rylands University Library of Manchester.

There are few general guides to noteworthy holdings in Latin American and Caribbean libraries. However, the Biblioteca Julio Jiménez Rueda in Mexico City, which supports the Centro de Estudios Literarios of the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM), is reported to have complete sets of the publishers’ series Letras Mexicanas (Fondo de Cultura Económica), Escritores Mexicanos (Porrúa) and Ficción (Universidad Veracruzana). In Rio de Janeiro, important literary collections exist in the Biblioteca Plínio Doyle, which is a research division of the Casa Fundação Rui Barbosa, and the Oficina Literário Afrânio Coutinho. The Instituto de Estudos Brasileiros of the Universidad de São Paulo houses Mário de Andrade’s library, whilst the libraries and archives of Sérgio Buarque de Hollanda and Oswald de Andrade have been deposited at the Universidade Estadual de São Paulo, Campinas.

The prime collection in the English-speaking Caribbean is probably the West Indies Collection in the Library of the University of the West Indies, Mona, Jamaica, which has a collection of literary manuscripts, notably those of Roger Mais. Jamaica is also the home of the other major collection of English-language Caribbeana, the West India Reference Library in Kingston.

Audio-Visual Materials
The outstanding collection in this area is the Archive of Hispanic Literature on Tape, which is part of the Hispanic Division of the Library of Congress (see above), and since its inception in 1943 has recorded readings by over 600 Latin American and Caribbean literary figures. Despite its title, “languages include Spanish Catalan, Portuguese, French, Zapotec, Náhuatl, Quechua, and...English.” Reproduction tapes for non-commercial use can be supplied.

A number of commercial audio and videotapes featuring Latin American writers reading from their own works, as well as dramatizations of novels or productions of works by Latin American playwrights have been produced by various organizations, and these are available in many research libraries. The University of Virginia, for instance, has a notable collection of videotapes, including many Latin American feature films. The Instituto Cervantes (New York) has a collection of Spanish-language films, including over 350 Latin American titles.

In the UK, the Library of the Institute of Latin American Studies of the University of London houses the Nissa Torrents Video Collection, which includes Latin American feature films as well as documentaries about writers and their work. The National Sound Archive of the British Library has acquired Latin American literary recordings produced in Mexico and Argentina, and NSA staff have also themselves recorded readings by contemporary Latin American writers.

The Museu da Imagem e Som in Rio de Janeiro has recordings of readings by a number of Brazilian authors; a selective discography was published in 1977.

Library Catalogues

Most major libraries now provide a digitized online catalogue accessible via the Internet (see also Information Technology, below), but with certain limitations. To date (1996) few libraries have converted all their catalogue records to be available online; in particular, older acquisitions and special collections acquired before the late 1970s or early 1980s, when most online catalogues were initiated, are often recorded only in onsite card catalogues. The card catalogues of a number of major libraries were, however, published in printed format in the 1960s and 1970s; these included the Library of the Hispanic and Luso-Brazilian Councils at Canning House, London, the Nettie Lee Benson Collection at the University of Texas, the Institute of Jamaica West India Collection, the Ticknor Collection at Boston Public Library, the Oliveira Lima Library of the Catholic University of America, the Library of the Hispanic Society of America, the shelflist of the Latin American literature collection in the Widener Library at Harvard, and the Latin American and Caribbean collections at the Universities of Miami (Coral Gables) and Florida. These catalogues are usually available at other major research libraries in the US and the UK, and they provide a useful supplement to online catalogues in cases where the catalogue records of older holdings have not yet been digitized. Although digitization is leading to increasing standardization of classification systems for the arrangement of collections, some libraries, particularly in the UK, still make use of sometimes rather idiosyncratic locally-devised systems.

Inter-Library Loan/Document Delivery

Most libraries participate in a scheme which allows them to borrow from another library material which they do not already hold but which is required by one of their patrons. The conditions covering these schemes vary from country to country, but usually operate at an international as well as at a national level. Document delivery is usually defined as the provision of the content of a text (usually, but not always, a periodical article) in electronic format, via the Internet. (See Information Technology, below.)

Union Catalogues

These record the holdings of several libraries, and are particularly useful to locate unusual or rare items. Some are on-line databases, such as OCLC (Online Computer Library Center), RLIN (Research Libraries Information Network), and CURL (Consortium of University and Research Libraries) (see Information Technology, below). The National Union Catalog produced by the Library of Congress, and published in 753 volumes from 1967 to 1980 (and with regular supplements in print, and latterly in microform) contains locations for most research libraries in the US. It is widely available in other major libraries in both the US and UK. The British Union Catalogue of Latin Americana, a card catalogue, was maintained from 1966 to 1988 by the Institute of Latin American Studies of the University of London. It contains entries for some, though by no means all, of the holdings of most of the UK libraries which collected Latin American material during that period; some of these libraries, but again not all, also submitted retrospective information.

PAT NOBLE

Further Reading

Bray, David B. and Richard E. Greenleaf, with the assistance of Bruce D. Tobias, Directory of Latin American Studies in the United States, New Orleans, Louisiana: Tulane University, Roger Thayer Stone Center for Latin American Studies, 1986

Harvard University Library, Latin American literature: Classification schedule, classified lists by callmarks, author and title lists, chronological listing (Widener Library shelflist, 21), Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1969

— Resources for Brazilian Studies at the Bibliothèque Nationale, Austin, Texas: Jackson, 1980

Mesa Lago, Carmelo, Latin American Studies in Europe, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: University of Pittsburgh Center for Latin American Studies, 1979(?)

Siefer, Elisabeth, Estudios recientes sobre America Latina: institutos y bibliotecas en la República Federal de Alemania y Berlin Occidental, Hamburg: ADLAf, 1971

Souza, Sebastião de, Discografía da literatura brasileira, Rio de Janeiro: Cátedra, 1977
Information Technology

Information technology may be defined as the use of computer technology for the organization, analysis and dissemination of information and data. As such, its application to the humanities is recent, and it has not yet been adopted as widely as in the sciences. However the growth of the worldwide communications network known as the Internet, which now links the computer systems of most large organizations, and allows an unprecedented degree of immediate and flexible access to important sources of information, especially the catalogues of major research libraries, is already transforming it into an indispensable new tool and means of communication for the serious scholar in any discipline.

It is becoming easier and easier to access the system; virtually all major research institutions and major corporations are linked up, whilst many cities, in the US particularly, have set up local networks, or “freenets.” Increasingly, public libraries provide computer facilities with network access, and “cybercafes” offering public access terminals on a commercial basis at hourly rates have been set up in both the US and the UK. The pace of change in this field has in all respects been very rapid, and new facilities and resources seem to appear almost daily; the following is a necessarily brief summary of the situation as it appeared at the time of writing (1996).

The applications of information technology to research method may be said to fall into three major categories: those which can be carried out on an independent personal computer or word processor; those which require a personal computer equipped with a CD-Rom drive; and finally those which are dependent on a link to the worldwide computer network known as the Internet, or to one of the national, regional, or commercial networks which provide a “gateway” to the Internet itself.

The first category, which comprises the production of text (word processing), and of bibliographies and catalogues, together with the analysis of text (e.g. word counts, indexing, etc.), is becoming commonplace, and needs no elaboration. Familiarity with the second category, the use of CD-Roms, particularly as vehicles for reference tools such as encyclopedias and cumulative indexes, is not yet as widespread, although the number of multimedia products now on sale to the public is growing fast. For research purposes, CD-Roms offer many of the benefits of online databases, such as keyword searching and the printing out of information, at lower cost than is incurred by direct access through commercial host services, though with some loss of currency. Major databases such as the MLA Bibliography and Scholarly Book Reviews, and the catalogues of some libraries (for instance, the British Library and the French Bibliothèque Nationale, and a number of...
Mexican research libraries) are published on CD-Rom as well as in hard copy or as an online service, and are increasingly acquired by many institutions in preference to the printed format. At the time of writing (1995), the number of CD-Roms exclusively devoted to Latin American studies is small, but Latin American Studies includes the catalogue of the Nettie Lee Benson Collection at the University of Texas, the Hispanic American Periodicals Index, and the Handbook of Latin American Studies (HLAS) from volume 50 onwards, whilst Biblioteca sin fronteras contains the holdings on Latin America of a number of Spanish libraries.

The third category, however, comprising direct interactive access through the computer networks to library catalogues, text archives, and other informational databases, together with fast and efficient communication either within a group or person-to-person (electronic mail), is still unfamiliar to many people outside academic communities, although these facilities are already easily available even from a home computer for the price of a local phone call, plus at most a small monthly subscription.

The basic requirement for access to online databases is connection to a computer network (either a local one or the Internet itself), and this is achieved via a mainframe computer operated by a service provider, which may be either a large institution such as a university, a local public network (a freenet), or a nationwide commercial organization such as Compuserve or CIX. An individual user can connect to the service provider either through a terminal linked directly to a mainframe computer via an internal network (such as are provided in most research libraries), or through a personal or laptop computer, which may be located anywhere provided it is linked to a mainframe through the telephone or optical fibre cable network by means of a device known as a modem.

Since the whole of this technology is still at a relatively early stage of development, methods of connection to the Internet can vary considerably from institution to institution. Various projects are under way, however, aimed at establishing an industry standard, and it is to be hoped that by the beginning of the 21st century this will have been achieved.

Information Resources Available

The most important of these resources are the catalogues of major research libraries, most of which are available for consultation online (though an important caveat needs to be entered here—at the time of writing many libraries, particularly in the UK, have in their online computerized catalogues records only for material acquired since the installation of the system; earlier material is often recorded only in their traditional onsite card catalogues [see also the section on Libraries]). Most major research libraries also contribute information to shared databases which act as union catalogues allowing for the location of rare or unusual items; important examples of these are RLIN (Research Libraries Information Network), OCLC (Online Computer Library Center), and CURL (Consortium of University and Research Libraries); a Europewide bibliographical database, CERL, is also projected. Many libraries offer facilities for patrons to conduct their own searches of these union catalogues as well as of the online catalogues of other libraries.

There are a number of general online indexes to periodical literature, of which the most important are UnCover, which is part of the database produced by CARL (Colorado Alliance of Research Libraries), FirstSearch (an OCLC service) and BIDS (Bath Information and Data Services) which includes the Arts and Humanities Citation Index. UnCover may be accessed directly by individuals via the Internet, but FirstSearch is a subscription service available in libraries, whilst BIDS is a service funded by the British Higher Education Funding Councils for the benefit of members of British research institutions, and requires a password. The Hispanic American Periodicals Index offers an online service to subscribers, and the MLA Bibliography, Arts and Humanities Search, and Dissertation Abstracts On-Line may be searched through commercial database hosts such as DIALOG.

Also available online are full text versions of many newspapers, periodicals, journals, often including graphics and sound. There are also several projects, amongst them the Gutenberg Project and the Oxford Text Archive, to create text archives of monograph material, in effect libraries in digitized form. The Gutenberg Project has the stated aim of creating an archive of one million texts by the year 2000, and in early 1995 the Library of Congress met with directors of libraries belonging to the Association of Research Libraries, to discuss the creation of a National Digital Library, with the aim of converting important collections to digital formats.

Digitized texts are one way of preserving the contents of publications in poor physical condition, but they also have certain other advantages over printed copies, in that they allow for keyword searching and programmed textual analysis. They may be published in CD-Rom format, or archived in computers accessible online, or both. Texts stored on one computer can be transmitted to another via a service known as FTP (file transfer protocol), usually in a compressed format, which may be read with the aid of special, freely available software. However, a new project, Alex, initiated in July 1994, aims not only to index the texts offered by the Gutenberg Project and a number of other text archives, but allows for fulltext retrieval as well. Systems like this, which provide electronic document delivery, supplement traditional inter-library loan services, and may eventually replace them.

At present, most of the texts available in this way have been transcribed from printed originals now out of copyright, or in poor condition, but it seems likely that as time passes more and more periodicals, particularly academic journals, and perhaps also experimental writing for which only restricted circulation is anticipated, will be published and distributed principally by electronic means. Increasing interest in this format is being expressed by commercial publishers; however, questions of copyright and text integrity will need to be resolved before real growth in this area can take place.

A common criticism of the resources available on the Internet is that of information overload, “drinking from a firehose” as it has been described, and discrimination needs to be exercised as much in this as in any other medium. Various projects are now being developed to provide organized access and structured indexes. The most widely available at the moment are “gophers,” which are essentially indexes arranged in hierarchical menus, but also offer keyword searching of all the Internet resources listed, by means of such specialist finding tools such as Archie, Veronica and Jughead, as well as providing direct connection to other databases. Many also have provision for files of information to be downloaded into an enquirer’s electronic mail account.

A recent development is the World Wide Web (WWW), which allows graphics, speech and music, as well as text to be stored and retrieved into a personal computer equipped with the appropriate software. The Library of the University of Texas WWW server, for example, can display and transmit maps, documents and pictures of artifacts from its collections. Text displayed in the World Wide Web format also contains highlighted words which provide direct links to other relevant documents and information sources.

The Web allows all sorts of individuals and organizations to set up their own “homepages” for online reference, and a recent development is the appearance of online versions of booksellers’ and publishers’ catalogues. Early 1995 saw the creation of an electronic clearinghouse, the Internet Bookshop, which allows users of the World Wide Web system to look up books in print, browse the file by subject, and obtain a list of booksellers and publishers able to supply whatever title is selected.

Among the most useful online resources for Latin American studies are:

1. Library catalogues: the catalogues of the major research libraries in the United States (see the essay on Major Research Collections), especially MELVYL, the catalogue of the libraries of the University of California (and one of the easiest to use) together with the Library of Congress database, LOCIS, and the catalogue of the Library of the University of Texas at Austin which contains the holdings of the Nettie Lee Benson Collection.

2. Indexes and databases: Handbook of Latin American Studies (available as part of LOCIS); MLA (via DIALOG (also on CD-Rom), available in many libraries, subscription only); HAPI, Hispanic American Periodicals Index (online directly at UCLA, by subscription only, or on CD-Rom as part of Latin American Studies); UnCover (available via CARL).

3. Electronic journals: most literary electronic journals carry material of the “little magazine” type, and none of these have any Latin American relevance at present, but one of the longest established, Postmodern Culture, occasionally publishes material on Latin American or Caribbean modern writers; it is indexed in the MLA Bibliography.

Electronic Mail

The fact that Electronic mail (also known as e-mail) is now extensively used by individual scholars and universities, has resulted in the electronic mailing list. An e-mail list operates by means of a master list of subscribers which is held on a computer; a copy of any individual message sent to the list is forwarded by the host computer to all members simultaneously. Each mailing list has a specific focus. Some mailing lists have thousands of subscribers worldwide, others may be confined to the members of one institution or even department. Lists allow informal discussion of topics of common interest to take place over different time zones, and can also be very valuable for posting enquiries, as well as for the rapid dissemination of information, project reports, conference announcements, etc., Catalogues and indexes of lists are available from various sources, both printed and online. There are a wide range of lists specific to individual countries of Latin America, and at present two general lists without restrictions on membership: LASNET, based at the University of Texas, and LATAM-INFO, part of the British Networked Information Services Project (NISP).

USENET “newsgroups” are similar to mailing lists in that they allow multilateral communication via electronic mail, but differ in that messages are not sent directly to individual subscribers, but are posted in sequence on a common database where they can be read via any computer equipped with the appropriate software. Newsgroups are divided into sub-groups, or “hierarchies”; there are several in the sub-group SOC which focus on Latin American topics or countries. Many library catalogue gophers provide access to these newsgroups, as do commercial suppliers of Internet access.

PAT NOBLE

Further Reading

New guides to online resources on the Internet and to the various search tools are appearing almost daily, but one of the earliest, and still one of the most useful, is:

Also recommended:

Okerson, Ann (editor), Directory of Electronic Journals, Newsletters, and Academic Discussion Lists, 4th edition, Washington, DC: Association of Research Libraries, 1994 [The printed version of an online directory which is regularly updated, and is available on many gophers, including BUBL]

Technology, the Environment and Social Change: Papers of the Thirty-Eighth Annual Meeting of the Seminar on the Acquisition of Latin American Library Materials...Guadalajara...1993, Albuquerque, New Mexico: SALALM Secretariat, 1995 [Contains a number of papers on information technology and its implications for Latin America and Latin American studies, including papers and resource lists by Molly Molloy]

Especially for Latin Americanists based in the UK:

Up-to-date texts of many guides to the Internet which have been published in printed form are often available on the Internet itself, through gophers, and may be downloaded by FTP or e-mail; BUBL is also a very useful source of general information about the latest proposals, technical developments, and new information services.

Most broadsheet newspapers and serious journals publish regular columns or sections on information technology, and these are excellent sources of information for the most recent developments, while College & Research Library News has a regular feature, Internet News, which offers valuable tips on new research resources. There are also a number of commercial journals catering for nonacademic users of the Internet.
Enrique Lihn 1929–1988

Chilean poet and prose writer

Enrique Lihn’s literary works began to appear in the late 1940s and acquired prominence during the 1960s. Although his poetry stands out above the rest of his work, his artistic activity is multifaceted. Lihn dedicated himself to other written genres as well (narrative, drama, essay) and he used visual media and both fine and applied arts (drawing, handcrafting of books, publicity).

His interest in different modes of communication and in diverse languages is a characteristic he shares with various Spanish American poets of his generation. Other predominant characteristics are the presence of “intertextualities” (the insertion into his texts of cultural references or the work of other authors), as in the poem “Apología y condenación de Las Ramblas” [Apology and Condemnation of Las Ramblas]: “Levantando el brazo inducido por una descarga eléctrica, habló / ¿Padre por qué me has abandonado? (Lifting his arm induced by an electric charge, he spoke: Father why have you abandoned me?); the “conversational” language (in which the pragmatic function takes priority and codes common to those used in everyday life are used), as, for example, in the poem “Noche de paz” [Silent Night] from Al bello aparecer de este lucero, 1983 [To the Beautiful Appearance of this Bright Star]: “No soy tu Papá Noel ni estás posando junto a mi / para la eternidad de una postal en familia / ni estamos menos separados que los vivos de los muertos.” (I am not your Santa Claus nor are you posing at my side / for the eternity of a family postcard / nor are we less distant than the living from the dead); the constant variation of a limited number of themes (for example in the poems “El insomnio” [Insomnia] and “Carne del insomnio” [Flesh of Insomnia], or in “Barca de los convalescentes” [Ship of Convalescents] and “Hospital de Barcelona” [Barcelona Hospital]); and the reduction of the space between the non-specialized reader and poetry.

The artistic, structural and stylistic operations that Lihn performs reduce the prestige and the redeeming function of poetry, desacralizing it. Colloquial language and that of mass media communication play an important role in establishing a precise context for communication, an experience common to both the poet and the reader. An example of this is an experiment carried out during the 1950s by Lihn, Nicanor Parra and other writers, called Quebrantahuesos [Osprey], a satirical collective news board crafted out of clippings taken from a variety of journalistic materials. Another facet of this was a “Spectacle-Discourse” (whose text was published later with illustrations and photographs) performed by Lihn in December of 1977. Before the eyes of the spectators, the writer went through a process of transformation into the farcical fictional character Gerardo de Pompier. In the years of the military dictatorship that had deposed president Salvador Allende, Lihn drew upon both experiences in order to create and read poems from his collection El Paseo Ahumada, 1983 [The Ahumada Promenade], in public, on one of the most central commercial streets of Santiago. In the texts, “The Penguin”—a beggar who plays a drum—recites a discourse containing various intermingled speakers who deplore the economic situation of the unemployed reduced to selling odds and ends among the luxurious stores that the government had helps build in order to promote an image of false national prosperity. The voices say “Su ayuda es mi sueldo…/ Su calculadora en mi mano a la que le falta un dedo con el que me preveo de los errores del cálculo…/ Su aparición en el Paseo Ahumada es mi estreno en sociedad…/ Su dos más dos son cuatro es mi dos menos dos.” (Your help is my salary…/ Your calculator is my hand missing a finger that I use to prevent miscalculations…/ Your appearance in the Promenade Ahumada is my debut in society …/ Your two plus two is my two minus two).

Throughout Lihn’s work there is a constant ironic and corrosive tone that immediately grabs one’s attention. The speaker of his poems assumes, for a few instants, the optimistic and hopeful attitudes that have traditionally found a place in the lyric genre, in order to take them to the point of absurdity later. Lihn affirmed, in a preface opening his collection La musiquilla de las pobres esferas, 1969 [A Little Music from the Lower Spheres], that he wrote “poetry against poetry; a poetry, as Huidobro would have said, ‘skeptical of itself’.”

As is the case with other Spanish American poets of his generation (Ernesto Cardenal, Juan Gelman, José Emilio Pacheco, Antonio Cisneros), Lihn creates irony by drawing upon contrasts, for example in “La guitarrista más hermosa del mundo” [The Most Beautiful Guitarist in the World]: “La guitarrista más hermosa del mundo / toca en E 50 St. y 5 Ave. por unos centavos que recoge / en el cajón de su guitarra, forrado de púrpura por dentro / como un cardenal asesinado” (The most beautiful guitarist in the world / plays on East 50th St and 5th Ave for a few pennies she gathers / in her guitar case, lined with purple / like an assassinated cardinal). The presence of an unforeseen twist in an everyday experience jars the reader into accepting a dialogue. Among his recurrent themes one finds temporality (old age, deterioration, sickness and death); writing (“Porque escribí” [Because I Wrote], “Si se ha de escribir correctamente poesía” [If You Are Going to Write Poetry Correctly…]; love; painting (“Woman Bathing in a Shallow Tub,” “Kandinsky 1904,” “Catedral de Monet” [Monet’s Cathedral]); and travelling—as can be observed in the titles of his books Escrito en Cuba, 1969 [Written in Cuba], Paris, situación irregular, 1977 [Paris, an Unusual Situation], A partir de Manhattan, 1979 [As from Manhattan].

According to Lihn, the poet is a conscious producer of his craft. His work consists of manipulating language. Lihn’s poetry uses biographical elements and a language of colloquial expressions and structures. Personal expression is thus made into that of a public person. He has said that his poetic speaker “writes, inscribing himself” in a “situation.” The “situation” of Lihn’s poetic subject is the context of Spanish America, which Lihn understands as that of a mimetic culture that follows European models with disastrous results. Lihn’s poetry seeks to make evident the lack of unity in a reality that depends upon Europe and the United States. “Situated poetry,” as Lihn preferred to call it, is also an answer to the problem of how to bring poetry closer to the non-specialized reader and how to create an intersection between the circumstances of everyday life (presented as continuous) and critical reflection (atemporal). The irony of his poems undermines the traditional distances established between the individual, his circumstances and the optimistic discourses that explain these circumstances, justify them or give them some meaning. Thus the individual’s attention is deflected from the tensions and confrontations of life experiences.

Lihn’s critics see “La pieza oscura” [The Dark Room], the title poem of his third collection, 1963, as the moment in which Lihn effectively explores the role of memory.
The text is centered on the perturbing discovery of sexuality experienced by a group of children playing in the dark. In the volume Conversaciones con Enrique Lihn, edited by Pedro Lastra, Lihn says that the verses of “La pieza oscura” point toward a moment that involves “the readiness of a child to became an adult before this occurs and with this begins a process of constant degradation. I believe that these poems [of the collection La pieza oscura] presuppose a sort of negative philosophy of existence that conceives life as that process: time is the irreversible illness whose conclusion is death.”

Lihn’s novels and short stories have a strong experimental style. His characters are presences that become absurd and ironic, to the point that language comes forth as the protagonist. The title of his first novel is a good example: Batman en Chile; o, El ocaso de un ídolo; o, Solo contra el desierto rojo, 1973 [Batman in Chile, or the Fall of an Idol, or Alone against the Red Desert]. In his second novel: La orquesta de cristal, 1976 [The Crystal Orchestra], a millionaire orders the composition of a symphony and the fabrication of crystal instruments for an entire orchestra that was to appear in public in the Paris of 1900. The story is the chronicle of the orchestra’s fate from its origin to its destruction by the Nazi occupation in 1942. The chronicle ends and is destroyed on that date, nevertheless it had been quoted “a priori” by the characters since 1900. El arte de la palabra, 1980 [The Art of the Word], takes place in the imaginary Republic of Miranda, and its revolves around entanglements involving a congress of writers.

In 1988, Enrique Lihn was hospitalized with incurable cancer. Given only a few months to live, Lihn continued to write until his last moments of lucidity, reworking his themes and maintaining in his writing the same critical attitude characteristic of his “negative philosophy of existence.” The poems of his Diario de muerte [Diary of Death] were compiled and edited by Adriana Valdés and Pedro Lastra, his close friends and collaborators.

Luis Rebaza-Soraluz

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry

Nada se escurre, Santiago de Chile: Colección Orfeo, 1949
Poeas de este tiempo y de otro, Santiago de Chile: Ediciones Renovación, 1955
Poesía de paso, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1966
Escrito en Cuba, Mexico City: Era, 1969
La musiquilla de las pobres esferas, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1969
Por fuerza mayor, Barcelona: Ocnos-Editorial Llibres de Sinera, 1975
Paris, situación irregular, Santiago de Chile: Aconcagua, 1977
A partir de Manhattan, Santiago de Chile: Ganymedes, 1979
El Paseo Ahumada, Santiago de Chile: Ediciones Minga, 1983
Al bello aparecer de este lucero, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1983
Pena de extrañamiento, Santiago de Chile: Sinfronteras, 1986
Diario de muerte, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1989

Short Fiction
Agua de arroz, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1968
La república independiente de Miranda, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1989

Novels
Batman en Chile; o, El ocaso de un ídolo; o, Solo contra el desierto rojo, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1973
La orquesta de cristal, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1976
El arte de la palabra, Barcelona: Pomaire, 1980

Compilations and Anthologies
Algunos poemas, Barcelona: Ocnos-Editorial Llibres de Sinera, 1972 [Consists of an anthology of the first four books together with the collection Album de toda especie de poemas]

Translations
This Endless Malice; 25 Poems, translated by Serge Echeverría and William Witherup, Northwood Narrows, New Hampshire: Lillabulero Press, 1969 [Contains La pieza oscura and Poesía de paso]
If Poetry is to be Written Right; Poems, translated by Dave Oliphant, Texas City: Texas Portfolio Press, 1977

Further Reading
Cánovas, Rodrigo, Texto y censura: las novelas de Enrique Lihn, Santiago de Chile: CENECA, 1986
Goic, Cedomil, “Enrique Lihn: La pieza oscura. 1955–1966,” Anales de la Universidad de Chile 12,8 (September-December 1963)
Ibáñez Langlois, José Miguel, Poesía chilena e hispanoamericana actual, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1975
Lastra, Pedro (editor), Conversaciones con Enrique Lihn, Santiago de Chile: Atelier, 1990
Libertella, Hector, Nueva escritura en Latinoamérica, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1977
Peña, Juan Andrés, Conversaciones con la poesía chilena, Santiago de Chile: Pehuén, 1990 [Chapter 4 is an interview with Lihn]

Special Issues of Journals
Review 23 (1978)

Baldomero Lillo 1867–1923

Chilean prose writer

Naturalism was a literary extension of European thought and philosophy of the late 19th century transferred to Latin America, especially through the novels of Zola. Under the influence of thinkers like Auguste Comte, Herbert Spencer, Saint-Simon and Jeremy Bentham, Positivism and Utilitarianism, coming in the wake of the Industrial Revolution in Europe, were supposed to raise the level of life for the working classes and help them to escape the stranglehold of the Catholic Church. The new ideas, coupled with the social sciences, the growing industrial wealth in the hands of the magnates, supported by the progressive young científicos (technocrats), were to provide the greatest possible happiness for the greatest number of people. This was particularly true of Chile whose rich mines and natural resources attracted a huge proletariat from all over the world. Positivist Chilean thinkers like Francisco Bilbao and José Victorino Lastarria propagated new doctrines readily received by the people. However, the Utopias and the New Jerusalems were not to be within the grasp of the masses. The “progress and order” message of the new thinkers produced a state of affairs that militated against the poor, but gained profit for a few industrialists, while the masses toiled in factories and mines. Such grievous injustices provoked new ideas on the rights of man, fraternity, solidarity, and produced a useful source of literary raw material for Baldomero Lillo.

At the beginning of the 20th century, Lillo gained a deserved reputation as a writer who devoted his life and his literature to the miners working in inhuman conditions below ground. Though not read much today, his mining stories of Sub terra (1904) created the image of Lillo as a comprometido (or engaged) writer whose stories, steeped in the bleakest Naturalism, followed the Zolaesque tradition in their description of the conditions of the workers exploited by the capitalist system. Through their portraits of a downtrodden people, these stories provided the enemies of capitalism with a great deal of material to wage a propaganda war and situated Lillo the humanitarian in the ranks of the socialists and other radical groups who struggled to overthrow the government and the forces of reaction.

Because Sub terra was written when Lillo himself was working in the mines and shared his fellow-workers’ circumstances, it was a true cry from the heart. Allegedly less concerned with the form of his work than with the experiences he wanted to portray, Lillo produced a series of stories destined to improve the life of his companions. The gruesome details of underground life have been well documented in stories like “La compuerta número 12” [Hatch No. 12] which relates the tragic story of an eight-year-old boy forced to work down the mine by his grief-stricken father who needs the boy’s tiny wage to feed the family’s other children. Tied to the mine-cage so that he cannot escape, the child, crying for his mother, is as much a prisoner of the mining company as his wretched father is dying of tuberculosis but obliged to continue working for fear of losing his job. “El chiflón del diablo” (The Devil’s Pit), another much anthologised story, depicts something of the same hopeless situation when a young miner, having lost his job, accepts a position in the dangerous mine of the title. His poor mother, who has already lost her husband and two sons to the site, is so overcome with grief on receiving news of the accident which kills her last son that she jumps into the pit, a desperate gesture of helplessness. Death by suicide, accident, company indifference and heartlessness, or hunger and neglect; the fate of the miner is always the same. In “El grisú” [Firedamp] it is exploitation, explosion, and gruesome death. In “Los inválidos” [The Disabled] an old miner uses the example of the tied up pit pony, wounded, tired, awaiting death, to show the miners their fate in life. The young husband in “El pago” [Payment] stands in line on pay day, only to be told that he owes money to the company, as his wife and babies wait at home for food.

Depressing as all of these stories are, they are rescued from a totally negative and numbing Naturalism by their pleas for justice. Although Lillo does not spare the reader the horrible details of death, misery and human deprivation, his stories advocate mercy and justice. Beneath the surface of the grim details is the humanitarian voice of the author crying out against the bosses and the system for pity and humanity in the name of the miners, and of all the exploited people of the world. Lillo’s stories seem to beg compassion for individual miners, society and even the human race in the face of life’s evils. The object of his rage extends beyond individual bosses and society’s leaders to providence itself which permits the young and the innocent to suffer and die in the face of existential evil.

The tendency to see Lillo only as an engaged author producing works of social protest and denunciation does a great disservice to Lillo the artist. Critics have underscored the propagandistic elements of Sub terra as a socio-economic document, whilst neglecting the positive elements of his costumbrismo minero and the fine, effective use of natural phenomena which he introduced to highlight the hopelessness of their situation—the beauty of the sun (contrasted with the dark life of the underground mine), a sun which exists for them only in dreams, or as an ironic reminder of a merciless God. Although it may seem at first glance that in this first collection the pathetic and political elements triumph over the aesthetic qualities, Lillo’s work was not yet complete.

In 1907 Lillo published another collection, Sub sole, which promoted him, perhaps unwillingly, from the ranks of the writers of social protest to the level of those who transcend geographical and chronological frontiers. Although there are two mining stories in the second collection, the situation of the underground workers is not the predominant theme. One finds also costumbrist-type stories, others dedicated to marine life, to the portrayal of Indians, humorous stories, and most importantly, some of a symbolic nature.

In Sub sole there are four symbolic stories that might be labelled modernista, but with a difference. Lillo, however, does not belong to the Art for Art’s sake world of his contemporaries, since, according to him, the writer cannot fulfill his artistic duties divorced from the real world of actuality. But there is no doubt that Lillo was influenced by his modernista mentors, although this aspect of Lillo’s work has not generally been treated by experts in the field (Fernando Alegría, Ricardo Latcham, Max Henríquez Ureña), even those devoted to Modernismo in Chile (John M. Fein, Mario Rodríguez Fernández). The modernista aspects of Lillo’s work should not be ignored. In fact, one of the characteristics of this movement in Chile is the co-existence of various currents within the movement, in many cases even in the same writer who produces without emotional or aesthetic conflict a mixture of creole, social and decadent poetry, e.g., Carlos Pezoa Véllez, Pedro Antonio González, Antonio Bórquez Solar. This anomaly was possible in the Chilean movement which could not boast of a single leader or one outstanding modernista writer.

Although Darío published his Azul [Blue] in Chile in 1888, he had no disciples, and there was little interest shown in his work. Perhaps driven too much by just anger in Sub terra, Lillo had little recourse to his artistic spiritual mentors. However, in his new collection, Sub sole, by means of fantasy, imagination, symbolism and allegory, Lillo wrote stories, four philosophical parables in particular, to propagate again his humanitarian ideas under a surface of modernista prose. In these stories, by means of the inevitable princesses, fairies, spirits, kings, colours, jewels and music, one sees revealed the other side of the coin, the artistic Lillo. However, this does not cancel out, rather it confirms, the image of the engaged—but now more subtle—writer.

The first story of the collection, “El rapto del sol” [The Abduction of the Sun] is a parable against the ambition and pride of an all-powerful king, indifferent to the problems of his oppressed people. The word “Humanidad,” which ends the tale, is the key to our interpretation of the story and the link with Sub terra. In spite of its modernista style, language, and imagery, the story highlights the plight of the ordinary man, and removes Lillo from the elitist position of his fellow modernistas. The only solution for the world, according to Lillo, is a rebirth of universal love, when the capitalist grasps the hand of the proletariat. Only when Humanity conquers in the class-struggle will peace triumph in the world. Complementing this story is the significantly titled “El oro” [Gold] in which Lillo chooses the well-worn symbols of the eagle and the sun to draw parallels with the first story. Here again the message is solidarity and brotherly love, although the language and the images are modernista, including a preference for the Rubenian esdrújulo (a word accented on the antepenultimate syllable).

But perhaps the most modernista of these stories from the stylistic point of view is “Las nieves eternas” [The Eternal Snows] which narrates the life of a drop of water, in a perfect cycle from its mountain birth melted by the sun, carried by a hurricane, turned into vapour, then snow and back to its mountain home. Thus Lillo depicts the modernista escape towards light and colour, through formal and thematic characteristics. In reality, however, the drop’s pilgrimage is a symbol of life itself, with all its vicissitudes, a manifestation of the human vices depicted in the two previous stories. The cycle inevitably ends in death—and here this little poem in prose is linked with the Zolaesque determinism of Sub terra. Beneath the lyrical language of “Las nieves eternas” the picture is still the same—a Darwinian vision of the world in which only the fittest survive.

Even more explicit is the theme of “Irredención” [NonRedemption], a title which emphasizes the almost religious sentiments of Lillo towards those who abuse and exploit human life. This story is not only about the punishment of vanity, but also about the destruction of life and the human seed, as in the princess’s nightmare world where flowers are destroyed. The story underscores the value of life—the princess destroys flowers, the mine bosses kill children—for Lillo, an unforgivable sin, from which there is no redemption. In spite of the religious terminology of the story, the most horrible aspect of the crime for Lillo (hardly an orthodox Catholic) was in the human field, and it is this hatred of man’s inhumanity to man which constitutes the basis of his protest both in Sub terra and Sub sole.

Notwithstanding the formal and technical characteristics of these symbolic stories, the philosophical parables which link Lillo to the modernista movement, the message is unchanging. By temperament and artistic vision, Baldomero could not surrender totally to the artificial world of the ivory tower. In both collections, his voice is still raised in protest against selfishness, pride, hatred and greed. To counteract these vices which cause life’s suffering, even a century later, Baldomero Lillo offers us human solidarity and universal love.

JOHN WALKER

See also the entry on Bolivia for further information on mining literature

Biography

Born at port of Lota, Chile, 6 January 1867. Father was employed at the foundry in Lota. Was a sickly child who attended school only irregularly but was avid reader. Started working in a store at an early age and later ran the store at the Buen Retiro mine. This allowed him to observe directly the wretched life of the miners. Married Natividad Miller. Moved to Santiago de Chile in 1898. Won short story contest in 1903. Sub terra appeared in 1904, and made him famous not only in intellectual circles but also among students and workers. Wife died in 1912, after which he took care of their four children. Retired in 1917 to live on his farm at San Bernardo. Died from tuberculosis on 10 September 1923.

Selected Works

Short Fiction

Sub terra: cuadros mineros, Santiago de Chile: Moderna, 1904
Sub sole, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta y Encuadernación Universitaria, 1907
Relatos populares, edited by José Santos González Vera, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1942.
El hallazgo y otros cuentos del mar, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1956
Pesquisa trágica. Cuentos olvidados, Santiago de Chile: Luis Rivano, 1963

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras completas, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1968 [Contains biographical outline by Raul Silva Castro and reviews of Sub terra and Sub sole which appeared in the wake of their publication]

Translations

The Devil’s Pit and Other Stories, translated by Esther S. Dillon and Ángel Flores, Washington, DC: Pan American Union, 1959
Further Reading

The paucity of book-length criticism, and the dates of the few articles dedicated to Lillo, highlight the neglect of his short fiction.
Alegría, Fernando, “Introducción a los cuentos de Baldomero Lillo,” in his Las fronteras del realismo: literatura chilena del siglo XX, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1962.
Latcham, Ricardo, “El naturalismo de Baldomero Lillo,” in his Antología, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1965
Orellana, Carlos (editor), El nuevo cuento realista chileno, Santiago de Chile: Editorial
Universitaria, 1962
Sedgwick, Ruth, “El mensaje social de Baldomero Lillo,” in Memoria del segundo congreso internacional de catedráticos de literatura iberoamericana, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1941
“Baldomero Lillo y Émile Zola,” Revista Iberoamericana, vol. 7/14 (February 1944)
Walker, John, “Baldomero Lillo, ¿Modernista comprometido?,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos, vol. 95/283 (1974)

Lins do Rego, José

See Rego

Clarice Lispector 1920–1977

Brazilian prose writer

Considered one of the major writers in Portuguese, Clarice Lispector fascinates the reader with her unique style. Blending an intuitive, spontaneous writing with an elaborate aesthetic and technique, her entire production provokes with endless questions about the meaning of existence, the profound dimensions of the ego, and the nature of subjectivity, gender and writing. Her versatile legacy includes short stories, novels, journalistic productions and chronicles, translations and children’s literature.

Born in Tchetchelnik, Ukraine, Lispector was two months old when she arrived with her parents in Brazil. The family lived in the northeast and later moved to Rio de Janeiro.
In 1943, she graduated from law school and married a fellow student whose diplomatic career would lead them abroad. They resided in Europe and the United States before returning to Brazil. These migrations inside and outside the country reinforce the awareness of being a foreigner that installs an alternate central or marginal outsider within herself. As Diane E. Marting states in Clarice Lispector: a Bio-Bibliography (1993), the writer’s closeness to diplomatic circles might have been the reason for her reticence to reveal her political opinions, however, it is still unexplained why Lispector resented questions about her age, her accent, her family’s immigration to Brazil and her Judaism (she tried to blend into the Catholic majority rather than to hold on to her roots). Perhaps a hidden Clarice is always confronting the other one while both of them are woven into the more autobiographical narrative voices.

Her first novel, Perto do coração selvagem, 1944 (Near to the Wild Heart), is partly autobiographical and is innovative in terms of the ways language is used and the meaning attributed to linguistic expression. The short stories of Laços de família, 1960 (Family Ties), and A legião estrangeira, 1964 (The Foreign Legion), confirm this trend. Here the author employs a cinematic slow motion, which focuses on close-ups of the characters through stream-of-consciousness, rather than on developing a strong narrative line. A maçã no escuro, 1961 (The Apple in the Dark), Lispector’s longest novel, in which the male protagonist, Martim, realizes that the world is like an apple that cannot be explained, anticipates topics that will be addressed later in her most studied work, A paixão segundo G.H., 1964 (The Passion According to G.H.). In this novel, with affection but in an essayistic tone, the female protagonist, the nameless G.H., sets up a confessional first-person narration that establishes a dialogue with somebody unknown and invisible. When she unexpectedly encounters a cockroach, she understands that in order to achieve the essence of existence beyond conventions, she will have to cannibalize the disgusting creature. The consequent Sartrean nausea is brilliantly described as well as the tension between self and nonself. From the simplicity of an apple up to the rite of sacrifice and purification, Lispector’s fiction displays an intertextuality based on myths and biblical references.

Due to Lispector’s extraordinary exploration of the feminine condition from a Latin American woman’s perspective and voice, she can be aligned with other important female writers, such as the Venezuelan Teresa de la Parra, the Chilean María Luisa Bombal, the Mexican Elena Poniatowska and the Argentine Luisa Valenzuela. Lispector, whose books have been translated into several languages, can also be placed with innovative Brazilian writers such as Waldomiro Autran Dourado and Adonias Filho. Influenced by her readings of Monteiro Lobato, Herman Hesse, Katherine Mansfield, Virginia Woolf, Albert Camus and Jean-Paul Sartre, she creates the characters’ inner world that flows in a river of metaphysical interrogations.

Lispector’s talent is capable of melting silence, words, textures and music into a poetic prose that constitutes a sensual quest for the experience of feeling, thoughts and things rather than for a rational search of an absolute truth. This quest was relevant to the argument advanced by the French feminist Hélène Cixous, who proposed the study of Lispector as an ideal example of l’écriture feminine. In Coming to Writing (1991), Cixous argues that feminine writing goes beyond binarisms that dichotomize emotion and reason, masculine and feminine, conscious and unconscious. To write the body, rejecting divisions of gender, implies a Lyotardean libidinal economy as an exchange between materiality and affection, as a post-modern sensibility: the wor(l)d is fruit, felt, and tasted. Lispector, for whom to live is to write, magically combines flesh, spirituality and a state of mind.

While dying of cancer, Lispector wrote a masterpiece which is also her most socially committed work, A hora da estrela, 1977 (The Hour of the Star). Playing a last mystical ritual, Lispector’s language and writing can succeed over death. A narrative hermaphroditism unites the ugly, marginal and insignificant Macabéa with the male narrator, Rodrigo, S.M. The feminine subjectivity becomes the centre that attacks, through different voices, the patriarchal values of an abusive, cruel society. A film based on this novel and directed by Suzana Amaral received the first prize at the Havana Film Festival in 1986. This is another indication of an escalating interest in Clarice Lispector and a homage to her gifted singularity.

ANDREA YANNUZZI

Biography

Born in Tchetchelnik, Ukraine, 10 December 1925. Family moved to Brazil in 1926 (Lispector was 2 months old) and settled in Recife in 1927. Attended the Ginásio Pernambuco from 1935 to 1936; Colégio Silvio Leite in 1937, and later Colégio Andrews; National Faculty of Law, Rio de Janeiro from 1941 to 1944, received law degree, 1944. Edited and contributed to Agência Nacional and A Noite, while still a student, 1941–44. Married Mauri Gurgel Valente in 1943; two sons. Left Brazil because of her husband’s diplomatic postings and lived in Europe, mainly Naples and Berne until 1952, and in the US from 1952 to 1959. After separating from her husband she returned to Rio de Janeiro in 1959. Awards include: Graça Aranha Foundation Prize, 1944; São Paulo Carmen Dolores Barbosa Prize, 1962; Golfinho de Ouro Prize, 1969.
Died 9 December 1977.

Selected Works

Novels
Perto do coração selvagem, Rio de Janeiro: A Noite, 1944; as Near to the Wild Heart, translated by Giovanni Pontiero, Manchester: Carcanet, and New York: New Directions, 1990
A cidade sitiada, Rio de Janeiro: A Noite, 1948
A maçã no escuro, Rio de Janeiro: Francisco Alves, 1961; as The Apple in the Dark, translated by A paixão segundo G.H., Rio de Janeiro: Editora do Autor, 1964; as The Passion According to G.H., translated by Ronald W.Sousa, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1988 Uma aprendizagem ou o livro dos prazeres, Rio de Janeiro: Sábiá, 1969; as An Apprenticeship, or the Book of Delights, translated by Richard A.Mazzara and Lorri A.Parris, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1986
Água viva, Rio de Janeiro: Editora Artenova, 1973; as The Stream of Life, translated by Elizabeth
Lowe and Earl E.Fitz, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1989
A hora da estrela, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1977; as The Hour of the Star, translated by
Giovanni Pontiero, Manchester: Carcanet, 1986
Um sopro do vida: pulsações, Rio de Janeiro: Nova Fronteira, 1978 [A Breath of Life is the only full-length narrative text published after the author’s death.]

Short Fiction
Alguns contos, Rio de Janeiro: Ministério de Educação e Saúde, Laços de família, Rio de Janeiro:
Francisco Alves, 1960; as Family 1952
Ties, translated by Giovanni Pontiero, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1972
A legião estrangeira, Rio de Janeiro: Editora de Autor, 1964; as The Foreign Legion, translated by Giovanni Pontiero, Manchester: Carcanet, 1986
Onde estivestes de noite, Rio de Janeiro: Artenova, 1974
Further Reading

“Coming to Writing” and Other Essays, edited by Deborah Jenson, translated by Sarah Cornell, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1991

Fitz, Earl E., Clarice Lispector, Boston: Twayne, 1985

Nunes, Benedito, Leitura de Clarice Lispector, São Paulo: Quiron, 1973

Peixoto, Marta, Passionate Fictions: Gender, Narrative and Violence in Clarice Lispector, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1994

Bibliographies
A hora da estrela

Novel by Clarice Lispector

Throughout her work, and particularly in A hora da estrela (1977), Lispector dwells repeatedly on the process whereby the everyday, the linguistically, intellectually and emotionally comprehensible, are set adrift. These elements are stripped of cohesion and abandoned as the disorderly remnants of an old order now rendered unimaginable. In this new reality, the narrative’s focus of attention is the unfolding subjectivity of the main characters, of the world seen through their often uncomprehending eyes. The familiar is abruptly defamiliarized and is subsequently destroyed. The characters, confronted with information they are unable to process, are perceptually impotent, and their condition becomes metonymical of their inadequate intellectual capacity, and even of their existence.

In A Hora da estrela all readerly expectations are challenged from the opening lines, or even prior to that, in the long list of possible alternative titles, some of which challenge the chronology and genre position of the work, depicting it as alternatively fact, pulp fiction, etc. Similarly, assertions concerning the absolute interpretative freedom allegedly bestowed upon the reader are problematized in the very moment of being made, by alternating with proclamations of an omnipotent authorial status as Deus ex machina, itself at once questioned by the visible spectacle of the author/narrator at points losing control over narrative events.

The plot, in so far as any plot can be said to survive Lispector’s refusal of linearity in this as in other works, revolves around the female protagonist, Macabéa. Macabéa shares that common denominator linking all of Lispector’s main characters, namely a dangerous relationship with language, which she variously subverts and violates, but which also threatens to destroy her. Her identity is the product of a figure of speech which is not hers but the narrator’s. The latter is not identified and on at least one occasion appears interchangeable with the equally elusive figure of Olimpico, Macabéa’s boyfriend and assassin. The triangular relationship, indeed, is almost entirely linguistically enacted within a framework of words and word games. In this process, language becomes the instrument whereby each character may or may not acquire definition (and the possibility of survival) by means of the erasure of the other. Thus the male narrator’s writing gradually emerges as the act of murdering Macabéa, and he variously experiences this murder as sin, crime or self-defence against his own existential evanescence.

The narrator and Olimpico’s enduring presence depends on the successful linguistic establishment of a binary structure which will rephrase Macabéa as the absent counterpart to their present, tangible selves. He writes as an act of despair, which is also a sacrificial ritual with Macabéa as the burnt-offering, requiring his atonement (for the sacrifice of her life in exchange for his) by means of a sackcloth-and-ashes penance. Thus, at various points he confesses himself to be both guilty of and remorseful for her death. He fears that in writing about her he will vouchsafe her identity at the price of his own and to avoid this he must relocate her in antithesis to himself, previous to her linguistic or narrative murder. To this purpose, the descriptions of Macabéa as the narrative progresses witness his ever more insistent identification of her with images of evanescence, void and absence. Both the narrator and Olímpico, whether or not they are one and the same person, a point which remains debatable to the end, grow in garrulousness as Macabéa fades into silence. Their speech ever more obsessively affirms its power to save or destroy her, to bestowed upon her a future or to consign her to oblivion.

Macabéa is twice condemned to death by the narrative and its narrator. She is first declared tubercular and on this occasion the narrator, experiencing one of several moments of frightening identification with her, an identification which threatens to carry him into her void, combats the danger by declaring himself in love with her as his other half. This means also his antithesis, the dumping ground for that which in him is vulnerable and whose danger he contains, consigning it to her and demarcating it, and her, as that from which he differs and is distanced. At this moment, when she is narratively condemned, Olímpico experiences her death and silence in conjunction with her. He combats the engulfing fusion by reasserting himself as her demiurge in a creator-creature pairing which grants him the power of imposing upon her a death of his choosing. He must become her murderer rather than allowing her to die of her own volition (illness) because only by becoming her murderer can he also become the inheritor of the life he stole from her.

He reiterates, only immediately to withhold, the power he possesses of awarding her life instead of death, and at that moment Macabéa, “grávida de futuro” (pregnant with a future) is run over by a car and dies. In the moment of her dying the narrator claims his right to resurrection, or possibly immortality, at the price of her death, and acknowledges his role in bringing the latter about. It is at this moment, however, that he paradoxically also acknowledges the universal nature of mortality, including his own death, foreseen in this moment of insight. The novel concludes with a question—will I die, too?—and with an answer—yes—which in a final linguistic sleight of hand appears as the affirmation of the ultimate negation, omnipresent death and omnipresent disappearance.

Lispector’s fiction is peppered with moments of epiphany or revelation. Not, however, the revelation of transcendental or divine meaning, or solutions, but only the conclusion that any meaning attained is likely to be so temporary and dispersed as to relinquish the right to self-definition as meaningfulness. This realization, in works such as A hora da estrela, potentially leads to a temporary or indefinite suspension of sanity, or establishment of madness, and in particular of female madness, as the status quo.

The latter point elicits the question of whether or not it is possible to identify a measure of social and political concern in Lispector’s work. This question is all the more pertinent given her undoubted preferential casting of women and the materially dispossessed as central to the process of subjective fragmentation at the heart of her fiction. There have been successful critical interpretations of her work based on the assumption of a preoccupation with both feminist and class issues and with the problem of disenfranchisement from power in her writing; all these points are clearly central to A hora da estrela. For these reasons, but also, or possibly primarily for her quasi-Wittgensteinian investigation of the limitations of language in structuring understanding, Clarice Lispector continues to be one of the great voices of modernity within and outside Brazil.

MARIA MANUEL LISBOA

Editions
First edition: A hora da estrela, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1977
Translation: The Hour of the Star, by Giovanni Pontiero, Manchester: Carcanet, 1986

Further Reading
Fitz, Earl E., “Points of View in Clarice Lispector’s A hora da estrela” Luso-Brazilian Review, vol. 19/2. (Winter 1982.)
Guidin, Márcia Lígia, A hora da estrela—Clarice Lispector, São Paulo: Ática, 1994

Literacy Campaigns

Brazil
Paulo Freire was born in 1921 in Recife, a port on the northeastern coast of Brazil that has had more than its share of poverty. As a young man, influenced by the Christian Personalist movement, he became passionately committed to the poor and their struggle to better themselves economically and educationally. This distinguished Brazilian educator is best known for his work in developing literacy campaigns in Third World countries such as his native Brazil, Angola, GuineaBissau, Nicaragua, Chile and Tanzania. None the less many of his ideas are applicable to the struggles of ethnic minority groups worldwide. In addition, Freire was special advisor in education to the World Council of Churches in Geneva, and prior to the military coup against the Allende government, he was a UNESCO consultant at Chile’s Institute of Research and Training in Agrarian Reform (ICIRA).

Paulo Freire’s work with adult literacy began in the 1950s when he worked as a teacher and advocate among the people of the slums in his native Brazil. It was while he did this work that he became involved in literacy training, gradually focusing his attention on adult literacy, especially among the poor of Recife. Between 1947 and 1959, Freire’s involvement with adult literacy intensified, resulting in his dissatisfaction with the traditional methods for dealing with illiteracy that posited an authoritarian relationship between teacher and pupil. His criticism of the prepared primers for literacy education caused him to conclude that such materials contained a hidden curriculum consisting of knowledge, attitudes, and values espoused by the dominant culture which illiterates were to learn in conjunction with the rudiments of literacy. In the early 1960s Freire plunged into various reform movements in northeast Brazil, having been given the responsibility of an adult literacy effort in Recife by its mayor, Miguel Arraes in 1962. These attempted reforms were centered on the Popular Culture Movement, which pushed for the democratization of culture through discussions (Freire’s culture circles) on such themes as nationalism, remission of profits, economic development, and literacy. Moreover, students and activists like Freire attempted to raise class consciousness (Freire’s famed conscientización / conscientização). Although incitement to revolt was never the direct objective of Freire as an educator, his work undeniably contained the seeds of social revolt because it gave the people an understanding of the oppressive reality of their lives. Between June 1963 and March 1964, Freire’s literacy program was extended to the entire nation by Paulo de Tarso, Brazil’s Minister of Education, and, subsequently Freire was appointed Secretary of Education and General Coordinator of the National Plan of Adult Literacy. Training programs, using the Freirean method for adult literacy education, were initiated in almost all the state capitals throughout Brazil (Rio Grande do Norte, São Paulo, Bahia, Sergipe, and Rio Grande do Sul). This national campaign was modeled after Cuba’s literacy campaign of 1961, which had almost eliminated illiteracy in the island. But such endeavors ended abruptly with the fall of President João Goulart’s government owing to a military coup in 1964. However, the Popular Culture Movement, together with the Supervisory Agency for Agrarian Reform (SUPRA), were successful in mobilizing rural and urban workers in northeastern Brazil. Literacy, however, remained the key to all the reform movements in northeast Brazil since only literates were permitted to vote.

Francisco Weffort, in his introduction to the Portuguese version of Freire’s Education as the Practice of Freedom (1969) contends that there is a high correlation between illiteracy and socioeconomic stagnation, and maintains that the power elites of the country were purposely fostering this situation in order to maintain the status quo. At the center of Freire’s writing and teaching lies a moral commitment to a set of democratic practices that engages all citizens in common governance. He posits that these practices can never be inherited but must be learned and relearned by each successive generation. In espousing these views, Freire emerged as one of the most outspoken proponents of the “critical pedagogy” movement. At the heart of this amalgam of educational philosophies lies a belief in the centrality of education in determining political and social relations. As practiced by Freire in countries throughout the Third World, the doctrines of critical pedagogy were used by colonized citizens to analyze their roles in relations of oppression and to devise programs for revolutionary change to provide a voice for the “culture of silence.” The impoverished and oppressed elements in society were encouraged to look critically at their world in a dialogical encounter with others. When given the proper tools of literacy and critical awareness or consciousness of their situation, the downtrodden gradually perceive their personal and social reality and deal critically with it through social activism. Coming to a new awareness of self, a sense of dignity and identity, the once oppressed members of society are stirred by new hope—liberated both to speak and to act in a thoughtful and responsible manner, actively transforming their environment rather than passively responding and adapting to changes and decisions made for them. Armed with such a critical perspective, once illiterate and powerless individuals seek to change the structures of society that had once served to oppress them. During the 1970s and 1980s the philosophies of critical pedagogy were adapted throughout the industrialized world as a means of addressing power imbalances there. As a result, much of the vocabulary of “empowerment,” “dialogue,” and “voice” has entered the lexicon of Western social reform movements. At the same time the principles of critical pedagogy have undergone significant modifications that adapt them to the needs of contemporary technocratic societies. Paulo Freire’s principle of “education as cultural action” has been adapted to fit a variety of projects where learning forms part of a social conflict situation. Freire sees knowledge as embedded in social practice and inseparable from political life. His theories are thus highly relevant to those working in education and those concerned with the theology of liberation.

Despite its short-lived application in Brazil in the early 1960s, Freire and the Popular Culture Movement followed a specific methodology which met with a high degree of acceptance and success among the population. Visual aids were used to dramatize various issues under discussion among marginalized groups of the population in the famous “Centros Populares de Cultura” (Centers of Popular Culture) in Brazil. His specific work on education and literacy campaigns were geared toward the empowerment of the masses in order to become agents of social change. Freire developed his doctrine through a critique of what he called the “banking concept of education,” the traditional method of making students ingest information passively, not allowing a critical response to the “deposits received, filed and stored.” This stress on the passive storage of information further prevents the subject from applying it in a creative way and acting upon what was learned. He proposed instead a method of learning centered around each individual’s experience, where the educator drops the role of the all-knowing paternalistic provider of knowledge and adopts a more humble role of “facilitator”: a mediator between the students and the world, who proposes alternatives for finding solutions—solutions which ultimately will have to be chosen and executed by the students.

Subsidized, in part, by the United States-sponsored Alliance for Progress and the Aid for International Development (AID) program for his literacy project in Angicos, a city of the Rio Grande do Norte, Freire and his team were able to teach three hundred workers to read and write in forty-five days. After members of the Communist Party infiltrated the rank and file of the Catholic-led Popular Culture Movement, Freire transferred his populist method to the cultural extension service of the University of Recife. Paulo Freire the educator became the radical social reformist after the military coup in 1964 and his arrest and subsequent exile in Chile. After his twenty-year exile he moved first to Chile, then emigrated to the United States before returning to Brazil. In his Pedagogy of the Oppressed (1970), written a number of years after the Brazilian experience, Freire indeed shows himself to be concerned with education as a means for promoting revolutionary action, particularly in countries like Brazil where revolution appears to be the only means of bringing about adequate social and political change through the establishment of a truly participatory democracy.
More recently, Latin American liberation theologians have taken note of the work of Paulo Freire with Gustavo Gutiérrez openly praising Freire’s Pedagogy of the Oppressed. Indeed, Freire’s theological and educational ideas parallel those of Latin American theologians of liberation. On a number of occasions Freire refers to the Christian base communities (comunidades de base) that are prevalent in Brazil and sees his literacy methods as operative in their educational efforts. For example, in these communities there is a rereading of the gospel which makes it relevant to life in society, an emphasis on social justice issues affecting both the individual and the community, and an encouragement to think critically and to take an active part in shaping the future through discussion groups, literacy training, participation in the duties of citizenship and the exercise of free speech. And another liberation theologian, Juan Segundo, has adopted Freire’s concept of conscientizing evangelization by viewing the gospel as a liberating interpretation of history in which men and women are the subjects rather than the objects of history. Of the connection between literacy training and evangelization Juan Segundo writes as follows in The idea of God: “An evangelization committed to man’s liberation is deeply tied up with the new form of literacy training, i.e., one incorporated within a process of consciousness-raising...as a process of liberation...”

ELENA DE COSTA

See also entry on Augusto Boal

Further Reading

Primary Sources

—— The Politics of Education: Culture, Power, and Liberation, translated by Donald Macedo, South Hadley, Massachusetts: Bergin and Garvey, 1985

Freire, Paulo and Donaldo Macedo, Literacy: Reading the Word and the World’ South Hadley, Massachusetts: Bergin and Garvey, 1987

Cuba and Nicaragua

Each of the two popular socialist revolutions in Latin America (Cuba and Nicaragua) produced an aggressive and impressive literacy campaign that profoundly changed the educational and political nature of its respective population.

The Cuban Literacy Campaign was undertaken during an eight month period in 1961. It was the first of many national mobilizations that Castro would order and, indeed, it provided both a model and source of organizational and logistical training and experience for many subsequent national campaigns, including the famous sugar cane harvests. The program was directed primarily at adults. Its immediate goal was educational, but in a longer view it was political.

At the time of the Revolution, Cuba’s population suffered from a 24% illiteracy rate, primarily in the rural sector. Fewer than 50% of the children between the ages of seven and fourteen attended school. Indeed, only about 12.8% of Cuba’s 6.4 million citizens had received an education. Castro knew well the plight of the rural peasants and, in particular, their need for basic education. His view was simple: a country with a high illiteracy rate would be hard to govern. Thus, one of the new government’s first priorities was to address the problem of illiteracy.

In April 1961, after a brief period of training, over 100,000 students were organized into literacy brigades and sent to all parts of the countryside. For adolescents (the campaign involved secondary school students from the age of thirteen), especially, the literacy campaign was an exciting event, that filled them with hope and a sense of adventure. Indeed, the process of learning was (and was certainly intended as) a twoway one since the more privileged urban young were to learn about the wretched conditons in which the rural population attempted to survive. Armed with books, tablets, and pencils, and under the direction of experienced teachers, these young brigades reduced the national illiteracy rate to an officially reported 3.9% in less than a year.

In addition to providing almost immediately a literate (in certain instances semi-literate) adult population, the literacy campaign produced an early social cement between young revolutionaries from the cities and the adult rural population. Moreover, the campaign provided both a national view of unity and purpose and martyrs since several young brigadistas were killed by counter-revolutionaries. In all, the literacy campaign to this day stands as one of the greatest accomplishments of the Castro government. That the Cubans understand the crusade’s revolutionary importance is validated by the support and popularity of the Museum of Literacy in Havana. It should be noted that the campaign produced many written testimonios (Dora Alonso’s El año 61 [The Year 1961]; Araceli Aguililla’s Por llanos y montañas [Across Plains and Up Mountains] and at least one entertaining and worthwhile novel in Manuel Pereira’s El capitán Veneno, 1979 [Captain Poison].

The Nicaraguan Literacy Crusade began in March 1980, and lasted some five months. It was the first national project of the Sandinista government. It began with 85,000 teachers (of whom 60% were women), a figure that grew eventually to nearly 100,000. It shared characteristics and problems with the earlier Cuban campaign: formidable logistical obstacles because of the roughness of the terrain and the absence of any infrastructure and, on the positive side, the same determination to break down divisions between the urban young and the impoverished peasants. In the case of Nicaragua, the massive program launched in 1980 had long been contemplated by the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) prior to assuming power in 1979. In fact, it had been articulated as a political objective as early as 1969 by Sandinista leaders.

Under the direction of the Minister of Education, the Jesuit Fernando Cardenal (brother of the poet Ernesto Cardenal), with the collaboration of Brazilian educator Paulo Freire as consultant, the National Literacy Crusade was carefully planned and extensively supported through international agencies and foreign governments. It is difficult to overstate the immense fervour and commitment of those who participated as volunteers. Utilizing a military command structure, the crusade was organized into “brigades,” “columns,” and “squadrons.” They took their fight against illiteracy to the various “fronts” of the “battlefield.” Their primary weapon was a basic reader entitled El amanecer del pueblo [Dawn of the People].

When the Sandinistas took control of the government in 1979, Nicaragua’s illiteracy rate was nearly 50%. In some rural areas it was as high as 90%. But government estimates at the end of the five-month crusade put the national level of illiteracy at only 13%. This stunning success resulted in the crusade winning the 1980 UNESCO Literacy Prize.

Unquestionably, the National Literacy Crusade was a major act of the Nicaraguan reconstruction. Similar in many ways to the Cuban Literacy Campaign some twenty years earlier, it forged a national consciousness by introducing enthusiastic urban youth to their country’s rural poor. The crusade integrated previously excluded groups into the mainstream of the Revolution, and it helped strengthen emerging mass organizations that supported the Sandinista efforts. Viewed as a coalescing political event, the National Literacy Crusade set the political and social tone for the subsequent years of Sandinista rule.

SAM L.SLICK
Further Reading

Bunck, Julie Marie, Fidel Castro and the Quest for a Revolutionary Culture in Cuba, University Park: Pennsylvania University Press, 1994 [Chapter 2, “Castro and the Children,” concerns the literacy campaign]
Hershon, Sheryl L. and Judy Butler, And Also Teach Them to Read, Westport, Connecticut: Lawrence Hill, 1983

Literary Theory

Contrary to the aspirations of some of its principal practitioners (e.g., Ángel Rama, Alejandro Losada, Antônio Cândido), literary theory has never encompassed the entire continent. A “Latin American” literary critical practice might more effectively be described as a fabric, the interwoven threads of which offer intricate patterns for analysis and re-elaboration. The threads to be pulled in its reading, by no means hanging loose, are to be chosen or unravelled by the individual analyst or appropriator, according to the sociological, cultural, ideological or literary perspective adopted.

The first, still contentious figure, Ángel Rama, provides a basic frame of the discursive fabric of Latin America, a structure whose elaboration Rama attributes to the labour of the intellectuals, the compilers of the cultural works, the “weavers, in the grand historical workshop of Latin American society.” For Rama as well as for some of his contemporaries (e.g., Losada, Cândido), the operational unit in any critical approach is “Latin America,” a conceptual whole they inherit from previous discourses but which they survey aware of its nature qua construct, as a project which demands the careful tracking down and identification of the diversity encompassed. This complex pattern leads Rama and Losada, drawing on the work of cultural anthropologists, to adopt regional and subregional units, the definition of which relies on the traditional dimensions of geography and ethnicity together with the more relevant aspects of historical and economic development. Their objective is to map the diversities that have been articulated and to form them into a global network; to write the literary history of the subcontinent while posing questions about its own chronology and periodization, to re-enact differently the colonial Utopian project not of discovering but of writing “Latin America.” The means are the critic and the written word, a semiotic effect which from colonial times displaced the orality of pre-colonial Latin America. In the suggestive title of Rama’s masterpiece, La ciudad letrada, 1984 [The Lettered City], published after his death, he reveals the writer’s task of weaving and writing in the construction of society and culture in Latin America. According to Rama, the materiality of the word captures the ambiguity of cultural life in colonial and post-colonial Latin America: on the one hand, in its subjection to and perpetuation of authority; on the other, in its subversive potential arising from the multiple economical structures that decentralized power in colonial times. The word and its artificer, the writer, are the agents of violent displacement of the oral cultures though, paradoxically, they become the agents of transformation and survival of that repressed orality in a process Rama calls “transculturación” (transculturation). Transculturators like Gabriel García Márquez, João Guimarães Rosa and José María Arguedas perform the act of translating modernity by recreating the pre-Columbian orality rediscovered through the eyes of the innovating forces coming from abroad. To Rama, transculturation legitimates cultural modernity in Latin America in that it provides a solid source for the “independence,” “originality” and “representativeness” of Latin American literature.

Angel Rama’s argument for modernity through the notion of transculturation resonates in some of his contemporaries, who also tackle the controversial issue of the originality of Latin America’s critical production. To the Brazilian literary critic, Roberto Schwarz, modernity brings ideas to Latin America, specifically Brazil, which when placed in the context of the new soil become “misplaced” and fictitious. Schwarz exemplifies this process in his analysis of the discrepancy produced in Brazil by the establishment of the modern nation sustained by the structure of slavery. Misplacement of ideas produces a hierarchical society in which unequal access to education and the written word invalidates all claims of representativeness of the cultural production made by one class. The divide between the elites and the masses, between modernity and old systems constitutes for Schwarz the touchstone of the debate on cultural representation in Brazil. Together with one of his Brazilian contemporaries, Alfredo Bosi, Schwarz problematizes the representativeness of the Brazilian literary canon in so far as it marginalizes other forms of cultural expression which they label as “cultura popular” (popular culture).

Recognizing the plurality inherent in cultural forms in Latin America and the abyss existing between intellectuals and the illiterate population (“o pesadelo da história” [history’s nightmare] in Haroldo de Campos’s words), other Brazilian literary critics, such as Silviano Santiago and de Campos himself, elaborate on the issue of the originality of Latin American literature through the notions of “entre-lugar” (in-betweenness) and “tradução” (translation). In a foundational article, “O entre-lugar do discurso latino-americano” [The InBetweenness of Latin American Discourse], Santiago describes the Latin American writer as operating in a plural textual site traversed by different memories, different languages, different histories. The colonial encounter, Santiago contends, brings to the colonized an other history and an other culture which displace the native memory and culture. This displacement produces a feeling of “outsiderness” in the Latin American subject, who incorporates the new memory, in a replicating process, as a fiction going on in some other time, some other place. Being no longer either in the native locus or wholly assimilated to the new culture, the Latin American subject inhabits a place in-between, from which he interprets the universal literary tradition in a distinctive manner. He reads the signs of tradition capturing the plurality of meaning his in-betweenness allows him to perceive. His reading or translation of the tradition is “never an innocent one; it could never be so.”

Relating the Latin American original and differential character to the Baroque experience of colonial times, to the mastery of complex semiotic codes ever since Latin American literature emerged, Haroldo de Campos pursues the creative character of Latin America through the development of the notion of translation as “transcriação” (transcreation), a notion he applies both to the general process of literary creation (cultural translation) and to the specific recreation of a foreign work of art in a new language and cultural context. Translation is for de Campos a means to create tradition, recreating the work of the other but also projecting one’s own tradition into the tradition of the other, a process he pinpoints in writers such as Jorge Luis Borges and in his own translation project. In tune with the Mexican critic Octavio Paz, de Campos proposes a view of tradition as a constellation of “signs in rotation,” in which synchronic and diachronic dialogues take place between writers. The Latin American author, they contend, selects his precursors from the universal literary repertoire and thus creates his own literary tradition, legitimate and representative of his own self.

The selection of a tradition is for the Argentine critic Ricardo Piglia a process the Argentine—or the Latin American writer—performs as an act of translation, as an appropriation of the culture of the other (the European culture) in such a way that the notion of originality and authorship are subverted. In his famous novel, Nombre falso (Assumed Name), Piglia enacts a literary plagiarism by introducing a short story allegedly written by Roberto Arlt as an original literary piece. The subtle play Piglia produces between the text and the paratext reveals to the reader the falseness of Piglia’s contention. The attribution of authorship and originality, Piglia implies, is ultimately a subtle power-structure, clearly to be seen in the exclusive originality and superiority claimed as the property of “central,” as distinct from “peripheral” cultures. Using the Borgesian stratagem of borrowing and recreating, and the intriguing plots of Roberto Arlt, Piglia (re)creates a detective quest which resembles the Latin American writer’s search for original authorship and, resonantly, for the “ex-tradition of Latin America.”

In an analogous detective search through the archives and images of the past, the Argentine literary critic Beatriz Sarlo interrogates modernity and its multifaceted aspects in Argentina. Her search keeps history close at hand in a twodirectional process whereby history illuminates fiction and is in turn illuminated by it. Sarlo works with the images of Argentine fictional discourse and elaborates from them a new reading of tradition. In the textuality of the Argentine fabric, Sarlo gazes, for instance, at the desert and its emptiness as a generation of Argentine intellectuals saw it in order to account for the desire and necessity which led that generation to populate the pampa, to fill in the cultural void, to implant a tradition. Sarlo also looks at the image of the gaucho, mythical foundation of a past in order to sustain a rapidly advancing modernity. Fiction records, for Sarlo, those images and concerns which enable the critic to reconstruct both the past and, ultimately, the social imaginary of the nation.

The intricate relationship between fiction and critical discourse pursued by Sarlo illustrates an approach to Latin American literary theory at a microlevel of analysis, unravelling the threads of modernity which contributed in Latin America to the construction of the different nations. This micro-reading brings back on stage Ángel Rama’s contention, now transposed into new dimensions, regarding the role of the word in the construction of Latin America, a task he judged as being still, and ever, in process, performed by the work of the Latin American critic. As the theorizings of the writers and critics discussed above seem to imply, a continuous thread in the yet-to-be compiled Latin American history of literary theory undoubtedly reveals the Janus-faced nature of this task: for Latin American theorists, the construction of literary theories is inextricably related to the construction of Latin American identities.

ADRIANA SILVINA PAGANO

Further Reading

Cândido, Antônio, A educação pela noite e outros ensaios, São Paulo: Ática, 1987
Paz, Octavio, Los signos en rotación y otros ensayos, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1965
Rama, Ángel, Transculturación narrativa en America Latina, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1982
——La ciudad letrada, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1984
——“A pesar de dependente, universal,” in his Vale quanto pesa, Rio de Janeiro: Paz e Terra, 1982

Special Issues of Journals
Casa de las Américas, Havana, vol. 34/192 (July—September 1993) [Issue devoted to Ángel Rama]
Enrique López Albújar 1872–1966

Peruvian writer

There is a definite indigenist intent in the best-known of Enrique López Albújar’s publications, Cuentos andinos [Andean Tales] and Nuevos cuentos andinos [New Andean Tales]. He is also the author of the regionalist novel Matalaché and shorter pieces. The latter work is linked to the urban realism that developed in Peru among members of the generation of 1954–55.

Tomás Escajadillo is insistent in his identification of López Albújar as founder of the movement of indigenist narrative, and in the difference in vision of the indigenous world as depicted by this writer and that by his countryman Ventura García Calderón, with whom in fact he has been compared frequently. When Cuentos andinos appeared, it was during a period of searching by both writers and public for a national literature in Peru, a reaction to the exoticism of Spanish American modernist works. There was a sense that the Indian, who was an unavoidable part of Latin American reality, had been treated in too picturesque or distant a manner until then. The stories of Cuentos andinos at times resemble novels in their condensed narrative style. Their language is brusque and direct, synthesizing thoughts and actions. While the author was an outsider to what he observed and described, readers sensed the depth and breadth of his sensitivity to Quechua reality.

It is generally felt that the native population’s psychology is not probed to a great degree, but it is skilfully suggested. The effect of the author’s profession is seen in the way the oppression of the people is of less interest to him than is the observable behaviour of individuals, a behaviour which can be analyzed and evaluated for its correctness.

A spiritual follower of Manuel González Prada, López Albújar served as a bridge between the end-of-century Realists and the later indigenistas. He portrays neither horrors nor sentimental lamentation and does not stylize characters, thus giving greater narrative sensitivity to the world represented in the stories. Ideologically, López Albújar remained independent, but was essentially a liberal of the Durand group, believing in a liberal government. While his work as a judge did not allow him to make altogether positive observations about the Indians, they are nevertheless not portrayed as a depraved group and in fact are not even submissive, but rebellious. One senses that their pre-Columbian beliefs and ethics have survived even though the author still sees the need to integrate them into Western and Specifically Peruvian civilization. López Albújar’s indigenismo is not Positivist, but rather is linked generally to criminal actions and individual cases. Despite the restricted perspective, the native characters are closer to being “flesh and blood” than those found in the works of earlier authors. In addition, they offer a more careful portrait of social organization through the protagonists.

López Albújar’s Andean tales appear to have influenced works such as Ciro Alegría’s El Mundo es ancho y ajeno, 1941 (Broad and Alien is the World). The second group of Andean stories may be less successful from a literary perspective, but as a whole they attribute greater social awareness to the Indians and their communities. This has been thought to be the result of the previous appearance of prose works by other Peruvian writers César Vallejo, José María Arguedas and Ciro Alegría.

Matalaché is considered to be the first negrista novel of Peru, and it earned the author the designation of a writer concerned with race and social equality. It is a little-studied work, significantly set in 1816, just prior to Peruvian independence. The parallel with human freedom and that of Latin America is evident. The intention to write a novel with historical content and social commitment is noted in the subtitle “Novela retaguardista” [Novel of the Rear Guard]. Although López Albújar did experiment with short compositions in the Futurist style of Marinetti, he ultimately opted for social concerns over aesthetic experiments of avant-garde writing. It may be the author’s own mulatto background and experience which impressed racial concerns upon his writing. In any event, he was instrumental in making racial themes a legitimate part of Peruvian literature and national sentiment.

KATHLEEN N. MARCH

Biography

Born in Chiclayo, Peru, 23 November 1872. Spent childhood in Piura on northern coast of Peru. Studied law at the University of San Marcos, graduated in 1894. Founded the newspaper El Amigo del Pueblo [The Friend of the People]. Later wrote for important newspapers in Lima and Buenos Aires. Active in politics and imprisoned for a short time as a result of writing a poem that was considered insulting to General Cáceres. Practised law in Piura and Lima. Editor of La Prensa. Appointed judge in Huánuco in the Andes, 1917–23. Returned to Piura in 1923 and became Director of Cultural Education for a brief period. Appointed judge of the superior court in Tacna, 1931 and lived there until 1947 when he retired to Lima. Died in Lima, 6 March 1966.

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction

Cuentos andinos, Lima: Opinion Nacional, 1920
Matalaché, Piura: El Tiempo, 1928
Calderonadas, Chiclayo: El Tiempo, 1930
Nuevos cuentos andinos, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1937
Las caridades de la Señora de Tordoya, Lima: Mejía Baca, 1955

Other Writings

Miniaturas; álbum de bellezas limeñas, Lima: Gil, 1895 [early verse]
De mi casona, Lima: Lux, 1924 [Memoirs of his childhood in Piura]
El hechizo de Tomayquichua, Lima: Peruanidad, 1943
Memorias, Lima: Villanueva, 1963 [memoirs]

Compilations and Anthologies

Los mejores cuentos, Lima: Patronato del Libro Peruano, 1957
Ramón López Velarde 1888–1921

Mexican poet and essayist

Modern Mexican poetry begins with Ramón López Velarde. He is undoubtedly one of the most genuine poetic voices to inhabit that hard-to-classify period in Spanish American literature that stretches from Modernism to the vanguard poets. As a major representative of Spanish American postmodernismo (that is, the period that followed Modernismo), he is the first writer in Mexico to thematize the Mexican province in a new way. But he ought not be reduced to being the poet of the province. López Velarde was above all the creator of a new poetic language; this alone distinguishes him from González Martínez, for example. The value of his verse resides in having rescued from oblivion the simple and the minuscule by means of a deceivingly prosaic language. If, in his haiku, José Juan Tablada delves into the small and colourful, and Carlos Pellicer manages to compose beautiful symphonies to nature, López Velarde turns inward; consequently, the themes of his poetry are his conscience, his anguish, his vacillations, his childhood memories, his feelings of guilt, etc. His poetry constitutes one of the most dramatic confessions in Mexican letters. As regards the themes, they were not new to Mexican poetry; what was new was the sensibility with which he approached them. One theme stands out among all: love, or, as Octavio Paz, one of his best critics states, “la pasión de amor” (the passion of love). Other prominent themes are women, sensuality, religion and death. Though López Velarde was not a great reader, he felt the influence of Baudelaire, Lafforgue, Góngora, Quevedo, Dario, Herrera y Reissig, Francisco González León (1862–1945) -a minor Mexican poet who wrote about life in the provinces—and especially Leopold Lugones, from whom he learned to create surprising metaphors by avoiding clichés and commonplace.

López Velarde’s literary production is rather small, since he published only two books of poetry in his lifetime: La sangre devota, 1916 [Consecrated Blood] and Zozobra, 1919 [Anguish]. Posthumous works include his collection of poetry El son del corazón, 1932 (Song of the Heart), and two prose collections: El minutero, 1923 [The Minute Hand], and El don de febrero y otras prosas, 1952 [February’s Gift and Other Prose Writings]. Generally speaking, La sangre devota is characterized by a partially modernista atmosphere which gradually becomes a timid exercise in avant-garde experimentation via the use of obscure metaphors and colloquialisms in the second half of the book. In Zozobra and El son del corazón, clearly more complex texts than La sangre devota, López Velarde reaches the maturity of his style not by abandoning the themes of province, woman or impossible love, but by complicating them formally by means of new avantgarde imagery. In all of his literary production, however, there are certain paramount concerns that never leave the poet’s imagination. The most significant is the struggle that the lyric voice wages between the thorough idealization of woman, woman as the pure love object, and woman as primarily a creature of flesh and blood who makes the staunchly Catholic López Velarde unreservedly give in to the temptations of the flesh. From this perennial conflict, in effect, emanate not only the attendant dilemma of an incessant wavering between good and evil but also the linguistic contradictions as well as the unusual juxtapositions of adjectives which are part and parcel of his style.

The most vivid incarnation of the poetic voice’s spiritual predicament in the early poems (written between 1905 and 1912 and not included in La sangre devota) and in the poems of La sangre devota is Fuensanta, an almost mystical figure from the province who arguably becomes the archetype of woman in the poetry of López Velarde. Fuensanta’s real name was Josefa de los Ríos, and she had a love relationship with the poet which ended abruptly and definitively. In his verse, she represents impossible love; the lyric voice describes her as a chaste and pure woman very much like the ideal woman of the courtly love tradition. It is not an accident, therefore, that critics have found parallels between the poetry of López Velarde and that of his compatriot, Amado Nervo. La sangre devota has been portrayed as a passionate spiritual biography. In the process of the transfiguration of Fuensanta, the poet does not know whether to venerate her or to desire her, for she in fact simultaneously embodies mystical temptation and physical attraction. This is especially evident in “En las tinieblas húmedas” [In the Moist Darkness], where a state of absolute confusion and conflict prevail, and also in “Pobrecilla sonámbula” [Poor Sleepless One], where Fuensanta is depicted as an intangible being, a phantom who walks in her sleep. Thematically, in López Velarde’s first poetic phase eroticism is always associated with religious and liturgical themes; hence, verbs such as to venerate, to revere, or to canonize, as well as nouns belonging to the Catholic rite and to the Bible, abound. Formally, this first phase is characterized by the use of an intimate and authentic language very different from the modernistas’ often superficial expression. Among the best poems of La sangre devota are “Mi prima Agueda” [My Cousin Agueda], “¿Qué será lo que espero? [I Wonder What It Is I Want?]” and “Y pensar que pudimos…” [To Think We Could Have…].

Three years elapsed between the publication of La sangre devota and Zozobra. During this time López Velarde moved to the capital and abandoned politics, utterly disillusioned after the death of his friend and hero Francisco L. Madero. Fuensanta and the province continue to be present in Zozobra and El son, but they are transformed. The erotic aspects of love which begin to surface in a number of poems of La sangre devota seem to overcome the poetic voice in these two texts as the lyric succumbs to the pleasures of the flesh in a desperate attempt to attain impossible love. Of the many women who are poeticized in these two collections of poems, María Nevares, with whom López Velarde corresponded for a good many years, plays a fundamental role. Zozobra represents the poet’s highest literary achievement. It has been called López Velarde’s most personal book. One of the best poems of the collection is the first one, “Hoy como nunca” [Today as Never Before], which functions as a type of thematic bridge between Zozobra and La sangre devota. Here the lyric voice invokes Fuensanta and reminisces about the past as he sinks deeper and deeper into a sea of desperation; this poem also introduces the theme of death, one of the most prevalent themes in López Velarde’s second poetic phase. In Zozobra the poet reacts strongly against sentimentalism. This is especially discernible in the abundance of rare adjectives, juxtapositions of dissimilar realities, combinations of surprising words and horrific images of death as in the best paintings of Hieronymus Bosch. Some of the most successful poems of Zozobra are “La mancha púrpura [The Purple Stain], “Tierra mojada” [Wet Land], “El retorno maléfico” [Evil Return], “Hormigas” [Ants] and “La última odalisca” [The Last Odalisque], the last of these being one of López Velarde’s most hermetic poems.

El son del corazón represents the final stage in the spiritual and aesthetic evolution of the artist. The presence of tangibly identified women disappears, and the women who do appear, such as Ligia and Zoraida, constitute symbolic representations of the now distant Fuensanta, who is not mentioned by name. In the poems of El son woman is in effect spiritualized and made less concrete. Availing himself of cosmic images, the more mature and reflexive poet re-elaborates the major themes of his previous works. There is a certain attitude of resignation even, as the lyric voice comes to accept the corruptibility of the flesh. The outstanding poem of El son is “La suave patria” [The Gentle Homeland], though “Treinta y tres” [Thirty Three] and “El sueño de los guantes negros” [The Dream of the Black Gloves] are equally excellent compositions. Going back to Othón before him, López Velarde evokes in “La suave patria” not the most typical but rather the most intimate and lyrical aspects of the homeland. In this sense, López Velarde was much more than the poet of the Mexican Revolution, as José Vasconcelos liked to think.

In El minutero and El don de febrero are contained a series of prose pieces that López Velarde wrote for different Mexican magazines and newspapers. According to Allen W.Phillips, López Velarde’s prose is not inferior to his poetry: rather, thematically and formally both poetry and prose run parallel to each other. Phillips underlines above all the lyrical quality of López Velarde’s prose and links it to the prose writings of Martí instead of to the most flamboyantly fancy compositions of Darío. The poet’s prose writings encompass prose poems, two short stories, literary and political articles and other prose pieces that are more difficult to classify. In the end, it must be clear that this part of López Velarde’s literary production, and especially his prose poems, offer an exceptional insight into the major aspects of his poetry.

See also entry on José Juan Tablada

Biography

Born in Jerez (now Ciudad García) in the state of Zacatecas, Mexico, 15 June 1888. First born of nine children. Educated at the Seminario Conciliar de Zacatecas, 1901–02; the Seminario Conciliar de Santa María de Guadalupe de Aguascalientes, 1902–05; and the Instituto Científico y Literario de Aguascalientes, 1905–07. Entered law school in San Luis Potosí in 1908 and graduated in 1911. While a student co-founded the little magazine, Bohemio. Contributed to various newspapers and from 1909 his signature became well known in the provinces. Moved to Mexico City shortly after graduating and spent the rest of his life there. Contributed articles to several metropolitan journals and was active also in the administration of Cultura, an important publishing house for intellectuals of the period. Died prematurely of bronchial-pneumonia in 1921.
Selected Works

Poetry

La sangre devota, Mexico City: Revista de Revistas, 1916
Zozobra, Mexico City: Mexico Moderno, 1919
El son del corazón, Mexico City: Bloque de Obreros Intelectuales, 1932; as Song of the Heart, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1995

Prose

El minuterio, Mexico City: Imprenta Murguía, 1923
El don de febrero y otras prosas, edited by Elena Molina Ortega, Mexico City: Imprenta Universitaria, 1952

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras completas, Mexico City: Nueva España, 1944
“La suave patria” y otros poemas, edited by Emilio de Armas, Havana: Editorial Arte y Literatura, 1983

Further Reading

De la Fuente, Carmen, López Velarde: su mundo intelectual y afectivo, Mexico City: Federación Editorial Mexicana, 1971
Gálvez de Tovar, Concepción, Ramón López Velarde en tres tiempos, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1971
Leiva, Raúl and Jorge Ruedas, La prosa de López Velarde, Mexico City: UNAM, 1971
Noyola Vázquez, Luis, Fuentes de Fuensanta. La ascensión de López Velarde, Mexico City: La Impresora, 1947
Molina Ortega, Elena, Ramón López Velarde. Estudio biográfico, Mexico City: Imprenta Universitaria, 1952
Murray, Frederic W., La imagen arquetípica en la poesía de Ramón López Velarde, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1972
Paz, Octavio, “El camino de la pasión,” in Cuadrivio, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1965 [One of the most lucid analyses of López Velarde’s poetry]
Ramón López Velarde, el poeta y el prosista, Mexico City: Instituto Nacional de Bella Artes, 1961 [Indubitably the best comprehensive study on López Velarde’s poetry and prose to date]
Segovia, Tomás, “Ramón López Velarde o el amor más allá de la muerte,” Vuelta 150 (1989)
Villaurrutia, Xavier, “Encuentro con Ramón López Velarde,” El libro y el pueblo 12. (1934)

Carlos Loveira 1882–1928

Cuban prose writer
Perhaps because his own life was dedicated to the workers’ struggles of his time, Carlos Loveira was able to expose—as were few other writers of his generation—the evils of the incipient Republic: the favouritism, the economic dependence, the dishonesty and corruption of those in power, the administrative incompetence and, in particular, the Cuban people’s feeling of frustration over the failure of their struggle.

One of his first books, De los 26 a los 35: lecciones de la lucha obrera, 1917 [From 1926 to 1935: Lessons of the Workers’ Struggle], is, in a sense, a foretaste of his works of fiction, in which autobiographical details abound. In it he advocates social changes, but considers that all change should be gradual and non-violent; he rejects the introduction of foreign ideologies into Latin America.

His Naturalist novels, in which scenes of local customs abound, portray the social problems of Cuba in the first decades of the 20th century. Often the thesis the author tries to express breaks into the discourse with digressions and observations which render the characters lifeless and slow down the narrative. Los inmorales [The Immoral Ones], Loveira’s first novel, appeared in the Havana journal Cuba Contemporánea (1913–27). According to the author himself, he wrote the novel as propaganda in favour of divorce, and it is a clear attack on the prevailing social and economic order and the hypocrisy of contemporary moral conventions. This magazine also published his second novel Generales y doctores, 1920 [Generals and Doctors], in which he satirizes the ruling class but fails to give an objective perspective because he turns it into a sermon on what he considers to be the solutions to the country’s problems; the thesis drowns the plot. Similarly Los ciegos, 1922 [The Blind], is a novel expressed in the pamphleteering tones of Socialist propaganda, in which the workers are depicted as idyllic characters. In La última lección 1924 [The Last Lesson], he criticizes the position of women and advocates their emancipation. His last novel, Juan Criollo, 1927 [John the Creole] is regarded as the best of his literary works. Here the characters develop more independently and the omniscient author does not interrupt the discourse so much. In this novel Loveira also discards the authoritarian tone which characterizes his previous works and the style is lighter.

The failures which mark Cuba’s political history: the Ten Years War (1868–78), thwarted by the Zanjón pact; US intervention in the War of Independence which, in Loveira’s opinion, delayed the natural process of historical evolution of Cuban nationality, mark his work with a strong pessimistic tone. His deterministic world view also influenced the creation of his characters whose attitude and evolution are determined by their social class. This feeling of frustration, which was shared by other authors of the period, was also due to the introduction of the Platt Amendment, which allowed the US to intervene in Cuba’s political problems whenever it wished; a humiliating Amendment which left a feeling of great bitterness in the intellectuals of the day, who were even more embittered by the second North American intervention of 1906.

Another characteristic of Loveira’s novels, particularly noticeable in Juan Criollo, is eroticism, through which the author portrays the vices of that time: corruption and prostitution, abuse by the rich and powerful, orphanhood. Eroticism is shown as an evasion, as national escapism. The author seems to say that through sex his characters find consolation to appease their inner frustration, born of the lack of faith in the future of the country and its people and most of all in the lack of national identity. In his novels, and especially in this last one, the author tries to answer his agonizing question: “Why is Cuba like this?”

In Loveira’s novels an intense criticism of all the social institutions of the country, especially the Catholic Church, is apparent. In short, the author seems to say that every Republican institution perpetuates the legacy of corruption bequeathed to it by centuries of colonial rule. He realizes that a republic cannot be built on the evils of a colony. Loveira’s characters, disillusioned and worn out by years of struggle and frustration, react with the cynicism and desperation of a society whose national conscience is in crisis. Loveira offers no hope of this crisis being overcome. His characters do not transcend social conditions, they are anti-heroes, roguish—picaresque elements are particularly evident in his last novel—who allow themselves to be carried on the current of opportunism and, as in Lazarillo de Tormes, they shelter in any port, degraded by the very society they denounce and reject. His novels cover a historic period when the Republican conscience was being shaped, and even today they are relevant as a literary metaphor to analyse the problems of Cuban society and people. Loveira gradually brought these problems into the open in all his work, finally summing them up in the character of Juan Criollo, who, for the author, was a symbol of Cuba.

MARÍA L. NEGRÍN translated by Patricia James

Biography

Born in El Santo, Santa Clara, Cuba, 21 March 1882. Of humble origin. Father died when Carlos was three years old. Brought up by the family for whom his mother worked as a cook; went to New York with them and there became a street vendor of sweets and fruit. At the age of sixteen joined up and returned to Cuba to fight for independence. At the end of the war he worked on the construction of the central railway. Also worked on the building of the Panama Canal. Returned to Cuba in 1908 and founded the Cuban League of Railway Employees in 1910. Founded the trade paper El ferrocarrilero [The Railway Worker] and published other short-lived newspapers and magazines. Left for Yucatan in 1913 where he created the Department of Labour for this state. Became Secretary of the Pan-American Labour Federation with headquarters in Washington, DC. In 1917 returned to Cuba for good as Head of the Department of Colonization and Labour of the Ministry of Agriculture. Member of the Academy of Philosophy and Art, 192.6. Died 26 November 1928.
Selected Works

Novels
Los inmorales, Havana: Cuba Contemporánea, 1919
Generales y doctores, Havana: Cuba Contemporánea, 1920
Los ciegos, Havana: Imprimería El Siglo XX, 1922.
La última lección, Havana: Imprimería y Papelería de Rambla Bouza, 1924
Juan Criollo, Havana: Cultural, 1927

Other Writings
De los 26 a los 35: lecciones de la lucha obrera, Washington, DC: The Law Reporter, 1917
“Un gran ensayista cubano: Fernando Lles,” Anales de la Academia Nacional de Artes y Letras, vol. 10 (1926)
“Adrian del Valle: escritor y periodista de Cuba,” Cuba Contemporánea, vol. 43/71 (1926)

Further Reading
Loveira’s work is not widely read outside Cuba; hence the paucity of critical material in English.
Herrera, Lourdes S., La novelística de Carlos Loveira, New York: Las Américas, 1983
Marqués, Sarah, Arte y sociedad en las novelas de Carlos Loveira, Miami: Universal, 1977
Owre, J. Riis, “Juan Criollo, after Forty Years,” Journal of InterAmerican Studies, vol. 9 (1967)
Pérez Firmat, Gustavo, The Cuban Condition: Translation and Identity in Modern Cuban Literature, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989 [Chapter on Juan Criollo]

Dulce María Loynaz 1902–

Cuban poet, prose writer and literary critic
In common with the work of so many other women writers in Latin America, that of Dulce María Loynaz has only recently been recognised and brought to the attention of a wider reading public. Above all, being awarded the highly prestigious Cervantes Prize for Literature in 1992, helped to rescue her work from the oblivion in which it had lain since the 1950s. In the course of that decade, persuaded by a supportive husband, she published most of what she had written up to that point in Spain where her work then enjoyed a brief popularity in literary circles. She herself was partly to blame if her name was subsequently forgotten, at least in her homeland, because she expressed hostility to the Cuban Revolution by holding herself aloof and declaring (incorrectly) that she was no longer writing. Age and the changed circumstances of her country, she said, had caused her inspiration to dry up. As with other Latin American women writers of her generation, class and religion were in conflict with Loynaz’s feminism. Her patrician background, coupled with her Catholicism prevented her from appreciating the real gains made by Cuban women after the Revolution. Thus unlike, say, Renée Méndez Capote, another Cuban woman writer of same class and generation but with progressive political views, Loynaz was not able to adapt to the new situation and to give younger women writers in Cuba a support from which they might well have benefited. This is because women’s progress in the socio-economic sphere after 1959 was not matched by more prestige in what remains to this day a largely white and male-dominated sphere of letters.

Loynaz is best known, and perhaps rightly so, as a poet. Her poetry tends to be inward-looking but this does not prevent her from tackling grand themes such as love of country. Her patriotism is passionately felt, in that her family history is inseparable from the founding of the Cuban state. Loynaz’s father, General Enrique Loynaz del Castillo, fought in the second war of Independence against the Spanish (1895–98), and she later edited his memoirs. She was born in the year in which Cuba became, theoretically at least, an independent country. These were the factors that prevented her from taking the easy way out after the Cuban Revolution for, unlike her second husband, she was not prepared to leave Cuba. In writing what are effectively love poems to her island, the intimate tone characteristic of Loynaz’s verse saves them from the pomposity and empty rhetoric which often mars poetry of this kind. Understandably, the prose poem “Isla mía” [My Island] from Poemas sin nombre, 1953 (Poems without Name), is the most famous in this category, together with “El Almendares” [The Almendares] from the collection Juegos de agua [Water Play]. In “Isla Mía,” in particular, she applies to Cuba a wide range of cultural references from the Bible and Greek mythology. In so doing, however, she does not show the cultural subservience towards Europe characteristic of earlier generations of Latin American writers. Hers is a self-confident blend of images from different sources in a poem which shows also a loving and knowledgeable regard for nature.

Loynaz was a feminist, and overtly so in speeches and articles devoted to other Spanish American women poets. But in her poetry such feelings are expressed covertly and therefore a feminist reading is only one of several possible interpretations. The emphasis on liquidity in the poems of Juegos de agua is relevant to the argument advanced by the French philosopher Luce Irigaray in Ce Sexe qui n’en pas un, 1977 (This Sex Which is Not One). Here she associates femaleness and liquidity, referring to the need to accept the changeable movements of liquids as appropriate metaphors for female discourse. This line of thought can be applied most fruitfully to Loynaz’s creative work. A theme of her poetry, related to her condition as a woman, is a yearning for freedom frustrated by forms of enclosure. Release comes from the creative act itself, as is made clear in the poem from Juegos de agua that begins with the lines “I am free in my verse, it is my sea.” On the other hand, many poems from this collection such as “Aquarium,” “Water Play,” and “Water in the Park” express the poet’s frustration over her incarceration.

Both the water imagery and the theme of imprisonment appear also in Loynaz’s bold, avant-garde novel, Jardín [Garden], a work that she wrote over a period of several years (1928–35). Her approach here is decidedly feminist because she rejects the realist novel with its insistence on plot, characterisation and sequential time as inappropriate to her purpose. In the Prelude to the novel she writes: “This is the incoherent and monotonous story of a woman and a garden. Unlike Einstein’s theories, time and space do not exist. Garden and woman are in any meridian of the world—the most curved or the most taut. And on any level—the highest or the lowest—of time’s circumference. There are many roses.” Such a statement, dangerously essentialist for contemporary feminists, shows in the context of its period a boldness belied by the fact that she made no attempt to publish this work until 1951. Jardín, described by the author as a “lyrical novel,” is in many ways deliberately obscure, although a knowledge of Loynaz’s poetry helps readers to unravel its meaning. In any event, certain points can be grasped very readily: the writer rejects the modern world that is swallowing up nature (expressed, of course, by the garden); the protagonist, Barbara, is isolated; she yearns for freedom but ends up marrying and “settling down.” At the end of the novel Barbara seeks to return to her garden, but it is too late: her condition is irrevocably postlapsarian, and she cannot return to the (barbaric) Eden she abandoned for a more “civilised” world (Europe). All that escapes destruction is a lizard, a hint that a new start is possible. Jardín is a bold experimental novel for a woman to have written at this time in Latin America, and for this reason it is unfortunate that Loynaz allowed it to collect dust in a drawer for so many years.

Winning the Cervantes prize has provoked an unprecedented surge of interest in Loynaz’s production and a growing number of her works has been either hastily reprinted or assembled for publication. Yet to come are English translations of her work, and the seriously scholarly attention that it undoubtedly deserves.

VERITY SMITH

Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, 10 December 1902. Educated by tutors at home; attended the University of Havana, doctorate in civil law, 1927. Married twice: 1) her cousin, Enrique de Quesada y Loynaz in 1938 (divorced in 1943); 2) the social columnist, Pablo Álvarez de Cañas in 1946 (died in 1974). After the Cuban Revolution embarked on history of El Vedado (residential district of Havana), but her failing eyesight is making it difficult for her to finish it. TV documentary, “Una mujer que no existe” [A Non-Existent Woman] shown on Cuban television in 1990. Member of the Cuban Academy of the Language, 1959; Corresponding Member, Royal Academy of the Spanish Language, 1968, Emeritus Member, Cuban Union of Artists and Writers (UNEAC). Awarded the Cross of Alfonso X (Spain), 1947; Cuban National Prize for Literature, 1987; Miguel de Cervantes Prize, 1992. Centre for Information and Promotion of the work of the Loynaz family opened in Pinar del Río, Cuba, 1990.

Selected Works

Poetry
Versos, 1920–1938, Havana: Úcar García, 1938
Juegos de agua, Madrid: Editora Nacional, 1947
Poemas sin nombre, Madrid: Aguilar, 1953; as Poems without Name, translated by Harriet de Onís, Havana: Editorial José Martí, 1993
Carta de amor a Tut-ank-Amen, Madrid: Nueva Imprenta Radio, 1953
Últimos días de una casa, Madrid: Imprenta Soler Hermanos, 1958
La novia de Lázaro, Madrid: Betania, 1991
Poemas naufragos, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1992,

Novel
Jardín, Madrid: Aguilar, 1951; Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1992

Other Writings
Yo fui feliz en Cuba…: los días cubanos de la Infanta Eulalia, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1993
Ensayos literarios, Salamanca: Ediciones Universidad de Salamanca, 1993
Fe de vida. Evocación de Pablo Álvarez de Cañas, Pinar del Río, Cuba: Ediciones Hermanos Loynaz, 1994

Compilations and Anthologies
Poesías escogidas, edited by Pedro Simon, Madrid: Visor, 1993
Poesía completa, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1993
Antología lírica, edited by María Asuncion Mateo, Madrid: Espasa Calpe, 1993

Further Reading
Campuzano, Luisa, “Últimos textos de una dama: crónicas y memorias de Dulce María Loynaz,” Casa de las Américas 201 (October-December 1995)
González Castro, Vicente, La hija del general, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1991
Núñez, Ana Rosa (editor), Homenaje a Dulce María Loynaz, Premio Cervantes 1992, Miami: Universal, 1993
Simon, Pedro (editor), Dulce María Loynaz, Havana: Casa de las Américas y Letras Cubanas, 1991 [Comprehensive and welldocumented volume in the Valoracion Multiple series, but the articles on the author’s work show a marked critical conservatism]

Special Issues of Journals
Anthropos, Barcelona, edited by Nara Araújo, 151 (1993)
Leopoldo Lugones 1874–1938

Argentine poet and prose writer

The literature of Leopoldo Lugones is inextricably linked with Spanish American Modernismo. Together with José Martí and Rubén Darío, Lugones is considered to be one of the principal figures of that literary movement. His early poetry had a farreaching influence both within Argentina and abroad. Lugones began his literary career as a poet, but he later came to be the most productive author of modernista prose fiction. Likewise, he wrote extensive essays, political commentaries and historical treatises, as well as literary and cultural analyses. His strong and wide ranging ideological stances—from socialism in his youth to fascism in his later years—are readily apparent in his writing.

As a poet he gained almost immediate prominence with his 1897 collection Las montañas del oro [The Golden Mountains]. Although to the present-day reader modernista poetry, and in particular that of Lugones, seems overcharged with baroque language, exotic imagery, and overstated metaphors, at the time of its publication Las montañas was highly praised as being poetically innovative and, more importantly, for defining the exalted role of the poet within society. The volume is loosely modeled after a poetic journey that takes the reader on a Dantean voyage from the summit to the darkest depths, and back again into the light. The poem’s modernista characteristics are not only evident in the language and style of the verse, but also in the traditional poetic imagery that is skillfully enmeshed with urban, technological and scientific images of a new age. Lugones continued his calculated experimentation with lexical and rhythmic form in subsequent volumes that were equally astounding examples of his skill for poetic composition. Los crepúsculos del jardín, 1905 [Garden Twilights] is widely considered to be one of the texts from the period that most thoroughly exemplifies the conventions of Modernismo. The poet’s deliberate focus on exotic scenes, intense emotion and physical love all combine to make the text highly erotic in nature. Lunario sentimental, 1909 [Sentimental Lunar Calendar] marked the beginning of Lugones’s break with Modernismo. More than just a collection of poetry, Lunario comprises a rather eclectic assortment of poems, short stories and even short plays that all revolve around the central theme of the moon. The volume provoked quite a controversy when it appeared, since it in essence mocked the excesses of Modernism, while it also ridiculed the high-brow culture of those to whom it catered.

When Lugones was placed in charge of cultural commemorations for the first centenary of Argentine independence from Spain, he took on the responsibility of commissioning appropriate works that would hail the occasion. Rubén Dario contributed his Canto a la Argentina [Song to Argentina], and Lugones offered his own Odas seculares [Centennial Odes]. Odas is significant not only because of the occasion for which it was written, but more importantly because it marked a change in direction for the poet himself. For the first time, Lugones based his poetry on specifically Argentine themes. The ten separate compositions that make up the volume are steeped in the imagery of the people, places and history of Argentina, which is indicative of his progressive movement toward his later famous nationalist stance. Lugones published several subsequent volumes of poetry, none of which ever gained for him the critical acclaim that greeted his earlier compositions. His only book published outside of Argentina was a collection of tender love poems titled El libro fiel, 1912 [The Faithful Book] that the poet wrote to his wife. His last two collections, Poemas solariegos, 192.8 [Ancestral Poems] and Romances del Río Seco [Río Seco Ballads], published posthumously in 1938, follow the same strong interest in Argentine themes.

Lugones was as skilled a prose writer as he was a poet, publishing in both genres simultaneously. In spite of the fact that Argentina did not become the subject matter of his poetry until 1912, his first prose work, La guerra gaucha, 1905 [The Gaucho War] deals with the most Argentine of all literary motifs, that of the gaucho. La guerra gaucha is truly a remarkable text in many ways. The twenty-three interrelated episodes, which could be considered short stories independent of one another, narrate the struggles for independence in northern Argentina as they were experienced by the gaucho soldiers, in particular the adventures of Martín Güemes, a 19th-century gaucho hero. The narrative is exceedingly complex in its use of metaphor, lyrical structure and the exorbitant use of arcane lexicon, all of which are employed to give elaborate descriptions of battles, hardships and human suffering. The text is in fact so complex that it even prompted such a sophisticated reader as Jorge Luis Borges to criticize Lugones’s convoluted and baroque prose style. In spite of its difficult narrative style, the novel has enjoyed numerous reprintings and was made into a motion picture; it continues to be a classic of Argentine literature. Notwithstanding the virtues of his first prose work, Lugones later proved to be an even better master of the short story. In 1906 Lugones published his first volume of short stories, Las fuerzas extrañas [Strange Forces]. The narrative of this second prose work is far less encumbered by the elaborate syntactic and lexical entanglements of the previous experiment. Likewise, the twelve stories, joined by a treatise on cosmogony, diverge from the author’s intense patriotism in La guerra gaucha to focus on elements of the supernatural, the forces of nature, pseudo-scientific experiments gone awry, and the occult.

The topic of the fantastic was very much in vogue in Buenos Aires at the turn of the century, and its influence on literature was only part of the entire picture. Séances, consultations with mediums, experimenting with ouija boards, and the study of theosophy and Kabbalah were all popular activities. Such authors as Edgar Allan Poe and Guy de Maupassant were widely read and assimilated by modernista writers. Lugones was no exception. Indeed, his characteristically hair-raising tales attest to the fact that he was a master of suspense and horror. Almost all the characters of Las fuerzas extrañas inevitably suffer cruel deaths as the result of having tampered with the forces of nature, a fate that reflects society’s angst over the modernization of culture. In most of the stories the author employs a narrative framing device that presents the story as non-fiction. His tales often included fictional testimonies, legal documents, diary entries, or the discovered fragments of lost manuscripts that lent credence to the action. Lengthy theoretical hypotheses and scientific data of the author’s own invention were also used to give the perception of authenticity. Lugones’s “Ensayo de una cosmogonía en diez lecciones” [Essay on Cosmogony in Ten Lessons] is perhaps the most coherent summation of the Modernists’ relation with the occult. It is essentially a treatise in which the author outlines the beliefs and attitudes concerning the doctrine of animism. Lugones continued and expanded his interest in the fantastic with his 1924 collection of short stories, Cuentos fatales [Fatal Stories], all based on the author’s interest in Oriental studies, in particular Egyptology. He hired an Arabic tutor to learn the language and became an amateur expert on the subject. The stories of Cuentos fatales include Lugones himself and his tutor as characters and draw widely on the occult doctrines and ancient belief systems of the Arab world. Lugones also wrote one full-length conventional novel, El ángel de la sombra, 1926 [The Angel of Darkness]. However, it was never successful and is in fact a largely forgotten item of the author’s abundant literary corpus. An interesting aspect of the novel is its treatment of the topic of suicide, foreshadowing the author’s own death.

Of Lugones’s vast essayistic writings, El payador, 1916 [The Gaucho Minstrel] deserves the most mention. It is actually the compilation of a series of public lectures Lugones gave in 1913 at the Teatro Odeón in Buenos Aires, which were attended by the most distinguished personalities of Buenos Aires society, including president Roque Sáenz Peña. In El payador Lugones begins by discussing the nature of epic poetry and ancient Greek culture, with the intention of later proving that Martin Fierro (the gauchesque poem written by José Hernández, and most famous work of all Argentine literature) an epic poem in its own right and representative of gaucho culture (poetry, music, language) can be directly linked to the lineage of Hercules. It is a very lengthy, in-depth, and at times tedious analysis. Nevertheless, it is significant because it marks a profound change in the author’s ideological trajectory, abandoning the socialism of his earlier years for nationalism. In El payador Lugones attempts to construct an image of national identity based on creole ideals and the continuance of HispanoCatholic hegemony in Argentina, one of the fundamental issues of Argentine nationalist ideology. Subsequent essays such as La patria fuerte, 1930 [The Strong Homeland] and La grande Argentina, 1930 [Heroic Argentina] reveal his strongly fascist ideals.

Lugones is a truly monolithic figure in Argentine letters, provoking both admiration and disdain. His works have greatly influenced subsequent generations of writers throughout Latin America and his literature continues to entice literary critics for its sophistication and originality.

DARRELL B.LOCKHART

Biography

Born in the province of Córdoba, Argentina, 13 June 1874, to privileged parents. Family’s wealth lost in crash of 1890 and moved to Córdoba City in 1892. Employed by city council. By 1894 he had established a reputation as a poet and orator. Organized student strikes in 1895. Settled in Buenos Aires where he founded the newspaper La Montana. Appointed Post Office archivist, 1899. In 1903 headed government mission to the Jesuit ruins of Misiones in the northeast of Argentina. First official trip to Europe in 1906 to study educational methods in Sweden and France. Returned to Europe during World War I and established the Revue SudAméricaine, Paris. On his return to Argentina in 1915 appointed director of the National Teachers’ Library, a post he was to hold for the next 23 years. Returned to France in 1919 at the invitation of the French government to visit the devastated war zones. Underwent change of ideology in 1920s as the result of disillusionment with liberal politicians. Supported the military coup of General Uriburu in 1930. Committed suicide in 1938.
Selected Works

Poetry
Las montañas del oro, Buenos Aires: Kern, 1897
Los crepuscúlos del jardín, Buenos Aires: Moen, 1905
Lunario sentimental, Buenos Aires: Moen, 1909
Odas seculares, Buenos Aires: Moen, 1910
El libro fiel, Buenos Aires: Piazza, 1912
El libro de los paisajes, Buenos Aires: Otero y García, 1917
Las horas doradas, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1922
Romancero, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1924
Poemas solariegos, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1928
Romances del Río Seco, Buenos Aires: Centurión, 1938

Novels and Short Fiction
La guerra gaucha, Buenos Aires: Moen, 1905
Las fuerzas extrañas, Buenos Aires: Moen, 1906
Cuentos, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1916
Cuentos fatales, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1924
El ángel de la sombra, Buenos Aires: Gleizer, 1926

Essays
La reforma educacional, un ministro y doce académicos, Buenos Aires: n.p., 1903
El imperio jesuitico: ensayo histórico, Buenos Aires: Compañía Sudamericana de Billetes de Banco, 1904
Didáctica, Buenos Aires: Otero y García, 1910
Las limaduras de Hephaestos: I. Piedras liminares, 2. Prometeo, Buenos Aires: Moen, 1910
Historia de Sarmiento, Buenos Aires: Otero y Compañía, 1911
Elogio de Ameghino, Buenos Aires: Otero y Compañía, 1915
Mi beligerancia, Buenos Aires: Otero y García, 1917
La torre de Casandra, Buenos Aires: Talleres Gráficos “Atlántida,” 1919
Las industrias de Atenas, Buenos Aires: Talleres Gráficos “Atlántida,” 1919
Estudios helénicos, 4 vols, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1923–24
Filosófica, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1924
La organización de la paz, Buenos Aires: La Editora Argentina, 1925
Nuevos estudios helénicos, Buenos Aires: La Editora Argentina, 1928
La patria fuerte, Buenos Aires: Taller Gráfico de L. Bernard, 1930
La grande Argentina, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1930
Política revolucionaria, Buenos Aires: Anaconda, 1931
El estado equitativo (ensayo sobre la realidad argentina), Buenos Aires: La Editora Argentina, 1932
Roca, Buenos Aires: Coni, 1938

Compilations and Anthologies
“El payador” y antología de poesía y prosa, edited by Guillermo Ara, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1979
Antología poética, selected by Jorge Luis Borges, Madrid: Alianza, 1982
Further Reading

Fraser, Howard M., In the Presence of Mystery: Modernist Fiction and the Occult, Chapel Hill: North Carolina Studies in the Romance Languages and Literatures/University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, 1992 [An excellent study in which the author analyzes the influence of the occult on the modernista fiction of Lugones, Darío and Nervo]
Ghiano, Juan Carlos, Análisis de “La guerra gaucha,” Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1967
Gramuglio, María Teresa, “Literatura y nacionalismo: Leopoldo Lugones y la construcción de imágenes de escritor,” Hispanérica, vol. 22/64–65 (1994)
Lermón, Miguel, Contribución a la bibliografía de Leopoldo Lugones, Buenos Aires: María, 1969
Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis 1839–1908

Brazilian prose writer

The literary production of Machado de Assis spans the last stages of the Brazilian Romantic movement and the emergence in Brazil, in the wake of analogous earlier developments in Europe, of the Realist “New Idea.” In his works he was responsible both for divulging and questioning this new approach in a tantalizing manner. Machado both engages with and to a large extent questions the central tenets of Realism, including the optimistic notion of the possibility of an accessible truth as upheld by Positivism. His writing spans most of the literary genres but excels in particular in the sphere of the novel and short story.

Machado shared with many authors of his period in Brazil and Europe alike a reformist concern. In his case this finds expression not in prescriptive formulae for social modification but instead in an irony which seeks to denounce wrongs through laughter. His targets are both some of the more pernicious premises of 19th-century Realist thought, and also the specifically Brazilian adaptations of these principles. Works such as Memórias póstumas de Brás Cubas (Epitaph of a Small Winner) and Quincas Borba (The Heritage of Quincas Borba or Philosopher or Dog?), for example, parody certain concepts central to Realist thought, such as Darwinism and natural selection. The reader is made aware that dangers lurk under the comic surface: the sanctioning within society of a so-called law of nature (the survival of the fittest), unrestrained by any measure of collective or individual responsibility or altruism.

Such considerations are applied throughout his work to specific problems; for example, the interaction of the sexes, the races, social classes, nations or continents. In the last case, his particular concern is the interaction between Europe as a whole and Brazil as a nation on the periphery of European concerns. However, since Europe profoundly influenced Brazilian society, political life, ideology and mores, Machado’s universality (that is, the appreciation of his work in the Western world) is ensured. At the same time, he preserves his interest in the local and his status as, in his own definition, “a man of his epoch and of his country.”
To the reader of later periods, Machado’s voice offers a remarkably contemporary ressonance, and a common denominator of scepticism regarding the possibility of transcendence or attainable truth. All this indicates, much more clearly than any 19th-century optimism, a modern awareness of fragmentation and loss. His is a reflection on the society of his period which offers a savage commentary on the moral contradictions of Brazil. The young nation felt compelled to adopt European models uncritically and superficially, and to promote industrialization without conviction, liberalism while preserving slavery, and scientifism devoid of moral responsibility.

Machado’s scepticism concerning the possibility of human goodness, which is intimately linked to his disavowal of the notion of truth in human relations, becomes particularly visible in his later novelistic work. It is customary to divide Machado’s production into two phases; the first encompasses his first four novels, some short fiction, a few plays, much of his poetry and a considerable number of his crônicas (journalistic sketches) and critical writing. The second includes the last five novels and a substantial number of short stories, as well as contributions to the other genres. Although some of the concerns already outlined are adumbrated in the earlier works, it is in later novels, and in particular in those in which first-person narration is used, namely Memórias póstumas de Brás Cubas, Dom Casmurro and Memorial de Aires (Counselor Ayres’ Memorial), that he resorts to certain discursive tactics and methods. These are deployed so that the reader’s expectations of a reliable narrative voice and the veracity of the plot are undermined at the end. It is also in the later works that certain areas of specific social concern, and in particular identifiable recurring preoccupations with issues of class and gender, of poverty and female exclusion, of marginalization on grounds of material or sexual status, emerge as the products of a lifelong meditation.

The body of his work offers to the contemporary reader an uncannily modern insistence on issues such as power and disempowerment, treated in a manner that conforms more easily to inclusion within a late 20th-century gaze than to an optimistic, reformist late 19th-century understanding. His numerous female characters in their roles as mothers, daughters and sisters, wives, widows and mistresses, and men in antithetical roles as masters or slaves, rich or poor, are shown to be perceptually mediated by a gaze, usually that of a narrator, and on closer investigation seen to be distorting and often deliberately so, a mendacious falsifier of reality. That reality, therefore, becomes itself inaccessible in a universe of fiction in which the interference of the perceptual and narrative processes is everything, and in which themes of ressurrected classical tragedy, such as murder, kinslaying, incest, betrayal and retribution exist side by side with a contemporary treatment of areas of debate around the issues of sex, class and race.

Machado de Assis emerges as both a "man of his epoch and of his country," the chronicler of the Brazilian local, and as an articulator of universal myths and concerns. His voice, representative both of 19th-century contemporaneity and of prophetic wisdom, foretells the dilemmas of a modernity which both formally and thematically he anticipated by at least half a century, in his depiction of a universe ideologically decentred and devoid of the possibility of transcendental truth.

MARIA MANUEL LISBOA
Encyclopedia of Latin American literature

932

Biography
Born in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 21 June 1839. Worked as a clerk and later typographer's apprentice at the National Press, 1854-58; salesman and proofreader, Paulo Brito Bookshop. Published his first works in periodicals including A Marmota Fluminense, Correio Mercantil, Diário do Rio de Janeiro and A Semana Ilustrada. Married Carolina de Novaes in 1869 (died in 1904). Clerk, then Director of accounting division, Ministry of Agriculture, Commerce and Public Works, 1873-1908. Member, and censor, 1862-64, Conservatório Dramático Brasileiro. Granted the Order of the Rose, 1888. Founding president, Academia Brasileira de Letras, 1897-1908. Died 29 September 1908.

Selected Works
Novels
Ressurreição, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1872
A mão e a luva, Rio de Janeiro: Gomes de Oliveira, 1874; as The Hand and the Glove, translated by Helena, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1876; as Helena, translated by Helen Caldwell, Berkeley:
University of California Press, 1984 laid Garcia, Rio de Janeiro: G. Vianna, 1878; as Yayá Garcia, translated by R.L. Scott-Buccleuch, London: Peter Owen, 1976
Memórias póstumas de Brás Cubas, Rio de Janeiro: Tipografica Nacional, 1881; as Epitaph of a W.H. Allen, 1953; as Posthumous Reminiscences of Bras Cubas, translated by E. Percy Ellis, Quincas Borba, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1891; as The Heritage of Quincas Borba, translated by Clotilde Wilson, London: W.H. Allen, 1954; retitled as Philosopher or Dog?, New York:
Noonday Press, 1954
Dom Casmurro, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1899; as Dom Casmurro, translated by Helen Caldwell, Esaú e Jacó, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1904; as Esau and Jacob, translated by Helen Caldwell, Memorial de Aires, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1908; as Counselor Ayres' Memorial, translated by Helen Caldwell, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1972; as The Wager: Aires' Journal,

Short Fiction
Contos fluminenses, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1872
Histórias da meia-noite, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1873
Papéis avulsos, Rio de Janeiro: Lombaerts, 1882
Histórias sem data, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1884
Várias histórias, Rio de Janeiro: Laemmert, 1896
Páginas recolhidas, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1899
Relíquias de Casa Velha, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1906

Plays
Desencantos: fantasia dramática, Poesias completas, Rio de Janeiro: Paula Brito, 1861
Quase ministro, Rio de Janeiro: Serafim José Alves, 1864(?)


Os deuses de casaca, Rio de Janeiro: Tipografia do Imperial Instituto Artístico, 1866
Tu, so tu, puro amor, Rio de Janeiro: Lombaerts, 1881

Poetry
Crisálidas, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1864
Falenas, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1870
Americanas, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1875 Compilations and Anthologies
Poesias completas, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1901
Teatro, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1910 [Includes O caminho da porta; O protocolo; Quase ministro; Os deuses de casaca; Tu, so tu, puro amor; Não consultes médico; Lição de botânica]
Crítica, edited by Mário de Alencar, Rio de Janeiro: Garnier, 1910
Obras completas, 31 vols, Rio de Janeiro: W.M. Jackson, 1937-42

Anthologies in Translation
The Devil's Church and Other Stories, edited and translated by Jack Schmitt and Lorie Ishimatsu, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1977; Manchester: Carcanet, 1985
Further Reading
The bibliography on Machado de Assis is extensive. The following recommended works will be useful in following up the aspects of his work emphasized above.
Caldwell, Helen, Machado de Assis: the Brazilian Master and His Novels, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1970
Maia Neto, José Raimundo, Machado de Assis, the Brazilian Pyrrhonian, West Lafayette, Indiana: Purdue University Press, 1994
Schwarz, Roberto, Ao vencedor as batatas: forma literária e processo social nos inícios do romance brasileiro, São Paulo: Duas Cidades, 1977
Um mestre na periferia do capitalismo, São Paulo: Duas Cidades, 1990
Stein, Ingrid, Figuras femininas em Machado de Assis, Rio de Janeiro: Paz e Terra, Coleção Literatura e Teoria Literária, 1984
Xavier, Therezinha Mucci de, A personagem feminina no romance de Machado de Assis, Rio de Janeiro: Presença Edições, Coleção Atualidade Crítica, 1986

Bibliography
Sousa de Galante, José, Bibliografia de Machado de Assis, Rio de Janeiro: Instituto Nacional do Livro, 1955
Dom Casmurro

Novel by Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis

First published in 1899, Dom Casmurro is the third and most famous novel of the mature phase of Machado de Assis and also, to borrow the novel’s term, “the most oblique and dissembling” of all his novels.

At a first reading of Dom Casmurro the innocent reader is immediately led into a trap: this being to pass judgement on the character Capitu, accused by her husband and childhood sweetheart Bento Santiago, the “casmurro” [aloof] narrator of these memoirs, of committing the crime of adultery with his best friend Escobar. In this sense the book belongs in a certain category of the 19th-century novel, namely that concerned with the psychological study of feminine adultery, of which O primo Basílio [Cousin Basílio] and Madame Bovary are examples.

However, a more careful reading will certainly reveal that Dom Casmurro, if it is a study at all, is a study of jealousy based on the account of a husband committed to convincing himself and the reader of his wife’s guilt. If in the beginning this remains unnoticed, it is probably because readers allow themselves to be impressed by the poetic and social prestige of the narrator. In fact, how can one not trust a distinguished gentleman, already in his sixties, alien to the practical issues in life, a well-educated prose writer who is obsessed by reminiscences of his childhood, of his first sweetheart?

Readers begin to grow suspicious only when eventually they consider the possibility that since the case is being made by a very interested party, it may well be biased. After all, readers know that Bento has no concrete proof of adultery, and that the alleged similarity between his son Ezequiel and Escobar is not that marked, in a narrative that presents a succession of physiognomic resemblances and coincidences of all sorts.

Once that initial suspicion is aroused the next step is to note the tendentious way in which the narrator organizes the evidence of Capitu’s supposed guilt. This is established on the basis of what seems to be his main argument. He wants to convince us that the behaviour of the girl with the eyes of an “oblique and sly” gipsy already predicted the future unfaithfulness of the woman: “e tu concordarás comigo; se te lembrás bem da Capitu menina, has de reconhecer que uma estava dentro da outra, como a fruta dentro da casca” (and you will agree with me. If you remember Capitu the girl, you must admit that one was inside the other, as the fruit is inside the husk).

Again, the only image of the girl Capitu that is available to the reader is the picture sketched by the narrator. And so we realize that it is not by chance that he spends two-thirds of the novel portraying her, colouring with the brightest colours her supposed slyness. Accordingly, if one takes a closer look at this delineation of character, one will notice that both the account of Capitu’s behaviour and the very narrative organization of these memoirs have the rigour of a premeditated account. Bento tells the reader that he had already reached the middle of the book and “the best of the narrative [is] still to come.” In addition, his main goal is to persuade us to condemn his spouse out of hand. After all, it is not a coincidence that Machado de Assis attributes to the husband the profession of lawyer and, therefore, ability in the art of persuasion. Given all these considerations, what initially readers thought of as the evocation of sincere memories reveals itself as a disguised effort against Capitu. It is the self-justification of a jealous husband, haunted by the responsibility: “Aí vindes outra vez, inquietas sombras?” (Come ye again, restless shades?)—of having cast out his wife and son until death. His reconstruction of the past is biased and generous to himself, since its aim, by persuading himself and the reader of Capitu’s guilt, is to free himself from these “restless shades.” In brief, after a more careful reading of the “oblique and dissembling” pages of Dom Casmurro, we are able to see the prosecutor turned into the culprit who is acting as his own advocate. Machado de Assis thus daringly anticipates what was then an unusual type of narrator, “the narrator put in context,” i.e., the narrator of a story whose drama is completely elucidated only from the moment one takes into account the active bias of the narrator created by the author. This means that behind the story told by the narrator there lies hidden another story told by the author, and to understand this other story in its entirety it is above all important to notice the distance between both points of view. Then the narrator, “disidentified” from the author, loses his status as a voice above any suspicion, to be situated on the same level as the other characters, and therefore a questionable character as well.

In the specific case of Dom Casmurro, from the moment the authority of the narrator is questioned his narration reveals itself as the very opposite, i.e., as an unwilling statement against himself. It is the narrator who is presented to the reader as the one to be judged. In this way, throughout Dom Casmurro, instead of the truth about Capitu the only truth presented by Machado de Assis is the one about the “casmurro” narrator of these memoirs.

TERESINHA V.ZIMBRÃO DA SILVA

Editions

First edition: Dom Casmurro, Rio de Janeiro: Garniei; 1899
Translation: There are several available and a further one is to be published in the late 1990s. At present the most modern is that by R.L.Scott-Buccleuch, London: Peter Owen, 1992.

Further Reading

Only after the publication of Helen Caldwell’s study did Machadian critics realize the unreliability of the narrator in Dom Casmurro. Up to that point they were lost in discussions about Capitu’s guilt. Caldwell, Helen, The Brazilian Othello of Machado de Assis, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1960
Gledson, John, The Deceptive Realism of Machado de Assis: a Dissenting Interpretation of Dom Casmurro, Liverpool: Cairns, 1984
Magical Realism

From the 1960s, through to the 1990s, magical realism became a much-used term in the discussion of Latin American literature. For some critics, it advertised what made the Latin American novel different from European traditions; for others, more narrowly but more usefully, it defined a specific direction that arose in the Latin American novel around the mid-20th century and that could be distinguished from Social Realism as its counterpart. This second meaning is the one that will be addressed here. Even in this case, though, the term has come to be used extremely loosely, without clarity as to the meaning of its two components (magic and realism). The only way to achieve that clarity is to place the words in a context of social and cultural history. Before doing that, however, a brief account is needed of how magical realism—as a term and as a way of writing—arose.

The key examples here are Alejo Carpentier, Miguel Ángel Asturias, Juan Rulfo and Gabriel García Márquez. In the preface to his novel El reino de este mundo, 1949 (The Kingdom of this World), Carpentier proposes that “lo real maravilloso” defines the most accurate way of seeing the history of Latin America. The main characteristic of the marvellous in the real is the way in which European myths and dreams, from the Fountain of Eternal Youth to Surrealism’s desire to make dream into reality, have found their real counterparts in Latin America. The marvellous in Latin America is not a mere literary fabrication, “presupone una fe” (it assumes a belief) it is a question of people actually believing in such things as El Dorado, the city of the Golden Man, which was still being sighted, as Carpentier points out, in the 20th century.

As a method for writing novels in the 20th century, marvellous realism (though Carpentier does not actually use the term) involves juxtaposing European and native—in Carpentier’s case, African-Caribbean—perceptions of events. The best example in Carpentier’s novel is the burning at the stake of Mackandal, leader of a slave revolt. In the white version, he is seen to be consumed by the flames. In the black one, he shoots up into the sky untouched by the fire. With this method, events themselves can become ambiguous, because told from more than one narrative position, a device which responds to a situation of cultural duality. This duality between colonial and native cultures pertains in most of Latin America, giving wide relevance to Carpentier’s method.

Magical realism, as the words indicate, is the proposal of a method for giving to magic the status of reality. The main difficulty is the definition of magic. Rather than trying to arrive at a theory of it (there is no consistent theory of magical realism), it is better to trace the various ways of writing associated with it. Although the expression was first used in German art criticism in the 1920s, its Latin American meaning is different and dates from the 1950s. Works like Asturias’s Hombres de maíz (Men of Maize), Rulfo’s Pedro Páramo and above all García Márquez’s Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude) became its defining examples. What distinguished these novels was the treatment of native and popular beliefs as valid knowledge rather than as exotic folklore. This meant that these beliefs would penetrate the language used for narrating and readers would not be able to rely on Western scientific-rational ideas associated with Progress to interpret what they read. The first few pages of any of the novels mentioned above will make that clear: in Pedro Páramo, for example, it emerges that all the characters are dead. In opting against the rationalism of progress, these and other similar writers are adopting the ways of seeing, speaking and thinking of the regional societies which had not been modernised. In the case of García Márquez, it is the Caribbean coast of Colombia, specifically its oral traditions (full of “superstition”), which supplies a view of the world that challenges the usual Western ideas of modernity by validating magical attitudes. Neoliberal thinking of the 1980s and 1990s, as personified say in Vargas Llosa, has argued that these attitudes are “archaic” and stand in the way of progress.

However, the novels in question suggest a different way of looking at the issue. Instead of characterising the ethnic or mestizo cultures of the regions as “backward,” they propose that in Latin America modern and non-modern societies exist alongside each other, without one being superior to the other, and that it is in their creative as opposed to destructive interaction that the possibilities of an alternative, transcultural, modernity are to be found (these arguments are elaborated by J.Martín-Barbero in Procesos de comunicación y matrices de cultura and Ángel Rama in Transculturación narrativa en América Latina).

García Márquez’s methods are a mixture of this type: on the one hand Kafka and, on the other, folk-tales and popular oral memories. This mixture of the avant-garde and the nonmodern is equally to be found in Asturias, Rulfo and Guimarães Rosa, or in the films of Glauber Rocha. To call their materials magical is to draw attention to their incompatibility with those programmes of rational enlightenment and modernization which virtually all governments of the last two centuries have imposed. Historically, the “superstitions” that these artists treat seriously in their works arose during the colonial period, in the interstices of the colonial societies, where actual everyday life was governed more by a mixture of native, black African and popular Spanish beliefs than by the official version of orthodox Christian belief. This mentality continues, for example, in popular Catholicism, where saints, many of them unrecognised by the Vatican, are treated as capable of miracles, and the dead are believed to continue their lives on the earth at certain times and places.

Much criticism of magical realism ignores the fact that such a collection of beliefs is not necessarily a release but a suffocating trap (Rulfo’s characters are trapped inside the hell of popular catholicism) or more broadly a form of social control (as it is in García Márquez, particularly for the women). Magical realism in its beginnings was not a type of literary fantasy—European critics compared it with the literature of the fantastic—but a presentation of the social imagination of particular groups. Thus García Márquez has often insisted that what seems fantastic to certain readers and critics is actually an ordinary, everyday reality. It seems fantastic or exotic if you are not aware of the social and historical context.

In the 1980s, magical realism became a genre formula, transferable to scenarios that lacked the particular historical characteristics outlined above, and was even adopted as a model by non-Latin American writers (such as Angela Carter). The Chilean novelist Isabel Allende uses in her narratives magic as an amalgam of styles from previous writers like García Márquez. The term “magical” becomes problematic when it no longer includes a recognition that modern societies also use magic in that they use hidden forms of control which include what is called News, something that García Márquez learned when he was a journalist. In this light, the classic theories of realism, such as Lukács’s, which often underlie definitions of magical realism, for example, that of Gerald Martin in Journeys through the Labyrinth, become untenable.

Historically, magical realism has to do with the Latin American experience of modernization, in particular with the massive migration of rural populations to cities, which produced a confrontation between urban and rural cultural universes. Removed from this base, magic becomes wish-fulfillment or drug (William Empson’s word for the Edwardian taste in magic). Latin America inherited two forms of reason that disallowed magic: medieval scholasticism and the Reason of the French Enlightenment. The first engaged in extirpating idolatry (i.e., native religions) in the colonial period, the second in eradicating superstition so as to achieve modernity. Magical realism, which draws on popular rather than erudite traditions, opens up an alternative way of looking at things.

Not all literature that explores native cultures can be called magical realist. If the marvellous, as Carpentier points out, requires faith, then it can only be experienced by a believer, in which case it is no longer marvellous. Thus the effect of the marvellous or the magical, as something capable of being experienced by a reader, arises from a dramatized juxtaposition of rationality and beliefs that do not fit. Where a writer extensively uses native cultural forms as bases for narrative, then the novel ceases to be a European, erudite form upholding a rational world that can be played off against magic. In this sense, the novels of José María Arguedas, for instance, should not be called magical realist, a fact that helps to define the limits of the concept and get rid of some of the confusions it has caused.

WILLIAM ROWE

See also entries on Best-Sellers: Isabel Allende, El reino de este mundo (Alejo Carpentier)

Further Reading

Alexis, Jacques-Stéphane, “Du Réalisme merveilleux des Haïtiens,” Presence Africaine 8–10 (June–November 1956)

Larsen, Ross, Fantasy and Imagination in the Mexican Narrative, Tempe, Arizona: Center for Latin American Studies, 1977 [Chapter 7 is on Magical Realism in Mexico]

Yates, Donald A. (editor), Otros mundos, otros fuegos: fantasía y realismo mágico en Iberoamérica, Pittsburgh: Latin American Studies Center of Michigan University, 1975

[Published conference papers with contributions on the history of the term, etc., by excellent critics such as Emir Rodríguez Monegal]
Eduardo Mallea 1903–1982

Argentine prose writer

When Eduardo Mallea died in 1982, he died a bitter man, his friends say. Whilst Argentine contemporaries like Borges, Sábato and even Cortázar in exile, were being praised by the world’s press and the academy’s scholars, Mallea suffered in silence, underestimated even by his compatriots. That he also wrote about his suffering—“He escrito siempre con sufrimiento” (I have always written with suffering) he said in Notas de un novelista, 1954 [Notes of a Novelist]—is the stuff of his fiction of ideas which deal with human passions. Mallea’s novels were too intellectual, too much like fictionalised essays, his critics claimed, to attract a wide public. Suspect too for some was his apparent concern for hondura (depth) rather than belleza (beauty), a charge that at times undermined the reputation of the artist, if boosting the image of the thinker, concerned as he was with man’s place in the universe and the human condition.

If such terms orient the reader towards the existentialist ideas emanating from France in the late 1930s and 1940s (Camus, Malraux, Sartre), it is no coincidence. But Mallea never lost sight of the fact that he was an Argentine. In 1937 he published his Historia de una pasión argentina (History of an Argentine Passion), a seminal essay important not only as a résumé of Mallea’s key ideas on argentinidad, the national identity, and the search for the soul of his country, but also because it contains the aesthetic and philosophical seeds of the rest of his fictional output—not to mention the spiritual autobiography of the author. Historia de una pasión argentina is the work of a thinker (pensador) in a long tradition that starts in the 19th century with Sarmiento, Aiberdi and Mitre, and continues in the 20th with Martínez Estrada, Gálvez, Scalabrini Ortiz and others. All these men of ideas tried to penetrate to the alma de la raza (the soul of the race), to analyse and explain the phenomenon of civilización/barbarie, and other “guiding fictions,” to repeat the phrase of Nicolas Shumway in his recent study, The Invention of Argentina. Like Gálvez, faced with the conduct of the corrupt conservative oligarchy of the 1930s, and the growing materialism, philistinism and lack of spiritual values, Mallea sought to examine the Argentine character through his concept of the two Argentinias, visible and invisible. The visible Argentina is represented by the cold, hard city of Buenos Aires, unnatural, artificial, deceitful, pretentious, with no substance, as opposed to the invisible Argentina to be found in the hinterland, close to nature, warm, hospitable, authentic, the source of Argentina’s true nature which had been corrupted by a selfish, greedy society, tempted by quick progress and easy profits, which can only undermine the hidden values of the true Argentina. This important essay was to influence many of Mallea’s novels, like Fiesta en noviembre, 1938 (Fiesta in November), Todo verdor perecerá, 1941 (All Green Shall Perish), Chaves, 1953 (Chaves and Other Stories) and others, but none so obviously and so closely as his key novel La bahía de silencio, 1940 (The Bay of Silence). The fact that his view of the two Argentinias turned on its head Sarmiento’s classic opposition of civilisation and barbarism or city and country in Facundo, 1845 (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants) reinforced by Martínez Estrada’s gloomy and pessimistic view as expressed in Radiografía de la pampa, 1933 (X-Ray of the Pampa), enhances Mallea’s position as a revolutionary thinker on the Argentine way of being.
It is always a very dangerous practice to describe in general terms the art of any writer, which is usually a complex and evolving process. However, at the risk of simplifying a complicated procedure, one can state without too much fear of contradiction that Mallea operates at two levels which one can loosely call the “universal” (that is, Western) and the national. Universal in this context signifies that Mallea is a modern writer who deals with contemporary problems of existence, which implies a group of concepts like lack of communication, especially between the sexes, solitude, isolation, the search for a meaning in life, that is, the themes of his French existentialist mentors. On the national level, Mallea is clearly concerned with the aforementioned themes of argentinidad, the national character, and the search for the identity of his people.

The universal current is noted early in Mallea’s fiction by way of a literary line which can be traced directly from his first early work, Cuentos para una inglesa desesperada, 1916 [Tales for a Desperate Englishwoman], and through to works of the 1940s and 1950s, characterised by what Myron Lichtblau identifies as emotional mutism, in which Mallea describes the human condition without underscoring the geographical, historical background or the Argentine way of being. What interested the young Mallea, and was to persist throughout his work, was the condition of alienated, anguished characters suffering in an impersonal, indifferent, inhospitable society the effects of inner silence—not unlike the visible Argentina portrayed in Historia de una pasión argentina, as symbolised by Buenos Aires, la ciudad-cáncer (cancer city), to cite Roberto Arlt’s phrase.

Running parallel with this tendency, then, is the other Mallean concern, the national problem, which can be traced in another line from Historia de una pasión argentina up through La bahía de silencio and on into the 1970s, for example, En la creciente oscuridad, 1973 [In the Growing Darkness]. However, it should be added that one of the merits of La bahía de silencio resides in the fact that Mallea transcends the purely regional by commenting on the human condition within the framework of what appears to be essentially an Argentine novel. Although there is a certain similarity between Mallea and Gálvez, writing at the same time on similar problems of the 1930s, Mallea is a more profound thinker and perhaps a more conscious artist, despite the tendency of critics to classify his work as philosophical essays disguised as fiction.

If at times Mallea gives the impression of being more concerned with expressing truth in human terms rather than the fulfilment of aesthetic needs, he is no primitive in the field of literature and literary theory, as his critical essays in Notas de un novelista and Poderío de la novela, 1965 [Power of the Novel] indicate.

As Donald Shaw has noted in the introduction to his edition of Todo verdor perecerá, the fundamental idea in Mallea, as in his contemporaries Gálvez and Barrios, is that the real proof of the artistic value of any writer can be found in the depth of his metaphysical perspective: “Toda obra grande es, por dentro, de planteo y paisaje general. Por eso un gran escritor es un escritor de paso ancho.” (Every great work is, essentially, made up of ideas and general background. Therefore a great writer is a writer who takes broad steps). Thus, if Mallea, in his search for individual, national or “universal” (i.e., Western) authenticity, allows his metaphysical concerns to take precedence over the so-called formal aspects of the novel, one ought not to consider any digressions as a sign of his inability to write worthwhile narratives. Mallea’s novels are far from being boring and formless, as some critics have unjustly described La bahía de silencio, perhaps his most important and most influential novel.

One can appreciate this key novel fully only in the light of Mallea’s concept of the two Argentinas. La bahía de silencio is the search by the (possibly autobiographical) protagonist Martín Tregua for a group of kindred spirits and a set of spiritual values on which to found the regeneration of his country. At the same time, he desires to establish certain moral precepts, permanent and stable, on which he can also construct a personal vision of life which might then have some meaning. If the novel appears to end on a tragic note, in the sense that Tregua never really finds his authentic Juan Argentino, or solves his own personal problems, it may be deemed a failure, but only for the want of suitable witnesses who cannot or will not listen to Tregua’s message of hope and regeneration. But the title of the novel also implies the positive act of waiting. That bay of silence, it should be remembered, is a waiting place for those optimists who can drift outward—and upward. On a final positive note, then, one can argue that Mallea’s novels, like Tregua’s work, because of the very fact that they have been written, will have permanent metaphysical and aesthetic value.

Mallea need not have died so embittered. His considerable output of novels and essays make a valid contribution to Argentine literature and thought, through their treatment of the key questions of argentinidad and national identity, at the same time as dealing with the transcendental problems of the human condition which help us to examine, if not to decipher, the mystery of existence. Mallea’s thought-provoking work will continue to be read after more popular and best-selling novels gather dust on library shelves.

JOHN WALKER

Biography

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction

Cuentos para una inglesa desesperada, Buenos Aires: Gleizer, 1926
La ciudad junto al río inmóvil, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1936
Fiesta en noviembre, Buenos Aires: Amigos del Libro Argentino, 1938; as Fiesta in November, translated by Alis de Solá, London: Calder and Boyars, 1969
La bahía de silencio, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1940; as The Bay of Silence, translated by Stuart Edgar Grummon, New York: Knopf, 1944
Las águilas, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1943
Rodeada está de sueño, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe, 1944
El retorno, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe, 1946
Los enemigos del alma, Buenos Aires: Sudamerica, 1950
La torre, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1951
Chaves, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1953; as Chaves and Other Stories, translated by María Mercedes Aspiazu, London: Calder and Boyars, 1970
La sala de espera, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1953
Notas de un novelista, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1954
Simbad, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1957
Poseción, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1958
La razón humana, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1959
La guerra interior, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1963
El resentimiento, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1966
La barca de hielo, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1967
La red, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1968
La penúltima puerta, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1969
Gabriel Andaral, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1971
Triste piel del universo, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1971
En la creciente oscuridad, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1973

Essays
Conocimiento y expresión de la Argentina, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1935
Nocturno europeo, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1935
Meditación en la costa, Buenos Aires: Imprenta Mercatali, 1939
Notas de un novelista, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1954
La razón humana, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1959
La vida blanca, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1960
Poderío de la novela, Buenos Aires: Aguilar, 1965

Compilations and Anthologies
Obras completas, 2 vols, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1961

Further Reading
Like many other (male) post-Boom writers, Mallea has suffered neglect at the hands of critics, preoccupied with Postmodern problems.
Foster, David William, Currents in the Contemporary Argentine Novel, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1975 [Chapter on Mallea]
Lichtblau, Myron I., El rite estilístico de Eduardo Mallea, Buenos Aires: Goyenarte, 1967
Lichtblau, Myron I. (editor), Mallea ante la crítica, Miami: Universal, 1985
Rodríguez Monegal, Emir, Narradores de esta America, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1969
Marcha

See Journals

Leopoldo Marechal 1900–1970

Argentine prose writer, dramatist and poet

Leopoldo Marechal belongs to the so-called “Martin Fierro” generation. He worked for Proa magazine, sponsored by Ricardo Güiraldes and promoted by the supporters of ultraiism, together with Borges, González Lanuza and Oliverio Girondo.

In his first book of poems, Los aguiluchos, 1922. [The Eaglets], the youthful images show Victor Hugo’s influence and contain references to 19th-century French poetry. Pantheism, technical dexterity and metaphoric discoveries would be refined in his later works. In Días como flechas, 1926 [Days Like Arrows], which is marked with a sensual vocabulary, he manages to convey a personal voice celebrating his own self and the joy of the world.

Odas para el hombre y la mujer, 1929 [Odes for Men and Women] is a balanced work which closes a first phase. He wants to interpret the harmony of the world, intensifying the mythology of the countryside, transformed into an ideal territory.

Cinco poemas australes, 1937 [Five Austral Poems], an elegy in which he recalls the time of his childhood, is a lyrical interpretation of Argentine places and traditions, where he allows himself to give in to expressive, intrinsic values. His vehemence is not spoilt by stanzas of controlled ardour. Laberinto de amor, 1935 [Labyrinth of Love], in paired alexandrines and Sonetos a Sophía y otros poemas, 1940 [Sonnets to Sophia and Other Poems] of simple contraction, with themes of a transcendental purpose and a more cerebral content, are restricted to a set metre.

Little by little he combines man’s universal experiences with those of his national circumstances. He shows a high degree of synthesis where verse and expressive rigour meet. He made use of several traditions to merge them into a cumulative compactness: the poetry of the Old Testament, Spanish lyrics, the ancient and the modern, in a profound relationship with American Baroque.

El poema de Robot, 1966 [Robot’s Poem] is a meditation on a scientific circumstance typical of our times, creators of monsters. It is about the author’s thoughts when faced with the tangible and dehumanized reality with which he has to live. The proud “formal aristocracy” of all his work is retained as is poetic purism over spontaneous emotionalism. He wants to establish a philosophy and an ethic of being. His language oscillates between classical in form and modern in concept, in an attempt to summarize all knowledge up to the present time. He gathers together all popular wisdom in the telluric dimension of his verses. He uses capital letters to emphasize the importance of the element he wants to exalt. He instils his experiences and his beliefs into his conceptual poetry.

El heptamerón (1966) is his “summa poética.” The seven days are considered with reflections on aesthetics and morality, together with philosophical preoccupations. It is his most complete allegorical/metaphysical statement. With ethical rigour he takes stock of his life and demonstrates that one’s native country is either a complete and certain entity or it is nothing. Previous generations have bequeathed Utopias, “they taught us the mother country was / I do not yet know what wise paradise / of indefatigable wheatfields and repetitive cows.” Salvation lies in the Cross, which compromises “the vertical of the saint, the horizontal of the hero.”

Marechal’s finest works are his novels: Adán Buenosayres (1948), El banquete de Severo Arcángelo, 1966 [Severo Arcángelo’s Banquet], and his posthumous work Megafón, o la guerra, 1970 [Megaphone or War]. With the first, which is easy to read, Marechal set out to write an epic in prose, something like a synthesis of national life. The hero’s symbolic journey is developed over a series of interior and exterior encounters jointly with other characters. It is a soul’s adventure towards darkness and towards light, containing a rich range of themes, a multiplicity of tones and purposes and a variety of levels of meaning, with an abundance of lyrical and dramatic elements. The novel begins with a metaphysical awakening in a room in Villa Crespo and takes place over a period of three days. The main character succumbs to memories of his childhood, reminiscences about his ancestors, of inconsequentially heroic lives. His private diary (the sixth book of the novel), “Copybook with Blue Covers,” discloses biographical details. The character has imagined himself as an ascetic, a quack, a boxer, a gangster, a pioneer in Patagonia, a founder of cities.

If, in Adán Buenosayres the lyrical element abounds, in El banquete this element disappears and action is the shaping factor. Its thrity-three chapters (symbolizing the life of Christ), attempt to prove man’s precarious nature, and his decadence throughout history. Because there is no omniscient narrator, dramatic devices abound, latent in all the episodes of the novel where objective reality is ignored. Arcángelo is the intermediary between heaven and earth and in Megafón the fictitious narrator “L.M.” is openly the character Leopoldo Marechal. Megafón,” a man of the day before yesterday and a man of the day after tomorrow,” Argentine man, leader and prophet, combines three manifestations: the warrior, the civilizer and the mystic, to fight inertia and indifference. Leopoldo Marechal knew and admired Gnostic metaphysics, occultism, Hinduism, Platonic idealism, the speculations of the cabbala, in a philosophical syncretism similar to that of his character Samuel Tesler. Nevertheless, he used this character to make fun of many ideas which he did not share. He combines the rationalist lines of St Thomas with the oracular and prophetic guidance of oriental religions and the latest theories of contemporary science. In the world proposed by Marechal as an alternative to current reality, man retains his spiritual dignity and his metaphysical hope, his essential optimism and his eclectic deism. Truth exists independently from us, and the essence of a human being is the point of departure of philosophical speculation and precedes existence.
Opposing the fragmented vision of man and of the ordinary world in 20th-century narrative, he starts from a paradigm, that of an integral image of the human being and puts it forward as an example of salvation.

Marechal insists that the fall of the soul is equal to the breakup of the whole person, to its dispersal in multiplicity, to its progressive individualization. Human existence ranks with the banishment from Paradise, it is the soul’s exile in the sentient world. Adam feels a “lost taste of Eden,” even though he many consider that the creation of the world is the result of a loving divine will. Defining himself as “Christian without strings,” Marechal’s intention was to demythologize reality in order to attempt to rescue a legitimate order from false substitutes.

BELLA JOZEF
translated by Patricia James

Biography

Selected Works

Novels
Adán Buenosayres, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1948
El banquete de Severo Arcángelo, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1966
Megafón, o la guerra, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1970

Poetry
Los aguiluchos, Buenos Aires: Gleizer, 1922
Días como flechas, Buenos Aires: Gleizer, 1926
Odas para el hombre y la mujer, Buenos Aires: Libra, 1929
Laberinto de amor, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1935
Cinco poemas australes, Buenos Aires: Cursos de Cultura Católica, 1937
El centauro, Buenos Aires: Sol y Luna, 1940; as The Centaur, translated by Richard O’Connell and James Graham-Luján, in New Directions 8 (1944)
Sonetos a Sophía y otros poemas, Buenos Aires: Sol y Luna, 1940
El viaje de la primavera, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1945
El heptameron, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1966
El poema de Robot, Buenos Aires: Americalée, 1966
Canto de San Martín, Buenos Aires: Castañeda, 1979
Poemas de la creación, Buenos Aires: Castañeda, 1979

Plays

Antígona Vélez, Buenos Aires: Citerea, 1965
Las tres caras de Venus, Buenos Aires: Citerea, 1970
La batalla de José Luna, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1970
Athanar (Sainete Alquímico), in Megañón, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1970
Don Juan, Buenos Aires: Castañeda, 1978

Other Writings

Historia de la calle Corrientes, Buenos Aires: Municipalidad, 1937
Descenso y ascenso del alma por la belleza, Buenos Aires: Sol y Luna, 1939; revised edition, 1965 [definitive version]
Vida de Santa Rosa de Lima, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1943
“Prólogo,” in Cántico espiritual, by St John of the Cross, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1944
“Proyecciones culturales del momento argentino,” in Argentina en marcha, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1947
Cuadernos de navegación, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1966

Compilations and Anthologies

Antología poética, with a preface by Juan Carlos Ghiano, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe, 1950
Antología poética, with a preface by Alfredo Andrés, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1969
Poesía (1924–1950) por Leopoldo Marechal, Buenos Aires: Del 80, 1984

Further Reading

Marianism

Marianism and machismo constitute a binary model for gender relationships in Latin America; while machismo is the cult of virility and aggressiveness, Marianism is the cult of motherhood and of female spiritual superiority over men. As L.P. Stevens notes, Marianism is closely linked to machismo in terms of “reciprocal arrangements” whereby Latin American women benefit from social and economic advantages. The stereotype of women as suffering mothers has been a useful ideological tool for reinforcing customs and beliefs which reduce women to the private realm of the house and the family. A private space from where some female writers have acquired a voice through a production focused on motherhood, such as Lecturas para mujeres [Readings for Women] by Gabriela Mistral or Diario de una joven madre [Diary of a Young Mother] by Juana de Ibarbourou. Nevertheless, while the white woman has traditionally followed this traditional model, David Foster points out in the introduction to his Latin American Writers on Gay and Lesbian Themes that the “indian and the black woman did not follow this pattern of socialization,” and therefore, “they are both coded outside [either] as whores [or] as hysterics.”

Both Marianism and machismo were promoted at the time of the Spanish Empire through its institutions (the state, the church and the army) to sustain class, race and gender domination. The base of this cultural construct originates, on the one hand, in the precolonial myths of the mother goddess who was seen as the source of life and, on the other hand, in the role played by the Virgin Mary as the self-sacrificing and long-suffering mother in the Catholic tradition. Mary provides also a model for chastity which deprives women of sexual pleasure limiting them to reproduction. Although Marianism differs from Mariolatry, which is the cult of the Virgin Mary, it is thought of as a syncretism of the ancient pre-colonial myths and the Christian ones, as is exemplified in the figure of the Mexican Virgin of Guadalupe, who first appeared on Mount Tepeyacac, where the Aztec deity of Tonantzin (“Our mother”) had been worshipped. This cult of Mary the mother virgin is represented in the text written by the Uruguayan poet Juana de Ibarbourou, Lores de Nuestra Señora [Praise to Our Lady].

One of the most popular novels of 20th-century Latin American literature, Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude), contains a parodic version of the Catholic belief in the Assumption of the Virgin Mary. This occurs when Remedios la Bella, who has magic powers over men, is elevated into heaven before dying. Also, the Virgin’s place is taken by one of the characters in Mario Vargas Llosa’s play, La señorita de Tacna (The Young Lady from Tacna) where a woman decides to become the mother of her sister’s children, and so she is both virgin and mother taking the position of Mary, the woman who escapes mortality and is deprived of sexuality.

It is important to note that the most popular Spanish term for a lesbian is marimacho (originally a word for tomboy). This is a linguistic/cultural fusion of the female (María) and the macho which, by moving away from gender polarization, forms an androgynous being without a defined position within the sexual hierarchy.

Military governments in Latin America have used the Marianism/machismo model to limit women to their homes and to reproduction from the 1970s. These same governments have directed torture and violence to the realms of the most sacred places: the church and the home. Their political atrocities have displaced women from the privacy of their homes to the public space where they insist on the social implications of their role as mothers. In countries like Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua, Marianism has been used in the last decades as the conscious female appropriation of their motherhood: an expression of the power of “private” voices transferred to the public realm of political action. This displacement is exemplified in some testimonial texts. One of them by a Bolivian woman, Domitila Barrios de Chungara, ¡Si me permiten hablar! Testimonio de Domitila, una mujer de las minas bolivianas (Let Me Speak! Testimony of Domitila, a Woman of the Bolivian Mines), where a woman has the political voice of the Trade Unions and faces the government to defend the rights of all women’s husbands and children.

The most notable example of Marianism in contemporary Latin America is the case of the mothers of the Plaza de Mayo in Buenos Aires who began to meet every Tuesday, starting in 1976, relying on their identity as mothers of the disappeared to justify their political stance. This happened also in Chile during Pinochet’s dictatorship (1973–90). These women have rearticulated the motherhood discourse and in the name of their sacred condition demand that human rights be respected in their countries. The mothers in both countries have tried to keep their discourse as a resistance to the main patriarchal tradition. Therefore, their voices have not been integrated yet into literary production.

ANA MARÍA BRENES-GARCÍA

Further Reading

Critical Studies
Del Campo, Alicia, “Resignificación del marianismo por los movimientos de mujeres de oposición en Chile,” in Poética de la población marginal: sensibilidades determinantes, edited by James V. Romano, Minneapolis: Prisma Institute, 1987
Montecino, Sonia, et al., Historias testimoniales de mujeres del campo, Santiago de Chile: Circulo de Estudios de la Mujer, 1983
Valenzuela, María Elena, La mujer en el Chile militar: todas ibamos a ser reinas, Santiago de Chile: Ediciones Chile y America, 1987
Creative and Testimonial Works
Mistral, Gabriela, Lecturas para mujeres, Mexico City: Secretaría de Educación, 1923
Vargas Llosa, Mario, La señorita de Tacna, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1981; as The Young Lady from Tacna, translated by David Graham-Young, in Three Plays, London: Faber and Faber, 1990

José Carlos Mariátegui 1894–1930

Peruvian man of ideas
The significance of José Carlos Mariátegui for the whole of Latin America is as great as it is underestimated. His central contribution was in the sphere of political theory and organization. He edited the most important cultural journal of the 1920s, Amauta, and founded the Peruvian Socialist Party in 1928 on the basis of the comprehensive analysis of Peruvian history and social development presented in the best known (and most integrated) of his collections of writings—the Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, 1928 (Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality). He was also the founder of the Peruvian Trade Union Congress (the CGTP) and its most respected leader—the counsel to the movement contained in his First of May Address of 1925 is a key document in the birth of Peruvian trade unionism. In 1929, already so sick, with the disease that was to cause his premature death in early 1930, that he could not attend in person, he wrote three key documents for the Congress of Latin American Communist Parties organized by the Comintern at Montevideo. These documents on the questions of race, antiimperialism and political organization were in many ways prophetic.

Latin America therefore lost its three finest political and trade union leaders within a few years—Mella of Cuba, Recabarren of Chile and Mariátegui of Peru. They were sorely missed in the subsequent decade. But while all three had a lasting impact on the political life of Latin America, Mariátegui’s role in its cultural history was second to none. That role was enshrined in the journal he founded and edited and whose brief existence belied its authority—Amauta. In its pages the issues and debates that concerned progressive artists and intellectuals elsewhere in the world were made known to a Latin American audience, but they were also seen in relation to the central questions of Latin American culture.

Mariátegui was not a spare-time cultural critic; nor was his interest in literature and art limited to a youthful pre-political phase, as some critics have suggested. What he called the “myth” of an age—a concept borrowed from the French theorist Georges Sorel—was the key to his exploration of culture. A revolutionary political analysis, in Mariátegui’s view, contained both an analytical and a visionary element; it was these components which he found in combination in Marxism. The vision captured the society towards which a transforming activity was directed; for Mariátegui, that activity was informed by cultural traditions and experiences both national and international. The pages of Amauta and of his trade union journal Labor gave space to a constant advocacy of the indigenous cause. Amauta also reproduced the writings of the indigenists—like Valcárcel, for example—side by side with articles stemming from cultural debates in the revolutionary movement in Europe and the United States. Henri Barbusse, Louis Aragon, Vladimir Mayakovsky, Trotsky and Serge Lunacharsky were all published in the journal.

In these debates and discussions two elements met. On the one hand, the search for cultural traditions—chiefly the collectivism of the Indian communities; on the other, a continuing discussion of the role of committed intellectuals in forging a national culture.

From a much earlier stage Mariátegui was also absorbed by the visionary qualities of artistic forms and movements not necessarily committed to social transformation, yet which should also be seen as critical of a narrow and unequal social order. In his youth, and in his reports for journals like Mundial (Lima) Mariátegui was first and foremost an iconoclast, identifying with the bohemian poets and artists who had colonised Lima’s central avenue, the Jirón de la Unión. He was one of a group who scandalised Lima’s conservative elite by inviting a Russian ballerina to dance at midnight in a cemetery—like the great Russian poet Mayakovsky, he was first a revolutionary artist and only later a political revolutionary. But there was no break between the two, rather a movement from revolutionary thought through theory (discussed in the collection Ideología y política) to political action. One of his seminal Siete ensayos, for example, addresses “El proceso de la literatura” [The Process of Literature]. Here he seeks “el sentido profundo de una literatura” (the deep sense of a literature), and finds that “se instaura el proceso de la literatura nacional” (the process of forging a national literature has begun). In confronting modernity, the “colony”—the intellectual dependence on the metropolis—must be broken, just as the great poet Manuel González Prada had enjoined Peruvian youth to break with Spain. The problem was that many writers and artists identified with those new currents that in Europe represented a withdrawal from a rejection of the older cultural traditions. For the Latin American, Mariátegui insists, that it not enough; but neither should it be rejected. The finest and most stimulating artists, and those who will provide the building blocks of a new national culture, are not limited to one field or another, but rather borrow from many, be they national or cosmopolitan. The important thing is to find new forms, that break the imposed mould of thought and permit the construction in the imagination of a world that will be built in the reality. It was in this sense that Mariátegui was no enthusiast about the work of César Vallejo, for example.

The years after Mariátegui’s death have shown how major a lacuna he left behind. There is a tragic irony in the fact that this revolutionary humanist and organizer of broad vision has been claimed as their own by a series of organizations characterised by sectarianism and the narrowest of nationalisms. The whole body of Mariátegui’s work was broad in its horizons, catholic in its embrace and open in its understanding of the complex and eclectic nature of national cultures—seeing both complexity and openness as the material from which a new world could be forged. At the same time these insights were interwoven with the practical business of organizing trade unions, and building an organization of revolutionaries.

MIKE GONZALEZ
Biography

Selected Works

La escena contemporánea, Lima: Minerva, 1925

Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, Lima: Amauta, 1928; as Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality, translated by Marjory Urquidi, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971

Defensa del marxismo, Santiago de Chile: Nacional y Extranjeras, 1934

El alma matinal y otras estaciones del hombre de hoy, Lima: Amauta, 1950

Historia de la crisis mundial: conferencias (1923–1924), Lima: Amauta, 1959

Signos y obras, Lima: Amauta, 1959

Temas de nuestra América, Lima: Amauta, 1960

La organización del proletariado, Lima: Amauta, 1967

Cartas de Italia, Lima: Amauta, 1969

Crítica literaria, Buenos Aires: Jorge Álvarez, 1969

Ideología y política, Lima: Amauta, 1969

Figuras y aspectos de la vida mundial, Lima: Amauta, 1970

Peruanicemos al Perú, Lima: Amauta, 1970

El proletariado y su organización, Mexico City: Solidaridad, 1970

Temas de educación, Lima: Amauta, 1970

Fascismo sudamericano: los intelectuales y la revolución y otros artículos inéditos (1923–24), Lima: Amauta, 1975

Las tapadas, in collaboration with Julio Baudoin, Lima: Amauta, 1976

Compilations and Anthologies

Ediciones populares de las obras completas de José Carlos Mariátegui, 20 vols, Lima: Amauta, 1959–70

Translations
Further Reading

Aricó, José (editor), Mariátegui y los orígenes del marxismo latinoamericano, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1978

Belaúnde, Víctor Andrés, “En torno a los Siete ensayos de José Carlos Mariátegui,” in La realidad nacional, Lima: Villanueva, 1980

Salazar Bondy, Augusto, “El pensamiento de Mariátegui y la filosofía marxista,” in Historia de las ideas en el Perú contemporáneo, Lima: Francisco Moncloa, 1965

Terán, Oscar, Discutir Mariátegui, Mexico City: Katún, 1985

José Mármol 1817–1871

Argentine prose writer and poet

José Mármol was the most versatile writer of the talented Generation of 1837, with journalistic articles, essays, and drama to his credit, but excelling most in lyrical poetry and the novel. In 1839—at the age of twenty three—he spent six days incarcerated by the regime of the Argentine dictator, Juan Manuel de Rosas, and later passed into exile, which would last till the fall of the strongman, Rosas, in 1852. In Montevideo he forged personal and ideological ties not only with Esteban Echeverría, Juan Bautista Alberdi, and Juan María Gutiérrez, the guiding spirits of the Romantic generation’s “Asociación de Mayo,” but also with Florencio Varela, leader of the exiled Unitarian Party. The trials of political persecution and exile constitute the central focus of his literary production, most of which was written during the exile period. After 1852, Mármol would serve the province of Buenos Aires, then the united country, in several important capacities provincial representative, national senator, director of the National Library, delegate to constitutional conventions, ambassador—yet his arrogant and tempestuous personality often impeded fruitful results.

His literary production had a decidedly political focus. Like that of the other renowned 1837 militants, his most important writings played a part in the ideological and propagandistic campaign to discredit Rosas and to promote the liberal, social and political order that would follow on the tyrant’s downfall. Mármol’s writing, born of political expediency, exuded the political and civic passion that he lived in those trying days. Few internalized better than he the tenets of Romantic versification, that made light of grammatical correctness and favored instead robust, sonorous verses. In the poetic competitions of 1841 held in Montevideo, Mármol’s patriotic poem, “Al 25 de mayo,” [To the 25th of May] won the highest honors, gaining him instant renown among his exiled compatriots as “bard of democracy.” Domingo Faustino Sarmiento, who appreciated any politically inspired writing, called Mármol “poet of maldition” whose verses made him “the most impassioned enemy of tyranny.” But Echeverría, for whom political intentions were viewed as a contaminating force in artistic matters, surely had Mármol in mind when he denounced his fellow exiles on account of their opportunistic and demagogic writings in the pages of Montevideo’s press.

Mármol’s intense interior life also found expression in lyric poetry, a genre that attracted few writers or readers in the conflict-ridden environment of mid-century Argentina. In 1844, a near-death experience in a storm while aboard a schooner attempting to navigate around Cape Horn en route to Chile, provided the inspiration for the resonant Romantic verses of Cantos del peregrino, 1847 [Songs of the Pilgrim], whose title, tone and content reveal the poet’s debt to Byron’s Childe Harold’s Pilgrimage. The narrative thread uniting the distinct parts of this fragmentary work is the sea voyage from Brazil to Montevideo of the exiled Carlos, during which time he poetically contemplates his interior world and the tempestuous natural forces. Here the Romantic creed predominates: the poet is a prophet exiled from an imperfect and impure humanity whose words bespeak the message of the gods. Mármol’s other important poetic work, Armonías, 1851 [Harmonies], also from his period in exile, utilized the gamut of meters associated with the Hispanic Romantic canon in expressing profound feelings for nature and man’s striving for a more just social order.

Without doubt Mármol’s most lasting legacy in the canon of Argentine and Latin American literature is his novel, Amalia, parts of which were published in instalments in the Montevidean press in 1851, and then in its entirety in Buenos Aires in 1855. It is the finest work of narrative fiction by any writer of his generation, and is rivaled only by Sarmiento’s biography cum essay, Facundo, 1845 (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants) in presenting a sociological, historical, and ideological interpretation of Argentine -politics and society during the Rosas period. In depicting the persecution and terror experienced by the members of the young generation of intellectuals at the hands of Rosas’s henchmen, Mármol was able to draw upon his own experiences between 1839 and 1840: his brief incarceration, months of clandestine opposition, and a harrowing escape to Montevideo. Also of documentary value are the literary portraits offered in the novel of the diabolical sister of the dictator, and his enchanting daughter, Manuelita; Cuitiño, a blood-thirsty military official reputed to be Rosas’s preferred executioner; the mazoqueros (literally, corn huskers), or band of thugs hired to persecute the regime’s alleged enemies; and Florencio Varela, Mármol’s erstwhile friend and liberal supporter in Montevideo.

Typical of the variant of Romanticism that prevailed in Hispanic America, the novelistic action of Amalia centers on a series of oppositions: love versus hate, spirit versus body, Christianity versus satanism, liberty versus oppression, civilization versus barbarism. Characterization predictably follows a melodramatic pattern: Daniel Bello and Eduardo Belgrano, the leading male characters, are physically and morally “beautiful,” and incarnate the most idealized values of Mármol’s generation; Amalía, the female protagonist, is remarkable only on account of her transcendental spirituality: with a body enjoying “celestial resplendence” and a sensitivity pointing toward an “diaphanous, bluish space,” she more resembles an idea associated with the Argentine ideal than a flesh-and-blood woman. On the other hand, the figures associated with the Rosas regime—with the exception of Manuelita—are depicted in deformed, darkened, animalistic terms. The novelistic action revolves around a conspiracy planned by the young men, their discovery by a paid informer of the regime, and their brutal assassination.

An ideological reading of the novel reveals several interesting facets of Mármol’s world view and his place within the society that would emerge after the fall of Rosas. First, there is the author’s recalcitrant unitarianism and, as such, the total war he declared on the federalist creed and its followers in the country’s interior. Not uncommon, for an intellectual of the period, was his fervent support of the Europeanized culture of Buenos Aires, and a corresponding disdain for what he considered to be the brutish customs and values of the country’s Hispanic, Indian, and mixed-raced peoples, in addition to its large black slave population. But Mármol’s extreme unitarian beliefs and adherence to the “monarchic principle” many times led him to oppose not only the compromise politics of the more moderate members of his generation—Echeverría, Alberdi, Gutiérrez, V.F.López—but also the republicanism of Sarmiento.

Lastly, the failed rescue at the end of the novel by Bello’s father suggests the contradictory nature of Mármol’s politics in the post-1852 era. The protagonist’s father, who nearly saves the lives of the youths and, as such their liberal revolt, was “a true federalist; cattle rancher, business partner of the Anchorena; and enjoying wide prestige in the countryside.” He was, in fact, a member of the very class that had supported Rosas’s rise to power and had benefitted so enormously under the dictator’s rule. This novelistic conclusion has confused generations of readers unschooled in the political intricacies of the period. Yet more realistically than any of the other important literary writings by Mármol and his generational peers, it suggests the unlikely alliance that was to reign supreme in Buenos Aires and then the rest of the country in the post-Rosas period. That ruling coalition joined two groups: the liberal intelligentsia, primarily of unitarian extraction, who had spent fifteen exile years in mortal opposition to Rosas; and the cattle-ranching latifundists, primarily of federalist extraction, who had been the mainstay of the Rosas regime.

WILLIAM H.KATRA

See also entry on Civilization and Barbarism

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry

_Cantos del peregrino_, Buenos Aires: n.p., 1847
_Armonias_, Buenos Aires: Ross, 1851

Plays

_El poeta_, Buenos Aires: n.p., 1842
_El cruzado_, Barcelona: n.p., 1851

Novel

René Marqués 1919–1979

Puerto Rican dramatist and prose writer

René Marqués, a staunch defender of all things Puerto Rican, widely acknowledged as a gifted and prolific writer whose works have advanced the cause of Puerto Rican letters, early on abandoned the traditional family career in agronomy in favor of writing. In doing so, Marqués none the less continued a family tradition, for his relatives included several writers, among them Padrina Padilla de Sanz a poet and short story writer who regularly wrote articles advocating women’s rights and Puerto Rican independence. As happened with several Latin American dramatists of his generation, a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation at a critical point in his artistic development—in his case in 1949 when he was thirty—afforded Marqués the opportunity to leave the island to immerse himself in his craft.

Marqués produced a copious body of work which encompasses a book of poetry, fifteen plays, two volumes of essays, five volumes of short stories and two novels as well as an anthology of short stories, which he edited. This does not include the countless pedagogical articles written while he worked for the Division of Community Education of the Department of Education, nor the numerous reviews and articles of literary criticism published in journals and newspapers such as Asomante and the Diario de Puerto Rico.

Though most would agree that the major contribution of Marqués to Latin American letters lies in his drama, one cannot relegate his fiction to second class status. His novel
La víspera del hombre [The Eve of Manhood], considered by many to have autobiographical overtones, follows the young Piruelo in his progression from childhood to manhood. This is a two-part journey: a geographic one as he leaves the stability of the coffee plantation where he has lived all his life; and a spiritual one as he discovers his true self in his growth to adulthood. The novel also focuses on the impact of the sale of the plantation where he had worked and the economic repercussions on his family as well as on him as an individual. La mirada [The Glance], his second novel, also with a young man as its protagonist, chronicles his search for meaning in an essentially senseless world. Many of the concerns voiced in his novels are echoed in Marqués’s short stories, all marked by a certain poetic technique which transforms several of them into prose poems. A number of Marqués’s plays find their source in his short stories, as for example, Un niño azul para esa sombra [A Blue Child for that Shadow] which recalls “El niño en el árbol” [The Boy in the Tree] and “La sala” [The Living Room].

Time plays a significant role in Marqués’s dramas. Its function is not limited to the customary indication of the passage of time. The author’s recourse to the flashback in certain works juxtaposes past, present and future. At times, as in Un niño azul para esa sombra, different levels of time coexist, i.e., present time or the reality in which the action takes place, and internal time, the individual, personal reality in which the protagonist exists. However, in its inexorable march time plays its most menacing role, for those characters who hesitate to take a stand, or to come to a decision, find that time has run out leaving them to the mercy of their circumstances.

The theater of Marqués, an innovative one rich in its use of symbol, repeats long standing preoccupations of the Puerto Rican author. Two in particular inform his theater and by extension his complete literary corpus: a loathing of anything which might defile or destroy Puerto Rican culture, and freedom for the island from its semi-colonial status and dependence on the United States. This freedom is more than political or economic. For the author it is also the liberty to maintain individual as well as national identity free from external adulteration. Much of this translates into criticism of the United States in his writings. The dilemmas of the characters in the majority of his plays, the notable exception being his biblical dramas, result from what he perceives as the political and economic leverage the United States exercises over his homeland. In La carreta (The Oxcart), a rural Puerto Rican family abandons the countryside to seek a better life in San Juan. Disillusioned, they move to New York only to find more heartache, and eventually return to the peace and stability of their rural home. La muerte no entrará en palacio [Death Will Not Enter the Palace], though set in an unnamed South American country, addresses the regime of Muñoz Marín and its acquiescence to the United States. Un niño azul para esa sombra, a study in the juxtaposition of temporal realities, recounts the sad tale of Michelin, who, devastated by the breakdown in his parents’ marriage, resents his father’s absence and his mother’s passionate devotion to all things American to such a degree that he eventually takes his life. Even the tragic fate of the three Burkhart sisters in Los soles trucos (The Fanlights) results, for Marqués, from the clash between the two cultures and the dominance of the United States rather than from the failure of the sisters to cope with present reality. Juan Bobo y la Dama de Occidente [Johnny the Fool and the Lady from the West], a pantomime-ballet, enunciates more clearly than other works by Marqués the motivation and nature of his anti-Americanism. While acerbic in its denunciation of the United States, a thoughtful reading of this play, with the accompanying introductory material, suggests that although Marqués directed his criticism against what he perceived as the preeminence of the United States in Puerto Rican life, he was none the less cognizant of almost five hundred years of Puerto Rican colonialism with less than twenty per cent of this subjugation transpiring at the hands of the United States, a fact which prompts one to wonder whether he would not have protested with equal vehemence had Spain continued to control the island. Moreover, scrutiny of Marqués’s theater reveals that the thrust of his protest is directed not so much at the political/economic circumstances of this supremacy as at the cultural annihilation perpetuated in its name. He resented the anglicization of Puerto Rican life, the substitution of Puerto Rican values for others. In his works Marqués sought to reaffirm the historical and cultural individuality of his homeland, and to renew the appreciation of and confidence in the Puerto Rican way.

FRANCESCA COLECCHIA

Biography

Selected Works

Plays

El hombre y sus sueños, Asomante, vol. 4/2 (April-June 1948)
Juan Bobo y la Dama de Occidente, Mexico City: Los Presentes, 1956
El sol y los Mac Donald, Asomante, vol. 13/1 (January-March 1957)

Un niño azul para esa sombra, Barcelona: Rumbos, 1961
La casa sin reloj, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1962.
El apartamiento, in Teatro Puertorriqueño, Séptimo Festival, San Juan, Puerto Rico: Instituto de Cultura Puertorriqueña, 1965
Mariano o el alba, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Cultural, 1965
Sacrificio en el Monte Moriah, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Antillana, 1969
David y Jonatán; Tito y Berenice: dos dramas de poder, amor y desamor, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Cultural, 1970
La muerte no entrará en palacio, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Cultural, 2nd edition, 1970
Vía crucis del hombre puertorriqueño, San Juan, Puerto Rico: Antillana, 1971
Carnaval afuera, carnaval adentro, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Antillana, 1971

Short Fiction
Otro día nuestro, San Juan, Puerto Rico: Imprenta Venezuela, 1955
En una ciudad llamada San Juan, Mexico City: UNAM, 1960
Purificación en la calle del Cristo, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Cultural, 1972 [Includes Los soles truncos]
Ese mosaico fresco sobre aquel mosaico antiguo, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Cultural, 1975 [First published in Sin Nombre, vol. 2/3 (1972); this edition includes photographs by Jorge Rigan]
Inmersos en el silencio: cuentos, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Antillana, 1976

Novels
La vispera del hombre, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Cultural, 1959
La mirada, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Antillana, 1975

Other Writings
Peregrinación, Arecibo, Puerto Rico: n.p., 1944 [poetry]
Cuentos puertorriqueños de hoy (anthology), 2nd edition, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Cultural, 1959
El puertorriqueño dócil y otros ensayos, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Antillana, 1975

Compilations and Anthologies
Teatro, 3 vols, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Cultural, 1970–71

Further Reading
Caballero Wanguemert, María M., La narrativa de René Marqués, Madrid: Playor, 1988
Montes-Huidobro, Matías, Persona: vida y máscara en el teatro puertorriqueño, San Juan, Puerto Rico: Centro de Estudios Avanzados de Puerto y el Caribe, 1986 [Includes critical studies on all of Marqués’s theater]
Reynolds, Bonnie Hildebrand, Space, Time, and Crisis: the Theatre of René Marqués, York, South Carolina: Spanish Literature, 1988
José Martí 1853–1895

Cuban poet, essayist and political thinker

The first period of José Martí’s literary development started in his adolescence, through to the year 1880, and includes everything that he wrote prior to his sojourn in Venezuela (1881), during which the first notable changes in his style become perceptible. In this period Martí’s poetic output was considerable, and it can be subdivided into two phases: the poems written in Cuba and in Spain (during his first deportation to that country), from 1868–73; and the poems written in Mexico and Guatemala (1875–77). This was a long period of literary training in which one can perceive a personal poetic voice that struggles for expression among the strong influences of late examples of Spanish Romanticism and some signs of turn-of-the-century Neoclassicism, displaying a preference for long poems, of amorous and sometimes social content. Martí wrote various pieces for the theatre during this period, and a collection of political writings among which the most notable are El presidio político en Cuba [Political Imprisonment in Cuba] and La república española ante la revolución cubana [The Spanish Republic in the Face of the Cuban Revolution].

The second period of Martí’s literary career started in 1881 and lasted until approximately 1888. The year 1881 was fundamental in Martí’s literary experience, and was marked by such works as El centenario de Calderón [Calderón’s Centenary], and especially by El carácter de “La Revista Venezolana” [The Thrust of the Venezuelan Review]—a veritable theoretical textbook on Spanish American literary Modernismo. The year also saw the arrival of his collection of poems Ismaelillo [Little Ishmael]—published the following year—which Martí believed was his first really accomplished poetic effort, and which is, at the same time, the first precise example of Modernismo. There are evident signs of Ismaelillo in Rubén Darío’s Azul...[Blue], published in 1888, in the same way that this book would influence some aspects of the poetry written by Martí at a later date. This period covers the first few years of his residence in New York, where he practised journalism, writing for some important North American and Latin American publications. This allowed him to develop an impressive collection of articles centering on the most diverse aspects of life in the United States; articles, indeed, that considerably influenced Darío, and that served as a cultural bridge between Anglo-Saxon America and Hispanic America. The powerful charge of expression found in Martí’s articles makes one think about that part of his output which, apparently, is most dissimilar to them: his poetry, and especially his Versos libres [Free Verses], which Martí never published. This collection of poems, or better still, this expression of his poetic voice, came about, according to the author himself, when he was twenty-five years old, in 1878. There is sufficient evidence to affirm that it accompanied him, as an intense and well used method of shaping—through words—the most personal part of his thought, throughout the decade of the 1880s at least. The Versos libres respond, in a considerable way, to the mark of modern urban life as Martí came to know it in the United States, especially in New York. Its convulsed quality is a reflection of that context, and its real modernity derives from it. The language used in these poems is a far cry from the strong Hispanic vein that runs through Ismaelillo, and that reappears in Versos sencillos, 1891 [Simple Verses] in order to adopt a line of expression that can be recognised as essentially different: the lyrical density of Ismaelillo is abandoned in Versos libres in favour of a desire that aspires to encompass everything within the poem, thereby transcending the traditional thematic frontiers between poetry and prose. The relationship between text and context is much more apparent and extensive in Versos libres than in any other area of Martí’s poetic oeuvre, and, consequently, the typically modern contentious quality of poetry manifests itself in this book with unaccustomed force. Referring to the relationship between Martí and Spanish American Modernism, Octavio Paz says, in Los hijos del limo (Children of the Mire), that a poem from this book, “Dos patrias” [Two Homelands]: “condenses that whole movement and announces, too, the arrival of contemporary poetry.”

Martí’s third period of literary development commenced around 1889, and includes such works as: the production of the children’s literature magazine La Edad de Oro [The Golden Age]; critical pieces on literature and art—as in his lecture “Heredia” and “La exhibición de pinturas del ruso Vereschagin” [The Exhibition of Paintings by the Russian Vereschagin]; articles on “The International Washington Congress” and “The American Conference,” and the vibrant patriotic address “Vindicación de Cuba.” This period is enriched considerably by his third book of poems, Versos sencillos, his revolutionary speeches—that constitute one of the culminating moments of 19th-century oratory—and his political documents, among which the most notable, because of its complex and completely rigorous prose, is “El manifiesto de Montecristi.” In 1895, with an apparently unsurpassable quality, Martí produced the extraordinary Diario de campaña [Campaign Diary], a text where the fusion between the epic and the lyrical reaches an intensity of dramatic proportions.

From a strictly literary point of view, Versos sencillos represents the most important work from this period and is considered to be the culmination of Martí’s poetic oeuvre. In the brief and essential prologue that he wrote for the book, the author himself highlighted the originality of the formal methods that govern the realization of these poems structured around a traditional scheme: the octosyllabic quartet with consonant rhymes, but effected by using profoundly innovative procedures. Among these the most noteworthy are: the repetition of the rhyme in order to create an “echo” effect; the taking advantage of graphic values for expressive ends; and the visible suppression of the rhyme in those parts of the poem where it is required by emotional intensity, substituting it by the aforementioned “echo” effect, placing it within the line of verse.

Throughout his work, Martí’s language assumes the expression of the “visions” produced by the awareness within the poet’s consciousness, striving to lock them up whole inside images. Martí lends the verse, as an entity, an aggressive, denuding, and penetrating function, attributing to it—in the prologue that he wrote for the publication of Versos libres—essentially sensory qualities: auditory (containing a vibrant and difficult sonorousness); visual (statuesque, fleeting); and tactile (statuesque, vibrant, and overwhelming). It concerns the means used to transfer to the verbal language the artist’s “visions,” that is, the plastic images through which a process of learning and understanding of reality, in some of its most rich and varied forms, took shape in the poet’s consciousness. The exposition of this process is conceived by Martí as an authentic spectacle, that is to say, as an expression that can be visualized; as Martí himself postulated in 1881, writing in the Revista Venezolana: “es fuerza que se abra paso esta verdad acerca del estilo: el escritor ha de pintar como el pintor. No hay razón para que el uno use de diversos colores, y no el otro.” (It is necessary for this particular truth about style to break through: the writer must paint like the painter. There is no reason why one should use a variety of colours and not the other). But this aesthetic statement does not exhaust itself in a pictorial sense whose literary implications would not be able to transcend the 19th century. To paint in words is, for Martí, to make the reader see using the word as the substance of the poetic image: “el deleite del alba que origina el penetrar anhelante y trémulo en lo por venir” (the pleasure of the daybreak that begins the wishful and timid penetration of the forthcoming), in such a way that “la frase suene como escudo, taje como espada y arremeta como lanza” (the phrase sounds like a shield, slashes like a sword, and pierces like a spear), as Martí himself would characterize the emergence of a literature capable of expressing “la grande America nueva, sólida, batallante, trabajadora y asombrosa” (the great America, new, solid, persevering, industrious, and astounding). The ultimate reach of Martí’s literature constitutes, in its origins and in its greatest achievements, a proposed poetic language for that America; a poetic language that would not just be a mere aesthetic achievement for him, but the ethical testimony of an artist who consciously assumes the expression of a new age. No other Latin American 19th-century writer believed himself to be, like Martí, immersed in the accelerated and ever-changing flow of history. The capacity to express this flow, with a use of language that appears to come from the very nucleus of the process, gave him access to an originality that makes him one of the outstanding figures of Latin American literature.

EMILIO DE ARMAS
translated by Luis González Fernández

Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, then a Spanish colony, 28 January 1853. Attended the Municipal Boys’ School, Havana, 1865–66; Instituto de Havana, 1866–69; University of Madrid, 1873; University of Zaragoza, degree in law, 1873, arts degree, 1874. After the first Cuban war against Spain, 1868, Martí devoted himself to revolutionary politics. Collaborated in the publication of the underground periodicals El Diablo Cojuelo and La Patria Libre, 1869: arrested for subversion, 1869, and sentenced to six years hard labour, sentence commuted and exiled to Spain in 1871. Moved to Mexico, 1875, via France and England. Contributed to Revista Universal, 1875–76, and founded the Alarcón Society, both in Mexico City. Married Carmen Zayas Bazán in 1876, one son. Visited Cuba briefly in 1877. Teacher of languages and philosophy in Guatemala, 1876–77; returned again to Cuba: worked in a law office, and taught literature at the Liceo de Guanabacoa; arrested on suspicion of anti-government activity, and deported again to Spain, 1879; travelled to France in the same year, then sailed to the US. Lived in New York, 1879–95; journalist for the New York Sun, c.1880. Critical of country’s economic structure and painfully aware that its economic might threatened the liberty of the Latin American states. Travelled to Venezuela and founded the Revista Venezolana, Caracas, 1881. Correspondent for various Spanish American newspapers in New York, including El Partido Liberal (Mexico), La Opinión Nacional (Venezuela), from 1881, La Nación (Argentina), from 1882, and La República (Honduras), from 1886, El Economista Americano (New York), 1887 and La Opinión Pública (Uruguay), from 1889. Translator for the publishing house, Appleton, New York, from 1882; contributing editor, La América, New York, from 1883. Consul for Uruguay, New York, 1887–91; North American representative of the Free Press Association of Argentina, from 1888; founding editor of the children’s magazine, La Edad de Oro [The Golden Age], 1889 (ran for four issues); Spanish teacher, Central High School, New York, 1890; consul for Argentina and Paraguay, 1890–91, and Paraguay, from 1890; founder, Liga de Instrucción, Tampa, Florida, 1891; in last years his involvement in Cuban revolutionary politics intensified: co-founder, Cuban Revolutionary Party and the revolutionary journal Patria, both 1892, travelled constantly throughout Central America, the Caribbean and Florida, helped organize the invasion of Cuba, 1895 (named Major General of the Army of Liberation in the island). Killed in action at Dos Ríos, 19 May 1895. Regarded as model Cuban patriot and, for this reason, has become an icon.

Selected Works

Poetry
Ismaelillo, New York: Thompson and Moreau Press, 1882
Versos sencillos, New York: Louis Weiss, 1891

Poetry Anthologies
Poesías, edited by Juan Marinello, Havana: Cultural, 1928
Versos de amor (inéditos), edited by Gonzalo de Quesada y Miranda, Havana: n.p., 1930
Flores del destierro (versos inéditos), edited by Gonzalo de Quesada y Miranda, Havana: Molina y Cía, 1933
Poesías completas, edited by Rafael Esténger, Havana: Librería Económica, 1953
Poesía completa, edited by Eliana Dávila, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1985
Antología poética, edited by María Esther Cantonnet, Montevideo: Casa del Estudiante, 1987

Novella
Amistad funesta, New York: n.p., 1885 [Published under the pseudonym Adelaida Real]

Plays
Amor con amor se paga, Mexico City: n.p., 1876; as Love is Repaid by Love, translated by Willis K.Jones, in Archivos de José Martí, vol. 2, Havana: 1947
Adúltera: drama inédito, Havana: n.p., 1935

Collected Works
Obras completas, edited by Gonzalo de Quesada y Miranda, 74 vols, Havana: Trópico, 1936–53

Compilations and Anthologies
Artículos desconocidos, Havana: Universo, 1930
Epistolario, edited by Felix Lizaso, 3 vols, Havana: Cultural, 1930–31
Obras escogidas, edited by Rafael Esténger, Madrid: Aguilar, 1953
Páginas de José Martí, edited by Fryda Schulz de Mantovani, Buenos Aires: Universitaria, 1963
Escritos desconocidos, edited by Carlos Ripoll, New York: Torres, 1971
Ensayos sobre arte y literatura, edited by Roberto Fernández Retamar, Havana: Instituto Cubano de Libro, 1972
Nuestra América, edited by Hugo Achúgar, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayachucuo, 1977
Nuevas cartas de Nueva York, edited by E.Mejía Sánchez, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1980
Martí y el Uruguay: crónicas y correspondencia, Montevideo: Universidad de la República, 1988

Anthologies in Translation
The America of José Martí: Selected Writings, translated by Juan de Onís, New York: Noonday Press, 1953
Martí on the USA, edited and translated by Luis A.Baralt, Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1966

Further Reading
Agramonte, Roberto, Martí y su concepción del mundo, Rio Piedras: Universidad de Puerto Rico, 1971
Cantón Navarro, José, Algunas ideas de José Martí en relación con la clase obrera y el socialismo, Havana: Instituto Cubano del Libro, 1970
Carbonell, Néstor, Martí, carne y espíritu, 2 vols, Havana: EdicionHomenaje a la República de Cuba en el Cincuentenario de su Independencia, 1951–52
Esténger, Rafael, Vida de Martí: biografía, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1936
Jiménez, José Olivio, José Martí: poesía y existencia, Mexico City: Oasis, 1983
Marinello, Juan, Once ensayos martianos, Havana: Comision Nacional Cubana de la Unesco, 1964
Martínez Estrada, Ezequiel, Martí: El héroe y su acción revolucionaria, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1966
Nuestra America

Essay by José Martí

“Nuestra America” (Our America), José Martí’s seminal essay on Spanish American character, history and destiny, first appeared in the January 1891 issue of New York’s La Revista Ilustrada [The Illustrated Review], edited by Elías de Losada. According to Vernon Chamberlain and Ivan Schulman (La Revista Ilustrada de Nueva York: History, Anthology, and Index of Literary Selections, 1975), it is one of four contributions that the Cuban writer made to the Revista during its 1886 to 1893 run. Additionally, Chamberlain and Schulman conclude that the Cuban also translated André Theuriet’s novella “Un idilio de Pascua” [A Christmas Romance] which appeared under the pseudonym M. de S. in the May 1892 issue. An identical version of “Nuestra America” was published later in El Partido Liberal [The Liberal Party], expanding the audience for ideas that Martí saw fit to print in La Revista Ilustrada because, as Chamberlain and Schulman attest, he sympathized with the editor’s fervent Latin Americanism. Martí himself wrote the following to Elías de Losada: “Me pareció el periódico, cosa mía, por la tolerancia y el pensamiento americano, del bueno, que Ud. pone en él” (The newspaper appeared my very own because of its tolerance and the fine American spirit with which you imbue it). Martí’s “Nuestra America” is regularly considered his most cohesive appraisal of the defining features of a region which he circumscribes within the essay to those lands that extend from the Rio Bravo to Patagonia. He espouses ideas that, in Chamberlain’s and Schulman’s opinion, lie at the core of his Spanish Americanism. The essay synthesizes an ideological evolution which began during Martí’s initial encounter with Latin America as a continent. After a period of exile in Spain due to anticolonialist activities in Cuba, the writer returned to the New World. Between 1875 and 1878, Martí resided first in Mexico and then in Guatemala. According to Cintio Vitier in his Temas martianos: segunda serie (1982), this epoch is crucial in the formulation of the Martí’s belief, clearly articulated in “Nuestra America,” that “El gobierno ha de nacer del país. El espíritu del gobierno ha de ser el del país. El gobierno no es más que el equilibrio de los elementos naturales del país” (Government should emanate from the country itself. The spirit of the government has to be the spirit of the country. Government is no more than the equilibrium of a country’s natural elements). This and other similar pan-nationalist notions evolve particularly during Martí’s stay in the United States (1879–95). Vitier and others have argued that the writer’s political conception undergoes a transformation based on the recognition of North American expansionist ambitions. If Martí focuses his organizational activities on securing Cuba’s independence from Spain, a nation representative of old Europe’s decadence, his more ambitious pedagogical and propagandistic concerns center on enunciating the need to avoid dangers explained in “Nuestra America.” In essence, these risks are internal and external in nature. Latin America must struggle against regionalistic fervor and a limiting world view which promote a general malaise at the same time that they make the continent look with envy toward Europe and the United States. Similarly, New World Hispanic nations must unite to combat the inherent racism of the North Americans and their imperialist impetus. Martí emphasizes the need to come to terms with the continent’s multi-racial identity. Long the basis of perceived inferiority, this polyvalent ethnicity should be reexamined in all its manifestations and recognized as the substance of innate originality. He teaches: “No hay odio de razas, porque no hay razas” (There is no racial hatred, because there are no races). Through this dictum he preaches a unity founded on a color-blindness that refutes what he terms “razas de librería” (bookstore races) and that allows for the absolute integration of peoples within and outside national borders. Only then could Latin America forge an effective barrier against Anglo-Saxon expansion, a barrier emerging from self-discovery and from acknowledgement of the collective need to upgrade submerged indigenous and African populations.

When Martí crafts “Nuestra America” as a fundamental expression of his pan-Latin Americanist doctrine, he is more aware than ever of the dangers posed byManifest Destiny. As David Saville Muzzey indicates in his study James G.Blaine: a Political Idol of Other Days (1934), on October 2, 1889, North American Secretary of State James G.Blaine convened an International American Conference in Washington to discuss such topics as “the establishment of regular communications between ports of commerce, the formation of an American customs union, a uniform standard of weights and measures, uniform copyright and patent laws, the adoption of a common monetary (silver) unit, and, most important of all, the agreement on a general plan of arbitration for the settlement of controversies in which the honor or independence of several states was not involved.” At its closing on April 19, 1890 representatives from the seventeen nations that eventually agreed to participate came together on only one item, identified by Alice Felt Tyler in The Foreign Policy of James G. Blaine (1965) as “the establishment of an International Bureau of American Republics, which was destined to be a permanent and very valuable agent for the collection and dissemination of information.” In part, the Conference’s failure resulted from Latin American distrust of United States intentions in the era of Manifest Destiny. Perceiving these deliberations among the nations of the Americas as essential to Cuba’s political destiny, José Martí followed them with anguish from distant New York City. The conversations coincided with Florida Senator Wilkinson Call’s introduction of a controversial bill that would permit his country to seek the Island’s independence from Spain under the tutelage of a voucher nation responsible for guaranteeing indemnification. To Martí, this initiative conceived by Cuban annexationist José Ignacio Rodríguez, a personal friend of Call’s who had in fact crafted it, was tantamount to granting the United States sovereignty over the Island. As a result, he worked feverishly behind the scenes and through his articles in La Nación of Buenos Aires to prevent the Conference delegates from voicing their approval of Call and Rodríguez’s machinations. To Martí, the Congress’s abject failure represents Latin American recognition of the imperialist objectives of the United States and, in Cuba’s case, the temporary victory of his message that “Cambiar de amos no es ser libre” (To change masters is not to be free). Two years later, Martí served as Uruguay’s representative to the International Monetary Conference, again held in Washington under the auspices of the United States. Its hidden intention was to impose a silver standard on Latin America. As Jorge Mañach documents in his Martí, el apóstol (1933), Martí addressed the Conference on behalf of Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Uruguay. He argued vehemently in favor of bimetallic standards, and he admonished those present about the danger of falling prey to new imperialist intentions imposed by devious means.

All these realities which he experienced within the monster, as Martí referred to the United States in a frequently mentioned letter to Mexican Manuel Mercado, integrate the dialogic substratum of “Nuestra America,” a text in which the writer dialectically opposes Blaine’s Pan-Americanism by contrasting it implicitly with his own Pan-Latin Americanism. The writer rejects any illogical political or economic dealings between Spanish America and that “pueblo emprendedor y pujante que la desconoce y la desdéná” (enterprising and powerful nation that neither knows it nor respects it). With pragmatic, albeit somewhat romantic, nationalism—based on perceived commonalities which he details in the essay—Martí justifies the inferior socio-economic and political position of the Spanish-speaking continent through a brief critical overview of its colonial past, from which Latin America emerged only after violent and yet unfinished revolutionary upheaval. A destructive conquest and its aftermath resulted in the repression and impoverishment of indigenous peoples, while rampant mercantilism promoted a new marginal population by the institution of African slavery. In his discourse, Martí advocates the need to rediscover the Other’s voice in order to define in more complete fashion Latin American identity. If Todorov in his The Conquest of America (1982) proclaimed the contemporary crisis of that ethnocentric period in European history when conquered voices were interpreted and transformed to distort their difference through assimilation into a cultural mainstream, Martí preached in 1891 the need to reconstruct the history of Spanish America by rescripting its most distant past and by teaching this rescripted past regardless of complexity, even at the expense of conventional hegemonic historiography. He wrote: “La historia de America, de los incas acá, ha de enseñarse al dedillo, aunque no se enseñe a los arcontes de Grecia. Nuestra Grecia es preferible a la Grecia que no es nuestra” (The history of America, from the Incas to the present, must be taught thoroughly, even if we do not teach about Grecian Magistrates. Our Greece is preferable to a Greece that is not ours). The writer excuses as well the predominance throughout 19th-century Latin America of what Sarmiento named “caudillos bárbaros,” or “primitive chieftains.” A natural biproduct of lands whose intrinsic realities are repudiated by ruling classes, caudillos emerge extemporaneously from areas whose idiosyncracies they more or less understand. However, Martí maintains, as soon as they betray those forces which forged them, the very masses that supported their struggle for power rise in rebellion to destroy them. Hence, it stands to reason that those civilian groups more apt to govern well must first study “los factores reales del país” (the real elements of a country) so that just and democratic systems are summoned forth as if by acclamation in the Americas.

Martí’s exuberantly poetic prose—often baroque in nature, inspired by classical models, always intensely personal produces what Miguel de Unamuno felicitously described as a “prophetic, biblical style.” An abundance of rhetorical complexities more admirable that lucid, renders his writing almost untranslatable and sometimes difficult to assimilate at an intellectual level. None the less, Martí’s writing never fails to affect the reader emotionally or aesthetically. In the specific case of “Nuestra America,” however, Martí tempers his prose to formulate a visionary, coherent and powerfully convincing manifesto which, despite its conciseness, represents one of the outstanding political texts in Latin American letters.

Jorge Febles

Editions

First edition: Nuestra América, La Revista Ilustrada, New York (January 1891)
Critical edition: in Nuestra América, prologue by Juan Marinello; selection and notes by Hugo Achúgar; chronology by Cintio Vitier, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1977

Further Reading

Agramonte, Roberto, Las doctrinas educativas y políticas de Martí, Río Piedras: Editorial de la Universidad de Puerto Rico, 1981
Iduarte, Andrés, Martí, escritor, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 3rd edition, 1982. [Despite its dated approach, Iduarte’s book is extremely informative regarding Martí’s life and works]
Portuondo, José Antonio, Martí, escritor revolucionario, Havana: Editora Poética, 1982
Vitier, Cintio and Fina García Marruz, Temas martianos, Havana: Biblioteca Nacional José Martí, 1969
Zea, Leopoldo, et al. (editors), José Martí a cien años de Nuestra América, Mexico City: UNAM, 1993

Versos sencillos

Collection of poems by José Martí

In October 1891, José Martí published Versos sencillos [Simple Verses], a brief collection consisting of forty-six untitled compositions whose deceptive facility illustrates the author’s creative maturity. Although the book is composed essentially of traditional octosyllabic quatrains arranged according to diverse consonantal rhyming patterns (abba; abab; aabb), it constitutes, nevertheless, a fundamental text in the development of Spanish American Modernismo. According to Federico de Onís (España en America, 1955) this late 19th and early 20th-century literary movement synthesizes the Hispanic version of a world-wide attitudinal crisis that, beginning in 1885, manifested itself in the arts, science, religion, politics, and finally, in every sphere of public life. Hence, Modernismo reflects Western modernity, described conventionally in light of shared universals: a break with tradition, rejection of empty rhetoric, a sense of historical discontinuity, the advent of psychologism, and so forth.

As Ángel Rama has detailed in a fundamental essay (Revista Iberoamericana, 1980), the book’s genesis must be taken into account to understand both its form and content. Versos sencillos was written during a particularly difficult period in Martí’s life. For years, he had lived apart from his wife, Carmen Zayas Bazán, and his son José, on whom he had based his first significant poetic collection, Ismaelillo, 1882. [Little Ishmael], and to whom the work is dedicated. “Hijo, espantado de todo me refugio en ti” (Son, horrified by everything I seek refuge in you), the poet wrote in the anthology’s preface. The couple’s definitive separation came about after Carmen’s brief visit to New York in October 1890. Additionally, as José Miguel Oviedo has clearly delineated in La niña de Nueva York: una revision de la vida erotica de José Martí, 1989 [The New York Girl: a Revision of Martí’s Erotic Life], since 1880 the Cuban had been romantically entangled with Carmen Mantilla, a married woman not widowed from Manuel Mantilla until 1885. Martí and Carmita’s daughter, María, on whom the writer lavished much fatherly love, is the protagonist of several “versos sencillos.”

In addition to this complicated personal life that had a tremendous impact on the psyche of a sensitive man intent on abiding by a strict moral code based, as Oviedo reminds us, on “lealtad, honestidad y pureza de corazón” (loyalty, honesty and purity of heart), Martí’s political commitments had taken a heavy physical toll. Intensely devoted to the cause of Cuba’s freedom, for over ten years he had been involved in organizational efforts to secure the country’s liberation by force. As a result, he suffered great anguish during the International American Conference of 1889, when he feared that Cuba would fall prey to the United States’ annexational whims. Pressure proved overbearing and the poet fell ill. Martí explains in the oft quoted preface to the Versos sencillos that, during August 1890, he sojourned in the Catskill Mountains under medical orders. There he wrote feverishly, surrounded by a natural ambience which he transcribed lyrically with transcendental ardor derived from his much admired Ralph Waldo Emerson. Several months later, he read the poems at a social gathering. The enthusiasm with which they were received by friends led to their publication, because the author sought to prove his love for “la sencillez” (simplicity) and his belief in “la necesidad de poner el sentimiento en formas llanas y sinceras” (the necessity to express sentiment in plain and sincere forms), as he says in Versos sencillos.

Its title notwithstanding, Martí’s collection encompasses often difficult compositions whose symbolic complexity has been lucidly explained in Ivan Schulman’s seminal Símbolo y color en la poesía de José Martí (1960). As this critic explains, words like “wing,” “eagle,” “sun,” “star,” often paralleled to antithetical notions such as “abyss,” “worm,” “coal,” “vulture” “yoke,” are presented in polar manner to characterize a dualistic reality. In their struggle for hegemony, these contradictory elements sometimes reconciled permitting the advent of positive natural and human forces. In Versos sencillos, the reader also observes Martí’s further development of a personal emblematic color scheme akin to those formulated by other poets of his generation.
José Juan Arrom has studied at length Martí’s compositional method in Versos sencillos (Certidumbre de América, 1971). Arrom argues that, given the politically-charged state of mind Martí describes in his preface, he sought to direct poetic preoccupations and images through strophes and meters intrinsically Hispanic in nature. Essentially, the Versos sencillos fit within the tradition of the Spanish “copla,” broadly defined as octosyllabic verses organized in stanzas of varied lengths. Unaffected in tone and spirit and often meant to be sung, these lyrics constitute a common corpus to which Martí consciously or unconsciously referred, as Arrom demonstrates convincingly by juxtaposing analytically specific textual fragments. This traditional nature of the Versos sencillos has ensured their permanence in Cuban folklore, to the point that several strophes have been widely disseminated in song. Popular composer Joseíto Fernández’s world-renowned “Guantanamera,” for instance, consists merely of a monotonous peasant guajira, whose refrain surrounds various “versos sencillos,” often altered at the discretion of the interpreter. By seeking inspiration in this inherently Hispanic creative form, Martí not only makes the political statements that Arrom and Rama claim for the anthology, but he also retrieves in modernista fashion a conventional meter not in vogue, one whose medieval roots represent the endurance of poetry and music. Versos sencillos evolves around a variety of motifs which may develop logically within certain texts, or may appear fortuitously intertwined in some, or may be presented confrontationally in others to suggest ideological tensions. Predominant among these motifs are love, honor, country, death, innocence, exile, nature, virtue, friendship, often fragmented to elucidate secondary notions that amplify the collection’s quasi pedagogical tone. Ideas emanate from a highly confessional poetic voice whose individuality is, nevertheless, obscured at times by an eloquent commitment to humankind, to the cosmos, and to transparent historico-political circumstances. Ivan Schulman has explained that this lyrical entity is neither the anonymous poetic I of popular song, nor the Romantic I struggling against an evil and insensitive world. Rather, it is that symbiotic I associated with the modern poet, in whose persona soul and exterior reality coalesce to shape a voice ambiguous as well as elusive (Ismaelillo, Versos libres, Versos sencillos). Texts generally evince antithetical structures that underline internal and external conflicts. This reflects a sense of crisis resolved explicitly or implicitly by the didactic voice which, by reading itself, guides the reader through ideological and imagistic frameworks. For instance, poem 23 states: “Yo quiero salir del mundo/por la puerta natural:/en un carro de hojas verdes/a morir me han de llevar./No me pongan en lo oscuro a morir como un traidor:/yo soy bueno, y como bueno/moriré de cara al sol” (I would like to leave this world/through the natural door:/In a cart made of green leaves/they will take me to my death./Do not place me in the darkness/to expire like a traitor:/I am good, and like a good man/I will die facing the sun). Positive natural images (“green leaves,” “sun”) are positioned antagonistically to the feared darkness which Martí conventionally associated with betrayal, with corruption, with the most negative human features. By defining itself as “good,” the poetic voice not only ascertains its right to “the burial of the just” and to look the sun in its face, but indirectly as well it enunciates a universal tenet: whoever is good deserves an identical honor.

Another ideological juxtaposition emphasized by Rama in his lengthy essay departs from the predominant airiness of the previous example. Martí at times permits traditional visions of ugliness and beauty to coexist in order to create tensions resolved intellectually by the reader’s recognition of their merely objective representation. Rama analyzes in particular the following stanzas: “En el bote iba remando/por el lago seductor/con el sol que era oro puro/y en el alma más de un sol./Y a mis pies vi de repente/ofendido del hedor/un pez muerto, un pez hediondo/en el bote remador” (I was rowing in a boat/on the seductive lake/with the sun that was pure gold/and in my soul more than one sun/Suddenly, at my feet I saw/offended by its stench/a dead fish, a stinking fish/in the rowboat). For Rama, by allowing beauty and ugliness to share realistically the same poetic structure, Martí subverts individual consciousness, signifying in Emersonian fashion that natural elements belong outside what this critic calls “standard evaluative cultural systems.”

A key motif in the collection, love and its concomitant image, woman, manifests itself at the core of several compositions. Poems 16 to 21 deal with the romantic convention of the femme fatale, perceived by the poetic voice in traditionally misogynist manner, a proclivity in the author’s work that Jacqueline Cruz has studied in a controversial essay published in Hispania (1992). Eve as the root of all evil, regardless of her individual physical attributes, reappears ephemerally in several compositions. She also provides the substance for many other texts. Noteworthy examples of both possibilities are I, 4, 10, 13, 14, 16, 33, 36, 37, 38, 41, 42, and one of Martí’s most enticing poems, 43, in which he craves an erotic encounter with an archetypal temptress. Powerfully sensual, the text focuses in modernista fashion on the woman’s red tresses, which the poetic voice longs to spread thread by thread over her naked back. More Patonic in nature is Martí’s bestknown composition, the suggestive 9, “La niña de Guatemala” [The Girl from Guatemala]. This lyrical dramatization of the fleeting relationship between the real author and María García Granados, a young woman who was his student when Martí resided in Guatemala, this “melodious game,” as Gabriela Mistral aptly designated it, may be described none the less as a confessional text through which the poet seeks to extirpate a sense of guilt emanating from María’s death from pneumonia shortly after he returned to Guatemala with his wife, Carmen Zayas Bazán.

Versos sencillos epitomizes Martí’s creative maturity. An essential volume in the development of Spanish American modernista poetry, it reveals as well the political commitment that cost the writer his life. Honor and duty, perceived by the lyric voice as the need to sacrifice for an ideal irrevocably entwined with Cuba’s fate, are guiding tenets that force the poet textually as well as historically to forsake verse. Darío, who questioned the island’s right to claim a man destined to be an artist, rectified himself at the end of an essay included in Los raros, 1896 [The Eccentrics] by resurrecting Martí’s voice. Here Darío recreates dramatically number 45 of the Versos sencillos. Dressed in the heroic stone vestments with which the Cuban poet had envisioned dead heroes reborn to punish a moment of weakness on the part of his lyrical alter ego, Martí bursts on the scene to address the essayist: “Yo quiero, cu ando me muera / sin patria, pero sin amo / tener en mi tumba un ramo / de flores, ¡y una bandera!” (I would like, when I die / without country, but without master / to have placed upon my tombstone / a bouquet of flowers and a flag!) [José Martí]). Martí’s dual identity as an aesthete devoted to a political cause and a poet who chose to become a prophet for the Americas is reflected powerfully in the Versos sencillos, a collection that cements his reputation as arguably the most provocative Spanish American modernista author.

Further Reading

García Ronda, Denia, “Las antinomias en ‘Versos sencillos’” Universidad de La Habana 228 (1986)
Oviedo, José Miguel, La niña de Nueva York: una revisión de la vida erótica de José Martí, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989

Ezequiel Martínez Estrada 1895–1964

Argentine essayist and poet

Although his first publications were five very short essays that appeared in Buenos Aires between 1916 and 1918, Ezequiel Martínez Estrada formally began his literary career as a premeditative poet in the rarefied tradition of Leopoldo Lugones’s lexical gymnastics, Edgar Allan Poe’s phantasmal visions, and the mythological evocations of Rubén Darío. Between 1918 and 1929 he produced six volumes of poetry which were not then, nor have been since, much appreciated by literary historians and critics. Nevertheless, there was an emotional harmony between the poet’s lyric intuitions and a sombre view of the world that was to permeate his prose from 1930 to his late writing.

His life’s work was a steady progression from the cerebral toward the emotional, as one can tell by a successive reading of three of his key essays: Radiografía de la pampa, 1933 (X-Ray of the Pampa), Muerte y transfiguración de Martin Fierro, 1948 [Death and Transfiguration of Martin Fierro], and his posthumous Martí, revolucionario, 1967 [Martí the Revolutionary]. A tone of disillusionment dominates Radiografía, but at the same time the historical vision of Argentine’s discovery, exploration and settlement is clear and perceptive. The second work (his longest) is also written in a historical perspective, based on a close, expansive reading of José Hernánández’s narrative poem Martín Fierro (see separate entry). In the frustrated life of the gaucho protagonist, Martínez Estrada finds a symbol of modern Argentina’s political and social disorientation, a departure toward indeterminacy. José Martí, the essayist, poet and political organizer who died in 1895 during the second Cuban War of Independence, is portrayed as one of the Western world’s last heroes. “He was not a philosopher,” says Martínez Estrada in his essay, “but a thinker in action, who wanted to change the world rather than understand (i.e., accept) it.”

In a way reminiscent of the Spaniard Miguel de Unamuno’s spiritual reiterations, Martínez Estrada had (and cultivated) a tragic sense of life. He persistently stressed a love-hate relationship with his country; and one feels that his late sojourn in Cuba (1960–62) was, in addition to an opportunity to do intensive research on the life and work of Martí and an enthusiastic endorsement of the 1959 Revolution, a form of symbolic exile in protest against the political state of affairs then prevalent in Argentina and several other Latin American countries (it was even rumoured in the press, erroneously, that Martínez Estrada had planned to adopt Cuban citizenship.

His pessimism has often been seen as excessively nihilistic. Juan José Sebreli, for example, in a book written from a Marxist point of view (Martínez Estrada: una rebelión inútil, 1960) [Martínez Estrada: a Useless Rebellion], sees him as an out-of-touch romantic who arbitrarily dismissed all possibility of historical progress. Dardo Cúneo, another compatriot, writes: “Martínez Estrada can be legitimately criticized for picking out elements of Argentine reality and evaluating the worst of them in such a way as to indicate that they contain the whole truth.” Possibly Martínez Estrada himself wanted to correct these impressions with his biography of a militantly optimistic 19th-century Cuban writer.

Although the author of Radiografía de la pampa published his works in four forms (poetry, essay, short story, drama), the essay, which E.B.White has identified as the genre of “congenitally self-centred” writers, was his basic instrument. His continual suggestion of a symbiotic relationship between his country and himself was both his poetic strength and his rational weakness (like Domingo Faustino Sarmiento a century before him). His visions were more compelling than his thoughts: the pampa; evocations of the gaucho as a predetermined victim and pariah; colonization of the pampa regions and South America in general as an implicit search for paradise; his view of Buenos Aires as the temporary abode described in one of the twenty-five essays comprising La cabeza de Goliat, 1940 [Goliath’s Head]: “We had a past without art, lacking in substance and without dignity, for things were not built, as in Rome, to last for ever, but only to remain the short time that our adventure would last.”

Radiografía de la pampa was Martínez Estrada’s foundation work; its basic themes would be further developed over the next two decades in La cabeza de Goliat, Sarmiento, Muerte y transfiguración de Martín Fierro and El mundo maravilloso de Guillermo Enrique Hudson [The Marvellous World of William Henry Hudson]. Radiografía’s six parts correspond to its six main topics: collective disillusionment; collective solitude; primitive forces (“telluric,” “mechanical” and “psychic”) which Martínez Estrada thinks have caused Argentina’s historical “erosion” more than its evolution; Buenos Aires, social and political exploiter of the nation; fear, an inhibitive force that has repeatedly provoked violence in the guise of “defence”; pseudostructures, or forms and functions that unintentionally reveal an illusory existence based on selfish interest.

_Muerte y transfiguración de Martín Fierro_ expands on the psychological and cultural inferences of _Radiografía_. The author takes over José Hernández’s protagonist, a rural Argentine mass-man of the 19th century who, in contrast to Ulysses, Faust and Don Quixote, is a restless symbol of the ordinary. Hernández defended him as a representative victim; Martínez Estrada, in full sympathy with Martín Fierro’s unspoiled nature and generally good intentions, considers him as the 20th-century Argentines’ ancestor who anticipates their spiritual insecurity, and their tendency to resent their historical fate.

In _Sarmiento_, which preceded _Muerte y transfiguración_, and _El mundo maravilloso de Guillermo Enrique Hudson_, which followed it, the author opposes Sarmiento’s good-civilization versus bad-ruralism thesis in a Neoromantic defense of natural man. William Henry Hudson, who grew up on the pampas, was an accomplished naturalist and writer who nostalgically relived his youthful years in _Far Away and Long Ago_ (1918), _The Purple Land_ (1885) and _Idle Days in Patagonia_ (1893). Martínez Estrada found a congenial soul in Hudson, who shared the belief that man was progressively enslaved through his own inventiveness and that his only alternative was a return to nature.

Like many of his essays, Martínez Estrada’s short stories are based on dilemmas that allow no solutions. The longest one, “Sábado de Gloria,” 1944 [Holy Saturday] is the nightmarish, Kafkaesque account of a government office worker’s attempts to finish his assignments by early afternoon the Saturday before Easter so that he and his family can leave on the 1.30 train for their vacation; but it’s almost four o’clock when another employee tells him he’s wanted on the telephone, and there the story ends. The author’s own dull experience as a part-time postal employee in Buenos Aires from 1916 to 1946 was undeniably the motivation for that tale. In “La inundación” [The Deluge], also published in 1944, over a thousand inhabitants of a remote village take refuge in a large, unfinished church on a hill during a flood. One recalls Noah’s Ark, but the theme is human survival (or demise) in the contemporary world. The rains continue day after day; food becomes scarce; 200 hungry dogs are outside. A doctor, an aged priest, and a mad prophet can’t attend to the people’s needs. But then, on the last page, heavy drops begin to fall once again on the anxious, uplifted faces.

One wonders to what extent Martínez Estrada enjoyed or suffered his vocation. The reader senses that authorship for him was both an indulgence and a torture. In an autobiographical letter (1945) that Victoria Ocampo asked him to write for her journal _Sur_ he declares that “to prolong life beyond puberty is a fatal error that one pays for with survival itself” and that in his fiftieth year he could remember no instance in which he was able “to experience a child’s innocence.”

---

Biography

Born in San Juan de la Esquina, province of Santa Fe, Argentina, 14 September 1895. Eldest of three sons. Moved to Goyena in south of province of Buenos Aires where father ran a general store. Sent to Buenos Aires at the age of twelve where he attended the Colegio Avellaneda, but largely self-taught because he was unable to finish his formal education. Employed by Post Office, 1914. Published first articles in the magazine Nosofros, Buenos Aires, 1917. Married the portrait painter and restorer Agustina Marconi in 1921. From 1923 taught at the Colegio Nacional, a school of the University of La Plata. Visited Italy and France, 1927. Lost his teaching post when Perón was elected president, 1945. Afflicted by painful skin complaint, 1952, which was to last five years. Travelled to Mexico, 1959, where he worked in the School of Political Science, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM). Went to Cuba, February 1960 to receive a Casa de las Américas award for his essay, Análisis funcional de la cultura. Stayed in Cuba from September 1960 until November 1962, to write an extensive biography of José Martí (see separate entry) commissioned by the Cuban government. Died of abdominal cancer in Bahía Blanca, 3 November 1964.

Selected Works

Poetry

Poesía, Buenos Aires: Argos, 1947 [A collection of six previously published volumes: Oro y piedra, 1918; Nefeliba, 1922; Motivos del cielo, 1924; Argentina, 1927; Títeres de pies ligeros, 1929; Humoresca, 1929]

Essays

Sarmiento, Buenos Aires: Argos, 1946
Muerte y transfiguración de Martin Fierro. Ensayo de interpretación de la vida argentina, 2 vols, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1948; revised edition, 1958
El mundo maravilloso de Guillermo Enrique Hudson, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1951
El hermano Quiroga, Montevideo: Instituto Nacional de Investigaciones y Archivos Literarios, 1957
Martí revolucionario, prologue by Roberto Fernández Retamar, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1967

Compilations and Anthologies

Antología, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1964
Leer y escribir, edited by Enrique Espinoza, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1969
Cuentos completos, Madrid: Alianza Editorial and Fundación Ézequiel Martínez Estrada, 1975
Antología, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1986

Translations

Further Reading

Adam, Carlos, Bibliografía y documentos de Ezequiel Martínez Estrada, La Plata: Universidad Nacional de la Plata, 1968

Anderson Imbert, Enrique, “Martínez Estrada en 1926,” Sur 295 (July-August 1965) [Testimony in an issue commemorating Martínez Estrada]

Canal Feijóo, Bernardo, “Radiografías fatídicas,” Sur 37 (1937)

——“Las soledades de Martínez Estrada,” in Idea/Imágenes, cultural supplement of La Nueva Provincia, Bahía Blanca (30 September 1993)

Fernández Retamar, Roberto, “Razón de homenaje,” in Casa de las Américas 33 (November-December 1965) [Introduction to an issue commemorating Martínez Estrada]

Maharg, James, A Call to Authenticity: the Essays of Ezequiel Martínez Estrada, University of Mississippi: Romance Monographs, 1977

Weinberg de Magis, Liliana, Ezequiel Martínez Estrada y la interpretación del “Martin Fierro,” Mexico City: UNAM, 1992

Carlos Martínez Moreno 1917–1986

Uruguayan prose writer

Like other members of the Uruguayan “Generation of 1945,” Carlos Martínez Moreno has been overshadowed by Juan Carlos Onetti and Mario Benedetti. However, the publication of a monographic study by Kenton Van Stone in 1994, may bring Martínez Moreno’s work the critical attention it deserves at home as well as abroad.

At ease with the different demands of essay, short story and full-length novel, Martínez Moreno looked beyond Uruguay for his subject matter. Spain provides the setting for the early “El niño que prepara su muerte” [The Child Who Prepares His Death] and “La pareja del Museo del Prado” [The Couple in the Prado Museum], from the collection Los días por vivir [Days for Living]. The Cuban Revolution gave rise to El paredón [The Execution Wall] and the fruitlessness of the United States’ military intervention in Vietnam is the subject of “Para un cadáver en Khe Sanh” [To a Corpse in Khe Sanh]. But much of his literary production is set in and pertains very clearly to the River Plate region. Martínez Moreno’s prose fiction as a whole might be considered a metaphor for Uruguay, if not Latin America as a whole, dealing as it does with decay and decline, the disintegration of human relationships—“El lazo en la aldaba” [The Wreath on the Door Knocker], a Christmas story without a happy ending—and abject failure (“La última morada” [The Last Dwelling Place]). Rubé n Cotelo draws our attention to “the obstinate and recurring presence of certain symbols of pessimism and frustration.”

While Martínez Moreno is deeply concerned with social and political themes, the specificities of concrete events are subordinated in his narrative to their effects on the people who participate in them. Whether the scions of upper-class families (Eugenio in Con las primeras luces [With the First Lights], or Carlos Juárez, one of the pampered, wealthy young described in “El simulacro” [The Simulacrum], whether they are drug traffickers (Coca) or petty thieves for whom violent crime is the only way of life, as in Tierra en la boca [Eating Earth], Martínez Moreno’s characters are trapped in a spiral of impotent degradation, living out their lives in “quiet desperation,” sometimes even madness, as in “El ciclo del señor Philidor” [Mr Philidor’s Cycle] and “El prisionero” [The Prisoner]. Accused by critics of despising the characters he creates, rather he is pitiless in stripping away the veils of pretence with which people delude others and, worse still, themselves. These attacks on hypocrisy are not necessarily without humour. The eponymous narrator-protagonist of “El invitado” [The Guest] observes his host and hostess first pretending that the maid has not dropped the soup tureen, then ignoring the appearance of “otro personaje. Es enorme, negro y lustroso” (… another character. He is enormous, black and shiny), the family pet, Ponciano, who first licks up the asparagus soup then vomits all over the porcelain shards. Along with symbols of pessimism and frustration, we also find the recurring motifs of eyes, vision, looks, perceived appearance as opposed to sordid, inner reality, particularly in “Los sueños buscan el mayor peligro” [Dreams Seek the Greatest Danger]. Much emphasis has been placed on the density and rigour of Martínez Moreno’s language. Sometimes convoluted in his descriptive passages, he is entirely successful in conveying an impression of authentic speech, whether that heard in the elegant drawing-rooms of the the upper classes or the rougher but no less meaningful parlance of the slums and shanty towns.

Martínez Moreno’s writing is also full of references to the visual arts and literature. It is difficult to know how far we should trust the voice of the narrator-protagonist of “El simulacro,” but one affirmation does stand out. When faced with the choice between a book on political history and the literary magazine Caras y Caretas (a famous Argentine magazine in which an earlier Uruguayan writer, Horacio Quiroga published his short stories), he would prefer the latter, a view possibly shared by the author. Arguably, such allusions do not constitute an empty display of authorial erudition, but may fulfil several purposes, social criticism being the predominant one. In the self-conscious “Los prados de la conciencia” [The Meadows of Conscience], the narrator-protagonist pokes fun at his peers, the participants in a writers’ congress in New York, recommends to Pérez, whom he has singled out for close attention “no elijas la profesión de escritor” (Don’t choose the profession of writer) and unexpectedly informs the reader that: “Mis lecturas hacen las veces de mi gusto, de mi experiencia y de mi vida” (My reading stands in for my may well be the Uruguayan equivalent of Cervantes’s book-burning scene. There is no doubt that Martínez Moreno makes use of irony, ostensibly for humorous effects, though normally with more satirical intentions in mind. “Cuatro o cinco islas” [Four or Five Islands] with its idea of using an island as a reformatory for minors, shares the tone of Swift’s A Modest Proposal.

Finally, one should consider those aspects of Martínez Moreno’s narrative that demand further investigation. The most obvious is his socio-political comment, but equally rewarding might be a close reading of his works to disentangle the web of intertextualities, as exemplified by the Lear motif in “Cordelia” (1956), or the Jamesian reminiscences of “Los aborígenes” [The Natives]. Within the Uruguayan canon, an obvious point of comparison for stories like “Paloma” (translated into English as “The Pigeon” in 1966 and still being included in anthologies as recently as 1993), is Mario Benedetti’s collection of short stories Montevideanos with its emphasis on stultifying routine, limited aspirations and pettymindedness. Another path to explore is his use of roman noir or “tough guy” fiction, arising no doubt out of his experiences as journalist and criminal lawyer. La otra mitad [The Other Half] deals with adultery, murder and suicide, Tierra en la boca with murder and theft. “El careo” [The Confrontation], another short story that appears in various anthologies, shows a murderer condemned out of his own mouth.

PATRICIA ANNE ODBER DE BAUBETA

See also entry on Mario Benedetti

Biography

Born in Colonia del Sacramento, Uruguay, 1 September 1917. Family bankrupted in 1920. Moved to Montevideo, 1925. Reporter for El País, 1938; staff member, El Diario, 1943 and began contributing to Marcha (see entry under Journals). Won short story competition, 1944. In 1952 covered Bolivian Revolution and became friends of its leaders, Paz Estensoro and Siles Suazo.
Joined the Leftist coalition, the Broad Front, 1971. Resisted both growing threat of military rule and the path of violent resistance chosen by the urban guerrillas. Awarded the Mexican Premio Latinoamericano del Cuento, 1977, for “La máscara.” Home bombed by right-wing death squad, 1978. Left Uruguay and went to Spain initially, settling later in Mexico. Professor of political science, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM). Died of heart attack in Mexico City, 6 February 1986.

Selected Works

Novels
El paredón, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1963
Con las primeras luces, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1966
La otra mitad, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1966
Coca, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1970
El color que el infierno me escondiera, Mexico City: Nueva Imagen, 1981; as El infierno,
Short Fiction
Los días por vivir, Montevideo: Asir, 1960 [Contains “Los sueños buscan el mayor peligro,” “Cuatro o cinco islas,” “Los días escolares,” “El invitado,” “La pareja del Museo del Prado,” “La serpiente”]

Cordelia, Montevideo: Colección Letras de Hoy, no. 7, 1961 [short story, written 1956]

La sirena y otros cuentos, Buenos Aires: CEDAL: 1968

De vida o muerte, Buenos Aires: Siglo XXI, 1971
Tierra en la boca, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1974
Animal de palabras, Montevideo: Arca, 1987

Essays on Literature and Art
Los narradores de 1900: Carlos Reyles, Montevideo: CEDAL, 1968
El aura del Novecientos, Montevideo: CEDAL, 1969
Las vanguardias literarias, Montevideo: Arca y Editores Reunidos, 1969
Montevideo en la literatura y en el arte, Montevideo: Nuestra Tierra, 1971
Ensayos, 2 vols, Montevideo: Cámara de Senadores, 1994
Crítica teatral, Montevideo: Cátnara de Senadores, 1994
Literatura americana y europea, Montevideo: Cámara de Senadores, 1994

Translations
“The Pigeon,” translated by Giovanni Pontiero, in Spanish Short Stories/Cuentos Hispánicos I Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1966

Further Reading

It should be noted that there is only one published full-length study on Martínez Moreno’s work. The two unpublished ones appear in the secondary bibliography of Kenton Van Stone’s monograph of 1994.

Aínsa, Fernando, Los novelistas del 45, Montevideo: CEDAL, 1968
—— Tiempo reconquistado, Montevideo: Géminis, 1977
Benedetti, Mario, Literatura uruguaya siglo XX, Montevideo: Alfa, 1963
Paganini, Alberto, Los cuentistas del 45, Montevideo: CEDAL, 1968
Rama, Ángel, La generación crítica, Montevideo: Arca, 1972
Marxism and Culture in Spanish America

In Latin America as in other parts of the world, Marxism manifests itself as a multifaceted phenomenon. On the political plane, and that of social struggle—praxis was the term used in the 1960s—Marxism gave rise to, or stimulated, the creation of the region’s communist parties, most of which were founded during the 1920s, partly as a result of the efforts of the Third International (1919). The communist parties of Mexico and the three Southern Cone countries were founded around 1920; and in 1928, José Carlos Mariátegui founded the Peruvian Socialist Party which was, for all intents and purposes, a communist organization. As a vision of mankind and society, the ideology devised by Marx and Engels has inspired the thoughts and actions of countless anonymous militants, of political and syndicalist leaders, and of the odd hero or two, or perhaps martyrs. (For example, Ernesto “Che” Guevara, the Argentine-born revolutionary who was assassinated in Bolivia in 1967 whilst trying to promote a guerrilla army of liberation in the South of the subcontinent; also, Salvador Allende, the constitutional president of Chile, who died in 1973 whilst fighting insurgent officers attempting a coup d’état). In its aesthetic and cultural orientation, Marxism has exerted a strong influence on the best of Latin American art, ranging from the mural paintings by the Mexican artists (Diego Rivera, David Alfaro Siqueiros, and to a lesser extent José Clemente Orozco) to the vast epic of Neruda’s Canto general (1950). Equally worthy of note is the expression of Marxism in popular music and social protest songs (such as those by the Argentine Atahualpa Yupanqui; the Uruguayans Daniel Viglietti and Alfredo Zitarrosa; the Mexican Amparo Ochoa; and the cantata Santa María de Iquique [The Virgin Mary of Iquique] by the Chilean Luis Advis, etc.). In fact, at least five of the greatest contributions to the world’s artistic repertory to have come from Latin America display signs, some of them direct, others less so, of Marxist thought and sensibility: 20th-century ultramodern and revolutionary poetry (Vallejo, Guillén, Neruda, Cardenal); the realist, social, or (before these) historical novel, before and after the Boom (Asturias, Arguedas, Roa Bastos, and the later works of Carpentier); Mexican mural art and the indigenist painting of the Ecuadorian Oswaldo Guayasamín; Brazilian architecture as conceived by Oscar Niemeyer; and the protest song (mentioned above) that peaks, as well as garnering an ample continental following, after the Cuban Revolution of 1959. A potent symbol of this alliance between art and ideological commitment is the political affiliation of the Brazilian novelist Jorge Amado, or of Nobel Prize winners such as the Guatemalan Miguel Ángel Asturias (1967), and the Chilean Pablo Neruda (1971), all of whom were communists for most of their lives.

Marxist ideas began to spread and to make themselves felt in Latin America during the final decade of the 19th century. The names of Marx and Engels were not unknown to the European immigrants (and to the Arab immigrants from the Middle East, to a lesser extent). Their names circulated in urban areas, spreading their message of social change to the mining regions of northern Mexico and Tampico, and to the salt and coal mines in Chile. Marx is known, in particular, as the activist of the First International (1864); the anarchist diatribe at this point surely contributes to his popularity. Engels, who died in 1895, is seen in the light of his contribution to the Second International (1889), the seed and guide of various Latin American socialist parties (the Socialist Party of Argentina, founded in 1896 by Justo; and the Socialist Workers Party of Chile, founded in 1912 by Recabarren).

If one divides Latin American Marxism into rough periods, it is possible to note a decisive change occurring with the advent of World War I or, more particularly, with the coming of the Russian Revolution. Before 1914 or 1917, Marxism coexists in an indiscriminate ideological amalgam with Evolutionism on the one hand and the anarchist creed on the other. The latter impregnated the early life of many communist leaders and even the lives of some founder members of the Party (Elías Lafertte and Braulio León Peña in Chile stand out in this respect); the former, the Evolutionist and pro-science atmosphere, not only blurs the frontiers between Positivism and Marxism, but, worse still, reinforces Marx’s anti-peasant prejudices, according to the well-known and distasteful analogy of The 18th Brumaire in which the conservative French peasants and their smallholdings are compared to “sacks of potatoes.” By adopting this line, one risks condemning the rural, that is, almost all of Latin America, as uncivilised and backward.

After 1917 and with the help of Lenin, Marxism evolved and took a more and more definite shape, sailing with ease through the no longer hazardous reefs of Positivism and anarchism. The good communist’s bedside book, or, more appropriately, those to be placed at the sword’s hilt, are Lenin’s most accessible publications (Imperialism; the Highest Stage of Capitalism, and to a lesser extent, The State and Revolution), and later, Stalin’s Problems of Leninism (192,4; 1947). Later still, a book ubiquitous in all the cells and schools for the formation of executive committees, The Fundamental Lessons of Marxism, written by the French normalist (normalien) and militant Georges Politzer. After World War II, Marxism entered academic circles little by little, becoming a matter for debate in universities among economists, historians, literary critics and sociologists, of all kinds. From 1959, and as a direct result of the Cuban Revolution and in response to the explosive worldwide situation, Marxist thought enjoyed a great degree of dissemination as much in specialist publications as in newspapers, magazines, and other forms of mass media. The Central American revolutions of the most recent decades, the Sandinistas of Nicaragua and the FMLN (Frente Farabundo Martí para la Liberación Nacional) of El Salvador, have been the objects of study and reflection by the Chilean-Cuban Marta Harnecker, who analyzes the transformations that have brought about the alliance between Marxism and guerrilla forces with diverse ideologies (Christian, social-democrat, and fundamentally independent organizations).

So that it might not appear unilateral, a description of the origins and reach of Marxism must take into account and put some emphasis on the context of its reception, that is, on the specific regions, countries and socio-historical circumstances in which the ideas and practice of Marxism will develop. In this sense, more than of Marxism, it is possible to talk in terms of Marxisms in Latin America, because of the manifest variety and ramifications of the phenomenon. Some light is shed on this question by a comparison of three relevant individual and national cases; those of the Cuban Julio Antonio Mella (1903–29); the Chilean Luis Emilio Recabarren (1876–1924); and the Peruvian José Carlos Mariátegui (1894–1930). Mella forged himself a path as a student leader at university. During his short period of exile in Mexico, before his assassination at the hands of Gerardo Machado’s henchmen, his main contributions went to the magazine created by Diego Rivera, El Machete. The predominant feature of these contributions is an anti-imperialist sentiment, that follows and makes topical once again Martí’s ideas in a post-revolutionary Mexico that paints clearer still the condition of his country of origin, Cuba, bound to the United States by the Platt Amendment (1902). By contrast, Recabarren worked as a typographer from his early teens, and from his affiliation to the Democratic Party (1894) up to the founding of the Communist Party of Chile (1922), his principal fields of action were the urban masses in Santiago and Valparaiso, and the miners in the north of the country. There he formed mancomunales, a type of class-based organization that, surpassing the limits of the mutualist and anarchist guilds, pointed the way already towards the workers’ federations that followed on a national scale. Throughout his life, until his suicide in 1924, Recabarren was the tenacious creator of the Chilean workers’ press and an indefatigable supporter of the popular theatre of political expression. As for Mariátegui (see separate entry), after what he himself described as his modernista and Bohemian “Stone Age” (1914–18), and after his productive Italian years (1919–23), he went on to analyze with impressive maturity the situation of both his country and the world, an analysis that culminates in his Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, 1928 (Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality). This is probably one of the few Marxist contributions to the study of a particular social structure, in this case, that of Peru. It would be inappropriate in a short article to evaluate and pass judgement on the effects of Marxism, separating the wheat from the chaff. Was it a powerful force in the 20th century, or an alarming accumulation of weaknesses, as some would have us believe? Does it still have a future in the midst of an intelligentsia reduced to impotence owing to a complete lack of political strategy? However, from a neutral or impartial base, it would be difficult to deny its having been an important, if not decisive, component in the cultural life of Latin America. Besides those literary figures already mentioned, much of the less well-known fiction would be inconceivable without the Marxist perspective. The profile of a culture does not depend only on its peaks, but, to use a Taoist metaphor, on “the spirit of the valley” as well! The Ecuadorian novels of the 1930s, a significant portion of the indigenous writing from the Andes, Mexican fiction by such writers as Mauricio Magdaleno and José Mancisidor, novels by the Costa Ricans Carlos Luis Fallas and Joaquín Gutiérrez, and narratives from the Argentines Raúl Larra and David Viñas, among many others, make this point clear. As regards essay writing, besides the fundamental works of the Chilean Volodia Teitelboim and the Argentine Héctor Agosti (who edited and translated Gramsci in the 1950s), recent years have given rise to: the Mexicans Eli de Gortari and Jaime Labastida in the fields of epistemology and philosophy; the Ecuadorian Agustín Cueva writing in the field of political and cultural sociology; studies on cultural criticism in Brazil, whose pivotal point resides in Roberto Schwartz; and literary criticism in Cuba in a continuous line from Juan Marinello and José Antonio Portuondo to Roberto Fernández Retamar; and in Puerto Rico, the works of José Luis González, etc. These examples alone would suffice to prove the current vitality of Marxism which, while having a manifold influence over the actions of the masses, has stimulated a significant number of intellectuals: artists, journalists, professionals, the last of these, as one might expect, especially in the variegated field of the social sciences.

JAIME CONCHA

translated by Luis González Fernández

Further Reading

General
Aricó, José, Marx y America Latina, Lima: Centro de Estudios para el Desarrollo y la Participación, 1980
Pan, Luis, Juan B. Justo y su tiempo, Buenos Aires: Planeta, 1991
Taibo II, Paco Ignacio, Los bolshevikis: historia narrativa de los orígenes del comunismo en Mexico, 1919–1925, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1986 [At once an entertaining and disturbing history of the early years of the Communist Party in Mexico]

Works on/by Individual Marxists
Guevara, Ernesto, Obra revolucionaria, edited by Roberto Fernández Retamar, Mexico City: Era, 1967
Mariátegui, José Carlos, Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, Lima: Amauta, 1928; as Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality, translated by Marjory Urquidi, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971
Recabarren, Luis Emilio, Escritos de prensa, edited by Ximena Cruzat and Eduardo Devés, 4 vols, Santiago de Chile: Nuestra America, 1985–87

Clorinda Matto de Turner 1852–1909

Peruvian prose writer, dramatist and translator

In contrast to the other members of the first generation of women writers in Peru, Clorinda Matto did not grow up savouring the cultural pleasures of European modernity that the liberal elite enthusiastically incorporated into 19th-century Lima. She was born in the city of Cuzco to a family of landowners and spent a good proportion of her childhood on her family’s estate in Calca, where she attended the local school and learned Quechua, a skill she put to use later in her life with the translation of the New Testament into the language of the ancient Incas. Her experiences as a girl growing up in the Urubamba valley, isolated from the guano-booming capital, Lima, and rich in Quechua traditions, became central to her work as a journalist and novelist. Her commitment to forging a Peruvian identity which would incorporate at its heart elements of Quechua culture, was reflected in her two novels on life in the Peruvian Andes, Aves sin nido, 1889 (Birds without a Nest) and Índole, 1892 (Human Nature). If it is true that Matto did not remain altogether invulnerable to the dazzling effects of the “civilizing lights” emanating from European modernity, her Andean background erupts in her work to provide a vision of national identity which was alien to the homogenizing images of a white, western, modern Peru constructed by the ruling liberal elite. Arriving in Lima for the first time as a literary visitor at the age of twenty-three, at a time when literature was still enmeshed in the poetics of Romanticism, Clorinda Matto found herself within a society that was relatively tolerant of women writers, but with its eyes firmly turned towards Europe.

Her first novel, Aves sin nido, narrates the experience of an enlightened creole couple in a small and remote Andean town where they witness at first hand the economic, social and sexual exploitation to which the local religious and political authorities subject the Indians. The book provoked intense controversy, unleashing a flood of critical reviews in the national literary press. Her supporters praised it for its timely courage and progressive stance towards the Indians and compared it with Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin, but the general consensus of the reading public was that the book was offensive for its anti-Catholic spirit and defamatory intentions. The book was later banned, Matto was excommunicated and her effigy burned in a public demonstration. The title of the novel alludes to the story of Margarita and Manuel who, having fallen in love, discover that they are brother and sister, both children of the Bishop of Killac and Indian mothers. They are then, birds that have no nest, no identifiable father, and in the last instance, no identifiable origin or identity.

Her second novel, Índole, is also set in an Andean village where the narrator observes and compares two opposite models of family life: one represented by a newly wed Indian couple, and another by a creole family in the process of disintegration. Despite the unequal conditions under which the dominant and the subordinated groups interact in Matto’s first two novels, the salient feature of this Andean world is an openness to the Other, practised by all the social groups concerned: Indians, masters and creole outsiders. The artistic power of these scenes of cultural interchange, suggests the author’s allegiance to an Andean social order which stands in stark contrast to the segregating practices of the Lima of Herencia (Heredity), the sequel to Aves sin nido. However much the enlightened creole characters of the first two novels rhapsodise about the Edenic Lima, its reality, as presented in Herencia, totally contradicts their dreams and shows just how deceived they had been. Where both Killac and Rosalina are characterised by the close cultural dependence between Indians and notables, or gentry, manifested particularly in domestic life, i.e. food, dress, forms of housekeeping, language of affection, festivities and forms of personal relations, the Lima of Herencia is marked by the barriers—cultural, social and spatial—that divide the three social actors represented by the bourgeoisie, the middle class and the destitute working class. The clusters of traditional Andean cultural practices represented in her first two novels provide a model, albeit not fully articulated, or what modern critics would define as transculturation.

The unfavourable reaction which her novels and her journalistic work provoked in the Lima reading public can be partly explained in political terms as part of the profound schism between the ever conflicting Andean and creole worlds which makes Peru, to this day, a nation divided by violence. Matto was indeed a promoter of Andean values in a nation intent on seeing itself as creole. However, a Christian feminist subtext emerges in Matto’s work which caused further controversy. For Aves sin nido is also the story of a group of women, creole, mestizo and Indian, who together resist oppression despite the belief of the local authorities that “las mujeres no deben mezclarse nunca en cosas de hombres, sino estar con la aguja, las calcetas y los tamalitos” (women should never interfere with men’s affairs, but should keep to their sewing, knitting and cooking). It is the home, not the public sphere, which is presented as the centre of potential revolutionary power, whence a combative morality spreads out into the community threatening the stability of an age old order. It is the female characters who appropriate the language of the New Testament to exhort and proselytise, and who directly confront the oppressors thus unleashing the plot. Matto’s intense and clear commitment to feminist concerns was more explicit in her journalistic work, particularly in her contributions to El Perú Ilustrado of Lima, and El Búcaro America [The American Vase] of Buenos Aires, two leading cultural journals where she worked as director, and in her founding of a publishing house staffed by women and devoted to the publication of works written by contemporary women throughout the continent.

FRANCESCA DENEGRI

Biography

Born Grimanesa Martina Matto Usandiravas in Cuzco, Peru, 11 November 1852. Parents owned small estate where Matto and her two brother spent their childhood. Spoke fluent Quechua for this reason. Formal education in Cuzco where she edited the school newspaper. Mother died in 1862. and in 1868 Clorinda left school in order to run the family household. Married the English physician, John Turner in 1871. Visited Lima in 1877 where she was drawn into the intellectual circle and salon organized by Juana Manuela Gorriti (see separate entry). During war between Peru and Chile (1879–83), Matto’s home turned into a hospital. Husband died in 1881 leaving her heavily in debt. Moved to Arequipa in 1883. Edited the daily newspaper, La Bolsa, 1884–86 [The Stock Exchange]; first woman in America to hold such a post. Moved to Lima in 1886. Deeply influenced by the ideas of Manuel González Prada who supported Indian education and was hostile to the Catholic Church. Editor-in-chief, El Perú Ilustrado [Cultured Peru], Lima’s most important literary magazine, 1889. Excommunicated by archbishop of Lima as result of both articles in El Perú Ilustrado and her novel, Aves sin nido. Resigned as editor in 1891 and founded feminist press, “La Equitativa,” staffed entirely by women, in 1892. A political enemy, Nicolás de Piérola, took over government in 1895. As a result Matto’s home was destroyed; her press sacked and her manuscripts lost. She took flight and settled in Buenos Aires where she undertook a translation of the Bible into Quechua at the request of the American Bible Society. Founded and edited the bimonthly El Búcaro Americano [The American Vase], a social and literary magazine that encouraged contributions from women. Died of pneumonia on 25 October 1909, leaving a part of her estate to the Women’s Hospital in Cuzco.
Selected Works

Novels

Índole (novela peruana), Lima: Imprenta “La Equitativa”, 1892

Herencia (novela peruana), Lima: Masias, 1895

Play

Hima-Sumac: drama en tres actos y en prosa, Lima: Imprenta “La Equitativa,” 1892

Other Writings

Perú—tradiciones cuzqueñas, Arequipa: Imprenta de “La Bolsa,” 1884

Tradiciones cuzqueñas, vol. 2, Lima: Imprenta de Torres Aguirre, 1886

Elementos de literatura según el Reglamento de Instrucción Pública para uso del bello sexo, Arequipa: Imprenta de “La Bolsa,” 1889

Bocetos al lápiz de americanos célebres, Lima: Bacigalupi y Compañía, 1889

Leyendas y recortes, Lima: Masias, 1895

Analogía: segundo año de gramática castellana en las escuelas normales, según el programa oficial, Buenos Aires: n.p., 1897

Boreales, miniaturas y porcelanas, Buenos Aires: Alsina, 1909

Viaje de recreo: España, Francia, Inglaterra, Italia, Suiza, Alemania, Valencia, Spain: Sempere y Compañía, 1909

Further Reading

Lemoine, Joaquín, Clorinda Matto de Turner, Lima: Imprenta y Librería de Benito Gil, 1887

Masiello, Francine, Between Civilization and Barbarism: Women, Nation and Literary Culture in Modern Argentina, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992. [Chapter 3 has material on this author]

Mayan Literature

The Maya were the only people of America’s high cultures who developed a glyph-writ language (a partly ideographic, partly phonetic mode of writing) capable of recording events. But by the time the Spanish conquistadors arrived in Yucatan, where the Maya were then concentrated, many of the great Maya city-states and sacred cities—Tikal, Uaxactun, Copán, and Palenque—were deserted. The Maya codices known as the Dresden, the Paris, and the Tro-Cortesiano antedate the Conquest. Also, among the Mayas, as among the peoples of Central Mexico, there were schools in which the ancient wisdom and knowledge contained in the painted books were passed on and preserved through oral tradition or memorization. As a result of this method of cultural transmission, important literary works have survived from several Mayan groups. Certain scribes who lived through the conquest and recalled the pre-Hispanic teachings transcribed many texts in the alphabet brought by the conquerors or simply transmitted orally information based on the ancient codices to a Spaniard, thereby sometimes compromising the text’s consistency. Humanist friars such as Andrés de Olmos and Bernardino de Sahagún were able to rescue and thus preserve this cultural-literary heritage of the Mayas. Among the Mayas of Yucatan and the Quichés and Cakchiquels of Guatemala (the Maya Indians comprise numerous linguistic and sociocultural groups including the Chontal, Chorti, Huastec, Ixil, Jacalteca, Kanjobal, Kekchi, Lacandon, Mam, Mopan, Tzeltal, Tzotzil and Tzutuhil, in addition to the Cakchikel and Quiché). There were also scribes, usually descended from priests or nobles, who began to transcribe the traditions of the pre-Hispanic centers of learning and the content of the ancient codices. The work of these custodians of the culture thus preserved various chronicles, some books on native medicine (notably the Libro de medicina [Book of Medicine], the Cuaderno de Teabo [Teabo Notebook], the Noticias de varias plantas [Information about Various Plants], the Libro de los médicos [Book of Doctors], and the Ritual de los Bacaab [Ritual of the Bacaab], all by unknown authors), and a whole series of texts called the Chilam Balam, written in the Maya language of Yucatan in Latin script.

The eighteen known books of Chilam Balam are undoubtedly the most significant portion of what remains of early Mayan literature. The volume contains prophecies of the days, the years, and longer periods of time. Within its pages there are also mythical and historical passages, hymns and songs, as well as valuable accounts of tradition and ancient wisdom interspersed with ideas demonstrating the influence of Christianity, mainly of biblical origins. And the best known of these texts is the Chilam Balam of Chumayel, of which only a late version exists, copied at the end of the 18th century. The indigenous testimonies contained herein are descriptions rather than explanations of events during the conquest, asserting that all of these occurrences came to pass because the Indians had lost control of communication. The language of the gods had either become unintelligible, or else these deities fell silent. “Understanding is lost, wisdom is lost” (Chilam Balam, 22). “There was no longer any great teacher, any great orator, any supreme priest, when the change of rulers occurred upon their arrival” (Chilam Balam, 5). The Chilam Balam reiterates their piercing question which can no longer receive an adequate response: “Where is the prophet, where is the priest who will give the true meaning of the language of this book?” (Chilam Balam, 24).

The Quiché and Cakchiquel peoples have also left a rich literary legacy with their famous Popol Vuh (Book of the People), the Títulos de los Señores de Totonicapán [Titles of the Lords of Totonicapán], and the pre-Hispanic play, the Rabinal Achi The Popol Vuh, referred to by some as the “Mayan Bible,” is based on the oral traditions of the MayaQuiché of Guatemala. It is a chronicle of their history which also includes sections on mythology, religion and cosmogony. Despite the relatively late date of transcription (Étienne Brasseur de Bourbourg’s French translation of 1862), the Rabinal Achi piece (originally known as the Baile del Tun-atun [Dance of the Tun-a-Tun] refers to the Mayan year of 360 days and perhaps the play’s annual performance at a festival or ceremony; the term also refers to a sacred native drum used as an accompaniment in the music/dance format of the drama) is authentically indigenous and the only literary work of its kind considered untainted by European or other more recent influence, particularly the taint of the late-medieval Spanish stage conventions found in extant versions of other important pre-Columbian dramas (i.e., the Quechuan Ollantay of Peru and the Náhuatl Güegüence of Nicaragua). Its purity is perhaps due, in part, to the isolation of the Quiché Mayas of Rabinal in Guatemala. The form and structure of the Rabinal Achi is significant in that it points to certain literary conventions apparent in Maya poetry: parallelism, phonic enchantment, repetitions, rhythm resulting from the reiteration of key words. The play also provides an insight into the structure that might have informed other dramatic Maya pieces: dance accompanied by music to punctuate and separate the “episodes,” monotonous, simple and repetitious music, retrospective exposition through dialogic exchanges, abundant reiterations to underscore the theme, the participation of large bodies of persons continually on stage (paralleling the presence of the Greek chorus), and the use of speech conventions and exact repetitions of dialogue by the responding character so as to aid oral transmission. The Mayas’ love of dramatic performances (solemn religious representations, diverting masquerades, or mere pantomimes) was not discouraged by the conquerors. On the contrary, the Spaniards (particularly the missionaries) cultivated drama as a means of instructing converts in religion (the “miracle plays” or autos sacramentales) or conveying cultural values. The more intelligent natives were even allowed to compose the text of such plays. What was saved from oblivion of the pre-Hispanic theatre, fragmentary as it is, still gives a glimpse of the richness and uniqueness of native American drama which had its beginnings in the sacred feasts and developed in isolation its own original forms of expression.

From these literary texts, several principal subjects of native Maya literature are apparent: myths and legends, sacred hymns, various kinds of epic, lyric, and religious poetry, early forms of theatre, chronicles and history based on the ancient annals, speeches and discourses, religious doctrines, and even the tenets of what may be called pre-Hispanic philosophy. In their ancient myths and sacred hymns, in particular, the Mayas show certain similarities in comparison with literary texts of the Náhuas. There had been many contacts between the two cultures ever since the Teotihuacán period and especially in Toltec days when the Náhuas migrated southward, and so, this provides a plausible explanation for parallelism in themes and styles between the two cultures. The native Maya language provides not only an adequate but a rich and elegant medium for communication. By the juxtaposition of roots or morphemes and the use of a number of suffixes and prefixes, it was possible for these literary “custodians of the culture” or “artists of the word” to express any idea with both precision and eloquence, however abstract and complex it might have been. Using the formulaic conventions of oral tradition, the same themes occurred, but they were stitched together or “rhapsodized” differently in each rendition even by the same poet, depending on audience reaction, the mood of the poet or the occasion, and other social and psychological factors. While Mayan poetry and prose was situational, purposeful, instructive in thematic content, recalling cosmological myths and legends about the gods and culture heroes, it also was the expression of creative imagination in its structural format. The old chronicles frequently mention lyric poetry and songs, especially those composed in the Náhuatl and Maya tongues. From the Mayas there is some lyric poetry preserved as part of religious celebrations and festivals in The Book of the Songs of Dzitbalché and also some poems scattered through the various books of the aforementioned Chilam Balam as well as in the Popol Vuh of the Quichés. But the Mayas did not have a Sahagún or a team of well-trained Indian scholars who devoted their time to collecting and preserving the old texts and traditions, and many of their literary compositions were lost. From what remains of their work, however, it is evident that the existence of a rich lyric poetry in the early days of indigenous Mexico is a testimony to the idea of poetry and art as a gift of the gods, as the survival of man on earth, a way to discover divinity, a possible wealth for mankind among the main pre-Columbian cultures of Mexico. The structure of such poetic compositions—repetition of ideas, expression of sentiment in parallel form to reinforce a single idea, the abundant use of metaphors—are similar to the structure of theatre pieces such as the already discussed Rabinal Achi. Indeed, such indigenous lyric poetry is considered to be a forerunner of a very ancient form of dramatic presentation, with groups of singers carrying on a chanted dialogue among themselves. As regards thematic content, prophecies and predictions about the katúns and chronicles and lyric accounts of the Spanish Conquest, together with other songs, are found in the various Yucatec books of Chilam Balam. Of a different flavor, more delicate and sensitive in expression, are many of the poems, sacred hymns and more personal lyric compositions in The Book of the Songs of Dzitbalché. And there are a number of lyric compositions scattered throughout the Popol Vuh. The critic-translator of the Popol Vuh, in a discerning analysis of the conceptualization of the creation myth in this Maya text, emphasizes the primacy given the aural sense in the Maya imagining of things both in thematic content and in lyric expressiveness: “In the beginning, there was a murmurous hush which slowly defined itself into the rippling of water, of softly shifting winds, of the tiny noise of insects, as the sounds of the world separated themselves and came into being” (from The Spoken Word and the Work of Interpretation). Walter Ong is among several commentators who have studied the different sensibilities shaped by primary dependence on what he calls “chirographic” as against the oral mode. One of his key discriminations in distinguishing the sensibility of a literary form from an oral culture arises from his claim that writing, by fixing thought, allows “study”: the systematic and sequential analysis of ideas. And so, the glyph-writing format of the Maya, just as the pictographs among the Aztecs, served to generate discourse and to aid thoughtful analysis, as well as to record received information.

ELENA DE COSTA

See also entries on Aymara Literature, Náhuatl Literature, Quechua Literature

Further Reading

Anthologies, critical editions, and important Mayan literary texts
Barrera Vásquez, Alfredo, El Libro de los Libros de Chilam Balam, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1948; as The Book of Chilam Balam de Chumayel, translated and edited by Ralph L. Roys, Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution, 1933; Norman, Oklahoma: University of Oklahoma Press, 1967 [The more recent edition is particularly recommended since it is a bilingual Maya/English one]
Crónicas indígenas de Guatemala, edited by Adrian Recinos, Guatemala City: Editorial Universitaria, 1957

Critical works or commentaries on Mayan literature
Brinton, Daniel G., Aboriginal American Authors and Their Productions, Chicago: Checagou Reprints, 1970
Correa, Gustavo, Calvin Cannon, W.A.Hunter and Barbara Bode (editors), The Native Theatre in Middle America, Middle American Research Institute, Publication 27, New Orleans: Tulane University, 1961
León-Portilla, Miguel, Pre-Columbian Literatures of Mexico, translated by the author and Grace Lobanov, Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1969
—Cantos y crónicas del Mexico antiguo a través de sus codices y tradiciones, Madrid: Historia 16, 1986
Wolff, Werner, El mundo simbólico de mayas y aztecas, Mexico City: SEP, 1963
Cecilia Meireles 1901–1964

Brazilian poet

Cecilia Meireles is considered one of the most important poets of the second phase of the Brazilian Modernist movement. Her first three books of poetry, Espectros [Spectrums], Nunca mais...e poema dos poemas [Never Again and the Poem of Poems] and Baladas para el-rei [Ballads for the King] were written in the Symbolist tradition, although the poet later chose to dissociate herself from these earlier volumes and to date her poetic contribution to literature from the book which followed a fourteen-year silence and was published in 1939, Viagem [Journey].

Meireles’s poetry was profoundly influenced by two events: first, the death of her parents and three older brothers, and second, the suicide of her first husband Fernando Correia Dias in 1934. She felt that experiencing so many deaths gave her an opportunity to see the transitory nature of life and provided for her what she referred to as an intimacy with death. Her poetry reflects this intimacy as well as an overriding concern with loneliness. The silence and solitude that were such an integral part of her childhood forced her to develop her imagination and to create magical worlds that would serve her well in her development as a poet.

Another element that had a profound effect on Meireles was that of being raised by her Portuguese grandmother. This upbringing later made its way into her poetry in the form of the traditional rhythms and poetic patterns associated with the Portuguese lyrical tradition that remained a constant throughout her literary career. This adhesion to Portuguese poetic forms was considered to be at odds with the growing Brazilian nationalism and dedication to innovation that was so prevalent during the first phase of Brazilian Modernismo.

Meireles’s first association with Brazilian Modernism came by way of the publication of Festa [Party] a journal that sought to create a poetry that would be more spiritual, universal, and harmonious in terms of form and content than the poetry written by the early Modernists. It reflected the concerns of the second phase of Modernism which did not have the irreverent and experimental character of the first phase. From 1930, poetry in Brazil began to present a greater equilibrium and more maturity as well as an abundance of religious and mystical themes. Meireles fitted right in with the growing body of poetry being produced during that time, composing a lyric poetry infused with a certain mysticism and a melancholic tone.

Viagem, which received the Poetry Prize from the Brazilian Academy of Letters in 1939, was considered by many to show her full maturity as a poet. The volume consists of twelve poems that may be interpreted as twelve stages of a spiritual trajectory. The title refers to this journey, where life and poetry join together to the extent that poetry and nature are also fused.

Meireles travelled a great deal and her travelling became an integral part of her poetry, as was seen in some of her later volumes such as Poemas escritos na Índia [Poems Written in India] and Poemas italianos [Italian Poems]. Doze noturnos de Holanda [Twelve Dutch Nocturnes] is also comprised of poetry that Meireles composed while travelling and reflect the mysteries of the night as well as her typical themes of music and melancholy. In a figurative sense, the image of the night in some way is involved in each of the poems of Doze noturnos, and there is a persistent existential anxiety. In the poems, animate and inanimate objects become shadowy and produce doubt and anguish. The poem “Noturno” may be noted for its reflection of metaphysical anguish and the poet’s bewilderment at the eternal cycle of life and death.

In Giroflê, Giroflá, Meireles joins together various sketches (crônicas) from her trips to India and Italy in a highly poetic prose. The title refers to an operetta written by Charles Lecoq; to a French word for the Indian clove (giroflê); and also alludes to language games played by children. In the text highly suggestive words are transformed into symbolic allusions to the countries she visited. In particular, India exerted a considerable influence on the poet after her journey there in 1953, when she was invited to participate in a symposium on the work of Gandhi.

There are other themes that may be considered emblematic of the author, such as the passing of time, the transitory nature of matter and the meaninglessness of life. All these components form some of the most unique and rich poetry in the history of Brazilian literature.

MELISSA A. LOCKHART

Biography

Born Cecilia Benevides Meirelles in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 7 November 1901. Father died three months before her birth. Mother, an elementary school teacher, died when Cecilia was three. The three other children of this marriage died before Cecília was born. Raised by maternal grandmother and her nanny, Pedrina. The former told her stories from her birthplace, the Azores, while from the latter she learned Brazilian folk songs and games. Her grandmother’s house was surrounded by lush vegetation which allowed Cecilia to live close to nature. Death and solitude fed her creative imagination. Graduated with honours from elementary school and awarded a Gold Medal of Merit. Married the painter Fernando Correia Dias in 1921; three daughters, Maria Elvira, Maria Matilde and Maria Fernanda. Established a children’s library in 1934. Travelled to Portugal with her husband in 1935 where she lectured in Brazilian literature at several Portuguese universities. Husband, who suffered from acute depression, committed suicide on their return to Rio. Married Heitor Grillo in 1940. From the 1940s to her death, she was active in several related fields, publishing around twelve books; working on literary translation from Spanish, English and French; lecturing abroad; broadcasting on cultural subjects and organising symposia on folklore, a field in which she was a recognized authority. Awarded the Brazilian Academy of Letters Prize, 1939 for Viagem. Died in Rio de Janeiro, from cancer, 9 November 1964.

Selected Works

Poetry

Espectros, Rio de Janeiro: Leite Ribeiro e Maurillo, 1919
Nunca mais...e poema dos poemas, Rio de Janeiro: Leite Ribeiro, 1923
Baladas para el-rei, Rio de Janeiro: Brasileira Lux, 1925
Viagem, Lisbon: Ocidente, 1939
Vaga música, Rio de Janeiro: Irmãos Pongetti, 1942
Mar absoluto e outros poemas, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1945
Retrato natural, Rio de Janeiro: Livros de Portugal, 1949
Amor em Leonoreta, Rio de Janeiro: Hipocampo, 1951
Doze noturnos de Holanda e O aeronauta, Rio de Janeiro: Livros de Portugal, 1952
Romanceiro da inconfidência, Rio de Janeiro: Livros de Portugal, 1953
Canções, Rio de Janeiro: Livros de Portugal, 1956
Solombar, Rio de Janeiro: Livros de Portugal, 1956
Romance de Santa Cecilia, Rio de Janeiro: Philobiblion, 1957
A rosa, Salvador, Brazil: Edição Dinamene, 1957
Metal rosicler, Rio de Janeiro: Livros de Portugal, 1960
Poemas escritos na India, Rio de Janeiro: Livrario São José, 1962
Ou isto ou aquilo, São Paulo: Editora Giroflê, 1964
Crónica trovada da cidade de Sam Sebastiam do Rio de Janeiro no quarto centenário de sua fundação pelo Capitão-Mor Estácio de Saa, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1965
Poemas italianos, São Paulo: Instituto Cultural Ítalo-Brasileiro, 1968
Ou isto ou aquilo e poemas inéditos, São Paulo: Edições Melhoramentos, 1969

Prose
Giroflê, Giroflá, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1956
Escolha o seu sonho, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1964
Vozes da cidade, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1965
O que se diz e o que se entende, Rio de Janeiro: Nova Fronteira, 1980

Compilations and Anthologies
Obra poética, Rio de Janeiro: Aguilar, 1958
Flor de poemas, Rio de Janeiro: Nova Fronteira, 1972
Cecilia Meireles, Petrópolis: Vozes, 1973
Seleta em prosa e verso de Cecilia Meireles, edited by Darcy Damasceno, Rio de Janeiro: José
Olympio, 1973

Translations
Cecilia Meireles. Poemas em Tradução Poems in Translation, edited with an introduction by Henry Keith and Raymond Sayers, Washington, DC: Brazilian-American Cultural Institute, 1977

Further Reading
Peixoto, Marta, “The Absent Body: Female Signature and Poetic Convention in Cecilia Meireles,” Bulletin of Hispanic Studies 65 (1988)
———“Looking into the Mirror in Cecilia Meireles’s Poetry,” Romance Notes 23 (1982)

João Cabral de Melo Neto 1920—

Brazilian poet

Traditional historiography always points out João Cabral de Melo Neto’s poetry as being an exception within the so-called Generation of 1945—a generation that restored the “great themes” of poetry and that, moved by a formalistic preoccupation (accusing the Modernists of being careless about the formal aspects of poetry), revived fixed forms, like the sonnet. This kind of characterization is still superficial and does not do justice to the author of Uma faca so lâmina (A Knife All Blade).

Within Brazilian poetry, Melo Neto’s works are unique in many other ways. First of all, while most of Brazilian poetry (including here popular music lyrics) seems to have inherited a certain lyrical sentimentalism from the Portuguese, Cabral fits into a tradition of Constructivist art (he admires Mondrian, Le Corbusier, Mirò, Valéry, Jorge Guillén, among others); his writing is much more like that of an engineer or an architect than one who attempts to explore the inner soul of a subject. Poetry is a product of intelligence and perseverance, and not of inspiration and chance. Luiz Costa Lima (1968) has described Cabral’s poetry as “antilyrical,” after suggesting that modern Brazilian poetry has followed a trajectory from a more emotional tone (Manuel Bandeira, 1886–1968), via Carlos Drummond de Andrade’s irony (1902–88), and culminating in Melo Neto’s “antilyricism.” João Alexandre Barbosa (1974) synthesizes Lima’s concept by arguing that Melo Neto’s poetry eliminates lyricism so as to instal its search.

This could be extended to the problem of representation. In Melo Neto, language is pushed to its limits in order to problematize its possibilities of representing reality. In most, if not all, of Melo Neto’s poems there is a procedure that has been called the “rectification of metaphors” where the language of the poem is always testing and revising the images that were used to symbolize reality, each time going deeper or assessing its content from another perspective. The major consequence of that procedure is that meaning acquires a plural potential, allowing the poem to be interpreted from different angles.

Also, one may say that there is a poetics of reading inscribed in Melo Neto’s poetry. Signs like “pedra” (rock) are symbols of obstacles to the reader, who should go through the poem not as a transparency of reality, but as something espresso (thick), as an object made out of words, that creates and represents reality but also is a reality in itself. Instead of the image of a dreamer, who wonders while reading the poem, Melo Neto’s text calls for patient, alert and lucid readers, who will open their eyes to the reality portrayed therein.

This is important because many of Melo Neto’s poems talk about the poverty and the misery of northeastern Brazil, combining an extremely sophisticated poetic diction with social consciousness. The geographic descriptions provided by his texts are loaded with ethical (and political) implications: northeastern people do not have the minimum standards required to be recognized as human beings. In the series of poems describing cemeteries, what is at stake is the presence of death within a reality of hunger, social injustice and high rates of infant mortality. The ethic engraved in this poetry is a “morality of resistance,” it is when there is no human thread in the northeastern backlander that he should be able to achieve survival in such adverse conditions.

As a diplomat, Melo Neto spent most of his adult life abroad, in Spain, in Africa, in other Latin American countries. A significant number of his works talk about Spain and compare it with Brazil’s northeast. Elements of Spanish culture have penetrated deeply Melo Neto’s poetics, such as the “palo seco” of Andalusian cante jondo: the “canto a palo seco” means a poetry that is reduced to its very bones, without any excrescence. By the same token, the tension and the eroticism that electrifies the dance of the bailadoras may well sum up the whole drama of the mimesis, trying to find the proper way to encapsulate within the precariousness of language the sensual movement of the dancer. It must be added that Melo Neto also combines forms of popular poetry (such as the cordel literature: hand-made booklets of poems sold in fairs and hung on a string) with an acute awareness of modern art and the problematics of modern poetry (the issue of communication, the crisis of representation)—he has written several poems, which discuss both Brazilian and foreign artists. Melo Neto also goes against the mainstream of Brazilian cultural discourse when he denies essentialistic views, advocating a Nietzschian notion of reality that is anchored in the physicality of the world. Moreover, Melo Neto also touches upon the issue of historicity, not only because he wrote poems about historical figures (like Frei Caneca): although a subject is often absent from his poems, in his few erotic works there seems to occur a fusion between the voice of the enunciator and the loved being represented. If it could be said that love is the starting point of history—since it implies a socialization between two partners—this socialization is definitely present in Melo Neto’s erotic poetry.

ROBERTO REIS

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry

Duas aguas, poemas reunidos, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1956

Museu de tudo, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1975

A escola das facas, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1980

Auto de frade: poema para vozes, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1984

Translations

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading

——A imitação da forma: uma leitura de João Cabral de Melo Neto, São Paulo: Duas Cidades, 1975

——“Balanço de João Cabral,” in his As ilusões da modernidade, São Paulo: Perspectiva, 1986

Merquior, José Guilherme, “Nuvem civil sonhada—ensai sobre a poética de João Cabral de Melo Neto,” in his A astúcia da mímese, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1972

Special Issues of Journals

World Literature Today (Autumn 1992)

Murilo Mendes 1901–1975

Brazilian poet

In speaking of the poetry of Murilo Mendes, critics are fond of citing the three events that Mendes himself recalls as being crucial in his development as a writer: the passage of Halley’s comet in 1910 apparently awakened Mendes to his vocation as a poet; in 1917 he ran away from school in Niterói to see a performance by Nijinsky at the Municipal Theater in Rio de Janeiro; and in 1921 he established a friendship with the painter Ismael Nery, whose premature death in 1934 provoked a spiritual crisis in Mendes and his conversion to Catholicism. Perhaps what these events have in common is the idea that the other-worldly can be perceived in this world and embodied as a source of spiritual guidance: a communion of the cosmic and the social. Like the famous comet, the poetry of Mendes possesses a definite luminosity and is capable of inspiring the kind of panic associated with the end of the world as we know it. Like the legendary Russian dancer, Mendes detaches himself from time and space in his writing in order to achieve a universal spirit that defies gravity in a search for grace. The religious quality that marks Mendes’s work (linked to a rather vague philosophy that Nery called Essentialism) enables the poet to channel his anguish and passion and to demonstrate the power of the Christian values of love and charity.

Although Mendes collaborated with the first literary magazines (Revista de Antropofagia [Cannibal’s Journal] and Verde [Green]) that grew from the landmark and controversial “Week of Modern Art” in São Paulo in 1922., Mendes is also part of a Catholic renaissance of the same period led by Jackson de Figueiredo and Tasso de Silveira and associated with the magazines A Ordem [Order] and Festa [Party]. Mendes was much younger than the first champions of the Brazilian Modernist movement (including Mário de Andrade, Manuel Bandeira and Oswald de Andrade) and did not publish his first book, Poemas, until 1929. For this reason, he belongs to a second phase of Brazilian Modernism, which was less encumbered by the propaganda of manifestos and freed of the predominance of what Alfredo Bosi has characterized as the Modernists’ initial aesthetics of a return to a primitive matriarchy based on a misunderstood and poorly-assimilated Freudian model. Mendes remained true to Modernism’s rebellious spirit in that he was a believer in modernity conceived of as liberation, and was therefore drawn to the irrational force of Surrealism. Mendes’s use of this language, however, gave him access to the subconscious world and a way of expressing an equilibrium between the transcendent qualities of eternal life and the banality of our everyday lives. For this reason, Manuel Bandeira in a well-known poetic homage called Mendes a “Conciliator of contraries/ One who incorporates the eternal in the contingent.”

With the exception of História do Brasil [History of Brazil] and Convergência [Convergence], there is an amazing consistency in the themes and tone of Mendes’s poetry. The poet himself realized this when he excluded the flippant, almost disposable poetry linked so closely to linear time and historical figures of História do Brasil from the major gathering of his work Poesias (1959). Convergência, poems written from 1963–66, is also an anomalous work, and seems produced in response to the veiled criticism of Brazilian Concretist poet Haroldo de Campos, who wrote an article in 1963 in which he characterizes Mendes as a perhaps overly cautious vanguardist, who has eschewed the “experimental laboratory” of the younger Brazilian poets. However, Mendes’s attempt to metamorphose himself and become a Concrete poet in Convergência is somewhat unconvincing, though his series of “Murilogramas” are interesting literary homages and imitations.

A poetic language laden with biblical images and embedded in an often oneiric montage of realia is at the core of much of his poetry. For example, Mendes, in collaboration with his compatriot Jorge de Lima, produced Tempo e eternidade [Time and Eternity], an orthodox effort to recreate Christianity in 20th-century poetry, drawing on the poetics of Neosymbolist French poets such as Charles Péguy and Paul Claudel. Most readers, however, prefer the spiritual intensity, marvelous enigmas and Zen-like paradoxes of works such as O visionário [The Visionary] (with its striking image of the poet as a new Prometheus chained to Rio de Janeiro’s Sugar Loaf Mountain, his liver eaten away by airplanes), As metamorfoses [The Metamorphoses], and the remarkable Poesia liberdade [Freedom Poetry], composed during World War II. Before leaving for Europe where he would live for some twenty years, Mendes paid tribute to his roots in Minas Gerais by constructing in verse of perfectly-sculpted lines a Baroque representation of a city that is part of the Patrimony of Humanity: Contemplação de Ouro Preto [Contemplation of Ouro Preto].

Murilo Mendes is one of the most complex voices of Brazilian Modernism. The poet has created a fascinating hybrid poetry that moves from a youthful anarchistic spiritual despair to a more mature visionary connection to a metaphysical world. With the 1994 publication of Mendes’s Poesia completa e prosa [Complete Poetry and Prose], the work of this worldclass poet is finally more accessible.

STEVEN F. WHITE

Biography

Born in Minas Gerais, Brazil, in 1901, where he received his primary and secondary education. Ran away from school in 1917 to Rio de Janeiro to see performance by the Russian ballet dancer, Nijinsky. Back in Minas, he worked as a telegraphist, pharmacist’s assistant, book-keeper and notary’s clerk. Worked at the Treasury in Rio de Janeiro. In 1957 he was appointed Professor of Brazilian Literature at the University of Rome. He seldom returned to Brazil thereafter and, as a result both of his voluntary exile and of his work being translated into several European languages, he became better known in Europe than in his homeland. Recipient of the Graça Aranha Foundation Prize and the Etna-Taormina International Prize for Poetry (1972). Died in Lisbon, 15 August 1975.

Selected Works

História do Brasil, Rio de Janeiro: Ariel, 1932
Tempo e eternidade, in collaboration with Jorge de Lima, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Edição de Livraria do Globo, 1935
A poesia em pânico, Rio de Janeiro: Guanabara, 1938
O visionário, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1941
Poesia liberdade, Rio de Janeiro: Agir, 1947
Parábola e Siciliana, Rome: Sciascia, 1959
Tempo espanhol, Lisbon: Círculo de Poesia, 1959
Murilogramas, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1965
Juan León Mera 1832–1894

Ecuadorean prose writer and poet

Until recently Juan León Mera has been identified as a Romantic writer, author of a single novel, Cuman dá, because it is one of the foundations for the formation of this genre in Latin America and it established the novel in Ecuador. This evaluation has changed in recent years as a result of the appearance of studies on key points of this work, which include the intellectual activity of its author in a more global and precise manner. Nevertheless, that significance had not gone unnoticed by his contemporaries, as Alcalá Galiano remarked in 1903: “…I can affirm that Mera’s literature is not mere literature, but rather a very subtle political and social philosophy, adorned with the rainment of wit and a nimble style.”

Mera began his career, not as a novelist but as a poet, writing Poesías, 1858 [Poems], La virgen del sol, 1861 [The Virgin of the Sun], Poesías devotas y nuevo mes de María, 1867 [Devout Poems and the New Month of Mary]. The choice of genre is not accidental; at that time it was the medium of expression with which the dominant culture identified, and in letters it represented the continuums of colonial society within the republic. His themes were the conventional ones, which followed the official criteria of the period: the family, patriotism, educational satire and, especially, religion. For the young man, born in Ambato, of a social class that had declined in status and with no contact with the capital, poetry was the first rung in the social ladder, and he strove hard to achieve this ascent. His education had three characteristics: he was selftaught, as he was unable to attend the university; had very few intellectual contacts—F.Cevallos and Julio Zaldumbide—and he had a Catholic upbringing, which led him to forsake his early liberalism for conservatism.

As a writer and politician he concentrated on the promotion of both political and cultural structures, but always within the boundaries of conservative thought and in agreement with the established cultural canon. His incursions into poetry and narrative, painting, literary criticism, biography, epistolary writing, and also into history, pedagogy, geography, folklore, and journalism, derived from the idea of a project for renewal to which the intellectual was morally bound. This explains a work such as Ojeada histórico-critica sobre la poesía ecuatoriana, 1868 [Historico-Critical Overview of Ecuadorian Poetry], in which he analyzes the reasons for the underdevelopment of writers and shows a new direction which does not have a decisive impact on the cultural context because of his eclecticism. His is an edifying literature in accordance with the conservative nature of the society and the moderation of Ecuadorian Romanticism. Thus it is significant that Mera and the intellectuals around him continued to study the Spanish classics—and also that Mera was interested in the critical commentaries of Valera, Pereda and Alarcón. Mera and his fellow-writers continued to respect the notion that Castilian should remain “pure.” Furthermore, in his adoption of literary Americanism as a formula for national cultural independence, Mera expressed his desire for integration into the Hispanic American world. The last is seen as a unit in which the reason for being a part of “the American reality” would be the contribution to the fabrication of that whole. Thus Mera developed native elements: indigenous folklore, nature, historical anecdotes, local customs. In addition to indianist narrative he wrote legends, stories and local color articles: “Entre dos tías y un tío,” 1891 [Between Two Aunts and an Uncle], Tijeretazos y plumadas, 1903 [Snips and Penstrokes].

Not long after the publication of his Poesías, Mera began his political career. From 1861 on he held important offices and was to become the most outstanding intellectual of the Conservative party, collaborating in the modernization project for the State that was promoted by the dictator García Moreno, with whom he closely identified. This project sought to endow the State with real power, defined as having a divine origin. Their goal was to be achieved with the support of the landowners in the regions and the union of Church and State. The Catholic Church was charged with keeping a vigilant eye on ideology and education. After the assassination of the dictator, together with the social changes that then took place, this particular expression of power was jeopardized. Thus Mera tried to find a formula that would allow the system of large landholdings common to the highlands to continue despite the threat presented by the liberal sectors of the coast, but he was unable to make his influence felt. His La Dictadura y la Restauración [The Dictatorship and the Restoration], written in 1884 but published in 1932, is an example of his role as ideologue, although the reaction of members of his political party was adverse.

In Cumandá (1879), Mera brings together a Romantic concept of the novel and an ideological interpretation of the country. The work’s lineage may be traced back to Chateaubriand and sentimental and indianist narratives. There are no signs of linguistic unorthodoxy, since the intention of the author is to write correctly—especially because the novel is dedicated to the Spanish Academy—following established models, leaving originality for themes, according to the tenets of literary Americanism. Thus the action is articulated with the familiar mixtures of narrative lines, changes of rhythm, unexpected turns, including the final anagnorisis and temporal counterpoints, supporting a story of love, hate, revenge, sin and repentance. The main plot narrates the love between the Indian Cumandá and the creole Carlos, impeded by the adversities which culminate in the death of the young woman. Linked to this story are the description and symbolization of nature and the sequences protagonized by Indians, including folklorish scenes.
Cumandá belongs to the period following on the dictatorship of García Moreno (1860–75) in which Mera is aware of the decline of both power in the sierra and of his model for the State. The novel tries to offer a formula for saving a world deep in sin (violence) because of landowners like Orozco and the interruption of the Jesuits’ civilizing mission when they were expelled. The sacrifice of an innocent Cumandá, a “white” Indian, allows for the reconciliation in orthodox Catholic terms between Orozco, father of the heroine and by then a Dominican priest, and Tongana, the Indian who had abducted Cumandá. At the same time it impedes the act of incest between the two young people. That is, the social solution must be found through reconciliation in Catholic terms. Religion acts as a moral guide so that material conditions change as a result. The solution Mera proposed is ineffective in societal terms since it consisted of a Jesuit model of civilization that was unacceptable to the landowners of the highlands. In 1895 the liberals come to power; a year earlier Mera had died, forgotten by the members of his own party.

Luis MARTUL TOBÍO

Biography

Born in Ambato, Ecuador, 28 June 1832. Abandoned by father and brought up by his mother in abject poverty; largely self-taught. Began to paint water colours which he sold to travellers. When he was able to visit Quito, made friends with the painter Antonio Salas, and mixed with younger writers such as Julio Zaldumbide. Involved in politics and journalism; became provincial governor, a deputy in the national Congress and president of the Senate. Composed song adopted as national anthem in 1865. Civil war and injustices of Ecuador’s society influenced his writing. Died in Ambato, 13 December 1894.

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction
“Los novios de una aldea ecuatoriana,” serialized in La Prensa, Guayaquil, Ecuador (February–April 1872)
Cumandá, o, un drama entre salvajes, Quito: J. Guzmán Almeida, 1891
Por qué soy cristiano, Quito: Imprenta de la Universidad, 1879
“Entre dos tías y un tío,” Revista Ecuatoriana, Quito, Ecuador, nos. 9–30 (1891)
“Un matrimonio inconveniente,” Revista Fe, Quito, Ecuador, nos. 58–60 (October–December 1893); in book form, Quito: El Conejo, 1984

Poetry
Poesías, Quito: Bermeo, 1858
La virgen del sol, leyenda indiana, Quito: n.p., 1861
Poesías devotas y nuevo mes de María, Quito: Bermeo, 1867

Other Writings
Ojeada histórico-crítica sobre la poesía ecuatoriana desde su época más remota hasta nuestros días, Quito: Sanz, 1868
La escuela doméstica; artículos publicados en “El Fénix,” Quito: Nacional, 1880
Compilations and Anthologies

Obras escogidas, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1948

Novelas cortas, Ambato, Ecuador: Imprenta Municipal, 1952

Further Reading

Guevara, Darío O., Juan León Mera o el hombre de cimas, Quito: Ministerio de Educación Pública, 1944

Sevilla, Carlos A., “Aspectos de la personalidad de Juan León Mera,” La Casa de Montalvo, Ambato, Ecuador, nos. 57–58, (1953)

Sommer, Doris, Foundational Fictions: the National Romances of Latin America, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991 [Chapter 8 is on Cumandá, Enriquillo and Tabaré]

Special Issues of Journals

La Casa de Montalvo, Ambato (June-August 1933)

Mestizo

Racial terminology in Latin America has often involved a confused and unequal use of terms and references to reflect many multi-racial cultures and peoples. The Spanish Crown contributed to this confusion early on with its near obsessive goal of identifying and categorizing the racial (caste) origin of the New World colonial population. In the final analysis, mestizo has been used to describe a variety of mixed-blood groups. Current clinical and popular usage, however, define a mestizo as a product of white European and Indian blood lines.

Unlike their British colonial counterparts in North America, who came with entire families to seek a new life, Spaniards often came to the New World without their women. Thus, Spaniards began the process of miscegenation (white and Indian) from the first moments of the conquest, seeking to couple with indigenous women, and that comingling of blood continues to this day in virtually every nation in Latin America. In the case of the Aztec empire, the Indian woman who represents this union and the creation of the mestizo is Doña Marina or La Malinche, given by her parents to Hernán Cortés and reviled as betrayer of the race until recent feminist re-visions by, among others, Rosario Castellanos (see separate entry) and the US critic Sandra Messinger Cypess.

This process of miscegenation between Spaniards (or in modern times other European blood lines, including British, German and Italian) and the indigenous populations, referred to in Latin America as mestizaje, has played a varied social and political role throughout the history of Latin America. Its primary importance has been in Mexico, most of Central America, and in many South American countries, particularly the Andean countries and Paraguay where the indigenous population is considerable.
In Spanish colonial society mestizos formed a major category in the social caste system, positioned above Indians and blacks, but distinctly inferior to both creoles and Spaniards. Mestizos were often shunned by Indians. On the other hand, they were often mistrusted by the creole and Peninsular authorities who questioned their loyalty to the throne. After the Wars of Independence and throughout most of the 19th and early 20th centuries the mestizo’s role in society stayed much the same. In many areas mestizos continued to have a stigma attached to them that suggested they were somehow bastard offspring. Still, mestizos have not generally suffered from the same level of racial discrimination that has been visited upon many Indian groups in Latin America. Moreover, during the last sixty to seventy years the mestizo has assumed a leadership role in many Latin American countries. Unlike Indians, mestizos now hold a wide variety of professional and political positions and live in socially differentiated towns and neighbourhoods, integrating with people of European extraction.

It is in Mexico where the mestizo and mestizaje are most heralded. Indeed, an entire historical mythology has sprung up in Mexico surrounding the mysterious and wondrous nature of the mestizo who is, in the final analysis, the modern Mexican. This new attitude is largely the result of the Mexican Revolution in which the majority of revolutionary military and political leaders were mestizos. Encouraged to some extent by the writings of the Mexican philosopher José Vasconcelos (see separate entry), who posited the notion of the “cosmic race,” this fusion of the great European (Spanish) heritage with the sturdy and admirable Indian races of pre-Columbian Mexico has become a sort of national sacred event—providing for the creation of a New Man. But it was the Mexican philosopher Andrés Molina Enríquez in his Los grandes problemas nacionales [Great National Problems] who most elaborated the view of the mestizo’s racial importance and started a tradition in Mexican historiography.

Mestizos come in a variety of complexions, tending to be more Indian-looking than European, or more Europeanlooking than Indian. The result: there is no one particular mestizo physiognomy. But in addition to using the term mestizo to denote racial features, the term is also associated with culture (mestizaje cultural)—indicating variously a way of life, a psychological disposition, customs, and so forth. In addition, the status of being a mestizo often suggests political and economic (commercial) distinctions in society. Thus, discussions of the mestizo in Latin American literature and letters often are not anthropologically or racially based, but rather sociologically and politically focused. This is apparent, for example, in the term cholo, meaning a mestizo, but also a “civilized” (that is, integrated) Amerindian.

SAM L.SLICK

See also entries on La muerte de Artemio Cruz (Carlos Fuentes), El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega, Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala, Identity, “Nuestra America” (José Martí), Fernando Ortiz, El laberinto de la soledad (Octavio Paz), José Vasconcelos

Further Reading

Anzaldúa, Gloria, Borderlands / La Frontera: the New Mestiza, San Francisco: Spinsters / Aunt Lute Book Company, 1987
Metafiction

From the moment pen was first put to paper certain writers have played with the conceited idea of immortalising themselves not only through their works but in their works. Curtailed by conventions—for example, the omniscient narrator is never omniscient enough—many writers take it upon themselves to invent new rules (not always for the same reason) that allow their appearance, brief or prolonged, on the stage of their own making. This gesture, once innovation and today yet another convention, is one of many visible in the technical repertoire of modern-day creators of fiction. Metafiction is, in the general sense, all that fiction which tends to reflect or comment, either directly or indirectly, on its own fictitious composition. In so doing, such writing breaks necessarily with realist conventions, experimenting with subject matter, style, temporal sequences and any other category that once might have been sacrosanct to the Realist School. Of course, this break can be playful, political, philosophical or simply aesthetic, depending on the aims of the writer in question. This trend away from the traditional categories of the novel is very much evident in contemporary Latin American fiction.

Since the beginning of the 20th century Latin American narrative has witnessed a variety of trends, perhaps the most prominent being the move, particularly since the middle of the century, away from traditional Realist writing. If Latin American literature was to respond to the many aspects and levels of its own reality, then creative autonomy would represent a crucial ingredient in communicating such a rich and heterogenous universe. The Boom, as we know it today, implied a revision of definition of the real in a phenomenological sense. While Realism tended to exalt Life and diminish Art, some Latin American writers, seeing little or no future in the regionalist novel and its mimetic narrative, opted for a different kind of writing that would come to grips with a more comprehensive definition of reality. This would include not only the knowable and familiar, the social and political, but also the individual’s personal and secret conceptions of life and of writing. In fact, objective reality is often questioned or totally rejected, while the subjective levels of dream and fantasy become the writer’s scenario.

This growing conviction of the writer’s freedom to select his or her field of vision and the tools with which to communicate it is frequently accompanied by the parallel conviction that the literary text is essentially a work of composition involving craft and artifice. This emphasis on the formal dimension of writing, intuitively practiced by all writers, becomes a conscious path taken by others and the raison d’être of their work. For these, narrative becomes the play on words and literary and novelistic conventions, a goal which frequently implies the attempted annihilation of fixed meanings or, in more extreme cases, of words having any referential meaning at all.

There is, however, no clear-cut chronological calendar in Latin America for this development towards more conscious craft and artifice in the novel. Nor do all writers have exactly the same motives for abandoning realist techniques and a clearly defined social and political backdrop. Moreover, the intensity with which they embrace technical innovation and change varies greatly and for different reasons.

In Argentina a pioneer of metafiction was Macedonio Fernández who remains little known because the experimental nature of his writing means that the reader has to struggle to achieve understanding. He is, in Barthes’s term, “writerly” rather than “readerly” and thus it is not surprising that Borges, in particular, should have admired his work and devised ways of presenting metafiction which appealed to the imagination and made it intellectually exciting. It is Borges’s interest in metafiction that accounts for him being the first Latin American writer to be taken up by the French intelligentsia. Borges was seen as relevant partly because he rejected realism and stressed the artificiality of literary creation. He argued that since the universe is, in any event, beyond the understanding of human beings it cannot be captured by them on paper. Thoughts can be conveyed on paper only through a series of words, an organization which places them in time, and any chronological order is artificial, since the material world is not reducible to semiotic signs. This is a point Borges illustrates through the fable of the map makers and the empire. The cartographers, desperate to make their synoptic version of the empire as accurate as possible, keep increasing the size of the map until it is as large as the territory itself, for they have learned that any synopsis (an encyclopedia, for instance) involves distortion. It follows from this that language, too, is an inadequate instrument to convey “reality” since it is at one remove from it; nor is it possible to reconcile the way intelligence seeks to structure the universe in a (vain) attempt to comprehend it, with the infinite matter it seeks to circumscribe and reduce to words. These metafictive concerns proliferate in Borges’s work; a few relevant stories are the following. In “Pierre Menard, autor del Quijote” (Pierre Menard, Author of the Quixote), a diffident, minor French writer of the early 20th century decides to immerse himself so completely in the atmosphere of Cervantes’s Spain that he will be able to rewrite the Quixote using exactly the same words that Cervantes used. Menard is able to achieve this bizarre objective in a partial way by a perfect reproduction of certain parts of this classic novel. But Borges’s point is that the same words do not have the same meaning when read in a different century: time has altered their sense irrevocably. “El Aleph” (The Aleph) illustrates the writer’s plight as a being living in time. The protagonist is able to see the universe in its entirety, but this revelation, of course, is outside of chronological time. How then can he convey this experience on paper? In “Emma Zunz,” Borges dwells on the distinction between the verisimilar and the real by stressing the artificiality of narrative. To save her life after committing a murder, Emma Zunz tells the police a story which is quite credible and in which, as Borges puts it drily: “sólo eran falsas las circunstancias, la hora y uno o dos nombres propios” (all that was false were the circumstances, the time and one or two proper nouns). In “La muerte y la brújula” (Death and the Compass), a pseudo-detective story, the investigator of a series of murders acts like a critic with a fixed idea. He decides that a Jewish murder requires a Jewish solution and turns himself into an instant scholar on Judaic culture. This obsession is his downfall since a character who bears the detective a grudge is able to use the knowledge of his obsession to destroy him.

Another Argentine author of metafiction is Julio Cortázar whose novel Rayuela
(Hopscotch) is one of the 20th-century’s monuments of self-conscious fiction in Spanish America. Since there is a separate entry on this text in the encyclopedia, the other examples that will be given here are Tres tristes tigres, 1967 (Three Trapped Tigers) by Guillermo Cabrera Infante and Máscaras, 1996 [Masks] by a fellow-Cuban, Leonardo Padura Fuentes, who makes an innovative use of the noire genre in his novels of the 1990s.

Cabrera, like Borges, is a ludic writer, but he believes more than Borges in the liberating potential of language. Specifically, he believes that language can be released from its servitude to Western Reason by being used playfully and creatively. With this objective in mind, Cabrera Infante like Cortázar, thought it of the utmost importance for authors to free themselves from “correct” Castilian and to reclaim the vernacular. This explains Cortázar’s insistence on using River Plate Spanish and why Cabrera Infante sees fit to alert the readers of Tres tristes tigres to the fact that “El libro está en cubano.” (The book is in Cuban Spanish). This emphasis accounts for the parodies of different island authors, exposing what is perceived as their contrived prose style. However, the written word, even when “Cuban,” is seen as but an inadequate substitute for the spoken vernacular. Pursuing the subject of the inadequacies of written language, Cabrera, who assisted with the English translation of Tres tristes tigres, also presents its readers with different forms of poor translation in the two versions of the “Tale of a Walking Stick” told by a couple of US tourists visiting Havana in the 1950s. The first version is a pedantic one with footnotes, and the second is that of Mrs Campbell, one of the main characters of the story who corrects the translation of the tale told about her and her husband.

Leonardo Padura Fuentes is a postmodern writer who has shrewdly exploited the climate of tolerance of the transitional period in Cuba (one which, for example, allows authors to publish abroad), to focus on corruption in high—and other places in the island’s contemporary society. His recent novel, Máscaras, unsurprisingly, won the Spanish Premio Gijón for the best crime novel of 1996. Its subject matter is bold, for it involves the death of a transvestite in a wood close to Havana, a crime which, as a detective on the case observes, is of a type associated with a “developed” country. In addition, it transpires that the victim has been killed by his own father, a trusted diplomat who has frequently served his country abroad. Máscaras is also a metafictive novel in several ways. It reflects on cultural policy since the Cuban Revolution, with particular reference to the silencing at the end of the 1960s of all but those writers prepared to follow the most orthodox Party line - the latter being those offered as models to aspiring writers of the protagonist’s generation. In addition the detective, Mario Conde, is a failed writer, and a story of his is inserted in the fiction. There is also a composite, homosexual character, Alberto Marqués, based on the playwrights Antón Arrufat and Virgilio Piñera. The complexities, sophistication and implied social criticism of Máscaras shows how far crime fiction in Cuba has evolved since the 1970s when it served as a propaganda tool in the Cold War.

Other 20th-century Latin American writers of metafiction who have an entry in this volume are: Reinaldo Arenas (see the article on Arturo la estrella más brillante [Arthur the Brightest Star]), Julio Cortázar, José Donoso, Salvador Elizondo, Manuel Puig (parody), Augusto Roa Bastos (Yo el Supremo [I the Supreme]) and Mario Vargas Llosa (particularly in La tía Julia y el escribidor [Aunt Julia and the Scriptwriter]).

DERMOT CURLEY AND VERITY SMITH

Further Reading

---

Mexico

19th-Century Prose and Poetry

In 19th-century Mexico, all official academic poetry still adhered anachronistically to the pastoral artifices of Neoclassicism. When this finally gave way to the impetus of Romanticism, the form of sentimental lyricism and its political neutrality continued. It was the Cuban José María Heredia (1803–39) who introduced Romanticism to Mexico. He brought together groups of young Mexican poets and gave them space in newspapers such as El Iris (182.6), La Miscelánea (1832) and La Gaceta Especial de la República which he himself edited.

In the 1850s a disagreement arose concerning cultural dependency. On the one hand, conservative literary circles (members of the academies of San Juan de Letrán and La Lengua) maintained that Mexican literature should remain faithful to Spanish models. On the other hand, Liberals such as Ignacio Ramírez (1818–79) and Francisco Zarco (1829–69) (members of the Liceo Hidalgo) favoured a nationalist perspective enriched by the presence of other forms of European literature. As a result, three forms of Romanticism were created in poetry, one a Hispanophile conservative form, another antiSpanish liberal form, open to other European models and a third, eclectic form, combining moral conservatism with a sense of nationalism and an openness to models from all over Europe.
The Hispanophile faction favoured a form of Romanticism that was conservative in theme and adhered strictly to classical rules of form. Although its themes were social it avoided political commitment, and the love conventions of the Spanish canon were followed. Critical opinion holds that it is mediocre poetry, lacking in spirit and poetic imagination since its adherents had resorted, it was claimed, to clichés and pallid sentimentalism. On the other hand, it is acknowledged that this poetry has an impressive command of rhetorical resources and classical metres, as well as a certain originality in its treatment of religious themes. To date there has been no thorough examination of the theoretical implications of a double religious and erotic code in the lyrical poetry of Manuel M. Flores, J. Arcadio Pagaza, Antonio Plaza and José Joaquín Pesado.

The liberal poetic wing was made up of poets of a younger generation: José María
Heredia, Rodríguez Galván (1816–42), Fernando Calderón (1809–45) and Ignacio Ramírez. These poets began their creative life in the Academy of San Juan de Letrán and went on to the Liceo Hidalgo in its first period, under the leadership of Francisco Zarco from 1851–70. Until its closure in 1882, the Liceo Hidalgo was the most significant literary institution in Mexico. Among the array of poets and writers who gathered there the most outstanding were: Guillermo Prieto (1818–97) who tried, with Riva Palacio, to popularize poetry and to poeticize the popular in the style of Fernández de Lizardi. They used the resources of the oral tradition of the ballad (romance/corrido), satirical poetry and the “jácara virreinal,” a picaresque ballad of the colonial period. They thus secured the attention of the masses.

Eclectic Romanticism was favoured by Ignacio Manuel Altamirano when he took over the Liceo Hidalgo. In his manifesto “La literatura nacional” (1870), which would be part of the canon for several generations, he proposed the modulation of the sentimental tone and a return to the formal rigour of Classicism. He believed that if landscape constituted a state of the soul, then the spirit of the race could be defined through the reproduction of the features of diverse regions. He recommended national models above foreign ones, and he included in that category the European icons of both the conservatives and the liberals, erasing the old disagreement between the two.

Among the followers of Altamirano, Salvador Díaz Mirón (1853–1928) stands out owing to his thematic complexity, the intensity of his tone and his refinement of form.
Contemporary criticism was unanimous in declaring him the best Mexican Romantic poet.

With the Restored Republic (1867–77) came the pragmatic Positivist ideology of order and progress, austere Republican morality and indifference towards art. The teaching of literature was considered one of the three least important subjects in the official education programme of Gabino Barreda, which was in force from 1862 to 1912. During the first five presidencies of Porfirio Díaz (1876–96), lyric poetry was the least favoured genre, and there were no poets in positions of middle to high political or administrative responsibility. Against this materialism and in the face of the Realist canon, Modernismo arose.

Spanish American Modernist poetry is not a stylistic tendency but rather a complex and coherent aesthetic expression, with its own well defined epistemology. It explores new intuitive and empirical ways of perceiving the poetic world and seeks to convey it via appropriate lyrical resources. Notable examples of such are the symbol, the metaphor and synaesthesia. Its poetic theory is made plain in the debate that Amado Nervo (1870– 1919) and other Mexican poets continued for more than a decade with academician Salado Álvarez (1867–1931). This debate has been most effectively examined by Luis Mario Schneider in Ruptura y continuidad de la literatura mexicana, en polémica.

It is inaccurate to see Modernism as an anti-scientific reaction; conversely it looks to Physics and Experimental Psychology to find arguments to take apart the materialism of the positivist theories. In the same way, it is imprecise to contrast Realism as the literature of the masses with Modernist poetry as that of the elite, despite the fact that both aspired to these respective goals. With very few exceptions, all Mexican 19th-century literature was elitist, since even at the end of the century more than 87% of the population was still illiterate.

The Mexican Modernist lyric can be divided into three periods which correspond to the positions of three very influential magazines in Latin America. The initial period is represented by the Revista Azul [Blue Journal] (1894–96). This became the most influential magazine of poetry in the Spanish language. Contributors included: the Cuban Julián del Casal, the Colombian José Asuncion Silva (1865–96), the Uruguayan Julio Herrera y Reissig (1875–1910), the Bolivian Ricardo Jaimes Freyre (1868–1933), the Spaniards Salvador Rueda (1857–1933), the Mexicans Salvador Díaz Mirón, Agustín F. Cuenca (1850–84), Justo Sierra and Laura Méndez de Cuenca (1853–1928). The publication was edited by Amado Nervo, Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera (1859–95) and Carlos Díaz Dufoo (1861–1941).

The Revista Moderna covered the most thriving period in which a balance was sought between formal preciosity and a greater insistence on existential and philosophical problems. With Jesús Valenzuela as their patron and the teaching of Nervo as their inspiration, the following published their best texts: Manuel José Othón (1858–1906), Luis G. Urbina (1868–1934), Efrén Rebolledo (1877–1929) with his first books of poetry and José Juan Tablada (1871–1945).

The postmodernist poets emerged through the magazine Savia Moderna [Modern Sap]. In this magazine a number of more minor writers who showed some aesthetic inconsistency were published, for example María Enriqueta Camarillo (1875–1968). It is worth noting the influence of the “Ateneo de la juventud,” above all in the reaction against the aestheticism of the first period of Modernist poetry. Two poets of great talent stand out: Enrique González Martínez (1871–1952) and Ramón López Velarde (1888–1921). These two favoured a return to humanist idealism and to the neopopularism that the avant-garde poets of the Contemporáneos group (1928–32) were to develop later. The work of Dolores Bolio (1880–1950), who perceptively reopened the problematic woman question, should be noted among these alternatives.

In poetry and in narrative, Mexican Modernism laid the foundations for the avant-garde movement. It is evident in all 20th-century Mexican lyric poetry, whether in the avoidance of ordinary settings (as in the Generación de Contemporáneos) or in the adherence to some of its principles such as the rejection of bourgeois materialism and of transnational capitalism.

From the first days of Mexican independence attempts were made to erase the Spanish presence, and Mexico’s pre-Hispanic heritage was revitalized as a sign of the new nationality. In 1827 Valentin Gómez Farías and Carlos María Bustamante issued a federal decree in which the Mexican Indian and all that was native was declared a symbol of Mexican nationality. The decree soon lost force. During the governments of Juárez and Díaz, the Mexican Indian was eradicated as a figure of national identity and was replaced by the mestizo (racially mixed). These presidents undertook all kinds of campaigns (including military ones) against the indigenous communities who would not use their land for the extensive cash crops of capitalism, and who did not participate in the manufacturing drive. As a consequence, the Indian disappeared from all official novels during these governments.

The novel was the instrument that was used to spread the liberal political concept of social and racial identity. In the first period of the Romantic novel (1810–69), four main forms predominate: historical, costumbrist, sentimental and serialized. However, none of these was a pure or independent narrative form.

The historical novel was the least widespread but the most political. It was the only form which systematically favoured Rousseau’s theme of the Indian as the good primitive man, and denounced the atrocities of the Spanish conquest or indeed the intolerance and authoritarianism of the colonial period. It supported the official stance of the Indian as an icon of nationality. In these novels, the structure of the plot was weak and the narrative techniques were basic and ineffective. A paradigmatic case is Jicoténcal (1826) published anonymously in Philadelphia, which Luis Leal has put forward as the first historical novelistic text in the Spanish language. In Netzula (1832) by José María Lafragua (1813–76), the Romantic theme of racial and social equality for all gives way to sentimentalism. From then on, in the 19th-century novel, texts inspired by Rousseau lost their political dimension and held on only to the narrative convention which showed admiration for uncultivated nature, and which presented the native as a fatal victim of history and destiny. The Positivist ideal of progress based on the urban values of institutional work and order was to predominate.

As Mexico did not have a Middle Ages, its authors sought to recreate the colonial period. Examples of such would be Ignacio Rodríguez Galván (1816–42) in La hija del oidor, 1836 [The Judge’s Daughter] or the failed attempt of Mariano Meléndez y Muñoz in El misterio, 1836 [The Mystery], set in the court of Philip II. They both lacked sufficient force and accuracy to capture either the atmosphere or the characters. The former constructed the action around the devices of the serialized novel, and the latter relied on a profusion of detail and the conventions of melodrama.

The costumbrista novel renewed the search for the nation’s soul and drew on aspects of society which it considered representative. It was based on the novelistic tradition started by Lizardi, which frequently resorted to prettification or redundant scenes. However, the costumbrist form gave the novels verisimilitude, as well as variety of plot and anthropological interest. The costumbrist proclivity for detail and affected sentimentalism detracted from the main thrust of the action, gave a slow heavy pace to the storyline, often interrupted the plot and caused the characters (even the major ones) to grow blurred. The costumbrist genre through José Tomás de Cuéllar (1830–94) became an independent narrative genre, and following the influence of Altamirano, became an integral part of Realism.

The sentimental novel was the most widespread and most characteristic of conventional Romantic sensibility. All the internal and structural elements of the texts were designed to achieve the melodramatic effect of the amorous conflict. It was perhaps the only form of the novel to remain pure, without resorting to history, costumbrist scenes or the resources of the serialized novel. This form imposed on the others the plot of an immortal and unrealized love to provoke the tension within the novel.

The influence of the sentimental did not disappear during the 19th century. Paradigmatic tales of this narrative form are Amor secreto, 1843 [Secret Love] by Manuel Payno (1810–94) and La sensitiva, 1859 [The Sensitive Girl] by Juan Díaz Cobarrubias (1837–59). In her study of the 19th-century novel in Latin America, Foundational Fictions (1991), Doris Sommer has pointed out that if one takes the woman as a double sign of desire and individual political aspiration (Eros and Polis), and if one takes the family as a substitute structure for government, since Romantic texts only present love relationships interrupted by the authoritarianism of patriarchal figures, the following conclusions can be drawn: the young generation was cut off from the project of the nation, there was great fear of change in the intellectual establishment, and the social classes remained impermeable, all of this in a country that was supposed to be in the process of developing.

Since the serialized novel did not aim for the verisimilitude of the historical novel, it was able to escape from political propaganda, finding an expression for the novelesque through the legendary and ended up in the realms of the fantastic. Although it aimed for a strictly novelistic space, it fell into the conventions of the serialized genre. It was however more flexible and critical than the other forms. These were the novels that were most read in the 19th century as they were published in weekly episodes in newspapers or independent booklets. The first time that the theory of the serialized novel was expressed in Mexican Literature was in the prologue to La hija del judío [The Jew’s Daughter] by Justo Sierra O’Reilly (1814–61), a story which can be taken as a model of the subgenre in its conservative form.

The serialized novel has been mistakenly scorned for the exaggerated and contrived nature of its plot, as well as for its supposed superficiality. However Astucia, el jefe de los hermanos de la hoja o los charros contrabandistas de la rama, 1865–66 [Artful Astucia, the Chief of the Brothers of the Blade] or by Luis Gonzaga Inclán (1816–75) and Los bandidos de Río Frío, 1889–91 [The Bandits of Río Frío] by Manuel Payno are novels that under the trivial appearance of adventure included a second code in which the objectives of the governments of Juárez and Porfirio Díaz were questioned. In Astucia the vulnerability of fiscal control and the law is exposed and society is replaced by an idealized community of smugglers. During the presidencies of Juárez (1858–72) (who was of native American descent), the representation of the Indian disappeared from the novel, in a country where a third of its population were indigenous but which was convincing itself of its claims to modernity. During the xenophobic dictatorship of Díaz, Los bandidos de Río Frío gave visibility to the Indian as a marginalized social entity who had been reduced to nomadism and banditry owing to agrarian policy. Both novels document the failure and corruption of the campaigns to bring peace to the country and to attract foreign investment.

As in politics, in the novels of the first period (1810–68), there were no influential masters, and not even a dominant canon. The novel remained more isolated than poetry and more adrift. There was no clear differentiation between the novel, the novella and the short story. However in the second period (1868–1911), Altamirano was responsible for the re-emergence of the novel and its re-structuring and shaping into what was known as the national novel. This made use of the empirical realism of costumbrism and the Mexicanist tradition in theme, space and type, as had been initiated by Lizardi and continued by Luis G. Inclán. It incorporated into one the contributions of nearly all Romantic European novelists.

Although the national novel preserved the sentimentalism of the Romantic spirit, it introduced a more restrained tone and presented marriage as a compensatory alliance for characters who worked for progress and social stability. The characters evolved even if they were predictable. They were created in pairs in binary opposition, for example the European character opposite the native or character of mixed race. Under the guiding hand of Altamirano the Mexican novel showed greater rigour in the design of its narrative structure and in the formation of its characters. There was a preoccupation with a sense of variety and proportion of tone and style. It is important to stress the independence of the national novel from European models and to note that it was a tradition that continued for more than forty years. The problem was that the transmission of reality resulted in a convention that was tied to the politics of Juárez and later Porfirio Díaz.

Mexican Realism involved a serious misrepresentation of reality, and perhaps for this reason contemporary criticism was united in questioning the use of the term “Realism.” The different generations of Realist novelists promoted the two phases of the project of Díaz’s regime. On the one hand they supported the programme of depoliticization (porfirismo 1876–88) through the repression or discrediting of revolts, as in La bola, 1887 [The Riot] and La guerra de tres años, 1891 [The Three-Year War] by Emilio Rabasa (1856–1930) and El Zarco, 1901 (El Zarco, the Bandit) by Altamirano. At the same time they presented government bureaucracy as a corrupt activity and thus an aspiration unworthy of the majority, as in La gran ciencia, 1887 [The Great Science] and Moneda falsa, 1888 [Counterfeit Money] by Rabasa. In the same manner the Realists promoted Porfirio Díaz’s programme by portraying social immobility as stability, political neutrality as Porfiriostyled peace and progress as an unquestionable absolute. This was the picture portrayed in the novels of José López Portillo y Rojas (1850–1923), Rafael Delgado (1853–1914) and Ángel de Campo (1868–1908).

The world was painted as a self-satisfied one. Authors selected certain aspects of a reality which had by then become a literary cliché and a stereotype. Although certain social and political blemishes were denounced, they were shown to be exceptions or individual cases which did not alter the upward direction of the system. The exploitation of those working on the plantations, the company stores and repressive authoritarianism were only denounced as vices in the case of feudal landowners, who were seen as antagonistic to the national project of modernity (capitalist land-owning), or such issues were set in periods long before Díaz’s government.

The Realist novelists considered mimesis to be of artistic merit, that is to say that they took as a starting point the assumption that reality was rational, ordered, unalterable and describable. They made gratuitous use of generalizations. They debased the social function of Altamirano’s novelistic tradition and the theory of European Realism, often converting this into an aesthetic diversion with a huge false impact. The fact that they narrated in the past tense reinforced their perspective of a stable world closed to change. The characters in their works were inconstant and static, and were psychologically at odds with themselves. Owing to the lack of any profound sense of irony, poetic subjectivity was not erased, and this resulted in a naive and childishly sentimental world.
Surprisingly, as the Realist short story was considered a minor genre, it was less subject to aesthetic and moral conventions, and more flexible regarding narrative technique. It thus allowed irony and in some cases, for example the short stories of López Portillo y Rojas compiled by Emmanuel Carballo in Cuentos completos, 1965 [Complete Short Stories], Vicente Riva Palacio in Los cuentos del general, 1896 [The General’s Stories] and Ángel de Campo in Apuntes y ocios, 1896 [Notes and Leisure], moral principles and social structures were rigorously questioned. The technique of the short story, whilst it had tinges of humour, became more flexible and more creative in its production of character and linguistic strategy.

It is difficult and unhelpful to draw a clear line between Mexican Realism and Naturalism, as both share aesthetic and ideological features, besides which both incorporate into their texts expressive formulas taken from Spanish American Modernism and even Romanticism. In Realism and Naturalism there were obvious Romantic features: a sentimental plot in which psychological tension and narrative interest were combined, and also characterization through physical, psychological, moral, ethnic, social and political contrasting. From Romanticism, they also took the rather simplistic technique of basing narrative conflict around contrasting categories of moral forces that were at odds with each other. They also made use of the tendency towards melodrama via exaggerated emotionality and the contrived theatricality of the story’s organization.

In Mexico, as in the rest of Spanish America, the Naturalists distanced themselves from the method of Zola’s Le Roman experimental, 1870 (The Experimental Novel), since they emphasized the artistic production of the material they had gathered and not the effectiveness of a purely scientific report. On the one hand they concealed symbols, allegories and other interpretations with spiritual significance, whilst at another level their descriptions were subject to apparent objective rigour.

The atmosphere was not favourable to Naturalism because Mexico lacked a sizeable middle class, as well as a major industry and metropolis. As Carballo has pointed out, Mexican Naturalism captured the new forms of the colonial period and perceived the beginning of underdevelopment. So it opened the way for other topics traditionally excluded from Realism, such as sexuality, anarchism and proletarianism, the issue of the dialectic of exploitation and poverty and with it other perspectives of strategies of authority and power. The protagonist of Pacotillas, 1900 [Shoddy Goods] by Porfirio Parra, because he is of mixed race and is middle class, represents the model of identity and the model of Porfirio Díaz’s official programme, which owing to the lack of opportunities and the repression of the dictatorship was linked with mental alienation and death. The (female) protagonist of Santa (1903) by Federico Gamboa is put forward consistently throughout the story as an allegory of the Mexican identity expelled from the countryside, who arrives in the city only to be prostituted by foreign companies. This was a clear allusion to the economic and political strategies of Porfirio Díaz. The Naturalist novel made the most fundamental and systematic criticism of the corruption of political principles, of laws, institutions and the procedures of Porfirio Díaz’s government. Surprisingly only Tomochic by Frías mentions Díaz as the cause of the nation’s ills, an accusation which cost Frías persecution and exile.

In some senses, the atypical nature of Mexican Naturalism was due to a reaction against the novelistic strategies of the form of Realism inspired by Altamirano. Gamboa, distancing himself from the Realist canon in Metamorfosis (1899) and Santa created great ideological ambiguity through a dyglossic discourse, composed of at least two narrative codes in tension. This confirmed another facet of the novelistic modernity of Mexican Naturalism.

Owing to the repression of Díaz’s dictatorship and the materialism of the national project, Modernism pointed to the self-awareness of the individual as a being who was socially alienated, spiritually oppressed and psychologically dislocated. The result was that modernist novels took the form of psychological or metaphysical exploration and their authors avoided placing them in an objective or realistic time and space. Modernism was the first convention to take an anti-canonical stance towards Realism, subverting its narrative conventions, and it thus caused the emergence of the following: the novella, the chronicle, the short story-essay, the short story-myth, the short story-aphorism, the suppression of action, decharacterization, the parody of the omniscient narrator, and as a final result the short Modernist novel which fused all the diverse experimental genres.

As a result of their scope and atypicality short modernist novels in Mexico were confused with the short story form. However, over twenty were published, among which the following deserve mention: ten novels by Amado Nervo (1870–1919), Querens (1891) by Pedro Castera (1838–1906), Nikko (1898), Hojas de bambú, 1910 [Bamboo Leaves], El enemigo, 1900 [The Enemy], Salamandra (1919) by Efrén Rebolledo (1877–1929); Claro-obscuro, 1894 [Light and Shade] by Ciro B.Ceballos (1873–1948), El espejo de amarilis, 1899 [Amyrillis’s Mirror] by Laura Méndez de Cuenca (1853–1928) and Un adulterio, 1903 [An Adultery] by Rubén M.Campos (1876–1945). To understand the aesthetics of the Modernist narrative it is essential to consider the outstanding volumes of short stories by Carlos Díaz Dufoo, Alberto Leduc (1867–1908), Dolores Bolio (1880–?), Laura Méndez de Cuenca and Bernardo Couto Castillo (1880–1901).

The narrators and poets of the Mexican Modernist movement made use of the same influences (already mentioned) which allowed a great imaginative freedom. This was enriched by a new reading of Eastern mythological, Nordic and GrecoLatin tales, which they then adapted to their fin-de-siècle sensibility. They transgressed all sense of reality by presenting a plot and resolution of an archetypal or fantastical nature. Irony, parody and humour linked to eroticism were other elements which transgressed the binary moral categories of Realism.

In Realism love was expressed within legal boundaries and social institutions, and in Naturalism it was presented as a deviation from the norm and a transgression of marriage. However, in Modernism love was exposed beneath all forms of eroticism as a perversion to any moral and legal principle, and it was given an aesthetic ontological dimension, and even a sacred value. Eroticism in the Modernist narrative was not only the fundamental theme but the most outstanding structural resource. It was the element which dissolved morals, reason, work, stability, evolution, identity and the national project. It questioned the certainty of reality, the nature and apprehension of time and space as well as the knowledge and control of human beings and their environment.

It can thus be said that the definitive feature of modernity in the Mexican novel of the 20th century was the creation and re-structuring of the novelistic world, free from the old necessity to faithfully reproduce reality. The creation of a strictly novelistic space in Modernism was achieved via fantasy, ambiguity, eroticism, a hostility to the epic manner, irony and an anti-narrative stance. All these features anticipated the experimentalism of avant-garde literature and subverted the ideology and narrative forms that had been persistently used throughout the 19th century.

MARIO MARTÍN
translated by Jo Glen

Further Reading

Alegría, Fernando, Historia de la novela hispanoamericana, 4th edition, Mexico City: Andrea, 1974

Brushwood, John S., Mexico in Its Novel: a Nation’s Search for Identity, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1966

Carballo, Emmanuel, Letras mexicanas del siglo XIX. Mexico City: Universidad de Guadalajara, 1991

Promis Ojeda, José, La novela experimental / La novela moderna, Santiago de Chile: Universidad Católica de Chile, 1968

Ramos, Julio, Desencuentros de la modernidad en América Latina, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989

Schneider, Luis Mario, Ruptura y continuidad: la literatura mexicana en polémica, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1975

20th-Century Prose and Poetry

Few Latin American countries can match the quality of presentday Mexican literary production; probably none could offer comparable diversity. If we look at the line-up of undisputed representative “complete writers,” that is, those who excel at both creative writing and critical reflection, with the exception of Borges, we can make the following observation. This role in the 20th century would seem to fall to the Mexicans: Alfonso Reyes, Octavio Paz, Carlos Fuentes and, at a later stage, possibly José Emilio Pacheco.
By contrast, Mexican literature has not attracted the same high level of criticism as the other major centers (e.g., Argentina and Brazil).

20th-century Mexican literature presents a rich canvas woven from the influences of, and responses to, social upheavals (such as the Revolution of 1910, the massive migration and emigration, the infamous Tlatelolco massacre of 1968, and the ongoing deep political and economic crisis of the country), international literary and cultural currents (the avantgarde movements, postmodern culture), and Mexico’s own plural, historical and cultural heritage, enriched subsequently by several waves of refugees seeking haven or new home (interwar and war immigration, especially after the Spanish Civil War, and Latin American diaspora from the Southern Cone in the 1970s). Mexico has also fascinated numerous firstclass foreign writers; The Plumed Serpent (1926) by D.H. Lawrence; Under the Volcano (1947) by Malcolm Lowry; or the works by the enigmatic B. Traven, to name just a few, all are part of Mexican heritage and have left their influence on Mexican literature.

The mask of orderly progress and successful modernization Mexico was displaying at the beginning of the century was shattered by the Revolution of 1910, and the country seemed to be falling prey, once again, to its violent demons. The young intellectuals grouped around the Ateneo de la Juventud (1909) were the first to sense that there was something rotten about Mexican “Modernity,” and they turned against its ageing bulwark, the philosophy of Positivism, the scientific warranty on which was expiring all over Europe at that time. The new, Neoromantic philosophies and literary currents (such as Symbolism or Vitalism) directed the attention towards the land, culture and metaphysics. Elsewhere in Latin America, the allegorical and visionary “Novel of the Land” was born out of this confluence; in Mexico, the mystique of the land was overwhelmed by history.

The young Mexicans turned to the many aspects of their culture and history dormant under the “modern varnish,” and became the first contemporary thinkers of mexicanidad and educators of post-revolutionary Mexico. Under José Vasconcelos as Minister of Education in the early 1920s, mass education and national values in arts, geared to the Mexican history of mestizaje, flourished. Alfonso Reyes evoked old Mexico in exquisite prose in his “Vision de Anáhuac,” 1915 [Vision of Anáhuac], which later became a kind of poetic “script” for some murals of Diego Rivera. But Reyes was an accomplished man of letters, a career diplomat; his literary tastes were refined and cosmopolitan; after he returned to his country permanently in the late 1930s, he set international standards for higher education, founding the Colegio de Mexico in 1940 with the help of Spanish intellectuals who found refuge in Mexico. In poetry, Ramón López Velarde evoked the traditional slow-paced everyday life of the provinces, and, in his poem “El retorno maléfico,” 1919 [Evil Return], expressed “an intimate reactionary sadness” over the destruction caused by the Revolution. López Velarde is renowned for his precise use of colloquial language which opened up a new universe for Mexican poetry; Salvador Novo (1904–74), Efraín Huerta (1914–82), Jaime Sabines (b. 1926), and José Emilio Pacheco (b. 1939) after 1968, among others, would continue to explore this path.

The Revolution of 1910 left its indelible mark on Mexican narrative which has lasted up to present. Mariano Azuela (1873–1952) produced not only the most highly acclaimed work of the first cycle (up to the mid-1940s) of the “Novel of the Revolution,” Los de abajo, 1915 (The Underdogs), but chronicled assiduously the unfolding Mexican post-revolutionary human tragicomedy. (In the second cycle, this role, at times enlarged to include all Latin America and the Hispanic world, would be assumed by Carlos Fuentes). In spite of the circumstances of its first appearance, i.e., being written in midst of the war and published as a serial in a newspaper in El Paso, Texas, Los de abajo is a narrative carefully planned and masterfully executed with attention to the smallest detail. Naturalistic symbolism; mythical closure; a narrative line cut to the bone and yet amazingly polymorphous; a discourse that combines lyricism, rough language and satire, all contribute to the continued vitality of this novel. The effaced narrator lets his characters engage, among themselves and sometimes including the landscape, in a truly polyphonic dialogue. This continually rejuvenating text also strikes one by being completely saturated with Mexican popular culture; many passages read like echoes of popular and revolutionary corridos; the ever-present elements of colloquial language aim beyond any simple naturalistic imitation and introduce a popular worldview, metaphors, the picaresque, folk wisdom and values. Through the dense and multifarious use of these elements, Los de abajo seems to anticipate the forms of postmodern writing which explored Latin American popular cultures in the guise of the novela del lenguaje (language novel) from the 1960s to the 1980s.

Several other works from this cycle stand out from the rubble; some of them have been called “novels” by default. The hybrid eye-witness narratives assembled by Martin Luis Guzmán in El águila y la serpiente, 1928 (The Eagle and the Serpent); some of Nellie Campobello’s short stories from Cartucho; relatos de la lucha en el norte de México, 1931, showing the utter absurdity of revolutionary violence as seen from a young girl’s point of view; some powerful pages of José Vasconcelos’s memoirs, started in 1935 with the first instalment of his Ulises criollo (abridged as A Mexican Ulysses); and José Rubén Romero’s (1890–1952) vintage picaresque novel La vida inútil de Pito Pérez, 1938 (The Futile Life of Pito Pérez).

In the second cycle, the novels of the Revolution become more conscious of their literary status, more experimental as narratives and more ambitious as symbolic structures, although especially in the feminist testimonial texts fiction and experiment may be softened for the powerful revisionist values their works bring along. It might be worthwhile noting that some dramatic texts by the avant-garde playwright Rodolfo Usigli (1905–79), such as Corona de sombra; pieza antihistórica en tres actos, 1943 (Crown of Shadows), have anticipated, and perhaps stimulated, this coming complexity in the novel, and specifically foreshadowed some early postmodern writing of Carlos Fuentes (b. 1928), such as his outstanding novella Aura, 1962, or the later “historical novel” Noticias del imperio, 1987 [News of the Empire], by Fernando del Paso.

The second cycle opens with a powerful indictment of gloomy prerevolutionary provincial life: in Agustín Yáñez’s Al filo del agua, 1947 (The Edge of the Storm) the Revolution bursts in at the very end of the novel as a promise of change. It is implied that bright prospects lie ahead. By contrast, other novels of this cycle concentrate on the turbulent period following the outbreak of the Revolution and after. Not much happiness is to be found in Pedro Páramo, 1955, by Juan Rulfo; his slim novel actually includes important elements of sly parody of Al filo del agua as well as of El laberinto de la soledad, 1950 (The Labyrinth of Solitude), by the poet and essayist Octavio Paz, which exerted so powerful an influence on the Mexican novel and subsequent thinking about Mexico. Paz’s presence is felt strongly in the early narrative of Carlos Fuentes, especially in his masterpiece novel La muerte de Artemio Cruz, 1962 (The Death of Artemio Cruz). Los recuerdos del porvenir, 1963 (Recollections of Things to Come), by Elena Garro, anticipates the free mingling of imagination and the fantastic with reality which will characterize the magical realism (realismo mágico) of Gabriel García Márquez and, later, of Isabel Allende. The panoply of female women characters in this novel also foreshadows later feminist revisionist narrative. In a playful fictional key, Jorge Ibargüengoitia satirizes mercilessly the unsettled post-revolutionary period in his biting and hilarious novel Los relámpagos de agosto, 1964 (The Lightning of August).

Ibargüengoitia’s joyfully irreverent attitude towards the Revolution opened the doors for the testimonial novels written by Mexican women writers such as Elena Poniatowska, in Hasta no verte, Jesús mío, 1969 (Until We Meet Again); and Ángeles Mastretta (b. 1949), in Arráncame la vida, 1985 (Mexican Bolero). Both novels feature strong women as their protagonists, thus questioning the stereotypes of traditional Mexican woman as outlined in El laberinto de la soledad. They are also incisive as a radical revisionist history of the Revolution from the feminist/feminine perspective. Mastretta’s fictionalized roman-à-clef, based in great part on oral testimonies, dares to unravel the mystique of the times of the “untouchable” Lázaro Cárdenas. The clever recipe book and family saga Como agua para chocolate, 1989 (Like Water for Chocolate), written by Laura Esquivel, is only the latest (re)version of the “Novel of the Revolution;” it combines the new feminist self-assured writing with the spice of Allende’s magical realism in a sagacious and salacious postmodern cooking. In the same way that avant-garde art obliged its readers to relearn to read and focus on the mise-en-abîme of endlessly proliferating, dense autotelic symbolic structures, intertextual spiderwebs, and metaliterary obstructs (Roland Barthes called this aseptic cabbalistic encounter with the text “bliss”), postmodern writing redisCOVERs some “simple pleasures” of reading which are, of course, anything but simple.

The avant-garde winds of change blew to Mexico first from the East. The traveler through the Orient José Juan Tablada toyed with the conciseness and imagist metaphoricity of the Japanese haiku, and he explored the ideographic, visual poetic space in Li-Po y otros poemas, 1920 [Li-Po and Other Poems]. However, not unlike Apollinaire’s earlier Calligrammes (1918), the somewhat adolescent art of painting objects with words and typography, the combining of words and images into visual structures, and the even more complex exploration of textual spatial dimensions, all coexist in Li-Po with still traditional poetic motifs and wordwork. For example, Tablada’s New York partakes of a different century from that of the Peruvian Carlos Oquendo de Amat or Federico García Lorca. Tablada’s poetry, at least on the surface, and his commentary on the visual arts both float freely with the artistic currents of the first half of the 20th century.

The first true, though ephemeral, avant-garde school, the estridentista (strident) movement, sputtered in the maritime province of Veracruz between 1921 and 1927. At that time, the ports were still the neuralgic points of the countries, being the places of first encounter and exchange of information. Yet one wonders whether the donkeys lazing in the streets of sleepy Xalapa, rather than being dutifully épatés, were not getting hiccups from all that futurist, Bolshevik-proletarian vertigo that was descending upon them. The founder of the movement, Manuel Maples Arce (1898–1963), wrote a vociferous visionary poem “Urbe; super-poema bolchevique en 5 cantos,” 1924 [City; Bolshevik Super-Poem in 5 Cantos], where naive politics is further drowned in ultraísta metaphors. The estridentistas are best remembered in Mexican literary folklore for the one-liner that ends their Manifesto of 1923, ¡Viva el Mole de Guajolote!, raising the favorite Mexican national dish of turkey with chili sauce as their banner.

In the meantime, the more serious members of the avantgarde generation gathered strength around literary journals such as La Falange, 1922–23 [The Phalanx], and Ulises, 1927–28 [Ulysses]. From the very beginning, they resisted the nationalistic “turn” imposed on Mexican culture by the Revolution and, instead of celebrating mestizaje, strove to express “the Latin soul of America” as opposed to the rival “winter civilization” of the North. (It is surprising then that their journals turned out to be the main conduits to Latin America for translations of contemporary North-American poetry.) The major achievement of this group was the journal Contemporáneos, 1928–31 [Contemporaries], which then gave the name to the whole generation.

The poets and critics around Contemporáneos were a loose grouping of heterogeneous voices, including Bernardo Ortiz de Montellano (1899–1949), the editor; José Gorostiza (1901–79); Jaime Torres Bodet (1902–74); Xavier Villaurrutia (1903–50); Salvador Novo; and Gilberto Owen (1905–52). Carlos Pellicer (1899–1977), who was after Torres Bodet the secretary to Vasconcelos, is also peripherally included among the Contemporáneos. In their activities, the “contemporaries” put on display their exclusive concentration on literature and avoided politics as ostentatiously. Some were career diplomats or held important government posts. It was enough of a scandal that a number of their inner group were more or less openly homosexual. Not surprisingly, Gide and Proust were their heroes, and theater benefited from their interests. Homoeroticism among the Contemporáneos group was vocally denounced, for example, by Maples Arce, who seems to be one of the first specimens of Latin American “machismo-leninismo.”

The “contemporaries” did for poetry (and for theater) what the second cycle did for the novel. Literature acquired in them autotelic status and their aim was the highest quality of production possible. Their literary aesthetics followed rather the conservative, intellectual strand of the avant-garde, i.e., the line of symbolism evolving into so-called “pure poetry,” under the influence of Paul Valéry and Juan Ramón Jiménez. Therefore, the group had little time for Dadaism or for Surrealism; only much later did Villaurrutia show some affinity with the latter, perhaps under the influence of his intimate friend, the Peruvian Surrealist César Moro who lived in Mexico during the war years. This horizon of aesthetic interests then limited the scope of contemporary literature disseminated by the journal; yet within its own terms of reference, Contemporáneos was a first-class achievement. Among the “contemporaries,” the intellectual purification of poetry was taken to its limit by Gorostiza in his hermetic Muerte sin fin, 1939 (Death without End), which is a 20th-century version of Sor Juana’s philosophical poem Primero sueño, 1692. (Sor Juana’s Dream). Death was also high on the mind of Villaurrutia in his famous nocturnos (nocturnes). By contrast, Pellicer celebrated the sunny “tropics” with “hands full of color.”

The poets of the next generation rallied around the journal Taller [Workshop], 1938–41. As if programmatically, Taller concentrated on Mexican literature; yet it also showed a certain continuity by including the Contemporáneos. The initial literary aesthetics of the group was also somewhat ambiguous: they felt attraction to “pure art,” yet expressed a willingness to subordinate art to broader social goals. It is no surprise then that the two generations mingled later in El hijo pródigo, 1943–46 [The Prodigal Son]. Among the talleristas, Efraín Huerta came closest to emphasizing exclusively the political dimension; later in his career he was recognized for his playful satirical, humorous, erotic, and otherwise pungent poemínimos (minipoems). The major poet to emerge from the Taller group was Octavio Paz who, in 1990, became the first Mexican Nobel prizewinner for literature. Paz formulated the disjuncture faced by the artist in his “Ética del artista” [Ethics of the Artist] as early as 1931, which was his first printed essay and the first manifesto of his creed, and he has tried to reconcile the opposites ever since. The very fruitfulness of his poetry and critical commentary consisted in the fact that he never abandoned completely one stance for the other, and both were continually being reborn in him within new intellectual and social contexts. “Ética,” surprisingly, contained already the seeds of Paz’s romantic revolt against Modernity.

The Spanish Civil War seemed to push Paz up the slope of political action and poetry. Yet his stay in Spain in 1937 was not without reverses; forty years later he finally raised the veil on some of his experiences in the notes to “Elegía a un compañero muerto en el frente de Aragón,” 1937 [Elegy for a Comrade Killed at the Aragonese Front], in Poemas, 1979. (Elena Garro, who was his wife at that time, is much more outspoken in her Memorias de España 1937, 1992, [Memories of Spain]). During the war years and shortly thereafter, Paz underwent the first metamorphosis: the contact with the US and his diplomatic travels all over the world drew him to intercultural problems; and the close friendship with the French Surrealists after the war made him a participant in the larger agenda of one of the most “postmodern” among the avant-garde movements. Towards the end of the 1940s, a stream of brilliant works started to pour out: his selected poems Libertad bajo palabra, 1949 [Freedom on Parole, partial translation in Early Poems, 1935–1955], early postmodern reflection on the Mexican soul, history, and culture in El laberinto de la soledad, 1950; parasurrealistic poems in prose, ¿Aguila o sol?, 1951 (Eagle or Sun?); philosophy of modern (his) poetry, El arco y la lira, 1956 (The Bow and the Lyre); and the poetic summation of that period in Piedra de sol, 1957 (Sun Stone).

The savagery of Tlatelolco brought Paz back to earth and to his Mexico in crisis. His immediate reaction to the massacre and his public rebuke of the Government turned him into the conscience of the Mexican intelligentsia. The Posdata to El laberinto, 1970 (The Other Mexico), started the process of his intellectual and physical return, and the literary and political journals, Plural, 1971–76, and Vuelta [Return], 1976 to the present, marked the road. Yet Paz’s postmodern vision and politics came too early to his country, torn among minuscule Utopian factions (fictions), a dreadful social reality, and the pragmatics of slick corruption. History must have seemed like a better bet, and Paz’s audacious postmodern re-reading of an end of an epoch emerges in Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz o Las trampas de la fe, 1982. (Sor Juana, or The Traps of Faith). Love was the first and is also the last refuge of the poet; in 1993, his meditation on love in modern Western culture, La doble llama (The Double Flame), appeared in print.

It took more time for the narrators of Paz’s generation to reach maturity. Together with Paz, Juan Rulfo, Juan José Arreola (b. 1918), and José Revueltas (1914–76) could be considered the founders of contemporary Mexican literature. Rulfo expressed his stark vision of the Mexican countryside in and after the Revolution at the beginning of the 1950s. His fame is based on just two slim volumes: the short stories El llano en llamas, 1953 (The Burning Plain and Other Stories), and the novel Pedro Páramo (1955). Rulfo’s work offers a deceptive façade of apparent simplicity; but behind his rustic, taciturn characters and their halting speech lies an accomplished master of modern narrative techniques; and behind the apparent realism lurks parody, satire, the grotesque and the absurd. Pedro Páramo stretches this line to the limit and achieves almost surrealistic qualities. Yet the array of experimental techniques in Rulfo’s work is never an end in itself, but only a means to achieve a merciless exploration of recent Mexican history and traditional cultural values. From this perspective, Pedro Páramo can be seen as an oniric appendix to, and sly rebuttal of, Paz’s famous El laberinto de la soledad.

Arreola became famous for his parodistic, absurdist, and Kafkaesque short fictions, collected in various versions of his Confabulario, 1952 (Confabulario and Other Inventions). Later Arreola’s short pieces got even shorter, in his whimsical minifictions, aphorisms, sharp quotes, and “cute” observations (following the lead of Ramón Gómez de la Serna’s greguerías). Arreola’s trademark was his prodigious verbal mastery and economy; through his literary workshops he was teacher to a whole generation of younger Mexican writers. By contrast, Revueltas was a radical political activist by nature, carrying “revolt” in his very name. Yet he seemed to always come either too early or too late. One generation earlier, his idiosyncratic Marxism could have been celebrated like that of the Peruvian José Carlos Mariátegui; but by the 1940s the expectations had changed. Los días terrenales, 1949 [Earthly Days], earned Revueltas the ire of the Stalinists, because the novel dared to question what would later be called, and officially criticized by the same Stalinists, as “sectarian attitudes.” After a severe dressing down by his comrades in which the then “faithful” Pablo Neruda also participated with insults typical of the times, Revueltas recanted, but later he turned into an acerbic critic of the Mexican Communist Party. Revueltas had a hard time fitting into the minuscule leftist splinter groups so typical in Latin America, warring more among themselves rather than with their “class” enemy. (Vargas Llosa captured a personal version of this atmosphere in his partly autobiographic Historia de Mayta, 1984 [The Real Life of Alejandro Mayta].) Finally in 1968 the opportunity seemed to knock on Revueltas’s door as he became involved in the Mexican students’ unorthodox rebellion; yet even he proved able to lead them only to Tlatelolco. Today it is almost painful to read his own utopian “organizational charts” for the “revolution” which neither the country nor the student body were ready to follow; if those organigramas were not soaked in young blood, they would look just like any other pages of fantastic literature. The posthumous collection of these materials, titled Mexico 68: juventud y revolución, 1978 [Mexico 68: Youth and Revolution], furnishes an important dimension otherwise missing in Elena Poniatowska’s La noche de Tlatelolco, 1971 (Massacre in Mexico), focusing on the human tragedy of those who went one step too far. While in prison for his role in the student movement, Revueltas wrote what is undoubtedly his literary masterpiece, the novella El apando, 1969 [Solitary Confinement], a powerful naturalistic and visionary parable of socialized brutality and human degradation. El apando reads like a distant echo of “El matadero” (The Slaughter House) by the Argentine Esteban Echeverría. What appeared as a hideous exceptional situation is espoused in Revueltas’s work as normal daily reality. In this sense, El apando was also a prophecy of what was to come to Latin America in the following decades.

Unmistakable seeds of diversification appeared in the next generation, especially through the strength of women’s writing. Yet the overshadowing figure was, and is, Carlos Fuentes. Fuentes consolidated the modernization of Mexican and Latin American narrative. In his own version of magical realism, Fuentes magnified Paz’s insight of the massive survival of “old Mexico” under modern varnish by his own infusion of myth and ritual (e.g., the themes of cyclical return and the double), obliging the reader to follow simultaneously different strands of meaning, not readily reducible one to another. The emerging polymorphous vision of reality was channeled, in the first cycle of his great narratives, by the ideal of the “totalizing novel”: La region más transparente, 1958 (Where the Air is Clear), uncovers modern Mexico City and its many subcultures; La muerte de Artemio Cruz, 1961 (The Death of Artemio Cruz), revisits the period from the Revolution to the present; Terra Nostra, 1975, plays with the whole of Hispanic culture, from the discovery of the New World to the apocalyptic end of Western civilization. Yet, at the same time, Fuentes writes early postmodern short fiction, such as the capriccio on themes from Mexican history and the history of modern witchcraft, Aura. This latter strand is then further explored both in his shorter and longer fiction: Zona sagrada (Holy Place) and Cambio de piel (A Change of Skin), both from 1967, Cumpleaños, 1969 [Birthday], and Una familia lejana, 1980 (Distant Relations). In Mexico, only Fernando del Paso dared to take up the challenge of the “totalizing novel,” but without any overwhelming success. Fuentes managed to make a smooth transition to postBoom writing, and his spy thriller La cabeza de la hidra, 1978 (The Hydra Head); and the string of novels as diverse as Gringo viejo, 1985 (The Old Gringo), Cristóbal nonato, 1987 (Christopher Unborn) and La campaña, 1990 (The Campaign), have further enriched his grand cycles of present-day Mexican and Latin American “human comedy.” Paradoxically, Cristóbal nonato is a fully postmodern narrative which, however, poke fun at and takes to task some early postmodern cultural trends.

A group of writers took the modernization of narrative a step further towards the exploration of narrative and language structures as self-sufficient artefacts. Similar to the French nouveau roman, some literature useful for writers and critics was produced. In Mexico, the trend was anticipated by Josefina Vicens (1911–88), who, according to experts, wrote the best novel about nothing in El libro vacío, 1958 (The Empty Book). For sure, Vicens still reads like Dostoyevsky in comparison with, for example, Salvador Elizondo (b. 1932), who has achieved a certain fame by taxing his readers’ endurance to the limit in a series of hermetic grafógrafos (graphographmanias). Yet even Elizondo was returned to life through the magnificent theatrical (per)version of his postmodern political divertimento Miscast, 1981. Juan Vicente Melo (b. 1932) has also shown a “nocturnal obedience” to this type of literature. Juan Garcia Ponce (b. 1932) early on and Sergio Pitol (b. 1933) more recently were able to find their way out of a literature turned upon and against itself. Hugo Hiriart (b. 1942) put this vogue of literary préciosité on its head and wrote a hilarious pastiche of chivalresque novel and other lost Utopias in Galaor, 1972 [Galahad].

Vicente Leñero (b. 1933) straddles the line between the experimental novel and theater and documentary literature and political commentary. The novelist and playwright Jorge Ibargüengoitia stands apart in this panorama, because he used rather traditional means, though ones which until recently were almost absent from Latin American writing, such as humor, parody, and satire (aggravated by sarcasm). Political and cultural commentary in Mexico also profited from the “new journalism,” represented by Elena Poniatowska and Carlos Monsiváis (b. 1938). The crónica (sketch) became one of the most versatile and ubiquitous genres in present-day Mexican literature and journalism: Cristina Pacheco (b. 1941) explored popular classes and their traditional values; Guadalupe Loaeza dissected the reinas (queens) from the swanky Polanco neighborhood; Juan Villoro (b. 1956) chronicled the sentimental journey of the post-Tlatelolco generation; and in his Ucronías, 1990 [Uchronies], Oscar de la Borbolla (b. 1953) added a crisp fictional “turn” to this literary-journalistic “reporting.”

Marco Antonio Montes de Oca (b. 1932) and Jaime Sabines illustrate the two competing currents in contemporary Mexican poetry: the experimental line echoing Octavio Paz and the down-to-earth line of colloquial poetry. Sabines is a poet who when stumbling on a stone, does not hesitate to protest against the pinche piedra; his modern elegy on the death of his father strikes a powerful chord with the distant voice of Jorge Manrique. In the later members of this generation, their “rebellious spike” (La espiga amotinada, 1960) seems to have rather pinched the wheels of their poetic Volkswagen.

The novelist, poet, and essayist Rosario Castellanos (1925–74) came to be considered the founding figure for contemporary Mexican women’s writing. In her consciously feminist work, cut short by her early death, she discussed topics placed later in the center of feminist discourse, such as women and language or cultural difference. Castellanos was also exemplary in transcending middle-class feminism and reaching out, through the narrative, towards the underprivileged indigenous people in Chiapas where she grew up as a child. Her experimental text in dramatic form, El eterno femenino, 1975 [The Eternal Woman] is a kind of encyclopedia of feminist topics in traditional Mexican culture and history. Elena Poniatowska, the most recognized woman writer in Mexico today, negotiates the line between journalism and fiction; her fiction proves that she is an accomplished storyteller, and this shows even in the string of her great testimonial and documentary narratives for which she has been especially praised, from Hasta no verte, Jesús mío, 1969 (Until We Meet Again), through La noche de Tlatelolco, 1971 (Massacre in Mexico) to Tinísima, 1992, [Tina Modotti]. The sly masterpiece novella Querido Diego, te abraza Quiela, 1978 (Dear Diego), is a homage to and a demythification of the “fabulous life” of Diego Rivera, chipping away at the macho image of one of the best known Mexican artists of the 20th century.

With Garro, Castellanos, Poniatowska, Mastretta, Esquivel, and a host of others, women’s writing in Mexico comes to the fore. The group of first-generation Mexican Jewish women writers has been very active. Coming from different parts of the world, they have focused on their double heritage and sometimes conflictive identity. Esther Seligson (b. 1941) delved into timeless Jewish history in her pastiche of biblical narrative La morada en el tiempo, 1981 [The Abode in Time], and she revisited Penelope’s story in her outstanding novella Sed de mar, 1987 [Thirst of the Sea]. Following the international success of Alex Haley’s Roots, 1976, Margo Glantz inaugurated this genre in Mexico with the documentary chronicle of her family Las genealogias, 1981 (The Family Tree: an Illustrated Novel); originally the work was published as an essay but the novelistic element hidden in it won. The feminist playwright Sabina Berman (b. 1953) evokes her childhood in the novella La bobe, 1990 [Grandma]; she also wrote openly lesbian poetry in Lunas, 1988 [Moons]. Angelina Muñiz-Huberman (b. 1936) recalls the experience of the Republican children taken to the Soviet Union and her first years in Mexico in Dulcinea encantada, 1992, [Enchanted Dulcinea]. Rosa Nissán recreated, from a child’s point of view, the world of the Lagunilla market and of the conflictive interculturality in her sparkling Novia que te vea, 1992, [Bride that Could See You]. Myriam Moscona (b. 1955) took up her Sephardic origin in her poetry.

The genre of documentary family saga spread among non-Jewish women writers. Silvia Molina (b. 1946) published La familia vino del norte, 1987 [The Family Came from the North]; earlier she was recognized for her autobiographical novel-diary Mañana debe seguir gris, 1977 (Gray Skies Tomorrow), dealing with her love affair with the ill-fated poet José Carlos Becerra (1937–70). Poniatowska recalled her coming to Mexico in La “Flor de Lis,” 1988 [The “Flor de Lis”]. Barbara Jacobs (b. 1947), sometimes appended to the Jewish writers for her Middle-Eastern origin, evoked her father in Hojas muertas, 1988 (The Dead Leaves). Yet Mexican women’s writing cannot be tied to any such specific themes. Maria Luisa Puga (b. 1944) used her travels in Africa for the novel Las posibilidades del odio, 1978 [The Possibilities of Hatred]. Martha Cerda (b. 1948), from Guadalajara, put all the worlds of Mrs Rodriguez into her proverbial bag, in La señora Rodríguez y otros mundos, 1990 [Mrs Rodriguez and Other Worlds]. The versatile playwright, poet, and novelist Carmen Boullosa (b. 1954) based her dense novelas Mejor desaparece, 1987 [Better Get Out of Sight], and Antes, 1989 [Before], on autobiographical elements; in 1993 she surprised readers with a masterpiece multigenre pastiche La milagrosa (The Miracle-Worker), uncannily prophetic about the bloody 1994 presidential campaign.

In the 1960s, while still “modernizing” along the lines of 19th-century industrialization, Mexico was hit by the early forms of emerging postmodern culture. The mass of middleclass teenagers, themselves a product of Mexico’s “progress” and urbanization, adopted international pop and countercultural toys for their newborn leisure culture; la Onda (the new wave) spread on these wavelengths like a brushfire. Various generational gaps appeared. The parents were appalled by the new sexual freedom, drugs and rock music. The older “progressive” intellectuals charged that songs in English and teenage game-playing in “Spanglish” implied a sellout to US imperialism; the Government shrank at the very idea of freedom. The young split between those who, although dressed like hippies, continued to pursue contemporary high culture and those who set out to explore the new cultural space and forms. Tlatelolco would dampen the joyful iconoclasm of Mexican youth and bring these two groups closer together. Yet the literary side of la Onda, was not any direct equivalent of the social phenomenon of that name; it was a sophisticated writing, saturated by the literary self-consciousness of the Boom aesthetics and by the experiments with the novela del lenguaje (“language novel,” inaugurated by the Argentine Julio Cortázar’s Rayuela, 1963). That is why such prime Onda writers as Gustavo Sainz (b. 1940) and José Agustín (b. 1944) could (plausibly) deny their belonging to that movement; both outgrew their work of the 1960s, but it was difficult for them to retain their original freshness. Only much later some populist authors resorted to surfing, with neo-naturalistic dedication, the low- and underclass language. La Onda as a social phenomenon survived Tlatelolco and culminated in the rock festival of Avándaro, 1971 (the Mexican equivalent of Woodstock), after which a clampdown on countercultural phenomena followed. In an experimental collaborative “script for a cinematic rock opera,” Ahí viene la plaga, 1985 [The Plague is Coming; title of the Mexican translation of one of Elvis Presley’s songs], José Agustín, José Buil and Gerardo Pardo take stock of that roller-coaster period. Whatever its limitations and contradictions might be, la Onda helped to shatter the grip of the elite establishment over cultural production.

José Emilio Pacheco and Homero Aridjis (b. 1940), both poets and novelists, illustrate some alternatives to the Onda literature. Pacheco wrote a highly experimental, yet also highly charged, novel juxtaposing crucial events of Jewish diaspora and persecution, Morirás lejos, 1967 [You Will Die Far Away]. Tlatelolco inspired in him some powerful palimpsests over the voices of the vanquished from the conquest and from Poniatowska’s testimony. His masterpiece novella, or prose poem, Las batallas en el desierto, 1981 (Battles in the Desert and Other Stories), which fictionalizes his own sentimental education and evokes a neighborhood and times now buried by the earthquake of 1985 and by history. It disproves the claims that postmodern writing is all surface, without historical dimension and social critique; all that is missing in Las batallas is an overarching allegory, didactic purpose, and totalizing (totalitarian?) ideology. Aridjis turned to the historical novel in 1942; Vida y tiempos de Juan Cabezón de Castilla, 1985 (1942; The Life and Times of Juan Cabezón of Castile), and he pursued ecological activities and topics which in Mexico lead to apocalyptic vision, as in El último Adán, 1985 [The Last Adam], and La leyenda de los soles, 1993 [The Legend of the Suns]; the latter blends myth, ecological and human wasteland, political satire, lyricism and the fantastic into a prophetic postmodern end-game.

Other writers of this generation have already well-established records. In the north, the novelists Jesús Gardea (b. 1939), Gerardo Cornejo (b. 1937), Ricardo Elizondo (b. 1950), or Daniel Sada (b. 1953). From Xalapa, Luis Arturo Ramos (b. 1947). In the center, René Avilés Fabila (b. 1940), Agustín Monsreal (b. 1941), Joaquín-Armando Chacón (b. 1944), Héctor Manjarrez (b. 1945), Humberto Guzmán (b. 1948), Marco Antonio Campos (b. 1949), Luis Zapata (b. 1951), Fabio Morábîto (b. 1955). In and out of the center, Federico Campbell (b. 1945), Hernán Lara Zavala (b. 1946), Carlos Montemayor (b. 1947). And let us not forget the “incurable” poet David Huerta (b. 1949).

Since the 1970s no predominant mode of writing has been established; Mexican writers have ceased to feel bound to the “Mexican” reality only; anything can be attempted, provided that high quality literature outcome is achieved. The result has been an enormous diversification. If Octavio Paz’s selective Poesía en movimiento [Poetry in Movement], 1966, expressed the tenor of the 1960s, Gabriel Zaid’s “busload of Mexican poetry” (Omnibus de poesía mexicana, 1971), is typical of the more inclusive postmodern tastes. At the end of the century, Mexican literature offers signs of robust health. Scores of new talented writers have appeared. Literature is now free to discover and rediscover new realities; a strong current of women’s writing has especially contributed to this. An explosion of regional literature has also changed the literary landscape: we are witnessing the revival of traditional centers (Guadalajara, Xalapa); emergence of northern borderlands and beyond (the US Southwest and Chicano culture), all with a production informed by contemporary models. Mexico City itself has turned into a hub of “satellite” subcultures. An array of minority cultures has emerged: indigenous cultures (as yet less noticeable in nationally visible cultural production); a strong group of writers focusing on their Jewish heritage; and a space opening up for gay/lesbian writers. This enormous diversity of elements coming in all possible combinations has produced a vibrant culture that no crisis could quell.

EMIL VOLEK

Further Reading

Bigas Torres, Sylvia, La narrativa indigenista mexicana del siglo XX, Guadalajara: Universidad de Guadalajara, 1990

Fernández, Jesse and Norma Klahn (editors), Lugar de encuentro: ensayos críticos sobre poesía mexicana actual, Mexico City: Katún, 1987

Forster, Merlin H. and Julio Ortega (editors), De la crónica a la nueva narrativa mexicana: coloquio sobre literatura mexicana, Mexico City: Oasis, 1986

Gibbons, Reginald (editor), New Writing from Mexico, Evanston, Illinois: Northwestern University, 1992

——(editor), Literatura mexicana hoy, II: Los de fin de siglo, Frankfurt: Vervuert Verlag, 1993

——El estridentismo: Mexico, 1921–1927, Mexico City: UNAM, 1985

Anthologies

Domínguez Michael, Christopher (editor), Antología de la narrativa mexicana del siglo XX, 2 vols, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989–91

Bibliographies
Gabriela Mistral 1889–1957

Chilean poet

Gabriela Mistral was the pseudonym of Lucila Godoy Alcayaga, born in 1889 and raised in an isolated mountain valley of Chile’s semi-arid north. Although the celebration of her public figure and her wanderings as a diplomat presented her with ample opportunity to mingle with wealthy socialites and the cultural elite, Mistral never hesitated to identify herself as a mestiza of Basque, Indian and possibly Jewish antecedents, whose family belonged to “la clase media baja campesina que lindaba con la tierra” (the rural lower-middle class, close to the land). These identifications persist throughout her writings and underlie her lifelong concern with peace, education, the rights of children, the struggle for social justice on behalf of the dispossessed and respect for the land. Her poetry dwells on suffering and loss while finding reason for hope in individual and communal experience of ordinary life, and in nostalgia for the remote past.

Melancholy poetry and socially-conscious prose were Mistral’s trademarks from her earliest publications in local newspapers, while she was an adolescent. Her refusal to tone down her publications in response to criticism led local authorities to bar her from entering secondary school. At the age of sixteen she began to support herself and her mother by working as a teacher’s aide in a rural school. Her frequent moves from one school to another in Chile exposed her to the complex and volatile social situation. The first of Chile’s major poets to come from outside a small, Europe-oriented elite, Mistral’s meteoric advancement as a teacher and educator in the state-run schools of Chile was owed to her extensive publications, which were directed at a diverse audience of schoolteachers, administrators, children and fellow poets. Despite her lack of a professional degree, in 1921 Mistral was placed in charge of Chile’s most prestigious secondary school for girls. Such successes in a woman from an obscure background earned her more than a few enemies. Never one to forget the ill-will of others, by 1926 she resolved to leave Chile, subsequently returning for only two brief visits, in 1938 and 1954. Her disinclination to settle in any one place and her fascination with seeing new landscapes worked in her favor. Supporting herself through journalism and lecture tours she became known, in Fernando Alegría’s phrase, as “a walking educational mission.”

In late adolescence and young adulthood Mistral claimed the Colombian Vargas Vila and the Nicaraguan Rubén Darío as her models. Only the influence of the latter persisted, in her attention to metrical form and her celebration of poetry as “song.” Although she initiated epistolary contact with Darío (as she did with most of the leading Latin American writers of her time), intellectually and temperamentally Mistral was from her early twenties a loner who preferred to reside outside of any particular literary or political group. Her political and artistic independence, coupled with the mindless exaltation of her as a symbolic mother for schoolchildren, has tended to dissuade most attempts to relate her work to any larger frameworks in Latin American cultural production. Among her various accomplishments, she was with José Martí one of the originators of children’s literature in Latin America. Partly as an extension of her work with the League for Intellectual Cooperation, she was deeply familiar with European and American folklore. Her “Sonetos de la muerte,” dating from about 1914, have been favorably compared to the verses of Quevedo. She singlehandedly invented, first in verse, then in prose, the “Recado” [Message] as a popular form for conveying the qualities of an impromptu oral presentation in compact, vivid prose. Other demonstrable influences on her poetry are the aboriginal traditions of the Americas, the tragedies of Aeschylus, the biblical Psalms, and the verses of Dante. She read very widely in history, devotional literature from East and West, and philosophy. In her journalism she was particularly interested in biography, novels and travel writing.

A substantial portion of the published poetry of Mistral, from her earliest poems published in teachers’ magazines and the theosophist journals, to her posthumously-published Poema de Chile, aimed to remedy the scarcity of interesting and instructive reading material available for use in the schools. It is virtually impossible to generalize about her school-based work except to point out that while some of it is occasional verse, other items are complex attempts to render philosophical ideas in the form of songs. From the 1930s onward, that school-based or didactic work increasingly concentrates on exploring the natural history of the Americas.

Mistral postponed until 1922, the publication of her first book-length collection of verse, Desolación [Desolation]. Scarpa explains the postponement as a result of the poet’s sensivity to criticism, her vulnerability as a woman and as a schoolteacher, and her very high standards with respect to her work: less than a fifth of the poetry that Mistral had finished up to 1922. appears in Desolación, and many of the verses that appear in that text were subsequently included in revised versions, in Lecturas para mujeres, 1923 [Readings for Women] and subsequently in the first edition of Ternura, 1924 [Tenderness]. In effect, these divisions and repetitions show the poet’s awareness of the increasing segmentation of the audience for poetry. As writing for children came to be regarded as a distinctly specialized subfield, Mistral sought not so much to distance herself from the readers of “children’s” or “educational” texts, as to bridge the gap between “popular” and “elite” cultural production. Crucial to Mistral’s success in this endeavor was her developing the figure of the poet as a spiritual teacher, almost a guru, who confronts injustice and decadence, who identifies with the suffering of others, and who finds communion with the natural world.

Retreat from society and closeness to the natural world brings purification and relief, in such early poems such as “La maestra rural” [The Rural Schoolmistress] and “La mujer fuerte” [The Strong Woman], and in the poet’s later celebration of American landscapes. As Jaime Concha points out, Mistral’s rejection of urban life and her romantic exaltation of country life are stances that Mistral shares with other early 20th century poets in Chile. Yet her work deeply diverges from that of her male contemporaries (and friends) Pedro Prado, Magallanes Moure and Eduardo Barrios, partly in her classspecific affiliation with the public (state) schools, and even more tellingly in her rejection of heterosexual love.
Writing about the body of the mother from within a deliberately female perspective provided Mistral with an alternative to poetic traditions in which woman is constructed solely in terms of satisfying male desire. Because Mistral never married and never had children, critics for many years wrote of her interest in writing for children and mothers as symptomatic of a tragic, laudable, or pathological longing for physical maternity. Only in her first volume of verse does she even allude to heterosexuality, however; in her writings on art and the role of the artist she clearly associates male-female sexual relations with pain, suffering and the degradation of both partners. In constrast to this negative view are her lyrical descriptions of the maternal body, appearing in “Poemas de las madres” (Poems of Mothers), her earlier cradle songs, and “Recuerdo de la madre ausente” (Memory of the Absent Mother). The sexual identification of the speaker is never an easy or straightforward matter in any of Mistral’s earlier verses, while in the later verses the speaker turns attention on the remote past, description of people and places.

Mistral left Chile for Mexico in 1922, where the Minister of Education, José Vasconcelos, called her to assist in the development of the nation’s school system. Her writings from Mexico and later show her discovery of “Americanism,” and her interest in the indigenous past subsequently colors her relation to European history. Concurrent with the development of Americanism in her work is her increased productivity as a journalist, and a tendency away from the forced syntax evident in Desolación, which some Chilean critics criticized as twisted or arhythmic, and others as an attempt to draw attention to herself. Mistral returned to Chile in late 1924 with the apparent intention of starting her own school, along the principles of the Belgian educator Decroly, but by the following, politically very tumultuous year she was thoroughly disillusioned by what she saw as the shallowness of Chile.

Because inflation and the whims of the Chilean government made it impossible for her to depend on the pension from her twenty years’ service in the public schools, Mistral supported herself during her subsequent residence in Europe by writing some fifty or more newspaper and magazine articles a year, over the next ten years. Her dependence on this income prevented her from publishing another full-length volume of verse, Tala [Felling] until 1938. With poems such as “Dos himnos: cordillera y sol de trópico” (Two Hymns: Mountain Range and Tropic Sun), this second volume represents a fuller extension of the Americanist concern increasingly evident in her journalism. While her older contemporaries preferred Desolación for its lyrical intensity, her younger critics preferred the explicit concern with recent history, cultural geography and the more sustained elegiac modes, in the first section of Tala. A constant in both volumes, as well as in Mistral’s next major collection, Lagar [Wine Press] is the poet’s preoccupation with death, which along with childhood and landscape, is one of Mistral’s greatest themes.

In Mistral’s poetry the expression of loss moves swiftly from personal desolation, to survey, in prophetic witness, the scarred common terrain. Where Tala arises out of the Spanish Civil War, Lagar shows the poet’s confrontation of World War II and the Holocaust. It is out of this prophetic witness that her commitment to pacifism emerges alongside her ever-present struggle for social justice on behalf of those who have been driven from the land: indians, farmworkers, abandoned women, refugees. Of all the volumes that Mistral published in her lifetime, her last work, Lagar, is at once her most hopeful, and her most pessimistic. The opening series of poems, entitled “Locas Mujeres” [Madwomen] show the continual effort to transcend individual personality, to comprehend the whole, and to seek an absolutely spare, unadorned language that will precisely name the absence of identity which the poet seeks. Like the volumes that precede it, Lagar is the work of a poet who sought continuously to remake herself. Beyond fashions or fads, her only interest in innovation was in the dogged commitment to put past successes behind her, to explore unfamiliar territory.

Popular religiosity exerted a strong influence on Mistral’s verse and thinking. Much has been written about her wideranging interest in religious expression, her belief in reincarnation, her unorthodox attitude towards suicide, her belief in natural and herbal remedies. One reason for the relative neglect of her work is that at a time when many Latin American intellectuals were increasingly drawn to Marxism, Mistral joined the lay order of the Franciscans. Not a devout churchgoer, Mistral’s admiration for St Francis is none the less evident in her “Motivos de San Francisco” (Motifs of Saint Francis) and her unique combination of spiritual and material values appears in her “Elogios de las cosas de la tierra” (Elegies of the Things of the Earth). Franciscanism also enters into her uncompleted epic-romance, Poema de Chile [Poem of Chile] which the poet worked on throughout the last ten years of her life, piecing it together as a kind of memory book against which to shore up the now-vanished landscape of a pre-industrial, purely agrarian Chile. The narrative of Poema de Chile has the poet returning to her native land, in Chile’s far north, and a haunt, accompanied by two equally spectral figures: a little boy from the Atacama desert, and a huemul, or Andean deer.

There is to date no collected, critical edition of Mistral’s poetry. While the Poesías completas that Mistral supervised in the last year of her life has been criticized for typographical and other errors, it includes crucial aspects such as dedications to individual poems, aspects that the popular paperback and schooltext editions lack. One challenge facing textual editors of Mistral’s verses will be to confront the impossibility of deciding on anything resembling a “definitive reading” for texts which she regularly, repeatedly revised, and which were published in multiple versions during her lifetime. In her later years her precarious health and her constant travelling meant that many of her poems lay unfinished, in multiple manuscript versions. Two volumes of poetry, Poema de Chile and Lagar, incomplete at her death, were subsequently published from these papers. With more than two decades of editorial labors by Scarpa, Céspedes, Calderón and Jaime Quezada, it seems probable that all but a few of the hundreds of essays that she wrote and published throughout Latin America are now in reliable texts.

Mistral would draw our attention for the originality of her thought and for the extraordinary story of her life’s journey, from a childhood spent in miserable poverty, to world renown, even if she had not written so much, and even if so much were not written about her. Even outside of her remarkable poetry and her lucid, wide-ranging prose she was during her own lifetime a monumental figure for Latin America. Of this woman who was the first Nobel Laureate from Latin America, who accepted that prize in the name of all those who work on behalf of Latin American culture, it can be no small task to comprehend the whole.
Biography

Selected Works

Poetry

Desolación, New York: Instituto de las Españas, 1922; revised edition, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1926

Lecturas para mujeres, Mexico City: Secretaría de Educación, 1923 [includes prose]

Tala, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1938

Lagar, Santiago de Chile: Pacífico, 1954

Poema de Chile, edited by Doris Dana, Santiago de Chile: Pomaire, 1967

Lagar II, Santiago de Chile: Biblioteca Nacional, 1992

Correspondence

Cartas de amor de Gabriela Mistral, edited by Sergio Fernández Larrain, Santiago de Chile: Andrés Bello, 1978

Cartas a Lydia Cabrera: correspondencia inédita de Gabriela Mistral y Teresa de la Parra, edited by Rosario Hiriart, Madrid: Torremozas, 1988

Epistolario de Gabriela Mistral y Eduardo Barrios, edited by Luis Vargas Saavedra, Santiago de Chile: Universidad Católica, 1988

Further Reading

The studies by Scarpa and Bahamonde include valuable primary sources such as letters, variant readings of early poems, and texts of poems that the poet excluded from her collected works. Of the various biographical studies, the earliest, by Figueroa, is extremely uneven but provides information not included elsewhere. The attention to dates in Gazarian Gautier’s biography make it one of the most reliable. Teitelboim’s biography is more up-to-date in terms of references to more recent publications, but includes no new factual material. While the poet’s letters are among the more useful sources for understanding her relation to her milieu, a number of books include anecdotal details about her later life: Ladrón de Guevara gives interesting descriptions of the writer’s work habits, while Alegria, Concha, and Samatan all contain convincing analyses of her complex and conflicted relationship with Chile. The poet’s centenary in 1989 sparked many fine reassessments of her poetry and prose, too numerous to list here, which appeared in a variety of special issues of Chilean magazines and in edited collections. The repetitive, uninformative, or cliché-ridden celebrations of her life are being gradually replaced by serious scholarly studies, among which the collections of correspondence edited by Luis Vargas Saavedra and Patricia Rubio’s monumental annotated bibliography, are the most important.

Figueroa, Virgilio, La divina Gabriela, Santiago de Chile: Impreso El Esfuerzo, 1933
Loynaz, Dulce María, “Gabriela y Lucila,” in her Ensayos literarios, Salamanca: Universidad de Salamanca, 1993 [The view of a Cuban woman poet who was a contemporary of Mistral]
Una palabra cómplice: encuentro con Gabriela Mistral, Colectivo Isis Internacional, Santiago de Chile: Casa de la mujer La Morada, Isis Internacional, 1990
Scarpa, Roque Esteban, Una mujer nada de tonta, Santiago de Chile: Nacimiento, 1976
—— La desterrada en su patria, 2 vols, Santiago de Chile: Nacimiento, 1980
Silva Castro, Raúl, Producción de Gabriela Mistral de 1912 a 1918, Santiago de Chile: Anales de la Universidad de Chile, 1957

Bibliographies

Modernismo

Brazil

Modernism in Brazil started in the 1920s and should not be confused with the eponymous movement that took place in the previous generation (and therefore during the epoch of Symbolism and Parnassianism in Brazil) in the Spanish American countries. Corresponding primarily to what became known as the avant-garde in those countries, the Brazilian movement equally benefited from the formal experimentation to which writers of the European avant-garde had dedicated themselves since the first decade of the 20th century. However, in the young Brazilian nation, in addition to the preoccupation with purely aesthetic renewal, there was the desire to construct a literary code that was essentially Brazilian. Thus, if on the one hand Brazilian Modernism converged with the European avant-garde in their rupture with the previous literature through a revolutionary reflection on language, on the other hand, in their nationalism, the Modernists rescued... and deepened one of the dearest proposals of Romanticism. Accordingly, as José de Alencar incorporated the indigenous vocabulary to the romantic prose of Iracema (Iracema, the Honey-Lips), Manuel Bandeira for instance would incorporate spontaneous speech of the people in his modern poetry of free verse.

A decisive event for the definition of the movement was the “Week of Modern Art” held in São Paulo from 11 to 17 February, 1922. There and then converged the diverse avantgarde tendencies that had been taking shape in the country for some time, making possible the consolidation of groups and proposals, and the publication of books, magazines and manifestos. Among the “isms” imported from Europe to Brazilian territory, at least two of them are noteworthy: Futurism, whose programme was based on experimenting with language towards one more appropriate for the civilization of technology and speed; and Primitivism, which in turn proposed experimenting with language from the liberation and projection of the forces of the individual and collective unconscious, and so valued marginal elements such as those of popular origin repressed by the formality of academic literature. These two trends, to a certain degree distinct in Europe, curiously merged in Brazil, acquiring new features, especially in the hands of the two most expressive writers of this first moment in Modernism: Oswald de Andrade and Mário de Andrade. Such a curious fusion between the Futurist and Primitivist programmes reveals itself as a natural development when one considers the context of the movement, i.e., a country in which the civilized and primitive coincided. So the Modernist writers, many of them from urban centres under modernization like Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo, thus aimed to conciliate their desire to align themselves with the audacity of modernity, whose most radical expression was Futurism, with their awareness of the fact that the unconfessedly black and indigenous roots of Brazil required a forcefully Primitivist aesthetics.

This very willingness to experiment with modern forms of expression and at the same time discover symbols and allegories capable of suggesting the repressed elements of Brazilian nationality—such as the Black, the evil of the wild man (in contrast to the idealized “noble savage”), the mulatto, the “malandro”—surfaces in the poems from Pau-brasil [BrazilWood] by Oswald and the novel by Mário de Andrade, Macunaima. Brazilian Modernism thus proposed to keep pace with the literature of the civilized metropolis, but adopting a different attitude to that of movements since Independence. Earlier writers had seen the wildness of the country as a disadvantage. However, in the hands of Modernist writers, this supposed deficiency turned to be seen as a primary source for the production and exportation of good literature. Just as brazil-wood was the first Brazilian product to be exported to Europe, the same was intended for the poetry inspired by it: a quality national production to compete in the international literary market. So the wild and primitive aspect of the nation, previously considered a reason for embarrassment vis-à-vis the “civilized” metropolis (or at most as romantic idealization), was from then on manifestly incorporated as a source of inspiration, and a very original one, instead of being regarded as an obstacle to the elaboration of culture. It was also intended that the originality of this native source was such that, when combined with the necessary European source, the former would have the power to transform the latter so that the literature inspired in both would result in something essentially Brazilian. The manifestos “Poesia pau-brasil” [Brazil-Wood Poetry] and “Antropófago” [Cannibal] constitute the perfect Oswaldian translation of this Modernist proposal.
As the 1930s drew near, paralleling the vogue for Social Realism in Western literature, a movement for rehabilitating regionalist values took place in the northeast of Brazil. This second moment of Brazilian Modernism, even though as a whole opposing the most precursory aspects of the first, benefited much from the incorporation of colloquial speech, of lexic and syntactic regionalism and “Brazilianism” created by the prose of the generation of 1922, who paved the way to much more complex forms of narrating the day-to-day. The new group was able to reconcile some of the aesthetic achievements of the previous group with their own interest in their regional reality. Traditional regionalism could then be redefined by an updated artistic language. The movement gathered around Gilberto Freyre who, with his studies on certain repressed aspects of the Brazilian colonial past, above all Casa grande e senzala (The Masters and the Slaves), motivated writers like José Lins do Rego to search in the present of the region for the prolongation of those unconfessed Brazilian roots. In this sense these regionalists gave continuity to the Primitivism of the 1922 generation, whose own experimentalism extended, albeit in a different way, to the most expressive name of this second moment: Graciliano Ramos. In fact, each of his novels possesses its own language, thus revealing the writer’s preoccupation with finding new forms of expression. Parallel to the regionalist prose, poetry as well in this second moment of the Brazilian modernism was contaminated by the concern with social reality. So, if in the most formal aspects Carlos Drummond de Andrade and Murilo Mendes needed only to proceed on the route of aesthetic liberation previously proposed, in the thematic aspect however they introduced politics in free verse.

Modernism renewed the language of Brazilian poetry and prose, freeing them from their academic past, and from the rejection of many ethnic and historic issues. It provided its writers with a coherent programme for literary autonomy, in addition to their maturing with respect to aesthetic problems concerning the representation of social reality. It paved the way, after all, for the germination, from the mid 1940s, of literature with the vitality and complexity by the likes of João Cabral de Melo Neto, Guimarães Rosa and Clarice Lispector.

TERESINHA V.ZIMBRÃO DA SILVA

Further Reading

For a long time critics had a tendency to underrate the achievements of the first phase of Brazilian Modernism in favour of the second. This situation has been reversed in the last thirty years or so because the application of concepts like carnivalization and parody allowed a productive re-reading of the works by Oswald de Andrade and Mário de Andrade.

Modernismo

Spanish America

This is a mainly poetic movement whose major creative impulse lasted from the 1880s to around 1915. It should not be confused with Brazilian Modernismo or European and Anglo-American Modernism.

The critical approach to Modernismo has undergone a change, due to a re-evaluation of the impact of Romanticism on the history of ideas, research on the Spanish branch of the movement and its European origins, and studies of Rubén Darío’s relationship with intellectual currents of his time. The result has been to explode two well-established myths. One was that popularized by Federico de Onís, according to which Modernismo expressed a novel crisis of sensibility occurring in the mid-1880s. The other was fashioned by Spanish poets and critics, Pedro Salinas, Dámaso Alonso and Manuel Machado among others, and presented Modernismo as characterized by little more than formal, technical innovations in poetic diction. Nowadays Modernismo is seen as representing a more intensified stage in the evolution of romantic intellectual and spiritual malaise. The modernistas’ preoccupation with beauty and the religion of art, that is, now tends to be interpreted as part of a response to cosmic disenchantment inherited from the Romantics. Another aspect of the debate about Modernismo concerns the relative importance of Darío and José Martí as founders and leaders of the movement. Martí preceded Darío chronologically as an innovator, but his innovations were chiefly important for prose. The real shift came in poetry and, after the publication in 1888 of his Azul, was led without question by Darío.

To seek the origins of Modernismo we must look mainly in two directions. If we agree with José Enrique Rodó, himself an outstanding modernista, that to come to terms with the movement is primarily “a question of ideas,” we must see that behind it lay the recognition that later 19th-century thought, and in particular Positivism, had failed to find an answer to the legacy of Romantic doubt and scepticism, intensified by Schopenhauerian pessimism. But the fact that all over Europe writers and intellectuals seemed to be groping towards a new set of ideal values Ferdinand Brunetière’s La Renaissance de l’idéalisme for instance, came out in 1896—had not passed unnoticed across the Atlantic. Two years later, José Asuncion Silva, one of the first modernista poets, was writing in his novel De sobremesa [Table Talk], which contains a compendium of early modernista attitudes, about an “idealist renaissance of art.” It was brought about, he asserted, by a reaction against Naturalism, and was heavily influenced by Wagner, Verlaine, Puvis de Chavannes and Gustave Moreau, among others. Darío had already proclaimed in his poem “El cisne” [The Swan] in Prosas profanas (1896) that, following Wagner’s lead, the new poetry had given birth to “la Helena eterna y pura que encarna el ideal” (the eternal and pure Helen who incarnates the ideal). Thus, in Modernismo, a longing for new, hopeful ideals struggled—in the end unsuccessfully—against what Rodó in Ariel (1900) called “the challenge of the Sphinx,” i.e. of ultimate why-questions. For this reason, the typical modernista fictional heroes, such as José Fernández in Silva’s De sobremesa, Juan Jerez in Martí’s Amistad funesta, 1885 [FATAL Friendship], Tulio Arcos in Manuel Díaz Rodríguez’s Sangre patricia, 1902. [Patrician Blood] are young men in the grip of a personal crisis of hopes and beliefs from which they try to escape by seeking a new, life-enhancing ideal. For the modernista poets, this ideal took the form of a worship of beauty, an attempt to overcome inner disquiet by living the life of art. They found inspiration in the evolution of French poetry from Théophile Gautier (whom both Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera and Darío imitated) through Baudelaire (not forgetting the influence of Poe, which he transmitted) to both Parnassianism and Symbolism. This is the second direction in which the origins of Modernismo can be sought.

In their quest to regenerate post-Romantic poetry in Spanish, they evolved new formal techniques of prosody, imagery, symbolism and poetic diction generally, to express on the one hand, a crisis of confidence in the human condition and on the other their aspiration towards new ideals, chief among them that of beauty as the only absolute. Among the most important representatives of the movement apart from those already mentioned, were Julián del Casal, Manuel González Prada and Salvador Díaz Mirón. In the later phase of Modernismo, we find such poets as Julio Herrera y Reissig, Leopoldo Lugones, José Santos Chocano, Amado Nervo, Guillermo Valencia, Ricardo Jaimez Freyre and Enrique González Martínez, but in their work we can usually discern a transition towards Neoromanticism (Nervo), Americanist mundonovismo (Chocano), Neosymbolism (González Martínez) and, especially in Lugones, towards an even newer type of less ornamental imagery which portended the avant-garde, soon to appear in the 1920s.

Up to the 1880s, poetry in Spanish had chiefly expressed ideas and emotions (until Bécquer in Spain, sometimes rather stridently). With Modernismo, sensations became prominent. Poems appeared which expressed reactions to sights and sounds; visual, acoustical and even olfactory images were foregrounded as the senses came to be regarded as worthy of exploration. This had two important results. First, there was a clear shift in the depiction of women. In place of the angelic, desexualized, consoling, Romantic stereotype, we find women presented often very erotically as genuine sex-objects. This broke, for the first time in Spanish America, a very strong literary taboo. Second, other avenues having failed, the senses, along with the visionary insight of the true artist, were perceived (by Darío especially) as opening doors of perception onto a higher reality, hidden from the common man, a view which has survived in the work of Octavio Paz.

In terms of the renovation of forms and poetic technique, Modernismo represents the peak of the process which began with the Romantics’ experimentation with mixed verse-forms (polimetría) and novel diction. Dario and his fellow-poets foregrounded the cult of beauty by using obtrusively musical rhythms, highly ornamental imagery designed to beautify banal or ugly reality, audacious rhymes, synaesthesia (the combination of two sense-impressions into one) and systematic use of new rhythmical and metrical patterns, often with lines of fourteen syllables or longer. A whole new range of symbols came into use. They included above all, that of the swan, whose snowy plumage symbolized pure beauty, but whose neck, shaped like a question mark, symbolized the enigma of existence. But present also was that of the centaur, representing the unity of the flesh, the mind and the spirit, and alluding to the paganism of classical times, in which the modernistas saw an age when beauty and sensuality were untrammeled by any Christian sense of sin. References to exotic foreign lands and cultures played a part in the modernistas’ fierce rejection of the philistinism of the late 19th century in Spanish America and elsewhere. Not only classical Greece, medieval Italy and late 18th-century France, but also China, India and Scandinavia provided poetic scenarios. Important, too, were poetic evocations of the other arts, especially music, sculpture and painting, imitated from the French “transpositions d’art.” As time went on, specifically Spanish American themes began to be increasingly employed. These would lead eventually, through Chocano, in the direction, for example, of Caribbean “black” poetry such as that of Cuba’s Nicolás Guillén, Neruda’s Canto general and Cardenal’s Homenaje a los indios americanos (Homage to the American Indians).

It is important to notice, however, that sporadically pessimistic, the modernistas did not as yet envisage a random world, unpredictable and unintelligible, even absurd, as was to be the case later with Neruda and Vallejo, both of whom, like Paz, had strong roots in Modernismo. Thus modernista poems remained carefully structured verbal artefacts, with the logical nexuses still in place, using regular verse-forms and generally avoiding difficult or disturbing imagery. To that extent their poetry still reflected a world in which beauty was not divorced from goodness and truth and in which the survival of a formal aesthetic order pointed reassuringly to the survival of a moral order and of epistemological confidence. Modernismo was harshly rejected by many in the next generation of poets, notably by Borges, but what was rejected was its increasingly artificial-seeming aestheticism. Its existential disquiet lived on and is still with us.

DONALD L. SHAW

See also entries on Rubén Darío, Julio Herrera y Reissig, Ricardo Freyre, Enrique Larreta, Leopoldo Lugones, José Martí, José Asunción Silva, José Juan Tablada

Further Reading

Fraser, Howard M., In the Presence of Mystery: Modernist Fiction and the Occult, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Department of Romance Languages, 1992
González, Aníbal, La crónica modernista hispanoamericana, Madrid: Porrúa Turanzas, 1983
———La novela modernista hispanoamericana, Madrid: Gredos, 1987
Gullón, Ricardo, Direcciones del modernismo, Madrid: Gredos, 1963

Jitrik, Noé, Las contradicciones del modernismo: productividad poética y situación sociológica, Mexico City: El Colegio de Mexico, 1978

Rama, Ángel, Las máscaras democráticas del modernismo, Montevideo: Fundación Ángel Rama, 1985

Special Issues of Journals
Revista Iberoamericana (January-June 1989)

Augusto Monterroso 1921–

Guatemalan/Mexican prose writer

Augusto Monterroso’s grandfather, general Antonio Monterroso, was a friend of writers and poets, amongst them Porfirio Barba Jacob. His father, Vicente Monterroso, one of the most moving characters in Los buscadores de oro [The Gold Seekers], was equally passionate about literature and alcohol. He “lived always immersed in his dreams and with absolute certainty he died wrapped in them.” Paradoxically, Augusto Monterroso, partly as a result of his family’s itinerant life, constantly on the move between Honduras and Guatemala, and partly because of his proverbial shyness and laziness, frequently referred to in his writing, left school without completing his primary education. In 1937 he started working as a clerk at a butchers. But the family’s artistic and intellectual legacy was not lost, and in the few spare hours he had every day, he started reading Lord Chesterfield, Madame de Sevigné, Horace, Juvenal and Phaedrus, the translator of Aesop’s fables into Latin verse. These authors, and others, would exert a profound influence on Monterroso’s writing. This self-educated man is one of the most sophisticated readers in Latin American literature, equally familiar with the classics as well as with modern and contemporary writers.

Indeed, many will be tempted to identify Monterroso with a writer he often quotes: Jorge Luis Borges, an author with whom he shares a passion for literature. Both writers have been able to bring life into literature through the use of their imagination; they both feel a special attachment towards English literature and, in both, humour is an essential ingredient. More than anything else, what brings them together is a unique talent to create a style of prose writing that is simultaneously contemporary and timeless: the very quality attributed to classic writers, regardless of the specific time into which they were born. However, dissimilarities are no less in evidence. Borges had an intellectual, scholarly and philosophical imagination. His language has the perfection of things that are stable, emphasised by his detachment. Monterroso, if not a political writer, never ignores political reality precisely because he never ignores reality. In contrast to Borges’s detachment, Monterroso’s personal life, his own personality, are constantly present in his literature. While, on the one hand, Monterroso shares Borges’s scepticism, on the other, he is a moralist. Moreover, he takes paradox to its limits, in the process creating a paradoxical language: if he is a classic, it is not because he wants to create a timeless language but because of what could be described as his radical wisdom.

Paradoxical yet again, Monterroso leans on classic tradition to modify and even to reverse, in book after book and without destroying them, the different literary genres. In the very title of Obras completas (y otros cuentos) the author underlines the writer’s ability to tease literary conventions through paradox: this collection of short stories undoubtedly constitutes his first collected works, or obras completas, but the title also refers to the title of one of the short stories included. In this instance, the break with tradition is limited. The opposite could, indeed, be argued: Monterroso reveals his extraordinary talent as a storyteller. More than modifying, he is challenging and excelling. It also contains what arguably could be considered as the shortest and most brilliant short story ever written, a line admired, amongst many others, by Italo Calvino, and one which has ensured Monterroso’s fame more than the rest of his work considered as a whole: “When he woke up, the dinosaur was still there.” In this book we find many of the characteristic features in Monterroso’s writing: the use of parody, paradox and nonsense, the frequent literary references incorporating the creative world of the imagination and ridiculing the pomposity in the worst tradition of Latin American writing, political ethos without a political discourse, the subtle presence of the writer that permeates his writing with irony, sarcasm, scepticism, melancholy and, more than anything else, the common-sense philosophy that allows the author to unmask conventional beliefs and attitudes.

Such common sense, carried gently, albeit relentlessly, to its logical conclusion, led Monterroso to subvert moral conventions in La oveja negra y demás fábulas, 1969 (The Black Sheep and Other Fables) and, consequently, to subvert the fable as a conventional genre. While the nonsensical aspect is emphasised and, therefore, humour is fully developed as the narrative activator, there is also a deeper and more compassionate understanding of human nature. While keeping his sarcasm for the wicked—often politicians and/or bad writers—Monterroso accepts resignedly that stupidity is part of the human condition, and a fable becomes a mirror in which we see ourselves undisguised. This subtle amalgam of humour and compassion, literature and life, scepticism and moral outrage demand to be developed in their full potential, a wider space, that is to say, the space provided by the novel. Lo demás es silencio [The Rest is Silence] is Monterroso’s most complex book. Once again, the structured conception of the novel disintegrates, in the same way that Cervantes—the ultimate model for Monterroso as well as for other contemporary novelists disintegrated the novel of chivalry. Ambiguity is here the logical and even exacerbated consequence of Monterroso’s need to unmask conventions and highlight and accept contradictions. Eduardo Torres, the main character, a man of letters, is, just like Don Quixote, a parody, yet at the same time the instigator of the parody of other writers. San Blas, where the action of the novel takes place, could be San Ángel, a residential and sophisticated neighbourhood in Mexico City, perhaps Mexico City itself, or even a more general mirror of Latin America’s parochial culture. The popularity of Obras completas (y otros cuentos) and La oveja negra y demás fábulas has overshadowed Lo demás es silencio, probably his most important book.

In books of essays like Movimiento perpetuo and La palabra mágica [The Magic Word], the compilation of interviews in Viaje al centro de la fábula [Journey to the Centre of the Fable], the diary La letra e [The Alphabet Letter] or the autobiographical Los buscadores de oro, it is impossible to distinguish the illuminating and original discourse from invention. Monterroso’s books are always truthful, imaginative, entertaining and funny. In questioning our conventional perception of literary genres and of human nature, he has created his own unmistakeable, inimitable and idiosyncratic genre.

JUAN ANTONIO MASOLIVER

Biography

Born in Tegucigalpa, Honduras, 21 December 1921, but of Guatemalan nationality. Educated at Guatemalan National University. Did not settle in Guatemala until 1936. As a member of the “Generation of 1940,” he was active in the opposition to Jorge Ubico’s dictatorship through the Association of Young Guatemalan Artists and Writers. After his arrest by the police of Ubico’s successor, General Federico Ponce Valdés, he went to Mexico as a political exile in 1944, where he stayed until 1953. Attended classes at the Arts Faculty of Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM). University teacher in Mexico. Married Dolores Yáñez in 1953; and was appointed consul and First Secretary at the Guatemalan Embassy in La Paz (Bolivia) by the left-wing government of President Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán. After the US intervention and the fall of the Arbenz government in 1954, Monterroso went to Santiago de Chile as a political exile. Made friends with Pablo Neruda, and worked with him on his magazine Gaceta de Chile. In the El Siglo [The Century] newspaper, he published what would become his most famous as well as most often translated short story, “Mr Taylor,” later included in his Obras completas (y otros cuentos). In 1956 he returned to Mexico where he was to settle permanently. Married Milena Esguerra in 1962. Married the Mexican writer Barbara Jacobs in 1976. Awarded the Xavier Villaurrutia Prize, 1975 (normally accorded only to a Mexican citizen); the Mexican Premio Nacional de la Crítica, 1992; the Premio Letterario Istituto Italo-Latino Americano, 1993. Order of the Águila Azteca, 1988.

Selected Works

No attempt has been made to divide Monterroso’s works by genre since their rule-breaking nature would make this a counter-productive exercise. La oveja negra y demás fábulas, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1969; as The Black Sheep and Other Fables, translated by Walter Bradbury, New York: Doubleday, 1971 Animales y hombres, San José, Costa Rica: Editorial Universitaria Centroamericana, 1972 Movimiento perpetuo, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1972
Lo demás es silencio: la vida y la obra de Eduardo Torres, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1978
Viaje al centro de la fábula: con Jorge Ruffinelli… et al., Mexico City: UNAM, 1981
Mr Taylor & Co., Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1982
La palabra mágica, Mexico City: Era, 1983
La letra e (fragmentos de un diario), Mexico City: Era, 1987
Esa fauna, Mexico City: Era, 1992
Los buscadores de oro, Barcelona: Anagrama, 1993

Compilations and Anthologies
Obras completas (y otros cuentos), Barcelona: Anagrama, 1990
Sinfonía concluida y otros cuentos, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1994

Further Reading

The dearth of critical material on the work of Augusto Monterroso (as opposed to its quality) indicates that his literary production is undervalued.
Campos, Marco Antonio (editor), La literatura de Augusto Monterroso, Mexico City: UNAM, 1988 [Includes essays by, among others, Julieta Campos, Noé Jitrik, Juan Antonio Masoliver, José Miguel Oviedo, Ángel Rama and Saúl Sosnowski]
Corral, Wilfrido H., Lector, sociedad y género en Monterroso, Xalapa, Mexico: Centro de Investigaciones Lingüístico-Literarias de la Universidad Veracruzana, 1985
Ruffinelli, Jorge (editor), Monterroso, Xalapa, Mexico: Centro de Investigaciones Lingüístico-Literarias de la Universidad Veracruzana, 1976 [articles by Jorge Ruffinelli, José Miguel Oviedo, Álí Chumacero, Ángel Rama and others]

Interviews
Gliemmo, Graciela, Las huellas de la memoria: entrevistas a escritores latinoamericanos, Buenos Aires: Beas, 1994

Vinícius de Moraes 1913–1980

Brazilian poet
Vinícius de Moraes is one of the outstanding Brazilian poets of the 20th century; furthermore, his engagement in various artistic fields situates him among the major figures in Brazil’s cultural life. The musical activity in which Vinícius, as he is also known to Brazilians, engaged almost exclusively in his maturity increased his popularity within his own country as well as abroad. Vinícius’s contribution to Brazilian popular music involved a genuine revolution in the late 1950s, for he was, jointly with Antônio Carlos Jobim and João Gilberto, one of the creators of the new bossa nova rhythm, originated from traditional samba. If, on the one hand, the involvement of Vinicius with music brought him international fame—he wrote the words to the famous song “A garota de Ipanema” (The Girl from Ipanema)—on the other, it proved prejudicial to his earlier poetic production which, unjustly, has been underrated by literary critics.

Vinicius de Moraes is the great poet of love and women, of love’s happy moments but also of its bitter torments. Woman is undoubtedly central to his poetry; she figures first as the ethereal woman of the early books, becoming in his later works the carnal and sensual inspiration for his erotic poetry, one of the most passionate in Brazilian literature. The vicissitudes of love are the predominant theme of Vinícius’s work. None the less, the poet also showed his interest in themes taken from everyday life in the big city, in the problems of Brazil’s poor, and expressed his concern over the most urgent issues of his time: some of Vinícius’s best-known poems condemn the tragedy of the concentration camps victims of World War II and the launching of the atomic bomb. Vinicius de Moraes’s profound sensitivity enabled him to discover poetry both in the tumult of the spirit and in the bustle of the outside world.

The poet’s interest in the external world does not make itself apparent right from his first books. The author himself points out two distinct periods in his work: the first, of a marked transcendental and mystical mood, the second, characterised by his immersion in the material world. O sentimento do sublime [The Sense of the Sublime], as he titled his first three books—written between 1933 and 1936—when organising the edition of his complete works, is filled with the influence of the poet’s Jesuit education. The themes revolve around a strong feeling of sin and the aspiration of ascent from earthly existence.

But the human and worldly Vinicius de Moraes that the public grew to love, overcame this phase of mystic torment and turned to daily life, to the poetry of love, of ordinary people. His later book Poemas, sonetos e baladas, 1946 [Poems, Sonnets and Ballads], is a synthesis of the wide range of themes and metres explored during the second phase of his literary career. By conferring on the book the new title O encontro do cotidiano [Encountering the Everyday], Vinicius made clear the new outlook which marks this collection of poems. The variety of poetic forms employed is a sign of change and of Vinicius’s urge to experiment with different metrical forms. The long biblical verse of his early years is replaced by shorter metres. In O encontro do cotidiano, he makes use of Modernist free verse and composes ballads of Iberian influence as well as sonnets. It was two of the most beautiful of Vinicius’s sonnets—“Soneto de fidelidade” (Sonnet of Faithfulness) and “Soneto de separação” (Sonnet of Separation), of O encontro do cotidiano, which rendered immortal the fundamental theme to his work.

The final tercet of “Soneto de fidelidade” includes some of Vinícius’s best-known verses on the experience of love: “Eu possa me dizer do amor (que tive):/Que não seja imortal, posto que é chama/Mas que seja infinito enquanto dure.” (May I be able to say of the love I had:/May it not be immortal, for it is flame / But be it infinite while it lasts). The sonnet form turned out to be the perfect receptacle for his intensely dramatic poetry, which thrives on oppositions, explores conflicting imagery, and focuses on the movements, on the turmoil of emotions. The “Soneto de separação” offers an example of such dramatic tension in his poetry. In a succession of stanzas the poet describes the lovers’ ever increasing pain as they part. The imagery is plastic and dynamic, these being characteristics of his verse, of which the first quatrain gives an example: “De repente do riso fez-se o pranto/ Silencioso e branco como a bruma/E das bocas unidas fez-se a espuma/E das mãos espalmadas fez-se o espanto.” (Suddenly laughter turned to tears/Silent and white like mist /And foam issued from their joined mouths/And terror rose from their upturned palms)

Vinícius was born in the city of Rio de Janeiro and his work reveals his strong attachment to his origins, not only as a carioca but especially as a Brazilian. His poetry speaks of the life in the tropical country, giving us pictures of the carefree life of the more fortunate classes as well as images of abject poverty. In “Balada das meninas de bicicleta” [Ballad of the Girls on Bicycles], also included in O encontro do cotidiano, the poet watches a group of young girls, beautifully bronzed from their life on the beach, as they ride their bicycles along the sea-front in the zona sul of Rio, the most opulent part of the city. “Balada no Mangue” [Ballad in Mangue], by contrast, is devoted to the poor women who find the sole means of livelihood in prostitution in Mangue, at the time the poem was written a well-known red-light district in the vicinity of the docks area of Rio de Janeiro.

Vinícius de Moraes owes his fame to his poetry and his lyrics but he achieved wide recognition for his dramatic production. His much acclaimed play Orfeu da Conceição (1954) was adapted for the film Orfeu negro [Black Orpheus], which won the Oscar for best foreign film in 1959.

SARA BRANDELLERO

Biography

Born in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in 1913. Studied law; spent a year at Oxford University, England, 1938–39. Consul, Brazilian legations, Los Angeles, Paris, Montevideo. Film critic from the 1940s. Interested in music, especially jazz. Collaborated with Antônio Carlos Jobim and João Gilberto in 1962.; worked with the former on the musical version of Orfeu da Conceição (Black Orpheus) in 1965. Left diplomatic service in 1969, and became a composer, lyricist and singer.

Selected Works

Poetry
O caminho para a distância, Rio de Janeiro: Schmidt, 1933
Forma e exêgese, Rio de Janeiro: Irmãos Pongetti, 1935
Ariana, a mulher, Rio de Janeiro: Irmãos Pongetti, 1936
Novos poemas, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1938
Cinco elegias, Rio de Janeiro: Irmãos Pongetti, 1943
Poemas, sonetos e baladas, São Paulo: Gaveta, 1946
Livro de sonetos, Rio de Janeiro: Livros de Portugal, 1957
O operário em construção e outros poemas, 4th edition, Lisbon: Publicações Dom Quixote,1975

Plays
Orfeu da Conceição, Rio de Janeiro: Autor, 1956
As feras: tragédia em tres actos, Rio de Janeiro: Serviço Nacional de Teatro, Ministério de Educação e Cultura, 1968
Compilations and Anthologies

Poesia completa e prosa, Rio de Janeiro: Aguilar, 1974
As coisas do alto: poemas de formação, edited by José Castello, São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1993

Other Writings

Further Reading

Moraes, Vinicius de, Poesia completa e prosa, Rio de Janeiro: Nova Aguilar, 1987 [The anthology includes a selection of the most significant studies written on the poet’s work]
Sant'Anna, Affonso Romano de, Música popular e moderna poesia brasileira, Petrópolis: Vozes, 1986 [Includes an interesting study of the origins and characteristics of the bossa nova movement and gives special attention to the role of Vinicius de Moraes in the renewal of Brazilian popular music]

Nancy Morejón 1944–

Cuban poet, literary critic and translator

Nancy Morejón is the most internationally successful and widely translated Cuban woman poet of the post-revolutionary period. Born into a respectable, black, working-class family, she participated in the Revolution while studying French language and literature at Havana University. Many of her poems confirm her early political commitment. Morejón was the first black woman poet in Cuban history to be given the opportunity to publish widely and to acquire a professional status as a writer, critic and translator. Influenced by the Black movement in the United States (particularly Angela Davis) and by the example of her literary mentor, the mulatto poet Nicolás Guillén, Morejón was one of the first Cuban women to celebrate blackness in poetry. Nevertheless, like Guillén, Morejón has always refused to separate black politics from the wider revolutionary process. In her view there is not a distinct African Cuban identity but a Cuban identity which cannot be understood without taking into consideration the black cultures of America. As she wrote in Nación y mestizaje: “it is impossible to engage in an exclusively cutaneous critique” of literature. This assimilationist approach (in some ways peculiar to Latin America) was particularly favoured in Cuba after 1959 when emphasis was laid on the need for a homogenous, syncretic national identity. So, while Morejón focuses on the experiences of black Cubans (particularly women) in her poetry, and while she is keen to inscribe Cuban culture within a Pan-Caribbean framework, she is always careful to do so within the parameters of Cuban revolutionary thought.

Morejón’s most renowned and widely translated poems are those which foreground the black Cuban woman participating in the long struggle for personal and collective freedom. In “Mujer negra” (Black Woman) from Parajes de una época, 1979 [Places of an Age], a mythical black woman recounts her transhistorical experience, from the crossing of the Atlantic as a slave to the part she plays with the revolutionary forces in the Sierra Maestra, until she and her people are finally free. Similarly, in “Amo a mi amo” (I Love My Master) from Octubre imprescindible, 1983 [Essential October], an 18th-century female slave voices her gradual awareness of the oppression to which she is submitted. She runs away from the white master she loved and, inspired by the sounds of African drums, plots cruel revenge. In these poems Morejón draws a clear connection between the slave’s fight for freedom against capitalism and that of the postcolonial Cuban nation. In other words, she articulates in her poems the complex interplay of class, race, nation and gender. Although she would probably not consider herself a feminist, she firmly accepts Alice Walker’s term “womanist.” She stated in an interview: “in my literature it is very important that I am a woman. It would be a nonsense to say I am not, or that I think women don’t write in a very special mode and with a special experience and charge.” Other poems that focus on black Cubans and African Cuban culture include “Los ojos de Elegguá” (Eleggua’s Eyes) in Richard trajo su flauta, 1967 [Richard Brought His Flute], “Madrigal para cimarrones” (Madrigal for Runaway Slaves), “Güijes” (Sprites), from Octubre imprescindible, and “Negro” (Blackman) and “Mundos” (Worlds) in Piedra pulida, 1986 [Polished Stone]. Morejón also writes about contemporary Africa; for example, the seven poems in the collection Baladas para un sueño, 1989 [Ballads for a Dream] are an eloquent protest against apartheid. One of Morejón’s most successful poems is “Freedom Now,” published as early as 1967. It is dedicated to “the struggle of the blacks in the US”:

en el sur de los Estados Unidos se fabrican ferrocarriles ganchos lámparas ganchos pintura de uña para señoritas cremas y helados de chocolate tinte plateado autos edificios de propiedad horizontal televisores escuelas democráticas... ciaudades misteriosas llenas de gente que lincha negros y pisa cucarachas

(from Richard trajo su flauta)

In the south of the States they manufacture railroads hooks lamps hairpins fingernails polish
Poems such as these, written from an African-Hispanic and often womanist perspective, are of great significance not only because they provide a bridge between the Cuban and the Caribbean literary traditions (Morejón is a specialist in French and English Caribbean writing), but also because they constitute some of the rare examples of black, feminist poetry written in Spanish.

However, to read Morejón purely (or even primarily) as a black poet is shortsighted in the extreme. Apart from wider political issues, for example, the war against Vietnam, nuclear arms, the Soviet space programme, the missile crisis in Cuba, the Nicaraguan Revolution, and the American invasion of Grenada, she has written a book on dance (Elogio de la danza, 1982 [In Praise of Dance]) and numerous poems which describe people and scenes from her home-town, Havana. Arguably, the most important themes in her work are the family and love. Her early collection Richard trajo su flauta opens with three poems dedicated to her paternal grandmother, her parents and her maternal grandmother respectively. The family home often figures as a space which provides loving support for the young woman despite generational differences. In the title poem “Richard trajo su flauta,” for example, the poet’s grandfather laments the passing of traditional Cuban music while she and her friends sit around listening to recordings of American jazz (Count Basie, Duke Ellington, and Nat King Cole). Morejón’s poem to her mother (“Madre” [Mother]), published in Piedra pulida, is particularly moving: “Mi madre no tuvo jardín / sino islas acantiladas / flotando, bajo el sol, / en sus corales delicados” (My mother had no garden / only cragged cliff-edged islands / floating under the sun / in reefs of delicate coral).

Here, as in many poems, Morejón makes full use of imagery associated with the sea. What most clearly distinguishes Piedra pulida from earlier collections, however, is the shift away from the urban landscape (streets, patios, the port) of the early Morejón, to rural landscapes and natural imagery. Trees, leaves, plants, rivers and mountains create an imaginary landscape as lush as the Cuban countryside itself: Water and greenery suggest life and love, as in, for example, “La planta infiel” (The Unfaithful Plant) and “Lianas, peces y algas” (Lianas, Fish and Seaweed). Apart from these key themes in Morejón’s work and the moral import of her poetry, the reader is struck by constant hankering for perfection, beauty, and art (as the title Polished Stone suggests). It is this concern for poetry as an aesthetic which has prevented Morejón from lapsing into propagandistic verse despite the often overtly political themes and her preference for free verse. As she says, “I think poets should create to teach people to see beauty…one of our duties is to create an awareness that beauty is a very concrete thing, but something that could be found in everyday life” (Ours the Earth).

CATHERINE DAVIES

Biography

Born in old part of Havana, Cuba, 7 August 1944, where she continued to live with her parents in adulthood. First African-Cuban student to take a degree in Faculty of Arts at Havana University where she majored in French. Graduated in 1966 and specializes in translation of French narrative and poetry. Worked for the Ministry of the Interior, on cultural brigades, in publishing and in the Havana headquarters of UNEAC (Cuban Union of Artists and Writers). Frequently represents her country at literary festivals, poetry readings and congresses. In the early 1990s appointed director of the publishing house associated with the Fundación Pablo Milanés in Havana. This centre was closed by the authorities in 1995 because it was perceived as a cultural “palenque” or centre for black intellectuals who might prove unreliable. Recipient of several Cuban awards for literature and criticism, of which the most important to date is the Premio de la Critica, 1986.

Selected Works

Poetry
Mutismos, Havana: El Puente, 1962,
Amor, ciudad atribuida, Havana: El Puente, 1964
Richard trajo su flauta, Havana: UNEAC, 1967
Parajes de una época, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1979
Poemas, Mexico City: UNAM, 1980
Octubre imprescindible, Havana: UNEAC, 1983
Piedra pulida, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1986
Baladas para un sueño, Havana: UNEAC, 1989
Paisaje célebre, Caracas: Fundarte, 1993

Essays
Lengua de pájaro, in collaboration with Carmen Gonce, Havana: UNEAC, 1971 [testimonial]
Fundación de la imagen, Havana: UNEAC, 1988

Translations
Where the Island Sleeps like a Wing. Selected Poetry by Nancy Morejón, translated by Kathleen Weaver, San Francisco: Black Scholar Press, 1985
Ours the Earth. Poems by Nancy Morejów, edited and translated by J.R.Pereira, University of the West Indies: Mona, 1990
Further Reading

Busby, Margaret (editor), Daughters of Africa: an International Anthology of Words and Writings by Women of African Descent from the Ancient Egyptian to the Present, London: Jonathan Cape, and New York: Pantheon, 1992,

Finn, Julio, Voices of Negritude, London: Quartet, 1988

Moore, Carlos, “Congo or Carabalí?: Race Relations in Socialist Cuba,” Rethinking Cuba [special issue], Caribbean Review, vol. 15/2, (1986)

Salgado, María, “La poesía tradicional y el compromiso ideológico en la creación femenina de la segunda promoción de la revolución cubana,” in La historia en la literatura iberoamericana, edited by Raquel Chang-Rodríguez and Gabriella de Beer, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1989

Felix Morisseau-Leroy 1912–

Haitian playwright, poet and novelist

Felix Morisseau-Leroy was one of the first, most vocal and most articulate champions of a Haitian literature in Creole. Not that he advocated abandoning French altogether: indeed, as is the case with many contemporary Haitian authors, Morisseau-Leroy’s works in French, whether in poetry, prose fiction or plays, alternate with those he composed in the national language.

The performance in Port-au-Prince of his Antigone en créole created a sensation in 1953. While Creole plays had been written and performed in Haiti since colonial days, they were almost invariably farces whose bawdy double entendres and slapstick were intended to provoke guffaws rather than to elicit reflection. They were almost never deemed worthy of publication and the only traces of them that remain are in occasional announcements and newspaper reviews.

Legend has it that Morisseau-Leroy’s Antigone was the outcome of a bet with friends who argued that Creole was fit only for colloquial and trivial expression and quite incapable of expressing higher conceits. He is supposed to have wagered that, in the same way Racine and Goethe adapted Euripides’ Iphigenia in French and German, he would adapt Sophocles’ Antigone into Creole. Morisseau-Leroy actually went further than his predecessors, since he transposed the action from a palace in Thebes to a voodoo temple in the imaginary Haitian mountain village of Tèb, and transformed the original characters into Haitian peasants; as he explains in the Foreword to the printed version:

This is a story that was told a long long time ago, and has already been told in many countries and translated into many languages…I kept what I could from the original story, and then I added to it the sun of Haiti, a certain way the Haitians understand life and death, courage and sorrow, luck and misfortune. I added the saints, the souls of the dead, the spirits of voodoo, the spirits who watch over the roads, the cemeteries, the doors, the trees, the fields, the sea, the rivers, who rule over rain, wind, storms in Haiti, and who much resemble what people call the Greek gods…And then I let Antigone, Ismêne, Marraine, Roi Créon, Tirêsiás, Hémon, Filo, speak exactly the way a Haitian would speak in their place.

Despite the grumbling of traditionalists, Antigone, performed under the direction of Morisseau-Leroy by peasants from the village of Morne Hercule, was very well received in Port-au-Prince. In 1959, the company was invited to Paris where the play was presented in the Théâtre des Nations series to a somewhat perplexed French public, which was unaccustomed to classical tragedies in voodoo settings.

The success of Antigone encouraged other playwrights to adapt foreign classics for performance in Creole: Franck Fouché’s Oedipe Roi was staged shortly afterward (although never published); he also adapted García Lorca’s Yerma (which was published). Corneille’s Le Cid would later be transposed into Creole by Nono Numa under the title Compère Général Rodrigue, Molière’s Tartuffe by Lyonel Desmarattes as Mouché Défas, etc. At the same time, serious original plays were beginning to be written in Creole and performed in both Haiti and the Haitian diaspora. Contemporary Creole playwrights such as Frankétienne and Sito Kavé owe much to Morisseau-Leroy’s 1953 initiative.
In 1978, Morisseau-Leroy published a sequel to Antigone entitled Roua Kréon. While less famous than its predecessor, since it was only published abroad in a photocopy edition by an émigré group, Roua Kréon could be considered the better play. King Créon and his niece, Antigone, are dead and the bumpkin prince Hémon has ascended the throne. Hémon is occasionally inspired to be a good king and to alleviate his people’s misery. But his father—who in the underworld has become an evil voodoo spirit—regularly possesses Hémon before he can take any action and, through him, Créon perpetuates his nefarious reign. The play was written at a time when young Jean-Claude Duvalier (whether by conviction or under pressure from the international community) was making timid moves to liberalize the dictatorial system put in place by his father. Morisseau-Leroy’s message is clear: so long as the system is not destroyed completely, it will remain as repugnant as under the dreaded Papa Dok.

Morisseau-Leroy’s most famous collection of poems is Diacoute [Satchel]; this work was first published in Port-au-Prince in 1953 then, with additional items, in Dakar (the poet was in African exile at the time) as Diacoute 2 in 1972; and, with further additions, in Miami, where he had settled, as Dyakout 1, 2, 3…in 1983. In this third version, all the poems are transcribed according to the rules legislated in 1979. Once Creole was recognized as a fully-fledged language, and no longer as merely a simplified, debased form of French, Morisseau-Leroy could write: “No one can claim any longer that French is the language of the Haitian people.” The author explains that in his Creole poems: “In Dyakout 1, in Dyakout 2, in Dyakout 3, it is the common people of Haiti who speak. All I do is put on paper what they are saying.”

His poems, composed in simple, direct verse, have become very famous among Haitians. They express the resentment of the Haitian poor at the injustice and abuse perpetrated upon them by the ruling classes and the foreigners, who are held equally responsible, in poems such as “Touris, pa pr en pòtre” (Tourist, Don’t Take My Picture) or “F.M.I” (International Monetary Fund), for the conditions which force poor Haitians to become Botpipèl (Boat people).

Written in French, Morisseau-Leroy’s first novel, as well as his 1977 collection of poems Kasamansa, are suffused with leftist ideology. While the former is a lucid analysis of the forces which conspire to keep Haitian peasants downtrodden, the latter are little more than ideologically determined paens to his racial brothers, Pushkin and Nkruma, as well as to the martyred President Allende, and are in no way comparable in quality to his poetry in Creole.

LÉON-FRANÇOIS HOFFMANN

Biography

Born in the southern village of Grand-Gosier, Haiti, 1912. Studied at the state secondary school in the nearby town of Jacmel, then in Port-au-Prince. After graduating from the Law School, he attended Columbia University, New York, from which he received a Master’s degree in education. Teacher and an administrator in the Ministry of Education, where he was named Chef de division in 1941. Editor of Le Matin, one of the important Port-au-Prince dailies, and was a frequent contributor of poetry and essays to Port-au-Prince periodicals. Like so many intellectuals of his generation, he went into exile under the Duvalier dictatorship. With the writers Jean Brierre, Gérard Chenêt and Roger Dorsinville among others, he spent many years in West Africa, first in Nigeria, then in Ghana with a UNESCO mission from 1960 to 1967, then in Senegal, where he organized theater workshops and staged performances for the Ministry of Culture. In 1981, when his eyesight began to fail, he joined relatives in Miami, and only returned to visit Haiti after the fall of Jean-Claude Duvalier.

Selected Works

Poetry in French

Plenitude, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie N. Telhomme, 1940
Gerbe pour deux amis, in collaboration with Roussan Camille and Jean F. Brierre, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie H. Deschamps, 1945

Natif-natal, un conte en vers, Port-au-Prince: Éditions Haïtiennes, 1948
Kasamansa, Dakar: Nouvelles Éditions Africaines, 1977 Poetry in Creole

Diacoute I, Port-au-Prince: Éditions H. Deschamps, 1953
Diacoute 2, Montreal: Éditions Nouvelle Optique, 1972
Kasamansa, Dakar: Nouvelles Éditions Africaines, 1977

Dyakout 1, 2, 3, ak twa lòt poëm, Miami: Jaden Kreyòl, 1983 Plays

Antigone en créole, Pétionville: Culture, 1953 [in Creole]
Doguicimi, tragédie, Accra, Ghana: Mimeo, 1961 [in French]
Jadinkreyol, Dakar: Nouvelles Éditions Africaines, 1977

Révèlè, Port-au-Prince: Éditions Haïtiennes, 1946 [novel]

Other Writings

Le Destin des Caraïbes—El destino del Caribe, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie Telhomme, 1941 [essay in bilingual French and Spanish versions]

Further Reading

Apart from occasional newspaper reviews there are, surprisingly, no biographical or critical studies, and even very few articles, devoted to Morisseau-Leroy either by Haitians or by foreigners.

César Moro 1903–1956

Peruvian poet and painter

César Moro is the pen-name of Alfredo Quípez Asín. Born in Lima, Moro went into voluntary exile in Paris in 1925, where he met André Breton and joined the Surrealist movement that had inaugurated a new literary and artistic period of great influence in Western art and literature, Surrealism. Moro became an active member of this movement in Paris (1925–33), where he stayed for nine years until his return to Peru. He had read extensively on Marxism, anthropology, psychoanalysis and the writings of Sigmund Freud; he had learned and mastered French, the language in which he wrote all of his poems except those of La tortuga ecuestre [The Equestrian Turtle]. Back in Lima he organized the First Surrealist Painting Exhibition in 1935, challenging what he understood to be the false morality of the Peruvian middle-class, and naturally, caused great scandal in the city. To add to the confrontation, the catalog of the exhibition was framed with a typical Surrealist phrase of the period by Francis Picabia: “Art is a pharmaceutical product for imbeciles.” During these years, he coined the phrase “Lima, la horrible” (beastly Lima) that has been used many times by other Peruvian poets.

In 1938 Moro traveled to Mexico, where he continued to be an active member of the movement sponsored by André Breton. He invested considerable energy into launching a Surrealist magazine. The first effort translated in a one-page publication entitled El uso de la palabra [About Utterance], with only one issue published in December of 1939. In his study of Peruvian poets, James Higgins argues that “the rejection of the alienating reality in which he was born and brought up in order to assume another felt to be more authentic is perhaps the key to his life and career.” Higgins is referring to Moro’s homosexuality, never acknowledged overtly by anyone and yet a factor which brought substantial alienation to Moro. But there is a further aspect of this alienation that is the mark of his poetic language. By producing work written in a language other than Spanish, Moro’s poetry is at an obvious disadvantage with regard to the general reading public. This question seems to take on a dimension of its own when set against the context of Peru then and today, a country of great importance at the end of the 20th century still suffers from high levels of illiteracy. How would a poet of Moro’s profile be read in his own country under these circumstances? It would be indeed be difficult.

Moro believed in the merging of reason and purpose of poetry and life, and it was one of the strong appealing forces that brought this Peruvian poet to the Surrealist fold. After four years in Peru, he left again. This time his voluntary exile took him to Mexico, where he met most of the members of the Contemporáneos group of poets, Carlos Pellicer, Salvador Novo and Gilberto Owen, and, most importantly, cherished the friendship of two homosexual poets, Agustín Lazo and Xavier Villaurrutia in particular. The issue of his homosexuality remains still today faintly implied. However, the voice that speaks through these poems is that of a homosexual subject, a voice that when disguised, is unable to find its truth. In this sense, it can be said that Moro was forced into a double exile, that of his poetic ideology articulated by the tenets of the Surrealist movement, and that of his homosexual disposition. In James Higgins’s reading of Moro’s poetry, he quite pointedly asserts that the poet “chooses the figure of the madman to embody his poetics, as deployed in the poem entitled “A vista perdida” (Lost from View).” The madman does not abide by the “rational” laws that are the cause of Moro’s alienation; he can display freely what is repressed, and so he does in Moro’s texts. It is accurate to think of Moro’s poetics as quite radical and iconoclastic, both characteristics that explain why he is still a marginal figure in the larger picture of Latin American poetry.

Recently, there has been more attention dedicated to his work, but much is in need of scholarly attention. As is the case with Vicente Huidobro, for example, some of Moro’s poems are in French; thus, his poetry remains unread by most Latin American critics. During his stay in Mexico, Moro published in the magazine El Hijo Pródigo [The Prodigal Son], and in Dyn, a journal directed by the Surrealist artist Wolfgang Paalen. He also collaborated in other prestigious Mexican journals such as Estaciones [Stations/Seasons], Letras de Mexico [Mexican Letters] and Poesía. He met and shared concerns with Wolfgang and Alice Paalen, Leonora Carrington and Remedios Varo, all Surrealist artists who were working in Mexico at the time.

Moro’s poetic works were published posthumously by André Coyné, a French scholar who met Moro after he returned to Peru from Mexico. They became close friends, and when the Peruvian poet died in 1956, Coyné published the first complete version of La tortuga ecuestre y otros poemas in 1957. He also compiled a volume containing most of the critical writings of Moro under the title of Los anteojos de azufre [The Sulphur Spectacles] published in 1958. In 1980, the Instituto Nacional de Cultura published the first of two volumes Moro’s complete poetic works.

MAGDALENA GARCÍA PINTO

Biography

Born Alfredo Quíspez Asín in Lima, Peru, 19 August 1903. Educated at Jesuit Colegio de la Inmaculada, Lima. Lived in Paris from 1925. Member of the Surrealist movement; worked on Le Surréalisme. Prominent painter; held exhibition, Brussels, 1925, Paris, 1927. Although initially wrote in Spanish, most of later works written in French. Returned to Peru, 1933. Formed a Peruvian Surrealist group; founder of the Surrealist journal, El Uso de la Palabra, 1939. Persecuted by the police following publication of a work in support of Republican Spain. Travelled to Mexico in 1938 where he lived until 1940. Organised the International Surrealist Exhibition with André Breton (1940). Eventually broke away from Breton’s conception of Surrealism. Returned to Peru in 1948; worked as a lecturer and as a curator. Died in Lima (under mysterious circumstances), 10 January 1956.

Selected Works

Poetry

Lettre d’amour, Mexico City: Dyn, 1944
La chateau de grisou, Mexico City: Tigrondine, 1943
Trafalgar Square, Lima: Tigrondine, 1954
Latin America has a varied and mixed population in terms of racial ancestry. In the main, the ethnic population groups are native Indians, Whites, Blacks and people of mixed ancestry. The white population of Latin America is of European descent. Blacks were brought from Africa to the then “New World” as slaves from as early as the 1500s through to the 1800s. The term “mixed ancestry” applies to people of dual (or in the case of Latin America in the 1990s) multi-ethnic racial ancestral mixtures. Through the centuries, many Whites, Blacks and Indians in Latin America have intermarried/interbred and as a result, most Latin Americans today are of an ethnically mixed ancestry. One of the largest groups of peoples of mixed ancestry are mulattoes (mulato in Spanish). Mulattoes are people of mixed black and white descent. Originally, the term designated the first cross between European and African; it still does so, but definition now depends largely on the country. In some countries of Latin America today, mulatto may refer to any degree of African-European inter-mixture and sometimes, as in the case of Brazil, can refer to a person of mixed-blood of any origin.

One unofficial criterion seems to be that mulatto is equated with fair-skinned people throughout the countries of Latin America. However, it is to be noted that in the case of Brazil, the category is even further broken down to “mulato claro” i.e., light-skinned and “mulato oscuro” i.e., dark-skinned, while in the Caribbean, mulatto (mulato) is synonymous with “trigueño” a wheat-coloured or light-skinned individual while “moreno” is the term used for a darker-ancestry. In Latin America mulattoes are numerous but, specifically, can be found in large numbers in Brazil where some 38% of the population of 155,356,073 (July 1991), is considered to be of mixed ancestry; Panama where 70% of the population of 2,547,628 (July 1991) is officially listed as mixed in ancestry and throughout the islands of the Caribbean, where, in particular, Cuba stands out with a population of 10,732,037 (July 1991) that is 51% mulatto.

Although the people of Latin America share many traditions and values that proceed from a common colonial heritage, there are a great many local differences in their way of life. Most Latin American countries have a class system based largely on ancestry. Peoples of mixed ancestry, including mulattoes, usually make up most of the middle class and to a limited extent they also penetrate the upper class. However, in the context of Latin America, it must be noted that social position is not decided solely on the basis of ancestry so that being a mulatto does not restrict a person to a low social status, nor does it entitle a person to affiliation to a higher class or economic circumstance; yet in many societies, it can be the benchmark of social acceptance.

Mulatto, like most other racial categorizations can be pejorative in meaning in most countries of Latin America, depending on the intonation of the speaker, but it should also be noted that mulatto is a term which can be, and is often, used by people of mixed ancestry as well as Blacks who are light-skinned to refer to themselves. Finally, in literature the mulatto woman has been promoted as a (masculinist) feminine ideal, because of her remarkably uncommon beauty and her (alleged) extremely powerful sexuality. Specifically the ideal of “mulatez,” i.e., being a mulatto, can be found in abundance in the popular poetry of Cuba. Examples of the representation of the mulata in the Island’s literature are provided by Cirilo Villaverde in his novel Cecilia Valdés, by Martín Morúa Delgado in Sofía (1891), and the poets Nicolás Guillén and Luis Palés Matos (the latter, a Puerto Rican) in the 20th century.

NICOLE ROBERTS

See also entries on Nicolás Guillén, Mestizo, Cecilia Valdés (Cirilo Villaverde)

Further Reading

Cohen, David and Jack P. Greene (editors), Neither Slave nor Free: the Freedman of African Descent in the Slave Societies of the New World, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1970

Martínez-Echazabal, Lourdes, Para una semiótica de la mulatez, Madrid: Porrúa Turanzas, 1990

Álvaro Mutis 1923-

Colombian prose writer and poet

The Colombian writer Álvaro Mutis first made his name in his own country as a poet. He began publishing poetry in 1948, with the unmemorable volume La Balanza [The Scales], followed by Los elementos del desastre, 1953 [The Elements of the Disaster]. A collected volume of his poems, Summa de Maqroll el Gaviero, was first published in 1973, since when he has diversified into short stories and novellas, most of them based on this figure of Maqroll el Gaviero or “the Lookout.” Mutis’s poems show a renovating spirit not often seen in Colombian poetry of the 1950s, still at that time much influenced by Spanish American Modernism, which by then was little more than a thoroughly outmoded Romanticism. Influenced by the French Surrealists, Mutis brought poetry into the modern day, into a time of despair and lack of meaning, in which chance and death are the most powerful forces. This sense of tragedy was conveyed however in a scrupulous, densely imaged language—often in prose poems (again from the French 20th-century tradition), and often imbued with a bitter humour at human frailty. From the French poetic tradition Mutis also learnt that poetry is as much a way of seeing the world as a matter of rhyme or verses, and he has written many prose poems and short Surrealist pieces. His poetry has been described by Octavio Paz as “rich without any ostentation or waste .. . showing a love of words, desperation with words, a hatred of words: the extremes of a poet.”

The poetry collection dedicated to Maqroll the Lookout introduces Mutis’s most interesting creation, a figure who dominates his prose work. Mutis published the first of the Maqroll series in 1986: La nieve del almirante [The Snow of the Admiral], and he is present as a secondary character in one of his later works of fiction, La última escala del tramp steamer, 1989 [The Tramp Steamer’s Last Port of Call]. Maqroll is a mythic figure in a world that no longer believes in myths. He is a sailor, a flying Dutchman condemned to travel the world fulfilling a duty that he imposes on himself because that is no more absurd than any other reason for living. Maqroll is a figure from Conrad or Rudyard Kipling, stripped of any idea of glory. In his wanderings, he provides Mutis with the outsider who can judge the experience of Europe and its civilisation as lived by Latin Americans, who feel themselves part of it yet distinct. His eponymous hero also casts a cold eye on the history of Latin America, where the perpetual if inexplicable turmoil is balanced by the overwhelming beauty of the landscape. Mutis also relishes the Arab tradition he senses he has inherited via Spain, and the wanderings of Maqroll ultimately link back to a figure like that of Sinbad in the Arabian Nights. Mutis’s fiction constantly reaches out from the contemporary world into one of myth, retelling stories he feels to be eternal. As he says at the end of La última escala del tramp steamer. “Men—I thought—change so little, they go on being so much the same that there has only been a single love story since the dawn of time, repeated an infinite number of times without ever losing its terrible simplicity, its irredeemable misfortune.”

NICK CAISTOR

Biography

Born in Bogota, Colombia, 25 August 1923. Lived in Brussels as a child, educated there. Visited Colombia to stay with his wealthy plantation-owning grandfather. After the assassination of Jorge Eliécer Gaitán (1947), a book of which he was co-author, was burnt. Member of the Mito group, which published the journal Mito, 1953–63. Has lived in Mexico since 1956. Awarded Colombia’s National Poetry Prize and the Mexican El Águila Azteca, 1989.

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction

Diario de Lecumberri, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1960
La mansion de Araucaima; relato gótico de tierra caliente, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1973
La nieve del almirante, Madrid: Alianza, 1986
Ilona llega con la lluvia, Madrid: Mondadori, 1987
Un bel morir, Bogota: Oveja Negra, 1989
La última escala del tramp steamer, Colombia: Arango, 1989

Poetry

Los elementos del desastre, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1953
Los emisarios, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1984
Cronica regia; y Alabanza del reino, Madrid: Cátedra, 1985
Un homenaje y siete nocturnos, Mexico City: Ediciones del Equilibrista, 1986
Amirbar, Madrid: Siruela, 1990
El último rostro, Madrid: Siruela, 1990

Compilations and Anthologies

Los trabajos perdidos, Mexico City: Era, 1965
Obra literaria, Bogota: Procultura, 1985
La muerte del estratega: narraciones, prosas y ensayos, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1988
Obra poética, Bogota: Arango Editores, 1993

Translations

Further Reading

Eyzaguirre, Luis, “Álvaro Mutis o la transitoriiedad de la palabra poética,” Inti, Rhode Island 18–19 (Fall-Spring 1983–84)
Interviews

Mysticism

Traditionally, Latin American literature has been perceived as a monopoly of male writers. However, the research into women’s writing (especially that which dates from the mid1970s) makes it possible to argue that over the centuries women too have been making contributions. Because the education of lay women was banned during colonial times, the majority of women writers were nuns. Convents were the only enclaves where women with intellectual aspirations could cloister themselves and be free from patriarchal control. In addition, being a nun gave a woman a special status in society.

Many nuns were mystics and were ordered by their confessors and the abbesses of their convents to write about their spiritual experiences. The purpose of this writing was to serve as a “vida exempla” for other sisters and also to encourage their vocation. In general mystics’ works were characterized by hybrid narration. They are valuable primary sources for historians as well as literary critics because they contain not only descriptions of the women’s mystical experiences, but also unique portrayals of the events of their times.

While the importance of rescuing women’s voices from the past is recognized, often the emphasis has been on the writings of a few well-known nuns. Although this is necessary, it is important also to continue along the path made by researchers such as the Mexican scholar, Josefina Muriel. Thus this article will concentrate on the work of two authors, of whom one needs further study while the other was discovered only in the early 1990s. The first is Sister María Magdalena de Lorravaquio Muñoz (1576–1636), whose works were compiled and edited by Josefina Muriel, and the second is a little-known mystic, Sister María Manuela de Santa Ana (1695–1793).

Sister María Magdalena de Lorravaquio Muñoz wrote her autobiography, Libro en que se contiene la vida de la madre María Magdalena, monja profesa del convento del Señor San Jerónimo de la ciudad de Mexico, hija de Domingo de Larravaquio y de Ysabel Muñoz su legítima mujer [A Book Containing the Life of Mother María Magdalena, Professed Nun of the Convent of St Jerome in Mexico City, Legitimate Daughter of Domingo de Lorravaquio and Ysabel Muñoz His Lawful Wife]. Sister María Magdalena’s autobiography exhibits the characteristics common to the writings of all mystics.

As already noted, these women wrote because they were ordered to do so by their confessors. Indeed, Sister María Magdalena did not have previous writing experience. She credits her skill to Jesus Christ and the Virgin Mary, and uses the rhetoric of humility to describe her life. A characteristic of her writing is the spiritual yet sensuous tone of the narratives. Sister María Magdalena often refers to the tenderness of her love for Jesus Christ. Many nuns’ writings were read with skepticism, and “false mystics” were punished by the confiscation and burning of their works. But Sister María Magdalena was a genuine mystic, well-known in her time and allowed to create freely and to discuss her religious and actual world. Sister María Magdalena was successful partly because her writing was safe from the meticulous censorship of the Inquisition.

Sister María Magdalena’s autobiography contais a microcosm of historical and social events as seen from the convent. The most interesting of her observations on society refer to social class. Because her own background was middle class rather than patrician, Sister María Magdalena sided with the poor. She narrates how she spent her time teaching the slaves and the Indian women in the convent. The following account makes clear her role as a teacher: “enseñar la doctrina cristiana a todas las mozas de servicio que quieren aprenderla. Después de esto dispongo todo lo necesario para el servicio de mis necesidades y de las hermanas que conmigo están…” (to teach Christian doctrine to all the young maidservants who wish to learn it. After this I arrange what is necessary for my own needs and those of the other sisters who are with me).

Here we have an invaluable record of women’s communal relations, of women helping and fostering the advancement of other women. This small example suggests the great value of the study of the body of women’s mysticism. These texts are not simply accounts of spiritual transfigurations, but vital preservations of the activities of and relations between women. María Madgalena died prematurely at the age of fifty after a protracted and painful illness. Yet she joined thousands of other women writers of her day in providing precious links in the almost invisible chain of women’s history.

The work of the second nun, Sor María Manuela de Santa Ana, is not yet known but it serves to illustrate that women have at all times played a significant role in society. Two valuable manuscripts written by her have been found. The first is a short but dense autobiography, “Vida” [Life] and the second manuscript contains some confessional letters and a long poem both compiled in “Correspondencia espiritual y poesías” [Spiritual Letters and Poetry].

The “Vida” is a mirror of the religious life both within and the outside convent walls. It follows the traditional rules of autobiography, but it also has a unique narrative style. “Vida” has embedded within it another text, “Las Capillas” [The Chapels]. This subtext is like St Theresa’s Castillo interior [Interior Castle] but the narration of “Las Capillas” differs from that of St Theresa because Sister María Manuela’s spiritual unions are very sensual. In this sense, her writing more closely resembles the spiritual eroticism found in the work of both Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz and in that of the Spanish mystic, San Juan de la Cruz. Sister María Manuela continues the tradition of allegory present in The Song of the Songs.
The historic accounts of Sister María Manuela have a profound impact on many present day readers because of her descriptions of the most important events of her time, such as the Jesuits’ expulsion from all Peru. Her comments about the Jesuits are significant because they protected and defended indigenous people against exploitation by the Spanish. If the Inquisition and Sister María Manuela’s confessors would have carefully read her autobiography, we probably would not have her works today. She narrates the expulsion of the Jesuits as follows: “Dos años antes del estrangamiento de la compañía de Jesús, lo veía con los ojos del alma acabada. Y que no había Jesuitas y todo lo que han en nada desecho.” (Two years before the estrangement of the Company of Jesus, I saw with sorrow through the eyes of my soul what would take place. And that there would no longer be any Jesuits in this land, and that everything they had done would be cast down).

In conclusion, the autobiographies of Sister María Magdalena and Sister María Manuela have a great deal of interest as both literature and history. Their texts offer us distinctive styles of writing the self that enrich our research. Furthermore, the examination of these works provides us with the real facts that highlighted women’s presence in the construction of colonial society.

ELIA J. ARMACANQUI-TIPACTI

See also entry on Conventual Writing

Further Reading

Arenal, Electa, “‘Leyendo yo y escribiendo ella’: the Convent as Intellectual Community,” Journal of Hispanic Philology 13 (1989)

Benítez, Fernando, Los demonios en el convento. Sexo y religion en la Nueva España, Mexico City: Era, 1985

Giles, Mary E. (editor), The Feminist Mystic and Other Essays on Women and Spirituality, New York: Crossroad, 1982

Myth

Definitions of myth are always necessarily partial and dependent on the needs of a particular discipline as it attempts to focus an area of study. Although our increasing awareness of the multi-dimensional nature of myths has demanded interdisciplinary perspectives, the processes of colonialism and post-colonialism continue to impose a Eurocentric framework on scholarly attempts to elucidate the formation, transmission and functioning of myth in culture. The Americas have been a particular rich area for the study of myth, inspiring works like Lévi-Strauss’s Structural Anthropology, but recent work (such as Gordon Brotherston’s Image of the New World, 1992.), reminds us that the diversity of language systems that exist(ed) in the Americas are still little understood and severely question and problematize some of the categories (such as that between oral and written traditions) that are used to underpin theories of myth. Since the conception that we have of myth has to be revised continually in the light of modern scholarship, and since the “texts” that have been preserved are still in the process of being fully interpreted, any commentary must be tentative in its use of conceptual and disciplinary boundaries and able to anticipate a further shifting of such borders.

In his essay “The Problem of Defining Myth,” Lauri Honko offers a definition based on the criteria of form, content, function and context. Like Mircea Eliade in Myth and Reality, Honko emphasizes that myth expressed a “truth,” a sacred narrative that tells how something came into existence, a pattern for behaviour or an institution, and as such establishes the paradigms for all significant human acts. Myth has a strong performative element. The knowledge it reveals is not an external, abstract knowledge but one that can be experienced ritually, either by ceremonially recounting the myth or by performing the ritual for which it is the justification. For Honko, “the ritual acting out of myth implies the defence of the world order; by imitating sacred exemplars the world is prevented from being brought to chaos.” The re-enactment of a creative event, for example, the healing wrought by a god in the beginning of time, is the common aim of myth and ritual. In this way the event is transferred to the present and its result, i.e. the healing of a sick person, can be achieved once more here and now.” In this context, myth is synonymous with history—in its documentation of the creation and development of a society—and is also a form of science as it combines with medical practice in the healer’s role as shaman, bearer of the soul. Myth is a language, then, that both records a narrative and intervenes in the present as a “lived” experience.

These dual functions are vividly portrayed in Jorge Sanjines’s La nación clandestina [The Secret Nation], a film set in the Bolivia of 1952–89, which simultaneously charts the attacks on a indigenous way of life by both government and guerilla forces, and the ritual re-enactment of the myth of “The Great Dancer” by one of its members as a defence of their culture against such attacks. In its content, the film gives voice to the continued presence of Amerindians in the Americas and their—often clandestine—preservation of ancient customs and institutions. In its form, Sanjines exploits the cyclical structures and narrative ambivalence of myth to fragment the linear story of urban conquest and domination, and to displace the certainties of a colonial world-view. Confronted by this disjunction of place and discourse, punctuated only by the melody of the pan pipes, the audience is forced to weave together the scenes of (indigenous) myth and (colonial) history, thus themselves actively engaging in the ritual dance and producing with it a new, hybrid reality.

It is as a radical post-colonial tool, writing/talking back to history and to the process of colonialism, that myth finds its most powerful manifestation in the literature of the Americas. Eduardo Galeano’s Los nacimientos (Genesis), for example, compiles a range of myths from the Great Lakes to Tierra del Fuego, gathering peoples as diverse as the metropolitan Aztecs and Incas, the confederacies of the Iroquois and Cherokee in the Appalachians and the loosely organized and widespread language family of the Guarani and Tupi in Brazil and Paraguay. All relating to a “creation” of some sort and based on documentary evidence (with details included in a glossary), these extracts are collectively entitled “Primeras voces” [First Voices] and provide insight into some of the Amerindian texts through which its people have represented themselves. Introduced as if apparently timeless, these poetic tales of creation and destruction, climate and government, retribution and trauma and healing and worship, built on an interconnectedness between man and the gods, animal and landscape, gradually accumulate into a vital context which throws into sharp relief the “Viejo Nuevo Mundo” (Old New Word) that follows. The use of dates in this second section introduces the historical framework of the colonizers (1492–1700) intent on conquest and domination, but the reader, empowered by the perspectives of the early context, is now suspicious of this totalizing discourse and its claims to power. Galeano’s re-presenting of ancient Amerindian myths not only allows those worlds to be recreated in their own voice, it also enables the reader to recognize their continued presence in the “Viejo Nuevo Mundo,” increasingly hybridized perhaps, but nevertheless providing an alternative and equally valid approach to a shared postcolonial reality.

Of course there are problems with this kind of literary representing of myth. Anthropologists have been particularly wary of literature’s use of the poetics of myth and have emphasized the need to interpret myth, or the series of myths which inevitably structure the oral transmission of any one variant, in a focused ethnographic context.
(Compare Lévi-Strauss’s methodology in The Raw and the Cooked). There is also the danger in a project like Galeano’s that the specificity of different Amerindian cultures and epochs may be lost in the political need to assemble a coherent resistance to colonial genocide. Writers like Miguel Ángel Asturias, José María Arguedas and Augusto Roa Bastos have preferred to focus on their own native ancestry and on specific texts (like the Maya-Quiché creation myths, the Popol Vuh, which inspired Asturias’s Hombres de maíz/Men of Maize) in their attempts to use the strategies of myth and mythic texts to reshape a Latin American aesthetic. Attempts at gauging the “authenticity” of myth in any of these texts (whether literature, anthropology or any other contemporary discipline) is a futile exercise, however. The “documentary evidence” has often been through more than one translation process, the translators and native guides themselves straddling periods of cultural transition and acculturation. No interpretative process can be ideologically free and the translation from oral to written mediums is inevitably subject to change.

Nor is Amerindian myth the only resource available to the contemporary writer of the Americas. The continent’s history of conquest and migration, including enforced slavery and indentured labour, has caused the displacement and transplantation of various mythological systems. The African-Hispanic novels of Nelson Estupiñán Bass (Ecuador), Quince Duncan (Costa Rica), Carlos Guillermo Wilson (Panama) and Manuel Zapata Olivella (Colombia) reveal the creative syncretism that emerges out of the need both to preserve African traditions and to re-interpret these traditions from a New World perspective. Zapata Olivella’s Changó, el gran putas [Shango, the Baddest SOB] for example, specifically calls on Shango, the hero-god of the Yoruba, in an attempt to reappropriate myths of slavery. Although the novel has its roots in Africa, “soul-force”— the power of the spirits of ancestors to give strength and direction to the living—a ritual which parallels the Amerindian use of myth, the emphasis is on the “nuevo Muntu Americano” (the new American man) who becomes a voice of hope for the wider cross-cultural community.
In the Circum-Caribbean, writers as diverse as Alejo Carpentier and Wilson Harris have, in their own times, formulated cross-cultural, New World perspectives that seek to inactivate the dynamic resources of myth to challenge the “one-sided conquistadorial realism” (Harris) of the colonizer’s history. Carpentier defines his notion of “lo real maravilloso” (the marvellous in the real) in direct relation to the cross-cultural landscape of the Americas and the creative possibility for dialogue and dialectic which it represents. Though drawing on the very tangible myths of an African, Arawak and Christian heritage, Harris has also argued for the continued significance of eclipsed cultures, like that of the Carib, as “absent presences” which resonate powerfully throughout the cross-cultural imagination of the Americas. These two writers (the former a Cuban who wrote in Spanish, the latter a Guyanese writing in English) also remind us of the colonial demarcating of a shared mythical heritage and the artificiality of such geographical and disciplinary boundaries. Within these academic boundaries a genre such as magical realism may be confined to the past and associated with the stars of the Latin American Boom (like Gabriel García Márquez and Carlos Fuentes), when novels as diverse as La Maravilla [The Marvel] by the Chicano writer Alfredo Véa, Jr and the Trinidadian Lawrence Scott’s Witchbroom demonstrate that the dual perspective of this genre, which attempts to respond to myth as well as to history, continues to offer an appropriate way forward for the post-colonial writer of the Americas.

Myth is central to both the writing and the vision of literature in the Americas, then, providing a catalyst for the experimentation and innovation of form and mapping a wider comparative and cross-cultural terrain than “Latin American” sometimes implies. At the same time as its influence is broad, however, we must also remember that myth retains a specificity of meaning for tangible and coherent Amerindian communities that are still little understood, or respected, so that our engagement with the ongoing translation process must be politicized if it is to be adequate.

PATRICIA MURRAY

Further Reading

Bierhost, John (editor and translator), The Hungry Woman: Myths and Legends of the Aztecs, New York: Morrow, 1984 [Bierhost is the translator of numerous other native American myths]

—— Book of the Fourth World: Reading the Native Americas through Their Literature, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1992 [Contains a full bibliography of the editions and availability of native texts]

Carpentier, Alejo, “De lo real maravilloso americano,” in his Tientos y diferencias, Mexico City: UNAM, 1964

Sajines, Jorge, “Problems of Form and Content in Revolutionary Cinema,” in Twenty-Five Years of the New Latin American Cinema, edited by Michael Chanan, London: British Film Institute, 1983

Zapata Olivella, Manuel, Changó, el gran putas, Bogota: Oveja Negra, 1983
Nāhuatl Literature

Indigenous literature is expressed in various forms of poetry and prose: great epic poems recalling cosmological myths and legends about the gods and cultural heroes, sacred hymns, and a variety of religious poetry often lyrical and sometimes dramatic, chronicles and historical accounts based on the ancient annals, and, finally, stories of creative imagination and instructive texts covering numerous topics. The greatest wealth of preserved literary texts (due to the efforts of friars and native survivors) has come down to us from the Náhuas of Central Mexico. Náhuatl literature (the literature of the people of the empire which sprawled across much of modern Mexico, collectively referred to as the “Mexica”) covered all aspects of life, for its aim was to help the memory to retain the whole accumulated knowledge of earlier generations, their religious ideas, myths, ritual, divination, medicine, history, law, as well as rhetoric and lyric and epic poetry. Prose was used for instructive treatises, mythical and historical narratives and verse for religious or profane poems. Many accounts or descriptions of events were in the form of poetry or rhythmic verses, since this format was easier to commit to memory. Some of these poems were veritable sagas, and others reflections upon the brevity of life or the uncertainty of fate, satisfying this culture’s appetite for philosophico-moral rhetoric. In contrast to the delicate sensitivity of the poems and legends of Maya literature, the often forceful expressions of Náhuatl literature reflect the mentality of the Aztecs, a people obsessed by a mysticomilitaristic concept of life. Ritual was a major tool in the creation of an imperial people—a highly elastic and dynamic expressive mode, more akin to street theatre and collective popular representation of familiar “performance texts.” Such extended dramatized performances (they often lasted days), recruiting different groups of participants from different social levels in complex sequence, were themselves sculpted successions of choreographed sentiments loosely organized around a theme, and made the more powerful for being repeatable, public, and participatory through the ritual aesthetic. Books or written accounts, using a compromise between ideogram, phoneticism and simple representation or pictography, served merely as prompters to the memory, since historical accounts, hymns and poems had to be learned by heart for transmission. For this reason, certain prompts were used such as phonetic parallels, assonances and alliterations.

The Náhuas had both a strong tradition of oral history before the conquest and a tradition of written record-keeping. In the 16th century when the conquest narratives were composed and recorded, the oral tradition still remained strong and the written texts show evidence of its influence. The repetition of information in slight variation and the relative lack of autonomy of the Náhuatl texts obviously come from the oral tradition. In contrast to their written counterpart, oral texts depend on reiteration and speaker intervention for their effectiveness in transmission. Such written texts demonstrate their origins in an orally constituted sensibility and tradition. This is apparent in Náhuatl and other early indigenous compositions in the oral drive to use formulaic expression, the oral mnemonic drive to exploit balance, the oral drive to redundancy, and the oral drive to narrate rather than simply to juxtapose. And, given poetic license and the variability allowed in multiple authorship and diverse time sequences of construction, in addition to the different polities that participated in different ways, as allies or enemies of the Spaniards, it is not surprising that no unified native account of the conquest exists. Obvious examples of differing points of view are Diego Muñoz Camargo’s Historia de Tlaxcala and the conquest chronicle of Tenochtitlán-Tlatelolco compiled under the direction of Bernardino de Sahagún in the Florentine Codex. Much of the Sahagún material has the resonance of confident memory: the chants to the gods in their archaic Náhuatl; the formal exhortations of parents to children; the midwife’s prayer for the newborn child, spoken when no male was present—all these as part of the memories of the elderly. Native conquest narratives, including those of Náhuatl literature, tend to be more a means for gaining insight into the native cosmogony than for constructing a historically accurate chronicle of events.

In the indigenous mind all art forms were intimately interrelated, as were all manifestations, activations or clarifications of the divine text sustained by the sacred impulse. The poet-singers and musicians as well as the scribes indicated the text’s sacred elevation through the richness of metaphor. Indeed, there is a suggestion in some poems that the processes of chant and inscription were simultaneous, the “text” as much sung as painted. Sung poetry was referred to in Náhuatl xochicuicatl, “flower-song” (humans, like flowers and song, exist only ephemerally in the world), and in the painted books the speech-scrolls which indicated the words were colored the deep blue-green of jade, of quetzal plumes, an incomparably precious commodity. Poetry, rather than being an individualistic art form as is the case in most cultures, can be said to represent collective understandings among Amerindians, who have a long tradition of song-poems as public, and publicly shaped, performances. Such poetry, although often composed by a single poet, was an arrangement of shared formulae more than the creative outpouring of an individual. The symbology and styles within the strongly marked genres (warrior songs, burgeon songs, songs of lamentation and love) were very much prescribed, indeed, and particular songs entered the repertoire only upon acceptance by the general population. Thus, songcraft or sung poems remained a popularly based art in Náhuatl aesthetics, as was the case among other pre-Columbian indigenous peoples. The Aztecs themselves divided poetry into various categories depending on subject matter: religious songs or hymns, war-songs, flowery, bantering songs, etc. As was previously mentioned, artistic forms were not strictly divided into separate genres. And so, poem and song were synonymous, for the poem was always sung or at the very least declaimed to the accompaniment of musical instruments. And, in turn, these poems were not only sung, but “acted” in dramatic fashion, that is, each of the verses repeated on numerous occasions throughout the performance text accompanied a given phase of a ritual ceremony, some set action of the priests or some specific masked dance. Thus, in the combination of recital, song, dance and music there were also to be found the elements of A dramatic art with actors in costume to represent historical or mythical heroes, dialogue, and, at times, exchanges between the characters and a choir. Even mimed songs, some of them sung by women, were inserted into these compositions of ballets and tragedies. The ancient Mexicans’ passionate love of oratory and poetry, music and dancing, had free rein at feasts, banquets and innumerable ceremonies. Dancing was not only a form of entertainment or a rite; it was a means of expressing worthiness and favor with the gods by paying homage to them with one’s entire body. The simplicity of instrumental accompaniment—the conch, the trumpet, the flute and some percussion—primarily provided a basic rhythm for singing and dancing. This perpetual theatre of Náhuas consisted of performances and sacrifices throughout the year coinciding with different religious festivals. It was the richness and eloquence of the Mexican language (Náhuatl had become the common tongue of the whole vast country by the beginning of the 16th century) which was exploited to its fullest potential in the rhetorical and poetic style of indigenous literary achievements. Reading their words, we note the poise of the cadences and the practiced balance of the repetitions and parallelisms. Náhuatl was and is a language rich in metaphor, and the Mexica took delight in exploring veiled resemblances, sometimes speaking literally and, more often, speaking metaphorically. Plays like the Maya-Quiché Rabinal Achi were frequent among both the Mayas and Náhuas. Fray Diego de Durán writes about Náhuatl schools for dance, making a clear distinction between the plays presented in festivals to honor the gods (a serious cosmic responsibility for the preservation of their people) and others which he specifically called “farces, interludes, and songs of much mirth” performed for sheer entertainment.

The “Anales” of Tlatelolco, possibly transcribed into European script in the post-conquest period (1528), is the first indigenous document written in European script that we have. Although written only seven years after the Spanish Conquest, this composition seems to have remained intact, without outside influence or contamination. The two great collections of Náhuatl “song-poems” are La colección de cantares mexicanos [Collected Mexican Songs] and Manuscrito de los romances de los señores de la Nueva España [Manuscript of the Ballads of the Lords of New Spain]. In addition, there is the Libro de los coloquios [Book of the Debates], which is lyrical in flavor despite its dialogue form, and was written down (and some say possibly composed) in the 1560s. These give some access, through their patterns of verse, their insistent metaphors, and their mournful evocation of mood, to preconquest sensibility. Most post-conquest Náhuatl texts, however, result in a hybridization of indigenous and European thought and forms.

ELENA DE COSTA

Further Reading

Anthologies, critical editions and individual texts
Baudot, Georges and Tzvetan Todorov (editors), Relatos aztecas de la Conquista, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1990 [Baudot provides new translations of the Náhuatl texts (although not the originals). His preface to the Náhuatl and Spanish texts indicates the provenance of the writers and any relevant biographical material that is known. Todorov’s interpretative essay deals with the “modalities of the narrative—narrators, genres, and styles”—and discusses the histories themselves]
Correa, Gustavo, et al., The Native Theatre in Middle America, New Orleans: Tulane University, 1961

León-Portilla, Miguel, Quince poetas del mundo azteca, Mexico City: Diana, 1994

Sahagún, Bernardino de, Códice florentino, Mexico City: Secretaría de Gobernación, 1979

Critical Studies

——Panorama literario de los pueblos Náhuas, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1987

Launey, Michel, Introducción a la lengua y la literatura Náhuatl, Mexico City: UNAM, 1992

——The Broken Spears: the Aztec Account of the Conquest of Mexico, translated by Lysander Kemp, Boston: Beacon Press, 1966

——Pre-Columbian Literatures of Mexico, translated by the author and Grace Lobanov, Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1969

——Native Mesoamerican Spirituality: Ancient Myths, Discourses, Stories, Doctrines, Hymns, Poems from the Aztec, Yucatec, Quiché-Maya and Other Sacred Traditions, New York: Paulist Press, 1980

Schroeder, Susan, Chimalpahin and the Kingdoms of Chalco, Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1991 [Chimalpahin is a significant native writer-annalist whose work (written in his native language) transcends conquest history. He wrote to glorify the history of his home polity of Amaquemeca (modern Amecameca). Schroeder’s study contains lengthy passages in Náhuatl with English glosses, and emphasizes the importance of understanding native categories within the indigenous context]

Nationalism in Spanish America

Before the 19th century the literary works written in Hispanic America that manifested an inherently local focus constituted only a small exception to the rule. One looks in vain for a realistic depiction of American types and customs in the colonial literary canon.
Ercilla’s Araucanian characters, only Indian in name, possessed the values and character of their Virgilian literary models. Ruiz de Alarcón merits inclusion in the elite of Golden Age dramatists, yet his finely crafted plays hardly reveal their American origin. Sor Juana, in her brilliant poetic and epistolary writings, depicts a superior intellect that seems to rise largely above geographical determinants. Lonely exceptions to this pattern were Guaman Poma de Ayala and El Inca Garcilaso de la Vega. The latter, after a lifetime of attempting to assimilate himself to European norms, proclaimed in the prologue to his monumental work, Comentarios reales de los Incas (Royal Commentaries of the Incas), a spiritual link with his Peruvian patria (homeland). In actual fact, nationalism—understood in the sense of a priority granted to American goals and forms—was not in vogue. Instead, the mutually supporting ideas of monarchy and empire in political thought, scholasticism in religion, and Neoclassicism in literature, joined together in prescribing centralized, Old World norms. This was not to be altered by the advent of Enlightenment ideas that did not challenge universalist structures in the priority now granted to an enshrined Reason. In short, colonial elites had little motivation for challenging the vertical conception of the universe that justified the derivative nature of their institutions and art.

In contrast to what occurred in the United States, political independence for the newly emancipated Hispanic republics in the early decades of the 19th century largely pre-dated the spread of a nationalist consciousness. As a result, the region’s intellectuals and writers emerged into the post-independence period with many previous conceptions largely unmodified. Yet there were changes: local elites increasingly followed British rather than Spanish leadership in the organization of their banking and trade practices; in the realms of philosophy, art and literature, they now emulated French models and condemned “retrograde” Hispanic influences. In spite of these changes, what remained largely unaltered was the doctrinaire nature of their thought. In culture, government, and fashion, their ideas of progress and the good life led them to continue preaching the necessity of imposing Europe-derived structures in the hope of replacing these with the perceived deficiencies in lifestyle and beliefs of the continent’s then largely rural society.

There were exceptions to this diffusionist model, however. In the correspondence of Venezuela’s Simón Bolívar (1783–1830) one finds a passionate expression of the dual ideals of Hispanic American independence and nationhood. In the Río de la Plata region, the highly popular gauchesque verses by Bartolomé Hidalgo (1788–1822) promoted the independence cause among the largely unlettered population and also set a standard for a future national literature by portraying the rural population’s customs, feelings and social types. Similar was the contribution of Mexico’s fiery journalist, José Joaquín Fernández de Lizardi, who defended that country’s struggle for independence through his journalism. He also published what has come to be regarded as Hispanic America’s first novel, El Periquillo Sarniento, 1816 (The Itching Parrot), which attacked Spanish influences and demonstrated sociological awareness of his Mexican homeland.

During the first three to four decades after independence, most Hispanic American republics experienced devastating internecine struggles that usually pitted modernizing urban elites against more traditional rural sectors. Urban intellectuals, the primary porters of the written culture, continued to call for more intimate links with France, Britain, and the centers of what they called civilization. At the same time, they condemned the Hispanic traditions and nativista (localist) art forms of the poncho-clad rural inhabitants.
on account of an anachronistic barbarism. For those elites, cultural parameters were inextricably linked to political criteria. Argentina’s Domingo Faustino Sarmiento, writing in Facundo, 1845 (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants), attacked the dictator Rosas, among other reasons, for the latter’s defence of “the American principle.” The promotion of nationalism, in his eyes, was equivalent to the obstruction of progress and modernity.

The spread of Romantic ideas among Hispanic American elites that began toward the end of the 1830s, accounts at least in part for a change of attitude that made increasingly acceptable the study and literary treatment of national reality. Although Sarmiento and his renowned cohorts of the Argentine Generation of 1837 opposed aspects of an American, or nationalist politics, it was they who expressed most authoritatively the imperative for a truly national orientation in Hispanic Americans’ literary and intellectual endeavors. Yet their advocacy was ambiguous. Esteban Echeverría, the foremost advocate and literary practitioner of this group, urged in Dogma socialista (1838) a fusion of urban and rural, unitarian and federalist, European and American orientations. None did more to disseminate the pragmatic new ideas emanating from European intellectual circles, yet it was he who most strenuously called for a science, a literature, and a government that would be based on the lived experiences and real needs of his countrymen. His disciple, Juan Baustista Alberdi (1810–84), succinctly expressed this thought: “A people must first acquire a philosophy before they can achieve a nationality.”

Under the sign of these ambiguities, the first indications of a national literature began to appear. The poem, “Silva a la agricultura en la zona tórrida,” 1826 [Song to Tropical Agriculture], by the Venezuelan Andrés Bello and Alberdi’s lyrical essay, Memoria descriptiva sobre Tucumán, 1834 [Descriptive Report on Tucumán], although heeding the Romantic call to turn away from the themes of classical antiquity and focus lyrical attention on the beauty of the American landscape, nevertheless betray the Neoclassical orientations of their creators. Echeverría’s long narrative poem, La cautiva, 1837 [The Captive], celebrates the savage American landscape that nearly consumes the Europeanized protagonist, Brián, and his diaphanous consort, María. Sarmiento’s very original character sketches of the pathfinder and the gaucho outlaw appear within a work—Facundo—whose main thrust was an attack on rural society and “American barbarism.”

Advancing into the second half of the century, many countries still suffered from tragic civil struggles between different social, ethnic and racial groups vying for hegemony. In this setting, writing often assumed the advocate’s role of defending the rights of minority groups within the emerging national fabric: Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda (1814–73), wrote Sab to attack slavery and to project a humanized image of Cuba’s black population; the monumental gauchesque poem, Martín Fierro (published in two parts, the first in 1872 and the second in 1879), by José Hernández, attacked the abuses to Argentina’s rural population at the hands of urban society; and Juan León Mera (1832–94) in Cumandá, o, un drama entre salvajes, 1879 [Cumandá or a Drama among Savages], defended the place of indigenous people within a larger conception of Ecuadorian nationality.

By the latter decades of the century, social peace had been gained in the majority of the Hispanic American republics, but often at a terrible price. Now, the militancy of previously rebellious minorities, often rural groups, had been broken, and urban elites were firmly in control of governmental authority. Given this setting, the production of many writers must be viewed, at least in part, as an attempt to legitimize these new social and political realities. Representative literary works sought to "violently forget" recent struggles and disseminate a positive historical memory of earlier pursuits of nationality. In Enríquillo, leyenda histórica dominicana, 1882 (The Cross and the Sword), Manuel de Jesús Galván (1834–1910), embellished the Dominican Republic’s Indian and mestizo origins. In Peru, the historico-literary essays of Tradiciones peruanas (1872–1910), by Ricardo Palma (1833–1919), celebrated the glories of Lima’s colonial past. The literary archeology undertaken by Chile’s Alberto Blest Gana (1830–1920) and Mexico’s Ignacio Manuel Altamirano (1834–93), participated in establishing harmonious views of their respective country’s colonial and early republican past. More political was Uruguay’s Eduardo Acevedo Díaz (1851–1924), whose historical novels had the “revisionist” mission of contradicting previous accounts and highlighting the uniqueness of the early independence leader, José Gervasio Artigas and, as such, his own small country’s contributions to the emancipation struggle. With Tabaré, 1888 (Tabaré: an Indian Legend of Uruguay), mythification approached a fanciful extreme, since Juan Zorrilla de San Martín (1855–1931) projects an Indian and mestizo identity onto Uruguay, a land where the Amerindians had already disappeared.

Evidence of the success enjoyed by the intellectuals in their quest to enhance nationalist sentiment was the wide diffusion in many of the region’s cities—very apparent by the 1890s—of a pulp literature and popular culture celebrating rural or creolist themes. Argentina was the first country to witness the rise of a national theater catering for the aesthetic tastes of all the different social classes, that featured as protagonist the honorable gaucho outlaw, Juan Moreira. Hispanic America’s urban reading public began to favor, for the first time, local writers expounding on mythified or folkloric national themes.

Approaching the end of the century, new historical factors account for yet another wave of nationalist sentiment in the literature of the region. Writers associated with the movement called Modernismo (Spanish American Modernism), in their desire for artistic, philosophical, and spiritual renovation, echoed the material advances and political maturity of their societies. But they also expressed discomfort before a new threat to the region’s political and cultural integrity: the bullish and expansive Anglo-American republic to the north. José Enrique Rodó, in his seminal essay Ariel (1900), communicated the Hispanic Americans’ spiritual superiority—the flipside to their defensive inferiority—in contrast to the crass materialism that reigned in the United States. Similar was the denouncement of Big-Stick imperialist ventures in Panama in poems like “A Roosevelt” [To Roosevelt], by the most outstanding of the region’s Modernist poets, the Nicaraguan Rubén Dario (1867–1919). The crowning effort of this continental wave of indignation was “Nuestra América” (Our America), an essay by Cuba’s José Martí (1853–95) that resonated with passionate pan-Hispanic sentiment.

See also entries on Andrés Bello, Esteban Echeverría, José Martí, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento
Further Reading

Masiello, Francine, Between Civilization and Barbarism: Women, Nation, and Literary Culture in Modern argentina, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992,

Romero, José Luis, Las ideologias de la cultura nacional y otros ensayos, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1981

Négritude

Négritude, sometimes described as “the Afrocentricity of the 1930s,” is the name given to a Black literary movement which, beginning in the 1930s, continued into the 1950s. The movement began among French-speaking Caribbean and African writers, and its leading figures include Aimé Césaire, a Martinican writer; to whom is attributed the first use of the term Négritude, Léopold Senghor, who became the first president of the Republic of Senegal in 1960 and Léon-Gontran Damas (1912–78), from French Guiana.

The Négritude writers held various traits and ideologies in common: they were all Black, from former French colonies and at the time all living in Paris. They were much encouraged by the example of Black Americans in Paris who were involved in asserting their distinctive culture. On the other hand, it was a time when Francophone Blacks still aspired to assimilation. The concept of Négritude evolved between 1933 and 1935 as a protest over thwarted political aspirations. As writers, they felt the need to examine critically Western values and thought, and in so doing they began to reassess Black African culture. They theorized that assimilation was ideological and that the assumption behind it was the inherent superiority of European culture and civilization over its African equivalents. Indeed in some circles (despite the importance given, particularly after World War I, to “primitive” art) it was even assumed that Africa had no history or culture. Thus, their awareness of cultural identity increased as they dwelt on the suffering, mental bondage and humiliation of Black peoples, not only during times of slavery but also under colonial rule.

This inspired in them the following views later expounded in their works: that all Africans and people of colour must look to the richness of their past, to their cultural heritage and in so doing could choose values and traditions invaluable to them in their modern world; that it was the challenge of committed Black writers to exceed the boundaries of the African as subject matter and to infuse their readers with the desire for political freedom and freedom of thought; that Négritude means all aspects of Black African cultural, social, economic and political values and as such the value and dignity of Black African traditions and her peoples must be reasserted; and that African life with its oral tradition and its mystic value would hold its rightful place in literary and cultural circles, especially when compared with the materialism and soullessness of Western culture. In 1934, Senghor, Damas and Césaire co-founded the magazine L’Etudiant Noir [Black Student] and it was Senghor who was later to write the following statement on the methods and objectives of Négritude writers:

Pour asseoir une revolution efficace, notre revolution, il nous fallait d’abord nous débarasser de nos vêtements d’emprunt—ceux de l’assimilation—et affirmer notre être, c’est à dire notre négritude. Cependant la Négritude, même définie comme l’ensemble des valeurs culturelles de l’Afrique noire,’ ne pouvait nous offrir que le début de la solution de notre problème, non la solution elle-même.

[To establish an effective revolution, our own revolution, we first had to cast off our borrowed clothes—the clothes of assimilation—and to assert our being, which meant asserting our négritude. Yet Négritude even when defined as “all the cultural values of black Africa,” could only provide us with the beginnings of a solution to our problem, not the solution itself].

In a sense, the Négritude literary movement was one of the greatest contributions to Black writers the world over as it empowered them. Their stories began to hold meaning for Black readers and others alike. The meanings held importance. The legacies live on, as in the 1990s Black writers, globally, continue to struggle against class inequality, racism, discrimination, and even the environment, as they wrestle to throw off the yokes (both internal and external) of colonialist partisan prejudice and discrimination.

NICOLE ROBERTS

See also the entries on Aimé Césaire, Francophone West Indies, La Revue du Monde Noir under Journals

Further Reading

Critical Works [Aimé Césaire’s Discours sur le colonialisme is essential reading]
Depestre, René, Bonjour et adieu à la négritude: travaux d’identité, Paris: Laffont, 1980
Piquion, René, Les Trois grands de la négritude, Damas, Césaire, Senghor, Port-au-Prince: Henri Deschamps, 1964
——Liberté, 5 vols, 1964–93:
   ———Ce que je Crois, négritude, francité et civilisation de l’universel, Paris: Grasset, 1988

Works by creative writers [(except Césaire, who has a separate entry)]
Damas, Léon-Gontran, Retour de Guyane, 1938
   ———Poèmes nègres sur des airs africains, Paris: GLM, 1948
   ———Graffiti, Paris: Seghers, 1952
   ———Black Label, poèmes, Paris: Gallimard, 1956
   ———Hosties noires, Paris: Seuil, 1948
   ———Chants pour Naett, Paris: Seghers, 1949
   ———Ethiopiques, Paris: Seuil, 1956
   ———Nocturnes, Paris: Seuil, 1961
   ———Poèmes, Paris: Seuil, 1964
   ———Lettres d’hivernage, Paris: Seuil, 1973

Pablo Neruda 1904–1973

Chilean poet

Among the most prolific of Latin American poets, Pablo Neruda was and arguably is the most widely read of the Spanish American poets. Indeed, operating within the domain of a notoriously esoteric and elitist genre, Neruda managed, more than any other Latin American poet to date, to popularize poetry. His Veinte poemas de amor y una canción desesperada, 1924 (Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair), alone has sold over a million copies since it first appeared in print. On the one hand, this unusual cultural phenomenon was largely due to Neruda’s background; on the other hand, it was a result of his involvement in national and international politics.

The son of a railroad worker, Neruda was born and raised in rural southern Chile, where he developed a keen interest, that would last his entire life, in natural phenomena: the sea and forest would always be generators for his poetry. However, nature would never be static or idyllic; nor would it be a romantic refuge from society. Even in his early poetry—Crepusculario, 1923 [Where Twilight Dwells], El hondero entusiasta [The Enthusiastic Diver], written in 1923, and Veinte poemas de amor—Neruda depicts nature’s energy and movement and his insatiable desire to portray the material world’s complexity. However, it is also a source of anxiety and sadness for him. The poet had the opportunity to live in southern Chile at the very historical moment when the industrialization of the countryside was taking place, and his father’s work placed Neruda the child at the axis of these socio-economic changes. His father’s work on the railroad as well in the lumber industry, furnished the young poet with a special vantage point for appreciating the conflicts that that socio-economic development wrought in a rural region in which the indigenous (Araucan) population had been exterminated. Nevertheless, Neruda’s early poetry is also marked by a Romantic and abstract search for conjugal love. In Crepusculario and El hondero entusiasta, and even in Veinte poemas, clearly he is searching for an earthly Ideal, so he cannot consummate his passion. One could maintain that erotic passion becomes entwined with the conscious desire to express the natural and social environment that surrounds him in language.

Two volumes of poetry written from 1925 to 1935, Residencia en la tierra (Residence on Earth), represent a qualitative leap with respect to his previous poetic production. These works are punctuated with constant references to the anguish or “ennui” of existence (as a reading of “Walking Around” attests) and to the menacing effects of an omnipresent nature. Since Neruda was always prone to be a critical realist at heart, it is difficult, if not impossible, to interpret this poetry as anything other than a real, largely autobiographical testimony of his social condition in the Orient. Having become part of the underpaid Chilean diplomatic corps in the Orient, and working variously in Rangoon, Ceylon, Java and Singapore, Neruda—as his poetry of these years and his memoirs affirm—felt alienated because he was neither a representative of the British Empire in the Orient nor a natural citizen of these regions, he could not speak the native languages nor English fluently, his position as a bureaucrat was dreadfully boring, the socio-economic exploitation of the population by the ruling class and the British was brutal, and the climate was suffocating him. In the Residencias, time and death become obsessively destructive in exercising their dominion over the human subject. Until the second half of the book two, nature is an autonomous, creative, and destructive force with which the poetic speaker cannot identify. The frailty of human life and the incessant movement of nature horrifies Neruda. The poet sees his own existence objectified before him in nature. This proved to be very a valuable and humbling experience that allowed the poet—especially after 1935—to question the guiding principles of art under capitalism. Although his early participation in anarchist activities in Chile certainly played a key role here, from this moment on, the ivory tower that bourgeois society offers its literati, did not seduce him.

It is worth noting that at the end of this period of nostalgia and social alienation, specifically in “Entrada a la madera” (Opening to Wood), Neruda came to grips with the situation: nature, from that moment on, became a source of amazement and discovery rather than an antagonist. Significantly, these “Tres cantos materiales” (Three Material Songs)—of which “Entrada a la madera” is a part—were first published in Spain, where Neruda had arrived as the new consul of Barcelona and, a few months later, Madrid. This biographical material is indispensable in order to understand the next phase in Neruda’s poetic work. For the poet arrived in Spain the same year that miners in Asturias took political power and set up a commune for ten days in this northern province. This was a period of increasing class conflict between the rural bourgeoisie, the Catholic Church, and the military on the one hand, and, the liberal, Socialist, and Communist working and middle classes on the other hand. Neruda stayed in Madrid until late 1936, when he was discharged from his post as consul, and when the Spanish Civil War intensified.

Published on Republican territory during the war against fascism, España en el corazón [Spain in the Heart]—originally published in Chile in 1937—was the product of Neruda’s open engagement with progressive and leftist political causes. A landmark in his oeuvre, in this book Neruda documented the central conflicts taking place in the Iberian peninsula. Thus, he dedicates several poems to specific battles (such as “El Jarama” [The Jarama River]), blistering critiques of the Nationalists, the socio-economic causes that had led to the war, and the dehumanization of war caused by the Nationalists. In sum, the socio-political, and even existential or ontological dimensions, and Neruda’s own perseverance challenged the alienation that plagued him so in the Residencias. The poet became a participant and writer of a Neorealist account of the making of history.

España en el corazón acts as a bridge between the Neruda of the Residencias and his magnum opus, Canto general, 1950 (Residence on Earth). In the intervening years, from 1937 to 1949, Neruda published relatively little compared to other moments in his life because he participated very actively in progressive and leftist politics. Having left Spain for France, he began coordinating support among the intelligentsia for the Republican cause. Moreover, he organized a mission to ship Spanish refugees to Chile during the waning moments of the civil war. Once he arrived in Chile he worked busily for the Popular Front’s presidential campaign, which triumphed in 1938.

Beginning in 1940 he spent three years in Mexico as a consul once again. Surrounded by left-wing artists and writers in Mexico under the progressive Lázaro Cárdenas regime, and concerned by the strength of fascism in Europe, Neruda’s political consciousness underwent another qualitative leap, expressed in his “Canto de amor a Stalingrado” (A Love Song for Stalingrad) and “Nuevo canto de amor a Stalingrado” (A New Love Song for Stalingrad). For Neruda, as for many other left-wing intellectuals, the fight against Franco’s Nationalist forces became an integral part of the struggle against fascism worldwide. These two poems, which the poet read in public in Mexico, narrate the defence of the Soviet Union against the invading German armies and they suggest the degree to which Neruda committed himself to socialism. Unsurprisingly, then, after returning to Chile Neruda joined the Communist Party in 1945, a few months after he was elected senator for the mining area of northern Chile. Thus, during these years Neruda’s commitment to humanitarian and socialist causes deepens.

Canto general, then, is the culmination of this period of increased political activity and awareness. This book is an attempt to re-write Latin American history from the vantage point of the oppressed, beginning with the American continent’s indigenous civilizations, extending to the brutality of the conquest, the wars of independence, leading up to the various dictatorships established in the 1930s and 1940s, and the resistance to them on the part of peasants and workers. Neruda’s poetic method in this work underwent a significant transformation as did the conception of poetry in Latin America. Canto general is a tour de force that depends on a great deal of knowledge about Latin American geography, history and politics, all of which is represented in particular and general abstractions that illuminate the driving forces at work in the region. While it is true that Neruda’s unique poetry—like that of Ernesto Cardenal—is capable of approximating the socio-historical developments in a Neorealist form, it is also true that Neruda’s work acquires a philosophical depth that surpasses that of his earlier books of poetry. Throughout Canto general, but especially in the cases of “Alturas de Macchu Picchu” (The Heights of Macchu Picchu) and “La tierra se llama Juan” (The Earth’s Name is John), Neruda discovers that labor is the driving instrument of history. Human labor is the materialization of culture from the Inca, Maya and Aztec civilizations to reformist capitalist states in the 1940s. Hence, Neruda valorizes the peasant and worker as the architects of Latin American history. In maintaining this, the poet refuses to accept as legitimate the division of labor and the privileging of intellectual over manual labor in capitalism. It follows that workers’ economic and political power would be the basis of an egalitarian society.

This is a theme that he continues to develop in his three volumes of odes, Odas elementales, 1954 (Elemental Odes), Nuevas odas elementales, 1956 and Tercer libro de las odas, 1957. However, Neruda shifts the focus in the works from a historical-geographical panorama of Latin America, to a philosophical meditation on the productivity of nature and human beings, including an account of how the latter transforms the former into labor. So, in short verses and long poems, he dedicates odes to the atom or to the onion with the intent of learning more about the universe and nature, a learning process that we can appreciate as readers. While Neruda still concentrates on the central role that labor has to play in human society—seen for instance in “El hombre invisible” (The Invisible Man)—poetry’s obligation is to attempt to write (a labor) history. The poet (the “hombre invisible” or “hombre sencillo”) [the invisible or humble man] is a worker; he is not a privileged spokesperson for society, nor a high priest of culture. Most importantly, in the Odas elementales, to the chagrin of many (though not all) critics, the language is realist, it is tangible, it is readable. Few intellectuals and artists of any political persuasion in Latin America have been able to meditate philosophically through the medium of a language accessible to most people, but this is Neruda’s great achievement in the Odas.

It is important to touch on one last work in Neruda’s long list of poetic productions, which sets the tone for the rest of his books—even though almost every one of his works renews his world view and his poetic theory. As in the case of most Communists in the world, Neruda was deeply shaken by Khrushchev’s revelation of the crimes committed during the Stalin regime in the Soviet Union. Extravagario, 1958 (Extravagaria), published two years after the Twentieth Party Congress, represents a notable change in the tone and themes in Neruda’s poetic repertoire. Nature, time, death and solitude take center stage again in his poetry. The poet turns inward in an attempt to rediscover his youth: the fragility of human existence, the limitations of human knowledge, the tragically contradictory nature of society and history. Unlike his previous works, humor and questions also play a central role in Extravagario. Yet this is clearly a hiatus in his work, a time for rethinking and self-criticising his Marxist beliefs while presenting the reader with a purview on his view of daily life and our own mortality.

GREG DAWES

Biography

Born Neftalí Ricardo Reyes Basoalto in Parral, Chile, 12 July 1904; Pablo Neruda became his legal name, 1946. Attended a school for boys in Temuco, 1910–20; Instituto Pedagógico, Santiago in the 1920s. Married María Antonieta Hagenaar in 1930 (separated 1936), one daughter. Lived with the Argentine painter Delia del Carril in the 1930s and 1940s; she encouraged his interest in the politics of the Left. They married in 1943, but the marriage was not recognized in Chile, separated, 1955. Married the Chilean singer Matilde Urrutia in 1966. In Chilean consular and diplomatic service: consul in Rangoon, 1927, Colombo, 1928, Batavia, 1930, Singapore, 1931. This was a very depressing period of his life. Consul in Buenos Aires, 1933, Barcelona, 1933, Madrid, 1935–36; had to resign from this post because he sided with the Spanish Republicans. As consul in Paris, 1939, helped Spanish refugees by re-settling them in Chile; Consul-General, Mexico City, 1940–43; elected to Chilean Senate as member of the Communist Party, 1945; attacked President González Videla in print, and was in exile after 1947; returned to Chile after the victory of the anti-Videla forces, 1952. After Salvador Allende was elected President in 1970, named Ambassador to France, 1971–72 (resigned because of ill health). Co-editor, with Manuel Altolaguirre, Caballo Verde para la Poesía, Spain, 1935–36, and Aurora de Chile, 1938. Member of the World Peace Council, from 1950 and President of the Union of Chilean Writers, 1957–73. Recipient of numerous awards including: National Literature Prize, 1945; Stalin Peace Prize, 1953; ViareggioVersilia Prize for cultural understanding, 1967; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1971. Died of cancer on 23 September 1973. His death was probably accelerated by the Pinochet coup earlier that month.

Selected Works

Poetry

Crepusculario, Santiago de Chile: Claridad, 1923

Anillos, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1926

Tentativa del hombre infinito, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1926

El hondero entusiasta, Santiago de Chile: Empresa Letras de Santiago, 1933

Residencia en la tierra (1925–1931), Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1933

España en el corazón: himno a las glorias del pueblo en la guerra 1936–1937, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1937

Tercera residencia, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1947

Los versos del capitán: poemas de amor, privately printed, 1952; as The Captain’s Verses, translated by Donald D.Walsh, New York: New Directions, 1972

Las uvas y el viento, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1954

Nuevas odas elementales, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1956

Tercer libro de las odas, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1957

Navegaciones y regresos, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1959

Las piedras de Chile, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1960; as Stones of Chile, translated by Dennis Maloney, Fredonia, New York: White Pine Press, 1986
Cantos ceremoniales, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1960
Arte de pájaros, privately printed, 1966; as Art of Birds, translated by Jack Schmitt, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985
Las manos del día, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1968
Fin del mundo, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1969
La espada encendida, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1970
Geografía infructuosa, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1972
El mar y las campanas, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1974; as The Sea and the Bells, translated by William O’Daly, Port Townsend, Washington: Copper Canyon Press, 1988
Elegía, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1974
El corazón amarillo, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1974
El libro de preguntas, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1974
Jardín de invierno, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1974; as Winter Garden, translated by William O’Daly, Port Townsend, Washington: Copper Canyon Press, 1986
La rosa separada, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1974; as The Separate Rose, translated by William O’Daly, Port Townsend, Washington: Copper Canyon Press, 1985
Defectos escogidos, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1974
El fin del viaje, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1982,

Anthologies of Poetry in Translation
Selected Poems, translated by Ángel Flores, privately printed, 1944
Selected Poems, translated by Ben Belitt, New York: Grove Press, 1961

Play

Other Writings
Comiendo en Hungría, in collaboration with Miguel Ángel Asturias, Barcelona: Lumen, 1969; as Sentimental Journey around the Hungarian Cuisine, translated by Barna Balogh, 1969 [poetry and illustrations]

Compilations and Anthologies
Poesía política: discursos políticos, 2 vols, Santiago de Chile: Austral, 1953

Further Reading
Rodríguez Monegal, Emir and Enrico Mario Santi (editors), Pablo Neruda. Madrid: Taurus, 1980

Bibliography
Alturas de Macchu Picchu

Canto II of Pablo Neruda’s Canto general

“Alturas de Macchu Picchu” postulates, in a lengthy poem with twelve different functioning units or sections, a new conception of poetry in the Latin American context. In this new poetics the borderline traditionally dividing poetry from history and politics is effectively erased, so that poetry becomes yet another vehicle for acquiring knowledge about the world. Yet this position does not involve any exaltation of the place of poetry as a form of expression that is somehow more “pure” or privileged than others. On the contrary, after 1935, Neruda always associates poetry with other forms of human labor, especially manual labor. Manual work maintains a direct contact with nature and transforms it. From Neruda’s Marxist point of view, labor is the foundation of human societies, and laborers are its architects. Ironically, the prevailing ideas of bourgeois revolutions—especially the French and American examples—are based on a fundamental belief in core human equality, yet capitalism produces equalities that give credence to the writings of the Enlightenment, but it also generates acute social and economic inequalities that contradict the rhetoric of the American and French Revolutions. Infused by Social Darwinist ideas, capitalism tends to portray the existing class differences and conflicts as something natural. In this way the economic benefits accrued by the capitalists at the expense of the working population, are deemed to be intrinsically part of human nature. Neruda’s materialist philosophy and social analysis, expressed succinctly in “Alturas de Macchu Picchu,” argues that Social Darwinism distorts human nature—which is always changing and open—on the level of social analysis so that the interests of the ruling class take precedent over those of working people, when the reverse should be true.

What makes Neruda’s case particularly interesting, is that his poetry up to 1935, consists of a double movement. On the one hand, his underdeveloped poetic theory recorded his own individual misery due to social and economic alienation in the Orient. Following in the tracks of bourgeois aesthetics, the socio-historical factors that lead the poetic speaker to wallow in his solitude appear only as indirect causes. His creed, as it appears in section II, was: “mátala y agonízala con papel y con odio” (kill and agonize it with paper and hate). On the other hand, Neruda endeavors to record this alienating period in his life as vividly as possible. So it is that, paradoxically, his struggle with his own mortality, with the objectivity of time, and with his own social alienation provides the impetus for him to discover the materialist grounding of our existence as human beings:

```plaintext hundí la mano turbulenta y dulce en lo más genital de lo terrestre
Puse la frente entre las olas profundas descendí como gota entre la paz sulfúrica y, como un ciego, regresé al jazmín de la gastada primavera.
```
[I plunged my turbulent and sweet hand/into the most earthly reproductive organs/I placed my forehead among the deep waves/I descended like a water drop among the sulphuric peace/and, like a blind man, I returned to the jasmin/of the worn human spring.]

The speaker’s senses serve as the guides to discover his place in nature and his own mortality. Yet, according to Neruda’s account, from 1925 to 1935 particularly, he is blind because he carried out this ontological search while overlooking the decisive importance of human nature. Indeed, as he indicates at the end of sections II and V, this poetic theory and practice only enable him to seize a partial, masked purview of society. The protagonist perceives the effects of human suffering due to our mortality as a species, but he cannot discern the social factors that impede human flourishing (such as a core human equality).

However, section VI, signals a decisive moment in this poetic autobiography. Visiting the Incan ruins of Macchu Picchu in Peru allows Neruda to speculate about the direction of his poetry after 1935. It is by recognizing the central significance of manual labor in the construction of the ruins and of Incan civilization that Neruda begins to conceive his own traditionally intellectual labor—according to bourgeois society—as manual labor:

Miro las vestiduras y las manos el vestigio del agua en la oquedad sonora la pared suavizada por el tacto de un rostro que miró con mis ojos las lámparas terrestres que aceitó con mis manos las desparecidas maderas: porque todo, ropaje, piel, vasijas palabras, vino, panes se fue, cayó a la tierra.

[We can benefit from two decisive insights here. First, the speaker observes and reflects on the grandeur of this labor (the ruins), and not on the destruction wrought by the Spanish conquest of the Incan empire. He identifies himself and confuses his own destiny with the vanquished, not the conquerors (thus, he states that an Incan “miró con mis ojos” [looked with my eyes]). Second, the Incans’ manual labor leaves traces of their history on] the product of their labor. Engraved with the Inca’s own social authorship, the architecture, becomes ruins due to the conquest. These structures are the social and the sensual (i.e., of the senses) result of their work. Thus, in examining this architectural landscape, Neruda pays homage to the Inca laborers (the slave, the serf, the miserable one, as he underscores it in section X) and not to the Inca monarchy.

As a vital residue of the Inca civilization, the ruins, fruit of Inca labor, have their own forgotten version of history to tell. The shape, surface, and texture of the stones, as well as their architectural arrangement, attest to the mores and values of Inca civilization and to the labor of their authors. In spite of the existence of a nobility during the Inca empire, Neruda notes that the society was collective in its orientation: “la ciudad como un vaso se levantó en las manos/de todos” (section VII) (the city like a cup was raised in the hands of all) and generally egalitarian when compared to other social systems. The Spanish conquerors thought that they had erased Inca history by subjugating and destroying the fabric of their civilization and by murdering its inhabitants and dismantling its cities. However, Neruda makes it clear that the regenerating vestiges of this destruction contain their own history, embodied in Machu Picchu. While the vanquished appear to be silenced, Neruda suggests in section VIII that, if one investigates further, there is an Inca version of history to be told if one can interpret the socio-historical and anthropological signs. In sections VIII through XII the poet pleads with Incas to reveal to him this buried history, a history which Neruda reconstructs in the rest of the Canto general as a complex and conflictive struggle between classes, individual destinies within the social context, and developed and underdeveloped nations. Re-examining Inca civilization from the point of view of the oppressed enables him to rewrite the central struggles in Latin American history.

This meditation on history is also a reflection on poetry. As regards the form, the poet’s method at this stage of his work is not unlike that prior to 1936. Conscious empiricism continues to be the source for discoveries about human nature. However, from 1936 on, the content of Neruda’s poetry reflects his capacity to encompass and approximate our knowledge in various fields. On the basis of his own reading as well as his personal and political experience, he is able to adduce various central characteristics about the human species, society (specifically capitalism), history, and universal laws. This method allows Neruda to analyze the internal relations that exist among these fields of human knowledge.

Neruda’s poetics also parts company with many of his contemporaries by acting as a vessel for those who create value in capitalism: the laborers. In section XII of “Alturas de Macchu Picchu,” Neruda recuperates and reconstructs a history of Inca civilization based on the works and lives of the oppressed. This he does with inordinate interest in objective and subjective detail: “contadme todo, cadena a cadena,/ eslabón a eslabón, y paso a paso” (tell me everything, chain by chain, link by link, and step by step). The poet’s own empowerment, then, does not come, as it does in bourgeois society, from his favored class (and social) position, in which he attempts to instruct the “masses” on societal and moral values. Rather, the poet like any other worker, attempts to learn from his fellow workers, from their transformation and construction of history. Challenging the notion of the division of labor, Neruda pleads with the Incas to “habladme toda esta larga noche/como si yo estuviera con vosotros anclado” (speak to me all this long night/as if I were anchored with you).
Editions

First edition: Canto general, Mexico City: Océano, 1950

Further Reading

Nicaragua

19th- and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

In the 19th and 20th centuries—arguably up to 1979—Nicaragua’s sovereignty was constantly in jeopardy due to the presence of British and American financial and strategic interests. Largely because of those interests Nicaragua was an underpopulated, underproductive agricultural nation dominated by oligarchies. Compared to other Central American countries it suffered from a lack of specialization and investment concentrated in agricultural products. The persistent vying for political power that took place between León liberals and Granada conservatives reflected the interests of town versus country to be sure, but the bourgeoisie had not managed to develop fully as a class and, consequently, always needed to contest the power of the landowners. In this context the arts suffered from unproduction. Until the last fifteen years, poetry, a concise and brief literary form compared to other genres, was the main arena of cultural activity.

Paradoxically, 19th-century Nicaraguan literature was dominated by one of Latin America’s most heralded poets of this period, Rubén Darío (1867–1916). Having grown up in one of the most underdeveloped countries in Latin America, this well-traveled poet would become the spokesperson for the modernista literary movement, which had to grapple with the impact of European and US imperialism in the hemisphere. Where the Romantic and Neoromantic poets had chosen to emulate European literary form and content in the mid- to late 19th century, Darío wanted to imitate Symbolist and Parnassian poetry to perfection and then create a uniquely Latin American literary identity.

His poetic works can be judged as contradictory attempts to come to grips with the onslaught of modernity which, for Dario, can be both attractive and inhumane. Thus, in “A Roosevelt,” from Cantos de vida y esperanza, 1905 [Songs of Life and Hope], he assailed the US version of modernity which places economic gain above all else. By meddling in Latin American affairs North Americans, he charged, unite the “cult of Hercules with the cult of Mammon.” Yet in this and other cases, Darío upholds anachronistic values—the traditional beliefs of Catholicism for instance—in the face of US capitalist industrialization.

Darío turned to spirituality to defend his values against the advance of modernity in the hemisphere. Poetry protects its own territory from the sciences by becoming self-reflexive, by highlighting the formal specificities of the genre for fear that the content will be invaded by the new. However, Darío distinguished between European and US influence. The United States was “Primitive and modern, simple and complicated” because of its lack of history—relative to Europe and Latin America—and its one-dimensional pragmatism which did not valorize religion and art. Unlike the United States, Darío maintained, France had found a place for the artist. He was particularly influenced by transcendental symbolism—Mallarmé, Valéry and Verlaine—precisely because it seemed to unite religious beliefs with art and because, in so doing, it sidestepped the fundamental and stark realities of industrialization.

Darío’s first major work, written in a Europeanized and relatively modern Chile, Azul, 1888 [Blue], established a similar dichotomy between daily life and the realm of art. In “El velo de la reina Mab” [Queen Mab’s Veil] he interweaves scenes of various artisans/artists who attempt to persuade Queen Mab of their virtue, a virtue which is directly connected to their insatiable search for the Ideal. In spite of its attempt to shun everyday life, the very purpose of the story arises from the marginal status art occupied at the turn of the century in Latin America. If the artist was unable to find a wealthy patron, then he was forced to work as a journalist and eek out a living. For all its parading of the Classical tradition and the virtues of sculpture, painting, music, the narration returns to Darío’s dilemma in the late 1900s: “Yo escribiría algo inmortal; mas me abruma un porvenir de miseria y de hambre” (I would write something immortal; but a future of hunger and misery overwhelms me).

The next major literary period was the “vanguardia” (avantgarde), which included José Coronel Urtecho (1906–), Manolo Cuadra (1907–57), Joaquín Zavala Urtecho (1910–71), Pablo Antonio Cuadra (1912–), Luis Alberto Cabrales (1901–74), Luis Downing (1914–) and Joaquín Pasos (1914–47). All were from oligarchical families living in Granada who had held conservative political convictions. Ultra-nationalist and firmly Catholic, the vanguardistas both followed in the footsteps of and took issue with Rubén Darío’s work. They shared his general belief in the primary importance of art—which, here too, attained a religious aura—and in the urgency of modernization. But they claimed to break with Darío’s anachronistic ideas: the reliance on Classical myths, precious images and monarchist ideas. In its place one vanguardist tendency, led by Pablo Antonio Cuadra—whose Poemas nicaragüenses, 1934 [Nicaraguan Poems] was this movement’s most salient work—attempted to incorporate popular songs, lyrics, legends and indigenous history into the conversational poetry they wrote. Influenced by the New American Poetry and by the French poets Apollinaire, Paul Claudel and Jules Supervielle, another tendency, led principally by Coronel Urtecho and Pasos, practiced a type of Futurist and Dadaist poetry in which free verse was the formal vehicle. Both currents in this vanguard, however, were generally united in their political and aesthetic persuasions. They wanted to express “Nicaraguanness” through Catholic faith and Castilian language. While the indigenous past was something they cherished, they also fully accepted their Spanish heritage.

The vanguardistas felt that the bourgeoisie could be the socio-economic agent of Nicaraguan development, but its anachronistic ideas and values held it back. Since for the members of this group, modernization necessarily involved a spiritual or ethical transformation as well—where art was seen as playing a fundamental role—they ridiculed the bourgeoisie’s pecuniary obsession, its individualism, apathy and anti-intellectualism. At various moments their political ideology wavered between fascism, monarchism and populism (where the model was, ironically, Augusto Sandino’s national liberation movement during the US occupation of Nicaragua). With very few exceptions the vanguardista members ended up supporting Somoza García’s rise to power as a military figure and later as the actual or de facto dictator of Nicaragua from 1936 to 1956.

Pablo Antonio Cuadra would go on to become one of Nicaragua’s most revered poets and most imposing cultural figures. Having held key posts on Nicaragua’s most important mainstream newspaper, La Prensa [The Press] and on the editorial board of El pez y la serpiente [The Fish and the Serpent]—a significant publishing house for creating writing—Cuadra has had more of an impact on Nicaraguan literati than any other poet except Ernesto Cardenal. As his Poemas nicaragüenses attest, in traveling abroad Cuadra seemed to lose a sense of himself in the geographical and historical differences that he encountered. His search for meaning continued in Canto temporal, 1943 [Temporal Song], written, ironically when Cuadra had become a partisan of fascism in Europe and Central America. Yet the themes that fill this book of poetry point to the isolation and despair of the speaker. He emerged out of this crisis by becoming more devoutly Catholic. Libro de horas, 1946 [Book of Hours] expressed his renewed religious convictions very well. Canto temporal had already signaled his commitment to traditional Christian values, but Libro de horas clearly marked his return to morals and to a religious conception of art: the poet becomes a prophetic figure.

In the next decade Cuadra published three works of poetry. Poemas con un crespiñculo a cuestas, 1949 [Poems with Dusk on My Back] was even more introspective and self-congratulatory than his previous books. In poems like “Pablo y Antonio” he gave primacy to a prophetic view of the poet and his creation once again, while exalting Catholic moral values. Written coterminously with Ernesto Cardenal’s Epigramas, Cuadra’s book by the same title, composed between 1957 and 1963, also critiques the authoritarianism of the Somoza dictatorship. However, Cuadra’s most significant work during the 1950s and 1960s is El jaguar y la luna, 1958 (The Jaguar and the Moon). Based on extensive research and reading on the ancient Central American Maya and Aztec mythology and history, this book recovers these cultural roots while referring to then contemporary socio-political matters, such as the ruthlessness of the military dictatorship. In Cantos de Cifar y del mar dulce, 1969 (Songs of Cifar and the Sweet Sea) the poet relies on the epic tradition as the basis of his poetry, expressing himself through carpe diem, political and metapoetic theme It is perhaps Esos rostros que asoman en la multiitud, 1964 [Those Faces that Become Visible in the Crowd] that constituted Cuadra’s most committed efforts to make popular songs, lyrics, and stories part of his poetic corpus while taking a firmer stand against the United States’ support of the Somoza regime. It marks most clearly a transformation in his political beliefs: he was then an ardent supporter of liberalism and an opponent of US imperialism. Siete árboles contra el atardecer, 1977 [Seven Trees against the Sunset] revisited many of the themes brought up in Esos rostros. Written during a much more intense socio-political time, when the Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN) was waging guerrilla warfare against the Somoza regime, this work deepens Cuadra’s historical research into the ancient Maya seeds of liberation. Like El jaguar y la luna, it interweaves the ancient struggles for social justice with those mapped out in Nicaragua just prior to the Revolution of 1979. By contrast, Tun—la ronda del año, 1988 [Tun—as the Year Passes], pointed to his adherence to liberalism and his disenchantment with the revolutionary Sandinista government. The poet appears as a messianic figure, and art the domain from which to critique society’s ills. Poetry itself surfaces from nature in a mysterious way and serves as the area in which a “democratic” alternative to “authoritarianism” can be elaborated.

Ernesto Cardenal (1925–), Carlos Martínez Rivas (1924–) and Ernesto Mejía Sánchez (1923–85), or the generation of the 1940s, perhaps had the most significant impact on Latin American literature of any Nicaraguan literary figures since Rubén Darío. With García Somoza still in power during this period, the economic modernization that had taken place had benefited the oligarchy and the bourgeoisie while creating little space or hope for culture. Influenced by periods spent in Europe, this generation either avoided the problems dictatorship posed, or they critiqued it. Martínez Rivas composed his La insurrección solitaria, 1953 [Solitary Insurrection] in Paris, where he visited Surrealists, became associated with Octavio Paz and became engulfed in a type of Christian existentialism. In the post-World War II era of despair, in which he perceived the disappearance of the individual, the poet turned to Christianity as the only redeeming hope. Other-worldly belief, which connects with Dario’s Platonism, pervades this poetry. When it comes into contact with daily life—which becomes a penance—it searches out contemplative perfection and purity in the sexist image of “woman.”

Working in the late 1940s Mejía Sánchez began to develop very intense and brief poetic poems. La carne contigua, 1948 [Contiguous Flesh] dealt with the family and its relation to society, principally via the question of incest. Several works in the 1950s, La impureza [Impurity], written in 1950, published in 1972; El retorno, 1950 [The Return], and Contemplaciones europeas, 1957 [European Contemplations] showed the poet’s mastery of word play and verbal allusions while underscoring such themes as solitude, purity, good and evil, the importance of human love, the crucifixion, the passage of time, the joy of life and poetry itself. Mejía Sánchez took a moral stance in the face of social injustice in his poetry and personally when he opposed the Somoza dictatorship in the 1950s.

Regarded as one of Latin America’s outstanding poets, Cardenal wrote a more socially committed poetry at around the same historical period. He studied at Columbia University in New York and later became a Trappist monk in Gethsemani, Kentucky, where his life changed dramatically thanks to Thomas Merton, an influential theologian in the 1960s who was his mentor in the monastery. In his Epigramas (1961), Cardenal employed this concise Roman poetic form to denounce the dictatorship of Somoza Debyal and to write love poems. This book is highlighted by ingenious word play and syntactical inversions which help underscore the political content.

Gethsemani, Kentucky (1960) and Salmos, 1964 (Psalms), are products of Cardenal’s religious conversion. Consisting of a series of short and dense poems, the first work counterposes Trappist collective life to life under multinational capitalism, underlining the waste, competition and alienation that the system produces for most of the world’s inhabitants. Psalms marks one further step toward left-wing politics and Liberation Theology. Having lived with Camilo Torres in Colombia and spent time in Cuernavaca, Mexico—both havens for radical theology during these years—Cardenal came to recognize more clearly the affinities between Christianity and socialism. In El estrecho dudoso, 1966 (The Doubtful Strait) and Homenaje a los indios americanos, 1969 (Homage to the American Indians), Cardenal presents well-documented and researched material in narrative poems. Both books could be seen as anthropological, historical, theological and poetic tracts on native American life before and after the conquest. A significant advance in Cardenal’s thinking is evidenced in Canto nacional, 1973 [National Song]. Using various film techniques, the poet interlaces his texts with references to history, politics, and plant and animal life in order to trace the struggle against the Somoza dictatorship and for national (and socialist) liberation in Nicaragua.

After a long period of belief in non-violence, the Christian base community Cardenal helped found, Solentiname, became involved in the national liberation struggle, which led to the assassination of several of the community’s members and the destruction of the community. In 1979 when the Sandinista popular Revolution triumphed, Cardenal was made Minister of Culture. His own poetic production suffered somewhat, but popular poetry workshops, in which peasants, workers and soldiers participated sprung up all over revolutionary Nicaragua with the support of the Ministry of Culture. A major democratization of the political, economic and cultural realms took place during these years, especially between 1979 and 1988.

In the meantime Cardenal published a book of short poems, Vuelos de victoria, 1984 (Flights of Victory), which interweaves revolutionary, theological and evolutionary ideas. Basing his poetry on scrupulous scientific research, and collaborating his radical reading of the Bible with his Marxist understanding of political and economic systems, Flights of Victory could be regarded as the prelude to Cardenal’s latest masterpiece, Cántico cósmico, 1989 (Cosmic Canticle), which explores these issues in a complex 600-page epic poem. In contrast to the notorious division between science and poetry, where critics and poets alike consider poetry to be the realm of subjectivity and irrationalism in opposition to the “objective rationality” of the sciences, Cardenal breaks down the barriers between these two spheres of human knowledge much as he had done with history and poetry.

Relegated to a marginal status in literary circles prior to the Sandinista Revolution in spite of the growth and size of the women’s movement in Nicaragua, works published by women dramatically increased in number after 1979. Two very different yet indispensable forerunners to the literary production during the Revolution are Michele Najlis (1946–) and Ana Ilce Gómez (1945–). Najlis’s El viento armado, 1969 [The Armed Wind] was composed in the midst of the struggle against the Somoza regime and US imperialism. Following the “personal politics” of the 1960s, Najlis suggested that individual liberation enables one to become committed to other socio-political causes. Since 1969, Najlis has published Augurios, 1981 [Augury], a didactic social poetry which reflects on the impact of the Revolution, and Ars combinatoria (1988), which is a highly experimental, heterogeneous poetic text that combines fables, short narratives and prose.
A poet of equal stature, but less explicitly political, Ana Ilce Gómez gained the immediate respect of critics and poets with the publication of Las ceremonias del silencio, 1975 [The Silent Ceremonies]. As a subtle meditation on sexism and the exploitation of women in patriarchal Nicaragua—a reading which seems to escape every male critic and poet—Las ceremonias del silencio documents the secondary status that women were and are relegated to in Nicaragua. Women reproduce socially (housework) and biologically but this is not judged by patriarchy to be essential, socially vital work. Ilce attacks this sexism in her haunting portraits of alienated women who can only find emptiness when they search for social recognition or family love.

The thematic traces of the poetry of Najlis and Ilce can be identified in the poetic and narrative works of Gioconda Belli (1948–), although Belli writes more openly about and poeticizes women’s sexuality. Belli’s first book of poetry, Sobre la grama, 1974 [On the Grass] represents the hypocrisy of male sexism in Nicaragua. In 1978 Belli won the Casa de las Américas poetry prize for Línea de fuego [Line of Fire], which made a more explicit link between sexual liberation and Sandinista political beliefs. These poems make public—for the first time in verse—the pleasures of sex and eroticism from a woman’s point of view; the personal anguish she felt due to the political repression and its effect on her family; and the manner in which her own “individual” stances unite with her Sandinista populist socialism. These two themes are even more successfully intertwined in De la costilla de Eva, 1987 (From Eve’s Rib). Here too the reader encounters physical descriptions of love scenes from a woman’s vantage point. But Belli also denounces US-sponsored atrocities in Nicaragua with a socially justified moralism. Since 1987, Belli has dedicated herself completely to writing novels. La mujer habitada, 1988 (The Inhabited Woman), deals with the participation of women in the armed struggle in the years leading up to the Revolution. Lavinia, the protagonist, breaks out of the role traditionally assigned to wives and lovers of guerrillas by joining and participating in the organization. Belli’s second novel, Sofía de los presagios, 1990 [Sophia of the Presages], is more liberal feminist in approach. The protagonist is a gypsy adopted by a family of mixed class background who marries a bourgeois traditionalist who expects her to fulfill the conventional gender roles of reproduction and housework. Sofia rebels against this status by using contraceptives to prevent childbirth and by falling in love with another man. After her father passes away, Sofia inherits his money and becomes a landowner in her own right.

The other principal tendency in women’s poetry today is led by Daisy Zamora (1950–). Zamora’s testimonial poetry critiques patriarchal institutions and gender relations within the workplace. Using irony and parody as critical realist tools, her poetry denounces the sexual division of labor, patriarchal insistence on reproduction, as well as the physical subjugation of women in Nicaragua. Her second and third books of poetry are more mature and provocative than La violenta espuma. 1981 [The Violent Foam], Zamora’s first work. En limpio se escribe la vida, 1988 (Clean Slate), consists of a series of vignettes on the working conditions of waitresses, housewives, seamstresses and the like. In these conversational, realist poems she depicts women as they are working—as they are being physically exploited. Zamora particularly assails the exploitation of women in familial relations. In Zamora’s autobiographical meditations on familial and gender relations in A cada quien la vida, 1994 (Life for Each), she criticizes the submissiveness, passivity and traditional “mothering” of women of her own and her mother’s generation as well as the objectification of women as objects of pleasure and beauty under Sandinismo and under the current capitalist system in Nicaragua.

In the last decade the novel has become the second most important genre in Nicaragua. The most distinguished novelist, short-story writer and essayist is Sergio Ramírez (1942– ). ¿Te dió miedo la sangre? 1983 (To Bury Our Fathers) is a rewriting of Nicaraguan history under the first years of the Somoza dictatorship. Told through six intertextual stories narrated in the first-person, this novel attempts to represent the political views of various sectors of the national population. Ramírez’s techniques create a narrative, class and political distance between the people and the semi-oligarchical Somoza dictatorship. His most ambitious novel, Castigo divino, 1988 [Divine Punishment], is a historical novel based on meticulous documentation of bourgeois life in León in the 1930s. Centered on an unusual crime, Ramírez aims to show the hypocritical bourgeois reaction that it provoked.

As an outgrowth of the guerrilla struggles in the 1960s and 1970s, Nicaragua, perhaps because of the success of the Sandinista revolution, has won fame in the Americas and Europe for its testimonial literature. Here we can mention only the most renowned narratives. Omar Cabezas’s La montaña es algo más que una inmensa estepa verde, 1982 (Fire from the Mountain), is a first-person narrative of a middle-class university student—Cabezas himself—who becomes involved with the guerrillas, first on campus, and then in the jungles of Nicaragua. The mountain, symbol of Sandino’s struggle against the US military presence and national sovereignty, becomes the home for rethinking national identity and for understanding revolutionary consciousness more fully. In Canción de amor para los hombres, 1988 [A Song of Love for All], Cabezas describes in detail the everyday life of the guerrillas during the revolutionary struggle. Whereas La montaña es algo más que una inmensa estepa verde had been almost the equivalent of a lengthy news dispatch, his second work is a more conscious reflection on the significance of this period of his life some nine years after the Revolution proved victorious.

Lastly, Tomás Borge’s La paciente impaciencia, 1989 (The Patient Impatience), which won the Casa de las Américas prize for testimonial literature, should probably be considered more strictly as an autobiography, published some ten years after the Revolution. As in the case of Cabezas, by this stage Borge has had the time to reflect on his experiences in jail, in the armed struggle, and in his capacity as a major leader of the revolutionary government, which he narrates in a realist and poetic discourse.

GREG DAWES

Further Reading

———“El movimiento nicaragüense de vanguardia,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 468 (1989)
Beverley, John and Marc Zimmerman, Literature and Politics in the Central American Revolutions, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990
Hodges, Donald, The Intellectual Foundations of the Nicaraguan Revolution, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1986

Anthologies

Special Issues of Journals

Revista Iberoamericana 157 (October–December 1991)

---

Rafael Núñez 1825–1894

Colombian poet, journalist and statesman

Born in the Caribbean city of Cartagena, Rafael Núñez was a popular, often imitated poet of his time. He was also a leading politician, first in the Liberal Party then, toward the end of his life, a staunch defender of conservative causes. As was often the case at the time, Núñez began his literary career as a journalist. His newspaper columns and articles are among his best writing, especially those that deal with literary and cultural topics. However, Núñez’s concerns were eclectic and typical of public figures, ranging broadly over politics, economics, sociology and literature. His periods of service as consul in Liverpool and Le Havre exposed him to liberal ideas and ideals that informed his work as journalist and publicist. His Ensayos de crítica social, 1860–74 [Essays on Social Criticism] and Reforma política en Colombia, 1885 [Political Reform in Colombia] were very influential, as was his essay La crisis económica, 1886 [The Economic Crisis]. Núñez wrote for several Colombian newspapers as well as for El Nacional of Lima and El Continental of New York. Throughout his life he contributed poems to various magazines and newspapers both in the Americas and in Europe. The works were gathered in one volume, Poesías, and published by Hachette in Paris (1889). This is the only authorized edition of his poetry.

Núñez’s early poetry is characterized by philosophical search and profound indecision as reflected in his famous poem “Que sais je?” [What Do I Know?] in which the religious implications of 19th-century Positivism clash with the certainties of Roman Catholicism. In later years Núñez embraced orthodox Catholicism and was recognized by Pope Leo XIII, who considered him one of the most influential members of the Church in America.
Much of Núñez’s poetry is based on the romance of love and the comfort it offers in times of conflict. His aesthetics and style show him to be a late adherent of the Romantic movement; as such his poetry lacks innovation and is quite derivative. While the sincerity of his emotions is not doubted, modern critics regularly remark on the lack of technical virtuosity that afflicts his work. Rafael Maya, for instance, calls his poetry “Romanticism of the first type: very ardent as a feeling but somehow rudimentary in its expression.”

Although influential and imitated, Núñez was not a skilled poet and today his literary fame rests chiefly on the fact that he wrote the lyrics to a march that subsequently became the national anthem of Colombia. The text of the “Himno Nacional” [National Anthem] is a symbolic expression of an a-historical struggle for ideological dominance in the context of the “Regeneración,” the name given by historians to the violent conservative takeover in 1885–86, of which the then-conservative Núñez was the leader. Military victory is the overarching theme of the anthem: this motif is presented on several referential levels (battles in Greece, the War of Independence against Spain earlier in the century), but no reference is made to the immediate violent events which gave rise to the poem. It does not, for example, mention the word “Colombia” (or its earlier, colonial version, “Nueva Granada”), a clear indication that Núñez sought to provide the text with an a-historic immanence thereby giving the anthem a meaning that transcends mere partisanship. The hymn is also an effective vehicle for the glorification of Simon Bolívar as father of the country, the hero who defeated the powerful Spanish army and vanquished nature, here represented by the mighty Andean mountains.

In politics Núñez was a man to be reckoned with. He was president on several occasions (1880–82, 1884–86 and 1887–94), with the notorious Conservative revisionist Marco Antonio Caro (himself a poet) as his vice-president. In matters of literary aesthetics, Núñez shows indifference—if not outright hostility—to innovation. He professed disgust for the budding Spanish American Modernismo. Nevertheless, Rubén Darío—the recognized father of Modernismo—and José Asuncion Silva, were among his protégés. Darío visited him in 1892. Núñez arranged for Darío to be appointed Colombian Consul General in Buenos Aires, a position that was handsomely paid and enabled Darío to visit New York and his beloved France for the first time.

Núñez’s literary work, vastly outdated by the beginning of the modernista movement, is none the less a significant example of the prevalence of written culture over orality in the mainstream culture of 19th-century Colombia. More important, however, is that his poetry, together with Caro’s, remains a prime example of the drastic denial both of Modernismo and modernity in Colombia in the second half of the 19th century, and as such, it contributed to make Colombia a nation without a literary avant-garde.

GILBERTO GÓMEZ OCAMPO

Biography

Born in Cartagena, Colombia, 28 September 1825. Doctor of law; practised law for 2.0 years. Journalist for several Colombian newspapers, and contributed to El Nacional (Lima), and El Continental (New York). Politician, initially in the Liberal Party, but towards the end of his life supported more conservative program. Secretary of State during the government of Tomás Cipriano de Mosquera. Consul, Le Havre, and Liverpool, England, in the 1860s. Returned to Colombia in 1874. Elected President of Colombia, 1880–82., 1884–86, and 1887–94.
Responsible for Constitution of 1886 which restored power of Catholic Church. Died in Cartagena, 18 September 1894.

Selected Works

Political Writings

Arreglo de las deudas flotantes, de tesorería, Bogota: Imprenta del Estado, 1856
Ensayos de crítica social, Rouen: Cagniard, 1874
¡Alocución bolivarense! Los enemigos de toda moral y de todo sano principio, Cartagena: Imprenta de J.P.Durán, 1885
Reforma política en Colombia, Bogota: Imprenta La Luz, 1885
Escritos políticos, edited by Gonzalo España, Bogota: El Áncora Editores, 1986

Compilations and Anthologies

Poesías, Bogota: Imprenta La Luz, 1885
Poesías de Rafael Núñez, Paris: Hachette, 1889
Los mejores artículos de Rafael Núñez, Bogota: Minerva, 1936 [prose]
Poesías, Cartagena: Dirección de Educación Pública de Bolívar, 1946

Further Reading

Miramón, Alberto, La angustia creadora en Núñez y Pombo, Bogota: Caro y Cuervo, 1975
Silvina Ocampo 1903(?)–1993

Argentine prose writer, poet and literary translator

Silvina Ocampo is one of the Latin American masters of the grotesque, along with Virgilio Piñera in Cuba and Felisberto Hernández in Uruguay. Her stories and some of her poems tell of a world upside down—the transvestite saint Teodora in the 1984 book of poems Breve santoral [Short Book of Saints], the children who build a world to their measure in the story “La raza inextinguible” [The Invincible Race]—a world where extreme acts of cruelty express love, where the finding of lost possessions becomes the source of disquieting misfortune, where a character’s knowledge of the future is interpreted by others as a blatant lack of sensitivity.

Ocampo’s current reputation rests largely on two collections of stories, La furia, 1959 [The Fury], and Las invitadas, 1961 [The Guests]. Her first book of stories, though, dates from 1937: Viaje olvidado [Forgotten Journey] consists of impressionistic stories about childhood, told from a less harrowing point of view than that of the later collections (it earned a rather quizzical review in Sur from her sister Victoria). Her last two books of stories, Y así sucesivamente, 1987 [And So On], and Cornelia frente al espejo, 1988 [Cornelia in the Mirror], are strange but less violent than the stories of La furia and Las invitadas.

The title story of La furia is typical of the core of Ocampo’s writing. A man is writing a memoir of the events that led to his incarceration for the murder of a little boy named Cintito. He murdered the boy for refusing to stop beating on a toy drum in a place where noise of this kind was most unwelcome - the hotel with rooms rented by the hour where the narrator had taken Winifred, Cintito’s nursemaid. Winifred abandons the narrator with the boy after telling him the terrifying story of her life, especially of the incidents that culminated years before in the death of Winifred’s best friend, Lavinia, burned to death during a ceremony where the two little girls were dressed up as angels. Winifred’s love for Lavinia was a cruel love: to “cure” her of her irrational fears she subjected her to ever more drastic frights, and there is every reason to assume that Winifred deliberately set Lavinia’s costume on fire. When the narrator objects that Winifred was cruel to Lavinia, Winifred replies that she will be cruel to him too, a statement chilling in its accuracy.

Another story from the same collection, “La casa de los relojes” [The Clock House], is equally perverse. Couched as the composition of a schoolboy writing to his teacher about “what I did in my summer vacation,” the boy’s memoir begins with swimming and other adventures, to culminate in the story of an unforgettable party. Wenceslao the watch repairman, who lives in a shack erected on the flat roof of the narrator’s building, is a hunchback not much accustomed to society, and he sheepishly appears at the baptismal party in a rumpled suit. One of the neighbours, the co-owner of a laundry and by now rather drunk, offers to press Wenceslao’s suit. When they get to the laundry, the offer to press the suit turns into an offer to press the suit while Wenceslao is wearing it, thus pressing the deformity of the back also. Days later the boy purports not to fully understand what he has seen, and tells his teacher that his mother has told him simply that Wenceslao “went away.” The horror of the story is deftly conveyed through the use of an seemingly innocent narrator.

“Tales eran sus rostros” [Thus Were Their Faces], the first story in Las invitadas, turns from grand guignol to the terror of the sacred. This is the story of secret communication among schoolchildren identified late in the story as deaf mutes, and of their teachers’ efforts to capture their secret. When the children throw themselves (or fall accidentally) from an airplane, one of the teachers sees that they have sprouted wings. A comment by the narrator provides a poetics of the story: “En realidad no se sabe si era horrible y se volvía hermoso, o si era hermoso y se volvía horrible” (In reality, we don’t know whether it was horrible and then became beautiful, or whether it was beautiful and became horrible). The uncertainty shared by the teachers and the narrator as to the nature of the event has to do with a perceived contradiction between the categories of “beauty” and “horror,” which in Ocampo’s work seem more to imply each other than to represent mutually exclusive semantic fields.

Ocampo’s poetry plays on the same contradictory nature of experience. In the poetic sequence “Los árboles de Buenos Aires” [The Trees of Buenos Aires] in Amarillo celeste, 1972 [Sky-Yellow], the trees are simultaneously innocent and wise and lascivious and friendly and frightening. The saints’ lives retold in Breve santoral, similarly, are full of unresolved tensions. Santa Teodora, for instance, dresses as a man and becomes a monk, only to be accused falsely of fathering a child. Unwilling to defend herself against the unjust accusation, her saintliness is revealed only upon her death, when her body is being washed and her female nature is revealed. It is fitting that Ocampo’s book of religious poems (illustrated with Norah Borges’s trademark angels) should reveal the story of a transvestite saint.

Among Ocampo’s less-known works are a detective novel she wrote in collaboration with her husband, Adolfo Bioy Casares, Los que aman, odian, 1946 [Those Who Love, Hate]; a verse drama written with Juan Rodolfo Wilcock about life in ancient Rome, Los traidores, 1956 [The Traitors]; several books of stories for children; and a significant body of translations of poetry from French and English, including many poems of Emily Dickinson. She also collaborated with Bioy Casares and with Borges on two anthologies. The first was the famous Antología de la literatura fantástica, 1940 (The Book of Fantasy), a project that Noemi Ulla has claimed to have been Ocampo’s idea originally, though Bioy and Borges were to explore the fantastic much more thoroughly in the following years than she herself. The second, the Antología poética argentina, 1941 [Anthology of Argentine Poetry], features the opening of one of her most popular poems, “Enumeración de la patria” [Enumeration of the Nation].

It has sometimes been argued that Ocampo was overshadowed in her lifetime by her more famous sister and husband. A more compelling explanation is that her work frightens or shocks many readers, with its focus on cruelty, deceit, metamorphosis, violence and sexual ambiguity. Her work is now being discovered anew, as has also happened with her peers in the grotesque, Felisberto Hernández and Virgilio Piñera, who have only been fully recognized after their deaths.

DANIEL BALDERSTON

See also entries on Adolfo Biyo Casares, Felisberto Hernández, Victoria Ocampo, Virgilio Piñera

Biography

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction
Viaje olvidado, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1937
Los que aman, odian, in collaboration with Adolfo Biyo Casares, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1946
Autobiografía de Irene, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1948
La furia y otros cuentos, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1959
Las invitadas, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1961
El pecado mortal, Buenos Aires: Editorial Universitaria, 1966
Informe del cielo y del infierno, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1970
Los días de la noche, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1970
Canto escolar, Buenos Aires: Fratema, 1979
Y así sucessivamente, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1987
Cornelia frente al espejo, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1988

Children’s Fiction
El caballo alado, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1972
El cofre volante, Buenos Aires: Estrada, 1974
El tobogán, Buenos Aires: Estrada, 1975
La naranja maravillosa: cuentos para chicos grandes y para grandes chicos, Buenos Aires: Orión, 1977

Poetry
Enumeración de la patria y otros poemas, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1942
Espacios métricos, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1945
Los sonetos del jardín, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1946
Poemas de amor desesperado, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1949
Los nombres, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1953
Pequeña antología, Buenos Aires: En, 1954
Lo amargo por dulce, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1962,
Amarillo celeste, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1972
Árboles de Buenos Aires, in collaboration with Aldo Sessa, Buenos Aires: Librería la Ciudad, 1979

Play
Los traidores, in collaboration with Juan Rudolfo Wilcock, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1956 [in verse]

Compilations and Anthologies
La continuación y otras páginas, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1981
Breve santoral, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de Arte Gaglianone, 1984
Páginas, Buenos Aires: Celtia, 1984

Editor, with Jorge Luis Borges and Adolfo Bioy Casares:
Antología poética argentina, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1941

Translation

Further Reading
Ulla, Noemi, Invenciones a dos voces: ficción y poesía en Silvina Ocampo, Buenos Aires: Torres Agüero, 1992

Victoria Ocampo 1890–1979

Argentine writer and patron of culture
Victoria Ocampo was the most influential woman of letters and cultural promoter in 20th-century Argentina. She founded, financed and was the main editor of the literary journal Sur (1931–70) which served as a bridge between the cultures of the Americas and Europe. Writing dominated her life, as she remarked in an early published volume: “my only ambition is to write one day, no matter how well or poorly, but as a woman.” Her extensive oeuvre bears witness to an ambition fulfilled: a six-volume autobiography (a genre in Argentina previously dominated by men), published posthumously; ten volumes of Testimonios, which record and express her very personal views on literature and life, placing her private, female, presence firmly in the public sphere; critical works on figures from Virginia Woolf and T.E.Lawrence to Borges and translations of contemporary literature from several languages. She was brought up in an aristocratic household, as trilingual in English, French and Spanish and would not feel confident writing in Spanish until the 1930s. Yet she viewed this linguistic schizophrenia as positive: equating her story, as she often did, with the history of Argentina, she always asserted that the polyglot could expand the boundaries of the Argentine nation, opening it up to enriching, heterodox ideas. She followed these principles, cultivating friendships all over the world with the most significant cultural figures of the day, inviting them to her homes in Argentina or, when they could or would not travel—as was the case of Virginia Woolf—offering them the hospitality of publishing in her “house” journal, Sur. She had both the advantages and disadvantages of wealth and background, and sought to open up new opportunities for women in a closed male society.

The world of her childhood and adolescence was both cosseted and claustrophobic. She was born into one of the wealthiest and most powerful families in Argentina and would always defend the cultural values of that liberal aristocratic tradition. Yet she saw from an early age, in a world hemmed in by nannies and servants, that the power of her class was male: women were excluded from male institutions, either political or cultural. The smoking room or the club were the spaces in which this power resided and Victoria Ocampo battled against convention to find “a room of her own” in Woolf’s celebrated phrase (from an article that Sur would publish in the 1930s). She married early and disastrously and although the marriage lasted for only a few months, she was forced to keep up the appearance of respectability for over a decade, hiding from family and friends a longstanding love affair with a cousin of her husband, in a society where divorce was forbidden. Her autobiography would later explore in great detail these first forty years of her life, expressing with unusual frankness the struggle for control over her own body and desires. Her first published work, an essay on Dante, would also seek to explore, through metaphor, the nature of “profane” and “sacred” love. This first text, from 192.0, showed what would become a constant in her writing: the essay form (itself an incursion into male territory: women were supposed to write about feelings in poetry, not about ideas in essays), which stressed quotation, translation and interpretation of the canon, an active process of engagement with the literary work in an accessible, almost conversational, style.

Her first contract with cultural life came not through an immersion in the avant-garde experimentalism of the 1920s but through meeting writers who came to Buenos Aires: Tagore, Ortega y Gasset, Count Keyserling. She later wrote about the advantages of becoming part of an aristocracy of the spirit and the drawbacks of being taken as a muse or emblem of male fantasy. By the late 192,08 she was aware that she could take control of her life, living openly on her own, travelling to Europe and the United States and mixing with the most significant artists and intellectuals of the day. Her wealth, in a world of impecunious artists, cast her naturally in the role of Maecenas, and it was another traveller to Buenos Aires, the North American Waldo Frank, who encouraged her to channel her passions and her talents into a concrete cultural endeavour, the periodical Sur, which set the standards for intellectual life in Argentina for some forty years. In Sur, the journal and the publishing house, can be charted her developing interests in literature, modernist art and architecture, feminist issues and her conception of culture as a dialogue between cultivated minorities across the world. Although she was never actively involved with political parties, her increasing prominence in the public sphere (as the best known woman in Argentina after Eva Péron) made her the target of opposition. She was outspoken in her rejection of Péron, and was locked up by the regime for some days in 1953. She also turned her face against the Cuban Revolution and the political and cultural radicalisation of the 1960s and 1970s in Argentina, which caused a younger generation to dismiss her as a cultural “oligarch.” But the more measured criticism of the last fifteen years, since her death in 1979, especially the growth of feminist criticism, has recognised her importance both as a disseminator and as a creative writer. She was elected to the Argentine Academy in 1977, the first woman to receive this recognition, and her acceptance speech told of the double lineage of her family. She was descended, she said, from both the Spanish conquistadors and from an indigenous woman, Agueda. In the figure of Agueda she stressed her own American roots but also her female relationship to history. Argentine culture, for her, was a mixture of the European and the American, the modern and the traditional and it was a culture that had been deaf, for too long, to the voices of its women. Victoria Ocampo was one of the clearest of these voices.

JOHN KING

See also entries on Sur, under Journals; Silvina Ocampo

Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 7 April 1890. Eldest of six daughters; her youngest sister, Silvina, became a writer of fiction. Family were members of oligarchy and very Francophile. Travelled to Europe in 1896 and again in 1908. Married Luis Bernardo de Estrada in 1912. Couple decidedly incompatible and theirs became a stage marriage. Long relationship with another man, but this was never made public so as not to bring shame on her family. Espoused cause of women’s rights. First publications were articles in La Nación in early 1920s. Founder of the journal Sur, 1931 and the publishing house of the same name. Ran these for forty years as sole financial backer. Arrested and imprisoned for one month in 1953. This was the first time (apart from with her servants) that she came into close contact with women from other social classes. First woman to be admitted to Argentine Academy of Letters, 1977. Died on 27 January 1979.

Selected Works

De Francesca a Beatrice, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1924
La laguna de los nenúfares, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1926
Testimonios I, Madrid: Revista de Occidente, 1935
Domingos en Hyde Park, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1936
Testimonios II, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1941
San Isidro, con un poema de Silvina Ocampo, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1941
338171 T.E. (Lawrence de Arabia), Buenos Aires: Sur, 1942.
Testimonios III, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1946
Further Reading

Bergmann, Emilie, et al. (editors), Women, Culture and Politics in Latin America, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990

Dyson, Ketaki, In Your Blossoming Flower Garden: Rabindranath Tagore and Victoria Ocampo, New Delhi: Safutya Academi, 1988

Meyer, Doris, Victoria Ocampo: Against the Wind and the Tide, New York: Braziller, 1979

Juan Carlos Onetti 1909–1994

Uruguayan prose writer

Juan Carlos Onetti lived a sedentary and reclusive life, and during his last decades there were very few attractions which could distract him from staying in his bedroom (first in Montevideo, then in Madrid). In that bedroom he read thousands of novels (from high brow to pulp fiction works), and wrote some of his most important short stories and novels. In reality, he seemed to belong to his own fictional world, because the characters of his invention were also daytime dreamers, used to sharing reality with imaginative endeavors, and imagining for themselves lives different from those they were living. Onetti started to write short stories in such a fashion, in the 1930s, when some of them (“Avenida de Mayo-Diagonal-Avenida de Mayo,” “El posible Baldi” [The Possible Baldi]) told how a bureaucrat, a bank employee, dreamed of a life full of adventures that was possible at a turning point when he chose instead to be sedentary. Such characters feel nostalgic about a kind of life much more interesting and thrilling than their own boring lives. A similar scenario is depicted in Onetti’s first novel, El pozo, 1939 (The Pit). Before going to sleep every night, its main character imagines himself immersed in different adventures in exotic places, as a way of compensating for his dull present. This process went yet further a decade later, in his best novel, La vida breve, 1950 (A Brief Life). Its protagonist, Juan María Brausen, is a script-writer who is asked to write a story and gets lost in his imagination thinking about a fictional place, the town of Santa Maria. In (his) “real” life, he starts inserting himself in a strange fiction which could develop into a possible murder and when he needs to escape from the police, he moves into that imaginary region. Thus, in 1950 Onetti founded Santa Maria, a coastal town imprecisely located in Argentina but also with traces of old provincial Uruguayan towns. The rest of his important novels take place in Santa Maria, but this town is never again mentioned as imaginary. The only ironic stance from the author was to name Juan María Brausen, the script writer from La vida breve, as the patriarchal founder of the small city.

While working as an assistant editor on the highly regarded Uruguayan journal, Marcha, Onetti promoted a radical transformation of River Plate literature (that is, of Argentina and Uruguay): writers should forget the all-pervasive literary theme of the countryside, and start developing stories about the cities. They had at least a metropolis, Buenos Aires, and a middle-sized but culturally very active city, Montevideo, and the characters should not be the gauchos any more, a type that had disappeared, but the urban citizens with their own array of different professions and trades. Onetti wrote programmatic articles on this subject, under a pseudonym, and published his urban short stories and novels. In this sense, he was continuing a then recently established Argentine trend, which had important practitioners like Eduardo Mallea and Roberto Arlt. Onetti felt closer to Arlt, whose literary imagination was, like his, a mixture of “Boys Own” adventures with picturesque characters, and a sense of the surrounding urban reality. They started what is considered the urban novel in South America.

Onetti wrote an unconventional narrative, stylistically and because of his themes. His style is difficult, elliptical and in many instances ambiguous because of long and sinuous phrases. He admired William Faulkner very much, and took from him the complexity of syntax besides the construction of a “saga” and an imaginary space. What Yoknapatawpha and the Comptons meant for Faulkner, Santa Maria and Larsen and Diaz Grey and Jorge Malabia, among other characters, meant for Onetti. Onetti continued one novel into the other, changing significantly the role of his characters, but Larsen has a special place because he is at the center of his narrative. Larsen was also supposed to be unconventional because of his peculiar enterprises: to fund a whorehouse near Santa Maria, in Juntacadáveres, 1964 (The Body Snatcher), or to rebuild an abandoned shipyard, as in El astillero, 1961 (The Shipyard), an enterprise owned by a madman. Many of Onetti’s novels and short stories lack the “logic” of human enterprises, hopes and desires, because these are the components of bourgeois life. Onetti’s more anarchistic view of the world advanced against the grain, but behind the uniqueness and unconventionalities the reader finds a very moving sentiment for humanity, a compassion which has its roots in religion. Pain, grief, compassion for the other are feelings to be found in novels such as Tan triste como ella [Sad as She], Para una tumba sin nombre (A Grave with No Name), or short stories such as “Jacob y el otro” (Jacob and the Other), “El infierno tan temido” (Hell Most Feared), “Un sueño realizado” (A Dream Come True).

Among other dichotomies that make his novels so complex and mesmerizing, purity as opposed to corruption is crucial to the understanding of his literature. Onetti used the archetype of childhood to symbolize purity, and depicted adulthood as a longer and dramatic age of decay. His novels and short stories abound in adult men trying desperately to find some kind of salvation. To compromise, to accept social hypocrisies, and simulacra implied to lose oneself. In “El infierno tan temido,” a father commits suicide to prevent his daughter’s virginity being lost. The town’s gossip about a former athlete visited by two women proved to be false and a product of slander. In “Bienvenido, Bob” (Welcome, Bob), an older man feels hurt when Bob, the brother of his young fiancée, despises him just because of his age, so he only has to wait until Bob grows old, to welcome him into his “corrupted” reality. There are no evil people in Onetti’s literature, only people wasted by the simple fact of living.

Onetti’s international reputation, and the fact that he was considered the most distinguished Uruguayan writer, did not prevent his imprisonment in 1974. He and other authors had awarded a literary prize to Nelson Marra for a short story that the military considered offensive. He was liberated three months later, and the following year he moved definitively to Spain and refused to go back to his country even when democracy was restored. In 1985, the new president of Uruguay travelled to Spain to present Onetti with the National Literary award but was not able to get even a promise that the author would return to his native country. In Madrid Onetti wrote several novels and short stories, each of them more pessimistic than the previous ones, to the point that in Dejemos hablar al viento [Let the Wind Speak], he had Santa María destroyed by fire.

His literary style became paradoxically more and more allegorical and hermetic at the same time that his books sold quickly and made him a popular writer. In 1980, he received the Cervantes prize handed to him by Juan Carlos, the King of Spain.

Jorge Rufinelli

Biography

Born in Montevideo, Uruguay, 1 July 1909. Lived in Buenos Aires, 1930–34 and 1941–55. Began publishing his work in 1933, but he attracted little critical attention outside Uruguay until the mid-1960s. Married four times: 1) his cousin María Amalia Onetti, 1930 (one son); 2) his cousin María Julia Onetti, 1934; 3) Elizabeth María Pekelharing, 1945 (one daughter); 4) Dorotea Muhr in 1980, after living together for 25 years. Edited the weekly journal Marcha in Montevideo, 1939–42, and Vea y Lea, Buenos Aires, 1946–55; editor for Reuters News Agency, Montevideo, 1941–43, and Buenos Aires, 1943–46. Manager of an advertising company in Montevideo, 1955–57; Director of Municipal Libraries, Montevideo, 1957. In 1974 he was imprisoned by the military dictatorship for being a member of the jury that awarded a literary prize to a story by Nelson Marra, which the authorities considered to be pornographic and subversive. Incarcerated briefly in mental institution. Forced to move to Madrid, and became Spanish citizen in 1975. Worked at a number of odd-jobs including waiter, salesman and doorman. Recipient of numerous awards including: National Literature Prize, 1962; William Faulkner Foundation Ibero-American Award, 1963; Casa de las Américas Prize, 1965; Italian-

Selected Works

Novels

Tierra de nadie, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1941; as No Man’s Land, translated by Peter Bush, London: Quartet, 1994

La cara de la desgracia, Montevideo: Alfá, 1960

El infierno tan temido, Montevideo: Asir, 1962,

Tan triste como ella, Montevideo: Alfá, 1963

Los rostros del amor, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1968

La muerte y la niña, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1973

Dejemos hablar al viento, Barcelona: Bruguera, 1979

Short Fiction

Un sueño realizado y otros cuentos, Montevideo: Número, 1951

Jacob y el otro: un sueño realizado y otros cuentos, Montevideo: Banda Oriental, 1965

La novia robada y otros cuentos, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1968

Tiempo de abrazar y los cuentos de 1933 a 1950, Montevideo: Arca, 1974

Tan triste como ella y otros cuentos, Barcelona: Lumen, 1976

Cuentos secretos: Periquito el Aguador y otras máscaras, Montevideo: Biblioteca de Marcha, 1986

Presencia y otros cuentos, Madrid: Almarabu, 1986

Cuando entonces, Madrid: Mondadori, and Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1987

Essays

Requiem por Faulkner y otros artículos, Montevideo: Arca, 1975

Compilations and Anthologies

Novelas y cuentos cortos completos, 2 vols, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1968
Obras completas, Mexico City: Aguilar, 1970

Anthologies in Translation
Goodbyes and Other Stories, translated by Daniel Balderston, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1990

Further Reading

Aínsa, Fernando, Las trampas de Onetti, Montevideo: Alfa, 1970

Kadir, Djelal, Juan Carlos Onetti, Boston: Twayne, 1977

Millington, Mark, Reading Onetti: Language, Narrative and the Subject, Liverpool: Cairns, 1985

Molina, Juan Carlos, La dialéctica de la identidad en la obra de Juan Carlos Onetti, New York: Peter Lang, 1982

Ruffinelli, Jorge, Juan Carlos Onetti, Montevideo: Marcha, 1973

Verani, Hugo J. (editor), Juan Carlos Onetti, Madrid: Taurus, 1987

Interviews

Chao, Ramón, Un possible Onetti, Barcelona: Ronsel, 1994

Special Issues of Journals

Crisis, Buenos Aires, 6 (1974)

Review, New York, 16 (1975)

El astillero

Novel by Juan Carlos Onetti

El astillero (The Shipyard) was published in 1961, after it won the prize for best novel awarded by the Buenos Aires publishing house, Fabril. The novel forms part of the saga of Santa María which Onetti began creating more or less from the publication of La vida breve, 1950 (A Brief Life). This novel was followed by Para una tumba sin nombre, 1959 (A Grave with No Name), Juntacadáveres, 1964 (The Body Snatcher), La novia robada, 1968 [The Stolen Bride] and Dejemos hablar al viento, 1979 [Let the Wind Speak].

The plot of El astillero is simple: the owner of a bankrupt shipyard, unable to accept either the passing of time or the demise of his business, employs a manager, Larsen, to “administer” and “organise” the yard, along with the two other surviving employees. The obvious result of this is a chimera and an allegory of failure. The owner, in a state of delirium, cannot see that the shipyard has been abandoned for years and that the chances of it ever working again are extremely remote. In fact, this character, Jeremías Petrus, cannot even see that the yard has been closed and has lain derelict for some time. Larsen, despite being aware of all this, accepts the post, for which—incidentally—he is never paid. The novel centres on the development of this character in relation to this situation, his own past and the characters (Jeremías Petrus, his daughter Inés, the maid Josefina, the employees Gálvez and Khun and Gálvez’s wife) who represent the life of Puerto Astillero, where most of the action takes place.

The most common misinterpretation of El astillero stems from a peculiarity of Onetti’s work which requires the reader to distinguish between the chronology of the publication of Onetti’s novels and the chronology of the saga of Santa María, the imaginary town which gives life to Onetti’s fiction. El astillero was published before Juntacadáveres, but in the chronology of Santa María, events in Juntacadáveres precede those of El astillero.

Leaving aside certain elements of the plot, El astillero comprises the story of Larsen, creating a type of sentimental biography. The character first appears, albeit in vague form, in Onetti’s second novel, Tierra de nadie, 1941 (No Man’s Land), and can also be recognised elsewhere as Junta Larsen, Juntacadáveres, or Carreño. El astillero underlines Larsen’s role as more than a character. He functions as a type of “narrative voice,” running through the stories which make up the Santa María saga. Larsen’s importance lies not in his physical presence, which could even be regarded as secondary when compared to that of other characters, but in his function as a type of parameter with respect to certain modes of behaviour, situations and attitudes which are, at least in a figurative, imaginary sense, practically unique to him. The other characters are judged in relation to him and it is in El astillero, more than any other novel in the Santa María series, that this tendency is particularly pronounced.

El astillero is divided into eighteen chapters. In order to reinforce the notion of the characters experiencing different, often contradictory feelings simultaneously, Onetti alternates the moods and settings through which they pass. He creates situations and contexts which, while appearing each time to be different, are possessed of an individual logic and direction.

The corpse collector is the main character in El astillero, but at the same time he is more: Larsen is a discursive model forming a mental and personal base for each element in Onetti’s cosmology. This is no minor achievement when one considers that El astillero, as previously mentioned, constitutes an “internal biography” of Larsen, relating his rise, fall and ambiguous disappearance. El astillero does not deal with attachment or feeling but explains, contextualises and suggests a sentimental discourse for the description of sentimentalism and its characters. This discourse is not so much verbal as imaginary. More than a macro (pimp), Larsen is a sentimentalist. The novel is a sentimental narrative which describes the ideas and concepts of a sentimental world.

Larsen is a sentimentalist because, while recognising his fate (the fate of humanity is one of Onetti’s favourite themes), he nevertheless continues to pursue tastes and preferences which can do little to alter his situation and indeed serve to worsen it. This image of the pursuit of pleasure, despite an awareness of imminent demise, is Larsen’s most outstanding characteristic as well as being a permanent feature of Onetti’s novels.
“Como si fuera cierto” (As if it were true), says the narrator, “que todo acto humano nace antes de ser cometido, preexiste a su encuentro con un ejecutor variable. Sabía que era necesario e inevitable hacer. Pero no le importaba descubrir el porqué” (that every human action was born before its realisation, exists prior to its encounter with a variable subject. He knew it was necessary and inevitable that he did it. But he wasn’t interested in finding out why). This lucid unbelief, the province of the sceptic, is what makes it possible constantly to pardon the figure of Juntacadáveres, and at the same time, the novel itself.

The narrator suggests that Larsen is a failed artist and that it is as such that he involuntarily attempts to rationalise his situation and to show a sentimental world that he belongs to, at least occasionally. There is something in Larsen’s character which condemns him to persistent failure. It is not a deficiency but instead an excess: the collector is ingenuous but lacks malice and a certain slyness. His innocence is pure, or more specifically, grave, serious, determinant, fatal, even malevolent. Larsen’s artistic failure is the result of an excess of understanding, pity and compassion; he is too clearheaded to be creative. This could be described as the Larsen complex and is an attitude relevant to both life and art with the character’s self-image based not on an assessment of what he believes himself to be, but instead on what he knows he is not and never can be: “Ese señor que—piensa Larsen de sí mismo—me mira en el espejo.” (That gent—thinks Larsen about himself—who looks at me in the mirror). Larsen’s radical sentimentalism merits wider consideration: an artist would have been able to oscillate between the belief in an image and the certainty of a condition, but not Larsen who, in this respect, is an excessively lucid character.

El astillero constitutes the most successful metaphor for the sentimental imperfection of the inhabitants of the universe of Santa María, in particular, and the stories of Onetti in general. This is a depiction of sentimental imperfection which particularly includes failure, or more precisely, human existence as failure. El astillero is a metaphor for the gap between that which remains and that which has disappeared, between people possessed of excessive ingenuity and characters with no understanding. Onetti’s great achievement has been in creating, without stereotypes and with sustained depth, a narrative where the most ingenuous brutality and ignorance manage to coexist with the most sordid and sterile lucidity, a game (like Queca with the street plan of Paris in La vida breve) where the animalistic and pure saves the rationalist from angst and audacity and where the sordid and cruel cries out desperately to the innocent.

Discretion without resentment, isolation without caprice: Onetti’s characters seem to disbelieve the possibilities of history and place themselves in a tempo, described as destiny, which leads them irredeemably along a path which, although already written, must be repeated in order to conjure up a sense of boredom and weariness. “Cuando él decide algo” (When he decides something), says Gálvez’s wife, summarising the dominant message of the Santa María stories, and of El astillero in particular, “yo me entero y entonces conozco lo que me va a pasar. Es así; yo sé, además, que tiene que ser así.” (I pick up on it and then I know what’s going to happen to me. That’s the way it is, and what’s more, I know that’s the way it has to be).

CLAUDIO CANAPARO
translated by Carol Tully
Editions

Further Reading

Musselwhite, David, “El astillero en Marcha,” Nuevos Aires 11 (1973)

Orality

Traditional oral culture is often seen in counter-distinction with modern rational culture, based on an abstract form of communication: writing. Orality, in opposition to written language, has recently become associated with resistance movements of the oppressed in Latin American literature. Theirs is the collective voice of a semi-literate or illiterate people, with a purely oral history, consisting of traditional tales, proverbs, prayers and formulaic expressions. These are features of works such as the ancient Guatemalan drama of epic proportions Rabinal Achi as well as other oral genres. Psychodynamic elements of orality, including onomatopoeic sounds, form part of the linguistic scaffolding of such novels as La cofradía del mullo del vestido de la Virgen Pipona, 1985 (The Sisterhood of the Sacred Vestments of the Plump Virgin) by the Ecuadorian Alicia Yáñez Cossío. Latin American texts ranging from myth and legend to the contemporary testimonial form of Rigoberta Menchú and Violeta Parra’s song-text poetry demonstrate the extent to which literate thought and expression have emerged from orality in varieties of Latin American writing. The spoken word acquires power as an instrument of action and dominance over described reality. Even a very sophisticated writer, such as Octavio Paz, recognizes the importance of orality in poetry when he pays homage to the oral tradition and primary oral cultures. In an article published in Vuelta (1991) he reminded his readers that: “La poesía comenzó antes de la escritura. Es un arte esencialmente verbal y que entra no solo por los ojos y el entendimiento sino por los oídos. La poesía es algo que se dice y se oye.” (Poetry began before writing. It is essentially a verbal art that enters not only through the eyes and understanding but also through the ears. Poetry is something that is verbalized and is heard). Other poets who share a similar view of the oral nature of poetry, and who incorporated it into their verses in a very deliberate manner, are Violeta Parra (Chile), whose song-texts were the inspiration for the Nueva Canción (New Song) musical movement in Latin America, Nicolás Guillén (Cuba) and his sow-poems which use onomatopoeia to re-create African-Cuban instrumentation and ritual ceremonial sounds, and Miguel Angel Asturias (Guatemala) in those verses and narratives in which he draws on the culture of the Mayas. Apart from the lexical and morphological inventiveness of popular speech, there is an exceptional use of the sensuousness of sound. in these texts. Indeed, the living tradition of oral protest poetry of the contemporary era has its origins in the popular protest poetry and songs which were sung in oral performance by the payador or gaucho balladeer and kept alive in print in the legendary gauchesque literature. The corridos of the Mexican Revolution and post-revolutionary Mexico are one such example of the impact that the oral tradition had on Spanish American protest poetry.

Critics such as Walter J. Ong (Orality and Literacy) believe that the main interest a writer might have in orality is based not only on sounds and the spoken word that determine forms of expression in a community, but also on the process of human thought itself. If it is true, as he says, that we know what we can remember, it is worth identifying the mental processes that humans use in order to remember things, namely, important events. In addition to the importance given to certain elements that define orality such as repetition, rhythm and other syntactical aspects, it should be noted that in oral cultures many constructions are aggregative rather than analytic, that is to say, remembered information is not systematized individually but in groups or series of related groups by means of parallelisms, antitheses and epithets. So, too, oral cultures depend heavily on repetition and redundancy in order to sustain an unbroken process of thought, i.e., copious repetition of linking phrases that at the same time to reinforce the orality of the text; the multiple use of different types of oral cultural texts: popular and religious songs; children’s sayings and games; formal talks and conferences for celebrating homages; word games; puns; moral sayings; prayers; legends and gossip.

The proverb maintains collective moral values. The nature of the oral is to create fluidity, excess, verbosity that, on another level, impedes the critical recognition of certain options for action and thus maintains the status quo of the community. Thus, a new language characterized by polyphonic communication, the collective voice of the populace, emerges from this intersection between the oral and the written, language as speech and language as written code. This language refuses to be a written, literary language, and can only be the reemergence of a spoken language, of a new colloquy. Replacing the shattered established literary and rationalist language, the new one is announced as an Adamic language in some forms of contemporary Latin American literature. This “poetics of change” as Julio Ortega refers to it, deconstructs both the notion of the text within the literary tradition and its role in the natural language. Indeed, in 1976 the literary critic Jean Franco acknowledged orality’s significance to the literary domain when she wrote “No study of Latin American literature, even in the 20th century, is balanced unless the oral performance is taken into account and unless there is some notion of the dialectics or oral and written literatures.”

The Mexican critic Miguel León-Portilla writes at great length about the colorful expressions of pre-Columbian literature. The rhythmic style of many of these texts (the sacred Mayan Popol Vuh or “Book of the People” and the preHispanic play Rabinal Achi, for example) is similar to the mythical accounts and poems of other primarily oral peoples and cultures. Their form of expression, which frequently repeats the same idea in parallel form, indicates that such texts were memorized in the pre-Hispanic centers of learning and recited during important religious festivals. In pre-Columbian society orally preserved and transmitted myths form the seed of what was to become their religious thought. Recited during festivals and ceremonies or sung to the accompaniment of flutes, conch-shells, and drums, they were also the beginning of religious drama. Pre-Hispanic imaginative and didactic prose (chronicles and history, descriptions and narrative texts, speeches, and admonitions) follow many of the stylistic procedures which are frequent in other forms of pre-Hispanic composition, such as parallel expressions, which repeat the same idea in different ways, the often observed rhythm of phrases, and the constant use of metaphors and idiomatic expressions, undeniable characteristics of both indigenous languages and orality. We are reminded by Walter J. Ong in relates them directly to the production of sound, and their Orality and Literacy that the oral nature of these elements aural reception unifies and internalizes sounds perceived by human beings.

Despite revealing the traces and scars of translation, as well as the liberating tropes that come from code switching, Latin American testimonial texts retain an unmistakable oral quality through the edited and polished version that reaches the reader. It is often the case that these stories are orally transmitted through a mediating voice (that of a social worker or anthropologist), who is responsible for transcribing and organizing the recorded material. Such works, prevalent in Latin American letters of recent years, give recognition (and sometimes prominence) to the voice of the unprivileged. As a device, orality helps to account for the testimonial’s construction of a collective self. For, unlike the private moment of autobiographical writing, testimonies are public events which strive to renew an interpersonal rhetoric (as opposed to producing a personal and distinctive style as part of the individuation process of traditional autobiography). The life stories of the Guatemalan Indian Rigoberta Menchú (Me llamo Rigoberta Menchú (I, Rigoberta Menchú: an Indian Woman in Guatemala), and the Bolivian miner’s wife Domitila Barrios de Chungara (¡Si me permiten hablar! Testimonio de Domitila, una mujer de las minas de Bolivia (Let Me Speak! Testimony of Domitila, a Woman of the Bolivian Mines) are two such examples of this literary form. In this context it is worth noting that in Latin America, it became common, as from the 16th century, for members of the dominant culture to interview subalterns: Spanish prelates recorded native accounts of religious practices and historical memory; confessors appropriated the visions of (illiterate and learned) nuns by recording them on paper.

For primarily oral cultures, such as the Andean or indigenous cultures of Central America, for example, meanings are registered and transmitted non-textually—through theatre, oral poetry, music, pilgrimage, artefacts, narratives (myths and legends, popular stories). These are often ways to preserve native knowledge in fields such as cosmology and history. And so it is oral tradition that provides the working material (musical devices, formulaic patterns, the figurative language characteristic of folk speech) for the practitioners of the Latin American popular theatre collectives today. Theatre facilitators such as the Nicaraguan Alan Bolt and the Honduran Jesuit Jack Warner and his Teatro La Fragua (Forge Theatre) exemplify the current trend to take theatre to the people, returning it to its roots of origin as a relationship between oral tradition and sociopolitical commitment. With borrowings from the aforementioned Popol Vuh, and both traditional and contemporary folklore rooted in oral tradition, such artists attempt to reawaken the people’s awareness of their historical roots. At the same time, they mirror a contemporary and thus directly meaningful circumstance in a performance text for an illiterate or semi-literate audience. It is in this context that we see the coincidence of two concepts of popular orality: the use of traditionally oral forms of communication with themes originating in oral culture, in conjunction with a modern medium enlisted in the service of raising the political as well as the cultural consciousness of a subordinate class and validating its needs and demands.

ELENA DE COSTA

Further Reading

Franco, Jean, “Latin American Literature in a Social Context,” Association of Departments of Foreign Languages 7 (March 1976)

—Folk Literature of the Mataco Indians, Los Angeles: Latin American Center Publications, 1982
—Folk Literature of the Toba Indians, Los Angeles: Latin American Center Publications, 1982 —Folk Literature of the Bororo Indians, Los Angeles: Latin American Center Publications, 1983
Olga Orozco 1920–

Argentine poet

Olga Orozco established her reputation as a somewhat atypical member of the Argentine “Generación del 40” with her first book of poetry, _Desde lejos_ [From Afar], which was published in 1946, the year of Juan Perón’s first election as president. Her most recent book, _Con boca en este mundo_ [With this Mouth in this World], was published to much acclaim in Buenos Aires in 1994. For a body of published work which has spanned almost five decades, Orozco’s poetic voice is remarkable, among other reasons, not only for its longevity, which no doubt accounts for much of its current resonance in her country, but also for its consistency. Orozco’s poetic universe, which she elaborates in eleven original books over a period in which the changes and shifts in Argentine society have been immense, seems to have remained relatively free from the common pressures to respond either to changing poetic fashions or to external political events.

While Orozco is mainly known as a poet, she has also published two books of prose fiction: _La oscuridad es otro sol_, 1967 [The Darkness is Another Sun] and _La luz es un abismo_, 1973 [The Light is an Abyss]. As Orozco has affirmed about the first of these volumes, her prose work gathers together autobiographical stories based on incidents from her early childhood in Toay in La Pampa province. These texts set in this distant small town—which are added to by the three previously unpublished stories which appeared in the later collection—share the same first-person narrator, the young girl Lía (Olga), as well as the same gallery of secondary characters, based on family members and friends. They also share the same focus: meditations on intimate events—both the traumatic and the everyday—conveyed in a language which cannot but reveal the verbal and conceptual traces of early Catholic indoctrination mixed with other related traditions of popular superstition and magic.

In many respects, while Orozco’s prose texts could be set easily in the modern Argentine short story tradition, with their echoes particularly of the work of Silvina Ocampo and of some early texts by Julio Cortázar (both friends of Orozco), they have more often been read as providing a useful explicatory framework for her poetry which has been seen as “difficult,” in other words, as philosophically, lexically and syntactically complex. From her first book to her last, Orozco’s long poems fill the pages with words, spilling over the line and exceeding the margins. In their subject matter, her poems juxtapose the two realms which are present in her prose texts: the orthodox and the unorthodox realms of the religious and the supernatural. In their form, they point constantly to the ritual and invocatory possibilities of poetry.
From her third book of poems onwards, Los juegos peligrosos, 1962 [Dangerous Games], this “other worldly” aspect comes to the fore in her work. But it is in her 1977 collection, Cantos a Berenice [Songs to Berenice], ostensibly a series of poems addressed to her cat, where Orozco’s usual subject matter—the proximity of the supernatural world to the everyday world—is cast solidly in specifically feminine terms, in this case, revolving around the relationship between the witch and her familiar. While Orozco would never claim to have been influenced by feminism, in this aspect her work shows similar esoteric and occult concerns present in the work of several European Surrealist women poets and writers, such as Leonora Carrington and Valentine Penrose. These writers belong to the same generation as Orozco and have attracted much recent feminist critical comment. This particular aspect of Orozco’s work merits a good deal more attention.

Her last four books of poetry have been increasingly involved in a more conventional religious exploration, with meditations on the process of aging, and on being surrounded by, and of communing with, the dead. While Orozco’s poetry has never openly tackled political themes, it is clear, however, that like the work of others from subsequent poetic generations in Argentina, her work, which speaks of silence, death and metaphysical anguish, has had a political resonance for its contemporary readers. Her recent book, Con esta boca en este mundo, with its abundant Eliotesque allusions, ends with a poem titled “Les jeux sont faits” [The Dice Are Thrown] which is a particularly good example of how these modern connotations arise: “Todo lo que recuerda mi boca fue borrado de la memoria de otra boca;/se alojó en nuestro abrazo la ceniza, se nos precipitó la lejanía,/y soy como la sobreviviente pompeyana/separada por siglos del amante sepultado en la piedra” (Everything my mouth remembers was wiped from the memory of another mouth;/has lodged in our embrace, distance pounced on us,/and I am like a Pompeian survivor/separated by centuries from the lover buried in the stone).

CATHERINE GRANT

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry

Desde lejos, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1946
Las muertes, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1952
Los juegos peligrosos, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1962
Museo salvaje, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1974
Cantos a Berenice, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1977
Mutaciones de la realidad, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1979
La noche a la deriva, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1984
En el revés del cielo, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1987
Con esta boca, en este mundo, edited by Jacobo Sefamí, Mexico City: Universidad Autónoma Metropolitana, 1992

Short Fiction
La oscuridad es otro sol, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1967
La luz es un abismo, Montevideo: Vintén, 1993

Compilations and Anthologies
Las muertes; los juegos peligrosos, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1972
Veintinueve poemas, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1975
Obra poética, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1979
Poesía: antología, edited by Telma Lazzani Bystrowicz, Centro editor de America Latina, 1982
Páginas de Olga Orozco seleccionadas por la autora Buenos Aires: Celia, 1984 [Contains secondary bibliography selected by the author, comments on her work by Guillermo Sucre, Juan Liscano, Enrique Molina and Alejandra Pizarnik, and an interview with Alicia Dujovne Ortiz]
Poemas, Medellin, Colombia: Departamento de Bibliotecas, Universidad de Antioquia, 1984
Antologia poética, Madrid: Ediciones de Cultura Hispánica, 1985

Further Reading
Colombo, Stella Maris, Metáfora y cosmovisión en la poesía de Olga Orozco, Rosario, Argentina: Cuadernos Altheia de Investigación y Ensayo, 1983
——Dos textos sobre la poesía de Olga Orozco, Buenos Aires: Tekni, 1980
Lojo, María Rosa, Olga Orozco: la poesía como viaje heroico, Buenos Aires: America Latina, 1988
Torres de Peralta, Elba, La poética de Olga Orozco: desdoblamiento de Dios en máscara de todos, Madrid: Playor, 1987
Fernando Ortiz 1881–1969

Cuban criminologist, ethnographer and anthropologist

Fernando Ortiz is regarded in Cuba as her leading intellectual between the death of José Martí in the Second War of Cuban Independence (1895–98) and the Cuban Revolution of 1959. Various Communist intellectuals associated with the revolutionary regime have seen him as an intellectual mentor, who, though not a Communist himself, had open, pluralistic attitudes which assumed mature shape during the “Popular Front” period of the mid-1930s. Both a nationalist and an internationalist, Ortiz argued that since reformist intellectuals and politicians had so dismally failed to guarantee cubanidad (Cubanness) between 1898 and 1959, a new generation was entitled to experiment with bolder revolutionary solutions. Educated in law in Madrid, Ortiz was influenced by the stress on an orderly evolution of society, as propounded by John Stuart Mill, by Positivist traditions both Comtean and Spencerian, and by the Functionalism of Durkheim. Ortiz studied too in Barcelona, where he was influenced by the protest of the “Generation of 1898” against the vacuousness and sterility then prevailing in Spanish intellectual life. Ortiz’s interests were broad, extending from law and criminology to archaeology, ethnography and anthropology. Between 1906 and 1916 Ortiz was a member of the House of Representatives, acquiring a reputation for moral probity by refusing offers of a share in the national lottery, one of the perquisites of office that brought the politics of the pseudo-republic into disrepute. Ortiz then withdrew from day-to-day politics, but continued to take part in public life as president of the Sociedad Económica de Amigos del País (Economic Society of Friends of the Country), director of the vigorous periodical Revista Bimestre Cubana [Cuban Bimonthly Review] and editor of Ultra. He was also an institutional innovator, founding the Sociedad del Folklore Cubano. He wrote occasional political pamphlets, with Ramiro Guerra y Sánchez and Emilio Roig y Leuschening, making trenchant critiques of Cuba’s internal organization and external relationships. The total output of Ortiz is voluminous. His complete works merit collection and publication.

Ortiz used Positivistic ideas and methods to undertake rational diagnoses of society and to devise practical solutions to perceived problems. For Ortiz, unlike some Mexican intellectuals, Positivism was an instrument for change, not a weapon of the status quo. Ortiz looked to the formation of a patriotic and disinterested meritocracy, and, influenced by the Italian socialist criminologist Enrico Ferri, was animated by the view that social cohesion and the quality of civic life would best be assured by a penal code designed to constrain despotism. From his boyhood experience of a clerical schooling and his observation of the identification of the Catholic Church with Spanish colonialism in the 18908, Ortiz derived a powerful anti-clericalism and a hostility to all forms of superstition and religious fanaticism. This was observed in both his pioneering studies of African-cult practices in Cuba and his historical study of “folk” Catholicism in the 17th century. Ortiz was careful, however, to stress that an irrational belief in the supernatural and a regression into primitive behaviour could be seen among Spanish immigrants (rich and poor) as well as among African-Cubans.

A second major theme in Ortiz’s writings is patriotic citizenship. His concern was to awaken Cubans to a greater awareness of the vitality of their national heritage through political pamphlets, works of philology and anthropological writings. Rejecting both an uncritical absorption of US culture and the alternative of Pan-Hispanism propagated from Spain, Ortiz looked to the evolution of a strong, independent republic inextricably linked with the notion of patriotic citizenship. The emancipation of an independent, sovereign Cuba was deferred by the failure of the intelligentsia to maintain the quality of leadership set by Martí and the patriotic heroes of the 1890s. Ortiz warned in 1924 of a national decline evident in poor literacy rates and falling school attendance disclosed by census data. Essential prerequisites of a strong republic included a thorough education reform, agrarian reform and the fragmentation of the large landed estates, and constitutional changes, above all clean, honest elections. It was characteristic of Ortiz that he chose to publish a selection of the writings against annexation to the United States by the Cuban intellectual of the mid-19th century, José Antonio Saco, to coincide with the peak of US hegemony and the entrenchment of the dictatorship of President Gerardo Machado. It was equally typical of Ortiz that he sought to revive memories of Martí in the year of the centenary of his birth (1953), shortly after Fulgencio Batista thwarted aspirations to democratic consolidation by seizing power in a coup.

The third main theme of Ortiz’s writings is ethnicity and race. Ortiz sought to arouse awareness of the Indo-Cuban past through his archaeological inquiries. But his studies of the African-Cuban present had more immediate and long-term impact. The customs, traditions, music, dance and folklore of African-Cubans were too glibly dismissed as being picturesque; they all merited rigorous study as invigorating features of national life. In a series of powerful studies, both historical and contemporary, of African-Cuban themes, Ortiz had the civic objective of demolishing racist orthodoxies, and of undermining the regulation of political rights and the mediation of citizenship by the state along ethnic lines. An efflorescence of African-Cuban militancy during the inter-war period, supported by advocates of an inclusionary cubanidad like Ortiz’s, did much to stimulate a public openness to the creative vitality of the politically committed poetry of Nicolás Guillén and the work of other lesser figures who lived the life of African-Cubans in their poetry. The democratic cosmopolitanism of Ortiz was manifest in his endorsement of rebuttals by democrats of Fascist and Nazi social theories, and in his reflections upon both the Holocaust and segregationism in the Deep South. For Ortiz there were no “predestined,” “chosen” or damned races, only racism, a tragic reality founded in a pernicious myth of superiority.

The discourse of Fernando Ortiz had three main strands. One was an invigorating eclecticism that reflected the strengths of Cuban intellectual traditions, and upon which the revolutionary regime drew in the 1960s and 1970s. A second unitary thread was a commitment to the concept and practice of patriotic citizenship and to the accountability of intellectuals and politicians. A third feature was his contribution to the international debate on themes of ethnicity and race, and, with regard to Cuba, to the question of constructing a national identity where the contributions of all ethnic groups were equally recognized.

CHRISTOPHER ABEL

Biography

Born in Havana, Cuba, 16 July 1881. Childhood spent in Menorca (Balearics) where he completed his secondary education. Studied law, first at the University of Havana, and later at Barcelona and Madrid. Obtained doctorate in law in 1901. Worked in Cuban consular service in various European countries. Started to teach law at Havana University in 1909. Among the founders of the Universidad Popular (intended for the unprivileged) in 1914. Editor of *Revista Bimestre founder of the Society of Cuban Folklore in 1924 and of their journal, Archivos del Folklore Cubano, in the same year. Lived in Washington from 1931 to 1933 when he took an active stand against the Cuban dictator, Gerardo Machado. Founded the Society for African-Cuban Received honorary doctorates from the universities of Columbia, Cuzco and Santa Clara (Cuba).
Died in 1969.

Selected Works

Ortiz’s output is vast, and as indicated in Christopher Abel’s article on him, as yet there is no edition of his complete works. Thus what is given here is a selection of his publications, which concentrates on those most likely to interest students of literature.
Details of a bibliography are also provided below.

Hampa afro-cubana. Los negros brujos, Madrid: Librería de F. Fé, 1906

El caballero encantado y la moza esquiva, Havana: Imprenta La Universal, 1910

La reconquista de América. Reflexiones sobre el panhispanismo, Paris: Ollendorf, 1910

Entre cubanos, Paris: Ollendorf, 1913

Un catauro de cubanismos, Havana: n.p., 1923

Glosario de afronegrismos, Havana: Imprenta El Siglo XX, 1924

La fiesta afrocubana del Día de Reyes, Havana: Imprenta El Siglo XX, 1915

“Los negros curros,” Archivos del Folklore Cubano, vol. 2 (1926–27); vol. 3 (1928)

“Más acerca de la poesía mulata. Escorzos para su estudio,” Revista Bimestre Cubana, vol. 37
(1936)

“La cubanidad y los negros,” Estudios Afro cubanos, vol. 3 (1939)

“América es un ajiaco,” La Nueva Democracia, vol. 21/11 (1940)

Contrapunteo cubano del tabaco y el azúcar, Havana: J. Montero, 1940; as *Cuban Counterpoint:
Tobacco and Sugar,* translated by Harriet de Onís, New York: Knopf, 1947

“Del fenómeno social de la transculturación y de su importancia en Cuba,” *Revista Bimestre
Cubana,* vol. 46 (1940)

“Los factores humanos de la cubanidad,” Revista Bimestre Cubana, vol. 21 (1940)

“Por la integración de blancos y negros,” Revista Bimestre Cubana, vol. 51 (1943)

El huracán. Su mitología y sus símbolos, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1947

“La ‘tragedia’ de los ſáñigos,” Cuadernos Americanos, vol. 52/4 (1950)

La africanía de la música folklórica de Cuba, Havana: Publicaciones del Ministerio de Educación, 1950

“Los negros y la transculturación,” La Nueva Democracia, vol. 31/1 (1951)

“Cubanidad y cubanía,” Islas, Santa Clara vol. 6/2 (1964)

Further Reading

Barnet, Miguel, “La segunda africanía,” Union, vol. 5/3 (July–September 1966)

———“Los estudios del folklore en Cuba,” in his La fuente viva, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1983

Coronil, Fernando, “Challenging Colonial Histories: Cuban Counterpoint/Ortiz’s Counterfetishism,” in Critical Theory, Cultural Politics and Latin American Narrative, edited by Steven M. Bell, Albert H. Le May and Leonard Orr, Notre Dame, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press, 1993

Miscelánea de estudios dedicados a Fernando Ortiz, Havana: Sociedad Económica de Amigos del País, 1956

Pérez Firmat, Gustavo, The Cuban Condition: Translation and Identity in Modern Cuban Literature, Cambridge and New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989 [Chapters I and 2 are on Ortiz]

Serrano, Carlos, “Miguel de Unamuno y Fernando Ortiz: un caso de regeneracionismo transatlántico,” Nueva Revista de Filología Hispánica, vol. 35/1 (1987)

Bibliographies

Juan L. Ortiz 1896–1978

Argentine poet

Juan L. Ortiz’s poetry only began to be widely known and read in Argentina—aside from a few honourable exceptions—in the 1960s. Moreover, the thirteen books of verse collected in En el aura del sauce, 1970–71 [In the Aura of the Willow] were only available in limited editions published by the author, and some of them, such as El junco y la corriente [The Rush and the Stream] or El Gualeguay [The Gualeguay River], had never actually appeared in book form before. En el aura del sauce, published in three volumes, more or less amounts to Ortiz’s complete works. It includes published but little-known collections, as well as previously unpublished works.

The most arresting feature of Ortiz’s work is its consistency, continuity and uniformity. From 1924, the date of his first known compositions, to 1970, Ortiz wrote and rewrote almost uninterruptedly his “conception of the world” (in Lucien Goldmann’s phrase), that is the world of the Argentine seashore, its constituent parts, its characteristics, its people. Ortiz was a virtuoso of monotony, for despite having written about the same figures and scenarios for almost fifty years, he always achieved difference and variation, always found that “something extra” in a line or verse which distinguishes invention from mere repetition. In this characteristic Ortiz is unparalleled in Argentine literature.

In the case of Ortiz, more so than for other Argentine poets, it is difficult to separate the life from the work. The poet’s entire existence as a discreet, taciturn administrator, withdrawn into a context of provincial tranquillity, seems to be manifested in his poems and throughout his entire production. This tranquility, this tender solitude and withdrawal, accompanies the continual presence of the coastal landscape, a presence which in its turn constitutes the essence of his poetry.

The search for harmony between certain objects, nature and the human presence is a characteristic of Ortiz’s poetry. This imperative recurs throughout his work, and indeed gives it poetic unity and coherence. Since this harmony can only be achieved provisionally and on rare occasions, Ortiz asserted, the poet’s task is to search and to question unceasingly. In his poetry, Ortiz attempts to draw back the veil from each entity and feature of the coastal cosmos; he has attempted to capture that mystery, that nakedness where the poetic essence of each entity and feature is to be found. Ortiz has striven to see beneath the surface, to a realm in which the harmony between objects, nature and the human presence is realized.

El agua y la noche [The Water and the Night], Ortiz’s first work, was published in 1933. It was followed by El alba sube, 1937 [The Dawn Rises], El ángel inclinado, 1938 [The Bowed Angel] and La rama hacia el este, 1940 [The Branch Bending to the East]. These four works form a unity which might be described as the basis of Ortiz’s vision of the banks of the river and its people. Here the poet establishes the inhabitants, atmosphere and situations of the poetic universe which all his subsequent works were to inhabit.

It was in El aire conmovido, 1949 [The Unquiet Air], however, that Ortiz managed to liberate poetry from the shackles of the poetic line—perhaps the most interesting poetic achievement of his work—in order to yoke it to language as a whole. Poetry would thus no longer be a technical problem of versification—as it continued to be for most Argentine poets of the era—becoming rather a problem of language and expression: “Mirábamos el río, las islas, este río, estas islas./Dos o tres notas, sólo, que jugaba apaciblemente/hasta el infinito, sin elevarse mucho,/en el brillo natural como rocío persistente./Una gracia quieta, quieta, de melodia algo aérea,/que se veía morir, sin embargo.” (We watched the river, the islands, this river, these islands./Just two or three notes, which played peacefully/into infinity, rising just a little,/in the splendour of nature like persistent dew./A still, still grace, with an airy melody/which nevertheless was visibly dying).

This affirmation of language itself as the very stuff of poetry—which as well as being the mark of his own work represents the poetic legacy taken up by writers such as Juan José Saer or Juan Gelman, to name two very different examples—is striven for by employing words in order to sound out their vital pulse: as Hugo Gola states in his prologue to En el aura del sauce, “Ortiz demonstrates in his work that he merely liberates the poetic treatment of the Word; anything else would be continued slavery. He thus situates himself, involuntarily, at the vanguard of a literature which strives to push back the confines of verse, breaking down all barriers and making language merely the raw material of poetry.”

The period spanning La mano infinita, 1951 [The Infinite Hand] to La orilla que se abisma, 1970 [The Abyssal Bank] and El Gualeguay (1970)—via La brisa profunda, 1954 [The Deep Breeze], El alma y las colinas, 1956 [The Soul and the Hills] and De las raíces y del cielo, 1958 [From the Roots and from Heaven]—can be defined as the second phase of Ortiz’s poetic output, in which the poetic universe of the seaboard, whose foundations were laid in his first four books, is more fully realized.
Generally literary critics have subsumed Ortiz’s works under the three headings of philosophically idealistic verse, the poetry of love for nature, and that of social commitment.

Ortiz, though he loathed dull provincialism, was much more than a mere imitator of Buenos Aires personalities or theories, as some have asserted. His autodidactic education and subtle irony gave him a remarkable lucidity from a young age (in the early years of the century, when Louis Aragon had hardly begun to be known in Buenos Aires, Juan José Saer recounts, “Ortiz had already translated a couple of his novels”). Despite his long-standing sympathy for communism, Ortiz was a libertarian spirit, free of aesthetic or social prejudices. The only creed he professed was an unparalleled curiosity and innocence, which he managed to convey in his verses with candour and wit. “The outstanding feature of his character,” adds Saer in relation to Ortiz, “was his generosity of spirit, a kind of cosmic compassion which caused him to consider every living thing worthy of friendship, solace and nurture.”

Imprisoned in the vastness of the seaboard, Ortiz made an art of monotony, a contemplative virtue of descriptive and allegorical reiteration: “In Ortiz thematic reiteration does not constitute repetition,” concludes Hugo Gola, “but rather observance of a “formal law of fantasy” which applies throughout Ortiz’s work. His insistence reveals an ever-renewed desire to capture images which call to him and force him to repeat tirelessly his expressive litany, so as to overcome inevitable despair, the bitter taste of ashes.”

Amidst unimagined vicissitudes, Ortiz has been a stalwart of integrity and asceticism. Devoted to anonymity and indifferent to formal and officious culture, he has painstakingly constructed a poetic world whose originality marks it as his own. Many of his verses bear a stamp which is quite unmistakable: “…alma, ¿por qué tiritas, si la melancolía, no lo ves? pasa a su cielo, allá en el cielo, encima del platino que pareciera el en sí del río…” (…soul, why do you shiver, when melancholy, don’t you see? passes on to its heaven, there, almost in an instant/over the platinum which seems the very essence of the river…), in La orilla que se abisma; or “Alma, inclínate ante los cariños idos…” (Soul, bow down before departed affections…) in El alma y las colinas; or that unforgettable ode to one of his many greyhounds in La brisa profunda: “Ay, oigo todavía tu llamado, tu súplica latida como desde una medrosa pesadilla/ whilst my heart, like your flanks, bleeds and bleeds, and March, amidst the sugar canes, still rains over you…).

As suggested previously, it is almost impossible not to link the works of Juanele (as his friends called him) with the story of his life. The pervasive sense of authenticity in all the poet’s descriptions is perhaps the principal evidence for such a link: here is a man who has wrought a means of writing out of existence itself, forged a daily necessity out of harmony. This is perhaps why his readers have been avid but few: to capture and to breathe these poems, the image of the poet is necessary. Where it intersects with the image of the poet himself, poetry is in fact just one more element of an entire contemplative harmony: in Ortiz, poetry is a tool for such a contemplation, for an acute and vigilant reflection on life.
“No olvidéis que la poesía/si la pura se nsitiva,” says the poet, “o la ineludible sensitiva/es asimismo, o acaso sobre todo, la intemperie sin fin / tendida, humildemente, para el invento del amor” (Do not forget that poetry./whether purely sensitive or inescapably sensitive/is also, perhaps above all, hard and endless vistas,/crossed, or crucified, if you prefer, by endless calls/and laid out, humbly, for the invention of love).

Such a conception of poetry, and its relation to the life of the poet, is perhaps the reason why Ortiz’s legacy, evident in a long and disparate generation of writers he influenced, has been that of a man of letters rather than that of a public poet.

Since the poet’s death in provincial obscurity during a dictatorship, his works have come to form a fitting biographical testimony; the verses now define Ortiz, not vice versa. The Argentine seaboard and Juan L. Ortiz have thus become so inextricably linked that it is impossible to talk about one without referring to the other, for he has been in a certain sense the founder of its handful of myths and the bearer of its joys.

CLAUDIO CANAPARO
translated by Ian Craig

Biography

Selected Works

All Ortiz’s books of poems are the traditional “slim” volumes. Thus, although they are all listed here, readers are likely to find the Complete Works in 3 volumes more useful.

Poetry

El agua y la noche, Buenos Aires: Biblioteca Editorial P.A.C, 1933
El alba sube, Buenos Aires: Rumbo, 1937
El ángel inclinado, Buenos Aires: Feria, 1938
La rama hacia el este, Buenos Aires: AIAPE, 1940
El álamo y el viento, Buenos Aires: Sauce, 1947
El aire conmovido, Buenos Aires: Sauce, 1949
La mano infinita, Buenos Aires: Llanura, 1951
La brisa profunda, Buenos Aires: Este, 1954
El alma y las colinas, Buenos Aires: Este, 1956
De las raíces y del cielo, Buenos Aires: Este, 1958

Complete Works
Oswald de Sousa Andrade, José

See Andrade

Miguel Otero Silva 1908–1985

Venezuelan prose writer and poet

It has been said that during Miguel Otero Silva’s long tenure as one of Venezuela’s most prominent narrators, he took his country’s literature to a new level using innovative narrative techniques. An exception is found in his first novel Fiebre, 1939 [Fever], where Otero Silva narrates in linear form the difficult moments of the political turmoil that Venezuela experienced in 1928 of which he was a protagonist, as were many other university students. Absent from its pages are the techniques—such as the experimentation with time—that were already used by writers of this period and initiated by Proust, Joyce, Faulkner and Virginia Woolf. The primary concern of the author in this youthful work is not of an aesthetic nature; rather, he seeks to engage with the suffering of a generation of people under a dictatorship.

It was sixteen years before Otero Silva’s next novel, Casas muertas, 1955 [Dead Houses] appeared, and this was the first to receive national and international recognition. During the years of literary silence, Otero Silva’s time was absorbed as editor-in-chief of El Nacional, the Caracas newspaper that he founded. In Casas muertas the author begins to use a chronological structure in a novel that apparently has a circular development. Apparently, because the last chapter is not narrated retrospectively as were the previous eleven; instead it projects itself away from the text to give birth to a new theme that will be fully developed in his next novel Oficina no. I, 1961 [Office Number I]. Even though there is perfect continuity between both works, in the second novel Otero Silva makes use of the double narrative plane and the flashback, techniques previously used in Venezuelan narrative by Enrique Bernardo Núñez. Both novels are preoccupied with the decay of the agricultural way of life in Venezuela and the sudden imposition of a new way of life based on the wealth created by the petroleum industry.

Following Oficina no. I, Otero Silva published La muerte de Honorio, 1963 [Honorio’s Death], Cuando quiero llorar no lloro, 1970 [I Can’t Cry When I Want to], Lope de Aguirre, príncipe de la libertad, 1979 [Lope de Aguirre Prince of Liberty] and lastly, La piedra que era Cristo, 1984 [The Rock that Was Christ].

Even though it is correct to state that all of Otero Silva’s novels incorporate elements of Venezuela’s contemporary history, Lope de Aguirre, príncipe de la libertad is the only one of his works that can be classified as a historical novel. It is in this work that the author is most concerned with historical truth but, on the other hand, he is not simply recounting the life of Lope de Aguirre, since the author presents an ideological reinterpretation of this historical figure’s life. Lope de Aguirre is a figure which has fascinated writers and artists both from Latin America and Europe. He is the protagonist of Daimón by the Argentine writer, Abel Posse; a source for the composite figure of the tyrant in Valle-Inclán’s brilliant avant garde novel, Tirano Banderas (The Tyrant) and the protagonist of the extraordinary film Aguirre the Wrath of God by the German director, Werner Herzog.

It is a common denominator of all Otero Silva’s novels to make use of characters that represent the ordinary people, many of whom are known only by their first name. More than characters, they are recognisable types that are at the forefront of Venezuela’s ever evolving history since they are found in the markets, political prisons, shanty towns, streets, and therefore are easily identifiable with the reader’s own experience.

JOSÉ B. ALVAREZ IV

Biography

Selected Works

Novels
Fiebre, Caracas: Elite, 1939
Casas muertas, Caracas: Pasa, 1955
Oficina no. I, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1961
La muerte de Honorio, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1963
Cuando quiero llorar no lloro, Caracas: Tiempo Nuevo, 1970
Lope de Aguirre, príncipe de la libertad, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1979
La piedra que era Cristo, Bogota: Oveja Negra, 1984
Poetry
Agua y cauce: poemas revolucionarios, Mexico City: Mexico Nuevo, 1937
La mar que es el morir, Caracas: Arte, 1965
Poesía completa, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1972

Other Writings
Elegía coral a Andrés Eloy Blanco, Caracas: Tipografía Vargas, 1958
Mexico y la revolución mexicana. Un escritor venezolano en la Unión Soviética, Caracas: Dirección de Cultura, Universidad Central de Venezuela, 1966
Andrés Eloy Blanco: homenaje en el LXXVIII aniversario de su natalicio, Caracas: Ediciones del Congreso de la República, 1974

Further Reading
Araujo, Orlando, “¿Qué buscaba Miguel Otero Silva?” in his Narrativa venezolana contemporánea, Caracas: Tiempo Nuevo, 1972
Barnola, Pedro Pablo, “Miguel Otero Silva y Casas muertas” in his Estudios crítico-literarios, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1970
Guaramato, Oscar, et al., Miguel Otero Silva y su tiempo, Cumaná, Venezuela: Universidad de Oriente, 1986
Márquez Rodríguez, Alexis, Acción y pasión en los personajes de Miguel Otero Silva y otros ensayos, Caracas: Academia Nacional de la Historia, 1985
Paz Castillo, Fernando, Miguel Otero Silva: su obra literaria, Caracas: Dirección de Cultura, Universidad Central de Venezuela, 1975
Szichman, Mario, Miguel Otero Silva: mitología de una generación frustrada, Caracas: Universidad Central de Venezuela, 1975

Interviews
“El compromiso esencial del artista es luchar por la paz del mundo (entrevista),” America Latina 12 (1980)
José Emilio Pacheco 1939–

Mexican poet, prose writer and translator
The work of José Emilio Pacheco is not confined to one genre. It includes poetry, the novel, the short story, theatre, the chronicle, translation. Activities that imply not only the production but also investigation and dissemination of culture. Since its beginnings during the early 1960s, in the field of literary journalism, his work has received increasing recognition, confirmed by national journalism and literature awards. Outside Mexico, Pacheco’s prestige allowed him to establish an international network of artistic and academic interchange that is evident in his poetry. Poems like “Turner’s Landscape,” “D.H.Lawrence y los poetas muertos” [D.H.Lawrence and the Dead Poets] or “‘Birds in the Night’ (Vallejo y Cernuda se encuentran en Lima)” [Vallejo and Cernuda Meet in Lima] call for a communal meeting of different cultural traditions. Pacheco’s Spanish versions of poetry written in other languages are regularly included in his own books under sections entitled “Approximations,” “Imitation,” “Reading of...”.

His critics regard him as the most important poet of his generation, and agree that his work, especially from No me preguntas cómo pasa el tiempo, 1969 (Don’t Ask Me How the Time Goes By), succeeds in widening poetry’s traditionally small circle of readers reducing the distance between the language of the specialist and that of the average inhabitant of the Latin American metropolis. The means he uses have been described in terms of “conversational language,” “collage,” “ready-made,” “graffiti.”

The first concept describes the predominant presence of linguistic forms that prioritize communication and resemble those used to transmit pragmatic information in everyday exchange, as in the case of the poem “Hoy mismo” [Right Now]: “Mira como las cosas que se van/Recuérdala pasoporque no volverás/a verlas nunca.” (Take a good look at things as they go/Remember them/for you will never/see them again). “Collage” refers to the presence of diverse objects in an environment that is conventionally alien to them. In Pacheco’s poetry, this is evident in the inclusion or insertion of epigraphs and titles (lines taken literally from other writers) or of codes disassociated from poetry (journalistic, historical, mathematical and biological language)—as is the case of the poem “Tema y variaciones: los insectos” [Theme and Variations: Insects]: “El esfex de alas amarillas ataca/al saltamontes/Abre con su aguijón tres orificios/Pone sus huevecillos en las heridas/a fin de que al nacer los esfex/se coman vivo al prisionero que fue su tierra y cuna.” (The yellow winged esfex attacks/ the grasshopper/It opens three holes with its stinger/Lays its small eggs in the wounds/so that the newborn esfex/may eat alive/the prisoner that was their land and cradle.) These lines also shed light on the concept of “ready-made”. The critic José Miguel Oviedo has described it as Pacheco’s skilful use or manipulation of an object not “made” with artistic aims, but rather “found” for that purpose. The poet succeeds in rapidly bringing the reader and the poem together by means of the anomaly effected by reproducing the object in a foreign context. This operation suggests other contents and provokes a revision of its original meaning. Lastly, the concept of “graffiti” emphasizes the efficiency with which ephemeral writing reaches the reader. Presented in a space where the written word’s capacities for recording and transcending are not justified, the graffiti’s presence produces an impact because of its irony, which makes it stand out and gives it meaning by contrast. These mechanisms, that appeal to and reach the reader in various degrees, permit Pacheco to exercise a philosophical and social criticism (abstract and concrete) in which the traditional heights of specialization and its languages are reduced in order to allow a common ground of opinion for different types of readers.

This multiple presence of writing, voices and images previously created by others, has been understood as “intertextuality”. Michael Doudoroff finds that the most interesting thing about this phenomenon in Pacheco’s work is how the writer neutralizes the borders that conventionally divide literary experience from other types of experiences. The intertextualities of his poems allow Pacheco to establish a variety of places and moments in which to situate an experience, and the reflection and analysis that it provokes. In the synthetic mention of cities, landscapes, historical scenarios and characters, or cultural references, readers gain access to a cosmopolitan world that also reaches them through their familiarity with mass media (radio, TV, films) and the products of the consumer society surrounding them. The distance between poetry and the average citizen is thus reduced. This dissolving of borders allows the construction of poems as sharp “literary” comments originating from a vast spectrum of non literary themes (a street scene, travels, the reading of a book, a newspaper article, a machine, all things as being in constant motion and faced with the inevitability of their eventual disappearance, as in poems such as “Conversación romana” [Roman Conversation]. The sum of these reveals the unified vision underlying his multifaceted interests.

Despite the presence of highly communicative language, José Emilio Pacheco does not actually follow the tracks of “conversational” poetry, that reached its peak in Spanish America during the 1960s (Ernesto Cardenal—a poet to whom Pacheco pays homage—is one of its most prestigious figures), but rather, circulates among different languages and voices, making use of codes found primarily in dialogue while, at the same time, employing specialized vocabulary or words forgotten in everyday speech.

With regard to his versions in Spanish of other writers’ works, Pacheco has said in the introductory note to his book Tarde o temprano, 1980 [Sooner or Later]: “In some way they are not, as one might believe, ‘translations of translations’, but rather poems based on other poems. I consider these pieces a collective work that should be anonymous and, to me, it seems abusive to sign it.” The same criteria that can be used to explain the presence of intertextuality can be applied to his other stylistic devices. Universal poetry seen as a flowing process of continual becoming, the writing of an author is but one more contribution, always limited and ephemeral as is one’s life in cosmic terms. In the poem “A quien pueda interesar” [To Whom It May Concern], Pacheco writes: “La poesía que busco/es como un diario/en donde no hay proyecto/ni medida.” (the poetry I seek/is like a journal/ that has no project/nor measure.)
Already in El reposo del fuego, 1966 [The Resting Place of Fire], the idea of an ephemeral life/work was contained in the image of the rapid combustion of the flame: “Arden las llamas / mundo y fuego / Mira / la hoja al viento / tan triste / de la hoguera. / Es hoguera el poema / y no perdura / Hoja al viento / también / tristísima.” (the flames burn/world and fire./Look at/the leaf in the wind/so sad/of the bonfire. //The poem is a bonfire/and it does not last/A leaf in the wind/too/also very sad). According to Pacheco’s poetics, the project of every human being is a constant beginning with no possibility of completion. As with the nature of the flame, the goal is to burn for an instant. Completion is just an appearance, the abandonment of a project halfway through, because even short-term human achievements are deceptively projected toward transcendence. Human beings suffer from a terrible illusion of immortality. Before reaching its impossible finale everything disintegrates. The object of all existence is a constant beginning that will be taken over by another builder whose reason for being is to collaborate in the construction of a monumental building of beginnings. This idea can be traced throughout his later work, for example in the volume Miro la tierra [I Look at the Earth], thus entitled in memory of the earthquake that destroyed part of Mexico City in 1985: “Todos sufrimos la derrota / somos víctimas del desastre / Pero en vez de llorar actuemos / Con piedras de las ruinas hay que forjar / otra ciudad, otro país, otra vida.” (We all suffer the defeat/we are victims of the disaster/But instead of crying let us act/With stones from the ruins we must forge/another city, another country, another life).

In Pacheco’s narrative, the novella Las batallas en el desierto, 1981 (Battles in the Desert), earned him the unanimous recognition of his critics. The motives and results contained in the rest of his works can be found in its plot. An adolescent, Carlitos, falls in love with Mariana, the young mother of his best friend, Jim. While Carlitos’s love suffers repression from family, the metropolis, Mexico City during the 1940s, changes and the country undergoes economic modernization. The narration interweaves childhood memories, recounted by the now adult character, with the more immediate actions of Carlitos as a child. Writing about this novel, Hugo Verani says: “The story, apparently trivial, comes out strongly imprinted with a will to demythify childhood as a golden age and to question the established order: that of the Mexican bourgeoisie and its values.” Here, childhood is just one more beginning with the illusion of completion, with adulthood it begins to crumble halfway through.

Pacheco’s social and philosophical criticism has attracted the attention of those who see modernization as a threat to the global ecological balance. A number of his poems dealing with nature, especially animals and insects as victims of the human search for immortality and well-being, have been collected in anthologies such as Fin de siglo y otros poemas, 1984 [End of the Century and Other Poems], and Album de zoología, 1991 (An Ark for the Next Millennium), and have awakened a renewed interest in his work.

Luis REBAZA-SORALUZ

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry

Los elementos de la noche, Mexico City: UNAM, 1963

El reposo del fuego, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1966

Irás y no volverás, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1973

Islas a la deriva, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1976

Ayer es nunca jamás, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1978

Tarde o temprano, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1980 [Includes translations of other poets’ work]

Los trabajos del mar, Mexico City: Era, 1983

Fin de siglo y otros poemas, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1984

Alta traición, Madrid: Alianza, 1985

Album de zoología, Guadalajara: Cuarto Menguante, 1985; An Ark for the Next Millennium, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993 [selections]

Short Fiction

La sangre de Medusa, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1958

El viento distante y otros relatos, Mexico City: Era, 1963

El principio del placer, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1972

La sangre de Medusa y otros cuentos marginales, Mexico City: Era, 1990

Novel

Morirás lejos, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1967

Other Writings

Poesía modernista, Mexico City: SEP/UNAM, 1982,

Crónica del puerto de Veracruz, in collaboration with Fernando Benítez, Xalapa, Mexico: Gobierno del Estado de Veracruz, 1986

Anthologies in Translation

Compilations and Anthologies
José Emilio Pacheco: selecciones, edited by Luis Antonio de Villena, Madrid: Júcar, 1986

Further Reading
D’Lugo, Carol Clark, “Narrative and Historical Commitment in Pacheco’s Morirás lejos, Chasqui,” vol. 19/2 (1990)
Jiménez de Báez, Yvette, Diana Morán and Edith Negrin, Ficción e historia. La narrativa de José Emilio Pacheco, Mexico City: El Colegio de Mexico, 1979
Verani, Hugo J. (editor), José Emilio Pacheco ante la crítica, Mexico City: UNAM, 1987; revised edition as La hoguera y el viento: José Emilio Pacheco ante la crítica, Mexico City: Era, 1993
Ricardo Palma 1833–1919

Peruvian prose writer

Though he began his literary career as a dramatist and poet, Ricardo Palma remains best known as the author of Tradiciones peruanas [Peruvian Traditions], collected in ten volumes and a supplement published over a period of nearly forty years (1872–1910). Many individual pieces had appeared in journals from as early as 1851, and many were extensively rewritten before republication, a practice which has created complex bibliographical problems for scholars.

The tradición as a genre was Palma’s creation. Among its formal predecessors, Quevedo’s Sueños come first, followed by the “letters” of 18th-century writers such as Montesquieu, Voltaire and Cadalso, Larra’s essays, and Spanish costum-bristas such as Estébanez Calderón and Mesonero Romanos; all of these offered possible models for describing aspects of social behaviour, though only occasionally from a historical perspective. On the other hand, Bécquer’s leyendas, most of which were written during the decade before the publication of the first series of Tradiciones peruanas, showed how the late Middle Ages and the Renaissance could become the settings for romantic short stories as well as for full-scale novels in the manner of Sir Walter Scott.

The distinctive feature of the tradición is the historical note with which Palma interrupts his brief narratives, often drawing the reader’s attention to the device as he does so. These notes supply information drawn from chronicles or histories, or from their documentary sources, concerning the principal figures of the period in which the anecdote is set, and especially the viceroy of the day, whose titles and honours are listed in full, as a preliminary to a brief outline of his career. The majority of these notes concern colonial Peru, with occasional excursions into the pre-Columbian era or the more recent period since Independence; a few draw on the history of a foreign nation, usually one of Peru’s neighbours. The information is offered for its own sake, and contributes little or nothing to a better appreciation of the tradición’s particular anecdote, while its fragmentary presentation—brief notes spread across many tradiciones—prevents any possibility of its constituting a coherent popular history of Peru.

The tradiciones cover the entire range of Peruvian society, from viceroy to beggar, observed in a wide variety of situations. Courtiers, officials, clergy, lawyers, merchants, tradespeople, artists and rogues, all take their turn as the focus of Palma’s attention. Some of the rarer crafts require explanation; the author’s lively curiosity ensures that it is given with due attention to detail. At other times, as with the legal and medical professions, Palma can rely on common prejudice to do the work for him; the reader needs no prompting or direction as to ambiances such as these.

The historical notes in the tradición, especially when supported by archival documents, could be seen as authenticating the narrative they accompany. In many instances the anecdote indeed has a core of fact, but Palma has glossed and reworked his material to create an aesthetically pleasing text which is neither true history nor wholly fiction. Elsewhere the fictional element predominates, embroidering standard folktale motifs. As might be expected of the colonial period, many deal with matters of honour lost or impugned and vengeance taken, a rich source of material, already thoroughly exploited in Spanish Golden Age drama: the quarrel may be occasioned by direct verbal or physical insult, or arise from some misconduct with women, whether actual or merely perceived, or be the result of violating conventions of rank or social status; and vengeance may be swift and instinctive, taken in the heat of the moment, or coldly calculated and executed long after the event. Other tradiciones owe more to the picaresque repertoire of tricks and deceptions, generally practiced for personal gain but at times as returns in kind for the malicious actions of other people. A third source of material, again predictable in the context, is religion, and especially miracles attributed to the intervention of those saints who were the objects of popular devotion; punishment for sacrilegious acts against them is a particularly common theme.

Palma was fascinated by popular turns of phrase and many tradiciones are devoted to explaining their origin with a picturesque character in a specific situation. His love of language is reflected in the style he developed for the tradición jocular and ironic, full of allusion and wordplay, switching easily from echoes of Golden Age authors to contemporary colloquialisms. Palma’s highly individual style charmed his readers, but also discouraged imitation; the form he created, the tradición, effectively died with him.

RON KEIGHTLEY

Biography

Born in centre of Lima, Peru, 7 February 1833. Illegitimate son of Pedro Palma and Guillerma Carrillo, both pardos (mulattos). Mother died in Palma’s childhood, a period of considerable political upheaval. Published early poems in the newspaper El Comercio, 1848. Took part in conspiracy against president Ramón Castilla in 1860, later an ally and friend. Spent next three years in exile in Chile. This experience broadened his intellectual horizons and gave him an interest in history. Travelled to Europe in 1864 and visited London, Paris and Venice. Acted as personal secretary to José Balta during latter’s presidency which started in 1868. Later Palma was both deputy and senator for several terms. Married Cristina Roman in 1876. Named corresponding member of Royal Spanish Academy of the Language, 1878. Home in Miraflores burnt down by Chilean troops during war of 1879–83. Lost the manuscript of a work in progress, “Los Marañones,” as well as books and documents. Named director of National Library in 1883 and became known as “the begging librarian” because the library had been sacked by Chilean troops. Travelled to Spain in 1892. Last years spent in semi-retirement. Gave up directorship of National Library in 1911 and died at his home in Miraflores on 6 October 1919.

Selected Works

Poetry

Armonías: libro de un desterrado, Paris: Librairie de Charles Bouret, 1865

Pasionarias, Le Havre, France: Typographie Alphonse Lemale, 1870

Verbos y gerundios, Lima: Benito Gil, 1877

Filigranas, Lima: Imprenta Benito Gil, 1892

Prose Works

Corona patriótica, Lima: Tipografia del Mensajero, 1853

El demónio de los Andes, New York: Imprenta “Las Notedades,” 1883
Cachivaches, Lima: Imprenta Torres Aguirre, 1900

Compilations and Anthologies
Tradiciones peruanas completas, edited by Edith Palma, Madrid: Aguilar, 1952 [There are several later editions. Apart from including all the Tradiciones, this volume carries Anales de la Inquisición de Lima, La bohemia de mi tiempo, and Neologismos y americanismos]
Cartas inéditas de Ricardo Palma, edited by Rubén Vargas Ugarte, Lima: Carlos Milla Batres, 1964

Translations
The Knights of the Cape, translated by Harriet de Onís, New York: Knopf, 1945 [Includes the title story and 37 other Tradiciones]

Further Reading

Porras Barrenechea, Raúl, “Palma romántico,” in Tres ensayos sobre Ricardo Palma, Lima: Mejía Baca, 1954 [Contains poems by Palma not included elsewhere]

Panama

19th- and 20th-Century Narrative and Poetry

Just as Central American literature in general is one of the least known literatures of Latin America, so Panamanian letters, in particular, have been the least disseminated and internationally recognised. To the world, Panama is the country of the Canal, the Isthmus with its corridor linking two oceans: a stop-over point. To the Panamanian, this special geographical situation has been the defining feature of the nation’s economic, political, social and cultural history.

Panamanian literature begins before Panama became an independent country. On 2.8 November 1821 the Isthmus broke away from the Spanish empire and on 24 February 1822. It was incorporated into Colombia. From the outset Panama suffered the consequences of living under Colombian rule, and separatist feeling developed. The physical distance between the two countries led to the stagnation of Panama’s political, economic and cultural life, and to neglect in the areas of health and education. From the beginning, therefore, the Isthmus thought of itself as an appendage independent of Colombia.

The introduction of printing in 1821, at the end of the colonial era, facilitated the publication of newspapers in which the intellectual and literary output of the Republic’s writers appeared. Mariano Arosemena (1794–1868), politician, journalist, diarist and one of the signatories of the Act of 1821, began to publish his ideas on the future of the Isthmus in the first newspapers of the era. A complete version of his Apuntamientos históricos [Historical Summaries], which appears in fragmentary form in newspapers during 1868 and 1869, was published in 1949. The work narrates the political, cultural and social history of Panama in the first forty years of the 19th century. Its value lies in its minutely detailed account of the events of the era, making it an indispensable source for students of the period.

The author’s son, Justo Arosemena (1817–96), a doctor of law, representative, senator, diplomat and, briefly, President of the Federal State of Panama, is perhaps the most important figure in Panamanian political thought of the 19th century. In 1852, Justo Arosemena put forward a constitutional reform project to the Colombian congress. The project proposed making the Isthmus a federal state, autonomous with respect to home affairs, but dependent on the central government with regard to currency, foreign affairs, weights and measures, the Army and Navy, and the naturalization of foreign citizens. The project was turned down. Arosemena continued to campaign tenaciously by penning newspaper articles. In his works Comentario al proyecto de acto reformatorio, 1852, [Report on the Reform Act Project] and El estado federal de Panamá, 1855 [The Federal State of Panama], he argues brilliantly in favour of Panamanian national interests and the creation of the federal state. In 1855 the Colombian Congress drew up the Additional Act of the Constitution, in which Panama is designated a federal state (though it was returned to provincial status in 1885), thanks to the eloquent reasoning of Arosemena. Despite his duties as a public servant, Arosemena’s output was prolific, and included numerous essays, as well as political, legal and moral treatises.

In the second decade of the 19th century a group of poets formed which Rodrigo Miró has called the first literary generation of Panama. It included Gil Colunje (1831–99), Tomás Martín Feuillette (1832–62) and Amelia Denis (1836–1911). This era is characterized by large-scale social upheavals and feverish commercial activity, caused by an influx of North Americans spurred on by the discovery of gold in California, by the building of the Trans-Isthmus railway, and by the construction of the Panama Canal by the French. Gil Colunje launched his career with a sketch for a novel, La verdad triunfante, 1849 [Triumphant Truth], which originally appeared in instalments. Though Rodrigo Miró grants the work scant literary merit and concentrates on its documentary interest, Ramón Luis Acevedo identifies La verdad triunfante as the first Central American Romantic novel. However, Colunje is firmly established in the history of Panamanian letters as a poet. He wrote one of the key poems of the period, the ode “28 de noviembre” [28 November]. In it the poet sings to liberty from colonial subjection, to Bolívar and his American dream of a Great Colombia, and he closes with a prophetic characterization of the “American Isthmus” as a means of linking the two worlds. Tomás Martin Feuillet developed a poetic style which was lyrical and emotive without being sentimental, not dissimilar to that of Bécquer, though without the latter’s sobriety. Occasionally Feuillet produced surprising comic verses, in which he criticized the commercialism of the era. His ballad “Retrato” [Portrait], in which he describes himself humorously and in detail, is of documentary value. The female representative of the Romantic period is Amelia Denis, who lived in Guatemala for several decades with her first husband, and for long periods in Nicaragua with her second. In Guatemala she wrote for various newspapers under the pseudonym “Elena.” The two principal themes of her poetry are domestic life and social injustice. The poem which secured her place in the Panamanian literary canon is “Al cerro Ancón” [To Ancón Hill], inspired by her last visit to Panama in 1906. Drawing on personal recollections, the poet paints a melancholy picture of the nation’s loss of territory to the United States because of the construction of the Canal. The work is prescient, for in the location of the title one of the most violent confrontations between Panama and the United States was to take place, decades later, over the question of respect for Panamanian sovereignty. “Al cerro Ancón” introduces the theme of the Canal, which was to reappear, more or less insistently, throughout 20th-century Panamanian literature.

The beginning of the modernista period was marked by Darío Herrera (1870–1914), more accomplished as a prose writer than as a poet, who was one of the first writers to turn his hand to the short story. His poetic output is Parnassian in character, and is largely made up of descriptive evocations of the era. Some of his poems are monotonous. His stories are more descriptive than narrative and his prose is meticulous. He published a single volume of short stories, Horas lejanas, 1903 [Distant Hours]. Lejanías, 1971 [Distant Places] is a partial collection of his poetic works. The rest of his literary output, which consists of chronicles, stories, verses and criticism, is scattered throughout newspapers and journals of the continent. The principal woman writer of the period is Nicole Garay (1873–1928). Though some critics compare Garay’s poetry to that of Amelia Denis, seeing parallels in the common focus on social issues, her verses are in fact very different. Garay’s work bears a decidedly modernist stamp. Some of her poems are pictorial compositions whose antecedents are clearly Parnassian. Her poem “Esplín” [Spleen] is characterized by a sense of weariness with life, a malaise suffered by many modernistas such as Julián del Casal and Julio Herrera y Reissig. Garay’s work evinces a rebelliousness absent in Denis, and contains more daring images, musicality and Symbolist undertones.

The struggle against centralized Colombian rule came to a head in the Thousand Days War (1889–1902.), in which Panama fought in the, ranks of the liberal party. The failure of the French Canal and, later on in 1903, the Colombian Senate’s rejection of the Herrán-Hay Treaty, which envisaged the building of a Canal using North American capital, provoked a resurgence of Panamanian separatist feeling, particularly among the commercial bourgeoisie. Aware of the trading interests of the Isthmus, this group saw the beginning of a prosperous future in the North American proposal. The United States took advantage of the climate of discontent to facilitate Panama’s separation from Colombia on the 6th of November 1903. Almost immediately, the Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty with the United States, in which Panama conceded almost all rights and privileges as well as a strip of its territory in perpetuity, was signed and ratified. From this moment on, the political and economic life of the Isthmus has revolved around the Canal, which was opened in 1914. Henceforward Panamanian history is characterized by frequent negotiations for more equitable treaties and by defence of territorial sovereignty and national interests. There have been several violent confrontations with the United States over its interference in Panamanian affairs, the most recent being the US invasion of Panama on 20th December 1989.

The first generation of poets of this new historical era are Ricardo Miró (1883–1940), María Olimpia de Obaldía (1891–1985), Gaspar Octavio Hernández (1893–1918) and Demetrio Korsi (1899–1957). Miró is considered to be Panama’s greatest poet. The National Literature Competition, founded in 1942, is named after him. Though the modernista influence is evident in the poet’s imagery, verse forms and use of rhythm, Miró’s poetry is more sober and intimate. Nationalism is a recurrent theme in his work. Particularly worthy of note is his poem “Patria” [Homeland], in which the poetic narrator forges a sense of national identity using personal experiences and intimate recollections, similar to the nostalgia for home. His works include Preludios, 1908, Los segundos preludios, 1916 [Second Preludes], La leyenda del Pacífico, 1919 [The Legend of the Pacific], Versos patrióticos y recitaciones escolares, 1925 [Patriotic Verses and School Readings], Caminos silenciosos, 192,9 [Silent Paths], El poema de la reencarnación, 192,9 [Reincarnation Poem] and Obra literaria de Ricardo Miró: novela y cuento, 1984 [The Writings of Ricardo Miró: Novels and Short Stories].

The poetry of María Olimpia de Obaldía, the first woman to gain admission to the Panamanian Academy of the Language (from 1951 to 1985), is simple and emotive. The poet revels in the treatment of exclusively female experiences such as motherhood, child-birth and breast-feeding. The sensuality of love is subtly alluded to in her work, but the poet stops short of eroticism. Gaspar Octavio Hernández was an exponent of different modernista styles. A certain preciousness, exoticism and the evasion of reality are evident in some of his poems. Others, however, are fervently patriotic and nationalistic, and protest at North American interference in the affairs of the Isthmus. Hernández’s work also includes a small selection of popular and comic verse, which were the stock in trade of Demetrio Korsi. Korsi is the chronicler of the life of the urban people. In technical terms, his poems show avant-garde tendencies in their experimentation with free verse.

The arrival of the avant-garde in Panama is marked by the publication of the collection Onda, 192,9 [Wave] by Rogelio Sinán (1904–94), the pseudonym of Bernardo Domínguez Alba. Sinán is the outstanding figure in 20th-century Panamanian literature, and the best-known internationally. He turned his hand to all genres, having come to prominence as a master of the short story in works such as A la orilla de las escuelas maduras, 1946 [On the Brink of the Mature Schools], La boina roja, 1954 [The Red Beret] and El candelabro de los malos oficios, 1982 [Candelabra of Dead End Jobs]. Plenilunio, 1947 [Full Moon], published in the heyday of Creolism in Panama, is perhaps one of the first Spanish American novels to focus entirely on the subject of metafiction and the active participation of the reader. The author/narrator, of the type one finds in Pirandello or Unamuno, initially addresses a female narratee, who withdraws to a bedroom since the author is being visited by the characters. The characters constantly discuss the story’s style, and rebel against the ending, which they propose to rewrite, but which ultimately remains incomplete. The author thus suggests one of the most important principles of the aesthetics of reception, namely that the creative potential of different readings and interpretations of a work is infinite. Sinán’s second novel, La isla mágica, 1979 [The Magical Island], sustains the ludic tone of Plenilunio, but in a different way. In the earlier work the author establishes a metaphysical game which challenges the reader. In la isla mágica, playfulness is evident in the size of the story, in the multiple names ascribed to a single character, in the way religious imagery is used to describe genital organs or sexual acts, in Pipe the black man’s ruses to deflower maidens, and, above all, in a series of comic scenes of ordinary folk. This work is wholly characteristic of the new Panamanian novel of the 1970s.

Sinán also revitalized Panamanian poetry. The avant-garde was still unknown in Panama when Onda appeared. Avantgarde and post avant-garde literature took off as a result of Sinán’s energy. Demetrio Herrera (1902–50) achieved fame when he published Kodak, 1937, which shows the influence of ultraismo (a Spanish avant-garde movement of the 1920s). Herrera’s poetic voice is that of the social rebel who chronicles the life of the slums. The post avant-garde poets include Ricardo J. Bermúdez (1914–), Esther María Osses (1916–90), Stella Sierra (1917–) and Diana Morán (1932–87).

The group of poets who began to publish in the 1960s is made up of Ramón Oviero, Moravia Ochoa and Bertalicia Peralta. These poets were decisive in condemning the North American invasion in 1989 (La voz aún no quemada [Our Still Unburned Voice, 1990]). Oviero’s work since 1961 is collected in Inventariando, 1985 [Making an Inventory]. Ochoa has published Ganas para un poco vivir, 1975 [Desirous of a Little Living] and Me ensayo para ser una mujer, 1983 [I Am Rehearsing to Be a Woman]. The best of Peralta’s work includes Sendas fugitivas, 1962 [Fleeing Paths] and Piel de gallina, 1982 [Goose Flesh]. The younger generation of poets consists of Manuel Orestes Nieto, Giovanna Benedetti, Pedro Correa (1955–) and Consuelo Tomás (1957–). Manuel Orestes Nieto won the Casa de las Américas prize for his collection Dar la cara [Facing Up] in which he testifies to the damage caused to the country by the US occupation of the Canal. Rendición de cuentas, 1990 [The Reckoning] is a collection of the author’s output over twenty years. Consuelo Tomás is a poet and author of short stories. She has published five poetry collections and a book of stories, Cuentos rotos, 1991 [Torn Tales]. In 1994 she won Miró prizes in the poetry section, for Agonía de la reina [Queen’s Agony], and the short story section, for Inauguración de la fe [Inauguration of Faith]. Tomás is one of the most promising young writers of the Isthmus. Popular humour and the grotesque are features of her work.

From the second decade of the 20th century, the short story begins to replace poetry as the dominant genre. Initially, peasant life is the most common subject matter. The rural theme is most effectively explored by Graciela Rojas Sucre, in Terruñadas de lo chico, 1931 [Smallholdings], and by Gil Blas Tejeira, in El retablo de los duendes, 1945 [The Goblin’s Altarpiece] and Campiña interiorana, 1947 [Heartlands]. The Creolist short story tradition began with José María Sánchez. His stories, set in Boca del Toro, describe the atmosphere of the exuberant natural setting in which the United Fruit Company establishes itself, and in which a colony of blacks from the British West Indies lives and works. Tres cuentos, 1946 [Three Stories] and Shumio-Ara (1948) are especially noteworthy. In Los clandestinos, 1957 [Illegal Aliens], César A. Candanedo describes aspects of life in Darién and in the banana growing area of Chiriquí. With the works Campo adentro, 1947 [Inland] and Luna de Veraguas [Veraguas Moon], Mario Augusto Rodríguez became the representative of “Cholo” or mixed race literature. Carlos F.Chang Marín began as a poet but achieved fulfilment in prose. The Creolist tradition is continued in Faragual (1961), though the work also explores self-consciousness and the complexity of discourse in the story “Seis madres” [Six Mothers]. The work of Renato Ozoares marks a shift from rural to urban settings. Part of his short story output is collected in Un incidente y otros cuentos, 1947 [An Incident and Other Stories] and El dedo ajeno, 1954 [The Other’s Finger]. In the 1960s and 1970s, the literary preoccupation with city life is accompanied by the first stylistic innovations and experiments in Panamanian fiction. The best contemporary exponents of the short story appear on the scene at this time: Pedro Rivera, Dimas Lidio Pitti, Enrique Jaramillo Levi, Moravia Ochoa and Bertalicia Peralta. These writers consolidate their reputations in the 1980s. In the 1990s, along with Tomás, Antonio Paredes Villegas is worthy of particular note. In El duende y otros cuentos, 1993 [The Goblin and Other Stories], Paredes deconstructs popular myths using empirical discoveries.

The novel came late to Panama. Poetry dominated the national literary output for many decades, until the short story began to gain ground in the 1920s and 1930s. It was not until the 1940s that the novel began to develop as a genre in Panamanian letters. The chief exponent of the Canal novel is Joaquín Beleño. His trilogy on the subject consists of Luna verde, 1951 [Green Moon], Gamboa Road Gang (1959) and Curundú (1961). El desván, 1954 [The Attic] by Ramón H. Jurado, is a psychological novel concerning the preoccupation with the human inability to communicate, which was a central theme in Spanish American fiction of the era. It is narrated by an unreliable and unauthoritative narrator, who, by establishing a distance between himself and the reader, obliges the latter to participate actively. In El ahogado, 1957 [The Drowned Man], Tristán Solarte (1924) interweaves the life of the protagonist with the myth of the “tulivieja.” The story appears to be recounted by a traditional third person narrator, but this is an illusion, since an enigma remains ultimately unresolved: who killed the protagonist? This feature suggests a more experimental type of fiction, in keeping with the changes beginning to take place in Spanish American literature of the period.

In the 1960s, while the canon of the Spanish American new novel was being established, Panamanian output was prolific (twenty five novels, as against fifteen in the 1950s) but traditional in character, apart from the exceptions mentioned above. The principal figures to emerge in this decade, Justo Arroyo and Gloria Guardia, have remained dominant to the present day. Arroyo’s La gayola, 1966 [The Slammer] brings the Panamanian novel into line with the Boom of Spanish American fiction which, in the case of Panama, takes off in the 1970s. As well as Guardia and Arroyo, Panama’s Boom generation includes Enrique Chuey, Saúl Trinidad Torres, Dimas Lidio Pitti and Rafael Pernett y Morales. Arroyo has been one of the most active writers of contemporary fiction in Panama. In the 1970s he published Dedos, 1971 [Fingers], Dejando atrás al hombre de celofán, 1973 [Leaving Behind the Cellophane Man] and El pez y el segundo, 1979 [The Fish and the Second]. In structural terms, Dedos is the most innovative. In it the author experiments with all the formal techniques assimilated from the Spanish American new novel: multiple viewpoints, rupture of the chronological order, switching of narrative styles and defamiliarization of the creative act. Arroyo has also published another novel Geografía de mujer, 1981 [A Woman’s Geography], and two volumes of short stories Capricornio en gris, 1972 [Capricorn in Grey] and Rostros como manchas, 1992, [Faces like Stains]. Gloria Guardia’s Tiniebla blanca, 1961 [White Shadow] is very much a first novel, without formal innovations, but it firmly established the author in Panamanian literary circles. El último juego, 1976 [The Last Game], with its multiple viewpoints which establish semantic polyphony in the text, clearly belongs to the stylistic current of the Spanish American new novel. The story is built around the conflict caused by the treaty which ratified the continued presence of military bases in Panama. Guardia is presently working on a short story collection to be entitled La estatua de libertad y otras fábulas [The Statue of Liberty and Other Fables]. In Las averías, 1972 [The Breakdowns], by Enrique Chuez, Marcha forzada, 1973 [Forced March] by Saúl Trinidad Torres, and Estación de navegantes, 1975 [Navigators’ Station] by Dimas Lidio Pitti, the mechanisms of poetry are used to suggest multiple interpretive possibilities. Rafael Pernett y Morales initiates the use of street humour and of playful and parodic tones in Panamanian fiction. Loma ardiente y vestida de sol, 1973 [Burning Loma and Dressed in Sun] sets a precedent in the Panamanian novel by making a working class area (Loma) both the protagonist and the setting of the work. Estas manos son para caminar, 1977 [These Hands Are for Walking] is a kind of “antibilddungsroman” which achieves the goal of exposing the corruption and hypocrisy of the country’s ruling class by narrating from the viewpoint of a social climber.

To complete the account of contemporary Panamanian fiction by women, in the last two decades two outstanding women writers can be added to the names of Consuelo Tomás, Gloria Guardia, Moravia Ochoa and Bertalicia Peralta. Rosa María Britton, novelist, short story writer, dramatist and essayist, is one of the most prolific writers of recent years. In her novels El ataúd de uso, 1983 [The Accustomed Coffin], El señor de las lluvias y el viento, 1985 [Lord of the Wind and the Rains] and No pertenezco a este siglo, 1992, [I Do Not Belong to this Century], she experiments with unreliable narrators and antagonistic narrative voices, as well as drawing on popular myths and glossing the history of the nation as part of Colombia. Isis Tejeira explores the shaping of the female subject in an oppressive patriarchal society in Sin fechas fija, 1982 [No Fixed Date]. She has also published a book of short stories entitled Está linda la mar y otros cuentos [The Sea is Fine and Other Stories]. In the novels of the 1990s, historical revisionism is the dominant tendency. In Cuando perecen las ruinas, 1991 [When the Ruins Perish], Rogelio Guerra Avila recounts the abandonment of the town of Chagres which took place as a result of the 1903 Treaty. Enrique Chuez’s Operación causa justa, 1991 [Operation Just Cause] is a chronicle or testimony of the North American invasion of Panama in 1989. The historical background of Britton’s most recent work, mentioned above, is the era of political turmoil in Colombia between independence from Spain and 1904.

This account would be incomplete without mentioning Rodrigo Miró, whose role as a historian and anthologizer of Panamanian literature has been essential to the nation’s literary development.

CARMEN S. ALVERIO
translated by Ian Craig

Further Reading

When surveying Paraguayan literature over time and across the contemporary spectrum, the reader is taken with the diversity and richness of work produced by what is supposedly one of South America’s least developed and most benighted societies. Indeed, any careful perusal of this literature gives the lie to pseudo-scientific and ethnocentric notions, popular in certain scholarly circles since the late 19th century, that Paraguay is a cultural wasteland, permanently incapacitated for “progress” by centuries of war and dictatorship. The fact is that those evils have not extinguished the artistic impulses of Paraguay’s people. Indeed, one can, without seeming to justify the country’s suffering, venture to say that it has been a raw material from which the best Paraguayan writers have produced works of undoubted genius.

What has been missing in Paraguay’s literature is not quality but the recognition of quality. To observe the struggles of Paraguayan writers is to confirm the half-serious witticism that “publishing in Paraguay is like remaining unpublished.” Paraguay has a viable publishing industry, but readership within the country is limited, and most Paraguayan writers have received scant attention in the wider Latin American and world literary markets. Foreign readers and foreign editors have tended to dismiss Paraguay as a far-flung bit of exotica of little importance beyond its own borders. This is true to the small extent that it recognizes the country’s unique qualities, but utterly false in undervaluing their universal appeal. Paraguay is an anomaly, and its story is worth telling precisely for that reason. In terms of language alone, the country has much to teach us. Most Paraguayans speak some form of Guarani, two-thirds to three-quarters are bilingual, and a small minority speaks only Spanish. The country is thus unique, in Latin America and perhaps in the world, in that its population has opted to preserve an indigenous language despite extensive European immigration and extensive intermarriage between the indigenous population and Europeans. The incongruities which flow from these facts deserve recognition in the world of ideas, for they reveal much about the encounter between Western and non-Western cultures that has molded and shaken our planet for the past five centuries.

Perhaps the chief incongruity of Paraguay’s linguistic reality is that Spanish, despite its smaller number of speakers, remains very much the language of power. Government is carried on mostly in Spanish, as are the major functions of education and commerce. Guarani is primarily a language of home and street, and while it has a considerable written tradition, this literature cannot attract enough readers to sustain its practitioners economically. Writers in Guarani have the same problem as their colleagues in Spanish, except to a much greater degree. In general, they must write as an avocation, and forget any dreams of a reputation outside the country. No survey of Paraguay’s literature, however, should ignore the Guarani component, which is absolutely essential as a symbol of Paraguayan nationalism and as a distinct vehicle for interpreting the country’s reality. For all the obstacles to publishing in the indigenous language, enough writers have overcome them to make their efforts an ongoing and vital part of the nation’s culture. This is particularly true in poetry and the theater.

The incorporation of Guarani literature into the national literature of Paraguay is somewhat problematical because its aboriginal referent both exceeds the current boundaries of the country and precedes its existence as a historical entity. There are Guarani-speaking native communities in neighboring countries as well as within Paraguay, and their presence obviously predates the political construct that bears that name. Given this fact and the numerous miseries they have suffered at the hands of the national government, indigenous Guarani speakers do not necessarily identify themselves with Paraguay. However, unlike the Quechua and Aymara literatures of the Andean region, Guarani literature cannot, on the whole, be considered in isolation from the literature of the modern nation-state in which it struggles to endure. Centuries of war, illness, poverty and assimilation have reduced the aboriginal communities to a small percentage of Paraguay’s population, while their ancestral tongue has spread and survived as the nation’s majority language. Most Guarani speakers, therefore, are non-indigenous persons whose self-identification is wholly and unabashedly Paraguayan. Guarani literature has a certain indigenous underpinning, but rarely does this “deep structure” explicitly challenge the national cultural ethos which overlays it. Myths and other aboriginal motifs are often employed in validating that ethos, not contradicting it, and the Guarani language itself is frequently a literary emblem of fierce patriotism.

Another sector of the population that has struggled against literary disenfranchisement is women. As in other Latin American nations, men have dominated the writing arts in Paraguay, regarding them as an extension of the power they wield in the political and economic spheres. Women writers have generally been obliged to operate from the interstices of this structure, confining their material to themes considered “appropriate” to feminine concern or exploiting an occasional opportunity to be the “exceptional woman” of “genuine influence” in matters normally left to men. Nevertheless, female writers have asserted themselves in sufficient numbers to merit attention as a distinct force in Paraguayan literature, and are doing so increasingly as women. That is, there is a growing consciousness of writing explicitly or implicitly in the cause of women. This is not to say that no debate exists as to the proper feminist relationship with men, nor is it to claim that Paraguayan feminism follows a North American or European model. Paraguayan women writers are slowly carving a place for themselves, but they are accomplishing this according to the realities and peculiarities of their own society.

It is sometimes said that Paraguay simply had no literature before the 20th century. While this is a patent falsehood, there is truth in the notion of Paraguay’s literary paucity prior to 1900. For the literary historian, therefore, the task is largely to understand the reasons for this scarcity and to identify the literary production which did in fact take place.

The Horsemen of the Apocalypse have been frequent visitors to Paraguay, and disasters that would seem hyperbolic in many other countries are here the stuff of history. From 1864 to 1870, Paraguay fought and lost the War of the Triple Alliance, quixotically taking on the combined forces of Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay, and suffering in the process a population reduction of over seventy-five per cent! Of the 1,300,000 Paraguayans alive at the war’s outset, only 300,000 remained by the end, most of them women and children. This alone suffices to explain the dearth of writers in the last decades of the century. Genocide simply erased many of the country’s potential literati. It must be added, however, that Paraguay’s nucleus of writers was never very robust even before the war, owing in part to the muzzle of dictatorship. During the regime of Dr José Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia from 1814 to 1840, literary expression was strictly forbidden even as the country enjoyed a degree of economic prosperity. No class of literati, therefore, was allowed to exist in the critical first decades of the country’s independence. Francia’s successors Carlos Antonio López and his son Francisco Solano López attempted to reverse this condition, but in the end their efforts were decimated by the war. The elder López promoted cultural institutions, including the Academia Literaria and the Aula de Filosofía. Students were sent overseas, journals were founded, and an interest in European Romanticism took hold. Journalism was generally an organ of the government, but at least one finds in it the potential for a serious interest in the art of writing.

What literature preceded the War of the Triple Alliance, and what managed to survive it, was dominated by chronicles and historical essays. In colonial times, Ruy Díaz de Guzmán (1558–1629) set this trend in motion with his account of European settlement in the Río de la Plata region. Following Díaz’s example and having a strong desire to make sense of their unique evolution as a people, Paraguayans have always been a nation of historiographers and analytical essayists. Writers of the López and post-López eras, including Crisóstomo Centurión (1840–1903) and Natalicio Talavera (1839–67), continued the colonial tradition of recording and commenting on the events of their time.

Paraguayan historiography in the 19th century was often—and unscientifically—bound up with the nation’s new-found interest in Romanticism. The same ambience which encouraged analyses of the meaning of events also gave birth to a Romantic sentimentalization of the nation’s history. Romanticism in Paraguay, however, did have themes other than patriotism, and did produce work in genres other than the essay. Diógenes (1857–1920) and José Segundo Decoud (1848–1909), along with Fulgencio R. Moreno (1872–1933) and the transplanted Bolivian Tristán Roca (1826–68), all produced non-historiographical essays, especially in literary criticism, and among the poets and narrators whose work set important precedents for later writers in these genres, one may cite Centurión, Moreno, Roca and Talavera, as well as Victorino Abente y Lago (1846–1935), Adriano M.Aguiar (1859–1913) and Enrique D.Parodi (1857–1917).
Along with its relative scarcity of works, Paraguayan literature before 1900 was noted for the belatedness with which foreign literary influences arrived in the country. European Romanticism came late to Latin America in general, but even later to Paraguay. Thus cynics have suggested that Paraguay’s writers were not only slavish in imitating foreign models, but hopelessly behind time in doing so. A more generous and correct view is that Romanticism was simply a matrix within which Paraguayans sought, as in everything else, to find meaning in their unique circumstances. Parodi and Roca, for example, contributed to interest in the nation’s Guarani heritage. One must conclude, however, that praiseworthy as their efforts were, the Romantics’ nod to Guarani culture did not come close to recognizing its true importance. All around these makers of literature there abounded, and still does, a vast “proto-literature,” the Guarani oral tradition, which even now has only begun to be acknowledged. The Romantics’ work foreshadowed the 20th-century recognition of the indigenous language as a basis for Paraguay’s originality and identity, but much remains to be done in this area.

Narrative fiction has been the least prolific genre in Paraguayan literature, and the most affected by the nation’s historical and political context. The historical essay was predominant until the mid-century, and what narrative production there was tended to emphasize romantic and nationalistic themes: the exaltation of the past, the affirmation of Paraguayan spiritual values, and the commemoration of the heroic struggle to survive the catastrophic War of the Triple Alliance (1864–70). This traditional framework was initiated by the Argentine Martin de Goycoechea Menéndez (1877–1906), who glorified the war and endowed the national literature with a mythic air. Other narratives of the traditionalist type are the historical costumbrista works of Natalicio González (1897–1966), Teresa Lamas de Rodríguez Alcalá (1887–1975), Concepción Leyes de Chaves (1891–1985) and Carlos Zubizarreta (1904–72).

Between 1932 and 1935, Paraguay fought another war, the Chaco War with Bolivia, which nevertheless had positive consequences for the literary sphere. The nation’s reality intruded on the consciousness of writers, and significant new themes—war, agrarian problems, political persecution, exile, and so forth—found their way into subsequent narratives. Exemplars of this thematic innovation are Cruces de quebracho, 1934 [Quebracho Wood Crosses] by Arnaldo Valdovinos (1908–91), Ocho hombres, 1934 [Eight Men] by José Santiago Villarejo, and especially El guajhú, 1938 [The Howl] by Gabriel Casaccia (1907–80). The first three were inspired by the Chaco War, and the last, Casaccia’s work, is a collection of stories which gives the coup de grâce to totally false, romantic and idealized literary images of the Paraguayan campesino.

Despite these advances, Paraguayan narrative fiction only began to achieve distinction and international renown in the 1950s with the appearance in Buenos Aires of three works: Casaccia’s novel La babosa, 1952 [The Gossiping Woman], the novel Follaje en los ojos, 1952 [Leaves in the Eyes] by José María Rivarola Matto and the story collection El trueno entre las hojas, 1953 [Thunder among the Leaves] by Augusto Roa Bastos (1917-). These works broke with the dominant trend toward narcissism and mythification in literature, and reclaimed for fiction the critical realism that had been practically eclipsed since Rafael Barrett (1876–1910) initiated it in the essay genre at the turn of the century.

Historical and political circumstances over the last fifty years have impeded Paraguayan narrative production, but they also help to explain it. In that interval the country has suffered a bloody civil war (the Revolution of 1947) and lived through the second longest dictatorship in the history of the Americas (that of General Stroessner, 1954–89). It should surprise no one, therefore, that the works currently best known were conceived and published in exile, for it is only at some remove from repression and censorship that writers have been able to express themselves freely and develop unfettered an artistically wrought narrative style in tune with contemporary historical conditions and containing significant socio-political material. The works of expatriate authors—Rubén Bareiro Saguier (1930–), Gabriel Casaccia, Rodrigo Díaz-Pérez (1924–), Augusto Roa Bastos, Lincoln Silva (1945–) and others—are where one finds the most honest articulation of Paraguay's contemporary problems. Casaccia, the progenitor of contemporary Paraguayan narrative, critically re-created several decades of moral and political corruption in three novels: the aforementioned La babosa, La llaga, 1963 [The Wound] and Los herederos, 1975 [The Inheritors]. In another of his novels, Los exiliados, 1966 [The Exiles], Casaccia devoted himself to the theme of political exile, practically unexplored in fiction composed within Paraguay’s borders. Augusto Roa Bastos, awarded the Cervantes Prize in 1989, and well known as one of Latin America’s most outstanding writers, examines the nation’s past and present within a historical and political framework in Hijo de hombre, 1960 (Son of Man), a novel steeped in the pain of being Paraguayan. Hijo de hombre has become one of the most important texts of contemporary Latin American fiction. Roa’s best-known novel, however, is his second one, Yo el Supremo, 1974 (I the Supreme), narrated from the ubiquitous perspective of Paraguay’s first dictator Dr José Gaspar Rodriguez de Francia, one of the most controversial figures in the history of the nation.

The theme of dictatorship, hard to include in narratives written within Paraguay, is implicitly or explicitly present in the fear that torments innumerable characters in the fiction of exile. And it intrudes directly in the reality of jail, torture and persecution portrayed in stories by Rubén Bareiro Saguier collected in Ojo por diente, 1973 [An Eye for a Tooth] and El séptimo pétalo del viento, 1984 [The Seventh Petal of the Wind], in stories by Rodrigo Díaz-Pérez contained in Entrevista, 1978 [Interview] and Hace tiempo…mañana, 1989 [Some Time Ago…Tomorrow], and in Lincoln Silva’s novels Rebelión después, 1970 [Rebellion Afterward] and General General, 1975 [General General]. Also products of exile are the story collection El collar sobre el no, 1987 [Necklace Over the River] by Carlos Garcete (1918–) and the novel El invierno de Gunter, 1987 [Gunter’s Winter] by Juan Manuel Marcos (1950–)—both inspired by the problems of the nation—as well as the collection of short poetic narratives Último domicilio conocido, 1990 [Last Known Address] by Ester de Izaguirre (1923–).

As for narrative production written within Paraguay between 1960 and 1989, it is important to point out the negative impact of dictatorial repression and of the censorship and self-censorship that prevailed in every corner of the country. These factors do much to explain the limited number of works published in Paraguay until now. As Guido Rodríguez Alcalá says in an essay published in 1980, given Paraguay’s political and cultural context, “the surprising thing is not that not much [literature] is produced, but that any is produced at all.” Even though narrative activity during this time is relatively scant and the works that have been published do not get the international attention lavished on those of exiled authors, Paraguay’s internal narrative corpus does have a number of works and writers of considerable merit who have received important national

The self-assertion of women narrators has been particularly significant since the 1980s, revealing in their voices a wide variety of styles and themes. Besides the aforementioned René Ferrer’s works, we may note, among others, the following novels by Neida Bonnet de Mendonça (1933–): Golpe de luz, 1987 [Blow of Light]; La vera historia de Purificación, 1989 [Purificación’s True Story], and La niña que perdi en el circo, 1987 [The Child I Lost at the Circus]. A further novel to be noted is Esta zanja está ocupada, 1994 [This Ditch is Occupied] by Raquel Saguier (1940–); while valuable collections of short fiction include La oscuridad de afuera, 1987 [The Darkness Outside] by Sara Karlik (1935–); and Tierra mansa y otros cuentos [Gentle Earth and Other Tales] by Lucy Mendonça de Spinci (1932–).

That narrative fiction is primarily an urban middle-class art form seems to be confirmed by the fact that little of it has been produced in Guarani. A notable exception is the Guarani novel Kalaíto Pombéro, 1981 [Kalaito Bogey-Man] by Tadeo Zarratea (1947–). Other Guarani works of fiction draw on the country’s rich oral tradition. Miguelángel Meza and Rubén Rolandi, among others, have produced compilations of folktales in Guarani.

Although Paraguay in recent decades has not been fertile soil for artistic creation in general, poetry has always been the most prolific genre in Paraguayan letters. The temporal framework of current Paraguayan poetry, if by this we mean what has been written since 1960, falls almost entirely within the thirty-five years of General Stroessner’s dictatorship. The resulting political, economic and cultural condition of Paraguay, and the varying degrees of censorship imposed by the tyrant on writers, have diminished both the quantity and quality of poetic composition within the country. Arbitrary arrests, ideological persecution and political repression resulted in exile for almost a million Paraguayans, a third of the population, including many writers and artists. “For these reasons,” explains Giuseppe Bellini, “the literature of Paraguay has been built more from the contributions of exiles than from those of writers who lived in their country.” In fact, the two internationally most renowned Paraguayan poets, Hérib Campos Cervera (1905–53) and Elvio Romero (192,6–), have written practically all of their work as exiles in Buenos Aires.

Regarded as the most important poet of the generation of 1940, Campos Cervera is also one of three writers from that group—the others are Josefina Pla and Augusto Roa Bastos—who have had a broad impact on contemporary Paraguayan literature as a whole. As witnesses to the cruel events of the Chaco War of 1932–35 with Bolivia, and in some cases as combatants in it, the members of the generation of 1940 all shared a concern for literary renewal during the harsh decade that led up to the bloody Revolution of 1947. The facts of life and survival in the Paraguay of that time forced these writers to a new awareness of the national reality, and their work reflects a renewed critical disposition. These poets, whose ranks also include Oscar Ferreiro (1921–), Ezequiel González Alsina (1919–89) and Hugo Rodríguez-Alcalá, have produced an introspective poetry which plumbs the depths of the intimate and has its roots in the ways of human beings, their ideals, dreams, doubts and anxieties. Frequently this poetic introspection discloses collective suffering and the anguish of expatriation; introspection becomes solidarity and there emerges a kind of testimonial poetry representative of human values. Such is the case in the work of Campos Cervera and that of numerous other poets influenced by him.

Of the works that bear Campos Cervera’s influence, special mention needs to be made of Elvio Romero’s poetic collections, among them Destierro y atardecer, 1975 [Exile and Evening] and El poeta y sus encrucijadas, 1991 [The Poet and His Crossroads]. The best-known Paraguayan poet at this time, Romero has produced work which is part poetic diary, part tormented witness to repression, and part denunciation of decades of Paraguayan suffering. Also in the vein of social protest are the works of expatriate writers like Rodrigo Díaz-Pérez and Rubén Bareiro Saguier, and those of others like Jorge Canese (1947–).

In the 1950s there arose a group of poets whose debt to the generation of 1940 (among them Roa Bastos, Campos Cervera and Romero) was real but indirect, since the older writers had been forced into exile after the Civil War of 1947. This generation of 1950—which includes Bareiro Saguier, Díaz-Pérez, Martínez and Villagra Marsal, has pursued other genres as well, particularly fiction, and has collaborated in producing Alcor, an important literary journal founded in 1955 by Bareiro Saguier and Julio César Troche. The generation of 1950 witnessed the violence and hatred of the 1947 conflict, and their works are often melancholy intimations of love, death, childhood, existential anguish, and nostalgia for an imagined lost paradise.

Many of these themes are also present in the poetry of those who wrote in Guarani. Carlos F. Abente (1915–), Gumercindo Ayala Aquino (1910–72), Narciso R. Colmán (“Rosicrán”) (1876–1954), are among those who maintained the Guarani poetic tradition in the early and middle decades of the century.

Beginning around 1960, a number of other groups appeared, all of them reacting in one degree or another to the conditions imposed by dictatorship. One of these groups, the so-called generation of 1960, began under the leadership of Josefina Pla and included writers born between 1937 and 1943 such as Esteban Cabañas, Miguel Ángel Fernández, Francisco Pérez-Maricevich and Roque Vallejos. Their works, like those of others not in the group, reflect an acute awareness of the country’s political and economic problems and express this awareness in simple, clear, essential verse, free of hollow rhetoric. Another group of the 1960s appeared toward the end of the decade, in rough simultaneity with the student unrest of 1968: this was the “Criterio group,” so named for its publication of the journal Criterio (1966–71, 1976–77). Most of the Criterio group’s members, who included Juan Manuel Marcos, Emilio Pérez Chaves, René Dávalos, Nelson Roura and others, were born between 1943 and 1950. Primarily students, their poetics of political liberation and social conscience incurred a wave of repression which resulted in the group’s complete dispersal.

The work of Guarani-language poets in this period deserves separate mention. The Stroessner regime sought political gain by instituting certain policies promoting the Guarani language, but this did not make it easier for writers seeking to publish in the indigenous language from the 1960s to the 1980s. Among those poets whose production in this period was partly or entirely in Guarani, we may cite Susy Delgado, Félix Giménez Gómez (“Félix de Guarania”), Juan Maidana (1917–82), Carlos Martínez Gamba (1942–) and Miguelángel Meza (1955–). Others who have published primarily in the 1990s include Wilfredo Máximo Acosta (1953–) and Zenón Bogado Rolón (1954–). The latter is noted for his vehement poetic defense of Paraguay’s indigenous peoples.

Political repression was a constant throughout the 1970s, at the end of which decade there appeared a group of poets whose ill luck was to have been born and raised entirely in the Stroessner era, that is, after 1954. It was also their fortune, however, to witness the end of dictatorship in 1989, and to incorporate this experience in their maturation as artists. These young writers comprise the generation of 1980. Most of them have participated in the Manuel Ortiz Guerrero Poetry Workshop sponsored by the Spanish Embassy in Paraguay, resulting in the publication of several volumes of collective effort. Y ahora la palabra, 1979 [And Now the Word] and Poesía Taller, 1982 [Workshop Poetry] are just two of the volumes produced by the workshop.

As in narrative fiction, the last ten to fifteen years of Paraguayan poetry have witnessed an expansion of output by female writers. Young poets like Delfina Acosta, Lourdes Espinola, Nila López and Mabel Pedrozo have claimed a place in the poetic “fraternity” which until recently included women only under unusual circumstances.

The first half of the century produced scarcely any playwrights whose reputation transcended the borders of Paraguay. A possible exception is Josefina Pla, author (alone or with Roque Centurión Miranda (1900–60)) of a number of plays, and scholarly criticism of Paraguayan drama in general. As in other Latin American countries, historical, political and socioeconomic factors offer some explanation of why theater has been and remains the least fertile literary genre in the 20th century. Nevertheless, the two decades before the Chaco War saw unprecedented interest in theater, and numerous authors, of whom the most renowned is José Arturo Alsina (1897–1984), produced dramas and comedies predominantly popular in tone and content. Alsina was born in Argentina but lived in Paraguay from early childhood; hence despite the influence of European playwrights in some of his plays, for example Ibsen in El derecho de nacer [The Right to Be Born] and Pirandello in La ciudad soñada [Dream City], his work is essentially a product of the Paraguayan milieu.
Of enormous cultural significance for this bilingual nation was the career of Julio Correa (1890–1953), a writer of great talent whose work in the 1930s opened up the Paraguayan stage to productions in Guarani. Correa’s plays demonstrated what should have been obvious all along: that serious dramatic discourse regarding Paraguay’s historical and political context, and the Chaco War in particular, was possible and desirable in the country’s majority language. Among Correa’s contemporaries, a number of playwrights—including Roque Centurión Miranda, Francisco Barrios and Luis Rufinelli (1889–1973)—followed his lead in producing works in Guarani.

Over the last four decades, the best-known playwrights include Ernesto Báez, Ovidio Benitez Pereira, José María Rivarola Matto, Julio César Troche, Mario Halley Mora—the most prolific dramatist of the period—and Alcibiades González Delvalle—perhaps the most polemical. Halley Mora’s work is interesting in that it includes a number of pieces in yopará, the blend of Spanish and Guarani spoken in many parts of Paraguay. The Paraguayan stage receives support from two important institutions: the Ateneo Paraguayo, and the Escuela de Arte Escénico de Asuncion, founded in 1948 by Centurión Miranda. These bodies are part of the creative potential which has characterized the Paraguayan stage in recent years. Among the many individuals who figure prominently in that ferment, one may mention José Luis Appleyard, Ramiro Domínguez and Ezequiel González Alsina (1919–89), all of them writers and critics; Manuel E.B.Argüello (1924–), actor, writer and essayist; Agustín Núñez, critic and director; Gloria Muñoz (1949), playwright and theatrical scriptwriter; and Edna de los Ríos (1942–), actress, playwright and international advocate for Paraguayan theater. Muñoz and Núñez collaborated in 1991 on a successful stage version of Roa Bastos’s novel Yo el Supremo.

The essay has been a rich and influential literary form in Paraguay throughout the century, and particularly so in the mid-1950s, when fiction, especially by exiled writers, began to incorporate historical themes which had belonged to the essayist. The essay thus became an important source of narrative material. As elsewhere in Latin America, the historical, political and cultural context of the end of the 19th century and the first four decades of the 20th century was conducive to the essay’s prosperity as a genre, both at that time and subsequently. The contextual coordinates of that prosperity are, paradoxically, the very disasters which the essay has so often decried in the course of Paraguay’s 19th- and 20th-century history. While theater was diminished by these factors because it requires labor-intensive collaboration by numerous artists, the essayist has the comparatively easier task of committing thoughts to paper and finding a publisher. Thus the very conditions which weakened the stage created a need which essayists moved to fill.

Paraguayan literature is generally thought to have taken a significant leap forward around the turn of the century, with the work of a group of intellectuals known as the “generation of 1900.” These writers, most of them born around the time of the War of the Triple Alliance, sought by the prolific production of essays and poetry to do for Paraguay what their Spanish contemporaries in the “generation of 1898” did for Spain: to promote the country’s spiritual reconstruction by reaffirming certain national values on the one hand and reinterpreting certain lessons of the past on the other. Among the most representative of this group are Cecilio Báez (1862–1941), Manuel Domínguez (1868–1935), Eloy Fariña Núñez (1885–1929), Blas Garay (1873–99), Manuel Gondra (1871–1927), Alejandro Guanes (1872–1925), Fulgencio R. Moreno (1872–1933) and Juan
E.O’Leary (1879–1969). All were journalists, all except Domínguez were poets, and all except Guanes cultivated the historical essay in varying degrees.

At least as important for Paraguayan letters as the generation of 1900 was their contemporary Rafael Barrett (see separate entry). Often excluded from Paraguayan literary histories on the grounds that he was born and raised in Europe, Barrett’s work actually deserves mention in any account of the country’s written tradition. His efforts as a crusading journalist are strongly identified with Paraguay and exerted a profound influence on his peers, both in the essay genre and in fiction.

Around 1915 there emerged another group of essayists. Continuing the work of historical research and reinterpretation begun by the generation of 1900, this group included Justo Pastor Benítez (1895–1963), Arturo Bray (1898–1977), Natalicio González and Pablo Max Ynsfrán (1894–1972). Beginning in the 1930s, these writers were joined by two historians of distinction: Julio César Chaves (1907–89), author of one of the best-known biographies of the dictator Francia, and Efraim Cardozo (1906–75), one of the signers of the pact which ended the Chaco War and a profound expert on its causes and evolution. Since that time, many other essayists of importance have appeared in the disciplines of historiography and philosophy, among whom one may mention Osvaldo Chaves (1918–91), Bacón Duarte Prado (1915), Adriano Irala Burgos (1928), Epifanio Méndez Fleitas (1917–85) and Hipólito Sánchez Quell (1907–86). Of Paraguay’s cultural historians and literary critics, some of the most productive are Raúl Amaral (1918–), Rubén Bareiro Sagüier, Carlos R. Centurión (1902–69), Juan Manuel Marcos, Francisco Pérez-Maricevich, Josefin Pla and Hugo Rodríguez-Alcalá.

Paraguayan essayists generally write for an urban, upper-and middle-class readership, and have for this reason practiced their art almost entirely in Spanish. Little expository prose has been written in Guarani, and there exists in the general population a mistaken notion that the indigenous language is unsuited to such purposes. Of those who have defied this myth, a few, including Pedro Encina Ramos and Dario Gómez Serrato, are compiled in Fray Antonio Guasch’s El idioma guaraní: gramática y antología de prosa y verso, 1983 [The Guarani Language: Grammar and Anthology of Prose and Verse].

TERESA MÉNDEZ-FAITH AND TRACY K. LEWIS

Further Reading

Para-Literature

The term “para-literature” is used as a substitute for “popular literature” to designate all works which have not been canonized by institutions; that is to say, the mass of texts constituting the popular novel of the 19th century, the melodrama, the detective novel in its various forms, the romance novel, the western, the tale of terror, science fiction, the spy novel, the pornographic novel, etc.

It is important to assume the existence of a literature/para-literature dichotomy and to reconsider both these categories in relation to each other; thus, an understanding of what is paraliterature will allow a greater comprehension of the literary phenomenon.

Thus, with the realization that literature and para-literature are an indissoluble pair, it is important to define these two phenomena in theoretical terms, for which we shall base ourselves primarily on Jakobson’s function scheme. In a literary text, the dominant function is by definition the poetic function, which focuses on the message itself—the text—which is not a means to an end but an objective in its own right. In para-literature, on the other hand, the predominance of the poetic function has been replaced by the conative function, which emphasizes the addressee of the message, in as much as it tries to produce a certain effect on the reader—an effect which varies from one para-literary form to another. It is, thus, possible to recognize a dominant conative-emotive function in the romance novel and in the melodrama, a dominant conative-cognitive function in the classic detective novel, a dominant conative-sensual function in the erotic novel. What is important in each case is that there be a persuasive effect on the addressee. The effectiveness of the conative function requires and arouses an intensification of the phatic function, the latter being the function which maintains contact between the addresser and the addressee.

The consequences arising from this difference of dominant function are manifold. Let us concentrate, firstly, on the concept of “contemplative distance” or “esthetic distance,” a necessary factor in literary comprehension. This comprehension would be unfortunate in a case where, for certain reasons, the reader were to suppress the distance and, identifying with the work, were to narcissistically substitute the object of contemplation for his own ego or introduce characters or events from the novel into the exigencies of real life. In para-literary experience, however, contemplative distance is voided and the message is reduced to a means of successfully imposing certain effects on the addressee.

The notion of distance is related to another concept, that of “disinterest,” in the Kantian sense. In the case of literature, there is a mutual disinterest on the part of the text, which does not seek to impose itself on the reader by means of effects previously elaborated in the work itself, and on the part of the reader, who does not use the text as a means of self-gratification but rather as an object of contemplation; an artistic text would thus transcend any intention of ideological imposition, causing opening effects at certain levels. Paradoxically, this respectful disinterest would be the manifestation of the most intense interest in the actualization of the esthetic object as such.

The predominance of the poetic function results in the polysemy of the poetic text, its indeterminacy and unpredictability, and, with that, its vast flow of information. The para-literary text, on the other hand, contains a minimal degree of information, given its essentially predictable and transparent meaning; it is defined in this sense as a “narrative of redundancy.”

Because of its redundancies, a para-literary work is a pleasure-inducing text, belonging to Barthes’s “texte de plaisir” (text of pleasure) category: a text which produces contentment, which satisfies, which is rooted in culture and related to a comfortable practice of reading. This production of pleasure is understandable from a Freudian perspective, according to which pleasure is attributed to the parsimony of psychic outpouring and, for that reason, the encounter with a known element evokes a pleasurable effect.

A para-literary work thus fully satisfies the reader’s “horizon of expectations”. According to Jauss, the distance between the horizon of expectation and the work itself—between the already familiar nature of the esthetic experience to date and the change in horizon necessitated by receiving a new work—determines the artistic character of a literary work: as this distance decreases and the consciousness of the reader does not require the horizon of a heretofore unknown experience, the work approaches the sphere of entertainment.

It may be inferred from what has been said that a para-literary text enjoys a high degree of readability, in Barthes’s sense; namely, its reader is conceived as eminently receptive and passive. In the case of those para-literary forms which provoke activity on the part of the reader whether to anticipate or infer the unfolding of the plot or to attempt to solve enigmas—think of a feuilleton and a detective story, such activity would be pleasurable, not exhausting.

The greatest contrast between para-literary phenomena and a writable text—that which, according to Barthes, unlike a readable text, requires the reader’s participation, his constructive effort—can be appreciated by having recourse to the metaphoric and metonymic poles. Para-literature is metaphoric; it seeks to discover meaning(s) and, more frequently, one single major meaning. The writable text, by contrast, is resistant to metaphor; it is conspicuously metonymic: wherein associations, contiguities, accumulations are clearly noted.

In a literary text, the units are not repeatable, for when a unit is repeated, it is no longer the same; it becomes something else. Para-literature, on the other hand, is the very realm of repetition—which is felt as such, which is not transformed, thus creating a redundant effect—both in the intertextual area (concerning the text itself) and in the relationship between the text and its genre; the proliferation of clichés, the presence of stereotyped characters, is a clear manifestation of what we are discussing; the Freudian perspective, which has already been noted with respect to the pleasurable effect produced by what is known, is also valid for the aspect to which we are now referring.
Also with regard to the process of rereading, there are noticeable differences between the literary and para-literary work. In the case of the latter, rereading, which the simplicity of the literary text renders unnecessary, would not be an enriching expansion of the first reading, although the pleasure of repetition could be produced thereby. As regards a critical rereading or meta-reading of the para-literary work, this would permit a dismantling of the text, which would uncover the textual strategies put into play. This operation, however—unlike what happens in a literary work, in which a major subtlety in understanding the text, must produce a more clear-cut reception of the message—would be to the detriment of the dominant conative function, which itself would be weakened or eliminated, resulting in a destructive exposure of the text.

It is understandable that, given its aims, para-literature should prefer to use myths conceived as intentionally concealing, misleading instances rather than myths understood as instances which reveal in an ontological sense. Just as literature can provoke an occurrence or emergence of truth, i.e., ontological unconcealment, a para-literary text precludes any opening, enclosing us in the facile excitation and satisfaction of one’s own ego.

Once we have grasped the differences between literature and para-literature, it is important to understand that both revitalize each other. Literature incorporates para-literary models and procedures, producing thereby intentional effects of rupture. The following cases should be noted by way of example:

- Literary texts which disguise themselves paratextually as being manifestations of para-literary genres: Boquitas pintadas (Heartbreak Tango), by Manuel Puig, calls itself a feuilleton in its subtitle; The Buenos Aires Affair, by the same author, follows the same procedure by calling itself a “novela policial” [detective novel].

- Literary works which, without having recourse to an explicitly disguising statement, constantly refer in all or part of their plot development to a para-literary genre, in which they are included, thus acquiring meaning, totally or in part. The first case corresponds to “La Muerte y la brújula” (Death and the Compass), by Jorge Luis Borges and its relationship to the detective genre; the second case is that of La misteriosa desaparición de la marquesita de Loria [The Mysterious Disappearance of the Young Marchioness of Loria], by José Donoso, a novel in which the erotic para-literary model is eliminated by the intervention of another genre, the fantastic, which is defined precisely by its unresolvable, ambiguous nature and which is therefore incompatible with the nature of para-literature.

- Literary texts which incorporate para-literary microtexts into their structure, creating an intertextual dialogue between the macrotext and its microtexts: newspaper articles and commercials in Libro de Manuel (A Manual for Manuel), by Julio Cortázar; radio dramas in La tía Julia y el escribidor (Aunt Julia and the Script Writer), by Mario Vargas Llosa; recounting of sentimental movies in El beso de la mujer araña (The Kiss of the Spider Woman), by Manuel Puig.

MYRNA SOLOTOREVSKY

See also entries on Detective Fiction, Pornography, Science Fiction
Further Reading

Dorfman, Ariel, Reader’s nuestro que estás en la tierra: ensayos sobre el imperialismo cultural, Mexico City: Nueva Imagen, 1980

——El comic es algo serio, Mexico City: Eufesa, 1982

Gubern, Roman, La imagen y la cultura de masas, Barcelona: Bruguera, 1983

Mattelart, Michele, La cultura de las opresión femenina, Mexico City: Era, 1977

Paris

In “El otro cielo” (The Other Heaven), an excellent though underrated story by Julio Cortázar (in the collection Todos los fuegos el fuego: All Fires the Fire), the author sketches a shadowy figure who lives in a bohemian quarter of Paris (c.1870), an aspiring artist known only generically as “el americano.” This character dies in a garret (of course) before the story ends, alone and unrecognised. “El otro cielo” is narrated by a young Argentine who, when the story opens, is able by a leap of the imagination to transfer himself from contemporary Argentina (c.1945) to an exciting (because dangerous) bohemian Paris of the 1870s. The execution in Paris of a serial “Jack the Ripper” type killer, who occupies the forefront of the Parisian part of the story, and the inglorious death of “el americano”—also in Paris—are followed by the figurative death in Buenos Aires of the narrator. The latter loses his creative ability as the result of marriage and the mediocrity that automatically ensues—in the author’s view—from the institutionalization of the erotic and its consequent loss, together with the proletarization of Argentine society implied by Juan Perón coming to power in 1945. Thereafter, the Argentine narrator, now sipping his mate in a domestic setting, can no longer “connect” to a Parisian arcade in the 1870s.
Cortázar, who lost his university post during Perón’s first presidency, was to settle for good in Paris in 1950. But many of his stories and his experimental novel Rayuela (Hopscotch), display a self-conscious unease over becoming a (Latin) American in Paris. For Cortázar, the dilemma faced by Latin American artists of an earlier period who settled in Paris is that if they remained there they risked losing their roots and becoming imitators of European styles; alternatively, to stay at home meant stultification on the rim of Western culture. Cortázar said in an interview given to Karl Kohut shortly before his death, that the intelligentsia of the French metropolis no longer exercised a powerful influence on Latin American artists and writers: the child had emerged from the shadow cast by the Gallic father and Paris had become a comfortable place of residence for Latin American artists or writers in exile, a city where they were guaranteed a community of fellow-exiles. This might explain why in Rayuela, as Jean Franco has pointed out, Paris is seen through the lens of the Surrealist writers, since they really did exercise a powerful influence on a generation of Spanish Americans in Paris.

Cortázar’s life and work are useful illustrations of the delicate and intricate links forged by Latin American intellectuals who spent periods of their life in Paris. Apart from Cortázar, the Spanish American writer who responded most sensitively and thoughtfully to the experience of spending many years in Paris was the Cuban Alejo Carpentier. During the eleven years that he spent in this city (1928–39), Carpentier earned his living as a journalist, sending home to Cuba articles on a most considerable range of cultural and political topics. Among the most interesting are the many he devoted to artists of the Surrealist movement, because their poetics had a considerable impact on the development of his own poetics and aesthetics. Carpentier also learned while in Paris that the French were both ignorant of and indifferent to Latin America. He vowed, therefore, to act as propagandist for his continent. Paris figures in this author’s fiction from the moment that this city first penetrated the consciousness of Latin American intellectuals, namely at the time of the French Revolution. Parts of Carpentier’s finest novel, El siglo de las luces (Explosion in a Cathedral) take place in Paris and describe how two young Cubans respond to that maelstrom. But in the first half of the 19th century Paris had to compete with London since Britain was perceived as a country of relatively enlightened ideas and political tolerance, and therefore one which provided a haven for revolutionaries such as Karl Marx. Paris had its heyday in the belle époque, that is in the years preceding World War I and also in the 1920s. The belle époque forms the background of Carpentier’s dictatorship novel, El recurso del método, 1974 (Reasons of State) in which the sybaritic “president for life” of a representative Latin American state spends all the time he can living it up in Paris, returning to his banana republic only when he must crush a coup against him. He winds up in old age as an exile in Paris, at which point Carpentier uses avantgarde art of the 1920s to show that the protagonist is a relic of an earlier age: “We have no bananas today” is the mocking line from a popular song of the period that greets the exdictator at the beginning of his Parisian exile.

A Latin American author closely associated with Paris in the belle époque is Rubén Darío, the leading Spanish American modernista poet, who projects in some of his early works a naughty “gay Paree” image of Paris complete with foaming champagne and garconnières. Inside the latter, a figure like the Carolina of “De invierno” [About Winter], from the collection Prosas profanas, 1896 [Profane Poems], waits to warm the poet up in this chilly (and for him) exotic, setting: “Abre los ojos, mirame con su mirar risueño/y en tanto cae la nieve de París.” (She opens her eyes, gives me a radiant smile/and all the while the snow falls over Paris). Clearly, few are the (extant) Latin American writers who produced such engaging rubbish, and at the other end of the spectrum is the Peruvian César Vallejo who in his poem “París, octubre 1936,” bids a farewell to life (he was to die two years later) in terms which, with much irony, encompass the plight of someone like Cortázar’s character, “el americano.” Vallejo begins this poem with the following lines: “De todo esto, yo soy el único que parte./De este banco me voy, de mis calzones, de mis acciones, de mi número hendido parte a parte, de todo esto yo soy el único que parte.” (I’m taking my leave of all of this/I’m leaving this park bench, my boxer shorts, my grand situation, my actions, my number split asunder, I’m the only one to leave it all).

Despite earlier activity, as in the case of US writers, the period when Paris proved most magnetic to Latin Americans was the 1920s. This was a time when there was a concentration of intellectual talent there in the form of students, diplomats, journalists and playboys. Among them were members of the oligarchy, such as the Argentine Ricardo Güiraldes, who supposedly introduced Parisian polite society to the tango; two women writers, who were also emotionally very close: the Venezuelan Teresa de la Parra and her Cuban friend Lydia Cabrera, the ambassador of Ecuador, Gonzalo Zaldumbide, the Guatemalan Miguel Ángel Asturias who, in a way that was typical of the period, came to Europe to learn about the history of his own continent—in his case, that of the Mayan Indians.

In the interview Julio Cortázar gave to Karl Kohut mentioned above, he said that Paris ceased being an important influence on Latin American writers after World War II. But this remark is limited to male writers since for some women writers a transformative experience has been their encounter with French feminism. A striking example is provided by the Cuban poet Zoé Valdés whose first collection, Respuestas para vivir [Answers for Living] won the “Roque Dalton” prize in 1982, before she went to work in Paris as the assistant of Alfredo Guevara, who then headed the Cuban delegation to UNESCO. Her second volume of poetry, Todo para una sombra, 1986 [Everything for a Shadow] shows how the knowledge she acquired there of French feminist theory radicalized her perception of gender and heterosexual relations. The Peruvian poet Blanca Varela, who spent several years living in Paris, is another contemporary author whose self-awareness as both a Latin American creative writer and a woman increased as a direct result of this experience.

VERITY SMITH

See also entries on Alejo Carpentier, Rayuela (Julio Cortázar), Surrealism

Further Reading

It seems strange that so important, interesting and varied a subject as this has not yet merited a single detailed study. There is scope here for several, but right now all that exist are very partial accounts such as chapters about Paris in the experience of a particular writer or an account of, say, Parisian literary journals of the 192.08 which focused on Latin America.

Carpentier, Alejo, Crónicas, 2 vols, Havana: Editorial Arte y Literatura, 1975 [A selection of Carpentier’s journalism from the period 1928–39, which he spent in Paris]

Kohut, Karl, Escribir en Paris, Barcelona: Hogar del Libro, 1983 [Includes interviews with Cortázar, Roa Bastos and Severo Sarduy, which focus on the experience of exile in Paris]

———“Teresa de la Parra, Paris y Las memorias de Mamá Blanca” in Las memorias de Mamá Blanca, edited by Velia Bosch, Paris: UNESCO, 1988

---

Nicanor Parra 1914–

Chilean poet

“Qué es la antipoesía?” (What is antipoetry?) asks the speaker in Nicanor Parra’s poem “Test.” The many alternatives given to the reader include, “Una tempestad en una taza de té?/ Una mancha de nieve en una roca?/ Un azafate lleno de excrementos humanos?/… Un ataúd a gas de parafina?/ Una capilla ardiente sin difunto?/ Marque con una cruz/La definición que considere correcta.” (A tempest in a teapot?/ A snowy spot on a rock?/ A coffin that runs on kerosene?/ A funeral parlor without a corpse?/ Put an X/Next to the answer you think is correct.” The irreverent and humorous work that Parra published as Poemas y antipoemas, 1954 (Poems and Anti-Poems) has had a marked effect on poetry from Hispanic America as well as from the United States and England when his poems were translated into English in the 1960s. The term antipoesía or antipoetry, as Parra’s claim to originality, is misleading, given literature’s ongoing tradition of breaking with tradition. For example, as different as Nicanor Parra and the Chilean poet Vicente Huidobro are in terms of their poetry, Huidobro also called himself an “antipoet” due to the ways he was working against tradition, while at the same time depending on that tradition as a means of providing the creative tension in his work. As one might expect, the four decades that have passed since the resoundingly successful publication of the Poemas y antipoemas have called forth plenty of anti-antipoets.

If one considers Parra’s first book Cancionero sin nombre [Song Book without a Name], a work published in 1937 that Parra now disowns and will not allow to be republished in anthologies of his poetry, it is clear that he produced the antipoems by writing against himself, in much the same way that his countryman Pablo Neruda completely remade his poetry at least half a dozen times throughout his life. The major difference between these two poets, however, is that Parra, once he found his “antipoetic” voice, has maintained it with very little real variation. Although the poems from Parra’s first book are largely unsuccessful imitations of Lorca’s Romancero gitano (Gypsy Ballads), they occasionally give an indication of the poet Parra will later become. In “El Matador” [The Matador], for example, the speaker of the poem tells his supposedly shocked listener that he is going to “eat an angel” and that “two priests of sperm” are going to hunt down the speaker in the afternoon “por provocar a los santos/por desorden en la calle/por derramar en la iglesia/un litro y medio de sangre.” (for having provoked the saints/for being disorderly in the street/for spilling in the church/a litre and a half of blood). This poem contains some of the same violent, surreal humor that appears in Neruda’s poem from the early 1930s, “Walking Around.”

Generally speaking, Parra’s antipoetry is anti-lyrical in that it is more prosaic and colloquial than traditional poetry. The Mexican poet José Emilio Pacheco has pointed out that the conversational poetry that became so prevalent in Hispanic America in the 1960s has an antecedent in the unacknowledged work of three poets that Pacheco calls “the other vanguard.” Pedro Henríquez Ureña, Salomón de la Selva and Salvador Novo were contemporaries of Huidobro, César Vallejo and Neruda, but were influenced by the so-called New Poetry from the United States in the first decades of the 20th century. In any case, Parra uses the most colloquial forms of speech to demystify absolutes, to cut through rhetoric and to deflate the overly solemn and the sacred.

Often he writes about everyday things by means of personae immersed in the banal, sometimes absurd, situations of the human condition. For example, in his well-known poem “Soliloquio del Individuo” (Soliloquy of the Individual), the speaker is the collective consciousness of the individual from the Stone Age to the contemporary world.
In order to satirize our times more effectively as well as to make his audience laugh and blush by means of black humor, scandal and vulgarity, Parra adopts the persona of an ascetic itinerant preacher he calls the Christ of Elqui in Sermones y prédicas del Cristo de Elqui, 1977 (Sermons and Homilies of the Christ of Elqui), followed by a sequel two years later, and resurrected again in 1983.

As a writer, Parra is less a loose cannon than a sniper. He has maintained an anarchist’s stance in his politicized poetry, which holds no ideology sacred. The Chilean left, for example, was unforgiving of the political position of Parra in his Artefactos (1972) during the Allende years and the way Parra gloated over the vanquished supporters of the Popular Unity government at the time of the military coup in 1973.
Parra remained in Chile during the military dictatorship and eventually began to use the written and spoken word as a means of criticizing Pinochet, albeit in somewhat predictable, unconvincing ways, such as the poems in Chistes parRa desorientar a la policía, 1983 [ParRa’s Jokes to Mislead the Police]. It is quite likely that the collective public art actions taken in the early 1980s by a new Chilean art avant garde (that included poet Raúl Zurita) to protest the dictatorship were influenced by the legendary archeology, presented some of these texts in 1975 in the magazine Manuscritos. The quebrantahuesos, conceived by Nicanor Parra with a heavy dose of absurd humor and social satire, were collages assembled from newspapers and exhibited at the corner of Bandera and Ahumada streets in the heart of downtown Santiago on a weekly basis.
Although Parra continues to use his brilliant, mordant humor as a basis for much of his more recent work, such as the epigrammatic Ecopoemas, 1982, [Ecopoems], he also confounds those who try to categorize his poetry by writing a beautifully lyrical, melancholy, ontological poem such as “El hombre imaginario” (The Man He Imagined). Taken as a whole, Parra’s poetry (often imitated, but never equalled) certainly embodies some of the most important characteristics of 20th-century Hispanic American poetry.

STEVEN F. WHITE

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry
- Cancionero sin nombre, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1937
- Poemas y antipoemas, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1954
- Canciones rusas, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1967
- Poesía rusa contemporánea, Santiago de Chile: Ediciones Nueva Universidad, 1967
- Poemas, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1969
- Artefactos, Santiago de Chile: Universidad Católica de Chile, 1972
- Nuevos sermones y prédicas del Cristo de Elqui, Valparaíso, Chile: Ganymedes, 1979
- Poema y antipoema a Eduardo Frei, Santiago de Chile: America del Sur, 1982,
- El anti-Lázaro, Santiago de Chile: Gráfica Marginal, 1982,
- Coplas de navidad, Santiago de Chile: Ediciones del Camaleón, 1983
- Chistes parRa desorientar a la policía, Santiago de Chile: Galería Época, 1983

Compilations and Anthologies
- Obra gruesa, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1969

Poesía política, Santiago de Chile: Bruguera, 1983

Hojas de Parra, edited by David Turkeltaub, Santiago de Chile: Ganymedes, 1985

Fotopoemas sobre textos de Nicanor Parra, photographs by Sergio Marras, Santiago de Chile: Ornitorrinco, 1986

Nicanor Parra: biografía emotiva, edited by Efrain Szmulewicz, Santiago de Chile: Rumbos, 1988

Poemas para combatir la calvicie: muestra de antipoesía, edited by Julio Ortega, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1993

Anthologies in Translation

Anti-Poems, translated by Jorge Elliot, San Francisco: City Lights, 1960

Other Writings

Discursos, in collaboration with Pablo Neruda, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1962

Further Reading

Flores, Ángel (editor), Aproximaciones a Nicanor Parra, Barcelona: Ocnos, 1973

Montes, Hugo and Mario Rodríguez (editors), Nicanor Parra y la poesía de lo cotidiano, Santiago de Chile: Pacífico, 1970

Morales, Leónidas, La poesía de Nicanor Parra, Santiago de Chile: Andrés Bello, 1972

Salvador Jofre, Álvaro Luis, Para una lectura de Nicanor Parra: el proyecto ideológico y el inconsciente, Seville: Universidad de Sevilla, 1976

Yamal, Ricardo, Sistema y vision de la poesía de Nicanor Parra, Valencia: Albatros-Hispanófila, 1985

Interviews

Teresa de la Parra 1889–1936

_Venezuelan prose writer_

Born in Paris at the end of the 19th century to a family of diplomats, Teresa de la Parra’s early years were spent on a sugar mill plantation in the Venezuelan countryside, an idyllic childhood which she nostalgically recounted in her Las Memorias de Mamá Blanca (Mamá Blanca’s Souvenirs). Parra’s early writings were first published around 1915 when some of her short fiction appeared in the magazine El Universal. Included in Obras (Narrativa, Ensayos, Cartas) [Oeuvre (Narrative, Essays, Letters)] are three of these short stories: “Historia de la señorita Grano de Polvo Bailarina del Sol,” “El genio del pesacartas” and “El ermitaño del reloj” [respectively: The Story of Miss Speck of Dust Dancer of the Sun, The Genie of the Letter Scales, The Hermit of the Clock]. Considered as examples of literature of the fantastic, these three stories are clearly allegorical of the artist’s position in society, more specifically of women artists.

In “Grano de Polvo,” a puppet relates to his master (a poet) the story of a beautiful speck of dust who used to dance in a ray of sunlight. The ballerina can no longer practice her art because he is keeping her “safe” inside his wallet, afraid that he may lose her forever if she were to be released. Parra’s feminism is already evident in this early story. When at the urging of the poet the puppet finally allows her to dance in the sunlight, Miss Speck of Dust forever eludes her captor and finds her freedom by allowing a monstrous bug to swallow her. The tone of this story is one of biting irony, from the straightforward denunciation of possessive male love to the horrifying solution found to the fragile dancer’s imprisonment.

Parra returned to Caracas in 1919 and remained there until 1923. The impact postcolonial Caracas had on Parra’s sensibility is recorded in her novel Ifigenia: diario de una señorita que escribió porque se fastidiaba (Iphigenia: the Diary of a Young Lady Who Wrote because She Was Bored), published in Paris on her return in 1924. Undoubtedly Parra’s most controversial work, Ifigenia was heralded following its publication as either a charmingly “feminine” new work by a female author or as a book of dubious merit, subversively dangerous to young ladies. Parra herself was obliged to explain her own position regarding the novel’s feminist premises, which she defended as “moderate” in her essay “Influencia de las mujeres en la formación del alma americana” [The Influence of Women in the Forging of the American Soul].

In the novel, the narrator María Eugenia struggles to bridge the gap between her European upbringing and the provincial society she encounters back at home. Forced to return to Caracas after the death of both parents, the young woman must gradually relinquish her progressive ideas (tied to the figure of the young and liberal Gabriel) and indeed her identity, in order to settle into the society she has inherited (as personified by the patriarchal figure of her uncle Eduardo and the pious women of the family). Initially rebellious and outspoken, family pressures lead the young woman to accept the older and conservative Leal as her future husband. A repulsive choice, it is clear that Leal would eventually crush her spirit, since during their courtship he either mocks or ignores all expressions of Maria Eugenia’s intelligence and individuality. The question of a woman’s “duty” in such a society is evident in her arbitrary choice of Leal over Gabriel. Indeed, if we consider the implications of the novel’s title (that is Ifigenia rather than Maria Eugenia, in reference to the main character), we find that the heroine’s ironic rejection of freedom in favour of family alludes to the classical theme of a daughter’s sacrifice. In Racine’s drama Iphigénie (1674), the heroine is at the center of a power struggle between her father Agamemnon and her betrothed Achilles. Agamemnon has offered Iphigénie’s life in sacrifice to the gods, in exchange for the fate of Troy. Iphigénie’s submissiveness, however, as revealed in her long reply to Agamemnon, is meant to underscore her father’s wrong and cruel disposal of her existence as though a commodity. In Parra’s novel, as Maria Eugenia falls prey to Leal, her submission to her family’s wishes is also an act that reveals as evil and fatal what becomes the only choice left to a dutiful and honour bound young woman. Thus, ironically, Parra’s heroine becomes the tragic victim of a self-imposed punishment.

Parra’s other novel Memorias de Mamá Blanca, narrates different aspects of a little girl’s childhood in rural Venezuela. In the novel’s prologue a narrator relates the story of her friendship with an old woman (Blanca) whose memoirs of the past she has inherited. Young Blanca’s memoirs are loosely structured, with chapters devoted to her sisters, to an old black farm hand named Vicente Cochocho, and also to the family’s painful move to the city. Notably absent from the family for long periods of time, Blanca’s father is a sometimes benevolent, sometimes testy and distant figure who strives to bring “order” and authority to the hacienda. His confrontation with Blanca’s adored old Cochocho inserts a strong note of social criticism, as it reveals the old man’s dignity and determination. A most important aspect of the novel, the relationship between Blanca and her mother, is presented through the latter’s obsession with her daughter’s straight hair. While the five other sisters, who have been graced with beautiful curls are not required to go through the “curling” process, Blanca alone is singled out as needing special attention. Time spent alone with her mother is a transforming experience for Blanca, since in the process of attempting to beautify her daughter’s hair, the mother instills in the young girl her passion for language and for story-telling. The mother’s poetic and creative spirit is thus transferred onto the daughter, a theme later echoed in feminist novels, most singularly in Isabel Allende’s La casa de los espíritus (The House of the Spirits). One further point worth noting about the Memorias, is that in the very masculine (and male-dominated) world of Latin American intellectuals in Paris, this work was perceived as important enough to be translated at once into French and it appeared, in a version by Francis de Miomandre (who had also translated Ifigenia), in the same year as the Spanish version, 1929.

It has been the task of a new generation of critics and readers to bring Teresa de la Parra’s writing out of obscurity. Her work is important not only to a complete understanding of contemporary writing by women but it is of equal value to comprehend vanguardist narrative and its impact on the literature that followed.

ANA GARCÍA CHICHESTER
Biography

Selected Works

Novels
Diario de una señorita que se fastidia, Caracas: Imprenta Bolívar, 1922
Ifigenia: diario de una señorita que escribió porque se fastidiaba, Paris: Franco-Ibero-Americana, 1924; as Iphigenia: the Diary of a Young Lady who Wrote because She Was Bored, translated by Bertie Acker, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994
La Mamá X, Caracas: Tipografía Moderna, 1923

Other Writings
Cartas, Caracas: Cruz del Sur, 1951
Epistolario íntimo, Caracas: Imprenta Nacional, 1953
Tres conferencias inéditas, Caracas: Garrido, 1961
Cartas a Lydia Cabrera: correspondencia inédita de Gabriela Mistral y Teresa de la Parra, edited by Rosario Hiriart, Madrid: Ediciones Torremozas, 1988 [Important also on issue of gender]

Compilations and Anthologies
Obras completas, Caracas: Arte, 1965
Obras (Narrativa, Ensayos, Cartas), Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1982

Further Reading

Bosch, Velia (editor), Teresa de la Parra ante la crítica, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1980
Gambarini, Elsa Krieger, “The Male Critic and the Woman Writer: Reading Teresa de la Parra’s Critics,” in In the Feminine Mode: Essays on Hispanic Women Writers, edited by Noel Valis and Carol Maier, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania: Bucknell University Press, and London: Associated University Presses, 1990 [Examines the reaction of male readers and critics to Parra’s work, and explains why it has been rejected by many who try to influence the Latin American literary canon]
Las memorias de Mamá Blanca

Novel by Teresa de la Parra

In Las memorias de Mamá Blanca (1926) Teresa de la Parra explores certain aspects of elite creole society in rural Venezuela in the early part of the 20th century. Published at a time when Social Realism was a strong influence in Latin American fictional writing, this novel has received some criticism for its nostalgic and idyllic portrayal of post-colonial upper-class society. Such appraisal seems unjust. Since the memoirs are narrated by a young Blanca Nieves (Snow White), blatant criticism of any aspect of society would have created a discrepancy in the narrative voice which any careful author would have avoided. To read this novel as a frivolous evocation of Parra’s social milieu is to ignore some of its most subtle and penetrating passages in which, without altering the book’s evocative and lyrical style, economic disparity and social injustice are disclosed.

The novel’s prologue is by a “writer” who claims to have in her possession Mamá Blanca’s manuscript, written toward the end of her life. This pre-textual narrative is a philosophical treatise on the nature of loves that transcend blood lines, loves that are often wrongly judged and misunderstood by others (undoubtedly Parra’s lesbian proclivities are of relevance here). Pointing out only that a “mysterious spiritual affinity” had been established between the two women (old Mamá Blanca and the young writer), the prologue’s narrator describes her love for Mamá Blanca as one in which, “as in all true loves, from beginning to end, I was looking for myself;” meaning that in Mama Blanca, an artist without a profession, she had found a mirror of her own dismantled soul.

It is important to remember that one of the most salient features of the feminist novel of the vanguardist period (including the work of Norah Lange and María Luisa Bombal), is the emphasis on “lateral” bonds of love as opposed to family ties, and on the friendship among women as essential to the fabric of female life. Parra’s novel adheres to these and other vanguardist tenets: first, there is the figure of the father who remains distant throughout the novel; secondly, the single most influential figure in little Blanca’s early childhood is unquestionably her own mother who, far from taking control over this family of women (there are six little girls in all), behaves much like an older sister. In addition, the novel rejects a strictly linear development, in favour of a more episodic structure, which highlights little Blanca’s memories of Vicente Cochocho (the old black farmhand), Cousin Juancho (an endearing charlatan), and the sisters’ favorite pastimes. As in many feminist fictional narratives that have followed, it is the inner world of women, the daily concerns of domestic life, and the interrelationships within the female members of the family that become the main subject of the novel.

One of the most important sections of the memoirs deals with Blanca’s admiration for her mother, who is far from a figure of authority or discipline. That role is reserved to Blanca’s father, who appears only occasionally to bring “order” to an otherwise chaotic and whimsical household. The mother’s role is that of teacher, and it is through her magnificent talent for story-telling that Blanca becomes familiar with European novels and romances. These tales become distorted and embellished as Blanca’s mother responds to her daughter’s request to make the stories more pertinent to her everyday rural experience. By juxtaposing European myth with Venezuelan images, mother and daughter engage in the kind of counter-discursive practice that was at the center of vanguardist literary production. The transformation of Snow White into a Venezuelan “Blanca Nieves,” pokes gentle fun at the controversy between civilization (gentility) and barbarism that had been debated in the earlier part of the century and also, more significantly, points the way of the future for Latin American literature.

ANA GARCÍA CHICHESTER

Editions

Translation: Mamá Blanca’s Souvenirs, by Harriet de Onís and revised by Frederick H.Fornoff, Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1993

Further Reading

Coloquio internacional: escritura y sexualidad en la literatura hispanoamericana, Madrid: Fundamento, 1990 [Contribution by Nissa Torrents on the Memorias]
Sommer, Doris, Foundational Fictions: the National Romances of Latin America, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991 [Chapter on the Memorias]
Violeta Parra 1917–1967

Chilean song writer

Within the context of Latin American cultural fiction, Violeta Parra constitutes one of Latin America’s most innovative and original figures. However, after her death in 1968, Parra became better known as a folk singer than as a poet and it was not until the 1980s that literary critics became interested in incorporating her lyrical discourse into the Latin American literary canon.

The life and the literary production of Violeta Parra are almost inseparable and are surrounded by a constant myth. She was born in 1907 in a small town in the south of Chile called San Carlos. Her relatives were musicians and circus folk of especially humble origin, a situation which never allowed her access to the culture of the elite. This and the fact that Parra was born in rural Chile, will be the most important foundation of her artistic legacy. From her childhood, she sang the melodies she heard her parents and other peasant families sing and she began her life as a folk singer, traveling through the neighboring areas and singing in the most loyal peasant tradition of the south of Chile.

In the 1950s, Parra migrated to Santiago where she sang regularly in bars on the outskirts of the city. That was a time when her singing developed along with her compositional skills and she began writing her own songs in which she incorporated many traditional elements of Chilean folklore, together with elements of her own imagination. At the end of the 1970s Parra began to have a very important part as the author of her own compositions which were sung in cafes throughout the capital; these were the result of her own initiative and that of her sons.

During the 1970s, Parra participated in the great political and cultural debate that mobilized students worldwide but which coincided, in Chile, with the so-called Movement of the New Chilean Song, a rescue “phenomenon” which focused on indigenous music as well as the politics of cultural reevaluation based on Chilean identity. In this phase of renewal, Parra promoted the country’s indigenous instruments, including those of northern Chile along the border with Bolivia.

Parra began to compose memorable poetry with a strong political theme, based on a social vindication, a concern for the workers, the dispossessed, students and women. The themes of love and disenchantment are also ever-present.

In Parra’s work, her songs as well as her poems and letters are collected in a book Toda Violeta Parra [All of Violeta Parra], we can see a marked preoccupation with women’s role and her relationship with Latin American patriarchal society. Las décimas represents her ultimate autobiography written in verse. There are various poems in which we can see woman as a victim due to her gender, but also due to man’s domination, violation and physical abuse.

Parra represents an extraordinary phenomenon within Latin American and Chilean culture. Not only was she a great folk singer who, working in precarious conditions, managed to collect more than three thousand songs throughout the country. She also was a great rescuer of the national culture which she considered to be embedded in folk music. Parra reawoke a sleeping cultural identity in the continent and also vindicated the cultural projects of the young and of women. Together with her work as a composer and a folk singer, she dedicated herself to making tapestries and pottery. Only rarely has Latin America produced an artist with such multiple talents as well as one of the few authors to have worked in the realm of genuinely popular culture with an essentially modern outlook.

Among her most remarkable works is the already mentioned Las décimas, an autobiography written in a form of verse that follows the traditional décima, consisting of ten lines. It also incorporated the struggle of a peasant woman attempting to become part of a patriarchal society, the conflicts of the country and the city and the role of working women.

Through her art Parra represents a fundamental link between the traditional and the modern, between the native perspective of the period and her internationalist outlook. Now that at long last her work is being taken seriously, it is emerging as one of fundamental importance in the Latin American culture.

MARJORIE AGOSÍN

See also entry on María Elena Walsh

Biography

Born in San Carlos, Nuble, in the south of Chile, 4 October 1917-Daughter of a campesino and a music teacher, sister of the poet Nicanor Parra (see separate entry). Moved to Santiago de Chile, 1930. By the age of twenty she was composing popular songs and singing at local fairs and in taverns. Married a railway worker, Luis Cereceda in 1937. Their daughter, Isabel, born in the same year; followed by son, Ángel. Worked with Spanish theatrical company, 1945. Separated from Cereceda and married again, 1949; two daughters. Director of the Museum of Popular Art, Concepción, 1950–51. Worked with her children in a circus. Career took off when she sang on the radio, 1953. Participated in the work of rescuing Chile’s authentic rural music. Awarded Caupolicán prize for outstanding folklorist of the year, 1953. Invited to International Conference of Communist Youth in Poland, 1953; travelled to USSR; spent two years in France where she made her first recordings. Returned to Chile, 1956 and made her first LP there. Moved to Concepción, in the south of Chile, under contract to the university, 1957. Continued her research on Chilean song there. Returned to Santiago, 1958, and began to work in pottery, painting and arpillera work (the last consists of creating images on sackcloth). Travelled to Europe, 1961, spending three years in France. Tapestries exhibited in the Museum of Mankind Paris, 1963, hers being the first individual show by a Latin American artist to be held there. Made documentary for Swiss TV, Returned to Santiago, 1964, where she installed herself in a large tent on the outskirts of Santiago: “la Carpa de la Reina” (Queen’s Tent). Travelled to Bolivia, 1966. Committed suicide in her tent/home, 5 February 1967.

Selected Works

Publications

21 son los dolores: antología amorosa, edited by Juan Andrés Piña, Santiago de Chile: Aconcagua, 1976 [Anthology of poems and songs about love]

Cantos folklóricos chilenos, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1979
El libro mayor, Barcelona: n.p., 1981 [Includes some of her letters and the text of an interview for Swiss television]

Compilations and Anthologies
Toda Violeta Parra, edited by Alfonso Alcalde, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1974

Selected Discography (78 rpm records are not listed)
Cantos de Chile, Paris: Le Chant du Monde, 1956
Acompañada de guitarra, Santiago de Chile: Odeon, 1957
La cueca presentada por Violeta Parra, Santiago de Chile: Odeon, 1959
La tonada presentada por Violeta Parra, Santiago de Chile: Odeon, 1959
Toda Violeta Parra, Santiago de Chile: Odeon, 1961
Recordando a Chile, Santiago de Chile: Odeon, 1965
Carpa de la Reina, Santiago de Chile: Odeon, 1966
Las últimas composiciones de Violeta Parra, Santiago de Chile: RCA, 1966
Canciones reencontradas en Paris, Santiago de Chile: Dicap, 1971
Canciones, Violeta Parra, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1971
Décimas, Santiago de Chile: Alerce, 1976

Further Reading
Agosín, Marjorie and Inés Dölz Blackburn, Violeta Parra: santa de pura greda: un estudio de su obra poética, Santiago de Chile: Planeta, 1988
Oviedo, Carmen, Mentira todo lo cierto: tras la huella de Violeta Parra, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1990
Pérez Ocampo, Gustavo, Gracias a la vida: diálogo con Violeta Parra, Peru: Lluvia, 1989
Pring-Mill, Robert, “Gracias a la vida”: the Power and Poetry of Song, London: Department of Hispanic Studies, Queen Mary and Westfield College, 1990
Subercaseaux, Benjamin, Gracias a la vida: Violeta Parra, testimonio, Buenos Aires: Galerna, 1976
Las décimas

Autobiography in verse by Violeta Parra

Las décimas by Violeta Parra is a binding and essential work for the author and it constitutes one of the richest contributions to Latin American popular poetry of the 20th century. In this work she uses the structure of popular poetry and includes customs, popular sayings, proverbs and tableaux of country life.

This work presents the autobiography of the poet and certain recurrent themes such as religious faith, death, time, fate and disillusion as related to religious faith and to hope in general. The topic of death, treated by and linked to the medieval Spanish tradition, appears frequently in this work, especially as the motif or framework of her childhood: “La muerte se acerca limpia/ya se oye su cascabel” (Death approaches cleanly /you can hear its bell).

Parra’s obsession with learning about and confronting death is linked to her predisposition in Las décimas to write about certain ritualistic forces such as the ceremonies in the cemeteries that she recreates, as well as the constant reflections on death which appear in the song books of the 15th century and the “Coplas,” the lament on the death of his father, written by Jorge Manrique.

Together with this invocation and recreation of death, we find in this autobiography descriptions of traditional feasts, such as those of San Juan and of the Cruz de Mayo, where Parra brings together, with great dexterity, the pagan and religious elements so characteristic of national folklore. She describes vividly the ceremony of the Cruz de Mayo (the May cross) where, following the traditions of the brotherhoods founded by the Spanish crown, rural Chileans maintain the cult of the cross which is venerated and decked out. Parra recreates this experience through her verses: “Festín de luz y de plata/la noche del dos de mayo/petardos gritos y rayos /inolvidables fogatas.” (Feast of light and silver/the night of May the second/fireworks shouts and lightning/unforgettable bonfires).

Las décimas, not only have a great expressive richness of a historical nature, especially the re-elaboration of folk elements and the articulation of the religious themes in a poetic way, but these poems also document the originality with which Parra works with the poetic text, recreates it giving it a sense and a vision of the world where she creates, almost always, an antagonistic relationship with the objects that surround it such as love and deception, but at the same time the possibility of redeeming one’s self, of finding faith through song and creation.

The autobiographical component of Las décimas is also very revealing because, on the one hand, Parra presents these women’s need for independence in their lives as well as the importance of reevaluating and rethinking the feminine. At the same time, Parra’s texts speak to us constantly of physical ugliness, of the marks left by chicken pox and deception.

On the one hand, these poems show her reflecting on woman’s physical beauty; they critique the degree of objectification to which women are subjected by men. However, at the same time, Parra addresses the same question from other angles, implying that woman’s identity is associated to her beauty, and therefore, that her physical appearance is very important. This dichotomy is always always present in Parra’s texts along with the re-elaboration of certain elements related to femininity, such as clothes, colored ribbons and fabrics.

Together with the autobiographical element, Las décimas restore the leitmotif that attempts to vindicate the dispossessed and especially, the life of women who have had to submit, to become dependent on others. The element of social justice and of rejection and loneliness become memorable in poems such as “Se llevan a Teresa” [They Are Taking Teresa] where Parra assumes the voice of the seer that witnesses a rape, a crime in which Teresa’s body is cruelly dragged through town. This theme, as well as the social preoccupation, the marginalization of the peasant woman and unemployment, will reach their culminating point in Parra’s later creations.

Throughout Las décimas, we manage to see Parra’s way of living with all its contradictions and her speculations on life and death, as well as her desire to redeem her historical circumstances through her creativity. The structures of these décimas is very interesting because, although they follow the traditional form, Violeta Parra defines and recreates herself by creating one of the most fascinating works of literature of her time.

Editions

Fernando del Paso 1935–

Mexican prose writer

Known as a practitioner of the encyclopedic and historical novel, Fernando del Paso is an immoderate writer who belongs to a literary generation that grew up under the spell of Carlos Fuentes. His are always all-knowing, all encompassing fictional narratives bringing to mind images of excess and portraying its creator as a gluttonous, Epicurean artist given to dissipation. And indeed, much like his idols, Joyce, Rabelais and Laurence Sterne, del Paso’s three major books—José Trigo (1966), Palinuro de Mexico, 1977 (Palinuro of Mexico), and Noticias del Imperio, 1987 [News of the Empire]—are gargantuan in scope and stylistic playfulness. Their length varies between 500 and 1,250 pages, and the plot is often made to appear secondary and inconsequential. The development of a storyline is not what matters; the main purpose being not to entertain but to challenge, to perplex and obfuscate. The novels do not have a linear structure but, in Georges Perec’s words, they approach life “horizontally;” that is, instead of narrating one storyline or more chronologically and realistically from point A to point C, they devote their energy and space to describing a bulk of atemporal experiences, which are often presented arbitrarily. And as far as their linguistic dimension goes, it is fair to say that language is used less as a conduit and more as a primary protagonist and as an inexhaustible pyrotechnics’ machine, a powerful volcano spewing out all sorts of ingenious pirouettes, riddles, rhymes, and puns. In short, their Utopian objective is to embrace reality as a whole, to leave absolutely nothing out, which results in an awesome array of information organized capriciously, with shifting viewpoints, and a multiple and often confusing cast of characters.

Del Paso’s baroqueness explains why he is so perfectly at home with his native culture: he is a consummate impersonator, and a writer’s writer, but one still fighting to keep a sense of originality. As he himself has claimed, “Tristram Shandy is my Jesus Christ, Joyce my Virgin Mary and the Spanish language my canvas.” His remarkable literary status was established with the appearance of his first novel, José Trigo, about a railway strike and the migration of workers from rural areas to urban centers. Three years later he was part of the University of Iowa’s Writing Program, where he first drafted Palinuro de Mexico. Since then he has written very little fiction. Noticias del Imperio (1987) is a rich historical novel about the French intervention in Mexico, and particularly about Maximilian of Hapsburg, his wife Carlota of Belgium, and their ill-fated reign in Mexico (1862–67), known as “the Second Mexican Empire.” In addition, he has published a biography of Juan José Arreola, a crucial figure in Mexican letters, instrumental in shaping the art of a number of writers, among them the poet and essayist José Emilio Pacheco. Del Paso’s second novel remains the most puzzling. Published in 1977, Palinuro de Mexico belongs to a time in Latin American letters, between the early 1960s and the late 1980s, when readers couldn’t satisfy their hunger for encyclopedic novels. Not surprisingly, it has been compared to Julio Cortázar’s Rayuela (Hopscotch), Augusto Roa Bastos’s Yo el Supremo (I the Supreme), José Lezama Lima’s Paradiso, and Guillermo Cabrera Infante’s Tres tristes tigres (Three Trapped Tigers), although, as the British critic Gerald Martin once rightly argued, its linguistic texture is “insufficiently demanding to stretch the reader’s consciousness to the dimensions required by del Paso’s Ulysscean perspective.” Unlike its counterparts in the Hispanic world, the novel is more accessible but also less rewarding in linguistic terms more conventional and less nightmarish.

The novel defies easy summary. The plot, if any, circles around a certain Palinuro, whose main obsession is the act of creation in its multiple expressions: artistic invention, sexual intercourse and procreation, health and sickness, recreation, acculturation, as well as transmigration. The scenario allows del Paso the opportunity for long disquisitions on history, time, and the meaning of things. In short, the book is about everything and nothing—medicine, eschatology, resistance and affirmation, linguistic and psychological emigration, atemporal love, Mexican history from pre-Colombian times to the 1968 student massacre in Tlatelolco Square, in which Palinuro dies (“Acta est Fabula: The Comedy is Over”). Its characters are ambiguous and evasive: Palinuro and Estefania, its protagonists, are in turns siblings, cousins, lovers, and mere companions. Their ancestors, Uncle Esteban, Grandmother Altagracia, Aunt Clementina, Mamá Clementina, Uncle Federico, are globe-trotting figures whose stage fluctuates between London, Prague, the Crimea, Paris, and Mexico City. Innumerable references (names, places, entire scenes) pay tribute to Alice in Wonderland and Laurence Sterne. Chapter 25, entitled “Palinuro on the Stairs; or, The Art of Comedy,” is an autonomous play using commedia dell’arte characters such as Harlequin and Scaramouche. In 1992., del Paso published the segment separately, as an independent volume (Palinuro en la escalera). The point of view shifts constantly: at times Palinuro tells the story; at other times he talks of himself and those around in the second and third person; and in a vampiresque twist, he becomes an anonymous entity and his cousin Walter assumes the narration. A colorful parade of historical and literary figures keep on resurfacing: “Che” Guevara, Ambrose Bierce, Jonathan Swift, Ho Chi Min; and scores of Latin American luminaries: José Asuncion Silva, Rubén Darío, Pancho Villa, and others. Nothing is certain—except, perhaps, the novel’s concrete existence.

Del Paso’s Mexico is at once mythical and mythological. In Noticias del Imperio, and less patently so in his other two narratives, time is cyclical: history is a spiral leading to nothingness. In fact, his novels can be read as a parodic reading of a Diego Rivera mural: color, lots of color surrounding omnipresent luminaries; and the message: an amorphous, indecipherable, vacuous collective identity made of various races, religions, and political backgrounds. But the novel is not an inconsequential quagmire. It reflects the rapid national modernization and deep collective introspection that took place in Mexico from the end of World War II to 1968. As the nation’s capital became an all-encompassing octopus, with tentacles everywhere, the Partido Revolucionario Institucional, the corrupt ruling party in power since 1929, solidified its bureaucratic power. The result was a sense of suffocation, the perception that, on the road to being, in Octavio Paz’s words, a “contemporary of the rest of humankind,” Mexico was selling its soul to the devil. It was losing whatever authenticity it once had. In 1958 Fuentes published La región más transparente (Where the Air is Clear), an ambitious examination of the social and political tension ubiquitous in Mexico City. Shortly after, a new anti-Establishment generation, modeled after the Beatniks in the United States and the French nouveau roman, which became known as la Onda (New Wave) appeared in Mexico. Leading writers of this group were José Agustín and Gustavo Sainz, who promoted an anarchic, spontaneously written, loosely structured fiction, with innumerable links to foreign cultural influences, one contaminated by history, autobiography and non-fiction. Del Paso analyzes the destruction and renewal in the country’s culture and ponders where it is going and at what cost. He reflects on the increasing openness of Mexico to the outside world, its cosmopolitanism, the democratic spirit developing in the populace, which results in conflagration and tragedy.

His contribution walks hand-in-hand with Fuentes’s, whose work champions encyclopedism in Mexico. Two years before the appearance of del Paso’s Palinuro, Fuentes published Terra Nostra, a narrative pilgrimage from 1492. to the 21st century with the Spanish language as its leading star; and in 1987, Cristóbal nonato (Christopher Unborn) an anti-Utopian apocalyptic vision, a nine-month long literary pregnancy, which culminated in an overpopulated Mexico City on 12 October 1992. Clearly, Fuentes’s goal, which he easily achieved, was to insert Mexico in the torrent of international fiction, to bring his native country to the international literary banquet. Not surprisingly, his books pay homage to infinite novelistic playfulness. But Fuentes’s charismatic personality and the seriousness with which he undertakes his itinerant role of “cultural ambassador of Hispanic America,” have somehow eclipsed Palinuro de Mexico. Del Paso isn’t Fuentes: his vision is less pedantic and more intimate and legible. While he also establishes a dialogue with his Mexican contemporaries (including Salvador Elizondo, the la Onda writers, and Fuentes himself), he does not reprimand, lecture, or look down on his readers. Instead, he creates a game of mirrors through which his troubled native country is perceived as a reflection, an addition, an appendix to a global European and American consciousness.
ILAN STAVANS

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 19 April 1935. Attended the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM), Mexico City: received BA in biological and economic sciences. Fellow of the Mexican Center for Writers, 1964–65; Guggenheim Fellow in 1970. Lived in London for eight years where he worked for the BBC World Service. Diplomat: cultural attaché at the Mexican Embassy in Paris. Received the Xavier Villarrutia Prize, 1966 for José Trigo; Prix du Meilleur Roman Étranger (France), 1975; Rómulo Gallegos Prize (Venezuela), 1977 for Palinuro de Mexico.

Selected Works

Novels

José Trigo, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1966

Noticias del Imperio, Mexico City: Diana, 1987

Poetry

Sonetos de lo diario, Mexico City: Cuadernos del Unicornio, 1958

Play

Palinuro en la escalera, Mexico City: Diana, 1992,

Other Writings

Memoria y olvido. Vida de Juan José Arreola (1920–1947), Mexico City: Consejo Nacional para la Cultura y las Artes, 1994

Further Reading

———“James Joyce y Fernando del Paso,” Ínsula, vol. 39/455 (October 1984)

Octavio Paz 1914–

Mexican poet, prose writer, and literary translator

Poetry
Octavio Paz is one of the most outstanding poets of Spanish America. Although he has written more than twenty books of poetry, there is a unifying factor in his work: the poems always reflect on themselves, they are self-referential, even if their main subject is different. That is, Paz can write about love, history, past recollections, myths, but the poems none the less refer to how words intertwine with these same subjects. The word is situated at the center of his poetry. From this foundation, other common features derive: silence (as opposed to utterance), as the final stage in poetic achievement; absence, as the representation of the impossibility of finding true presences, the true Word; history, as a fault or fall from Edenic harmony; eroticism, in contrast to absence, as a clear path to find the true other, a natural elimination of differences; and the construction of the poetic persona. Although Paz might use complex theory and thought, his poems are founded on basic images belonging to nature: the tree, water, wind, stone, birds, earth, etc. His poems use a clear syntax, a transparency that confronts enigmas, and which speaks to the reader with wisdom and simplicity.

Paz began publishing poetry in 1933—the year in which he published his first book, Luna silvestre [Rustic Moon]—but he has expressed uncertainties about the quality of his early work. One of the seven poems of this collection (quoted by Alberto Ruy Sánchez in Una introducción a Octavio Paz) announces one of Paz’s recurring themes—words emerging from the beloved. Nevertheless, Paz did not, in the end, approve of the lyricism of this book and it was never reprinted. The same thing happened with a book of very different tone, ¡No pasarán! 1936 [They Shall Not Pass!], inspired by the Spanish Civil War. Paz came to despise its social rhetoric and eliminated it from later anthologies and compilations. Very few poems of this kind survived Paz’s revisions. “Elegía a un joven muerto en el frente” (Elegy to a Young Man Killed on the Front) is one of them.

Libertad bajo palabra, 1935–1957, 1960 (in Early Poems, 1935–1955) was the first compilation of Paz’s poetry. The homonymous poem became the prologue to the entire volume. In it, the speaker assumes the invention of the word, the poem itself, as the reinvention of the world: “Invento la vispera, la noche, el día siguiente que se levanta…invento el terror, la esperanza, el mediodía…invento la quemadura y el aullido, la masturbación en las letrinas…invento la desesperación, la mente que me concibe…Contra el silencio y el bullicio invento la Palabra, libertad que se inventa y me inventa cada día.” (I invent evening, night, the next day rising…I invent terror, hope, noon…I invent the burn and the howl, masturbation in latrines…I invent despair, the mind that conceives me…Against silence and noise I invent the Word, freedom that invents itself and invents me every day). The Word (in capital letters because it refers to the absolute in language) predominates even over the persona that creates it, acquiring autonomy. But in Paz’s poetry, language is never set free as in Surrealism. Paz has always been concerned with poetic form. His poems are well structured and maintain a formal equilibrium. Nevertheless, it could be argued that Surrealism was a major influence on Paz’s work. “Surrealism is an attitude of the human spirit…It is the concrete exercise of freedom. Surrealism tries to eliminate the differences,” says Paz. The compilation Libertad bajo palabra ends with one of the most celebrated poems by Octavio Paz, and probably the best-known of Latin America in the second half of the 20th century: “Piedra de sol,” 1957 [“Sunstone”]. This is a circular poem: it starts with the same lines with which it ends. That is, at the end of the poem the reader is forced to begin again. Its title is taken from the Aztec stone of the same name. In the first part, the analogy of the poem brings together nature, words, and love: “Voy por tu cuerpo como por el mundo… voy por tus ojos como por el agua…voy por tu frente como por la luna…voy por tu vientre como por tus sueños… voy por tu talle como por un río/voy por tu cuerpo como por un bosque.” (I travel your body, like the world…I travel your eyes, like the sea…I travel your forehead, like the moon…I travel your belly, like your dreams…I travel your length, like a river/I travel your body, like a forest). But soon the poetic persona finds himself alone, in search of the other, an elusive subject that is both generalized and nullified. Then, a long series of images (resembling, in tone, those used by Neruda in “Alturas de Macchu Picchu”) present dualities: life and death, happiness and anguish, creation and destruction: “grieta en la roca, reina de serpientes/columna de vapor, fuente en la peña/circo lunar, peñasco de las águilas.” (crack in the stone, queen of snakes/column of mist, spring in the rock/lunar circus, eyrie of eagles). The poem becomes, at this point, autobiographical. There are specific references to Paz’s travels. Also, in the middle of the poem there is a concrete place and date: “Madrid, 1937.” His personal history is extended to social circumstances, since there is an obvious connection to the Spanish Civil War (1936–39), and to Paz’s visit to Spain, and to his participation in the Second Congress of Antifascist Writers in Valencia (1937). In the second part of “Sunstone,” love rises above the violence and atrocities of war: “el mundo cambia/si dos, vertiginoso y enlazados/ caen sobre la yerba…/tiempo total donde no pasa nada/ sino su propio trascurrir dichoso.” (The world changes if two, dizzy and entwined, fall/on the grass…total time where nothing/happens but its own ecstatic passing). “Sunstone” presupposes that love, freedom, and poetry (the famous triad of Surrealism) can transform the world. If history appears as a destructive force, circularity and a challenge to linear time is offered through the images of nature and its metaphor of woman. The poem ends with its beginning.

With Salamandra, 1958–1961, 1962. (Salamander), Paz breaks with the traditional presentation of poetry. Paz uses some of the typographical innovations of French Cubism, linked in particular to Apollinaire and Reverdy. The images are reduced to the minimum. This is an example from “Pares y nones” (Odd or Even): “Invisible collar de miradas/a tu garganta encadenada” (invisible necklace of glances/fastened around your throat). Salamandra was written in Paris. Paz later served as the Mexican ambassador to India (1962–68). Those years resulted in Ladera en este (1962–1968), 1969 [East Slope], a volume that clearly links Eastern myths and philosophy to his poetry. Calm and tranquility suffuse the poems to transparency. The words and metaphors used by Paz are simple, but at the same time the poet denotes vast knowledge, lucidity, and wisdom. Ladera este was accompanied by notes explaining and clarifying references (places, religious figures, myths, etc.) that were new to Mexican readers. In a way, some of the Indian myths used by Paz confirmed concepts (i.e., creation/destruction, human and divine dualities, etc.) previously expressed in relation to Mexican and European motifs. But Paz penetrates into the subject of silence and the state of transcendental peacefulness.
“El día en Udaipur” [The Day in Udaipur], for example, presents duality in two alternating columns, and concludes with a Buddhist notion of nothingness: “Esto que he visto y digo, el sol, blanco, lo borra.” (What I’ve seen here, what I say/the white sun erases). Both Salamandra and Ladera este seem to culminate in a single poem, Blanco, 1967 [White], although Blanco was published two years earlier than Ladera. Blanco brings together Paz’s readings of Mallarmé (Paz has written extensively on “Un coup de des” [A Throw of the Dice]), John Cage’s theories on music and silence, and Eastern philosophy. Blanco is, like “Piedra de sol,” one of the best-known and acclaimed poems by Paz. The English edition clarifies the title. “Blanco: white; blank; an unmarked space; emptiness; void; the white mark in the center of a target.” Analogy seems to be the dominant theme: poem, woman and world are identified and fused. The first edition was published as a long single sheet (printed in three columns and in different colors), folded and packed in a box. Paz included an explanatory note, observing that the poem could be read in six different ways, which include three basic themes: the center column as a text on language (“the passage of the word from silence to silence”), the lefthand column as a text on the four traditional elements (earth, air, water and fire), and the righthanded column as a text on four variations of human knowledge: sensation, perception, imagination and understanding. What this note does not say is that the poem as a whole is also, and primarily, a love poem.

Another period in Paz’s poetry would open after his return to Mexico in 1969. Besides the continued reflection on language and poetry, the following books present long poems based on memories of childhood and youth. Two poems are of particular relevance: “San Ildefonso Nocturne”—from Vuelta, 1976 (Return), and Pasado en claro, 1975 (A Draft of Shadows). Autobiography becomes an important element of these poems. Memory is used as an elusive way to evoke an unattainable past. Again, the self-reflective nature of these poems makes the itineraries an illusion of words. In Pasado en claro “Names: they vanish / in a pause between two words.” Paz’s recent book of poetry, Árbol adentro, 1987 (A Tree Within), presents the poet’s preoccupations in a variety of ways. Many of Paz’s poems are based on paintings by Joan Miró, Marcel Duchamp, Antoni Tapiés, Robert Rauschenberg and Roberto Matta. Árbol adentro ends with a love poem,” Carta de creencia” [Letter of Testimony]. Again, as in the beginning, Paz attributes to love the creation of language and, thus, of life. The “Coda” says: “Tal vez amar es aprender/a caminar por este mundo/Aprender a quedarnos quietos/ como el tiulo y la encina de la fábula/Aprender a mirar/tu mirada es sembradora. Plantó un árbol/Yo hablo porque tu meces los follajes.” (Perhaps to love is to learn/to walk through this world/To learn to be silent/like the oak and the linden of the fable/To learn to see/Your glance scatters seeds/It planted a tree/I talk/because you shake its leaves).

JACOBO SEFAMÍ

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 31 March 1914. Attended the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM), Mexico City, 1932–37. Married Elena Garro (see separate entry) in 1937; divorced in 1959. Co-founder and editor of literary review Barandal [Balustrade] 1931–32; editor of Cuadernos del Valle de Mexico [Notebooks from the Valley of Mexico], 1933–34. Travelled to Yucatan, 1937. Attended the Second International Congress of Anti-Fascist Writers in Spain,

Selected Poetry

Luna silvestre, Mexico City: Fábula, 1933
¡No pasarán!, Mexico City: Simbad, 1936
Raíz del hombre, Mexico City: Simbad, 1937
Bajo tu clara sombra y otros poemas sobre España, Valencia: Españolas, 1937; revised edition, Valencia: Tierra Nueva, 1941
Entre la piedra y la flor, Mexico City: Nueva Voz, 1941
A la orilla del mundo y primer día: bajo tu clara sombra, Raíz del hombre, Noche de resurrecciones, Mexico City: Compañía Editora y Librera Ars, 1942
Libertad bajo palabra, Mexico City: Tezontle, 1949
Semillas para un himno, Mexico City: Tezontle, 1954
La estación violenta, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1958
Agua y viento, Bogota: Mito, 1959
Viento entero, New Delhi: Laxton Press, 1965
Vrindaban, Madurai, New Delhi: Laxton Press, 1965
Discos visuales, Mexico City: Era, 1968 [four poems printed on paper disks]
Ladera este (1962–1968), Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1969
Topoemas, Mexico City: Era, 1971

Pasado en claro, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1975

Vuelta, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1976

Poemas recientes, n.p., Institución Cultural de Cantabria de la Diputación Provincial de Santander, 1981

Anthologies and Compilations

Lo mejor de Octavio Paz: el fuego de cada día, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1989

Poetry Anthologies in Translation

Cuatro chopos/The Four Poplars, translated by Eliot Weinberger, Purchases: State University of New York, 1985

Further Reading

Sucre, Guillermo, “Paz: La vivacidad, la transparencia,” in La máscara, la transparencia, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1975 [One of the key essays on Paz, based primarily on poetic language’s selfreflection]

Wilson, Jason, Octavio Paz, Boston: Twayne, 1986
Essays

Octavio Paz’s essays cover an astonishing range of subjects. Aztec art, Tantric Buddhism, Mexican politics, neo-Platonic philosophy, economic reform, avant-garde poetry, structuralist anthropology, utopian socialism, the dissident movement in the Soviet Union, sexuality and eroticism: these are but some of the topics Paz has explored in his essays. He is as comfortable writing in sweeping terms about such large issues as the nature of religion or the end of modernity as he is drawing delicate character sketches of people he has known in the course of his very long life. He is both deeply immersed in Mexican history and culture, having produced in El laberinto de la soledad (The Labyrinth of Solitude)—see separate essay—one of the most influential interpretations of the Mexican character ever written. Paz is also steeped in the Western tradition as a whole, as one can see from a work such as Los hijos del limo, 1974 (Children of the Mire), a history of modern poetry from German Romanticism to the 1960s avant-garde that remains unparalleled in its reach.

Yet it would be wrong to describe Paz as an eclectic thinker. What strikes the reader of Paz’s essays is not just the ease with which he moves between different topics, but also the extraordinary depth and consistency of vision he has maintained throughout his many varied projects. At a very early age, in the 1930s, Paz came into contact with two complex and occasionally interrelated phenomena that expressed the longing for a grand social and spiritual transformation that has resided at the heart of modernity: avant-garde aesthetics and revolutionary politics. Since then—that is, for almost six decades now—Paz has conducted in his essays an ongoing meditation on these two cornerstones of the modern era. Even though Paz’s disenchantment with revolutionary politics set in very soon, the left, especially the Marxist left, continued to perform the role of implicit interlocutor in his political essays. And even though the direct link between political and artistic practice also snapped in Paz’s mind very early in his career, his writings on poetry are even now imbued with a profoundly utopian spirit.

By the time the Cold War began, Paz had already decisively spurned the Soviet model. This did not mean, however, that he immediately embraced the democratic-capitalist alternative to communism. In El laberinto Paz approached the two opposed blocs as simply different versions of the same general phenomenon, which later, following Raymond Aron, he would label “industrial civilization.” El laberinto contains pages of passionate denunciation of the dehumanization afflicting modern societies, both East and West. Subsequent collections of essays, such as Corriente alterna, 1967 (Alternating Current), and Posdata, 1970 (The Other Mexico), also bristle with distaste for the materialism and soullessness of the Western democracies. Even in the 1980s and 1990s, by which time Paz had become an influential supporter of the neoliberal economic policies pursued by successive Mexican governments, he continued to write unflinchingly in texts such as Tiempo nublado, 1983 (One Earth, Four or Five Worlds), La otra voz, 1990 (The Other Voice), and Itinerario, 1993 [Itinerary], of the weaknesses of liberal democracy, as well as of the havoc wrought by the free-market system. Yet by this time he had also become adamant in his insistence that Mexico needed to become modern if it wished to survive and flourish under current global conditions. He continued to sound a note he had favored for a long time, which was that Mexico should find its “own path” to modernity, but by the 1980s such vague protestations began to have a rote quality to them. In practice, the policies Paz supported meant that Mexico was becoming increasingly aligned with the US economic model.

The persistent ambivalence about modernity may have something to do with the fact that in Mexico modernity is often regarded as an alien imposition, and therefore as a problem. Yet in diagnosing the social, economic, political and ecological disasters it has brought about, Paz drew considerable inspiration from a specific tradition within modernity itself. Ever since Posdata, a long essay Paz wrote shortly after resigning as Mexico’s ambassador to India to protest the massacre by the Mexican Army of hundreds of peaceful demonstrators in the Plaza Tlatelolco in Mexico City in October 1968, “criticism” has been Octavio Paz’s watchword. In Posdata Paz presented a devastating critique of the Mexican political system as well as of the nation’s cultural imaginary. As a cure for the nation’s ailments, Paz offered as a first step the practice of criticism itself, arguing that it was only by ensuring the possibility of free inquiry and open debate that the nation could even begin to think about ways to resolve its problems. What Paz was calling for, in other words, was the creation of a public sphere. As founder and editor of two important monthly reviews based in Mexico City, Plural (1971–76) and Vuelta (1976-) Paz went on to make a crucial contribution to the forging of such a space for intellectual discussion.

At the end of Posdata, Paz describes criticism as an “acid” that corrodes the myths of a nation. It brings to light a culture’s subconscious, making it the object of rational debate. It serves to free a people of their blind submission to a set of cultural fantasies. Paz believes that criticism in this sense originated in the Enlightenment. In fact, he has often argued that many of the weaknesses of Latin America’s political and intellectual tradition are the result of the absence in Latin America of an Enlightenment. From this, it is clear that Paz sympathizes with the demystifying effects of modernity. And yet in his writings on poetry, Paz appears not as the level-headed spokesman for a rationalized, disenchanted world, but as the impassioned defender of poetry’s visionary powers. Over the years, Paz has returned repeatedly to the idea that the function of poetry in the modern world has been to serve as an antidote to modernity itself. The Romantic rebellion against the Enlightenment first established this pattern, according to Paz. Where the Enlightenment spoke in the name of reason, the Romantics spoke for all that was repressed by reason. What is remarkable about Paz is how he has tried to straddle this divide, to take on both the cause of the Enlightenment and the cause of Romanticism.

In “Poesía de soledad y poesía de comunión,” 1942. [Poetry of Solitude and Poetry of Communion], Paz posits a stark conflict between poetry and the modern world. Paz speaks of how modern society robs people of their humanity, turning them into commodities or instruments. Under such circumstances, the task of poetry is to restore the world that has been lost to humanity, the world of dreams and innocence, of eternity and ecstasy. Because of its opposition to the dominant norms of modern society, poetry is a fundamentally dissident, sacrilegious activity. It is not surprising, then, that “Poesía de soledad” celebrates the tradition of the poète maudit embodied in figures such as Novalis, Nerval, Baudelaire and Lautréamont. Over the course of his career, Paz was to maintain this view of poetry as a profoundly transgressive activity. Yet he also undertook over the years a gradual reappraisal of the very target of modern poetry’s foundational act of transgression: the Enlightenment.

To begin with, this was a matter of recognizing that the Enlightenment helped prepare the way not only for the rationalization and hence dehumanization of the world, but also for the rooting of the social order in the profoundly emancipatory activity of criticism. If poetry was an act of rebellion, then it was a mode of criticism, and as such it was an integral part of the project of modernity. The initial reappraisal of the Enlightenment led inevitably to a modified view of the modern world itself. Some of its constitutive elements—democracy, criticism, the free market—even came to be regarded by Paz as attractive and desirable. But what did this mean for poetry? Could it continue to blaspheme against the very world Paz was now defending? Or did the changes in Paz’s political views allow him to envision the building of a new kind of bridge between poetry and modernity?

In La otra voz Paz argues that the tradition of liberalism that flowed out of the Enlightenment has brought immense benefits to humanity. Yet he also thinks that liberalism cannot answer some of the most important questions about human life. This is where poetry comes in: it reminds us of that vast zone of reality that is ignored and suppressed in the modern world. Clearly, Paz continues to believe in the profound importance of poetry to society. But whereas in his early work poetry was thought to be able to give us a “new man,” in his late work poetry discloses a buried world, the world of what Paz calls the “other” voice, yet without being able to provide more than a temporary respite from the iron hand of the market. By the 1990s the function of poetry is no longer to transform life, but to make it more complete.

MAARTEN VAN DELDEN

Selected Essays

Las peras del olmo, Mexico City: UNAM, 1957

Tamayo en la pintura mexicana, Mexico City: UNAM, 1959

Cuadrivio, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1965 [on Darío, López Velarde, Pessoa, Cernuda]

Los signos en rotación, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1965

Puertas al campo, Mexico City: UNAM, 1966
Primeras letras (1931–1943), edited by Enrico Mario Santí, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1988
Pequeña crónica de grandes días, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1990
Un mas allé erótico: Sade, Mexico City: Vuelta, 1993
Vislumbres de la India, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1995

Essays in Translation
The Siren and the Seashell and Other Essays on Poets and Poetry, translated by Lysander Kemp and Margaret Seyers Peden, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1976
The Labyrinth of Solitude, The Other Mexico, Return to the Labyrinth of Solitude, Mexico and the United States, and The Philanthropic Ogre, translated by Lysander Kemp, Yara Milos and Rachel Phillips, New York: Grove Press, 1985

Further Reading

Surprisingly, in the light of Paz’s stature and notoriety, there are still relatively few detailed and systematic studies of his essays. Much more critical attention has been paid to his poetry. There are signs, however—in Fernando Vizcaíno’s recent book, for example—that the impact Paz has had on the intellectual debate in Mexico, especially in the last twenty-five years, is beginning to result in an increased focus on Paz’s career as an essayist and intellectual.

Aguilar Mora, Jorge, La divina pareja: historia y mito en Octavio Paz, Mexico City: Era, 1978
[Still the most reliable attack on a much vilified author]
Krauze, Enrique, “Octavio Paz: Facing the Century. A Reading of Tiempo nublado” translated by Sonja Karsen, in Salmagundi 70–71 (Spring-Summer 1986). [A well-informed essay that offers a much broader account of Paz’s ideological development than the title indicates]
Ruy Sánchez, Alberto, Una introducción a Octavio Paz, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1990
Vizcaíno, Fernando, Biografía política de Octavio Paz, o, La razón ardiente, Málaga: Algazara, 1993

El laberinto de la soledad

Essay by Octavio Paz
Following the seminal meditation El perfil del hombre y de la cultura en Mexico, 1934 [Profile of Man and Culture in Mexico], by the philosopher Samuel Ramos, young Octavio Paz embarked, in his polymorphous El laberinto de la soledad, 1950 (The Labyrinth of Solitude), on a search through and for the Mexican soul. The essay appeared at a time when Mexico was consolidating its post-Revolution and the economic benefits of World War II, with every intention of stepping into the “first world”; and when the young artist, under the influence of post-war Surrealism, was opening a new, “violent station” in his poetry and was longing to put Mexican literature on the world stage. In a way, El laberinto symbolizes Mexico and the poet’s coming of age. The book dazzled, hit home, and hurt. To some it was a Bible of mexicanidad, of being Mexican; to others it was an obscene gesture to the mother country. In time, this instant classic became a Mexican institution. Similar to other great Latin American essays, like Sarmiento’s Facundo (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants), it turned into a standard mimetic referent, a simulacrum of reality, for future literary (and academic) fictions.

El laberinto is the work of a keen analyst of culture, of a poet, and of a visionary, surprising at every turn. Paz starts with his personal experience: in the United States, where he lived on two occasions and had the chance to see the pachucos, his “estranged” Mexican countrymen, settled in-between the two cultures; and in Spain, during the Civil War, where he witnessed—he says—the man in the image he wishes man to have, to break the circle of solitude and to open up to the extraordinary and the transcendent. Going from personal experience to myth, the first chapter is a miniature preview of what whole. The next three chapters focus on Mexican traditional culture (social ritual, fiesta, language, popular symbols and myths). Paz shows the syncretic nature of many social values, and, sometimes, even a smooth transition from Mesoamerican pre-Columbian values to those brought in by the Spanish conquistadors. The old Mexico appears to be well and alive under layers of modern varnish. The following two chapters turn to Mexican history, tracing the genealogy of social alienation from the conquest to the Mexican Revolution. Paz envisions modern Mexican history as a string of repressions and partial revivals of the “true” Mexican being. This binary myth-paradigm produces striking insights as well as some marvels. Conquest is, of course, a neat repression; but the 16th and early 17th century colony, with its “participatory structures” and syncretism at work, appears, surprisingly, as a kind of revival and is even posited as a certain idealized Origin (how could he do this to the Aztecs!). On the other hand, it is imperative for the Revolution to be presented as a reversal of the mid-19th-century Reform which, according to the same blueprint, was designed as the most radical incarnation of the modern European project in Mexico. This underlying logic also explains why there is not much history on the image of the Revolution, exalted as a fiesta, as an immersion of Mexico in its old self, and as “a return to the mother.” The next chapter gives a quick review of contemporary Mexican high culture. Then, vision and History turn into vision and myth again: “The Dialectic of Solitude” gives an overarching closure to the spiritual odyssey through personal, collective, and universal labyrinths of solitude and solidarity.

For the second edition, in 1959, Paz completed the paradigm of symbols, opposing the Virgin of Guadalupe to the “violated Mother,” La Malinche, the Chingada; and added a new chapter to update the historical dimension of the book. “The Present Day” is a strikingly iconoclastic “supplement.” The fiesta-image was left behind as Paz focused on the historical Revolution and its mixed record. This partial demystification alone would not be that problematic. Paz was actually very cautious in his judgments, looking as he was all the time for signs for optimism. Where he crossed the line was when he turned on the sacred contemporary revolutions and their icons, from Russia to the emerging “Third World.” He also chastised contemporary intelligentsia for its failure to analyze “the new reality confronting us,” and even dared to invoke the name of Trotsky in positive terms. Orthodox Marxists were outraged, and Paz, like his surrealist mentors, was dutifully blacklisted. What went unnoticed was that, following his criticism of left and right, he went on to declare bankrupt the whole project of Modernity, diagnosing the end of Eurocentrism and “the general collapse of Faith and Reason, of God and Utopia.” In this context, the words referring to Mexicans as being “contemporaries of all mankind” meant that they were actually stepping into a brave new world of post-Modernity.

Paz reacted strongly to the massacre of students at Tlatelolco square in October 1968, resigned from his post of ambassador in protest, and poured out his bitter reflections on Mexican past and present in Posdata, 1970 (The Other Mexico: Critique of the Pyramid), meant as a “postscript” to El laberinto. It was not a complete surprise to see that Aztecs and PRI, the Mexican Government party of “institutionalized revolution,” shared his ire. Throughout the years, he continued updating and expanding his vision of Mexico. All these works make up the first volume of his Mexico en la obra de Octavio Paz, 1987 [Mexico in the Work of Octavio Paz]. Brilliant as they may be, these later writings have not retained the freshness, scope of vision and transgressive innocence of the first.

In the decades after the publication of El laberinto, Mexico went through dramatic changes: rampant urbanization, population explosion, industrialization, rapidly deteriorating ecology, accelerated by the devastating earthquake and economic crisis of the 1980s. These changes were bound to call into question a work dated in the late 1940s, and to push the poet’s words back to poetry and myth. The fall of the Berlin Wall buried under its debris more than one of the traumas charring “The Present Day.” What is remarkable, then, is actually the resilience of El laberinto, especially of its first half.

It has been noted that the most thorough meditation about mexicanidad starts from the vision of the pachucos. However, instead of celebrating the fact that Paz gives them an early recognition and puts them in the origin of his quest, the Mexican-American intelligentsia of the 1970s and 1980s preferred to feel offended. Paz could not anticipate the presentday orthodoxy of “political correctness;” he is describing his experience and his feeling of estrangement when he sees himself in the “mirror” of the pachuco. Is the latter a future image of an “Americanized” Mexico? Yet the pachuco does not cease to be Mexican; and his acting up in face of an alien overwhelming culture even draws certain admiration, thus becoming a symbol of Mexican struggle with North-American civilization. Paz will return many times to this counterpoint. This interest in marginal and other cultures reappears when he assumes the limits of his voice and recognizes the existence of a plurality of Mexicos, living side by side in different historical times. “Past epochs never vanish completely, and blood still drips from all their wounds, even the most ancient.”

The three chapters on traditional culture direct the reader to Mexican intrahistory (in Miguel de Unamuno’s sense of the word). Unlike Ramos, Paz does not exert moral indignation over the low, and does not repress it; he enjoys both the high and the low, the kitsch and the exquisite; his best intuitions come from the verb that would be unpronounceable for the philosopher. This inspiration is not unique: Paz’s influential meditation on world cultures, Conjunciones y disyunciones, 1969 (Conjunctions and Disjunctions), which takes El laberinto to a universal dimension, originated from a similar source. The symbolism of chingar (sexual penetration) and fiesta anticipates the present craze for carnival, although the postmodern version of it is a rather hermetic intellectual exercise and reenactment on the page. Further, unlike Ramos, Paz does not sit comfortably at the rhetorical and moral distance of an enlightened pedagogue: he struggles, agonizes, mimics contradictory voices, contradicting himself. His symbols are not allegories, but flow and change (the Revolution). When he refers to Mexican women, does he impersonate tradition? Does he accept it as his? Does he identify with it? Or do some protestations reflect the sarcastic voice of his then wife, Elena Garro, who became one of the founders of Mexican feminism? Finally, unlike Ramos, Paz is not interested to just make the Mexican functional in modern society; for him, this would only produce another alienation and repression. Once again following the path of Surrealism and its radical critique of Modernity, the solution, for Paz, lies in reconciliation of the contraries, the high and the low, the intellectual and the erotic, the strange and the normal, the transcendence and the intranscendental.

In El laberinto, Paz attempts to square the triangle of Mexican traditional culture, full of masks, rituals and symbols; the painful History, specifically Mexican but universal in its pursuit of Modernity; and the universal dimensions—lacks and needs, fears and desires—of any human being. Nowadays, the aesthetic structures of El laberinto are more visible, and History continues reshuffling its pragmatic values. It would be easy to criticize facets of its awesome pyramidal structure, its visionary excesses, psychoanalytic shell, latent binary biases and, in general, how the poet produces poetic myths. What makes it stay alive is how much of it exceeds its matrix and what new values are foregrounded in time. The interest in and recognition on equal terms of marginal and alien cultures; carnivalization and popular culture accepted and analyzed without bias; strategic use of shifting symbols; polymorphous character, radical ambiguity of meaning, irreducible to any one “origin;” unambiguous assault on the modern project and Eurocentrism; both in ideology and form, this magnificent and still uncomfortable work shows many signs of an early postmodern text.

EMIL VOLEK

Editions

First edition: El laberinto de la soledad, Mexico City: Cuadernos Americanos, 1950

Further Reading

Cristina Peri Rossi 1941–

Uruguayan prose writer and poet

Bearing in mind that until recently Latin American women writers suffered from a significant lack of recognition, Cristina Peri Rossi’s fiction is well-known and read beyond academic circles. The Argentine writer Julio Cortázar has been most appreciative of her work, perhaps acknowledging an affiliation between them through Surrealism; she is widely recognized in Spain where she has lived in Barcelona since 1972; and her works have been translated into English, German, French, Czechoslovakian and Yiddish.

Peri Rossi’s first thirty-one years, spent in her native Uruguay, were marked by the general mistrust towards women whose writing did not consist, as she says, “of certain laudatory lines composed for official occasions to recognize the achievements of public figures.” This attitude, and above all the threat presented by the dictatorship of Bordaberry (who militarized all civil institutions and officially abolished any recognition of human rights) forced her to leave the country in 1972. Though she now frequently visits her home, she has chosen not to return to Uruguay on a permanent basis, because, she says, she now feels estranged from her own country. Exile—a frequent theme in the work of many Latin American writers—is a characteristic of life: “We are all exiled from La nave de los locos (The Ship of Fools), this is the true condition of man.” This sense of alienation and estrangement contributes to the hallucinatory perspective of many of the situations described in her fiction: “The category in which the universe manifests itself is the category of hallucination,” she writes, quoting Gottfried Benn in an epigraph to her collection of short stories, El museo de los esfuerzos inútiles [The Museum of Useless Efforts].

Peri Rossi’s works include poetry, short fiction and novels. She says she works on three typewriters at the same time, moving from one to the other, as the impulse takes her. There are three main components to the themes of her work: the political, be it in terms of national politics or of feminist protest and non-conformity to established canons; the erotic and the questioning of sexuality and gender distinctions; third, the continuous dialogue with language.

With reference to the first, the political, many of her earlier short stories denounce the oppression and persecution of totalitarian regimes. “Los trapecistas” [The Trapeze Artists] from Indicios pánicos (an ambiguous title in Spanish meaning both Signs of Panic and Vestiges of Pan) tells of the despair of a man who feels compelled to denounce his lover to the authorities. While in “Anunciación” [Annuciation] from La rebelión de los niños [The Children’s Rebellion] we read of a child on a beach confronting the guns of the military to protect a guerrilla woman who appears to him as an image of the Virgin.

Political subtexts can also be read in the story of the long distance runner in El museo de los esfuerzos inútiles who, being expected to beat the existing speed record, when approaching the end of the race chooses to lie on the grass verge by the track and look up at the sunlight playing among the tree tops. Breaking out of the role imposed on him, he exemplifies the right to question and, if appropriate, refuse to comply with society’s expectations.

The feminist intent is evident, for example, in La nave de los locos in a “fragment from the unpublished Confessions of Eve,” a subversive reading of the patriarchal myth of the creation; or in the macabre journey of a coach load of women coming to London to seek an abortion.

The erotic theme figures frequently in Peri Rossi’s work, scrutinized in its various manifestations and aberrations, such as the fallacious belief in a life-long monogamous marriage or the inability to put a stop to a relationship that is finished. There is also the question of the prohibition of love, which intensifies desire to the extent of compelling the individual to take refuge in the imaginary interior space of wish-fulfilment, more powerful than the material world, as in the story “Una pasión prohibida” [A Forbidden Passion]. Yet loving is an essential condition of reality: “El infierno es no poder amar” (Hell is not being able to love), says one of Peri Rossi’s characters in La nave de los locos.

The questions of sexuality and gender emerging from the erotic theme have long preoccupied Peri Rossi, who sees the latter not as “the simple result of biological elements,” but as what “is socially thrust upon us by our parents and by society.” Hence, our sexual role is often an “imposition on our behaviour,” and Peri Rossi’s characters strive to break loose from these pre-conditions by experimenting with a multiple sexuality and/or periodically acknowledging an absence of sexuality, or reversing the traditional roles, thus subverting the sexual hierarchy.

Peri Rossi’s further preoccupation with language is evident in both her poetry and prose. In her stories from La rebelión de los niños, language figures as a form of social oppression, being institutionalized and posing a permanent dialectical crisis between its official and personal usage. Against such oppression, the arbitrary nature of language is emphasized: “Así supe que el sonido es una geometría que podemos componer y el significado, apenas una referencia ostensible a las cosas que aprendimos a nombrar de niños, en el tiempo de la obediencia” (So I learnt that the sound is a geometry that we can make up and its meaning only a visible reference to the objects which we learn to name in our childhood at the time of obedience) says Oliveiro in El libro de mis primos [My Cousins’ Book].

Elsewhere, especially in the poems, the pleasure of words is described in erotic terms: “Las mujeres son todas pronunciadas y las palabras son todas amadas” (Women are all pronounced, words are all loved) goes a line from Evohé; or “Leyendo el diccionario/he encontrado una palabra nueva/con gusto, con sarcasmo la pronuncia/la palpo, la apalabro, la manto, la calco, la pulso/la digo, la encierro, la lamo, la toco con las/yemas de los dedos…” (Reading the dictionary/I have found a new word/with pleasure, with sarcasm I pronounce it/I feel it, I engage it, I cover it, I press it, I push it/I say it, I enclose it, I lick it, I touch it with the tips of my fingers…).

Her erotic association with language is also a feature of her poetry. One of her later collections, Babel bárbara [Barbarian Babel] consists mainly of love poems, dedicated to a woman aptly named Babel, based on the connection between writing and desire. The poem “Amar” [To Love] begins: “Amar es trahir—traducir—(To love is to betray—to translate—) a much more poignant comparison in Spanish given the similarity of the words meaning to betray and to translate.

“The act of loving and the act of writing hold something in common,” says Peri Rossi, “namely the ludic element.” Her novel of 1992, La última noche de Dostoievski (Dostoyevsky’s Last Night), is a metaphor of this association. It tells of a journalist, a compulsive gambler, who seeks help from a psychoanalyst to overcome his compulsion. Games of chance have for him an erotic attraction—and so has the psychoanalyst. The solution, the only possible solution, will be for him to turn to that other activity which shares many attributes with gambling, in particular, pleasure: writing.

PSICHE HUGHES

---

Biography

Selected Works

Novels

El libro de mis primos, Montevideo: Biblioteca de Marcha, 1969
Solitario de amor, Barcelona: Grijalbo, 1988

Short Fiction

Viviendo, Montevideo: Alfa, 1963
Los museos abandonados, Montevideo: Arca, 1969
Indicios pánicos, Montevideo: Nuestra America, 1970
La tarde del dinosaurio, Barcelona: Planeta, 1976
La rebelión de los niños, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1980
El museo de los esfuerzos inútiles, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1983
Una pasión prohibida, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1986; as A Forbidden Passion, translated by Mary Jane Treacy, Pittsburgh: Cleis Press, 1993
Cosmoagonías, Barcelona: Laia, 1988
La ciudad de Luzbel, Montevideo: Trilce, 1993

Poetry
Descripción de un naufragio, Barcelona: Lumen, 1974
Diaspora, Barcelona: Lumen, 1976
Lingüística general, Valencia: Prometeo, 1979
Europa después de la lluvia, Madrid: Fundación Banco Exterior, 1987
Babel bárbara, Caracas: Angria, 1990
Otra vez Eros, Barcelona: Lumen, 1994

Other Writings
Fantasías eróticas, Madrid: Temas de Hoy, 1991
Acerca de la escritura, Zaragoza, Spain: Universidad de Zaragoza, 1991

Further Reading
-----“Cristina Peri Rossi and the Question of Lesbian Presence,” in her Reading the Body Politic: Feminist Criticism and Latin American Women Writers, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993
-----“Cristina Peri Rossi, Solitario de amor” Journal of Interdisciplinary Literary Studies, vol. 2/1 (1990)

Interviews
Hughes, Psiche, “Interview with Cristina Peri Rossi,” in Unheard Words, London: Allison and Busby, 1985
Peru

19th- and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

Political emancipation from Spain left Peru’s social structure intact. Reflecting that continuity, Neoclassicism remained the dominant literary mode in the years after Independence and the leading intellectual figure of the age was Felipe Pardo y Aliaga, a member of the country’s conservative upper echelons. Distrustful of popular democracy and an advocate of orderly progress directed by an enlightened elite, Pardo was an accomplished and versatile writer who conceived literature as a vehicle for instructing the public. He is best known as a civic poet, the bulk of his output consisting of satirical poems ridiculing the social, political and cultural state of the country. As a dramatist, he sought to raise the standard of the local theatre by adapting Spanish models to the Peruvian scene, his best play being Frutos de la educación, 1830 [Fruits of Education], a comedy of manners in the tradition of Moratín. He was also responsible for introducing the costumbrist sketch to Peru in his short-lived journal El espejo de mi tierra, 1840 [The Mirror of My Country], using it as a medium for satirising the disorder of the new Republic and the failure of the upper classes to provide effective leadership.

Very soon, however, it was Lima’s emergent middle classes who increasingly dominated the literary scene. Manuel Ascensio Segura created a national theatre of quality with a corpus of thirteen plays, the best of which are El Sargento Canuto, 1839 [Sergeant Canuto], La saya y manto, 1841 [The Skirt and Shawl], Ña Catita, 1845 [Mistress Catita] and Las tres viudas, 1862, [The Three Widows]. Though he saw himself as a moralist and social critic, Segura’s talent was above all that of a perceptive observer of the social scene and his plays are memorable mainly for their lively and entertaining depiction of Limeñan customs and types and for dialogues which capture the flavour of popular speech. Likewise, in the 1840s and 1850s, Segura, Ramón Rojas y Cañas and Manuel Atanasio Fuentes used the costumbrist sketch to portray the virtues and defects of the capital’s middle classes and to give expression to their aspirations and grievances. In a similar fashion, from 1872 onwards, Ricardo Palma’s Tradiciones peruanas [Peruvian Traditions] were to focus mainly on Lima’s days of colonial splendour and make use of chatty historical anecdotes to undermine the mythology of the dominant elite and to enhance the middle classes’ image of themselves. Segura, the costumbrists and Palma thus fostered a vision of Peru which identified the nation with Lima and its middle classes. The only work to challenge that vision was the country’s first novel, Narciso Aréstegui’s El Padre Horán, 1848 [Father Horán], which depicts the social and economic backwardness of the Cuzco region and indicts the Republican regime for its failure to improve the quality of life in the provinces.

In the 1850s there emerged a group of young writers who sought to incorporate national literature into the Western mainstream by introducing Romanticism to Peru, but that early attempt at modernisation proved a failure, since for the most part their work... was derivative and mediocre. The only exceptions were the novelist Luis Benjamin Cisneros and the poet Carlos Augusto Salaverry. Cisneros combines a Romantic glorification of love with a somewhat insipid social criticism in Julia (1861) and Edgardo (1864). Salaverry’s reputation rests mainly on the love poems of Cartas a un ángel [Letters to an Angel], published in journals from 1858 onwards.

A major turning-point in the country’s history was the humiliating disaster of the War of the Pacific (1879–83), which provoked a crisis of national morale and prompted intellectuals to embark on an agonised reappraisal of every aspect of Peruvian life. In a series of speeches and essays reprinted in Páginas libres, 1894 [Free Pages], Manuel González Prada attributed Peru’s sickness to the Spanish colonial legacy and advocated a radical modernisation which would destroy the power of the oligarchy, break Lima’s stranglehold on the country and incorporate the mestizo and Indian masses into national society. To that end he called for a literature which, breaking with the traditionalism of the past, would adopt a forward-looking spirit and develop new forms of expression to confront the realities of the modern age. As a poet he himself contributed to that project, for he was one of the main precursors of the modernista movement and enriched and revitalised poetic expression by experimenting with new forms and metres.

The new and more radical spirit championed by González Prada was to manifest itself in the costumbrist sketch and the novel. The former underwent an evolution with Albelardo Gamarra, who, by extending its scope beyond the capital to portray customs and scenes of virtually every region of the country and by using it as a vehicle to speak out on behalf of the oppressed, asserted a new nationalism which embraced the whole of Peru and all of its people. The novel, meanwhile, became a more vigorous medium of social criticism in the hands of two female writers of the realist school. Clorinda Matto de Turner’s Aves sin nido, 1889 (Birds without a Nest) addresses the social problems of the Andean highlands and protests against the oppression and exploitation of the Indian masses, while Mercedes Cabello de Carbonera’s Blanca Sol (1889) echoes González Prada’s denunciations of the moral corruption of Lima’s high society.

Unfortunately, most Peruvian writing of the 19th century was artistically flawed and if Ricardo Palma stands out as the leading figure, it is precisely because he set a standard of literary professionalism which none of his compatriots were able to match. However, the advent of Modernismo brought a greater aesthetic awareness and significantly raised the level of literary craftsmanship. Among the best prose works is Enrique A.Carrillo’s Cartas de una turista, 1905 [Letters from a Tourist], a novel which gently derides Peru’s cultural backwardness and explores the gulf between the ideal world of the imagination and the prosaic world of everyday reality. Cuentos malévolos, 1904 [Malevolent Stories] by Clemente Palma, the first writer to cultivate the short story systematically, is marked by its cosmopolitan outlook and impregnated with the decadent spirit of the fin de siècle, manipulating ironic cynicism and black humour to subvert established religious and philosophical beliefs and conventional moral values. In poetry José Santos Chocano achieved international status and gave a new direction to the modernista movement by celebrating the awesome grandeur of the American landscape and the epic splendour of the continent’s history, thereby asserting Hispanic America’s pride in itself in the face of Anglo-Saxon encroachment. Subsequently, Alberto Ureta was to establish himself as a fine minor poet with a work characterised by a resigned melancholy at the fleetingness of time and a bitter-sweet nostalgia for moments of lost happiness.
Among later writers still operating within the modernista sensibility was José María Eguren, author of Simbólicas, 1911 [Symbolic Poems], La canción de las figuras, 1916 [Song of the Figures] and Poesías, 1919 [Poems]. Perhaps the only genuine representative of the Symbolist aesthetic in Spanish America, Eguren was Peru’s first major poet of modern times. Turning his back on society to commit himself completely to his art, he lived poetry as an alternative life-style, elevated it to a medium for capturing the hidden magic of the world and through his consummate craftsmanship endowed his superficially simple and transparent verse with a rich suggestive power. Another important transitional figure was Abraham Valdelomar, who cultivated both poetry and fiction. The bulk of his work is still modernista in manner, most notably so in his reworking of Inca legends in Los hijos del sol, 1921 [Our Children of the Sun], where he re-creates the sumptuous magnificence of the pre-Columbian past. However, both in his poetry and in the stories of El caballero Carmelo, 1918 [Sir Carmelo], he initiates a movement away from the sophisticated cosmopolitanism of Modernismo by employing a simple, austere language to evoke the provincial world of his childhood and to celebrate the natural dignity and nobility of the humble folk of rural Peru. Ventura García Calderón’s La venganza del cóndor (1924), translated into English as The White Llama, is likewise inspired by the aim of revealing to the world the unknown Peru beyond the capital, but though the stories are characterised by an impressive mastery of language and technique, their portrayal of national reality is superficial, conjuring up the image of an exotic and mysterious land of picturesque customs and colourful characters. By contrast, Enrique López Albujar’s Cuentos andinos, 1920 [Andean Tales] ushers in a more realistic approach to the treatment of the rural world by focussing on the violence and brutality of life among the Indian peasantry, and though its depiction of indigenous culture is limited and distorted by Western preconceptions, it is the first work of fiction to portray the Indian convincingly as a human being.

The 1920s were a period of political and intellectual ferment which saw the spread of radical thought and the emergence of organised left-wing political movements. The leading intellectual figure of the age was José Carlos Mariátegui, whose Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, 1928 (Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality) provides the first Marxist analysis of Peru’s history. As a political thinker Mariátegui exercised an enormous influence, but he was equally important as a stimulator of intellectual activity. From 1926 to 1930 he edited Amauta [Inca Sage], a journal of socialist orientation aimed at promoting a deeper understanding of Peru and at widening its cultural horizons. It published poetry and fiction as well as articles on science, geography, politics, art and history, and not only included contributions from prominent foreign intellectuals but provided an outlet for young Peruvian writers, whatever their political affiliations. As such it gave a great boost to the intellectual life of the country.

One aspect of the ferment of the 1920s was the growth of a somewhat amorphous avant-garde movement. Much of the verse of the period manifests a continuing cultural dependency by merely aping the latest Western fashion, but the best poets assimilated the spirit and techniques of the international avantgarde to forge a new and personal poetic expression. Foremost among these was César Vallejo, who was subsequently to gain international recognition as one of the great figures of 20th-century literature. Others were Carlos Oquendo de Amat and, in the 1930s, Emilio Adolfo Westphalen and César Moro. The avant-garde era thus constitutes a watershed in the history of Peruvian poetry, since it saw the establishment of a modern poetic tradition.

The standard-bearer of the avant-garde was Alberto Hidalgo. Influenced by the Futurism of Marinetti but stylistically still conservative, his early books celebrate the beauty of cars, aeroplanes, motor cycles, sport and war, manifestations of a new creative spirit which is destroying the old world to build a new. Later, Hidalgo was to invent “simplism,” his own variant of the avant-garde poetics, and his formal experimentation becomes more daring in Química del espíritu, 1923 [Chemistry of the Spirit], Simplismo, 1925 [Simplism] and Descripción del cielo, 1928 [Description of Heaven], where it is linked to a religion of the self, seen as the source of ultimate reality. Among the best examples of Futurist poetry are the “polyrhythms” of the expatriate Juan Parra del Riego, which exploit modern imagery and free verse to convey the excitement and dynamism of 20th-century life. By contrast, the indigenist poet Alejandro Peralta makes use of avant-garde techniques to evoke the Andean rural world in Ande, 1926, and Kollao, 1934 [Aymara World]. However, second only to Vallejo’s Trilce as the outstanding book of the 1920s is Oquendo’s 5 metros de poemas, 1927 (5 Metres of Poems), whose verbal jokes and visual games express a child-like delight in the exciting new world opened up by modernity.

Though often naive and undiscriminating, the avant-garde’s enthusiastic response to modernity was an expression of the emergent middle sectors’ hopes that Peru was on the verge of a radical transformation. Unfortunately, those hopes were to be frustrated as the country entered a decade of political repression and the poetry of the 1930s reflects the increasing marginalisation of the intellectual community. Westphalen’s Las insulas extrañas, 1933 [Strange Islands] and Abolición de la muerte, 1935 [Abolition of Death], constituting as they do a Proustian search for lost time in which memory and the poetic imagination struggle against time and death to recuperate the happiness of lost love, are emblematic both because of the poet’s withdrawal into a private space and because of his lonely resistance to the life-negating forces around him. For his part, the Surrealist Moro expressed his repudiation of the Peruvian environment by opting to spend most of his adult life in voluntary exile and to write his work in French, the major exception being La tortuga ecuestre [The Equestrian Turtle], written in 1938–39, where poetry is celebrated as an alternative life-style devoted to the subversion of dominant Western values and to the pursuit of a self-fulfilment denied him by a dehumanising society.

Meanwhile, 1928 saw the publication of two novels which in their different ways reflect the new spirit of the times. Martin Adán’s La casa de cartón (The Cardboard House) is an avantgarde “portrait of the artist as a young man.” By contrast, Enrique López Albújar’s Matalaché is something of an anachronism, since it is a historical novel with a conventional romantic plot and is consciously traditional in form and manner. However, its modernity lies in the way it uses history, for like Mariátegui’s Siete ensayos it reappraises the Independence period in order to question the value-systems on which post-Independence Peru has been built. In the 1930s José Diez-Canseco was likewise to go against the prevailing regionalist current. On the one hand, he may be regarded as a precursor of the urban fiction of the 1950s, since his novel Duque, 1934 [Duke] depicts the frivolous life-style of the capital’s idle rich while some of the stories of Estampas mulatas [Mulatto Vignettes] (1929–40) focus on the dispossessed of the poorer districts of Lima and Callao. On the other, though his other tales are superficially regionalist in that they are set in various parts of the provinces, their mestizo protagonists share a common identity and way of life and are portrayed as representative of a national culture spanning city and countryside, highlands and coast.

For the most part, however, the fiction of the period was regionalist in character. The 1920s saw the growth of an indigenist movement to champion the cause of the downtrodden Indian population of the Andean region, but though it produced important works of non-fiction such as Luis E. Valcárcel’s Tempestad en los Andes, 1927 [Storm in the Andes], fiction tended to limit itself to a crude social realism denouncing the oppression and exploitation of the Indian peasantry, typical examples being the stories of María Wiesse and Gamaliel Churata in the pages of Amauta. In a similar vein César Falcón’s Plantel de inválidos, 1921 [Nursery of Cripples] and El pueblo sin Dios, 1928 [The People without God] and César Vallejo’s El tungsteno, 1931 (Tungsten) analyse Andean society from a Marxist perspective and situate the Indian question within the context of the class struggle. Not all regionalist fiction was politically motivated, however, and Emilio Romero’s Balseros del Titicaca, 1934 [Boatmen of Lake Titicaca] and Fernando Romero’s Doce relatos de la selva, 1934 [Twelve Jungle Tales] are representative of a current which aimed primarily to promote among Peruvians a knowledge of their own country. The culmination of the regionalist/indigenist trend was to come with the emergence of Ciro Alegría and José María Arguedas in the second half of the 1930s. Alegría’s first two novels, La serpiente de oro, 1935 (The Golden Serpent) and Los perros hambrientos, 1938 [The Starving Dogs], are sympathetic portrayals of the way of life of the rural peoples of the remote regions of northern Peru, while El mundo es ancho y ajeno, 1941 (Broad and Alien is the World), the indigenist novel par excellence, is a paradigmatic account of the destruction of the traditional Indian community by the expansion of the latifundia system. For his part Arguedas sought to dissociate himself from the simplifications of the indigenists and the stories of Agua, 1935 [Water] and the novel Yawar fiesta, 1941 (Yawar Fiesta) offer a deeper understanding of Indian culture and a more complex view of Andean social relationships. Together the two men’s complementary interpretations of the Andean world laid the the foundations of a solid novelistic tradition.

Meanwhile, the theatre had gone into a long decline following the death of Segura, the only dramatists of any note being Leonidas Yerovi in the early 1920s, both of whom carried on the costumbrist tradition. However, the 1940s saw the beginnings of a revival. Percy Gibson Parra’s Esa luna que empieza, 1946 [That Rising Moon] initiates a move away from costumbrist realism towards the poetic treatment of universal archetypes. Likewise, the majority of Juan Ríos Rey’s eight plays are poetic reworkings of historical and cultural myths, the best example being Ayar Manko (1952). Sebastián Salazar Bondy, a leading promoter of theatrical activity, was himself the author of ten dramas as well as eleven brief one-act plays, his best works being the historical drama Rodil (1954), the comedy El fabricante de deudas, 1963 [The Debt Manufacturer]—an adaptation of Balzac’s *Le Faiseur”—and the political allegory El rabdomante, 1965 [The Diviner]. In the wake of the 1940s revival, the 1950s and 1960s produced three highly successful works. Enrique Solari Swayne’s Collacocha (1955), dramatises Latin America’s striving to overcome underdevelopment through an epic representation of the struggle to dominate nature. Julio Ramón Ribeyro’s *Vida y pasión de Santiago el pajaro*ero, 1958 [Life and Passion of Santiago the Birdman] adapts the story of an 18th-century visionary as an allegory of the artist in contemporary Peru. Alonso Alegría’s El cruce sobre el Niágara, 1968 [Crossing Niagara] is an affirmative counter-text to Waiting for Godot, based on the career of the French tightrope-walker Blondin. More recently, the novelist Mario Vargas Llosa has turned his hand to writing for the stage with La Señorita de Tacna, 1981 (The Young Lady from Tacna) and Kathie y el hipopótamo, 1983 (Kathie and the Hippopotamus). However, Peru still suffers from a lack of a public of sufficient size to support commercial theatre except on a very modest scale, and the continuing paucity of official support means that semi-professional groups have to struggle to keep their heads above water. In such circumstances it is hardly surprising that, while Peruvian dramatists have produced some fine plays, on the whole they have failed to match the achievements of the country’s poets and novelists in terms of both quantity and quality.

The 1940s and 1950s threw up a whole generation of poets of high quality who combined the avant-garde legacy of experimentation with a rehabilitation of more traditional forms to produce some strikingly original poetry. The dominant tendency of the 1940s was a so-called “pure poetry,” the main exponents of which were Martín Adán, Jorge Eduardo Eielson and Javier Sologuren and, later, Leopoldo Chariarse and Francisco Bendezú. This poetics may be regarded as symptomatic of the sense of alienation experienced by many of the country’s intellectuals, for the poets who practised it turned their backs on the surrounding reality to take refuge in the timeless world of literature, creating in poems of rigorous formal perfection an alternative space where life is lived at a higher level. The outstanding example is Adán’s Travesía de extramares, 1950 [Voyage Beyond the Oceans], a collection of sonnets re-enacting the poet’s pursuit of an ineffable ideal reality. “Pure poetry” was to persist into the 1970s, but long before then it had gone into crisis, for most of its practitioners lost confidence in the transcendent powers of poetry and their later work, such as Adán’s La mano desasida (Canto a Macchu Picchu), 1964 [The Hand Let Go (Song to Macchu Picchu)], is given over to the expression of an acute existential anguish.

Meanwhile, the quashing of a brief experiment in democracy by the coup d’état of 1948 led to an upsurge of socially-committed verse, represented mainly by a group of poets—Gustavo Valcárcel, Alejandro Romualdo, Juan Gonzalo Rose and Manuel Scorza—who suffered exile during the Odria dictatorship. Much of this poetry tended to lapse into strident diatribe or declamatory effusions of revolutionary optimism, but Romualdo and Rose, in particular, were able to produce more effective work by developing more sophisticated forms of expression and by linking the social to their personal experience. Another poet of the period, Mario Florián, produced his best work, not in his later social verse, but in his earlier books, notably Urpi, 1944 [Dove], where he cultivates an Andean folk poetry rooted in popular oral tradition. Subsequently, the growing politicisation of Peruvian and Latin American society was to be reflected in the work of poets, such as Washington Delgado and Pablo Guevara, who began to publish towards the end of the 1950s. Their poetry, however, is different in character from that of their predecessors, for it bridges the somewhat artificial gap between private and social poetry by combining socio-political concerns with an expression of personal experience and by situating the poet as an individual in the context of social and historical processes.

Other poets are less easy to categorise. The poetry of Sebastián Salazar Bondy, for example, is essentially confessional, a testimony of his personal encounter with the world, celebrating the values of love, friendship and goodwill among human beings. The work of Blanca Varela, Peru’s foremost female poet, is marked by a rebellious dissatisfaction with her condition as a woman and as a human being. Carlos Germán Belli, the outstanding poet of the generation of the 1950s, developed a highly original mock-classical manner which indirectly voices social criticism by giving expression to the frustrations of the country’s middle classes and, in his later work, serves as a vehicle for metaphysical meditations.

In the narrative field the 1950s saw the emergence of a generation of writers—Enrique
Congrains Martín, Oswaldo Reynoso, Eleodoro Vargas Vicuña, Carlos Eduardo Zavaleta and Julio Ramón Ribeyro—who sought to bring a more professional approach to literary activity and to modernise Peruvian writing by assimilating the technical developments of mainstream Western fiction. Their work was mainly urban, reflecting the impact of the industrialisation of the coast and the massive shift of population from the rural areas to the cities, particularly Lima. An important precursor was Sebastián Salazar Bondy, who pioneered modern urban fiction with the stories of Naúfragos y sobrevivientes, 1954 [Castaways and Survivors] and in his non-fictional Lima la horrible, 1964 [Beastly Lima] captured the dissident mood of the new generation. Thus, Congrains, in the stories of Lima, hora cero, 1954 [Lima, Zero Hour] and Kikuyo, 1955 [Plague of Weeds] and in the novel No una sino muchas muertes, 1957 [Not One but Many Deaths], portrays the hardships and frustrated ambitions of the new urban masses. Reynoso, in the stories of Los inocentes, 1961 [The Innocents]—later retitled Lima en rock [Swinging Lima])—and the novels En octubre no hay milagros, 1965 [No Miracles in October] and El escarabajo y el hombre, 1970 [The Beetle and Man], depicts the drudgery and struggles of the lower middle classes and the alienation of their adolescent offspring. Several of Ribeyro’s stories and his novel Los geniecillos dominicales, 1965 [The Sunday Goblins] focus on sectors of the middle classes who find themselves socially displaced because of their inability to compete in the new society. However, the generation of the 1950s also renovated the regionalist tradition by producing a substantial body of work which adopted a new approach to the treatment of rural life. Ribeyro’s novel Crónica de San Gabriel, 1960 [Chronicle of San Gabriel] explores the decline of the traditional landowning oligarchy. Zavaleta’s La batalla, 1954 [The Battle], El Cristo Villenas, 1955 [Villenas the Christ] and Los Ingar, 1955 [The Ingars] depict the backwardness of the rural world by focussing on underdevelopment at the level of the human personality.
Vargas Vicuña, in the stories of Nahuin, 1953 [In the Eye-View] and Taita Cristo, 1963 [Father Christ], employs a lyrical manner reminiscent of the Mexican Juan Rulfo to convey the Andean peasantry’s struggle for life in an inhospitable environment.
Unfortunately, most of the generation subsequently gave up writing, but Zavaleta and Ribeyro maintained a constant literary activity and the latter, as the author of a corpus of short fiction dealing with universal as well as national themes, was eventually to become recognised as a major writer.

In their concern to introduce a more professional approach to the creation of fiction and to modernise narrative technique, the generation of the 1950s formed part of a continent-wide trend which was to culminate in the so-called Boom of the 1960s. In Peru the two main representatives of the new Spanish American narrative, José María Arguedas (in his second phase) and Mario Vargas Llosa, exemplify a continuing divide in national life and letters in that, while the former writes as spokesman for the Andean world and its culture, the latter is very much a novelist of the Western mainstream. That divide again manifests itself in the second wave of “new novelists” who emerged in the 1970s. Alfredo Bryce Echenique depicts the privileged world of the Hispanic oligarchy in Un mundo para Julius, 1970 (A World for Julius) and in his later novels deals with the experience of the Latin American intellectual in Europe. By contrast, Manuel Scorza, in a cycle of five novels initiated by Redoble por Rancas, 1970 (Drums for Rancas), renovates indigenist fiction by bringing to it a humorous magical realism akin to that pioneered by García Márquez.

In recent years Peruvian fiction has continued to be marked by experimentation and by the sophistication of its narrative technique. However, the most significant development has been the emergence of writers from lower-class backgrounds whose work seeks to give a history to the traditionally marginalised sectors of Peruvian society. Gregorio Martínez, in the stories of Tierra de caléndula, 1975 [Marigold Country] and the novels Canto de sirena, 1977 [Siren Song] and Crónica de músicos y diablos, 1991 [Chronicle of Musicians and Devils], re-creates the experience of the Negroid peasantry of the southern coastal region. Cronwell Jara’s novel Patíbulo para un caballo, 1989 [Scaffold for a Horse] is a foundational myth telling the story of the migrant masses’ conquest of a space in the city. Miguel Gutiérrez’s La violencia del tiempo, 1992 [The Violence of Time] recounts the saga of a humble mestizo family over several generations. Paralleling changes which have been taking place in the country at large, fiction has thus undergone a process of democratisation and begun to reflect the multiracial character of Peruvian society.

Meanwhile, the 1960s constituted a second major watershed in modern Peruvian poetry. The new generation of poets adopted a poetic manner characterised by freer, more open forms, by multiple discourses and intertextual dialogues, and by a colloquial conversational tone that was often humorous and irreverent. By so doing, they reflected the spirit of an age marked by an internationalisation of culture, a liberalisation of the socio-political climate and a general relaxation of attitudes to life. Key figures in the literary history of the period were Javier Heraud and Luis Hernández, partly because of their role as precursors, but mainly because the mythology surrounding their lives turned them into folk heroes, symbols in their different ways of rebellion against an outmoded social order and life-style. However, the major poets of the new generation were Antonio Cisneros, Rodolfo Hinostroza and Marco Martos. Cisneros’s poetry is characterised by a devastating irony, which he wields in Comentarios reales, 1964 [Royal Commentaries] and Canto ceremonial contra un oso hormiguero, 1968 [Ceremonial Song against an Anteater] to debunk the mythologies of the ruling establishment and voice his disconformity with the bourgeois life-style. Hinostroza, in Consejero del lobo, 1965 [Counsellor of the Wolf] and Contra natura, 1971 [Against Nature], asserts the freedom of the individual against the power of the state, identifying himself in the latter book with the youth movement which sought to create its own alternative order. Martos, in Casa nuestra, 1965 [Our House] and Cuaderno de quejas y contentamientos, 1969 [Notebook of Complaints and Contentments], cultivates a deliberately prosaic anti-poetry reminiscent of the Chilean Nicanor Parra and strives to reconcile a concern for social change with a distrust of ideologies.

The poets of the 1970s were to continue and develop the poetic manner of their predecessors, going even further in their cultivation of a colloquial language and tone and incorporating into their verse references to the paraphernalia of modern city life, in order to reflect the spirit of the new society that was evolving in contemporary Peru as a result of industrialisation, mass migration to the cities and the Velasco Revolution. Outstanding among them is Abelardo Sánchez León, whose work expresses the alienation of an individual estranged from the traditional, exclusive bourgeois world in which he grew up, and unsure of his place in the changing society around him. However, as in fiction, the main feature of the period was the emergence of writers of humble extraction, such as Enrique Verástegui and José Watanabe, who broke the middle class’s traditional monopoly of literature and were, in effect, the literary expression of the emergent provincial lower sectors who were claiming a place and a voice in national society. This democratisation of poetry was to continue in the 1980s with the appearance of a whole generation of women poets, foremost among whom are Carmen Ollé, Giovanna Pollaro, Patricia Alba and Mariela Dreyfus.

JAMES HIGGINS

Further Reading

——“Historia de la literatura del Perú republicano,” in Historia del Perú, edited by Fernando Silva Santisteban, Lima: Mejia Baca, 1980

Forgues, Roland, Palabra viva, 4 vols, Lima: Studium, 1988–91 [These 4 volumes consist of interviews with most of Peru’s leading writers]

Gorríti, Juana Manuela (editor), Veladas literarias de Lima, Buenos Aires: Imprenta Europea, 1892

——Hitos de la poesía peruana: Siglo XX, Lima: Milla Batres, 1993

——Myths of the Emergent: Social Mobility in Contemporary Peruvian Fiction, Liverpool: Institute of Latin American Studies, 1994

Losada, Alejandro, Creación y praxis. La producción literaria como praxis social en Hispanoamérica y el Perú, Lima: Universidad de San Marcos, 1976

Mariátegui, José Carlos, Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, Lima: Amauta, 1928; as Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality, translated by Marjory Urquidi, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971 [The last essay, of over 100 pages, is a stimulating sociological and political interpretation of Peruvian literature from the colonial period up to the Indigenist movement]
Ricardo Piglia 1941–

Argentine prose writer

Since the publication of NOMBRE FALSO (Assumed Name) and RESPIRACIÓN ARTIFICIAL (Artificial Respiration), Ricardo Piglia has been the dominant voice among the group of Argentine writers that came of age in the 1960s, many of whom were to die or go into exile during the military dictatorship of 1976–83. Piglia (né Ricardo Emilio Piglia Renzi, hence his frequent alter ego, Emilio Renzi) is a talented literary critic and a popular teacher at the University of Buenos Aires, but most of his critical thinking has been published in his fiction, notably in the novel “Homenaje a Roberto Arlt” [Homage to Roberto Arlt] in NOMBRE FALSO and in the second half of RESPIRACIÓN ARTIFICIAL. This fusion of fiction and criticism has reminded many readers of Borges, and indeed a good part of the reflection on Argentine literature and culture in the works mentioned revolves around the place of Borges (and of Arlt) in them.

If Borges made the analytic detective story and the fantastic popular in the 1940s, so Piglia has set as one of his tasks the translation and promotion of the “hard-boiled” tradition in US fiction, from Hammett and Chandler to such recent voices as Paul Auster. He has directed several series of modern crime fiction for Editorial Sudamericana and others. Closer to home, he has been the most spirited defender of the self-consciously lowbrow fiction and journalism of Roberto Arlt. Arlt, he has argued, though a contemporary of Borges who died before the rise of Perón, is Argentina’s quintessential modern writer, a writer who makes of his marginal status a uniquely powerful standpoint. In Respiración one of the characters argues that Arlt is the first Argentine writer to celebrate the fact that he read the European classics in bad Spanish translations; the same point is made wonderfully in “Homenaje a Roberto Arlt,” which consists of the intrigue around a supposed lost story by Arlt, “Luba” (actually borrowed from Leonid Andreev, but sounding so much like Arlt that many readers have been fooled by the resemblance).

Encyclopedia of Latin American literature  1200

Piglia’s early stories, published as Jaulario [Cage Collection] in Cuba and as La invasión [The Invasion] in a slightly different Argentine edition (both published in 1967), already reveal Piglia as a reader of North American fiction. One of the most effective stories in the collection is “Las actas del juicio” [Records of the Trial], the purported transcription of the statement made in court by the assassin of General Justo José Urquiza (1801–70); as such it is the first of Piglia’s works to delve into a troubled period in Argentine history, the halfcentury of civil conflict that followed independence from Spain. Another of the stories in this early collection, “Mata-Hari 55,” begins with a note that is an early statement of Piglia’s poetics of narrative fiction:

La mayor incomodidad de esta historia es ser cierta. Se equivocan los que piensan que es más fácil contar hechos verídicos que inventar una anécdota, sus relaciones y sus leyes. La realidad, es sabido, tiene una lógica esquiva; una lógica que parece, a ratos, imposible de narrar. [The most uncomfortable aspect of this story is that it is true. Those who think that it is easier to tell a true story than to make up an anecdote, with all of its interrelations and laws, are wrong. Reality, we know, has a slant logic; a logic that seems, at times, impossible to narrate.]

It is important to note Piglia’s sceptical approach to the narration of real events even as early as 1967; though he was already politically active at this point, his work does not subscribe to the naive realism that was much in vogue in the period, nor does he indulge in experimental fiction for its own sake, which was another tendency that was strong in the wake of Cortázar’s Rayuela (Hopscotch).

The next collection, the magnificent Nombre falso, was published months before the military coup. In a 1994 note to a new edition of the book, Piglia recognizes the novella “Homenaje a Roberto Arlt” that comprises the second half of this breakthrough work as “lo mejor que he escrito” (the best thing I have written). What begins—in a tone reminiscent of the Borges stories that are disguised as book reviews—as a discussion of a project to gather together certain dispersed and unpublished works of Roberto Arlt gradually brings Arlt back to life in evocations of him by his friends and in his own words, and in the narrator’s “total identification” with Arlt (to quote a phrase from Novalis quoted in Borges’s “Pierre Menard”). The encounter with Arlt’s friend Saúl Kostia and the struggle over the manuscript of a supposed Arlt story, “Luba,” reveals the powerful links in Arlt’s universe between fiction, forgery, invention and plagiarism. The novella ends with an appendix containing the text of “Luba,” actually a slightly modified translation of a story by the Russian writer Andreev, who is mentioned several times in “Homenaje.” The Andreev story does indeed sound so much like Arlt that a number of critics have taken it to be either an Arlt text or a perfect imitation of Arlt by Piglia; Piglia’s point (developed at length in Respiración artificial) is that Arlt’s fiction is selfconsciously imitative of the European works he read in bad Spanish translations. Since “Luba” sounds so much like Arlt, but is actually earlier, Piglia has brilliantly proven the point that Borges made years before in his essays on Kafka and Hawthorne, that every writer creates his precursors. In this story Piglia is creating Arlt, and also creating a new Borges, a much more subversive one than the “real” Borges who at that time was alive and living in Buenos Aires.

Respiración artificial is also haunted by the odd couple of Roberto Arlt and Jorge Luis Borges, as well as by some other odd couples (Hitler and Kafka, Hitler and Descartes, Gombrowicz and Borges, etc.). The novel begins with the publication (in April 1976, weeks after the military coup) of a novel by Emilio Renzi based on the life of an uncle, Marcelo Maggi, who had vanished years before in a scandal that rocked the family. The novel reaches the uncle, who is living in Concordia, up the Paraná River toward Paraguay; the uncle and the nephew begin an exchange of letters that takes up most of the first half of the book, gradually interspersed with a series of documents relating to a project of historical research that Maggi is working on about an imaginary figure from 19th-century Argentine history, Enrique Osorio. Osorio, according to Maggi, was at work on an Utopian novel called 1979 at the time of his suicide in 1850. The fragments of the novel that are quoted are letters that very pointedly refer to the experience of the mid-1970s, torture, exile, disappearance. When Renzi travels to Concordia to meet his uncle, the papers are eventually turned over to him by one of the uncle’s friends, after an astonishing all-night conversation about the relation between reality and fiction, Argentina and Europe, history and philosophy. The uncle never appears; though this is never stated directly, he has been “disappeared.”

Respiración artificial is a difficult act to follow. Piglia’s next work was Prisión perpetua, 1988 [Life Imprisonment], a new edition of Nombre falso, with the addition of two new stories, one about a North American friend the narrator had in Mar del Plata, the other about Nietzsche’s sister’s adventures in South America. His next major work, La ciudad ausente [The Absent City], is a futurist fantasy based on certain aspects of the life and works of Macedonio Fernández (1874–1952), and revolves around an imaginary museum in which the body of Macedonio’s wife, Elena de Obieta, has been preserved and turned into a speaking machine. (This work has been turned into an opera by the Argentine composer Gerardo Gandini; it had its world premiere at the Teatro Colón, Buenos Aires, in October 1995).

Piglia’s other works include a book of interviews, Crítica y ficción, 1986 [Criticism and Fiction], and a fascinating rewriting of a series of major texts from Argentine literature, La Argentina en pedazos, 1993 [Argentina in Pieces], in comicbook form, with introductory texts by Piglia and comics by a series of avant-garde Argentine artists in the medium. In this work Piglia delves again, as in his first work, into the relations between reality and fiction, into the construction of a social imaginary.

Daniel Balderston

Biography

Born Ricardo Emilio Piglia Renzi, in Adrogué, province of Buenos Aires, Argentina, 2.4 November 1941. Studied History at University of La Plata. Worked in publishing as reader, proof-reader and—in the 1970s—as director of Editorial Tiempo Contemporáneo’s “Serie Negra” of hard-boiled novels. Visiting professor at Princeton University, New Jersey, and, briefly, at the University of California, Santa Cruz. Currently teaches in the Faculty of Philosophy and Letters of the University of Buenos Aires. Awards include the Boris Vian Prize for Respiración artificial.

Selected Works

Short Fiction
Jaulario, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1967
La invasion, Buenos Aires: Jorge Álvarez, 1967
Cuentos morales, Buenos Aires: Espasa Calpe, 1995

Novels
Nombre falso, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1975; as Assumed Name, translated by Sergio Waisman, Pittsburgh: Latin American Literary Review Press, 1995
Prisión perpetua, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1988
La ciudad ausente, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1992,

Other Writings
Crítica y ficción, Santa Fe, Argentina: Universidad Nacional del Litoral, 1986
Por un relato futuro: diálogo, Santa Fe, Argentina: Centro de Publicaciones, Universidad Nacional del Litoral, 1990 [Conversations with Juan José Saer]
La Argentina en pedazos, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de la Urraca, 1993

Further Reading
Menton, Seymour, Latin America’s New Historical Novel, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993 [Comments on Respiración artificial]
Morello Frosch, Marta, “Significación e historia en Respiración artificial de Ricardo Piglia,” in Fascismo y experiencia literaria: reflexiones para una recanonización, edited by Hernán Vidal, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Institute for the Study of Ideologies and Literature, 1985
Virgilio Piñera 1912–1979

Cuban dramatist, prose writer and poet

Eclectic, prolific and innovative, Virgilio Piñera is one of the principal figures of 20th-century Cuban literature. His first books were volumes of lyric poetry, Las furias, 1942, [The Furies], and La isla en peso, 1943 [The Corporeal Island]. In the same year he published one of his earliest theatrical works, Electra Garrigo. Seeking a broader cultural environment he moved to Argentina, where he worked in the Cuban embassy, and later as a translator and editor for the Argos publishing house. In the course of several significant periods of residence in Buenos Aires he formed a friendship with José Blanco, then editor of the important cultural journal Sur, to which Piñera contributed. In Argentina Piñera also headed the group responsible for the Spanish translation (1947) of Witold Gombrowicz’s modern Polish classic, Ferdydurke. His complete plays appeared in 1960, though some of his best work was still to come. Dos viejos pánicos [Two Old Panics] was awarded the 1968 Casa de las Américas Prize, in the period before he was ostracized by a crudely anti-bourgeois cultural establishment in the 1970s. Piñera’s first and best novel, the astonishing La carne de René, 1952 (René's Flesh) was followed by two others in the 1960s: Pequeñas maniobras, 1963 [Small Manoeuvres] and Presiones y diamantes, 1967 [Pressures and Diamonds].

Of Piñera’s three novels, La carne de René is undoubtedly the best, for its originality and black humour. Bizarre forces vie for possession of René's flesh, eroticly, physically and symbolically. The novel is an allegorical satire on human materialism using a grotesque eroticism. In the end René accepts the futility of seeking spiritual freedom, and becomes resigned to his destiny: “…y cada día que pasaba, más y más se convencía de su carnalidad, de su absoluta impotencia para dejar de ser carne.” (…with every passing day he grew ever more convinced of his carnal state, of his total inability to give up being flesh). Pequeñas maniobras is the first-person narrative of Sebastián, an individual obsessed with avoiding all social contact, human warmth, personal or political commitment, in fact anything that might complicate or compromise his existence of acquiescent defeat. His inclination to flight and evasion, however, leads to a series of episodic adventures. Sebastián lives in various nondescript lodgings, almost marries but inevitably flees at the last moment, and moves aimlessly through society. Always on the move, always in retreat, he takes various jobs, as book salesman, street photographer and odd-job man in a society for spiritual mediums. Sebastián is a weakling, an existential fugitive of unheroic proportions. The novel includes hints of political commentary, though a less revolutionary model hero than Sebastián would be hard to imagine. Presiones y diamantes is almost science fiction, a rather slight socio-political fantasy that describes the disintegration of “normal” values in a large modern city.

Piñera’s short fiction is informed by the literature of the Absurd, in which strange, often grotesque situations are developed to provide a metaphor for the predicament of useless existence, and the futility of man’s endeavours to transcend his limitations. His characters often transform a mundane situation into an absurd obsession, and simple problems are answered with the most drastic and grotesquely hyperbolic remedies. In “La carne,” 1944 [Flesh] the citizens of a town suffering famine survive by consuming their own flesh; in “Union indestructible,” 1962. [Indestructible Union], a married couple remedy the lost physicality of their love by immersing themselves in a barrel of tar, and after a few hours in the hot noonday sun can hope to be united forever. In “La montaña,” 1957 [The Mountain] a man’s sole purpose in life is to remove a mountain—by devouring it. With the voice of rational reason left out, the languid grotesques of these stories can proceed with excesses that become the norm.

To date Piñera has been most widely regarded for his theatre, and is Cuba’s principal exponent of the Theatre of the Absurd. Although this is primarily a European genre, it has often been pointed out that certain early works, such as Falsa alarma [False Alarm], with its sense of the ridiculous and the irrational, precede the better-known works of Ionesco. A late work is Dos viejos pánicos which is a good example of Piñera’s absurdist theatre. Tota and Tabo are an old couple who behave like children, crying, squabbling and leaping from one subject to another. Each has a personal obsession. Tabo collects cuttings of young people in order to burn them, and in this symbolic destruction of youth hopes to ward off his own old age. Tota is tormented by thoughts of the lover she might have married, if not for Tabo. The obsession with old age leads to a greater anguish, the fear of Fear itself. They try to kill a personified Fear, but it escapes and returns to torment them. In aspects of its stage presentation and characterization, the play suggests the influence, without derivativeness, of Samuel Beckett’s Endgame.

In art and life, Piñera was a rebel: in relative poverty for much of his life, anti-bookish to the point of possessing hardly any books, yet well-versed in French literature, and living a life dedicated to and redeemed by literature. Long out of favour with the Cuban authorities (“Casa de las Américas” reported his death with a cursory obituary), Piñera’s obscurity was one that he himself seems to have promoted. Studies of his work often declare that he is little-known, but this perspective altered in the 1980s, and is set to change further in the 1990s, as Piñera receives increasing attention as a considerable, if not a major writer.

FRANK MCQUADE

Biography

Born in Cárdenas, Matanzas, Cuba, 4 August 1912 (some sources give 1910). Family moved to Camagüey in 1925. Attended the University of Havana c.1932–37: his studies were interrupted during the dictatorship of Gerardo Machado; resumed studies in 1938, for a further two years. Founding editor of Poeta, 1941 (two issues only). Lived in Buenos Aires from 1946 to 1958. Worked as a clerk in the Cuban Consulate, and as a translator for the publishing house Argos. Co-editor, with José Rodríguez Feo, of the literary journal Ciclón, 1958. After the Cuban Revolution in 1959, he contributed to numerous journals and magazines, including Casa de las Américas and Lunes de Revolución. Director of the publishing company Ediciones R., 1960–64. Arrested for homosexual activity in 1961 and imprisoned briefly. Allowed to continue his work as a translator in the Instituto Cubano del Libro, but isolated from all other cultural activities. Thereafter, like Lezama Lima, fell out of favour with the authorities, with the result that his last years were of misery and poverty. Awarded the Casa de las Américas Prize for Theatre, 1968 for Dos viejos pánicos. Died in Havana, 18 October 1979.

Selected Works

Novels
La carne de René, Buenos Aires: Siglo XXI, 1952; as René’s Flesh, translated by Mark Schafer, Boston: Eridanos Press, 1988

Short Fiction
Cuentos fríos, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1956; as Cold Tales, translated by Mark Schafer, Hygiene: Colorado, Eridanos Press, 1988
El que vino a salvarme, Buenos Aires: Sudamerican, 1970
Muecas para escribientes, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1987

Plays
Aire frío, Havana: Pagran, 1959; as Cold Air, translated and adapted by Maria Irene Fornes, New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1985
Dos viejos pánicos, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1968
Una caja de zapatos vacía, edited by Luis F.González-Cruz, Barcelona: Universal, 1986

Poetry
Las furias, Havana: Espuela de Plata, 1942.
La isla en peso, Havana: Espuela de Plata, 1943
Poesía y prosa, Havana: Serafín García, 1944
La vida entera, Havana: Ediciones R., 1960

Compilations and Anthologies
Teatro completo, Havana: Ediciones R., 1960
Teatro de la crueldad, Havana: Instituto del Libro, 1967
El teatro y su doble, Havana: Instituto del Libro, 1969
Teatro inconcluso, Havana: UNEAC, 1990

Further Reading
Aguilú de Murphy, Raquel, Los textos dramáticos de Virgilio Piñera y el teatro del absurdo, Madrid: Pliegos, 1989
Nélida Piñón 1935–

Brazilian prose writer

Together with writers of the stature of Clarice Lispector and Lygia Fagundes Telles, Nélida Piñón has transcended the boundaries of her Brazilian literary culture. She is also one of the four women (up to the mid-1990s) to have been accorded the distinction of membership of the Brazilian Academy of Letters, to which she was admitted in 1989. Piñón has published some twenty works that include novels and short stories, most translated into several Western languages. She is an active traveller, who is called to participate in international symposia, sharing the limelight with the most prestigious Latin American intellectuals.

Piñón is viewed as a vanguard writer in Brazil; she has been breaking down traditional literary barriers in Portuguese narrative discourse through her practice in experimental writing. Her ethical and aesthetic concerns reflect her interest and participation in the theoretical debate about language and the unconscious. She believes writing involves denouncing realities that have not been disseminated, so that the act of reading is turned on its head and becomes an act of subversion. She responds hesitantly when asked whether she identifies herself as a feminist and/or is concerned with feminist writing. However, she has also expressed radical ideas about language: “We’re just starting to impregnate language, but haven’t done enough yet to have changed it. Just a “feminine sensibility” won’t give us an identity.”

Her first novel Guia-mapa de Gabriel Arcanjo, 1961 [Guide Map of Gabriel Arcanjo] as well as her first collection of short stories, Tempo das frutas, 1966 [Brief Fruit] are experimental in their search for an appropriate medium of female expression to counterbalance what she considers has been the fate of Brazilian women writers. In an interview entitled “The Contamination of Language” (1982), Piñón observes that she was not supposed to write or to have ideas of her own which deserved to be recorded. So she was ashamed of anything she might write. Thus, she acted as her own censor and was terribly afraid of opening her own mind, of knowing more than she was supposed to know, of saying more than she could say.” Piñón’s experience reflects the complexity of women’s engagement in the task of creating a language and space in which women can express themselves.

In her fiction, Piñón carefully argues the case for supporting women’s right to self-expression. One instance is A casa da paixão, 1972 [The House of Passion], where she constructs a defence for women to express their own sexuality, something that entails defying the cultural code from which she writes. In A força do destino, 1977 [The Force of Destiny] she draws on the well-known play by the Spanish Duque de Rivas, Don Álvaro, o la fuerza del sino, 1835 [Don Alvaro, or the Force of Destiny] to thematize the creative writing process. Her most acclaimed novel to date is A república dos sonhos, 1984 [The Republic of Dreams] successfully translated not only into English, but also into French and Spanish. It narrates a double story of the history of Brazil from the Getulio Vargas period (1930–45) to 1983, the end of a long period of military rule, with a family saga about Madruga, an immigrant from Galicia in northwest Spain. It is told from the perspective of the main character’s wife as she lies dying. The title alludes to the hopes raised in the heart and mind of impoverished immigrants as they settle in Brazil. This novel contributed to establish Piñón as a gifted writer of historical fiction, a genre mostly cultivated by male writers in Brazil. The narrative device Piñón uses has suggested to critics a link between this work and William Faulkner’s As I Lay Dying.

She considers the novel the genre that allows her the most suitable space for an extended reflection on societal concerns through the depiction of characters with a natural human dimension, as they struggle with the opposite forces of good and evil.

Her most recent novel is A doce canção de Caetana, 1987 [Caetana’s Sweet Song]. This is a complex allegorical work whose characters—a wealthy cattle baron, Polidoro Alves, and a decadent opera singer, Caetana Toledo—embark on an exploration of their passions and aspirations, like becoming Maria Callas for one day. Caetana fulfils her dream as a simulacrum: she cannot sing but will mime to Callas as Violetta. This novel, where the mise-en-abyme is displayed masterfully, can be interpreted as a symbolic representation of Brazilian society interrogated in the process of writing its own story. Although Piñón’s literary production will continue for some time to come, her contribution to Brazilian-Portuguese literary language has already been acknowledged. She has stated that writing in Brazilian-Portuguese is to reveal Brazil in its inner make-up, an idea to which she has herself subscribed quite successfully.

MAGDALENA GARCÍA PINTO

Biography

Born in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, 3 May 1936, of Galician parents. Attended a German secondary school; Faculty of Philosophy of the Pontificia Universidade Católica, Rio de Janeiro. Taught at the Federal University of Rio de Janeiro, Columbia University, New York, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore. Professor at University of Miami. Former vice-president, Brazilian Union of Writers. Awarded the Castelão Medal and the Galícia Medal. Elected to Ordem do Cruzeiro do Sul, and Lazo de Dama de Isabel La Católica. Member of the Brazilian Academy since 1989.

Selected Works

Novels

Madeira feita cruz, Rio de Janeiro: GRD, 1963
Fundador, Rio de Janeiro: José Álvaro, 1969
A casa da paixão, Rio de Janeiro: Mário de Andrade, 1972
Tebas do meu coração, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1974
A força do destino, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1977

Short Fiction
Tempo das frutas, Rio de Janeiro: José Álvaro, 1966
Sala de armas, Rio de Janeiro: Sabiá, 1973

Further Reading
Vargas Llosa, Mario, “Presentación de un libro de Nélida Piñón,” Revista de Cultura Brasileña 48 (January 1979)

Sergio Pitol 1933–

Mexican prose writer
Sergio Pitol, one of the most interesting Mexican writers to emerge in the period following Juan Rulfo and Carlos Fuentes, began to obtain international recognition when he was awarded the Premio Herralde de Novela in Barcelona in late 1984 for El desfile del amor [Love’s Parade]. Here, this novel will be considered, along with Domar a la divina garza, 1988 [Taming the Divine Heron], which was published four years later, and La vida conyugal, 1991 [Married Life], a series of novels which their author has characterized as a parodic triptych. But it should be noted that Pitol was originally known in Mexico as a short story writer; his collection, Vals de Mefisto [The Waltz of Mephistopholes] was awarded the Villaurrutia prize for the best book of stories published in Mexico in 1982.,
El desfile del amor—at one level a detective mystery—is an example of storytelling in which an event is presented from different perspectives. Miguel del Solar, the linking protagonist, is a Mexican historian on leave from an academic post in England. The setting is Mexico City in 1973, but what concerns Miguel took place in 1942 when Mexico joined the Allies and declared war on the Axis powers; a Mexico, then, which—not long after the advent of Sinarquismo and the nationalization of oil—was host to European refugees: Trotsky, Spanish Republicans, Jews, German Communists and—often in the guise of businessmen—Nazis. In the Minerva apartment block in which Miguel was then living (a building considered eccentric both architecturally and because of its inhabitants) a young, recently arrived Austrian is murdered during a party given by Delfina Uribe to tie in with the opening of a new Escobedo exhibition at her fashionable gallery. Miguel’s investigations lead to a series of meetings; with Eduviges, an antiregime aunt-in-law; with Emma Werfel, the hagiographic daughter of an émigrée Jewish writer assaulted during the same party; and several with Delfina, “una figura pública desde su juventud” (a public figure since her youth): three striking examples from Pitol’s favourite regiment of extravagant female monsters. They—together with Balmoran, an unbalanced bookseller, and Escobedo—advance and withhold information and opinion about the murder and about the involvement therein of Eduviges’s brother, Arnulfo Briones (himself a subsequent victim) and his bodyguard-secretary, the sinister Martínez. After his final meeting with Delfina, Miguel is convinced he commands all the facts about the Minerva mystery, but “su mirada no lograba penetrar un velo” (he was unable to see through a veil), reinforcing his earlier reference to Tirso de Molina’s La huerta de Juan Fernández [Juan Fernandez’s Garden] and Dickens’s Our Mutual Friend, “donde nadie era quien decía ser” (where no one was whom he was said to be).

Domar a la divina garza is a short novel whose setting is contemporary Mexico, but whose action is mainly located in Istanbul twenty-five years earlier. Triggered by a reference to the Blue Mosque, Dante C. de la Estrella—a slightly mad, middle-aged lawyer—embarks on a meandering account of his meeting with Marietta Karepetiz, “una de las más grandes farsantes de la historia” (one of history’s greatest humbugs), the widow of an archaeologist whose work included a study of a mass open-air, quasi religious shitting ceremony during the Mexican Revolution. Her graphic account of their field trip—and Dante’s ignominious and messy departure from Istanbul—form the book’s dénouement. Dante’s story is told so obliquely that his listeners complain that “Nadie sabía ya de qué hablaban” (nobody knew any longer what he was talking about), but his implacable—and scatological—discourse holds them (and the reader) in thrall. It is an often amusing and in some ways “novel” novel, skilfully employing language—obsessional, vituperative garrulity—to depict the self-deluded, duped Dante and his loathed/loved tormentor, Marietta. Both Marietta (reminders of Hilda Tablet and Tía Julia) and Dante (echoes of Vargas Llosa’s scriptwriter, the narrator in Nabokov’s Pale Fire and the Ancient Mariner) are worthy additions to the tribe of literary monsters. Undoubtedly a tour de force, it is an extremely “literary” book; its modish, irrelevant opening chapter could be taken as a “homage” to Calvino, and Gogol plays an integral part in the plot.

La vida conyugal has as its protagonist Jacqueline Cascorro (her own alternative to the hated María Magdalena she was christened), who is married to a generous but increasingly unfaithful husband, Nicolás Lobato. At first she unhappily accepts her lot, then “Todo cambió en un instante, cuando al quebrar con sus manos una pata de cangrejo y oir descorchar a sus espaldas una botella de champaña… convirtiéndola… en una mujer de muy malas ideas” (Everything changed in a flash when, while she was cracking a crab’s claw in her fingers, she heard at her back the uncorking of a champagne bottle… transforming her… into a woman with very wicked ideas). She begins to fall madly in love with a series of disparate lovers (in the process heightening her conjugal ardour) and, misrepresenting her husband as a rich, mediocre brute, she persuades them to murder him so that they can elope with his money. But, like Buñuel’s La vida criminal de Archibaldo de la Cruz (The Criminal Life of Archibaldo de la Cruz), this is a story of murder most foul. Her last affair—and last murder plot—with a depressive Italian art historian coincides with the collapse of Lobato’s business affairs; he flirts and the professor and Jacqueline are accused of his murder. Years later, he returns incognito to Veracruz and, after a while Jacqueline learns of this and moves back into his life—still with murderous thoughts. A coda shows us an elderly Nicolás wheeling Jacqueline in a chair. The protagonist is another example of Pitol’s extravagant characters, this time in the context of a parodic novela rosa (romantic novel).

Pitol might be called the most international of Mexican novelists, little concerned with either magic realism or Indian problems. This hint of a more Old World eroticism seems to suggest that, paradoxically, he might be better in tune with a Mexico that has recently become financially allied to the US and Canada than many of his more typically “Mexican” contemporaries. But he is aware of criticism: he lets another of his monstrous women—Billie Upward in Juegos florales, 1982 [Floral Games]—advise the narrator that “tenía que escribir sobre temas más mexicanos” (he should write about more Mexican subjects). And, writing an autobiographical essay almost twenty years earlier in Warsaw, Pitol had talked of trying to create a personal world, adding “Mi método de trabajo no me permite casi la menor invención. Tengo que conocer a los personajes, haber hablado con ellos para poder recrearlos” (My way of working barely allows me the slightest invention. I have to know the characters, to have spoken with them in order to be able to recreate them). Pitol’s magic is in the recreation: he offers us bizarre but believable characters, whose contradictory visions and versions of their own and other people’s pasts are comic, horrific and highly suspect.

ANTHONY EDKINS

Biography

Born in Puebla, Mexico, 18 March 1933. Studied law at the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM), Mexico City, 1950–55; also studied in Arts Faculty of that university. Taught at UNAM; University of Veracruz, Xalapa, 1966–77, and at University of Bristol, England, 1971–72. From 1960 worked also for Ministry of Foreign Relations and was cultural attaché in France, Poland, Hungary and USSR, 1975–80. Head of cultural affairs in Ministry of Foreign Relations, 1981. Head of International Affairs at the National Institute of Fine Arts, 1982; ambassador to Czechoslovakia, 1982–87. Has also worked for publishing houses, including Oasis, 1955–60, and Tusquets, 1969–70. Contributed to many leading cultural journals; editor of La Palabra y el Hombre. Literary translator from Polish and English. Awarded the Xavier Villaurrutia Prize, 1982; Herralde Prize for the Novel (Barcelona), 1984; Grand Prize of the European Cultural Association (Poland), 1987.

Selected Works

Novels

_No hay tal lugar_, Mexico City: Era, 1967
_El tañido de una flauta_, Mexico City: Era, 1972
_Nocturno de Bujara_, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1981
_Cementerio de tordos_, Mexico City: Océano, 1982
_Juegos florales_, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1982
_El desfile del amor_, Barcelona: Anagrama, 1984
_Domar a la divina garza_, Barcelona: Anagrama, 1988
_La casa de la tribu_, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989
_Cuerpo presente_, Mexico City: Era, 1990
_La vida conyugal_, Mexico City: Era, 1991
_El relato veneciano de Billie Upward_, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1992

Short Fiction

_Infierno de todos_, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1965
_Los climas_, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1966
_Del encuentro nupcial_, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1970
_Vals de Mefisto_, Barcelona: Anagrama, 1984

Other Writings

_Sergio Pitol_, prologue by Emmanuel Carballo, Mexico City: Empresas Editoriales, 1967 [In the series “Nuevos escritores mexicanos del siglo XX presentados por sí mismos”]
_Juan Soriano: el perpetuo rebelde_, Mexico City: Era, 1993

Compilations and Anthologies

_Asimetría: antología personal_, Mexico City: UNAM, 1980

Further Reading

_Costa, Olga, Sergio Pitol_, Guanajuato, Mexico: Gobierno del Estado de Guanajuato, 1983
_Rest, Monika von, “‘Cuerpo presente’: cuento existencialista de Sergio Pitol,” Cuadernos Americanos 209 (1976)

_Special Issues of Journals_
_Texto Crítico, Veracruz, 21 (1981) [Includes articles by Russell M. Cluff, Carlos Monsiváis and Juan García Ponce]
Alejandra Pizarnik 1936–1972

Argentine poet and prose writer

Alejandra Pizarnik is now one of the most acclaimed poets of her country, yet she achieved notoriety before fame as the result of her suicide in 1972. Pizarnik felt herself to be the perpetual outsider, possibly due in part to her belonging to a first generation of Argentine Jews who had emigrated from Eastern Europe. The feeling of not belonging became the dominant motif in her poetry. Her poetic style was greatly influenced by her study of painting, which added a very visual component. Pizarnik’s poetry also shows the influence of the Surrealist poets, and her perception of the poetic was that it transcended the act of writing itself and became a permanent component of life.

Pizarnik’s literary production is generally considered to consist of two facets. First the public persona that is evident in the texts published during her lifetime and, second, the private realm that became evident to her readers after her death when another edition of poetry was published as well as fragments from her diaries. In addition to her poetry, she published La condesa sangrienta [The Bloody Countess], which touches on both the author’s public and private domains, and remains a text that has been difficult to classify.

Pizarnik’s first book of poetry, La tierra más ajena [The Most Alien Land] is one that reveals much about the young poet and her influences. Her poetry at the time was very typical of that of the first half of the 20th century and focused on elements from daily life and the enumeration often common to Surrealist poetry.

La última inocencia [The Last Innocence] and Las aventuras perdidas [The Lost Adventures] both contain many examples of her personal motifs of death and night. The idea that poetry is an escape from the quotidian perils of civilization is prevalent in La última inocencia. Death in the text is both frightening and seductive. In Las aventuras perdidas childhood is seen as the only time of true innocence and happiness.

While Pizarnik lived in France, she produced three editions of poetry; Arbol de Diana [Diana’s Tree], Los trabajos y las noches [Labours and Nights], and Extracción de la piedra de locura [Extraction of the Stone of Madness]. It was during this time that the poet became obsessed with the figure of Erzébet Báthory, a 15th-century Hungarian countess who was the subject of a book by the Surrealist Valentine Penrose. Pizarnik decided to write a book (La condesa sangrienta) concerning the enigmatic countess, and the text itself is probably one of the strangest in Argentine literature. It was first published in the Mexican journal Diálogos in 1965 and finally in book form in 1971.

Pizarnik’s fascination with the countess has left many critics perplexed. Báthory was infamous for torturing over 600 young women in sexual rituals that were associated with her desire for eternal youth. The gruesome ceremonies form the foundation of Pizarnik’s text, vignettes concerning the various torture techniques of the countess. Pizarnik does not condemn the noblewoman’s actions, but rather simply recognizes that society’s concept of “civilized” versus “uncivilized” behaviour is arbitrary and that the countess’s actions may be understood as the result of her simply wielding too much power.

In the first three sections of La condesa sangrienta, Pizarnik writes about the particular torture instruments used, such as “La virgen del hierro” [The Iron Virgin], “Muerte por agua” [Death by Water] and “La jaula mortal” [The Lethal Cage]. All three of the particular tools allow the countess to fulfil her sexual and sadistic fantasies. The descriptions are provided in the present tense and with much attention to detail. For example, the countess’s habit of wearing white (suggesting innocence and virginity) is mentioned as well as the clothing’s transformation as the blood begins to soak the fabric during the torture session. The descriptions are highly lyrical, almost poetic. In the fourth vignette, Pizarnik begins to deviate from mere description to provide commentary on the motivations of the countess. In “El espejo de la malancolía” [The Mirror of Melancholy] Pizarnik makes reference to the Countess’s possible lesbian persona. Throughout the text, there is an odd conjugation of positive and negative elements that provide rather jolting contrasts. There is also a voyeuristic dimension to the text, where the countess is portrayed as the ultimate voyeur, observing, contemplating the scene and inviting the reader to do the same. The final passage of the text is a meditation on the ramifications of the possession of unlimited power. La condesa sangrienta emerges as a disturbingly beautiful depiction of sexuality and death. It is a highly enigmatic work, and the one which has received most critical attention.

Pizarnik’s last collection of poems, El infierno musical [The Musical Hell], was published in 1971. In addition to poetry, Pizarnik also wrote many reviews, short stories, poems, and a theatrical piece entitled Los poseídos entre lilas [The Possessed among Lilacs]. The final writings of the poet were compiled in Textos de sombra y últimos poetas [Texts of Shadow and Last Poems] by Olga Orozco and Ana Becciú in 1982. As Daniel Altamiranda contends, the fact that these are poems that Pizarnik had decided not to publish renders their publication problematic. One must take into account that these texts may not have been considered finished by the poet or at least ready to be submitted for publication, in which case it would seem unfair to subject them to the same sort of rigorous analysis that her other poetry has received. None the less, there are some thematic issues raised in the poetry that are interesting to comment on such as lesbian rape presented in “Violario.”

Pizarnik continues to be one of the most discussed Argentine poets of the last thirty years and her death, if in fact it did not initiate her rise in popularity, at least contributed to making her an almost mythical figure in the realm of Argentine letters.

MELISSA A. LOCKHART

Biography

Born Flora Alejandra Pizarnik in Avellaneda, Buenos Aires, Argentina, 16 April 1936. Descended from East European immigrants. Studied in Faculty of Arts at the University of Buenos Aires and also painting with Juan Battle Planas. Lived in Paris, 1960–64. Studied French literature at the Sorbonne and translated a number of French works into Spanish. Returned to Buenos Aires and worked for Cuadernos (1964–68). Awarded the Buenos Aires First Prize for Poetry in 1966 and received a Guggenheim Fellowship, 1969. Two years later, in 1971, she received a Fulbright Award. Suffered recurring bouts of depression, and during a weekend leave from a psychiatric clinic in Buenos Aires, she took her life with an overdose of seconal. Died on 2,6 September 1972.
Selected Works

Mixed Genre

La condesa sangrienta, Buenos Aires: López Crespo, 1971

Poetry

La tierra más ajena, Buenos Aires: Botella al Mar, 1955
Los trabajos y la noches, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1965
Extracción de la piedra de locura, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1968
Nombres y figuras, Barcelona: La Esquina, 1969
El infierno musical, Buenos Aires: Siglo XXI, 1971
Los pequeños cantos, Caracas: Árbol de Fuego, 1971
El deseo de la palabra, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1975
La última inocencia y Las aventuras perdidas, Buenos Aires: Botella al Mar, 1976
Poemas, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1982.

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras completas. Poesía completa y prosa selecta, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1993

Further Reading

Goldberg, Florinda F., Alejandra Pizarnik: “Este espacio que soyos,” Gaithersburg, Maryland: Hispamérica, 1994
Piña, Cristina, La palabra como destino. Un acercamiento a la poesía de Alejandra Pizarnik, Buenos Aires: Botella al Mar, 1981
Elena Poniatowska 1933–

Mexican prose writer

Elena Poniatowska has produced two of the most commented on icons of testimonial writing in Latin American literature: Hasta no verte, Jesús mío (Until We Meet Again), 1969, and La noche de Tlatelolco: testimonios de historia oral, 1971 (Massacre in Mexico). In both of these texts, which could not be more different from each other, she has used her journalistic training and instincts to the utmost. Yet she has been careful to avoid the common pitfall of like writers who tend to confuse journalism with literature. Poniatowska pioneered “new journalism” in Mexico, together with Carlos Monsiváis; but her literary works are significantly more complex than her journalistic pieces. In her literary creation, Poniatowska daringly explores the margins between fiction and the testimonial, documentary, and autobiographic types of writing; rather hybrid and experimental texts are her trademark.

In 1962, Poniatowska briefly assisted the anthropologist Oscar Lewis, one of the founders of testimonial writing, in editing one of his works focusing on the “culture of poverty.” Soon afterwards, she put the lesson into practice when she got acquainted with the folksy and feisty Josefina Bórquez (1900–88), who became the Jesusa in Hasta no verte, Jesús mío (in Mexico, the bar call “Bottoms up!”). However, half a decade would pass before the text would be ready for print. Poniatowska avoided another pitfall of testimonial writing, besides the mentioned journalistic slant, namely the temptation of a quick score. First, she took her time to know the subject well and to break the natural barriers between two strangers, magnified by the difference in their social upbringing. In the process, Josefina ceased to be a “subject”; the professional relation between the two women became a life-long friendship and even a kind of a surrogate mother-daughter relationship. Secondly, Poniatowska put a lot of thought and creative effort into the elaboration of the log of interviews into a meaningful whole. Hasta no verte is a work of love and art, and it shows.

Josefina became Jesusa in a playful allusion to her conversion to a “spiritualist” sect; the title then plays with her new name and also touches on one period of her life dominated by alcohol. This game of literarization and the layers of fictionalization turn raw testimony into a testimonial novel. Poniatowska does not assert artistic freedom for freedom’s sake; she uses it to free Jesusa from the superfluous and repetitive elements, in order to bring forward her essentials with greater force and artistic impact. Paradoxically, the fictionalization does not cut into the authentic voice of Jesusa. It amplifies rather her “representativity,” though not in the sense the orthodox Marxist model of representativeness would have it. Hasta no verte falls back rather on the Spanish picaresque tradition. What sets Poniatowska’s work apart from so-called “testimonial writing” is, then, not so much the artistic elaboration as the fact that she shuns prefabricated allegorical and political metanarratives. While the strict theoreticians of the testimonial genre (such as Barnet or Randall) might doubt her political “usefulness,” Poniatowska realized that the image of a “strong woman,” breaking every traditional stereotype, as seen against the backdrop of half a century of Mexican history, did not need any additional explanations and dissertations on womanhood, patriarchy and class struggle. Poniatowska’s brand of implicit yet unequivocal feminism and political stance makes for an even stronger work of art.

The testimonies of oral history, La noche de Tlatelolco, rely more heavily on the journalistic work. Poniatowska showed a lot of character just by taking up the story, and she was to defy the powerful Mexican establishment several times more over this issue. In the wake of Olympic Games, the Mexican Government decided to stop the months-long student protest movement and teach the protesters a lesson; on 2 October 1968, the peaceful manifestation on Tlatelolco square ended in a massacre of students, women and children, participants as well as bystanders. The Government engaged in a massive cover-up; detentions, tortures and imprisonments followed. Poniatowska set out to provide a testimony of the student movement and the fateful evening when the unthinkable happened there, where spectators from all over the world gathered for the other spectacle.

A number of unorthodox features of La noche strike the reader. First, Poniatowska does not present a casebook of complete interviews and printed materials, but mixes them up in a fragmentary, polyphonic, and dialogic flow of markedly heterogeneous voices. The first part follows the course of the student movement and its consequences after the massacre; the second part concentrates on what happened at Tlatelolco. Secondly, Poniatowska surprises by the variety of testimonies she presents; as if following the Paris May (when students and workers challenged the authority of the French government), they range from slogans, graffiti, impressive one-liners, and personal accounts, to the satire, the carnivalesque and the absurd. Poniatowska does not hesitate to show the political naivete, shortcomings, and even the absurdities of the movement. Thirdly, Poniatowska not only includes samples of the protest literature generated by Tlatelolco in her testimony, but she pointedly incorporates the protest literature of other times (the conquest, Martí, Rulfo), highlighting the continuity of like phenomena throughout Mexican and Latin American history. Once again, Poniatowska manages to turn testimony into a first-rate work of art, without diminishing its factual value.

The experimental technique of the collage of heterogeneous elements, similar to Cortázar’s Rayuela (Hopscotch), produces a strikingly voluble narrative flow, where points of view and counterpoints clash in hidden and open polemics. This dialogic technique, combined with the image of the student movement as seen from the street (avoiding conspicuously the high profile leaders), blunts to a great degree the movement’s ideological thrust and widens the gap between the people’s testimony and the Government’s perspective. Although Poniatowska strives to efface herself from her narrative, La noche leaves no doubt about her allegiance and the firm hand with which she selects and arranges the information. When the book was awarded the prestigious Xavier Villaurrutia Prize, Poniatowska refused to accept this elegant cover-up in the name of the dead students. La noche has become one of the most widely-read books in Mexico; frequently, other writers have appropriated parts of it as a token of the Tlatelolco reality in their own texts.

In the novella Querido Diego, te abraza Quiela, 1978 (Dear Diego), Poniatowska has widened the margin for fiction and has further fictionalized one chapter of the already “fabulous life” of the Mexican painter Diego Rivera. Poniatowska relies especially on Bertram Wolfe’s biography and, beginning with fragments of a letter from Angelina Beloff (Rivera’s Russian wife) reprinted there, she “reconstructs” Angelina’s (unanswered) correspondence to Diego after his return to Mexico in 1921. It is interesting to see how the unreliable aspects of Wolfe’s biography add another layer of fiction to fiction. Poniatowska plays on the edge of reality and fiction, producing a powerful story of love, desire and abandonment. Or is it an indictment of the Latin male culture?

In the 1980s, Poniatowska returned to journalism. Fuerte es el silencio, 1980 [Strong is the Silence], is another defiant volume of political investigative reporting, uncomfortable for any “institutional revolutionary party.” The testimony on the 1985 earthquake that wreaked havoc on Mexico City, Nada, nadie: las voces del temblor, 1988 (Nothing, Nobody: the Voices of the Mexico City Earthquake), was worked out in Poniatowska’s writers’ workshop, but could not match the impact of La noche.

Poniatowska’s novel La “Flor de Lís,” 1988 [The “Flor de Lis”], is a slightly fictionalized autobiography. As such it is an important document about the human formation of this extraordinary writer, who from the heights of international elites has reached so deep into the Mexico’s soul and has shown so much courage in face of the overwhelming powers-that-be. The novel Tinísimax, 1992, is Poniatowska’s most ambitious literary work of the last decade. This half-documentary and half-fictional biographic novel about the Italian-American photographer and international revolutionary Tina Modotti evokes with compassion the “heroic years” of Mexican and international communism between the 1920s and the 1940s. Tinísimax is a metaphor of so many human beings trapped in the treacherous historical and ideological torrents of our times.

EMIL VOLEK
Biography

Selected Works

Novels
Hasta no verte, Jesús mío, Mexico City: Era, 1969; as Until We Meet Again, translated by Magda Bogin, New York: Pantheon, 1987
Querido Diego, te abraza Quiela, Mexico City: Era, 1978; as Dear Diego, translated by Katherine Silver, New York: Pantheon, 1986
La “Flor de Lís,” Mexico City: Era, 1988

Short Fiction
Lilus Kikus, Mexico City: Los Presentes, 1954
Los cuentos de Lilus Kikus, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1967
De noche vienes, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1979

Testimonial and Other Writings
Palabras cruzadas: crónicas, Mexico City: Era, 1961
Todo empezó el domingo, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1963
México visto a ojo de pájaro, Mexico City: Colibrí/SEP, 1968
La noche de Tlatelolco: testimonios de historia oral, Mexico City: Era, 1971; as Massacre in Mexico, translated by Helen Lane, New York: Viking Press, 1975
La vendedora de nubes, Mexico City: Colibrí, 1979
Gaby Brimmer, in collaboration with Gaby Brimmer, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1979
Fuerte es el silencio, Mexico City: Era, 1980
La casa en la tierra, photographs by Mariana Yampolsky, Mexico City: INI-Fonapas, 1980
Domingo siete, Mexico City: Océano, 1982.
¡Ay vida, no me mereces!: Carlos Fuentes, Rosario Castellanos, Juan Rulfo, la literatura de la Onda, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1985
La raíz y el camino, illustrations by Mariana Yampolsky, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1985
Estancias del olvido, photographs by Mariano Yampolsky, Mexico City: INI-Centro Hidalguense de Investigaciones Históricas, 1986
Serena y alta figura, Mexico City: Océano, 1986
Tlacotalpan, photographs by Mariana Yampolsky, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1987
Hablando en plata, in collaboration with David Maawad, Mexico City: Centro Hidalguense de Investigaciones Históricas, 1987
Further Reading

Poniatowska, Elena, “Hasta no verte, Jesús mío” Vuelta 24 (1978)

——“La muerte de Jesusa Palancares,” in La historia en la literatura iberoamericana, edited by Raquel Chang-Rodríguez and Gabriella de Beer, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1989

Steele, Cynthia, “La creatividad y el deseo en Querido Diego, te abraza Quiela, de Elena Poniatowska,” Hispamérica 41 (1985)

Interviews

Hasta no verte Jesús mío

Testimonial text by Elena Poniatowska

Hasta no verte Jesús mío (1969) had to wait until the 1980s before receiving critical attention outside of Mexico. The increasing recognition of the work appears to be due to recent developments in feminist criticism in the field of Latin American literature and to a growing interest in more testimonial forms of literature based on oral histories of marginalised members of society. The text takes the form of a first-person narrative and is based on a series of interviews Elena Poniatowska conducted with a poor Mexican woman, Josefina Bórquez (1900–87), who at the time was working as a washerwoman in Mexico City. Poniatowska was attracted by Bórquez’s outspokenness and her deviance from the standards expected of Mexican women. However, the text has been seen as much novel as testimonio, and despite its oral quality, its reliance on a real informant and its deep roots in the material reality on which testimonies depend, it is clear that Hasta no verte, Jesús mío has undergone much authorial mediation. Josefina Bórquez is transformed into a literary character, Jesusa Palancares, and novelistic strategies are used, such as the organisation of events in the protagonist’s life into chapters which follow a broadly chronological time sequence and focus on key episodes. In a number of interviews Poniatowska has said that she has edited and embroidered her interviewee’s words as well as inventing parts of the narrative.

As much has been written in the critical literature on this work about the processes of production and the extent of fictionalisation as on the content of the narrative. The debates raise some fascinating questions as to the relationship between fiction and reality, and the ethics of attempting to give voice to a less privileged Other, while altering that voice and finally claiming some form of authorship over it. While these critical debates shed much light on the relationship between fiction and “testimonio,” and ask many thought-provoking questions, they do not address the reasons behind the power or the success of the novel, as they are issues which only emerge once the reader engages with the critical literature. The reader who approaches the text blindly need never know that the protagonist has any form of relationship with a non-literary “real” woman. Another strand of critical work has, thus, paid less attention to the relationship between privileged writer and marginalised interviewee, preferring to examine Jesusa as a character, a picaresque literary creation.

The major reason behind the appeal of the text is the fact that Jesusa is such a successful literary figure, whose use of vernacular Mexican Spanish makes her entirely believable. The question as to her literal existence for the reader who approaches the text as a work of fiction is not of great consequence as she expresses social, economic and poetic truths, and her words provide highly entertaining reading material. The first person narrator jumps out from the text, grabs the reader and demands attention. She has total conviction in her beliefs which are often contradictory and idiosyncratic. Jesusa Palancares makes a dramatic entrance onto the stage of characters in Latin American literature: her language has a freshness and a vitality absent in more traditional “literary” texts and her narrative, packed with anecdotes of a life full of adventure, has a fast-moving, oral quality which makes for entertaining reading.

Jesusa takes her listener through the key events and experiences of her life: from her early memories of her mother’s death and her childhood with her father and her brothers and sister; her troubled relationships with a series of stepmothers; her adventures while following her father, and later her violent husband in the Mexican Revolution as a young woman, through to her experiences in Mexico City in a variety of jobs and often make do homes, and her involvement with the Spiritist Church. She provides a full commentary on all these experiences, revealing belief systems stemming from popular wisdom, popular prejudices and church dogma. The result is a rich often contradictory and always interesting word stream.
Jesusa Palancares is, then, a dynamic woman who refuses any easy attempts at categorisation. Not only does she, as Joel Hancock observed in an article of 1983, “deviate radically from the commonly portrayed stereotypes of women,” she also defies the traditional representations of Mexican women. She is neither virgin (Guadalupe), nor whore, temptress, traitor, or la Chingada (Malinche), that is, the passive, raped victim. Most importantly, she does not depend on men for her identity, and after a brief and disastrous marriage remains single and self-sufficient. She is a curious mixture of both rebel and conformist: while she frequently challenges the official discourses of the Revolution, the institutionalisation of the Revolution, the Catholic Church and many conventions of gender relations and gender roles, at the same time she is steeped in the popular discourses of her culture. Thus, while she clearly takes pride in her rebelliousness against male attempts to dominate and use violence against her, she feels that this rebellion makes her evil; likewise she expresses prejudices against women, blaming them for men’s need to exercise their power. She also shows that she has internalised racist notions of identity and looks down on her sister as she “salió más indita que yo” (turned out more of an Indian than me).

Jesusa is neither symbol nor metaphor nor archetype: she does not represent her gender or her class. Rather, she actively engages with her various labels, Mexican, woman, poor, and with the social and historical circumstances of her life, and finds her own strategies to survive both materially and emotionally. Thus, over her life she takes a range of jobs, from servant, to factory worker, to waitress, always moving on when she feels she is being over-exploited or when she feels her freedom is being curtailed. She has a number of close relationships with men, women and children and picks herself up with a greater armoury of defences when others let her down. Even La Obra Espiritual, the Spiritist Church, which she turns to for a dependable belief system and in order to have a sense of self worth, is abandoned when she feels she is not respected by other church members with lesser powers than hers, although she retains her beliefs which are all she has to help make sense of her reality. Jesusa Palancares is, then, an extraordinary woman. She refuses the expected roles of passive victim and fights those who try to place her within that role, on a number of occasions physically beating up men who attempt to coerce her into submission. Proud, fiery, confrontational and contradictory, she has the status of a great literary figure.

Despite the fact that Jesusa cannot be taken as representative of either her gender or her class, the texts provides many insights into conditions of life in Mexican society for poor, working class women. The hardships she faces and many of the circumstances in which she finds herself serve to convert the text into a valuable social document. These aspects provide the testimonial elements of the text for, relying on experience, Jesusa bears witness and exposes the failings of revolutionary and post-revolutionary Mexico. The reader learns about the poor conditions of employment for illiterate women with no alternative income, the abuses committed by middle and upper-class women against their servants, the violence committed by men against women, and the complete lack of any state support for all, even for those who, like Jesusa, are widows of fighters in the Revolution.

Jesusa’s story offers a contradiction to official state discourses which claimed that the urban proletariat would become valued citizens in the new post-revolutionary Mexico.
Jesus’s much quoted words when assessing her own place in her society, instantly negate years of state rhetoric:

Al fin de cuentas, yo no tengo patria...No me siento mexicana ni reconozco a los mexicanos. Aquí no existe más que pura conveniencia y puro interés. Si yo tuviera dinero y bienes, sería mexicana, pero como soy peor que la basura, pues no soy nada…

[When all’s said and done I’ve got no country…I don’t feel Mexican and I don’t recognise the Mexicans. Here, there’s nothing more than greed and self-interest. If I had money and possessions I’d be Mexican, but as I’m worse than garbage, I’m nothing at all…]

Elena Poniatowska effectively challenges dominant discourses by transmitting the voice of a woman whom most readers of Latin American literature would have no access to. The text provides an example of how literature can produce counter discourses and illustrate the value of those who are normally rendered invisible by a nation which is often deeply uncomfortable with its own people.

DEBORAH A. SHAW

Editions

First edition: Hasta no verte, Jesús mío, Mexico City: Era, 1969
Translation: Until We Meet Again, by Magda Bogin, New York: Pantheon, 1987

Further Reading

Popular Culture

Brazil

In Brazil, popular culture takes many forms and may be divided into two areas: that which has its roots in the folklore of the country and often in the rural areas, versus that which is primarily the product of technology, disseminated through the mass media and generally originating in urban areas. The manifestations of popular culture that form part of the first category are cordel literature, poetic duels, forms of dance, music and religious expression. In the second category one finds such elements as the ever popular soap operas, films, and sports. That is not to say that the two forms do not mingle on occasion, in fact they often have. However, this essay will be dedicated primarily to the cultural expressions of Brazilian folklore.

Cordel literature (stories on a string) refers to the popular poetry written primarily in the northeast of the country and sold on the streets, in marketplaces and town squares. The literature began to be written in the late 1800s and reached its peak in the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s. The poetry is extremely picturesque and provides a sort of running commentary on Brazilian life and customs. In the past, before television and radio, the cordel served also as a way for the many members of the population to receive news. It continues to serve as a forum for the views of the masses, generally the poor who comprise a very large percentage of the country’s population.

The term cordel refers to the cord on which the early poets would hang their compositions in order to sell them. More recently, however, the poets carry their wares in a suitcase and set up shop in a busy town center, often in a market. The various pamphlets, each containing a separate poem, are spread out on the suitcase which rests on a stand. The poets will then recite their verses, but sometimes stop at the climax of the story as an incentive for their listeners to buy the poem. The mark of an excellent cordel poem is that which remains a crowd-pleaser in spite of the many times the listeners may have heard or read it.

The poems themselves would be printed on coarse paper and would normally carry on the front an illustration of the topic. This illustration has become a popular art form in its own right, the xilogravura or design created by a woodcut. Xilogravuras have begun to be sold and collected apart from the cordel and artists of this kind have also become widely known.

Cordel poetry retains many oral characteristics. It was originally composed primarily in the country’s northeast, an area of seven states where roughly between a quarter to a third of the country’s population resides. However, as the result of an extreme drought in the northeast at the turn of the century there was a massive migration to the urban areas of the south. The building of the capital of Brasilia in the late 1950s led to yet another migration towards that region. Thus, cordel literature may now be found in all the above mentioned areas.
The topics covered in the cordel range from Brazilianized renderings of the most standard of fairy tales to commentaries on the socio-political situation of the day. The themes revolve around the plight of the poor, the bandit heroes of the backlands, local religious figures, and fables. The poems generally are didactic in nature, emphasizing the need for bravery or sound ethical decisions in life.

Although the literature of the cordel is one born of humble origins it has exerted an influence on many other more mainstream cultural manifestations such as established literature, theater and film. Many authors, for example, Jorge Amado, have used themes from the cordel in their novels. In a quest to portray an authentic national identity, cinematographers have often incorporated cordel-related themes into their films. Glauber Rocha’s Deus e o diabo na terra do sol [God and the Devil in the Land of the Sun] and Antônio das mortes [Anthony of the Deaths] are examples of this appropriation.

There are many other forms of popular culture in Brazil such as the poetic duel, which is still practiced in the northeast. The duel is normally practiced in a public place, often a bar or a square, and the two poets take turns to insult and challenge one another using complex rhyme and rhythm schemes. The winner of the duel is the poet who has demonstrated the greatest mental agility as well as a command of the rigid rules of meter necessary for the immediate composition of verse.

Popular music is an area of culture that seems to straddle the boundary between rural cultural manifestations and those that have been produced and disseminated through the mass media. Popular music in Brazil reflects the country’s diverse heritage; its indigenous, black and Portuguese traditions. Probably the most famous of the genres that have evolved is samba, a dance and music form most often associated with the internationally known celebration of carnaval or Mardi Gras. An outgrowth of classical samba is the bossa nova, an urban musical genre that became popular throughout the world in the early 1960s.

One final aspect of Brazilian popular culture to be discussed is that of the African-Brazilian religions, often seen to be versions of popular Catholicism. African-Brazilian religions are a combination of African, Catholic, and indigenous components. These practices date from the early 1700s and generally involved the adoration of black saints. While the adoration of these figures was initially something imposed by the slaveowners as a step towards conditioning the slaves into subservience, it became a vehicle for their solidarity and an outlet for their concerns about social justice. Candomblé and Umbanda have been the groups most studied by researchers. Umbanda, in particular, emphasizes the spirits of the dead and their ability to take possession of a living being. It is estimated that some twenty to thirty per cent of all Brazilians are involved in some sort of religious practice of African origin, and yet most would also consider themselves to be Catholics and, as the result of syncretic practices, see no discrepancy between the two.

MELISSA A. LOCKHART

Further Reading

Spanish America

Popular culture is a process whereby the historic experience is shaped in the collective memory. Popular culture and its written counterpart in literature are derived principally from two sources: first, traditional elements which have been handed down from generation to generation and still have the power to excite the imagination of the contemporary society, and second, new elements which are constantly being invented and introduced in the daily lives of the masses. The massive production of criollista (creolist) texts in Argentina between the late 19th and early 20th centuries served a public, either in transition between the country and the city, or who had recently entered Argentina as immigrants. Popular urban criollista literature with its narratives of traditional rural types like the gaucho offered an identity and a way of negotiating the transition. Of all the rich traditions in Latin American rural popular culture, one of the most important is the poetry written by the peasantry, paradoxically defined as “oral literature.” Related to it, yet constituting a different genre of its own, is the poetry of the cantadores (traveling singers). Both forms stem from a common European medieval and, to a lesser extent, Indian and African oral tradition which goes back to a multiplicity of sources: popular stories, myths and legends, medieval romances, and Iberian picaresque narrative. Such poetic forms contain epic, satirical, burlesque and fantastic elements, moral counsel, religious teachings and abundant critical commentary on everyday life and on historical and current events. The literary form that evolved into the payadas of the Argentine and Uruguayan gauchesque literature of the 19th and 20th centuries has its roots in this oral-based literature. Popular protest poetry and songs, such as those of the gaucho and pseudo-gaucho literature of the River Plate countries, for example, are still kept alive not only in print but also in oral performance by the working-class rural payador or folksinger; or the corridos of the Mexican Revolution and post-revolutionary Mexico (such as the lament for Zapata’s death, whose haunting melody was used as the theme-music for Kazan’s Viva Zapata; or the décimas of Panama, whose rural poets use the form for social criticism in the sense that they “not only lay wounds bare but cauterize the source of the infection” (in the words of Zárates, who collected a large body of Panamanian oral poetry in the 1960s). The presence of such a living tradition of oral protest poetry means that the modern poet can address a wide public and be understood. Even quite complex intellectual statements can be conveyed, since the sentiments and moods and rhetoric are on the whole well-known and have lost little of their emotive power at the “popular” level. Popular poetry reiterates its material, exalts it poetically, and allows the profound voice of an entire society to be heard in the poet’s own voice.

Argentina’s José Hernández (1834–86) wrote the most popular of the gaucho poems, Martín Fierro, considered by many to be the greatest and perhaps the only true epic poem produced in the Spanish-speaking republics. It is a popular poem in which the poet puts his song at the service of an oral tradition. The impulse is individual; the source is popular. In the work there is the famous payada, with a black. A payada involved a performance of traveling singers, usually two poets, who engaged in a dialogue, sometimes in a duel—a desafío—of poetic improvisation, often to the accompaniment of a guitar. A good poet-singer (cantador or payador) masters various forms of poetic improvisation, characterized by definite patterns of rhyme and meter. The hero of the poem, Martin Fierro is a payador, the legendary gaucho balladeer or singer (Argentine popular poet), who is proud of his inventiveness as he recounts the story of his life in the verse form of décimas. The second part of the poem, the Vuelta (The Return), published in 1878 culminates with this payada or song contest between Martin Fierro and the moreno, brother of the black he had slain in the first part, the Ida (The Departure). The payada was a typical rural musical form in which gauchesque poetry had its roots. The genre is a combination of very old folklore (consisting of music, and epic, lyrical and even dramatic poetry of the Argentine countryside) and imported European elements (verse, rhyme, and stanzaic structure). In its early stages, up to around 1917, the tango dance form retained a connection with the rural musical and song forms of the Argentine payada and milonga. In this display of the skill of the gaucho poet, the two men reaffirm the suffering and the struggles of man and place them in a cosmic setting. The form of the contest—the unanswerable questions—is an example of the riddle-song found in most archaic cultures, a “knocking on the door of the Unknowable” as Huizinga calls it in Homo Ludens, which was also a ritualistic way of defeating the opponent.

The gaucho served as a vehicle for the construction of a genuinely “popular” national consciousness. Gauchos were a nomadic group of mestizos who lived off the herds of wild cattle on the immense grassy plains of Argentina’s pampas. These representatives of the subaltern classes were used in gauchesque literature of the late 19th and early 20th centuries as a “popular” voice, purportedly that of “the people.” Due to the voice of the gaucho, in consonance with the voice of the fatherland, the people became, tautologically, the voice of the nation/state, effacing the differences between dominant and dominated. The gaucho’s voice is deployed by the gauchesque writers to introduce concepts such as liberty and patria (pride in one’s country)—the universals of the European Enlightenment. This literary genre made use in written texts of the oral form of the gaucho song. In it, the patriotic gaucho was held up against the bad, anti-social gaucho. The most famous books in this tradition are Hernández’s Martín Fierro and Ricardo Güiraldes’s Don Segundo Sombra, 192,6. The strophe of Martin Fierro, keeping within the metrics of Hispanic Romanticism, avoided classical rigor without displaying traditional currents: octosyllabic verses organized in sextets, with the initial verse free of rhyme. Further, the poem carried the traits of the “Romantic school”: literature as an expression of society; local color; nationalism; sympathy for the people; the exotic theme of Indian customs; the exiled and doleful hero as the victim of society; Fierro’s noble friendship with Cruz; the novelistic episodes of violent contrasts as in the death of Vizcacha, the fight between the Indian and Fierro in the presence of a woman, the child whose throat is cut, and the happy meetings of Fierro with his children and those of Cruz. The genre is built within the semantic opposition between the gaucho as “vagrant” (vago or delincuente) and the gaucho as “patriot” or national hero, terms which dramatize the process of nation formation. The gauchesque is one strand in the making of a popular urban culture. Its popularity is evident both in rural and urban settings.

In keeping with its roots in oral tradition, Martin Fierro and other works of the genre were read aloud to groups of peasants in the non-standard language of the gaucho in the local pulpería (a cross between a bar and a general store), as earlier gauchesque poetry was read. While it is unusual for the writings of any thinker to have an immediate impact on an uneducated public, Hernández’s work had such a reception. It went into the repertory of literature transmitted through performance. Indeed, the popularity of a literary form can best be demonstrated by the degree to which a mass audience becomes actively involved with its dissemination and/or development. It was only after the rapid expansion of Buenos Aires, making it the first modern city in Spanish America, that the popularity of the gauchesque genre waned. Some 268 centros criollos (Creole centers), many named after the regions from which their members had originated, had been set up from the 1890s by rural immigrants as meeting places where traditional rural music was performed. The baqueano (guide) is one of four gaucho types which Domingo Faustino Sarmiento (author of Facundo) displays as essential to the foundation of a genuine “national literature.” The others are the rastreador (pathfinder), the singer or payador (composer of oral poetry)—the gaucho prototype for the minstrel—and the gaucho malo or “bad gaucho.” The period in which this genre flourished ran, approximately, from 1880 to 1910, as the loss of links with the old style of peasant life and the increasing social weight of the working class contributed to its decline.

As its name indicates, gauchesque poetry stood at one remove from the oral poetry that was part of gaucho culture. Its authors were educated men who, to argue their views on society, made fictional gauchos their spokesmen. It was a form apart from the extemporaneous, abstractly philosophical verse of gaucho tradition, with its typical debate format and legendary practitioners (e.g., Gabino Ezeiza, (1858–1916).

The décima verse form used in such payadas of gauchesque literature has contributed to its popularity. It is a metric combination of ten octosyllabic verses which usually have the following rhyming pattern: first verse rhyming with the fourth and fifth verses; the second verse with the third; the sixth with the seventh; and the last verse rhyming with the eighth and the ninth verses. After the fourth verse there is usually a pause in the form of a period or semi-colon, not permitted after the fifth verse (rhyming pattern: abbaaccddc). The décima is also referred to as the espinela after its founder, Vicente Espinel, the Spanish poet. The form was also used extensively in the song-text poetry of the Chilean Violeta Parra and in numerous verses of other contemporary poets, such as Xavier Villaurrutia (Décima muerte [Tenth Death, 1947]). Like the ballad form in Spain, the décima is used by learned as well as popular poets.

ELENA DE COSTA

Further Reading

Carril, Bonifacio del, El gaucho a través de la iconografía, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1979

Decotte, Alex and Maximilien Bruggmann, Gauchos, Buenos Aires: Librerías ABC, 1978

Olivera de Bonfil, Alicia, La literatura cristera, Mexico City: Instituto Nacional de Antropología e Historia, 1970 [Chapters on corridos and popular poetry]

Rowe, William and Vivian Schelling, Memory and Modernity: Popular Culture in Latin America, London and New York: Verso, 1993 [Traces the main anthropological, sociological and political debates about the nature of popular culture (including oral poetry and popular drama) in Latin America]

Santa Cruz, Nicomedes, La décima en el Perú, Lima: Instituto de Estudios Peruanos, 1982

Pornography

Pornographic literature has always provoked critical debate. Conservative and religious groups oppose it, as do politically correct feminists, and the principles enunciated by these two groups can be summarized in three statements: pornography is the theory and rape is the practice; pornography is itself violence against women; pornography is incitement to sexual hatred (Dworkin and McKinnon). However, there is a Marxist approach which considers pornography as a resistance discourse whose proponents negate the debated distinction between pornography and eroticism (according to which the latter is “redeemed” by entering the superior category of art). Instead, they argue that both discourses are part of a revolutionary process whose goal would be to unmask the normative cultural categories of gender and sex.

Etymologically, the word pornography derives from the Greek coinage pornographos, which means someone who writes stories about whores (pornai) depicted when they pursue daily activities such as shopping, gossiping, or teaching their daughters about men and money. Following the origin of this term, pornography is used to refer to the production of genitally-based material which describes both foreplay and the sexual act itself in such a way as to provoke arousal in the reader.

The influence of Spanish Catholic tradition did not allow a production on pornography in Latin American countries until the 19th century with the emergence of capitalism and the influence of other European literatures, showing an integration of these countries in the project of modernity. Many of the major figures in Latin American writing have dedicated texts to pornography, although most of these have been produced in the second half of the 20th century. Authors like José María Vargas Vila (Colombia), Alejandra Pizarnik, Alicia Steimberg and Enrique Medina (Argentina), Reinaldo Arenas and Mayra Montero (Cuba), Rubén Monasterios (Venezuela), Cristina Peri Rossi (Uruguay), María Luisa Mendoza (Mexico), have examples of pornography within their literary production.

One of the first Latin American authors to show an interest in pornography in his texts is José Mario Vargas Vila. In the last years of 19th century he wrote polemical novels centered on sexuality that were censored for their perversion; misogynous texts like the trilogy El alma de los lirios [The Soul of Lilies] or the novel Ibis, where the female body is depicted as the source of lust. Female writers grew interested in male sexual fantasies and were to adapt this tradition to their own ends. Thus in the 1950s, Alejandra Pizarnik devotes a part of her surrealist work to parody high eroticism as shown in her essay “El texticulo de la cuestión” [The Texticle of the Question].

As David Foster explains in Bodies and Biases, in Argentina pornography has been censored as bad writing: Enrique Medina’s fiction is a case in point; or it has been published abroad, like the new texts by Diana Raznovich and Alicia Steinberg; or, as in the case of the work of Griselda Gambaro, has been considered as pornography for the well-to-do. However, in Venezuela a form of writing has developed which is openly defined as pornography. Rubén Monasterios, a journalist exponent of this phenomenon, parodies sexuality while he shows his abilities as a writer of narrative in Encanto de la mujer madura y otros relatos obscenos [Charm of the Mature Woman and Other Obscene Stories]. Contemporary Venezuelan writers also write short stories, as in Eróticos, erotómanos y otras especies [Eroticist, Erotomaniacs and Other Species] all focused on the genital organs and on the commercialization of human sexuality.

In spite of the radical feminist critique of pornography as the source of objectification of women, there are contemporary women writers all over Latin America dedicating part of their production to pornography. The cause is the emergence in these countries of neoliberal market forces. The Mexican María Luisa Mendoza author of De ausencia [Of Absence] shows the intimacy of a female character who surrenders to her body’s pleasures. Also important is the lesbian production by Sara Levi Calderón and Rosa María Roffiel (Mexico) who are developing a non-phallic sexuality for women. In Brazil, women like Cassandra Ríos and Adelaide Carrara concentrate on mass-consumer porn and use high writerly Portuguese to describe the obscenity of human experience in their novels. Another contemporary Brazilian author, Hilda Hilst, has also dedicated her creative efforts to writing pornographic narratives.

ANA MARÍA BRENES-GARCÍA

Further Reading

Critical Studies (general)
Gubar, Susan and Joan Hoff (editors), For Adult Users Only; the Dilemma of Violent Pornography, Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1989

Critical Studies (concerning Latin America)
Booker, M. Keith, Mario Vargas Llosa among the Postmodernists, Gainesville: University Presses of Florida, 1994 [Chapter 7 is on Elogio de la madrasta/In Praise of the Stepmother]
Foster, David William and Roberto Reis (editors), Bodies and Biases: the Representation of Sexualities in Hispanic Cultures and Literatures, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1995

Fiction
Positivism

Positivist philosophy, which was deeply rooted in Latin American thought, had a major impact in the literary production of the 19th century. Positivism’s early exponent was Saint-Simon (1760–1825), who by 1817 had published his Encyclopaedia of Positive Ideas, a philosophy of liberal politics, which heralded the supremacy of science. Auguste Comte (1798–1857), a disciple of Saint-Simon, was responsible for clearly and systematically outlining the importance of positivist philosophy in a body of work published between 1830 and 1842 entitled Cours de philosophie positive. Comte explained that the term “positive” meant a “special manner of philosophizing that consists of envisaging the theories in any order of ideas as having for their object the coordination of observed facts.” This way of reasoning could be applied to all subjects, although Comte did not explain what he meant by “facts.”

Comte developed his philosophy by means of the law of three stages. Accordingly, the first stage in the evolution of knowledge was of theological origin; in it the world had been explained according to the will of anthropomorphic gods. In the second, metaphysical abstraction had been the leading philosophy which attempted to comprehend the human condition. Finally in the third stage of development, the human mind had evolved to the positivist level, in which the world was explained in terms of scientific facts. Positivist philosophy, thus, proclaimed the necessity for empirical evidence in all areas, based in the general belief that sociology (considered at the time as the most advanced science) required the study of physical sciences (biology in particular) as a model of research. It was the duty of positivist philosophers to create a synthesis of scientific knowledge with the purpose of reorganizing society. Comte insisted that “mental and moral change was logically and chronologically prior to social and political change,” meaning that the positivist philosopher “was to become, not a king, but a priest, a member of the ‘spiritual power’…a priesthood, serving not some theological fiction, but Humanity itself.”

Expeditions during the 19th century by Alexander von Humboldt and others, had left behind a scientific discourse whose method of direct observation and imitation of flora and fauna was adopted by Latin American writers of fiction and of non-fiction. For the Latin American writers of this period, many of whom were statesmen committed to the process of creating free post-colonial nations, the conflict between narrative (that is to say fiction) and history (science) did not exist. This lack of epistemological distinction between science and art or narrative and fact had been a long-standing practice, since one of the most salient aspects of the historical discourse of the colonies had been the distortion of observed facts. In the 1800s, following the ideological guidelines espoused by Positivism, the Latin American novel reflected the positivist philosopher’s preoccupation with empirical evidence. This can be observed in the exploration of national identities and in the emphasis on historiography that characterize the novels of this period.

In particular, positivist thought was a key factor behind the production of the so-called “foundational novels,” which were part of the general effort to create national identities. Historically and socially inspired, the theme of many of these novels was the romance (following Chateaubriand’s model) between people of different ethnic origin. The idealized marrying of individuals from different sectors of society was meant to represent the possible solution for nations plagued by social, economic and ethnic disparity. The need to reconcile these diverse groups was perceived as absolutely necessary in order to achieve a national identity, and it is this unity of vision that brings together many novels of the period that would otherwise seem to have little in common. Novels like Aves sin nido, 1889 (Birds without a Nest) by the Peruvian writer Clorinda Matto de Turner, María (1867) by the Colombian Jorge Isaacs, Cumándá (1879) by the Ecuadorian by Juan León Mera, Martin Rivas (1862) by the Chilean writer Alberto Blest Gana or Enriquillo, leyenda histórica dominicana, 1882 (The Cross and the Sword) by the Dominican writer Manuel de Jesús Galván, have many similar elements. Particularly in plot and language the coherence of the novels comes, according to Doris Sommer, “from their common need to reconcile and amalgamate national constituencies, and from the strategy to cast the previously unreconciled parties, races, classes, or regions, as lovers who are ‘naturally’ attracted and right for one another.” The idealization of poor, marginal and exploited sectors of society (of indigenous or African origin), reveals the reformist spirit of 19th-century writers and their commitment to the use of literature as a tool for the promotion of change. The anti-slavery novel, for example Cecilia Valdés (1882.) and Sab (1841), by the Cuban writers Cirilo Villaverde and Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda respectively, also viewed the restructuring of political organization as the only practical and fair solution to the problems created by racial and social disparity.

Positivism remained strong and vital in the literature of Latin America until avant-garde forms, techniques, images and language asserted their influence. These new approaches were first seen in the poetry of the early 20th century starting with César
Vallejo, and then toward the end of the decade of the 1920s in the work of fiction writers such as Roberto Arlt and Macedonio Fernández.

See also entries on The Historical Novel, Science

ANA GARCÍA CHICHESTER

Further Reading

Brushwood, John S., Genteel Barbarism: Experiments in the Analysis of Nineteenth-Century Spanish-American Novels, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1981 [A discussion of several novels of the period, which emphasizes what these novels perceived as a grave conflict in the creation of national identities, that is the dichotomy between the Europeanized urban areas, and the more “savage” conditions in rural sectors]

González Echevarría, Roberto, “Redescubrimiento del mundo perdido: el Facundo de Sarmiento,” Revista Iberoamericana, vol. 54/143 (1988) [This study of Domingo Faustino Sarmiento’s Facundo explores the impact of scientific reports written by 18th-century European explorers and explains the influence of this kind of travel literature on 19th-century fiction and nonfiction]

Sommer, Doris, “Irresistible Romance: the Foundational Fictions of Latin America,” in Nation and Narration, edited by Homi K. Bhaba, London: Routledge, 1990 [An excellent essay which explains the impact of positivist thought in some of the novels of the 1800s]

Standley, Arline Reilein, Auguste Comte, Boston: Twayne, 1981 [A good introduction to the study of Comte and of his aesthetics, which also contains a very useful and complete chronology]

Abel Posse 1936–

Argentine prose writer

Abel Posse, a career diplomat and the author of ten novels and a critical reading guide to the best 101 works of world literature, Biblioteca esencial, 1991 [The Essential Library], is primarily identified with the new Latin American historical novel. Posse started to gain more critical attention and a wider reading public after he received the prestigious Rómulo Gallegos prize in 1987 for his novel Los perros del paraíso, 1983 (The Dogs of Paradise). This novel is part of the Columbus trilogy which includes Daimón, 1978 (Daimon) and El largo atardecer del caminante, 1992 (The Long Twilight of the Traveler). Like many Argentine writers, Posse made the obligatory peregrination to Europe in the 1960s where, among other things, he studied in Paris and met writers such as Julio Cortázar, Mario Trejo, Jean-Paul Sartre and Pablo Neruda. Because of his experience in Europe, or perhaps in spite of it, Posse not only maintained a highly independent stance with respect to the continent, but he was also able to develop his dual vision of the Old and the New Worlds. This binary vision plays a fundamental role in his Columbus trilogy. Posse’s first novel, Los bogavantes, 1970 (The Crew), deals with the lives of Latin Americans residing in Paris during the tumultuous 1960s, and his second novel, La boca del tigre, 1971 (In the Mouth of the Tiger), chronicles the life of Latin Americans in another exotic setting, the Soviet Union. These novels are works of crisis in which Posse explores a reality foreign to his vision, which centers on Latin America, and they are written in a language and a voice which he still had not made his own.

A long developmental phase followed during which Posse came into contact with Latin American reality when he lived in Peru and met José María Arguedas. While Posse did not publish anything between 1971 and 1978, his contact with Peruvian reality opened up a world to him which required a new language and perspective. Posse’s independence with respect to politics and ideologies and his complete adherence to literature enabled him to forge a new language and to consolidate his dual vision. Unlike some Argentine writers who traveled to Europe but who remained attached to their national reality, Posse not only eluded that trap but was able to integrate all the ostensibly disparate elements of his multinational experience into a unified vision.

The novel which marks the turning point in his writing is Daimón, the first novel of the Columbus trilogy. Significantly, Posse starts the trilogy with the bizarre and fantastic expedition of the demented conquistador, Lope de Aguirre, and not with Columbus’s discovery of America, which is the subject of the second novel in the trilogy, Los perros del paraíso. Aguirre’s expedition (1558–61), his rebellion against Spain’s administrative empire and his attempt to create a new empire, were already historically anachronistic since his aim was to restore the medieval values of the warrior and the vassal at a time when the conquistadors were no longer needed. In Daimón Posse resuscitates Lope de Aguirre and his followers so that they can not only recreate their expedition but also travel across the centuries to bear witness to the Spanish colonial enterprise in Latin America. Although the three novels contain a strong historiographic subtext, Posse goes beyond official history to give the reader a metahistorical vision in which he foregrounds language and form as the true heroes of these works. Not only is official history undermined by its link to Tarot cards but past and present are blended within the framework of circular time, and Lope de Aguirre’s peregrination across the centuries demonstrates the failure of the colonial enterprise and demythifies the mythic discourse of the discovery and conquest of America which is contained in the shipboard log of Christopher Columbus. In other words, Daimón subverts the scriptural edifice on which the whole colonial enterprise was erected before the reader confronts the mythic discourse of Christopher Columbus in the second novel. The other major innovation in Daimón is the creation of a baroque language which coincides with the eminently postmodern landscape of Latin America with its diverse cultures, races, languages and spatialized time zones which range from the prehistoric to the futuristic. Posse achieves his aim of creating a work in which his vision arises from language and not from ideas.

In Los perros del paraíso Posse inverts Europe and America so that Europe is illogical and irrational while the Incas and the Aztecs, in a series of anachronistic meetings, logically discuss the invasion of the Old World by using hot-air balloons. Posse subverts the canonical figure of Christopher Columbus who not only undermines the mythic discourse of the discovery and conquest of America, but also aspires to the Edenic world of Being in direct opposition to the Western obsession with the Paradise of Doing. Posse creates a Spain and Europe hovering between life and death, awaiting the seismic sexual union between Ferdinand and Isabel which will sweep away the medieval world and create a new order. Temporal and historical anachronisms abound in this novel and at one point Posse fuses all the voyages of Columbus so that they become a paradigm of all such ventures. Posse’s metahistorical vision of America allows him to fuse past and present so that Ferdinand and Isabel’s regime bears a striking resemblance to that of Eva and Juan Perón. Posse continues his subversion of official history, and his baroque language and the dialogic approach to the novel are foregrounded as much as the characters and story. In a final inversion Columbus is transformed into the first integral mestizo before the erotic conquest of America begins.

The last novel of the Columbus trilogy, El largo atardecer del caminante, replaces the anachronistic, spatio-temporal leaps across history with the intimate story of Alvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca’s incredible journey on foot across North America (1528–1536). The highly personal tone of the narrator’s voice creates a world in which Western man is an alien presence, a universe in which the foundations of the colonial enterprise are brought into serious question. Indeed, Cabeza de Vaca’s intimate account constitutes the discourse of failure, the recognition that the Western world never understood the pulsating and vibrant reality of the Other, and not, New World.

As Posse’s previous novels show, he criticizes the official history of Latin America as well as those Argentine writers who believe that they must talk only about Argentina in their works, while ignoring that fact that they live in a historical, telluric and human organicity which is Latin America. Each step that Posse’s Cabeza de Vaca takes in the novel is one more footfall in the discourse of failure. History in this novel spirals inward toward the intimate center of this narrative voice which seeks to close the door on this enterprise.

Posse has also written four other novels which deal more directly with Argentina and especially Buenos Aires. In Momento de morir, 1979 [Time to Die], Medardo Rabagliati, a lawyer in Buenos Aires, becomes progressively more embroiled in the violence and death which reigns in the streets of the city as contending political groups of all political stripes struggle for power. The novel demonstrates that politics and ideological struggles are never far from Posse’s fiction. In Los demonios ocultos, 1987 [The Hidden Demons], he explores the post-war world of Nazism. Lorca, the son of a German who has disappeared, is a journalist who becomes obsessed with locating his father. His investigation leads him to discover a Nazism which still proposes the creation of the master race. Posse’s novel also investigates Argentina’s link with the dark forces of Nazism which have played such a prominent role in the country’s history. In La Reina del Plata, 1988 [The Queen of the Plata], Posse fuses the past and present in his circular temporality. In this past-present Buenos Aires, Posse revives old myths of Argentina and infuses them with new life. This novel demonstrates how Posse constantly transcends the narrow boundaries of Argentine reality in order to recontextualize and revitalize cherished national myths such as the tango, Yrigoyen and Evita. In El viajero de Agartha, 1989 [The Traveler of Agartha], Walter Werner, a German archeologist, abandons everything to undertake a special mission to Agartha, the so-called City of the Powers. The strange journey turns into an initiatory voyage towards the esoteric universe of the pagan mythologies on which Nazism has founded its theology of violence.

While the awarding of the Rómulo Gallegos prize in 1987 and a number of others have brought Abel Posse more recognition, his work still has not received the full critical attention that it deserves. Part of this may be due to his independent stance in relation to literary movements and his rejection of identification with any particular political ideology. While Posse works on the margins of the literary mainstream, his dynamic evolution as a writer never ceases to break new ground. Posse continuously combines and recombinesthe elements of his multifaceted, transnational experience which coincides closely with Latin America’s pre-eminent status as a postmodern universe. Posse describes himself as a thief (ladrón) of many writers. Nevertheless, in his case, robbery yields a high return which can only enrich the possibilities of Latin American literature.

ROBERT L. SIMS

See also entry on The Historical Novel

Biography

Born in Córdoba, Argentina in 1936, but spent childhood in Buenos Aires. Moved to Paris in 1959. Has travelled widely as result of working as a diplomat. Publication of first novel delayed because of censorship in Franco’s Spain. Recipient of the following major prizes in Argentina: Triennial National Prize, 1969–71; the Argentine National Prize for Literature. Also awarded the Rómulo Gallegos Prize (Venezuela), 1987 for Los perros del paraíso.

Selected Works

Novels
Los bogavantes, Buenos Aires: Brújula, 1970
La boca del tigre, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1971
Momento de morir, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1979
Los demonios ocultos, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1987
La Reina del Plata, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1988
El viajero de Agartha, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1989
La pasión según Eva, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1994

Other Writings

Further Reading
The Post-Boom

The Post-Boom may be summarized as a movement in Spanish American fiction, beginning in the 1970s, partly as a reaction against the Boom. It is a much less homogeneous and hence less easily defined movement than the Boom itself, while in addition the break with the previous movement is much less clearly visible than the shift which took place during the 1950s at the beginning of the Boom. A few Boom writers, including Vargas Llosa, Donoso and even García Márquez himself, have recognized that a change has been taking place and have adjusted some aspects of their work accordingly, so that a line of separation is hard to draw. Secondly, since about 1975, when the Post-Boom is thought to have begun to take shape, no major writer has appeared who enjoys the same stature as the great figures of the preceding generation. On the other hand, the movement has seen the triumphant emergence of a galaxy of women writers, Isabel Allende (Chile), Luisa Valenzuela (Argentina), Elena Poniatowska (Mexico), Cristina Peri Rossi (Uruguay) and Rosario Ferré (Puerto Rico) prominent among them, and this may well be seen in the end as its single most important feature. The Post-Boom novelists tend to react against two aspects of the Boom: its cosmopolitan, universalist tendency on the one hand, and its emphasis on experimentalism as a means of questioning reality on the other. Hence major features of the Post-Boom are a more specific emphasis on Latin America and a move towards re-establishing the so-called “mimetic contract” between writer and reader. However, the extent to which this is aimed at or realized, varies considerably as we move from “ultra-realistic” “testimonial” (eye-witness) writing at one end of the Post-Boom spectrum to high fantasy and on-going narrative experimentalism at the other. Less variable is the intention to bring fiction back to a closer relationship with the here and now and with the history of Spanish America. The rise and fall of the military regimes in Chile, Uruguay and Argentina, together with the struggles in Central America and not least the run-up to the fifth centenary of the Discovery focused attention anew on the past and present of the continent.

Some writers in the Boom period, like Mario Benedetti in Uruguay and David Viñas in Argentina remained more or less faithful to old-styled realism during much of their creative cycles and were never members of the movement. They represent a certain continuity between the self-conscious neo-realism of some areas of the Post-Boom and the old tradition. But the real transition came with the early novels of Manuel Puig, which were clearly referential to the Argentina of the time and in addition popularized what was to become an important characteristic of the Post-Boom: its incorporation of “pop,” “youth” and “mass” culture-elements into the new pattern of fiction. Among the first writers to practice this incorporation were Gustavo Sainz and José Agustín in Mexico and Antonio Skármeta in Chile. The latter’s Soñé que la nieve ardía, 1975 (I Dreamt the Snow was Burning), whose hero is an aspiring professional soccer player living among young political activists in Santiago under Allende, is one of the inaugural novels of the Post-Boom.

Its greatest success so far has been Isabel Allende’s La casa de los espíritus, 1982, (The House of the Spirits), in which the shift from fantasy to political commitment can be observed taking place. Her subsequent easy-to-read, plot-centred novels, with their strong heroines, clear ideological stance and generally happy endings illustrate some central Post-Boom characteristics. These also include: humour and greater optimism, non-intellectual protagonists, often of working-class background, support for the oppressed and marginalized and two others especially which seem to put Allende in the middle of the Post-Boom mainstream: strong love-interest and melodrama. It is difficult to find in Boom fiction works in which love plays an important, life-enhancing role. But a major feature of the Post-Boom is its rehabilitation of the emotions. Melodrama, we know, depends on its appeal to a moral consensus in the audience or readership. Its reappearance in Allende and elsewhere in the Post-Boom is in significant contrast to the Boom’s tendency to question accepted values. Finally we should notice the voicing in the Post-Boom of formerly silenced or marginalized viewpoints, especially those of women, young people and members of the real working class, but also Jews, homosexuals and ethnic minorities.

Two of the most significant Post-Boom experiences were those of exile and of living in the shadow of the fifth centenary of the Discovery. Exile, according to Allende, caused writers to become more consciously aware of their common Latin Americanness than of their individual nationalities, and re-focused their attention on the continent and its problems, of which they had felt the effects at first hand. The imminence of the Discovery celebrations, on the other hand, brought a greater awareness of history and was a factor in the rise of the New Historical Novel, perhaps the most important form of writing in the Post-Boom. It also raises one of the most difficult problems connected with the movement. How is it possible to appear to observe and report reality (in this case historical reality) confidently and unambiguously, when the Boom writers had expended so much talent and energy questioning both the notion that reality is easy to understand and the presumption that there is a simple relationship between words we use to describe it and what they purport to describe? The dilemma has produced two kinds of writing. Both belong to the Post-Boom to the extent that they are concerned specifically with Spanish America. But whereas one presents the past of Spanish America as if it were relatively intelligible and capable of yielding lessons for the present, the other presents all historical interpretation as fiction, parading the traditional historical novel, as in Los perros del paraíso, 1983 (The Dogs of Paradise), by Abel Posse (Argentina). What this illustrates is that most Post-Boom novelists are more conscious of the status of their work as fiction than was the case before the Boom. However, under the impact of events, some have elected to break with the “splintered mirror effect” of many Boom novels, in which the reader had to reassemble the picture of reality and was always conscious of its fragmentary and potentially unreliable nature. Recognizing that it is difficult to reflect and to interpret what is happening in Latin America if, at the same time, one continually undermines the notions of chronology, cause and effect and referentiality, these authors have perforce moved towards greater reader-friendliness. At the same time, and as part of the same process, they have tried to replace the disturbing metaphors underlying much of the fiction of the Boom, with a more reassuring vision of reality. It may be noted in passing that, to the extent that this return to referentiality and reassurance is actually part of the Post-Boom’s mainstream (and opinions differ), it is not easy to relate the movement to Postmodernism, though exception might be made for parts of the new historical novel and the new detective novel in Spanish America.

Who, finally, are the representative writers (that is, principally novelists) of the Post-Boom? Skármeta mentions Ariel Dorfman, José Agustín, Gustavo Sainz and Jorge Aguilar Mora, Luis Rafael Sánchez, Manuel Puig and Eduardo Gudiño Kieffer, Reinaldo Arenas and Miguel Barnet, Oscar Collazos and Sergio Ramírez. Ricardo Piglia mentions his fellow Argentines Juan José Saer and Puig, Skármeta, Dorfman, Rafael Humberto Moreno-Durán, Agustín, Sainz and José Emilio Pacheco. Mempo Giardinelli and Abel Posse should be added to these names, together with the women writers already mentioned, Allende, Valenzuela, Poniatowska, Peri Rossi, Ferré and Ana Lydia Vega, among others.

The challenge to the Post-Boom writers seems to be to move on from the Boom, incorporating more direct referentiality and social comment in their fiction, without ignoring the Boom’s legacy of sophisticated writing. The search, that is, is for a new balance between observation and imagination.

DONALD L. SHAW

Further Reading

Rama, Ángel, Más allá del boom: literatura y mercado, Mexico City: Marcha 1981

Postmodern Writing

In Latin America, the discussion of Postmodernism in literature and culture was introduced relatively recently, gaining in prominence towards the end of the 1980s. At first sight, Postmodernism must have looked like a strictly Anglo-American affair, and the very term was confusing. In the Anglo-American context, “Modernism” is used as a period concept covering the span from about the 1910s to the 1950s; Postmodernism therefore, emerging in the turbulent 1960s, tends to be rather a break with than a continuation of modernist aesthetics. In the Hispanic context, postmodernismo (1905–20) is a generational concept referring to a kind of prolongation of the initially more cosmopolitan end-of-the-century Modernismo (1890–1905)—the Hispanic literary counterpart to Art Nouveau. The attempt made by Juan Ramón Jiménez, during his exile in the US, to expand Modernismo somewhat in the Anglo-American sense to cover the 1890s through 1950s (the span of his own poetic production), did not prevail, in spite of some good reasons he might have, because the image of tradition-breaking was captured by the much more radical avant-garde currents of the 1920s. Recently, Fredric Jameson has revived Ramón Jiménez’s claims. In the Brazilian context, Modernismo is correlated with the explosion and proliferation of the international avant-garde movements in the 1920s, but its duration is expanded somewhat loosely up to at least the 1960s.

Since the 1960s, social studies have tinkered with other concepts, such as “postindustrial society,” referring to the momentous social and technological changes precipitated by World War II. Outside of the Anglo-American cultural context, the discussion of Postmodernism was increasingly related to this emerging new, postmodern, “information age” and social paradigm (though certainly not “paradise,” Utopian or other). In correlation to this, “Modernism” was inflated to stand surreptitiously for “modern art” at large, from the Enlightenment to the 1950s (the aesthetic and political conservatism of mainstream Anglo-American Modernism vis-à-vis the avant-gardes made the new quixotic mission of that term somewhat more plausible).

The confusion created by this leap from the arts and literature into apocalyptic history (the “end of modernity”) was further complicated in international discussions, responsive by necessity to local contexts and sensibilities. Yet precisely these dynamics and the ensuing shift in the meaning of the pivotal concepts enhanced their tantalizing powers and their potential for meaning, something perhaps crucial for contemporary cultural developments. Without this linkage, Postmodernism could be just a short-lived fashion and, indeed, as some wishful undertakers have come to suggest, already dead (strangely enough, this “death” was pegged to 1989, the time when precisely the modern Utopian model crumbled under the Berlin Wall).

The curiosity of Latin American literary critics was aroused when the lists of “postmodernist” writers included more and more of the prominent Latin Americans; some European theoreticians of Postmodernism (such as D.W.Fokkema) went as far as to declare that the movement actually originated in Latin America—specifically with Borges. (Of course, Borges would have something to say about the fabrication of precursors.) Marxist-oriented critics, pointing out that Latin America had not experienced full modernity yet, questioned the relevance of Postmodernism in those circumstances. Since the late 1980s, a fully-fledged discussion about the possible merits of Postmodernism in Latin America has developed.

In which ways might it be profitable to apply the concepts of Postmodernism or postmodern writing to Latin American literature? Latin American postmodern writing, if any, is part of the emerging postmodern condition worldwide and also within the specific cultural, political and social contexts of the individual countries. Therefore, it has not been productive to draw a time-line, e.g., starting from the 1960s, when the unequivocal signs of new cultural forms emerge (mass media, urban popular culture, rock music and other forms of international culture, including commodification of countercultural phenomena); nor from the 1970s, when the transformation becomes massive; nor from the 1980s, because, by then, the “new” is already several decades old. Nor is it very productive, following Ihab Hassan’s lead, to compile a list of rhetorical devices, because they all seem to come from one shelf, namely the avant-garde (though not necessarily from AngloAmerican Modernism). In Postmodernism, the avant-garde deconstructive devices have crossed over from poetry into narrative, criticism (already present in Russian Formalism), and philosophy. It would not be productive either to identify Postmodernism with some short-lived fashions, such as la Onda writing in Mexico which explored, from the Boom aesthetics, the leisure culture of emerging middle-class adolescents and other paraphernalia of the 1960s. A similar aesthetic double-standard is to be found in the so-called novela del lenguaje (language novel) of the 1960s and 1970s: in this novel centered on language, the postmodern exploration of different strata of popular cultures (in Cabrera Infante, Sarduy, Puig or Sánchez) is coupled with a relentless attack on the illusion of representation through language that comes from the avantgarde. By contrast, the testimonio is founded, and founders, on the illusion of representation and representativity; its search for “unofficial history” and for the empowering of the voice and the culture of the underprivileged have been seriously undercut by testimonio’s overt, still modern, political underpinnings.

It would be equally misleading to identify Postmodernism or postmodern writing with the Post-Boom, because this awkward, ill-defined concept cannot be taken as equivalent to either. Post-Boom refers to the narrative written in Spanish America after the fireworks of the totalizing, allegorical and experimental novels of the 1960s; but when the attempt is made to go beyond chronology and grasp more exactly the Post-Boom aesthetics, the concept disintegrates. For example, such important Post-Boom novels as Reinaldo Arenas’s El mundo alucinante, 1969 (Hallucinations, also published as The Ill-Fated Peregrinations of Fray Servando); Ricardo Piglia’s Respiración artificial, 1980 (Artificial Respiration); Isabel Allende’s La casa de los espíritus, 1982 (The House of the Spirits); Laura Esquivel’s Como agua para chocolate, 1989 (Like Water for Chocolate); or Jesús Díaz’s Las palabras perdidas, 1992 [Lost Words], are all as representative and totalizing, in their own way, as the best Boom novels of Fuentes, Vargas Llosa and García Márquez. The uneasiness these postmodern novels provoke in some readers may be actually due to the fact that these works require a new art of reading, which a part of the elite audience educated on the master-allegories of the 1960s still cannot muster. The resulting fuzziness of the Post-Boom aesthetics sometimes allows that typical Boom authors, such as Severo Sarduy, writing directly within the French nouveau roman tradition, are paraded as prime examples of Post-Boom; yet indeed aspects of Sarduy’s writing may be perceived as postmodern (such as his playing with elements of popular culture and with scriptural and gay transvestism). Further, if we identify Boom narrative or authors with “modernist” writing, and Post-Boom with “postmodernist” writing, we have to exclude from the postmodern realm precisely the authors who figure prominently on the “postmodernist” lists of the non-Latin American critics (Borges, Cortázar, García Márquez, Fuentes, Vargas Llosa, among others). Could all these critics be wrong? Are they reading “out of context”? Is reading from another context necessarily all wrong? Asking these questions does not excuse those US comparatists who impose Anglo-American patterns on Latin American writing.

Finally, these and other exercises in sweeping generalizations fail to explain some striking differences in how postmodern problematics have been received in individual Latin American countries. For example, while Brazil and Mexico jumped on the postmodern bandwagon almost effortlessly; in Argentina it encountered some vocal resistance from the male literati (although, to the contrary, it was assumed programmatically by writers with exile experience, such as Mempo Giardinelli, who lived in Mexico, and Néstor Perlongher, who actually lived in Brazil); in addition, women writers seem much less inhibited in this context. In Cuba, we sense an overwhelming desire to be (and act as if they were) “already” postmodern.

Since Latin American mainstream societies have engaged in the ever accelerating yet ever elusive “modernization,” heterogeneous Latin American cultures both share the condition and, at the same time, are the beneficiaries of the crisis of the modern Western Utopian rationalism which has been driving modernization. Due to the crisis of Eurocentrism and of “modern” values, accelerated by decolonization, Latin America ceased to be “put down” a priori to a position of inferiority. Instead of searching for an identity, as if it were some “lost father” or other “origin,” this might be indeed the propitious time for Latin America to forge a unique cultural identity and reinvent “from scratch,” from the marvelous amalgam of the premorden, modern, antimodern and now also postmodern building blocks, and, of course, all-time forgeries. Lo real maravilloso (Carpentier’s poetics of Latin American reality); realismo mágico (understood as an aesthetics of artistic creation and as a re-vision of Latin American realities); Borges’s hybrid fictions, featuring a quilt made from the most distant cultures and from patches of absurd “logical gradations” (the dead-serious modernist reading mistook his knack for pastiche, his Dada-humor and sly satire for “philosophy”); or Paz’s early postmodern soul-searching in El laberinto de la soledad (The Labyrinth of Solitude) and his continuous denunciation of the crisis of modern values, have all started this process. But the novels of magical realism, to take one example, also show a double-bind: in these works, the forces of Western modernity end up defeated symbolically by Latin American premodernity; yet “the Others” have to keep playing the role of “Indians” for Western audiences. Hence, it is apparent that the equality bestowed on Latin America has been limited to culture, aesthetics and intellectual tourism. If the world does not self-destruct, it would seem that only modernization, so vilified by Latin American intellectual elites (from Ariel to the “good revolutionaries”), has any chance of bringing full equality. In the meantime, the prophesized “continent of the future” lies amidst ecological disaster, aggravated by population explosion and uncontrolled urbanization and deforestation. The apocalyptic parable about the end of time, La leyenda de los soles, 1993 [The Legend of the Suns], by Homero Aridjis, seems to be an appropriate closure and the latest reincarnation of magical realism at the end of the 20th century.

Large migrations have also produced new cultural, political and economic phenomena: the indigenous population has swamped creole or Europeanized cities, and Latin Americans at large have established numerous “beachheads” in the North or in some other former metropolis. While academic criticism spins out serial narratives about “Third World,” “dependency,” and other typical modern intellectual constructs, the illiterate and barefoot migrants, undocumented “aliens,” and forced exiles have effected a sort of “reverse conquest” of significant bits of the “empire” and have changed it, as well as their original countries, in the process. Today, the strength of Puerto Rican literature could not be understood without its close ties to New York. Puerto Rican culture has gone a long way from the curse put on the exile in René Marqués’s La carreta, 1951 (The Oxcart), to the current “love affair” with “our” New York. Mexican literature has only begun to feel the influence and to recognize the importance of border and chicano literature and culture. Miami and Cuba are still two hostile territories of one Cuban body and soul. These symbiotic relationships with the “significant other” have added to the already rich cultural diversification going on within. For example, contemporary Mexico shows an important revival of regional cultural centers; ever stronger writing by women; and an emergence of diverse marginal cultures (indigenous, Jewish, gay/lesbian).

Our relating Latin American Postmodernism to the process of emerging postmodernity permits us to bring into focus, and to re-evaluate, the various ideological and artistic contradictions concealed in Latin American literature since the 1940s and fruitfully to reread some recent classics from the perspective that can illuminate their “flip side,” showing their “reverse” as equally authentic, if not more, as the side played to exhaustion by the earlier modernist readings. Latin American postmodern writing bears witness to this new process of transition.

EMIL VOLEK

See also entries on Chicano Literature, Cuban Writing in the United States, The Post-Boom, Puerto Rican Writing in the United States

Further Reading

Octavio Paz and his journal Vuelta (1976–) have pioneered the debate in Mexico and Latin America. Many useful articles have appeared in special issues of journals, such as Vuelta 127 (1987); Casa del Tiempo (Mexico), vol. 8/81 (1989); Revista de Crítica Literaria Latinoamericana 2,9 (1989); Nuevo Texto Crítico 6–7 (1990–91); Politeia, Colombia, 11 (1992); Boundary 2, vol. 20/3 (1993). Jaime Alazraki has explored the postmodern re-reading of Borges and Cortázar.

Beverley, John, José Miguel Oviedo and Michael Aronna (editors), The Postmodernism Debate in Latin America, Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press, 1995
Booker, M.Keith, Vargas Llosa among the Postmodernists, Gainesville: Univerdsity Presses of Florida, 1994
Chamberlain, Bobby J., “Pósmodenidade e a ficção brasileira dos anos 70 e 80,” Revista Iberoamericana 164–65 (July–December 1993)
Volek, Emil, Literatura hispanoamericana entre la modernidad y la postmodernidad, Bogotá: Unalcol, 1994

Special Issues of Journals
Jean Price-Mars 1876–1968

Haitian anthropologist and man of ideas

The first occupation of Haiti by the US, between 1915 and 1934, was to have unforeseeable repercussions on the cultural life of the country. From the time independence was gained from France in 1804, the history of the first black republic had been marked by intense racial antagonism between black and mulattoes, and extreme socioeconomic division. The presence of the Americans, on whom all Haitians were able to focus their deepest resentments, provided the catalyst for the awakening of a nationalist movement that manifested itself partly, but most importantly, in a legitimized interest in the country’s African heritage. A dedicated anthropologist, Jean Price-Mars remains particularly noted for a series of essays gathered during this period in a volume entitled Ainsi parla l’Oncle (So Spoke the Uncle), where he proclaimed the importance of the Haitian folklore, ethnicity and religion that had been imported from Africa, granting these cultural elements a prestige which was quite astonishing at the time, even in a world where imperialism was already in decline. Along with two of his contemporaries, Dr Arthur C.Holly and Dr J.C.Dorsainville, Price-Mars helped shape the minds of the generation of writers and intellectuals responsible in part for the present situation in Haiti.

Price-Mars dedicated his whole life’s work to bridging the many rifts that have always been part of Haitian society; fortunately, he was endowed with a remarkable ability to conciliate outwardly conflicting differences. This talent was already present in childhood, when he moved easily between the austere Protestantism of his father and the fervent Catholicism of his maternal grandmother. He undertook medical studies and at the same time he actively participated in the literary circles of Port-au-Prince; when he continued to study medicine in Paris, he became involved at the same time in the burning social issues of the times. He discovered anthropology and returned to Haiti to pursue a multifaceted career as historian, ethnologist, teacher, politician and diplomat. In a feat of impartiality, he managed never to alienate himself from one side or the other of a given issue: at the same time as he was describing the current affairs of his country, he actively promoted a reassessment of Haitian history from a non-European point of view; however great his concern for the masses of illiterate Haitians, he never dissociated himself from the privileged elite minority to which he belonged by birth; he was proud of his African origins, yet he revered Haiti’s cultural ties with France until his death. As late as 1966, in his speech of acceptance of the first Prix des Caraïbes awarded by the AEFMOM (Association des Écrivains d’Expression Française de la Mer et de l’Outre-Mer), he referred to “la France immortelle, la France qui est en même temps la beauté et la lumière du monde…” (France, immortal, both beauty and light of the world).

The work thus recognized by France was manifold; in his capacity of President of the Société d’Histoire et de Géographie d’Haïti, Price-Mars wrote prolifically, in many genres including book reviews, testimonies for friends and colleagues, articles and essays. Consistent with his interest in genealogy and family backgrounds, he wrote noteworthy essays on the founders of his country, including “Le Sentiment de la valeur personelle chez Henry Christophe en fonction de son rôle de chef,” 1934 [The Sentiment of Personal Valour in Henry Christophe, the Leader] and “J.J.Dessalines, les origines, le milieu physique, le milieu humain,” 1938 [Dessalines: His Origins, His Physical and Human Environment]. His critical works focused on the literary and historical writings of various authors including Jacques Roumain, Max Coiscou and Fernando Ortiz. He founded the Institut d'Ethnologie de Port-au-Prince at the same time as becoming active in the political life of his country. President of the Société Africaine de Culture, he was a distinguished speaker and gave many lectures that were influential on the running of his country. His many interests did not divert him, however, from his main work as historian and ethnologist; his two main concerns throughout his life were the relations between Haiti and her neighbours (with many articles written on the dealings between Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Cuba and the United States) and the African side of the racial and cultural origins of the Haitian people. It is this latter aspect of his work that gave rise to his best-known volume, Ainsi parla l’Oncle, a compilation of essays that was a direct reaction to his encounter with Gustave Lebon whose work Lois psychologiques de l'évolution des peuples [The Psychological Laws Governing the Evolution of Peoples] concluded that the outcome of racial mixture can only be a retarded or deficient species of humanity.

In a series of eight essays, Price-Mars draws attention to the Haitian peasantry with particular reference to its language, religion, African origins and mores. Haitians could no longer be considered as mere descendants of slaves to a superior white race, but as inheritors of a timeless cultural wealth handed down, through the generations, directly from Africa. The Creole language and the oral traditions of Haitians were now seen as indispensable tools in the passing on of this heritage. Voodoo was no longer a religion of primitive people, but rather a religion in its early stages, expressing animism and dynamism rather than fetishism. Price-Mars’s pursuit of the authentic, left itself open to various interpretations: “At its most benign,” says J.Michael Dash in his article “Blazing Mirrors: the Crisis of the Haitian Intellectual,” “the cult of authenticity meant the honouring of artistic intuition and a rediscovery of the expressiveness of Creole. At its most extreme, it meant the celebration of cannibalism, black magic, sensual abandon and dictatorship.” However factual Price-Mars’s reasoning, he nevertheless tends to consider the African race and culture superior to all others; the reason for this may not be personal but, instead, the result of his approach to the subject: the science of anthropology being the product of European thinking, it may have been inevitable that the researcher would produce a conclusion that one race is superior to another. But his earnest enquiry and his exalting of a people who were despised the world over earned him one of his lesser-known accolades, that of precursor to the Négritude movement; affectionately referring to him as “l’Oncle” during a speech made in 1956 on the occasion of Price-Mars’s eightieth birthday, Léopold Sédar Senghor acknowledged him as follows: “L’Oncle légitimait les raisons de ma quête, confirmait ce que j’avais pressenti. Car, me montrant les trésors de la Négritude qu’il avait découverts sur et dans la terre haïtienne, il m’apprenait à découvrir les mêmes valeurs, mais vierges et plus fortes, sur et dans la terre africaine.” (Our Uncle validated the reasons for my research, confirming my suspicions. Indeed, by showing me the treasures of Négritude he has discovered about, and in, the land of Haiti, he taught me to discover the same values in Africa, although as yet untouched and more powerful).

Recognition of the wealth of the African contribution to the Haitian ethos was an essential step in defining national identity in Haiti. Although the deeper content of Price-Mars’s teaching and beliefs failed to solve the problems of his country to any extent, these have nevertheless a universal application; in a world where cultural and racial mixing is becoming the norm, this final observation from Price-Mars, the reconciler of dualities, sums up an important lesson for all people regardless of race, culture and religion: “Acceptez donc le patrimoine ancestral comme un bloc. Faites-en le tour, pesez-le, examinezle avec intelligence et circonspection, et vous verrez comme dans un miroir brisé qu’il reflète l’image réduite de l’humanité toute entière.” (Take your ancestral heritage as a whole. Look it over, weigh it up, study it with intelligence and care, and you will notice that, like a cracked mirror, it reflects a miniaturized image of all humanity).

CHRISTINE A.F.ROBINSON

See also entry on Fernando Ortiz

Biography

Born in Haiti, 1876. Studied medicine in Port-au-Prince and in Paris, 1895–1900. Charge d’Affaires in Washington, DC, 1903–10. This experience made him acutely aware of racism and as a result he devoted the rest of his life to the study of African civilizations and Haitian folklore. Died in 1968.

Selected Works

La Vocation de l’élite, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie E.Chenet, 1919
Une Étape de l’évolution haïtienne, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie “La Presse,” 1929(?)
Formation ethnique, folk-lore et culture du peuple haïtien, Port-auPrince: V.Valcin Imprimeur, 1939
La République d’Haïti et la république Dominicaine: les aspects divers d’un problème d’histoire, de géographie et d’éthnologie..., Port-au-Prince: n.p., 1953
De Sainte Domingue à Haïti: essai sur la culture, les arts et la littérature, Paris: Presence Africaine, 1959
Silhouette de nègres et de négrophiles, Paris: Présence Africaine, 1960

Further Reading

Depestre, René, “Jean Price Mars et le mythe de l’Orphée noir,” in Pour la Revolution, pour la poésie, Montreal: Léméac, 1975
——“La Négritude de Jean Price Mars,” in Bonjour et adieu a la négritude, Paris: Laffont, 1980
Duvalier, François, Elements d’une doctrine, Port-au-Prince: Presses Nationales d’Haïti, 1968
Fouchard, Jean and Emmanuel C.Paul (editors), Témoignages sur la vie et l’oeuvre de Jean Price-Mars, Port-au-Prince: Imprimerie de l’Etat, 1956
Nicholls, David, From Dessalines to Duvalier: Race, Colour and National Independence in Haiti, London: Macmillan, 1988
Prison Writing

Since institutional violence is such an accepted part of Latin American experience, its appearance in the continent’s literature seems predominantly documentary from the time of Independence. One manifestation of this experience is prison writing, which includes works such as Hernán Valdés’s Tejas Verdes (1974) in which he relates his experiences in a concentration camp run by the Chilean secret police. His testimony forms part of an extensive bibliography of fictional and documentary literature that treats the violence of repressive Latin American societies. These materials focus on the use of torture, secret police, extra-legal death squads and clandestine jails as institutionalized means of social and political control. From Eduardo Pavlovsky’s drama on professional torturers, El señor Galíndez (1973) novels on official torture like Manuel Puig’s El beso de la mujer araña, 1976 (Kiss of the Spider Woman) and Carlos Martínez Moreno’s El color que el infierno nos escondiera, 1981 (El infierno), to the personal testimony by Jacobo Timerman, Preso sin nombre, celda sin número, 1981 (Prisoner without a Name, Cell without a Number), there is a constellation of works in which it is difficult to distinguish between the fictional and the documentary.

Writers employ various forms of narrative to describe prison life: the memoir or the diary; episodic accounts rather than tightly structured narratives; a series of soliloquies and digressions, etc. The characters most often represent symbolic and ethical imperatives as well as aesthetic and psychological ones, as protagonists frequently muse on the meaning of moral guilt and responsibility. The subject matter of such polemical and provocative narratives, whether they be in a specific or unspecified time and place, includes descriptions of the unjust incarceration of political prisoners. Quite often these are based on eyewitness accounts and, as Ariel Dorfman asserts in Hacia la liberación del lector latinoamericano (Some Write to the Future), such prison testimonials have mainly a threefold function: “to accuse the executioners, to record the sufferings and the epics, to inspire the other combatants in the middle of retreat. A fourth function (not always of primary concern) is to carry out a rational analysis of the problems and the reversals that are being suffered today.” Since much of this literature is born of urgency—the need to denounce atrocities through personal accounts as opposed to “official” versions—prison writing becomes a chronicle of protest and subversion in many instances. Prison narratives are an integral part of the resistance itself, since they not only recount strategies of resistance, but are themselves one such strategy. And, most significantly, the literary recording of prison life transgresses the silence willed by the authorities, as well as being a valuable source of sociohistorical information. From a literary perspective, prison narratives constitute a productive interfacing of a narrative explicitly framed by an author or author/protagonist but attributable to historically “real” individuals.

In contrast to narrative prison writings, plays which emerge from the concentration camps usually are the work of internees who are novice writers. But, not unlike their narrative counterparts, these short (usually one act) dramatic productions result from the desire to communicate a particular message about a lived experience. The act of writing or, in many instances, re-enacting a memorized performance text uncommitted to paper during internment is a continuation of the act of resistance and of survival. It is still resistance, but now in words: what the prisoners lived through together, shared, and were able to reconstruct and then perform in front of their peers during their detention as a collective enterprise from conception to performance, is also a means of communicating with the outside world. It is an act of catharsis at the same time that it is a demonstration of political denunciation and personal defiance in the face of repression. Among the prison dramas written by the Chilean Oscar Castro, former member of the theatre group El Aleph, were La guerra [The War], Sálvese quien pueda [Run for Your Life], La noche suspendida [The Interrupted Night], Casimiro Peñafleta, preso político [Casimiro Peñafleta, Political Prisoner] and Vida, pasión y muerte de Casimiro Peñafleta [Life, Passion and Death of Casimiro Peñafleta]. In these politicized theatre sketches, the performances took the form of happenings due to the total involvement of the camp. And, it was humor and irony, innuendos and double meanings that became strategies subtly to poke fun at prison guards while, at the same time “entertaining” them with the performance text. In effect, their tormentors become accomplices in their own denunciation in these spontaneously performed works. Humor and irony, popular stories and anecdotes are incorporated into these dramatic vignettes of prison life, and, among the prisoners themselves who have become writers-directors-actors of their own lived scripts, a sense of collectivity grows strong and speaks through a thousand cracks of the prison or concentration camp walls. It is community theatre within a small closed community that we see here, an expression as much of the desire to keep one’s sanity by re-creating personal experiences in pseudo-fictional form as a collective whole as it is the need to scorn one’s oppressors before their very eyes without suffering reprisals for doing so. In contemporary Latin American theatre, particularly in countries like Argentina, Cuba, Mexico and Brazil there is a tradition of using public spectacle for sociohistorical information. What links documentary prison writing—whether narrative or dramatic—to the intricacies of fiction in Latin America is its association with the long-standing literary tradition of the region, that is, the close relationship between writing and reality, between literary discourse and fact, between detached author and involved participant. Given the essential value of the sociopolitical commentary and recreation of lived reality Latin Americans have learned to expect from their fellow artists, it is not surprising that prison writing has emerged in the service of sociopolitical awareness and as a testimonial of personal human endurance and triumph in the face of physical violence and psychological assault. Prison writing and political detention, the struggle against torture and the opposition to censorship are at once social and political movements. The counterdiscourse of political detainees constitutes a threatening culture, a challenge to both the secrecy requirement of torture and the disciplinary sanctions that read these incarcerated textual interventions out of the curriculum.

ELENA DE COSTA

Further Reading

Narratives and Drama
Benedetti, Mario, Pedro y el capitán, Mexico City: Nueva Imagen, 1979; as “Peter and the Captain,” translated by Freda Beberfall, Modern International Drama, vol. 19/1
Cabieses, Manuel, Chile: 11808 horas en campos de concentración, prologue by Argenis Martínez, Caracas: 1975
Polari de Alverga, Alex, Camarim de prisioneiro, São Paulo: Global, 1980
Quijada Cerda, Aníbal, Cerco de púas, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1977
Rojas, Rodrigo, Jamás de rodillas (Acusación de un prisionero de la junta fascista de Chile), prologue by Volodia Teitelboim, Moscow: Nóvosti, 1974

Critical Studies

Prizes

There are countless literary prizes available to writers from Latin America; it seems as if almost every nation, every province, every town has its awards for one genre or another. So numerous are the prizes offered that they tend sometimes to lose significance. This entry therefore only highlights some of the most important in the 20th century.
The Nobel, best known and most valuable of the international literary prizes, first awarded in 1901 and open to writers in any language, has been won to date by five Spanish American writers: Chilean poets Gabriela Mistral (1945) and Pablo Neruda (1971), Guatemalan novelist Miguel Ángel Asturias (1967), Colombian novelist Gabriel García Márquez (1982), and Mexican poet and prose writer Octavio Paz (1990). Others, including Brazilian authors, have been in the running; perhaps the most often mentioned is Borges, some observers having claimed that politics explain the failure of nominees such as him.

In addition to prizes open to international competition by writers in any tongue, there are others available only to writers in Spanish or Portuguese; many such prizes are offered in the Iberian peninsula. The most prestigious for writers in Spanish is the “Premio Miguel de Cervantes,” which was established in 1967 by the Spanish Ministry of Culture; recipients receive a substantial sum of money from the hands of the King of Spain, in a ceremony held at Alcalá de Henares (where Cervantes once studied); this prize has been won by Carpentier, Borges, Onetti, Paz, Sábato, Fuentes, Roa Bastos, Biy Casares, Enrique Larreta, Dulce María Loynaz and Mario Vargas Llosa. Another “royal” prize from Spain is the Premio Príncipe de Asturias de las Letras; Uslar Pietri, for example, has won this award. A third such prize is the “Reina Sofía” for poetry, first awarded in 1992, and to a Chilean: Gonzalo Rojas.

The “Premio Biblioteca Breve” was the most important of a number of awards offered by publishing houses, in this case Seix Barral; many of the writers of the Boom were helped to prominence by this annual award, and during the years when it was being made (from the late 1950s to the early 1970s) Seix Barral acquired something of a reputation for publishing what was new and significant. The “Premio Biblioteca Breve” recognised specific unpublished novels; among Spanish American winners were Vargas Llosa (for La ciudad y los perros [The Time of the Hero]), Cabrera Infante (for Tres tristes tigres [Three Trapped Tigers]), and Fuentes (for Cambio de piel [A Change of Skin]).

In Spanish America itself, the Rómulo Gallegos prize, named after the Venezuelan novelist and president (in 1947), stands out; its value is some $10,000. Several of the most successful novelists of the 20th century have received this award: the first winner was Vargas Llosa for his La casa verde, 1967 (The Green House), and García Márquez won it five years later (for Cien años de soledad [One Hundred Years of Solitude]), and then Fuentes (Terra Nostra); other winners have been del Paso (Palinuro de Mexico [Palinuro of Mexico]), Posse (Los perros del paraíso [The Dogs of Paradise]), Mejía Vallejo (La casa de dos palmas [The House with Two Palms]), Uslar Pietri (La visita en el tiempo [The Recurring Visit]), and Giardinelli (El santo oficio de la memoria [The Holy Office of Memory]).

The Casa de las Américas prizes were launched in Cuba in 1959, shortly after Castro came to power. They are awarded for various categories of writing in addition to the traditional genres (for example, for children’s literature and for testimonial fiction), and for writing from different geographical or linguistic communities of Latin America, including Brazil, Caribbean Creole, and indigenous languages. In addition to giving recognition to writers, these awards have helped to keep Cuba on the cultural stage; while they are not of great monetary value, they are numerous: some 450 awards have been made during the period up to 1995. Many prominent Latin American writers have won, or have served as members of juries; however, the disaffection of some famous writers with the aftermath of the Revolution has reduced participation.

In Brazil, the national government offers National Cultural Awards through the Ministry of Education and Culture in literature, the visual arts, film and folklore. In the case of local government, the most prestigious prize is the Paraná State Short Story Prize, offered for an unpublished collection. Winning it has launched the career of several distinguished writers, among them: Dalton Trevisan, Rubem Fonseca and Lydia Fagundes Telles. The Brazilian Academy of Letters offers several prizes, of which the most important is the annual Machado de Assis Prize, awarded to authors for their complete works. Other prizes include the Odorico Mendes for translation into Portuguese, and the Monteiro Lobato Prize for Children’s Literature. Finally, there is the Camões Prize, established in 1989 with the support of both the Portuguese and Brazilian governments. Brazilian writers who have won it are João Cabral de Melo Neto and Rachel de Queiroz.

PETER STANDISH

Further Reading

To date, very little has been written on this subject in relation to Latin America, even though the various political agendas involved would make this a fascinating subject:

Protest Literature

In Latin America, the Catholic Church has been one of the pillars of the established order for centuries. However, its authority began to be undermined from within during the 1960s. This was when Christian base communities, inspired by Vatican II—grounded in “liberation theology”—began to nurture dissent by challenging the legitimacy of established structures and laying foundations for new forms of leadership and solidarities. In so doing, they have encouraged a plethora of subaltern texts, both written and orally produced as performance texts in marginalized communities throughout Latin America, particularly in slum areas on the outskirts of large cities (the Chilean poblaciones or villas miserias and campamentos or squatter settlements, for example) in South America, and in remote rural regions inhabited mainly by illiterate and semi-literate peasants in Central America.

Pre-conquest peasant-based beliefs, which are perpetuated and reinforced through rituals, contribute to a continued collective identity and, as is often the case, form the basis of the literature of resistance that has emerged in recent years. Protest literature has the potential for being a liberating discourse, which challenges its public to transform their world through emancipatory action, as opposed to mythical literary texts whose transformative potential is limited by ideology. Writers began to depict previously marginalized worlds, visions and voices. They used their art as a medium for political consciousness-raising as they explored the changing representations of shifting sociopolitical and historical power relationships. Novelists, dramatists and poets began to approach issues that are a key to an understanding of Latin America and its cultural images—among them, colonialism, institutionalized violence, revolution, identity and self-definition, and socioeconomic centrality versus marginality—with a variety of strikingly powerful and innovative artistic techniques. This was a literally defined movement as opposed to simple agitprop or political pamphleteering devoid of stylistic concerns and focused on a single ideology. The writers involved in protest literature prefer to address a thinking public, an audience that will enter into a dialectical exchange with one another, prompted by the literary work, in order to explore solutions to the issues raised in the literary text. The insistence on the “here-and-now” of historical reality and its conditions of possibility underwrites much of the project of protest or resistance literature as emphasis is placed, to a large extent, on the political as the power to change the world.

Latin American writers, with few exceptions, confess to an engagement with reality that is entrarrnable or visceral, and it would seem that the vitality of their writing is connected to the urgency with which they perceive and experience that reality—the interaction between self and circumstance. Since the 19th century, the writer in Latin America has not only addressed the most vital concerns of his society (social reality) but has also traditionally wielded enormous influence as a man of letters, as witness, social conscience, and as a voice of protest whenever necessary. Indeed, in the 1970s in authoritarian countries many writers were imprisoned, tortured and “disappeared” not to mention forced into exile for their denunciation of sociopolitical injustices. Whatever the form of discourse—prose, poetry, theatre—or rhetorical devices, the writer’s vocation in Latin America has consistently entailed a moral imperative to speak out on issues of national concern—or when that is not feasible, to encode political dissent into his discourse through “creative” approaches to bypass censorship.

One direct form of protest writing is the Socialist Realist novel which provided the reader with information on the sufferings and alienation of Chilean coal-miners (see the entry on Baldomero Lillo), Indian mine-laborers, and on the exploitation of the marginalized in general. With the appearance of works such as Oscar Lewis’s Los hijos de Sánchez (Children of Sánchez), sociological information was diverted into documentary and non-fictional channels (case histories, for example). Of course, social protest writing and documentary realism have demonstrated a more decisive, critical, selfreflective and, at times, propagandistic function in countries which have undergone a revolution (i.e., Mexico, Nicaragua and Cuba) or countries which have experienced social unrest and political restructuring, such as the military dictatorships of Chile, Argentina, Uruguay and Brazil in the 1970s. Contemporary prose writers in these countries have tended to write on political themes, notably novels of political oppression, a major concern of protest literature in the latter half of the 20th century.

Spanish American poetry today is full of protest, and one need only look at the shanty towns on the outskirts of any major city to comprehend the reasons for its popularity. The contrasts between poverty and wealth in the vast majority of Latin American countries is so blatant that the poets of social protest must bear witness to the situations they observe by writing poesía testimonial (testimonial or “witnessing” poetry). The situations described usually relate to some kind of social injustice (so this poetry is also poesía social), and since the poets are generally not only deeply involved in the society that they portray but committed to a line of action, what they produce is essentially poesía comprometida (engaged poetry). And, since there is discontent with the social scene depicted, most of this poetry is likely to be poesía de protesta as well. Protest can take many forms, however, some of which involve an attempt to alter the situation by violent or undemocratic means. A poet’s work, in this instance, may therefore be categorized as revolutionaria, insurreccionista, guerrillera or subversiva (revolutionary, insurrectionist, guerrilla, or subversive). The role of poetry in the liberation struggle itself has been a crucial one, both as a force for mobilizing a collective response to occupation and domination and as a repository for popular memory and consciousness. Often this poetry written in the context of national liberation organizations and resistance movements remains singularly unavailable to the literary institutions for two reasons: its limited production and dissemination in print, and the fact that it does not conform to conventional and canonical criteria adhered to by poets in the North. The roots of Latin American protest poetry lie in the songs and poetry of the various Independence movements. Although the ideologies have changed over the years, many of the issues remain at the core of social ills: tyranny, exploitation, brutality, atrocities and injustices of all sorts. The language of praise of heroism, nobility, self-sacrifice, and physical and moral courage of the victimized in society is pitted against the denunciation of their oppressors. The epic epithets, the turns of phrase, the stock similes and heightening allusions to heroic precedent also largely are a return to that earlier period of engaged poetry, with many modern additions gaining currency in part because they are entering an accepted system for referring to events which move both audience and poet one which would not only be at the service of a cause but also, effectively, accessible to the mass audience it was meant to reach.

The idea of exposure, to desenmascarar (unmask) the realities that lie hidden beneath the façade of a democratic Latin America is the first and foremost task of writers of protest literature. But more than exposure, they see their role as educating both themselves and their audience to the subaltern Other, consisting of the marginalized segments of society who until this point had been both invisible and voiceless. The author of protest literature seeks to create a dialogue among all socioeconomic sectors of society, a public debate that ultimately leads to steps to resolve the problems inherent in the country’s social and political institutions. The concept is a radical one in that literature aspires to create “public cultures of dissent.” Mainstream bourgeois literature of the high culture gradually has begun to adapt itself to a more widespread audience, to gain a wider appeal, especially through popular theatre and poetry. As a result, self-representations of subordinated groups (such as the Chicano theatre presentations of Luis Valdez’s El Teatro Campesino) have gained in popularity as did the “forgotten” or erased histories, texts, memories, experiences, and community narratives of other marginalized groups in the society.

ELENA DE COSTA

See also entries on Augusto Boal, Ernesto Cardenal, Roque Dalton, Guerrilla Poetry, Jorge Icaza, Pablo Neruda
Further Reading

Creative Works

Critical Studies
Collazos, Oscar, et al. Literatura en la revolución y revolución en la literatura, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1971
De Costa, Elena, Collaborative Latin American Popular Theatre from Theory to Form, from Text to Stage, New York: Peter Lang, 1992
———“The Scope of Spanish American Committed Poetry,” in Homenaje a Rodolfo Grossman, Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 1977
Poética de la población marginal. Fundamentos materialistas para una historiografía estética, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Prisma Institute, 1987
Puerto Rico

19th- and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

The first three centuries of Spanish colonial rule were characterized by the production of historical texts—chronicles, accounts, letters, memoirs; e.g., Fray Íñigo Abbad’s Historia geográfica, civil, y política de la Isla de San Juan Bautista de Puerto Rico, 1788 [Geographic, Civil and Political History of the Island of San Juan Bautista de Puerto Rico]—which later Puerto Rican writers will explore in search of their cultural roots.

The word, devoid of utilitarian contingency and elevated to an artistic means of personal and collective expression, is also present in the form of a rich oral tradition. This popular tradition, a popular muse with Hispanic roots—the African-American contribution, as Efraín Barradas explains in Para entendernos: Inventario poético puertorriqueño [To Understand Ourselves: a Puerto Rican Poetic Inventory], downplayed by Hispanophiles, is also an essential part of this popular tradition. Its principal forms of expression are found in the copla (four-line stanza), the décima (ten-line stanza) its preferred vehicle, the hexasyllabic aguinaldos and villancicos (Christmas carols) and the folkloric short story with Juan Bobo, whose “bobería” is more apparent than real, as protagonist.

The first “criollo” name of note is that of María Babiana Benítez (1783(?)-1873) Puerto Rico’s first female poet. Her “La ninfa de Puerto Rico a la Justicia,” 1832, [The Nymph of Puerto Rico to Justice] reflects the influence of Spanish Neoclassical and particularly Spanish Golden Age poets, and introduces some of the major themes and attitudes of the island’s poetry: the Edenic vision of Puerto Rico, cultural Hispanophilia and political commitment.

For others, Puerto Rican literature begins with the publication of Aguinaldo puertorriqueño [Puerto Rican Carol] of 1843. It is a collective endeavor consisting of verse and prose pieces composed by a group of young writers who wished to produce an entirely indíjena (indigenous) work that would rise above the vulgares coplas de Navidad (coarse Christmas coplas). That is to say, this Primer aguinaldo [First Carol] was written by a group of aspiring literati who wanted to become the voice of an incipient bourgeoisie that, understandably, rejected the popular. Direct descendants of the Primer aguinaldo are the Album puertorriqueño [Puerto Rican Album] published in Barcelona in 1844 by a group of Puerto Rican university students, which included Manuel Alonso (182.2–89) and Santiago Vidarte (1828–48), as well as the Cancionero de Borinquen [Songbook of Borinquen] published by the same group in 1846, and the second Aguinaldo puertorriqueño which appeared in San Juan also in 1846. These works belong to a first Romantic period. They signal the beginning of a criollista attitude from which soon would arise a truly national literature.

In 1849, while still a student in Barcelona, Manuel Alonso published the first edition of El Gíbaro [The Gíbaro] the first Puerto Rican classic. This compilation of twenty-one escenas (scenes), eight in verse and thirteen in prose, eclectic with respect to genre—includes Esproncedian poems (Espronceda was a major Spanish Romantic), a sonnet, short stories with supernatural elements, descriptive romances (ballads), scenes of local color, essays in literary criticism—transcends the trivial anecdote and the picturesque detail in order to define what is Puerto Rican. Colonial society was evolving and Manuel Alonso was aware that the rural world he had captured in El Gíbaro was disappearing; he wished to leave a written record of it, but as spokesman for the liberal ideals of a rising bourgeoisie he did not bemoan its disappearance. This attitude sets him apart from the costumbrists of the first decades of the 20th century, who, after the shattering events of 1898 sought spiritual strength and support in the past.

Full blown Romanticism—as was the case in Spain—was a late arrival in Puerto Rico, and then, due to the stifling colonial censorship, was deprived of its revolutionary thrust. It coexisted with Neoclassicism, and actually gave way to its reincidence after the death of the two leading Romantic figures, Alejandro Tapia y Rivera (1826–82) and José Gautier Benítez (1851–80). Romanticism, particularly in the prose genres has been characterized as “escapist,” inclined toward exotic themes, settings and characters. Yet this superficial exoticism veils multiple allusions to Puerto Rican reality of the time, and Romanticism’s affinity for bygone epochs results in works that recreate the island’s indigenous past.

Alejandro Tapia y Rivera was Puerto Rico’s first great man of letters. He was the creator of Puerto Rican theater, the island’s first novelist, a serious historian and a fine poet. He is best known for his plays, among them Bernardo de Palissy o El heroísmo del trabajo [Bernardo de Palissy or the Heroism of Work], staged in 1857, considered the best of his dramas, and La cuarterona [The Quadroon Woman], published in 1867, which dealt with the subject of racial prejudice, his only play with a contemporary Caribbean setting. Tapia published, in Madrid in 1878, a long epic-philosophical poem, “La Sataniada” [The Sataniade], dedicated to Lucifer, in which Tapia attempts to summarize his vision of the world. He is Puerto Rico’s most noted Romantic novelist. In 1848 he wrote El heliotropo [The Heliotrope], a short romantically impassioned narrative and in 1862 produced as part of a collection of diverse works entitled El bardo de Guamaní [The Bard of Guamaní], the leyenda (legend), La palma del cacique [The Cacique’s Palm], which recreates the conflicts between Indians and Spaniards during the conquest of the island. El bardo de Guamaní also includes Tapia’s first novel La antigua sirena [The Ancient Siren], set in medieval Venice. La leyenda de los veinte años, 1874 [The Legend of the Twenty Years], a narration of conflictive love, displays genuine emotion for the Puerto Rican landscape. The novel Cofresí (1876), is a work which relies on invention and does not contribute any historical facts to the biography of the protagonist, the Puerto Rican pirate of the same name. In 1872 Tapia published one of his best novels, Póstumo el transmigrado [Póstumo the Transmigrated] on the transmigration of souls. Its sequel, Póstumo el envirginado, 1882 [Póstumo the Envirgined] is a novelized argument in favor of women’s rights. Finally, in 1880, he published two short novels of spiritually refined love, Enardo y Rosael, which again takes up the theme of the transmigration of souls, and A orillas del Rhin [On the Banks of the Rhine].

The first important lyric poet in the history of Puerto Rican literature is José Gautier Benítez. His two major themes are love and country. Patriotic emotion inspired his most original and lasting work, the poems “Ausencia,” [Absence], “Regreso” [Return] and “Canto a Puerto Rico [Song to Puerto Rico]. In his representation of nature as voluptuous and gentle, Gautier Benítez sings to the Edenic landscape of Borinquen, a major theme of Puerto Rico’s lyric poets, as for instance in Santiago Vidarte’s “Insomnio” [Insomnia].

As stated earlier, the deaths of Tapia and Gautier Benítez marked the beginning of a period in which a Neoclassical reaction coexists with Romanticism and pre-Modernismo.
José Gualberto Padilla (1829–96), popularly known as “El Caribe,” was the so-called “capitán del antirromanticismo” (captain of anti-Romanticism) due to his fondness for Spanish Golden Age poetry, his devotion to satire and his view that art has a social or pedagogical function. He is best remembered for his unfinished “Canto a Puerto Rico” [Song for Puerto Rico], the first attempt to synthesize the material, historical and spiritual essence of his homeland.

Puerto Rico’s most distinguished 19th-century lyric poet is Lola Rodríguez de Tío (1843–1924). The Romanticism of her three works, Mis cantares, 1876 [My Songs], Claros y nieblas, 1885 [Bright Intervals and Mist], and Mi libro de Cuba, 1893 [My Book on Cuba]—is tempered by her imitation of Spanish Golden Age poets and her use of the traditional copla. The resulting simplicity of some of her octosyllabic quatrains makes her a precursor of José Martí’s Versos sencillos [Simple Verses], although she never identified herself with the new modernista sensibility, finding her most enduring inspiration precisely in the popular poetry that the new sensibility rejected in favor of more cosmopolitan and aristocratic refinements.

Francisco Gonzalo Marín (Pachín) was a 19th-century soldier-poet. Pachín Marín’s commitment to the independence of his homeland, whether in a tone of exalted romanticism, or as in his later poems in Romances, 1892 [Ballads], closer to Martí’s Versos sencillos, is his main theme.

A third literary current coexisted with Neoclassicism and Romanticism—the “criollismo” initiated by Manuel Alonso in 1849 with El Gíbaro. Criollismo (Creolism) encompassed all varieties of realism in Puerto Rican letters, including Costumbrism, Naturalism and the new Social Realism that characterized the “Generación del 30” [Generation of the 1930s] in the 20th century. The most representative author of this costumbrist version of Realism of the end of the century was Manuel Fernández Juncos (1846–1928). His “cuadros de costumbres,” published in newspapers, were later compiled in the following volumes: Tipos y caracteres, 1882 [Types and Characters], Costumbres y tradiciones, 1883 [Customs and Traditions], Cuentos y narraciones, 1907 [Stories and Narrations] and La última hornada, 1928 [The Last Batch].

Before continuing with the “Generation of 1898,” a brief allusion should be made to the greatest figure in Puerto Rico’s cultural history: Eugenio María de Hostos. Hostos wrote on politics, pedagogy, sociology, philosophy, morals, law, economics, history, literary criticism, biography; he practiced all literary forms, especially the treatise and the essay. The one work we need mention here is his novel Peregrinación de Bayoán, 1863 [The Pilgrimage of Bayoán] written in the form of a diary. Bayoán is basically a Romantic work which criticizes the evils of the Spanish colonial regime in the Caribbean, and proposes a confederation, symbolized by the names of its characters: Bayoán (Puerto Rico), Darién (Cuba) and Guarionex (Santo Domingo).

It is entirely appropriate as José Luis González proposes in Literatura y sociedad en Puerto Rico to speak of a “Generation of 1898” not only in regards to Spain, but also in reference to Puerto Rican literature. For both countries the Spanish-American War had disastrous consequences. For Spain it marked the culmination of a process of decadence, for Puerto Rico it meant that its protracted struggle for liberty was thwarted precisely when a resolution was in sight. In literary terms the effect was similar in Spain and Puerto Rico: a rejection of the purely aesthetic proposals of Modernismo. Pure literary concerns were set aside in order to ponder the more pressing question of what was to become of Puerto Rico politically. “Modernismo” in Puerto Rico is principally “Americanist” or militant. Another phenomenon of capital importance in the intellectual life of the country and which will persist well into the future is the spiritual return to Spain as a defensive reaction against the denaturalizing policies of the new colonial regime.

Among the narrators the major figure of this generation was Manuel Zeno Gandía (1855–1930). Although he is often classified as a Naturalist writer and imitator of Zola, in fact it is only La charca, 1894 [The Mud Pool], the second in a series of four novels subtitled Crónicas de un mundo enfermo [Chronicles of a Sick World], that is markedly naturalistic à la Zola. In fact, Zeno Gandía’s novels are closer to the Realism of Stendhal and Flaubert, and of Pardo Bazán and Galdós, and the Naturalism present in the first novel of the series Garduña—published in 1896, but written in 1890—and La charca is totally absent from the last two novels El negocio, 1922, [The Business] and Redentores, 1925 [Redeemers]. Zeno Gandía exposes the illnesses of the society of his time believing, as did Zola, in the redeeming purpose of art. During the long hiatus between Garduña and the last two novels, Zeno Gandía dedicated himself to the struggle for Puerto Rican independence. Disillusioned, he decided to continue his Crónicas. Redentores [Redeemers] is a bitter denunciation of the political situation of the island under United States sovereignty.

Among the poets José de Diego (1866–1918) best exemplifies this position. De Diego does not reproach Modernismo its formal and linguistic innovations, many of which he employed brilliantly in his own work, but rather, that in its early escapism, it led poets away from their patriotic sentiments and ideals. His third book, Cantos de rebeldía, 1916 [Songs of Rebellion] crystallizes his aesthetic and political ideals. All complementary themes in his work—Hispanism, Latinism, etc.—derive from one central motif, achieving Puerto Rican independence.

The other outstanding modernista poet was Luis Lloréns Torres (1876(?)–1944). As its editor, his name is linked to La Revista de las Antillas (1913–14), a publication that encouraged and promoted the modernista poets. Lloréns Torres is a modernista of the second movement, that is, of the Americanist variant. For this reason his models are Santos Chocano, Darío and, above all, Whitman. He brings together the Creolism of Alonso, the patriotic lyricism of Gautier Benítez and the defensive Hispanophilia of De Diego. On the one hand, Lloréns Torres is remembered for the soaring eloquence, reminiscent of Whitman, of his “Canción de las Antillas” [Song of the Antilles], and on the other, for his masterful use of the décima.

It was also Lloréns Torres who attempted to transcend Modernismo in Puerto Rico with two -isms which he put forward in Sonetos sinfónicos, 1914 [Symphonic Sonnets]: pancalismo (todo-belleza) [all beauty] and panedismo (todoverso) [all verse], under the sign of Whitman and Darío, respectively.

The first post-war attempt at a literary movement was diepalismo—this name combines the first syllable of the last names of its initiators, J.I.de Diego Padró (1899–1974) and Luis Palés Matos (1898–1959). Begun in 1921, its innovation was to replace logic with phonetic value, utilizing onomatopoeia as the only basis for its new poetry. Although it lacked followers, Palés Matos continued cultivating the onomatopoeia in his negrista poems. Palés Matos is best remembered as initiator of this Caribbean movement with Tuntún de pasa y grifería (1937). A better fate awaited the Noísta group let by Evaristo Ribera Chevremont (1896–1976), who, on his return from Spain in 1924, began to disseminate the new aesthetic theories current in Europe. In addition, as was the case with many other avant-garde poets, given the patriotic fervor created by Pedro Albizu Campos (1891–1965) and his Partido Nacionalista Puertorriqueño during the decade of the 1930s, Rivera Chevremont combined formal experimentation with thematic nationalism. The successor to noísmo was atalayismo (1929–c.36), which gathered strength during the 1930s, again combining formal innovations with political commitment, as for example in the work of Clemente Soto Vélez. Atalayismo produced some notable works: Graciani Miranda Archilla’s Responsos a mis poemas naífragos, 1930 [Responses to My Castaway Poems], Fernando González Alberty’s Grito, 1931 [Scream] and Luis Hernández Aquino’s Niebla lírica, 1931 [Lyrical Fog]. Hernández Aquino (1907–88), author of Isla para la angustia, 1943 [An Island for Anguish]—and Samuel Lugo (1905–85), are key figures in the next movement, integralismo, which parts company with the other expressions of the avant-garde, in that it is a movement affirming Puerto Rican and Hispanic values in the face of the hegemony achieved by the cultural presence of the United States. Trascendentalismo, with its most representative poet, Félix Franco Oppenheimer (1912–), opposed the materialistic euphoria enjoyed by those in favor of the Estado Libre Asociado [Commonwealth], by striking a religious note, in an attempt to elevate man to a more spiritual plane.

Three poets who belonged to this period, but who transcended any particular movement are Julia de Burgos (1914–53), Juan Antonio Corretjer (1908–85) and Francisco Matos Paoli (b. 1915). Julia de Burgos’s work is a bridge that links the late vanguard of the 1930s with the existentialist anguish of the 1950s. In the final analysis, the strength of her poetry is that it is deeply personal: the principal theme of the poetry of Julia de Burgos is Julia de Burgos. All other themes—nature, death, country—are subordinated to the poet’s ego. Her poetry prefigures the strong feminine and feminist current that began in the 1960s, as well as the literature of the Puerto Rican immigrants in New York. The poetry of Juan Antonio Corretjer also spans several decades. Beginning with the Neocreolist affirmation of “Regresemos a la montaña,” 1929 [Let’s Return to the Mountain] his work can be characterized as an attempt to reconstruct a lost Edenic world. It is this creation of a mythical image of Puerto Rico, that makes Corretjer the national poet of Puerto Rico. Francisco Matos Paoli also defies classification in terms of generation or literary movement. He practiced a hermetic or pure poetry, which nevertheless shares with Puerto Rican literature one central theme: political commitment.

Zeno Gandía’s successor is Enrique A. Laguerre (b. 1906) the most important novelist of the Generation of the 1930s. This group of writers formed the first literary movement to come together as a conscious expression of the national will. The members of this generation clearly perceived the threat posed to Puerto Rican cultural integrity by the cultural influence of the United States and concurred on the need to look for the authentically autochthonous, to delve into the past in order to find the living roots of what is truly Puerto Rican, to denounce debasing influences in order to plan a future course of action for the country. The Generation of the Thirties is dominated by essayists, the most influential being Antonio S. Pedreira (1898–1939) and Tomás Blanco (b. 1900), whose Insularismo, 1934 [Insularism] and Prontuario histórico de Puerto Rico, 1935 [Historical Handbook of Puerto Rico], respectively, were the first attempts to articulate Puerto Rico’s historical conscience. Its literary activity centers on the Department of Hispanic Studies of the University of Puerto Rico, founded in 1927, and is given momentum by Índice (1929–31) the history, literature, arts and sciences monthly journal founded by Pedreira and others.

The death of Zeno Gandía in 1930 left a void in terms of the novel which is filled by Laguerre. Olga Casanova in La novela puertorriqueña contemporánea divides Laguerre’s novels in two groupings. The first includes La llamarada, 1935 [The Blaze], Solar Montoya, 1941 [Montoya Plantation], La resaca, 1949 [The Undertow] and to a certain degree Los dedos de la mano, 1951 [The Fingers of the Hand]. The second is composed of El 30 de febrero, 1943 [The 30th of February], La ceiba en el tiesto, 1956 [The Ceiba Tree in the Flowerpot], El laberinto, 1959 [The Labyrinth], Cauce sin río, 1962 [Riverbed without a River], El fuego y su aire, 1970 [The Fire and Its Air], and Los amos benévulos, 1976 [The Benevolent Masters]. More recently Laguerre has published Infiernos privados, 1986 [Private Hells], Por boca de los caracoles, 1990 [Through the Mouth of Sea Shells], and Los gemelos, 1992 [The Twins]. The first grouping is characterized by the telluric theme, the rural setting and the jíbaro (Puerto Rican peasant) and his vicissitudes. In the second, responding to Puerto Rico’s industrialization and urbanization and rapidly growing urban middle class, the city is the dominant setting. The first novels clearly show the influence of the Spanish American regionalist novel, whereas by the time of El laberinto Laguerre begins to utilize some of the narrative techniques used by Faulkner, Hemingway and Joyce, and El fuego y su aire and Los amos benévulos are in line with the formal experimentation of the Boom.

In contrast with the Generation of the 1930s, the “Generación del 50” (Generation of the 1950s) is best represented not by essayists, but by fiction writers. It includes Abelardo Díaz Alfaro (b. 1919), René Marqués (1919–79), José Luis González (b. 1926), Pedro Juan Soto (b. 1928) and Emilio Díaz Valcárcel (b. 1929). José Luis González may very well be the central figure of the group. Not only is he considered as the initiator of this generation by all of its members who acknowledge their debt to him for having been the first to publish innovative stories—En la sombra, 1943 [In the Shadow] appeared when he was only seventeen, followed by Cinco cuentos de sangre, 1945 [Five Blood Stories] and El hombre en la calle, 1948 [The Man in the Street] . The narrative of José Luis González possesses most of the characteristics that René Marqués in the prologue to his Cuentos puertorriqueños de hoy, 1958 [Present Day Puerto Rican Stories] points to as typical of the Generation of the 1950s: First, as with the Generation of the Thirties, the writers of this generation affirm “lo puertorriqueño,” but they go beyond the emphasis on the local in order to adopt a more “universal” posture. Social and political concerns are present, but these writers are more interested in Man’s psychological and metaphysical problems. Certain new themes are incorporated into Puerto Rican literature: sex, solitude, death, incommunication, etc. Second, costumbrism and descriptions of nature disappear or play an insignificant role. We are now dealing with the life of the urban dweller, and also with the lives of Puerto Ricans who live abroad: New York, Korea, Spain, etc. Third, these writers attempt an objective approach to contemporary problems—alienation, rootlessness, the search for identity. Finally, they are concerned with formal and stylistic innovations inspired by the aesthetic and literary tendencies in France, England and especially in the United States—Faulkner, Hemingway, Steinbeck, Dos Passos. These very same foreign writers are also influential in the rest of Spanish America, and therefore, there is a resulting affinity between Puerto Rican and Spanish American authors. The combination of formal innovations, a preoccupation with man’s existential problems, and political commitment and social concerns—the protagonists of the works are often a reflection of the author who acts as a witness of the times—places Puerto Rican literature, and particularly narrative, within the literary current which will be designated as the Boom.

The next generation of Puerto Rican writers, the “Generación del 70” (Generation of the 1970s), is strong in terms of the narrative, but also in terms of the historical essay. A new wave of historians attempts to complete and reassess the historical record: Guillermo A. Baralt, Esclavos rebeldes, 1982 [Rebellious Slaves], Fernando Picó, Libertad y servidumbre en el Puerto Rico del siglo XIX, 1979 [Liberty and Servitude in 19th-Century Puerto Rico] and Amargo café, 1981 [Bitter Coffee], Ángel Quintero Rivera, Conflictos de clases y política en Puerto Rico, 1977 [Class Conflicts and Politics in Puerto Rico], to mention just a few. This concern with reevaluating history, already present in the Boom, has resurfaced in Post-Boom narrative as a mini-boom of the historical novel, to which Puerto Rico has made its own contribution in three novels by Edgardo Rodríguez Juliá, La renuncia del héroe Baltasar [The Resignation of Hero Baltasar], La noche oscura del Niño Avilés, 1981 [The Dark Night of Niño Avilés] and El camino de Yyaloide [The Yyaloide Road], which describe 18th-century society on the island as demographically and culturally African-Caribbean. Perhaps the volume of essays El país de cuatro pisos, 1980 [The Country of Four Floors] by José Luis González best exemplifies this reevaluation of history and culture. González demonstrates how the dominant class has perpetrated a hoax by imposing its culture, the product of the patrician lifestyles of the coffee “hacendados,” as the totality of Puerto Rican culture—the danza as the typical musical and dance form, the jíbaro and the telluric as the main themes in literature. This generation of writers revindicates the African-Caribbean and the popular as the predominant components of the island’s culture, whether in the novels of Luis Rafael Sánchez—La guaracha del Macho Camacho, 1976 (Macho Camacho’s Beat), La importancia de llamarse Daniel Santos, 1988 [The Importance of Being Called Daniel Santos]—or in the chronicles of Edgardo Rodríguez Juliá—Las tribulaciones de Jonás, 1981 [The Tribulations of Jonás], El entierro de Cortijo, 1983 [Cortijo’s Funeral], Una noche con Iris Chacón, 1986 [A Night with Iris Chacón], Puertorriqueños, 1988 [Puerto Ricans], El cruce de la Bahía de Guánica, 1989 [The Crossing of Guánica Bay]—or in the short stories of José Antonio Ramos, for instance in his character Papo Impala. On the other hand, Juan G. Gelpí in Literatura y paternalismo en Puerto Rico sees Luis Rafael Sánchez and Edgardo Rodríguez Juliá as transitional figures inasmuch as they continue the magisterial inflection, the paternalistic discourse of Pedreira and Marqués. Gelpí sees the short stories of Edgardo Sanabria Santaliz—El día que el hombre pisó la luna, 1984 [The Day Man Stepped on the Moon]—and the novel Felices días, tío Sergio, 1986 [Happy Days, Uncle Sergio] by Magali García Ramis as works of “aprendizaje” (apprenticeship) in which the paternal figure is dead, absent or is replaced as in the case of Ramis’s novel, by a homosexual. For Gelpí the three writers who best exemplify the break with the paternalistic canon are: Manuel Ramos Otero, El cuento de la Mujer de Mar, 1979 [The Story of the Woman of the Sea] with its themes of exile in New York and homosexuality—Rosario Ferré (b. 1942), Papeles de Pandora, 1976 (The Youngest Doll), with its representation of feminine eroticism and its repression by patriarchal discourse—Ana Lydia Vega (b. 1946), Virgenes y mártires, 1981 [Virgins and Martyrs], co-authored with Carmen Lugo Filippi, and Encancaranublado y otros cuentos de naufragio, 1982, [Encancaranublado and Other Castaway Stories]—whose writing on day-to-day ironies and humorous incidents break with the linguistic puritanism, seriousness and pessimism of the paternalistic canon.

Since the 1960s poetry has assumed new forms of representation and attempted renovation based on a political and ideological act of faith. The poets of the 1960s came together around two magazines Guajana (1962–78) and Mester (1967–70). Guajana, founded by university students and edited by Vicente Rodríguez Nietzsche (b. 1942.) is the more important of the two. Under the influence of the Cuban Revolution, these politicized poets saw their poetry as a weapon to be used for the liberation of their people. Literature must start by reinforcing the national culture as a pre-requisite for the liquidation of colonialism. On the one hand, these poets saw their “realist” poetry as breaking with the “pure” poetry of their immediate predecessors. On the other hand, Guajana dedicated issues to those poets who preceded them in the struggle, such as Luis Llorén Torres, Luis Palés Matos and Julia de Burgos. Ultimately, though, much of the poetry which appeared in Guajana fell outside the political ideology of the publication. The poets of Mester agree essentially with the position of the poets of Guajana: the idea of culture as the foundation of the national. Some of the major poetic figures of this decade are: Andrés Castro Ríos (b. 1942), Marina Arzola (1939–76), Marcos Rodriguez Frese (b. 1941), Juan Saez Burgos (b. 1943) and Ángela María Dávila (b. 1944).

The 1970s were also characterized by the influence of two literary magazines, Ventana (1972–77) [Window]—founded by José Luis Vega (b. 1948) and other young poets— which appeared regularly for a year and a half, and after that only irregularly, and Zona de carga y descarga, (1972–75) [Loading and Unloading Zone]. The editors of Ventana, in contrast to those of Guajana and Mester, defended the view that ideology ought not to occupy the entire focus of the poetic work, and that instead a balance should prevail between historical necessity and creative freedom. In contrast to Guajana, Mester and Ventana, which concentrated on poetry, Zona placed equal emphasis on other genres, and also represented an opening to new currents in literary criticism, and a modernization of a critical apparatus still too closely linked to Hispanism. Zona also included works by writers from other Spanish American countries such as Vargas Llosa, Donoso, Lezama Lima and Sarduy, who served as models for liberation and transformation while expanding the island’s literary frontiers. In essence, Zona, like Ventana, rejected the type of literature whose political commitment lead to a neglect of form and an impoverishment of content, advancing the view that Puerto Rican reality in all its complexity can best be explored through the personal dimensions of poetic imagination. Nevertheless, the poets of the 1970s and 1980s show elements of continuity with the social symbols of Puerto Rico’s literary tradition. Some of the most important poets of the period are Edwin Reyes (b. 1944), Iván Silén (b. 1944)—Los poemas de Fili-Melé, 1976 [The Poems of Fili-Melé]—Rosario Ferré—Fábulas de la garza desangrada, 1982 [Fables of the Bleeding Heron], where Ferré destroys myths that keep in place the social and cultural obligations which nullify women as true human beings—Olga Nolla and Luz Ivonne Ochart. The 1980s saw the publication of the poetry of José Luis Vega, Jorge A.Morales, Aurea María Sotomayor, Vanessa Droz and Manuel Ramos Otero. Among these writers poetry achieves a radical liberation, imposing itself on the basis of authenticity, as a discourse of imagination and desire. In poetry the general movement... over these last three decades has been towards the personal and the intimate without rejecting the political paradigms and the struggle for social justice.

BENJAMÍN TORRES CABALLERO

See also entries on Rosario Ferré, René Marqués, Puerto Rican Writing in the United States, Luis Rafael Sánchez, Ana Lydia Vega

Further Reading

Casanova, Olga, La novela puertorriqueña contemporánea. Los albores de un decir (Hasta 1975), San Juan, Puerto Rico: Instituto de Cultura Puertorriqueña, 1986

González, José Emilio, La poesía contemporánea de Puerto Rico (1930–1960), San Juan, Puerto Rico: Instituto de Cultura Puertorriqueña, 1972

González, José Luis, Literatura y sociedad en Puerto Rico (De los cronistas de Indias a la generación del 98), Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1976

Anthologies

Marqués, René (editor), Cuentos puertorriqueños de hoy, San Juan: Club del Libro de Puerto Rico, 1959

Bibliographies and Dictionaries

Special Issues of Journals
Revista Iberoamericana, vol. 59/162–63 (January-June 1993)

Puerto Rican Writing in the United States

While the first major corpus of texts by Puerto Ricans in the United States took shape in the 1960s with what is known as Nuyorican literature (writing by Puerto Ricans living in New York City), it should be noted that the first Puerto Ricans to write about the mainland experience were those who arrived in the 19th century as political exiles of Spanish colonial rule. However, Jesús Colón and Bernardo Vega are generally considered the earliest Nuyorican writers in that they did not visit the mainland as members of the exile community to reside in New York temporarily; they arrived in the opening decades of the 20th century with the large wave of immigrants that followed US colonial intervention and remained for most of their lives employed in the cigar industry and as journalists, participating in labor movements and local politics. Thus, both were involved in the everyday life of their community and their works comprise a committed documentation of the growth of that community.

Although published in 1977, Vega’s autobiographical Memorias de Bernardo Vega [Memoirs of Bernardo Vega] was written in the 1940s and attests to the experience of the immigrant population between the first and second world wars. Vega contributed to newspapers and ran his own weekly, Gráfico [Graphic] from 1927 until 1931. Colón’s articles appeared in organs such as El Nuevo Mundo [The New World], Pueblos Hispanos [Hispanic Communities], Liberación [Liberation] and The Daily Worker. His Memories of a Puerto Rican in New York (1961), includes pieces from “As I see it from here,” his column in The Daily Worker. These pieces are important in terms of their expression of a tranethnic solidarity with the racially oppressed and the working classes. A second volume of Colón’s essays, The Way It Was and Other Writings, was published in 1993.

By 1950, one third of the population of Puerto Rico had relocated to places as far afield as New York City and Hawaii. In addition to heavy industrialization which drained resources and caused environmental damage, the island endured other negative by-products of US colonialism ranging from cultural subjugation and assimilation to the imposition of the English language and the enforced sterilization of sectors of its female population. Such traumatic factors have indelibly marked the history both of Puerto Rico and its migrant population in the US. The literary production of the diaspora is inextricably linked to the experience of colonization as well as to the intensified experience of discrimination and poverty which accompanies the minority experience in the US. After World War II, the principal factor to impact the US Puerto Rican community and its cultural production was the boom in migration of workers to the mainland coinciding with the period of Operation Bootstrap. This large scale influx radically altered the identity of the existing Puerto Rican community, much as the Mariel generation was to do in the case of US Cubans. While the preceding wave of emigrants of the early 20th century consisted, predominantly, of artisans and laborers, the late 1940s and 1950s saw the arrival of what was largely an unskilled rural underclass.

Not surprisingly, the boom in migration became a central theme in the national literature of Puerto Rico. René Marqués’s drama La carreta, 1963 (The Oxcart) and Pedro Juan Soto’s novel Spiks (1954) are arguably the best examples of this tendency and derive from the authors’ direct experience of the New York community. In addition to the thematization of the diaspora in narrative and drama, works by island poets such as Julia de Burgos, Clemente Soto Vélez and Juan Antonio Corretjer drew on a first-hand experience of life in New York in the 1940s. Although island writers had direct knowledge of the migrant life, their works constitute a literature about the US Puerto Rican community, not a literature produced by the latter. Texts by authors such as Soto and Marqués may be characterized by their reductionist representation of the immigrant experience and by a failure to recreate the linguistic singularity of the urban community. A sense of unfamiliarity and distance arises especially from their use of a standard Spanish which does not reflect the emergent US Puerto Rican bilinguality and interlinguality. Yet, since the US Puerto Rican experience had hitherto been rendered, for the most part only in autobiographical and journalistic writings, the island authors are important in that they provide the first accomplished literary treatments of that mainland experience.

In further contrast with island writings of the 1950s about life in New York, one of the first works to offer a more faithful representation of the city community is Guillermo Cotto-Thorner’s Trópico en Manhattan (1960). The significance of this novel lies in its reproduction of the interlingual and neologistic texture of spoken language which the author explains in a glossary entitled “Neorkismos”. In this way, he displays both a familiarity with US Puerto Rican language and a recognition of the importance of the latter as a vital aspect of the cultural identity of the community. Indeed, Cotto-Thorner’s portrayal of the New York Puerto Ricans occupies a transitional position in that it prefigures the kind of writing which boomed at the end of 1960s, when Nuyorican literature proper first emerged as an identifiable body of literary works.

The narrative of the late 1960s and early 1970s followed in the tradition of the autobiographical mode favored by the early writers of the New York experience such as Colón and Vega. Among the first novels are Island in Harlem (1966) by Manuel Manrique, Run Baby Run (1968) by Nicky Cruz, Frankie Cristo (1972) by Humberto Cintrón, Carlito’s Way (1975) by Edwin Torres and Nobody’s Hero (1976) by Lefty Barreto. Set largely in the ghetto, these works deal with the issue of identity in the context of their characters’ involvement in street gangs. Island in Harlem is noteworthy for its focus on racial differences within the Puerto Rican community in terms of the conflict between its black protagonist and his white rival. Of the early novels, the most accomplished work, one also dealing with the experience of a dark-skinned Puerto Rican, is Piri Thomas’s Down These Mean Streets (1967). In the latter, the narrator recounts his early life in Harlem and an involvement with gangs, violence and drugs leading to eventual imprisonment. Thomas’s account is continued in subsequent works, Savior, Savior, Hold My Hand (1972) and Seven Long Times (1975).

Through the 1980s and 1990s, with works such as Family Instalments: Memories of Growing Up Hispanic (1982) by Edward Rivera and Eldorado in East Harlem (1992) by Victor Rodriguez, US Puerto Rican narrative is characterizable primarily by its representation of barrio life and by its concern for issues of ethnic identity and community. Especially notable in US Puerto Rican narrative has been the contribution of women authors. One of the leading prose writers is Nicolasa Mohr who, in works such as Nilda (1973), El Bronx Remembered (1975), In Nueva York (1977) and Rituals of Survival (1985), explores the woman’s experience within the Nuyorican community. While Mohr provides a significant feminist perspective on the latter, Georgia-based Judith Ortiz Cofer treats a different context of the Puerto Rican experience. In Silent Dancing (1990) she documents a childhood divided between Puerto Rico and New Jersey, while her first novel, The Line of the Sun (1989), focuses more exclusively on the Puerto Rican community in New Jersey. Another outstanding contribution to the corpus of prose by US Puerto Rican women writers is the recent work by Esmeralda Santiago, When I Was Puerto Rican (1992).

Like narrative, US Puerto Rican poetry derives primarily from the localized context of New York yet, unlike narrative, it is a genre linked with the period of political protest in the 1960s. Given its possibilities as a performative genre, poetry provided a means for the communication of socio-political concerns during the protest period. Within that politicized climate, those figures who were to become the major poets of the 1970s and 1980s, such as Miguel Algarín and Pedro Pietri, were involved in activism for the improvement of the situation of US Puerto Ricans. In the late 1960s, the alliance of a political agenda with cultural production is concretized by the opening of Algarín’s Nuyorican Poet’s Café and El Taller Boricua [The Boricua Workshop]. Both comprised spaces in which political discussion was fomented and poetry conceived and performed in such a way that the two were inseparable. The coexistence of the ideological and the aesthetic, and its embodiment in a performative medium, is a salient characteristic of the works of some of today’s better known poets such as Tato Laviera, Algarín and Pietri. Pietri’s Puerto Rican Obituary (1973) was among the first collections to be published and treats the everyday struggle of the urban, ethnic community. The collectively-oriented writing of the streets pioneered by Pietri marks a common practice in poetry of the 1970s and is exemplified in the works of others such as Dadi Piñero, Jack Agueros, José Antonio Figueroa, Jesus Papoleto Menéndez and Felipe Luciano.

In addition to their thematization of the situation of the ethnic community and their articulation of the urban context, respective works by Algarín and Laviera such as Mongo Affair (1979) and La carreta Made a U-Turn, 1979 [The Oxcart Made a U-Turn] merit attention in terms of their incorporation of African-Caribbean rhythm so as to enhance their performative quality. Moreover, in collections such as Algarín’s Mongo Affair and Miguel Piñero’s La Bodega Sold Dreams (1980), while the focus is the Nuyorican community, both poets express the transthetic solidarity shown by Jesús Colón. Their notion of community derives from the barrio yet exceeds the confines of the latter as alliances are forged across ethnic and racial boundaries. In works such as Body Bee Calling from the Twenty First Century (1982), Algarín moves away from the collective, objective focus of his earlier poetry but continues to explore issues of identity and community through a subjective and abstract meditation on his own corporeality. That introspective tone which departs from the collectivist sensibility of the early poetry is characteristic of the work of one of the most renowned US Puerto Rican poets, Victor Hernández Cruz. While other poets of the late 1960s and early 1970s were largely ignored by mainstream presses, Hernández Cruz published his second volume Snaps in 1968 with Random House and, in collections such as Mainland (1973), Tropicalization (1976) and By Lingual Wholes (1982), he has continued to produce highly subjective and sophisticated poetry. Yet, Hernández Cruz’s work stands alongside that of his contemporaries as a vital contribution to the US Puerto Rican tradition and finds resonance with the latter specifically in terms of his use of rhythm and interlinguality.

Recent poetry by women constitutes another strand in a diverse US Puerto Rican tradition. Foremost among women poets are Sandra María Esteves, Aurora Levinson-Morales and Rosario Morales. The collaborative work of the latter two, Getting Home Alive (1986), articulates a communal sense of identity and solidarity given by a textual linkage of varied ethnic, racial and socio-economic contexts in the spirit of Jesús Colón. Their work depicts a community derived from an assemblage of associated differences underlain by a pan-American, pan-Latina and pan-ethnic feminism. Similarly, in Yerba Buena (1980) and Bluestown Mockingbird Mambo (1990), Sandra María Esteves explores the problematics of self-representation in the contexts of ethnicity and gender. Especially significant is Esteves’s poem “A Julia y a mí” [To Julia and Me] which establishes a connection with island poet Julia de Burgos and stresses the importance of the latter for contemporary US Puerto Rican writers. The tendency towards the articulation of a pan-Latino consciousness in US Puerto Rican poetry is also seen in the work of Martín Espada. In Trumpets from the Islands of Their Eviction (1987) and Rebellion is the Circle of a Lover’s Hands (1990), Espada foregrounds a concern for the situation of US Latinos. Evidence of his solidarity and of his desire to be accessible to Spanish speakers is the publication of a bilingual edition of the latter work.

Interestingly, much of the poetry by US Puerto Ricans written in Spanish does not emphasize a commitment to the plight of working-class Puerto Ricans, nor does it engage so directly in questions concerned with the collective. Works such as Después del suicidio, 1970 [After the Suicide] by Iván Silén, Una puertorriqueña en Penna, 1974 [A Puerto Rican Woman in Pennsylvania] by Luz María Umbierre and, more recently, La voz de mujer que llevo adentro, 1990 [The Woman’s Voice which I Carry Within] by Alfredo Villanueva Collado, rarely address the urban context of the Puerto Rican experience or the issues of identity, discrimination and oppression which have traditionally accompanied that experience. Like Hernández Cruz, these writers opt for a more subjective focus which, nevertheless, serves in turn to enrich and diversify the US Puerto Rican tradition of which they undoubtedly form a part.

WILSON NEATE

Further Reading

Critical Studies

Bibliographies and Anthologies

Barradas, Efrain and Rafael Rodríguez (editors), Herejes y mitificadores: muestra de poesía puertorriqueña en los Estados Unidos, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Huracán, 1980

Poetry and Narrative

Labarthe, Pedro Juan, Son of Two Nations: the Private Life of a Columbia Student, New York: Carranza, 1931

Figueroa, José Ángel, East One Hundredth Street, Detroit: Broadside, 1973

Rivera, Oswald, Fire and Rain, New York: Four Walls Eight Windows, 1990

Manuel Puig 1932–1990

Argentine prose writer and dramatist

Manuel Puig’s unexpected death at the age of fifty-seven prevented him from enjoying the late explosion of popularity inspired by the success of the musical version of his best-known novel, El beso de la mujer araña, 1976 (Kiss of the Spider Woman). A hostile off-Broadway reception to this new venture had greatly distressed him during the final weeks of his life and he would almost certainly have been surprised by later events. The “massacre,” as he called it, was but one of many disappointments in a professional life that had started with a period of critical silence, probably the result of the disconcerting cinematic references in his novels, which was followed first by expressions of incomprehension and then by a wave of animosity, to say nothing of a series of devastating setbacks.

Although he did not live to bask in the recognition that he has received posthumously, albeit indirectly, he did at least witness an improvement in critical understanding of his work. It had always proved difficult to classify him and this seemed to provoke a certain distrust in his readers with regard to the quality and importance of his writings; some even saw him as a fellow-traveller of the leading players in the Latin American Boom. Since there are no stylistic or ideological bases for this view, it may have been because he was thirty-five when his first novel, La traición de Rita Hayworth, 1968 (Betrayed by Rita Hayworth), was published, too old to fit comfortably into a “junior Boom” or a “petit Boom”; and, of course, it was far too soon for the more respectable-sounding Post-Boom, to which he clearly belongs. Indeed, hindsight gives us the confidence to assert that Puig was always a postmodern writer, different, even alienated, from the great cultural-commercial narrative flowering of the 1960s.

With his avowed aversion to jargon and literary pretension, Puig himself affected an attitude of indifference towards questions of categorization; none the less, he was in fact hypersensitive to reader reception and most disturbed by what he judged misreadings of his texts. He never, as was often claimed, condemned the cursilería, or pretentious vulgarity, of some of his fictional creations, admitting instead that he found it sympathetic and touching. He was happiest with those critics who saw him as dedicated to the cause of human happiness, querying invented sources of social and interpersonal injustice, non-dogmatic, open-minded and committed to an even-handed vision of culture.

Even-handedness and open-mindedness are close neighbours of ambivalence, and in an eminently postmodern manner, he had always been a stranger to certainty. This is evident in his novels, not only in his desire for impossible reconciliations between mutually-incompatible alternatives, but also in his vision of the constitution of art and culture. His inclusion of references to the cinema, and the mass media in general, together with his faithful reproduction of the speech patterns of the lower-middle class of the River Plate area, were originally censured by critics who claimed that there was an insurmountable distance between what he was doing and “literature.” But those who later came to his defence were not immune from misconceptions either; they placed undue emphasis on the author’s passion for tangos and boleros and Hollywood melodramas and ignored his carefully-calculated references to highbrow and middlebrow cultural areas.

In the late 1980s, critics at last began to appreciate the import of his dismissal of the “great divide” between mass culture and “serious” art. He was not pitting one against the other but valuing both as indicators of human truths. It was also realized that his concern for the socially marginal, particularly women and homosexuals, was not a plea for rigid feminism or for homosexual orthodoxy. Finally, it became clear, even to those who had earlier insisted on seeing him as an enthusiastic advocate of social Utopias, that his ideology and tastes were full of contradictions and conflict and that his world-view was basically pessimistic, in spite of the heartwarming optimism he often expressed in interviews. His texts are celebrations of the deeply-moving flexibility of the human mind. as it seeks to defend itself against the intolerable constitutional rigours of life, few of which could be eliminated by increased social justice.

Perhaps the most touching example of this is found in Sangre de amor correspondido, 1982, (Blood of Requited Love), one of Puig’s least appreciated texts. In a monologue which is frequently interrupted by challenging denials of everything he affirms, an uneducated, unloved, destitute Brazilian labourer re-writes his own history, eventually settling for a swaggering, macho version of it which bears little resemblance to the facts. But he survives.

To classify Puig’s writings as lighthearted and “camp,” as some have done, is to ignore the fact that so few Puig characters do in fact survive. It is undeniable that humour sometimes is a by-product of the non-distanced irony employed by the author as he deals with his less sophisticated creations, but he does not mock them and the strong vein of naturalistic determinism in the novels tends to preclude the possibility of a happy ending.

Toto, the child-protagonist of the Bildungsroman that is La traición de Rita Hayworth does reach adulthood, but by this time he is disappointed, even cynical; Gladys, in The Buenos Aires Affair (1973), resists the temptation to kill herself but takes a sleeping-pill in order to withdraw from life; like Ana, in Pubis angelical (1979)—another survivor—she can no longer depend on her consolatory romantic convictions. Prospects for both these women are bleak. All Puig’s other protagonists die: some, like Nené in Boquitas pintadas, 1969 (Heartbreak Tango), and Ramírez in Maldición eterna a quien lea estas páginas, 1980 (Eternal Curse on the Reader of These Pages), are completely disillusioned.

It is worth noting, however, the postmodern paradox that in general Puig’s characters survive by means of hope and faith; this is true, too, in the theatrical works that he wrote in the 1980s. He is only too conscious that things will turn out badly, aware of the presence of death threatening beauty and love and enthusiasm and desire but he is determined to underline human courage, however misguided, in the face of the ineluctable.

The way he himself coped with disappointment and setbacks is proof of the survival instinct that moved him so much when he observed it in others. His early childhood in a culturally sterile town in the pampas, his difficult relationship with his father, unsatisfying periods at school, then university in Buenos Aires, and the horrors of military service strengthened a desire for the exotic which was already manifest in his love of the cinema. He set out on his travels, but did little more than wash dishes in restaurants in Italy, England and Sweden, his self-esteem dwindling. No-one was interested in his early attempts at writing, either in Europe or in Argentina, to which he returned in 1960. A year later, he won a scholarship to work at the Cinecittà but soon discovered that film-making was not to his taste, least of all when it was permeated by the intellectual Neorealist movement of the day. He was by then thirty and jobless, and he resolved to try his hand at writing another film script. This became La traición de Rita Hayworth, which he finished in the United States, where he had gone to live in 1963. Even now his life was not easy. Two publishing contracts were cancelled because of censorship problems and when, at last, La traición appeared it was not well received. However, Gallimard then brought out the French translation of Boquitas pintadas and Le Monde judged this one of the best books of the year; people began to look at its predecessor with new eyes.
Persecution in Argentina at the hands of the supporters of Juan Domingo Perón and his widow, “Isabelita,” who succeeded to the presidency of the country on her husband’s death in 1974, together with his avowed distaste for current Argentine society and, perhaps, his ever-present escapist exoticism spurred Puig to move on: to Mexico, to New York, and then to Brazil. It was in 1989 that he made his final move: back to Mexico, where he died.

In the meantime, thanks to the personal intervention of Isabelita Perón, he had received no royalties for the film of Boquitas pintadas, many of his later books had been harshly criticized (The Buenos Aires Affair was proscribed both in Argentina and in Spain), and he had suffered lack of recognition for his film scripts, some of which were changed without his permission; no-one was interested in his early work, and in his home country there actually seemed to be a vendetta against him—when El beso de la mujer araña finally appeared there, it was ignored. His theatrical ventures were not all that successful either, with the exception of Misterio del ramo de rosas, 1987 (Mystery of the Rose Bouquet), but this had to be withdrawn when the London theatre in which it was being presented was destroyed by fire. The film version of El beso de la mujer araña was indeed an international hit, but it was not to Puig’s liking. And then came the disastrous reception of the first version of the musical.

Even so, at the end of his life, however depressing the setbacks he had endured, he was fundamentally optimistic, still moved and excited by everything. In spite of his fundamental clear-sightedness, he never gave up. Like his favourite creations, he too loved and hoped, even if he did not believe.

PAMELA BACARISSE

Biography

Selected Works

Novels

Plays

Bajo un manto de estrellas, with El beso de la mujer araña, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1983; as Under a Mantle of Stars, translated by Ronald Christ, New York: Lumen, 1985; revised translation, 1993

La cara del villano; Recuerdo de Tijuana, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1985 [screenplays]

Further Reading

——“Manuel Puig’s sentimiento trágico de la vida,” World Literature Today (Autumn 1991)

Borinsky, Alicia, Ver/ser visto (Notas para una analítica poética), Barcelona: Antoni Bosch, 1978

Echavarren, Roberto and Enrique Giordano, Montaje y alteridad del sujeto, Santiago de Chile: Instituto Profesional del Pacifico, 1986
El beso de la mujer araña

Novel by Manuel Puig

It appears to be a cliché—albeit an implausible one, given the success of El beso de la mujer araña in its various metamorphoses—to complain of the difficulty involved in choosing one single text by Manuel Puig for detailed consideration. Even so, it is an unsatisfying and unsatisfactory exercise, and for more than one reason. First, Puig was far less of a one-book writer than were many of his contemporaries or immediate predecessors: in the twenty years between La traición de Rita Hayworth, 1968 (Betrayed by Rita Hayworth), and Cae la noche tropical, 1988 (Tropical Night Falling), he published six other novels and at least five, possibly all, of these are worthy of equal attention. Then there is the indisputable fact that one Puig novel does not really provide complete access to his cosmovision, which is gradually illuminated (even if not completely clarified) by the repetition of favourite themes and preoccupations and by the accumulation of intertextual cultural references that reappear and inter-relate in the different works. Finally, the relationship between the original text and the film, the musical, and even to an extent the stage version (which Puig himself wrote) of El beso de la mujer araña, is an uncomfortable one, and idiosyncratic directorial emphases and the need for reduction and elimination have served to blur the original multifaceted character of the novel. Indeed, those who come to the word from the image or the action or the music come contaminated by extraneous interpretations and assemblage, and even those whose first experience was with the written text cannot entirely escape this contamination.

Nevertheless, it has to be conceded that of all Puig’s novels it is El beso de la mujer araña which has truly captured the public imagination, possibly because this story of two Argentine men imprisoned for what is most distinctive about them (political activism in the case of Valentín, and in that of Molina a sexual orientation which has led to a charge of corruption of minors), is all things to all (wo)men. It has a suspenseful plot, with the shocking revelation halfway through that Molina is being rewarded for (theoretically) betraying Valentín, and it also includes a string of self-contained mininarratives in the form of the film plots recounted by Molina to pass the time and to project his own condition and ideology; each of these shamelessly tugs at the heartstrings while cross-referencing to the main narrative and to the other recounted films. In the end, it is the originally unappealing Molina who wins the reader’s sympathy as he falls hopelessly in love with the heterosexual Valentín; when he is released from prison, he manages to avoid betraying his cellmate, and it is Valentín’s companions in the armed political struggle who kill him. He dies not for the cause, but for love.

The novel has been classified as a plea for homosexual emancipation; a protest against political oppression; the vindication of the mass media; a search for identity; an exercise in the death-defying utilization of narrative; a demythifying picture of Buenos Aires; an elaboration on the psychosexual theories of the 1960s; a treatise on bisexuality; a celebration of pop culture—or a postmodern affirmation that mass culture and high art serve the same purpose; an investigation into “seeing” and the gulf between aesthetics and ethics; even as a defence of women. Perhaps the most important view of all is that of an emotion-starved public which has judged it the story of devoted, hopeless love, albeit in an original, not to say irregular, context.

It is certainly all of these; no one interpretation automatically invalidates the others. Indeed, the trap associated with adapting a novel for a largely visual medium lies in the need to select, eliminate and reduce, resulting in arbitrary points of focus. For example, if a film-maker wishes—as Babenco did in his 1984 movie—to underline the element of political oppression, he will change the hortus conclusus setting of a windowless prison cell, with all that it connotes, and give the public a view of the horrors taking place within the range of vision of the prisoners. Even the author himself, when adapting the book for the theatre, was obliged to select only one of Molina’s narratives, thereby suppressing the important web of cross-references that exists between this and all the others. It could be suggested that ideally El beso de la mujer araña should be read and not seen (or heard), and that it should be read as a postmodern novel, with all the insecurity and discomfort and uncertainty and sense of confusion that such a reading will inevitably produce. There is no point in seeking answers, least of all sociopolitical answers; it is difficult enough to construct a comprehensible question.

Nevertheless, there are certain clearcut narrative, symbolic and thematic points that should probably not be overlooked. How, as an example of the first category, can the reader approach the character of Molina without being aware of the futility—or, rather, impossibility—of his making meaningful vital choices? Though he is indisputably a simulacrum of a conventional pre-feminist woman, a position which might conceivably merit censure, virtually all his other circumstances have been determined for him: his love of men (though he is not, he claims, a homosexual but a woman in a man’s body); his overwhelming desire for romantic, monogamous love (at odds with his inevitable lifestyle); the uncomfortable Freudian division of his loyalties between his ailing mother and his cellmate; his impossible dream of being married to an exclusively heterosexual man; his exceptional need for beauty in a dirty and ugly world.

The symbolism of the film plots is equally significant: Molina identifies with the girl in the first, an adaptation of Cat People (1942), who turns into a wild animal when sexually aroused, and with the heroine of the second (invented) plot, Destino (Fate), who was born near the frontier between two warring countries and supports the “wrong” side for love, and for the love of beauty. Then there is the misleading appearance of the female protagonist of Molina’s version of The Enchanted Cottage (1945), with her inner beauty, virtue and culture visible only to the blind or one blinded by the magic of love, and the cabaretera (night-club singer) of the Mexican story, whose selfless motives and fidelity are misjudged by all, and who loses the man she loves. There are countless more examples of symbolic protagonists and images which connote familiar problems.

Then, although one book does not furnish enough evidence to make an exhaustive list of Puig’s favourite themes, El beso de la mujer araña indubitably highlights many of these, from cosmic injustice to social exploitation, from the need for blind faith to the essential nature of love, which solves nothing and cannot ensure a happy ending but which will make life seem to be worth living. Ultimately, perhaps, the success of all the versions of this text can be attributed to Puig’s humanitarian, non-judgmental vision of his fellow men and women as creatures who do not merit the apparently predestined suffering which is their lot and who bravely and absurdly refuse to accept that what they see around them is all there is.

PAMELA BACARISSE

Editions

Further Reading

The origins of Quechua literature date back to the age of carving petroglyphs on the craggy rock outcroppings, in the weaving of the tunics on the back strap looms, and the striking of slabs of granite from the rock quarries. Indeed, these manifestations of culture are “read” as texts when Andean scholars pause to consider the knowledge and belief systems of the Quechua peoples. Much of what is considered as literature of the Quechus is dependent on the efforts of archeologists, anthropologists, ethnohistorians and folklorists who assemble the corpus we commonly label as Quechua literature.

While Quechua peoples lacked the tradition of alphabetic writing, the Andean peoples did possess an elaborate recordkeeping device which allows us access to their cultural artifacts. An intricate set of strings and knots based on a decimal system, in the care of a specialist trained in interpretation, is the archive of the historical accounts, the literature, and the material facts of Inca civilization as it spread to the reaches of present day Ecuador, Bolivia, Chile and Argentina. Although the kipu is preserved in museum collections around the world, unfortunately, much of the knowledge it contained is irretrievable. With the death of kipu specialists in the aftermath of the Spanish invasion, what is salvaged from the colonial period is dependent on the efforts of religious and secular intellectuals who encouraged the writing down in European script the lore of the conquered Andean peoples.

Four well-known texts of Quechua literature all date from the turn of the 17th century. These few indigenous oriented texts share a common theme in describing the accommodation and resistance of indigenous peoples to Spanish rule, as well as narrating the rich cultural traditions of the Andean region. Only one manuscript, the myths of Huarochiri, is written primarily in Quechua with marginal annotations inserted in Spanish by the priest Francisco de Ávila. The thirty-one chapters and two supplements tell a narrative of a remote past, the mythic cycle of Paria caca, the invasions of Huarochiri territory by their neighbors, the Incas, and the missionary activities of the Spanish. The recent English translation of the manuscript includes an introductory essay and explanatory notes by Frank Salomon, which serve to outline the narrative strategies in the text along with descriptions of Quechua esthetics. Salomon notes that the text is a compendium of the oral and the literate traditions; the prose contains numerous markers of recorded spontaneous speech in Quechua as well as framing devices (chapters, for example) common to European books. As a result of his field work in Peru, Alejandro Ortiz Rescaniere has interwoven recent versions and supplements to the Huarochiri tales in Huarochiri, 400 años después, 1980 [Huarochiri, 400 Years Later].

We can glean from the three other indigenous colonial texts (written in Spanish) reference to the Quechua literary tradition. Garcilaso de la Vega, the son of a Spanish soldier and an Incan noblewoman, gives us examples of Quechua lyric in addition to his commentary on the training and duties of intellectuals in the empire. His Comentarios reales, 1609 (Royal Commentaries of the Incas) describes the governing of the Empire, ritual ceremonies, agriculture and the belief system existent before the moment of conquest and the changes wrought after the invasion by Europeans. Joan Santacruz Pachacuti Yamqui Sallqamaygua, in his Relación de Antigüedades deste Reyno del Pirú, 1613 [Account of the Antiquities of the Kingdom of Peru] includes many examples of ritualized Quechua speech, imploring the deities to grant the people bountiful crops, good health, and freedom from the ravages of adverse climactic events. Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala likewise preserves many of the ceremonial verses common to planting, harvest, and occasions of state and provides valuable insights through his black and white line drawings. His transcriptions of the songs in his Nueva Corónica y Buen Gobierno, 1612, (Letter to a King) attest to the importance of Quechua lyric, which was often recited accompanied by the high-pitched bleat of a sacrificial llama. Diego de Castro Titu Cusi Yupanqui’s Relación de la conquista del Perú, 1570 [Account of the Conquest of Peru], although written entirely in Spanish, nevertheless provides us with an indigenous perspective on the ravages of conquest, its aftermath, and the natives’ reaction to the European system of writing.

Other documents written by Spanish missionaries and government officials also provide examples of Quechua literature from the colonial period. Cristóbal de Molina includes a sampling of Quechua ritual verse (similar to those verses found in Santacruz Pachacuti) in his writing. Recent archival research carried out by Pierre Duviois documents additional examples of sacred prayers from the testimony of Quechua speakers who were accused of the practice of idolatry (17th century).

The Quechua drama Ollantay survives in several manuscripts (possibly dating from the 18th century) and in various translations since the 19th century. The tale of the warrior hero Ollantay who falls in love with an Incan accla (chosen woman) is more than a simple romantic narrative. The Inca Pachacuti’s refusal to allow Ollantay to marry Cusi Ccóyllur brings the elaborate political organization of Incan territory into high relief in the play, as the hero rebels against royal power that emanates from Cuzco. In fashioning this drama about rebellion, we glimpse the dissatisfaction of the peoples conquered by the Incan troops and forced to serve in campaigns to conquer others. However, the play serves to reinforce the power of the rulers from Cuzco for Ollantay is later appointed to high office by Pachacuti’s son, Cusi Ccóyllur is released from prison, and the two are permitted to reunite, along with a daughter sheltered in a convent during their long separation.

The memory of Atahualpa, the Incan ruler executed by the Spanish invader Francisco Pizarro, is promulgated in Quechua drama and poetry, with recourse to an elegiac tone. Tragedia del fin de Atawallpa [The Tragedy of the Death of Atawallpa], transcribed in 1871, contains three acts in which Atahualpa’s dream about the Spanish is interpreted, the mystery of European writing is commented upon and, finally, the Spaniards come before the Inca in his palace whereupon Pizarro plunges his sword into the Incan ruler.
The final scene in this drama depicts Pizarro doubly cursed by Spanish king and the native peoples of the Andes, leading to his death at the close of the play. Such just retribution is not found in two other wellknown poems: “Apu Inka Atawallpaman” [For the Inca Atahualpa] and “Atawallpa wañuy” [The Death of Atahualpa]. Both versions lament the cruel circumstances of the ruler’s demise and convey despair at what the future may hold for the conquered peoples. A version of the drama of conquest is still colorfully performed in Oruru, Bolivia, every year where Atahualpa’s death occupies central stage. In addition, in the collected myths about Inkarri, a composite Atahualpa figure, a millennial subtext is revealed; Inkarri, beheaded by the Spanish, will return to lead his people out of poverty and subjugation when his buried head and his buried body grow back together again to form one whole piece.

For José María Arguedas this tragic, cosmic anguish is frequently expressed in Quechua poetry and prose after the death of Atahualpa:

Creemos que con estos versos se inicia claramente el período de la desolación en la literatura quechua. El hombre peruano antiguo se despide del universo creado por sus manos e ingresa bruscamente en la servidumbre aún no concluida…

[We believe that from the time of these poems a time of “desolation” is expressed in Quechua literature. The ancient Peruvians saw the last of a universe created by their own hands and entered very abruptly into a servitude that has no end…]

Many of the anthologies of Quechua verse compiled by Lira, Farfán, Escobar, Mera, Arguedas and the Montoyas give evidence of this theme, along with profound feelings of amorous attraction, planting and harvest songs, and songs about everyday objects and occurrences. Certainly, the Autobiografía, 1977 [Autobiography] of Gregorio Condori Mamani explains poignantly his isolation at being raised an orphan and the solace he sought in the Quechua oral tradition to create a sense of place for himself. In fact, the hardships of incarceration or military boot camp are alleviated by the tales and songs of Quechua-speaking companions.

A similar expression of isolation colors the poetry of Juan Wallparimachi Mayta, an orphan, who writes of absence of his beloved and of maternal attention. In another context, he is remembered as the author of the translation to Quechua of a proclamation of independence in February of 1811. In recent years, Quechua speakers—along with other indigenous communities—have published outspoken declarations of their rights and proclamations of their cultural heritage. With increasing fervor, and increasingly sophisticated access to national media, indigenous communities are determining both who they are and what they represent as defined by their own criteria, not by categories imposed upon them by others. Literary production, such as the poems by Ariruma Kowii, mirror this self-conscious reflection and the vigorous promotion of indigenous values.

REGINA HARRISON
Rachel de Queiroz 1910–

Brazilian prose writer, literary translator and dramatist

Rachel de Queiroz’s literary production situates her among the classic writers of Brazilian literature. This is meant in the sense of language and verbal brilliance; in the sense, also, of her humanity and warm vision of the everyday life of humble people. A pioneer of the so-called “Novel of the northeast” (together with José Américo de Almeida, José Lins do Rego and Jorge Amado) she also explores the popular imagination, and is able, with the creativity of an outstanding storyteller, to value the treasure trove to be found in the oral tradition. Her first novel O quinze, 1930 [The Year Nineteen Fifteen], was published when she was only twenty years old. It is a work set against a social backdrop and is realistic in its portrayal of a people’s struggle against poverty and drought, reflecting the social fermentation of the age. With this portrayal she established a cycle, that of the novel of the northeast, which examines the life and the land of that region in fiction.

In O quinze, whose title refers to a year of severe drought, one of the most dramatic periods of a region in the Brazilian interior is described using sombre panels, linked to the lives of the characters. It can be seen as a document that treats the fictional material in an objective manner. Devoid of sentimentality, it portrays the clash of lives, and the pathetic encounters and separations.

There followed other novels, a wide journalistic output (collected in various volumes of chronicles), plays, children’s literature and innumerable translations—especially of Charlotte Brontë’s works—a particular favourite of hers.

The conflicts of life determine the characteristics that will remain in her later works: characteristics such as: directness of language; succinct episodes; and concise descriptions. This regional variant of Realism surpasses the “novel of manners” because it brings to life the social material and passes judgement on it, without being sensationalist or aggressive. One person’s drama becomes everybody’s everyday story. Among the characters in her novels—and in her plays—the female ones are of special interest. In O quinze, the dialogue and settings betray the dramatic elements. Though a theatrical scene might be able to cover or reveal more adequately certain situations, the thematic constants cannot surpass the novel’s power of expression. She created paradigmatic female types: the strong and the submissive; the legendary Dona Brites; and the no less legendary Maria Bonita. They were created with lucidity, and with a capacity to observe the subtle nuances of a woman’s behaviour. Queiroz gives impetus to fiction

Further Reading

Ossio, Juan M. (editor), Ideología mesiánica del mundo andino, Lima: Ignacio Prado Pastor, 1973
as life and humanity, and integrates herself in the regional dramas. The intensity of these dramas is increased because she is present, participating in them, and infusing them with passion. Psychological inquiry makes her face drought, the cangaceiro (the bandit) and fanaticism.

Having reached literary maturity, new possibilities unfold in later novels, such as João Miguel, 1932 [John Michael]. The novel is like an extension of O quinze, in another space: a common man, his crime and his woman. But it still remains in the saga of the northeast, with a character that could have played a part in the earlier novel.

In Caminho de pedras, 1937 [Stony Road] the social preoccupations, whose exponent is a female character, Noemí, are presented through revolutionary fervour. In her path towards the moment of liberation and consciousness she confronts, with firmness and resolution, the many difficulties that she encounters. The novel is structured to achieve a balance between context and individual behaviour, intimate impulses (the passionate relationship between Roberto and Noemí) and social impulses (the revolutionary cause). The novel is one of compromise, but its critique of politics (of the authoritarian government that allows social misery) does not reduce the quality of the fiction of a writer capable of structuring novelistic elements with sensitivity.

The rural drama of a drought finds its complement in the drama of urban poverty. Provincial bourgeois society closes the cycle in As três Marias, 1939 (The Three Marias). It is shaped by personal experience and narrated in the first person, which gives the novel an autobiographical feel: because of its reconstruction through memory and the protagonist’s longing to communicate, full of questions and doubts. The novel addresses the problem of the emancipation of women, prisoners of traditional social structures, and addresses, too, their fight to demolish prejudice. Queiroz abandons the political novel in favour of psychological inquiry of an intimate nature. The female characters to be found at the convent school, lend themselves to social inquiry. In Dora, Doralina (1975), the narrator surpasses herself in terms of characterisation, creating a gallery of unforgettable characters. Objective information is transfigured by the range of images.

In Memorial de Maria Moura, 1992 [Maria Moura’s Memorial], there is a permeation of history and fiction summoned up by memory. Action and introspection alternate in an intricate combination. The changes in point of view of the characters/narrators express the intimacy of each of them. Besides the protagonist who lends her name to the title of the novel, Memorial de Maria Moura is narrated by other characters such as Beato Romano (Father José Maria, also on the run from the police). The narrative voice does not comment on the action, and the exposition of social problems (a characteristic of Queiroz’s works) instead comes about through the circumstances of a narration that reports and informs. One story penetrates another and complements it. Ironically, the novel is dedicated to “Her Majesty Elizabeth I, Queen of England (1558–1603), for her inspiration.” The queen, Elizabeth I, celibate like Maria Moura, armed ships and men in order to attack the galleons that transported gold to Europe from the New World. Maria Moura plans crimes and hold-ups but has a code of honour. She crosses frontiers and creates her own history, becoming a symbol of liberty and of courage. The female character wants to dispense with frontiers and transcend space: Maria Moura by right of conquest through power and force; Marialva, through her ingenuous dreams.

Secrets cross one another in the various strands of the novel: that of Maria Moura’s confession to the ex-priest, and his own secret which follows; the cubicle wherein are locked mysteries and treasures, and the trunk that holds “the things rescued from the fire.” Desire, frustrated and oppressed by the law, pulsates in the work, and the spaces (such as the confessional) are profaned by transgressions. There are traces in the writing of the linguistic effort involved, since the novel has been created using almost solely the lexicon of the age.

With Queiroz, women’s literary language entered the sphere of social themes. She was the first female Brazilian novelist to inscribe herself on an equal plane with her male counterparts, and was the first woman member of the Brazilian Academy of Literature. From the regionalist novel (which consisted of a critical and anti-exotic outlook) to the urban novel, she is characterized by her power of reconstruction of the age, and the power of synthesis. Political engagement and penetrating analysis of behaviour are brought together in a humane manner.

Queiroz also saw the value of the crônica or newspaper feature as a vehicle for literary expression. She fused power of observation with direct language, and objective perception with the capacity to bear witness.

BELLA JOZEF
translated by Luis González Fernández

Biography

Born in Fortaleza, Ceará, Brazil, 17 November 1910. Attended the Colégio da Imaculada Conceição, Fortaleza, 1921–25; completed training as a primary school teacher at the age of 15. Teacher from 1925 to 1930. From 1927, contributor, and later editor of O Ceará; from 1930 weekly newspaper and magazine columnist for various publications including Última Hora, Jornal do Comércio, Folha Carioca and A Cigarra. Member of the Brazilian Communist Party from 1931 to 1933, expelled. Imprisoned, briefly, as a Leftist intellectual by Getúlios Vargas’s government, 1937. Translator of Russian and English literary works for the publishers José Olympio, Rio de Janeiro, from the early 1940s. Brazilian delegate to the United Nations General Assembly and its Human Rights Commission, 1966. Recipient of numerous literary awards including: Graça Aranha Foundation Prize, 1931; Felipe d’Oliviera Society Prize, 1939 for As três Marias; O Estado de São Paulo Saci Prize, 1953; Brazilian Academy Machado de Assis Prize, 1957; National Book Institute Theatre Prize, 1959; Paulo Brito Prize, 1959. First Woman Member of the Brazilian Academy of Letters, 1977.

Selected Works

Novels
O quinze, Fortaleza, Brazil: Estabelecimento Gráfico Urânia, 1930
João Miguel, Rio de Janeiro: Schmidt, 1932
Caminho de pedras, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1937
As três Marias, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1939; as The Three Marias, translated by Fred P. Ellison, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1963
Dora, Doralina, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1975; as Dora Doralina, translated by Dorothy Scott Loos, New York: Avon, 1984
Memorial de Maria Moura, São Paulo: Siciliano, 1992, Horacio Quiroga 1878–1937

Uruguayan short story writer

Horacio Quiroga is a serious contender for the symbolic title “father of the Latin American Short Story.” Among the first to advance a theory (however sketchy) of the short story form, he was probably the first to cultivate it to the exclusion of other literary modes (his poetry, like that of Cervantes, largely being both forgotten and forgettable). He not only crafted some of the most classic short narratives of the Spanish language, but established it as a literary genre of value, not as the short-winded sibling of the novel, but on its own merits. Influenced by Poe (whose commentary on Hawthorne’s Twice-Told Tales is clearly visible in Quiroga’s ideas), Quiroga also served as a model for more recent narrators, such as Julio Cortázar. Hence he serves both as a figure of historical dimensions in the development of literature in Spanish America, and as a writer of high value and standards on his own.

Both the biography and the short fiction of Horacio Quiroga are characterized by tragedy, violence and inevitable fatalism as man confronts two all-powerful antagonists: nature and his own existential fate. Quiroga’s own death, by suicide, followed those of his father, stepfather and wife (the latter dying after a full week of suffering) and the accidental shooting, by the young Quiroga himself, of a close friend. In his tales death is just as pervasive, protean and arbitrary, serving finally to portray human life as a pre-ordained struggle that, however valiant, affirms inglorious destiny and the futility of individual action. In Quiroga, hope is foolish illusion, a lie to which we cling even knowing full well the awful and mortal truth it hides.

Quiroga is usually, and appropriately, classified as a regionalist or creolist writer, for he sets his tales in specific locales, typically the jungle of the Paraná River region, where Uruguay and Argentina blur together, where people live isolated from the adornments and comforts of civilization. (A few tales enter the realm of the sociopolitical, such as “Los Mensú” [The Contract Laborers]). As in other writers of this group—Rómulo Gallegos, Ricardo Güiraldes, José Eustasio Rivera—the untamable hostility of the jungle is man’s most visible foe, the one whose action brings his brief life to a sudden end by the diseases, snakebites or accidents which affirm what he knew all along: that he simply cannot win, regardless of what it is he was striving for when struck down. Neither economic success, personal recognition, freedom from oppression nor even love itself can survive in Quiroga’s representation of nature.

These themes, generally recognized by Quiroga’s readers and critics, are valid, and can readily be observed in his most famous stories, many of which are available in English and in multiple anthologies of Spanish American literature. Yet there are aspects of Quiroga's works that are too often overlooked, since the overwhelming violence of life seems to drown out other messages he has for us, in some of which his characters themselves bear part of the blame for their tragic ends. In other words, man is always a victim of life; but he is also, at times, a victim of his own nature and failings, and even of his own aspirations, since these predispose him to vulnerabilities he might avoid if he could but take refuge in stoicism and ironic rejection of existence.

In “El hombre” [The Man], the nameless protagonist slips while crossing a fence he had built around his banana patch, an action he had taken in the selfsame way every day: but this day, for no identifiable cause, he is to die. Nothing is different: he has done nothing unusual, is aware of no great crimes; all about him is just as always while his life drains into the soil his own work had softened. The futility of his life and the absurdity of its end are sad enough. Yet a final blow comes, for the last thing he sees is his own horse, awaiting the man’s final breath to begin eating the very plants which had symbolized his owner’s life.

Similarly, “El hombre muerto” [The Dead Man] steps on an unseen snake, an event equally lacking cause-and-effect relationship as that of “El hombre.” And like the first protagonist, this man finds disillusionment: whereas the first one sees his life’s work about to be destroyed along with himself, the Dead Man begins to feel better only as he draws his last breath. Hope, as we said, is illusion, as we readers, like his characters, know very well. Yet Quiroga’s skill and our own refusal or inability to recognize such a harsh and unrelenting view leads us, and them, to hope in vain. This man was “dead”— doomed, along with his life’s labor—from the first. And yet again, the father of “El hijo” [The Son] sees his only child, whom he had thought dead of a gunshot while hunting, finally return: but in the last scene the narrator reveals that the “son” is but a hallucination of the man’s mind, unable to cope with the death that has in fact been real all along.

These tales exemplify the all-powerful and soulless cruelty of nature and inhuman fate. Yet, as was mentioned earlier, Quiroga wrote tales with another dimension, which are also much better antecedents of the short story of the latter part of the 20th century in their use of ambiguity, dualities and psychological penetration. These stories merge with the others to give us a full view of Quiroga, who was—perhaps without fully knowing it—something of an existentialist before his time: life is a dead-end, but the individual contributes to the specifics of his demise. Two examples of such narratives may suffice.

“El almohadón de plumas” [The Feather Pillow] presents, in its grotesque ending, a parasitic creature, which has slowly and nightly drained a young bride of blood from its hiding place in her feather pillow. Hostile, arbitrary nature once again? Only in part, for a closer reading of the tale finds ample reason to realize that there exists a parallel between the creature and the new husband, whose coldness, distance and inability or unwillingness to meet his wife’s inner needs suck her spirit dry. (María Luisa Bombal’s “El árbol” [The Tree] has close parallels). Indeed, the creature can be seen as symbolic only of this psychological “parasitism,” as having no physical existence, although the story works best by giving both readings full credence. This interpretive openness—are both true? only one? and if only one reading is “true,” which?—typifies more recent Latin American writing, and in technique and theme is a worthy precedent for Cortázar, Borges and others.

“La gallina degollada” (translated both as “The Decapitated Chicken” and “Justice,” the latter title involving a liberty on the translator’s part) is a classic of gore, horror and dual retribution: the arbitrary, blind “retribution” of existential hostility—a couple’s sons, deeply longed for to sanctify their marriage, suffer a fever of no particular origin and become physically repulsive and mentally retarded—and another, “caused,” if there ever is true causality in Quiroga, by their failure to respond positively to their tragedy. Instead, they abandon their sons, the daily visual reminder of their failing marriage, personal flaws and impotent fury at life and each other. Their neglect is partially responsible for the final scene, where, imitating a maid’s preparation of a chicken for a meal, the sons behead their younger sister, the only normal offspring of the ill-fated couple. This couple, and the husband in “El almohadón de plumas,” are in a sense innocent; yet all suffer the horrors of a fate beyond their powers either to foresee or to forestall, and in which they must share some of the blame.

Quiroga is a master in the use of narrative focus and point of view; of symbolism—the coffin-like canyons of “A la deriva” [Drifting], for instance; and of the subtle use of narrative versus chronological time. His prose is more often stark than beautiful, for stark are his themes, but his blending of the mot juste, use of narrative structures which allow no irrelevant distractions and skillfully facilitate their themes’ full impact, and his creative use of symbolism and simple unilinear action make him a widely-read and still-influential master of the short story. These characteristics, expressive of his chosen themes, give us a writer who concentrates on the tragic in metaphysical terms, that which has no adequate explanation. He always reminds us of our limitations, vulnerabilities and frailties, and that fate may—however we may hope or struggle against it—overwhelm our human condition.

PAUL W. BORGESON, JR

Biography

Selected Works

Short Fiction
Los arrecifes de coral, Montevideo: El Siglo Ilustrado, 1901 [prose and verse]
El crimen del otro, Buenos Aires: Emilio Spinelli, 1904
Cuentos de amor, de locura y de muerte, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Editora, Imprenta Mercatali, 1917
Anaconda, Buenos Aires: Agencia General de Librería y Publicaciones, 1921
El desierto, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1924
“La gallina degollada” y otros cuentos, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1925
Los desterrados, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1926
Suelo natal, Buenos Aires: F. Crespiillo, 1931
Más allá, Buenos Aires: Lautaro, 1935

Novels
Historia de un amor turbio, Buenos Aires: Arnaldo Moen y Hermano, 1908
Pasado amor, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1929

Play

Translations
South American Jungle Tales, translated by Arthur Livingston, New York: Difffield, 1922; London: Methuen, 1923
The Decapitated Chicken and Other Stories, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1976
Compilations and Anthologies

Obras inéditas y desconocidas, edited by Ángel Rama, 8 vols, Montevideo: Arca, 1967–73

[Volume 7, Sobre literatura, contains the following important articles: “La crisis del cuento nacional” and “La retórica del cuento”]

Cuentos completas, 2 vols, Montevideo: Ediciones de la Plaza, 1978

Novelas completas, Montevideo: Ediciones del Atlántico, 1979

Further Reading

———“Relectura de Horacio Quiroga,” in El cuento hispanoamericano ante la crítica, edited by Enrique Pupo-Walker, Madrid: Castalia, 1973

Amorim, Enrique, El Quiroga que yo conoci, Montevideo: Arca, 1983

Barrerechea, Ana María and Emma Susana Speratti Piñero, “Realismo e imaginación en la obra de Horacio Quiroga,” in their La literatura fantástica en Argentina, Mexico City: Imprensa Universitaria, 1967

Beardsell, Peter R., Quiroga. Cuentos de amor de locura y de muerte, London: Grant and Cutler, 1986

Bratosevich, Nicolás A.S., El estilo de Horacio Quiroga en sus cuentos, Madrid: Gredos, 1973

Espinosa, Enrique, Trayectoria de Horacio Quiroga, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1980

Flores, Ángel (editor), Aproximaciones a Horacio Quiroga, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1976

Jitrik, Noé, Horacio Quiroga: una obra de experiencia y riesgo, Montevideo: Arca, 1967

Martínez Morales, José Luis, Horacio Quiroga: teoría y práctica del cuento, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1982

Rodríguez Monegal, Emir, Genio y figura de Horacio Quiroga, Buenos Aires: Editorial Universitaria, 1967

———El desterrado: vida y obra de Horacio Quiroga, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1968

Selection of Short Stories

By Horacio Quiroga

Horacio Quiroga wrote more than 200 short stories. These cover a wide range of themes and situations, and draw on numerous traditions and models, some listed in his Decálogo del perfecto cuentista [Ten Commandments for the Perfect Short Story Writer], others mentioned in his letters and critical writings. His literary relationship with Edgar Allan Poe has been well documented and, in literature as in life, Quiroga is most typically associated with the frontier experience, writing in a similar vein to Jack London. His profoundly ironic view of his fellow men extends to their reading practices as well as their behaviour. Hence, in “La miel silvestre” [Wild Honey], the narrator begins by ridiculing the boyish fantasies that arise from readings of Jules Verne and other tales of adventure, but then introduces a grimmer, more threatening tone with such evocative comments as “límites imprevistos” (unforeseen limits), clearly a euphemism for death.

We see Quiroga constructing a personality, setting up a “fall-guy,” someone doomed to disaster. Gabriel is not of the stuff of heroes. A chubby, pink-faced accountant who likes milky tea and sweet pastries, he wants to experience adventure, but is reluctant to muddy his new hiking boots. Gabriel decides to go hunting. The narrative is almost reminiscent of certain children’s fairy tales, with danger, possibly death lying in wait in the woods. On the first day of his adventure, Gabriel does not venture into the woods, but on the second—with the usual Quirogian foreshadowing—he walks for about a league, then falls asleep, almost getting himself eaten by ants. On the third day, prolonging tension for the reader, Gabriel goes into the bush with his machete, eats wild honey and suffering from paralysis, is eaten alive by ants. Far from a detailed description of the horrors about to take place, there is understatement and factual comment, the same technique applied so effectively in “El almohadón de plumas” [The Feather Pillow]. The real horror derives from his chilling comparison of the fully conscious Gabriel with a terrified child. One of the words most frequently used by Quiroga is “inexorable,” and this in fact describes much of the contents of his narrative, a relentless march towards death. A tragic conclusion is inevitable, all that remains to be seen is how the calamity unfolds, with foreshadowing achieved through the careful selection of vocabulary to describe significant choices and their consequences.

Much in the same vein is “El hijo” [The Son]. A thirdperson, omniscient narrative, this story is almost identical in tone and technique to “El hombre muerto” [The Dead Man]. We find the same accumulations and repetitions, the intensifying adverbs and the triple structure of adverbs, adjectives or nouns placed together, and the Quirogian technique of contrast, the burning heat of the midday sun set alongside the coldness of death. Quiroga toys with his readers, setting up certain emotions in the reader, because of the child’s youth and innocence, the father’s devotion and impotence. All the father’s hopes, his love and his whole life are centred on the child. Fully aware of the dangers, his own limitations, he has done his best to teach his son not to take risks but this, we know, is not enough. From the very outset, the child’s death is a foregone conclusion: as soon as the father warns him to take care, we suspect that something awful is about to happen to this child setting off with his shotgun and cartridges. This emphasis on the shotgun and the father’s complacency can only reinforce our suspicion. Following the father’s stream of consciousness, there is a growing awareness that all is not well. The father’s hallucinations, treated as fantasy sequences, are indicative of the man’s state of health and mind, but they also foreshadow the child’s death. Just when he relaxes, a shot rings out. When the boy does not return, first he makes excuses for him, then begins to experience growing anxiety. As in other short stories, Nature can only be held at bay, never completely overcome, and the greatest irony of all is that the very tools that men use to tame Nature eventually become the instruments of Nature’s revenge: the machete, the gun, but especially barbed wire, to represent an encroaching “civilization” which Quiroga held in contempt. There is, of course, further irony in the fact that the father’s premonitory hallucination comes true. Just as he had seen in his vision, the boy is hanging upside down from a post, his legs tangled in barbed wire. There are different ways of interpreting this dénouement: Nature is fighting back, man is being punished for his complacency. However, when we consider the phrase “su hijo bien amado” (his dearly beloved son) in conjunction with the strong visual image of the child hanging on a post in a virtual crucifixion scene, there appear to be strong biblical resonances. But since this sacrifice has been made in vain, not as part of a redemptive process, perhaps Quiroga is suggesting that the Christian message is essentially void of significance, an aspect which might be explored in reading his other stories.

Quiroga has often been compared with Kipling, whose works he read in French translation, principally because of points of contact between the Just So Stories and the Cuentos de la selva (South American Jungle Tales). Apart from Quiroga’s own reference to Kipling in “La retórica del cuento” [The Rhetoric of the Short Story], there are similar animal protagonists as well as common storytelling devices. Compare, for example: “Now this is the next tale, and it tells how the Camel got his big hump,” and “Aquí se cuenta la historia de un tigre que se crió y educó entre los hombres, y que se llamaba Juan Darién” (Here is told the tale of a tiger who was raised and educated among men and whose name was Juan Darién). Arguably, Quiroga mixes the ingredients of what might be an innocuous children’s tale to produce a much darker depiction of human nature. The tiger motif is particularly strong in “Juan Darién,” a story which has much in common with The Jungle Book and The Second Jungle Book, set in a far-off land, with the odd allusion to Bengal. However, the whole story appears more ambiguous than The Jungle Book. While there is genuine compassion for the tiger-child, just what is the moral lesson? Certainly that human beings are often less compassionate and more brutal than the animals to whom they claim superiority. Although motherhood is treated as almost sacred, both stories focus on cruelty and rejection: Mowgli is turned out of the pack and has to leave the jungle, only to come up against the hostility of ignorant and superstitious villagers. For his part, Juan Darién is cast out by the human beings, tortured, and after a last visit to his foster mother’s grave, returns to the wild jungle.

“El espectro” [The Spectre] demonstrates familiarity with novels and films about the far West. It is hardly surprising that Quiroga should be attracted by this genre, given his own background. The American West and Kipling’s India are much closer to his own experiences than, say, early 20th-century Europe. In this tale, the narrator’s ideals of masculine behaviour seem to match Quiroga’s own preoccupations. The fantasy element occurs when what happens on screen affects the way the other characters live, prefiguring the plot of Woody Allen’s The Purple Rose of Cairo, as Pablo Rocca has pointed out. The actor Duncan Wyoming dies, and leaves his widow Enid to be cared for, but not “consoled” by his best friend, the screenwriter Grant. The couple watch Wyoming’s film over and over again, but as they grow closer, the dead husband becomes increasingly jealous, and finally steps out of the screen to seek his revenge. Grant shoots at him, but the bullet penetrates his own temple. Enid dies three days later. In the afterlife, they are inseparable, and spend all their time at film premières, waiting to see Wyoming’s last film, and thus return to life through the channel that Wyoming has opened up.

Quiroga the craftsman is equally at home with a third- or first-person narrative and it would be interesting to establish which is used for what purposes. We can distinguish Gothic horror, animal tales, the wilderness narratives and fantasy, and there is another category, which overlaps with those previously mentioned, his grim fairytales. Uniformity of style and consistency in his narrative technique may lead readers to underestimate his versatility of theme and setting, yet there can be no doubt that he is perfectly at home with more than one setting, the main difference being that when he writes about the jungle, there is much more detail, presumably because the natural world is as much a character in his narrative as the human beings or animals.

PATRICIA ANNE ODBER DE BAUBETA

Anthologies and Compilations

Todos los cuentos, Colección Archivos, Asociación Archivos de la Literatura Latinoamericana, del Caribe y Africana del Siglo XX, in collaboration with UNESCO and the Fondo de Cultura de España, 1993 [Scholarly edition coordinated by Jorge Lafforgue and Napoleón Baccino Ponce de León, with articles by, among others, Milagros Ezquerro, Jorge Lafforgue, Dario Puccini and Beatriz Sarlo]
Graciliano Ramos 1892–1953

Brazilian prose writer

Considered the most expressive name in the second moment of Brazilian Modernism, Graciliano Ramos departs from other northeastern writers of the 1930s, since while sharing their main concern with the regional reality, he also proceeds with the experimentation that characterized the generation of 1922. Accordingly, for each of his narratives Graciliano contrives different aesthetic solutions, hence the unique style of works such as São Bernardo and Vidas secas (Barren Lives). It is true, however, that Ramos neglected the grammatical liberty introduced by the first Modernists, opting instead for traditional syntax. Thus he is considered an experimental writer, but a “classical experimentalist.”

So, if in Caetés the reader comfortably faces a narrative that as a whole does not break new ground, that is definitely not the case with the two novels (among the most important written by this “classical experimentalist”) that followed his debut. In the first of the two, São Bernardo, Ramos focuses on the rural reality of the farm São Bernardo, whose proprietor Paulo Honório is given the narration; in the second, Angústia (Anguish), the writer turns to urban reality, giving the narration this time to a lesser civil servant.

Despite the common factor—the narration in the first person—the narrative strategy in São Bernardo is organized differently from Caetés and Angústia in that its narrator is introduced to us during the very act of composing the novel. This disposition allows the discussion of literary creation, ever present in Graciliano’s works, to be intensified to the point of primary importance. Similarly, the direct, objective, “dry” style for which the writer was renowned finds here one of its moments of maximum expression, in this case documenting in a concrete way the awkwardness of a pragmatic and ill-read man like Paulo Honório in the role of writer. In fact, the style of Paulo Honório, consisting of short, brisk sentences, bears witness to his personality whose most remarkable features are rudeness and pragmatism. When a man like this turns to literature he is certainly not motivated by aesthetic reasons, and as a matter of fact Paulo Honório resorts to it with a well-defined goal. He needs to confess, relieve his conscience, and since he has no friends, being too proud and not believing in religious consolation, he then opts for the symbology of the confessional novel. Throughout the pages that he writes a picture takes shape: a man that, having conquered his place in the sun the hard way, assimilated on his trajectory all the selfishness and brutality of a competitive system, being at last aware of it all: “Creio que nem sempre fui egoísta e brutal. A profissão é que me deu qualidades tão ruins. É a desconfiança que me aponta inimigos em toda parte! A desconfiança é também conseqüência da profissão” (I don’t believe I have always been egoistic and brutal. It is this profession that has given these vicious characteristics. And that terrible distrust of mine that discovers enemies everywhere! This distrust is another consequence of my profession). Paulo Honório, who became the owner of the São Bernardo farm, gradually lost his humane values, being able to see the world only in terms of profit. He thus ceased to be a person and ended up representing the farm itself. In order to have an heir he marries Madalena, an idealistic teacher whom he is to destroy with his attitude of proprietor extended to human beings. Madalena commits suicide, victim of Paulo Honório’s violence; he then realizes that he had destroyed the only being he ever loved.

The solitude of Paulo Honório is followed by the Angústia of Luís da Silva who, between two worlds with which he cannot identify—the rural world of his parents and grandparents and the urban one he finds himself in—appears to the reader to be continually falling apart until he eventually commits a crime. He murders his rival, a successful graduate who took his lover from him. In this way he hopes to solve his existential dilemma, his anguish as the last member of a disintegrating rural family whose members had come to the city to try their luck, but found only constant misery, persistent economic and social inferiority. This fragmentary narrative (more than in São Bernardo we observe here an extraordinary interplay between past and present) concretely documents such degradation, whose major evidence is the insignificance of the very name Luís da Silva. It contrasts significantly with the complex surnames of his grandfather (Trajano Pereira de Aquino Cavalcante e Silva) or even the father (Camilo Pereira da Silva). This continuous degradation culminates in the delirium of Luís da Silva that in a single paragraph covers the last eleven pages of the novel.

One should note that the experimentalism of Graciliano Ramos is less of an end in itself than a means employed by the author to intensify a reality the better to narrate it. Vidas secas and the works that followed are no exception and confirm the rule. That is actually the moment when Graciliano turns to the biographic reports of Infância (Childhood), Viagem [Voyage] and Memórias do cárcere (Jail Prison Memoirs). In the last of these he narrates the vicissitudes of his political imprisonment during 1936–37.

In the context of Brazilian literature Graciliano Ramos stands out as one of the most provocative names, having significantly contributed to its coming of age in all senses, but especially with respect to the aesthetic representation of social problems.

TERESINHA V.ZIMBRÃO DA SILVA

Biography

Born in Quebrângulo, Alagoas, Brazil, 27 October 1892. Family moved when he was two to Buíque, Pernambuco where his father bought a cattle ranch. Years of severe drought caused his father to resume former occupation as a shopkeeper. Distressing childhood according to his own account in Infância (1945) of a brutal father and neurotic mother. Began to read avidly from the age of ten. Studied in Viçosa and Maceió, Alagoas, but dropped out of high school and helped father run his store. Travelled to Rio de Janeiro, 1914, and worked there as a journalist. Returned after some months to become his father’s partner. Married Augusta de Barros and bought his father’s store. Successful in business. Learnt several European languages and translated from the English and the French (Camus’s La Peste in the case of the latter). Store became intellectual centre of Palmeira dos Índios. Organized private school for children. Agreed to stand as mayor, 1928, and won election. Married Heloísa Medeiros in 1933 (his first wife had died). Served as director of State Printing Office (1930–33) and director of Public Instruction in Alagoas (1933–36). Second novel, São Bernardo, placed him at once among Brazil’s most distinguished writers. In 1936, after Getúlio Vargas assumed presidency, dismissed from post without explanation, arrested and sent to Rio where he remained in jail without a trial for a year.
Released in January 1937, again without explanation. Health undermined by this experience.
Spent wretched period in Rio until he obtained an editorial position on a newspaper and, in Kafkaesque way, appointed federal inspector of schools by the very same government that had imprisoned him arbitrarily. Joined the Communist Party in 1945. Elected president of Brazilian Writers’ Association and visited countries of the Soviet bloc in this capacity, 1952. Upon his return fell gravely ill and died after an operation on 20 March 1953.

Selected Works

Novels
Caetés, Rio de Janeiro: Schmidt, 1933
São Bernardo, Rio de Janeiro: Ariel, 1934; as São Bernardo, translated by Robert Scott-Buccleuch,
London: Peter Owen, 1975
Angústia, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1936; as Anguish, translated by Lewis C. Kaplin, New York: Knopf, 1972
Vidas secas, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1938; as Barren Lives, translated by Ralph E. Dimmick,
Austin: University of Texas Press, 1961
Brandão entre o mar e o amor, in collaboration with Jorge Amado, José Lins do Rego, Aníbal
Machado and Rachel de Queiroz, São Paulo: Martins, 1942

Short Fiction
Dois dedos, Rio de Janeiro: Acadêmica, 1945
Histórias incompletas, Porto Alegre: Globo, 1946 Insônia, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1947
Histórias verdadeiras, Rio de Janeiro: Vitória, 1951

Children’s Fiction
A terra dos meninos pelados, Pôrto Alegre: Globo, 1939
Histórias de Alexandre, Rio de Janeiro: Leitura, 1944

Other Writings
Infância, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1945; as Childhood, translated by Celso de Oliveira,
London: Peter Owen, 1979
Memórias do cárcere, 4 vols, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1953; as Jail Prison Memoirs, translated by Thomas Colchie, New York: Evans, 1974
Viagem, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1954 [On travels in Czechoslovakia and the USSR]
Cartas, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1981 [correspondence]

Compilations and Anthologies
Obras completas, 10 vols, São Paulo: Martins, 1961
Further Reading

Graciliano Ramos’s work has benefited in the main from structuralist readings that have been applied to Brazilian literature since the 1960s.

Bosi, Alfredo, José Carlos Garbuglio and Valentin Facioli (contributing editors), Graciliano Ramos, São Paulo: Ática, 1987 [A comprehensive introduction to Ramos’s work with the participation of other scholars, including Antônio Cândido]

Brayner, Sonia and Afrânio Coutinho (editors), Graciliano Ramos, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1978

Cândido, Antônio, Ficção e confissão: ensaio sobre a obra de Graciliano Ramos, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1956

Malard, Leticia, Ensaio de literatura brasileira: ideologia e realidade em Graciliano Ramos, Belo Horizonte, Brazil: Itatiaia, 1976

Oliveira, Celso Lemos de, Understanding Graciliano Ramos, Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988

Puccinelli, Lamberto, Graciliano Ramos: relações entre ficção e realidade, São Paulo: Quiron, 1975

Zilberman, Regina, “São Bernardo” e o processo de comunicação, Porto Alegre: Movimento, 1975

Regionalism

Brazil

The term regionalista (regionalist) denotes a literary work that focuses on a certain region and on its features (geography, nature), as well as on the kind of social and historical background that has that region as a frame. Most regionalist works also deal with the human beings who inhabit the region in question (peasants, miners, backlanders), bringing regionalism very close to a fiction which is most of the times Realist/ Neorealist in its general outlines.

A significant portion of Brazilian literature is fuelled by nationalism. At least since the 18th century we find literary works that aim to explore the uniqueness of the Brazilian character, seeking to outline a national identity for the country. From this standpoint, to portray the tropical milieu was a way of searching for Brazilianness. For this reason, we may say that regionalism has played an extremely important role in Brazilian literature, especially during the second half of the 19th century (Romanticism, in particular) and during the first half of the 20th century (the Modernist novel of the 1930s). Although regionalist features are present throughout the history of Brazilian literature, within the limits of an encyclopedia article it is best to concentrate on the second of these crucial moments.
Traditionally, in Brazil’s literary historiography, in the 19th century the novels that portray the interior (i.e., not urban novels) are known as “sertanistas” (related to the sertão or backlands). We may call regionalist Inocência, 1872 (Innocence) by Visconde de Taunay (1843–99) and O garimpeiro, 1872 [The Prospector] by Bernardo Guimarães (1825–84), among other works of the period. This kind of literature continues through the works of Inglês de Sousa (1853–1918) writing under the pseudonym Luis Dolzani, Afonso Arinos (1868–1916), Afrânio Peixoto (1876–1947) and Valdomiro Silveira (1873–1941), until the 1930s, when literary historiography explicitly called regionalistas authors like José Américo de Almeida (1887–1980), José Lins do Rego (1901–57), Jorge Amado (1912–), Graciliano Ramos (1892–1953) and Rachel de Queiroz (1910–). Although the term is generally used to allude to the writers whose work focuses primarily on the northeast, the truth is that it could easily be applied to the works of writers from other regions, like João Simões Lopes Neto (1865–1916) or Érico Veríssimo (1905–75), from the south. This is one of the concepts that was incorporated into literary criticism, but that ended up by losing its original critical insight.

Luiz Costa Lima once wrote that Brazilian fiction obeys the primacy of observation (primado da observação). According to Lima, Brazilian literature does not often create a fictionality; it is nurtured instead by a mimesis that attempts to capture “realistically” Brazilian reality. In other words, Brazilian literary texts are not constructed with the awareness of being symbolic representations, made up by means of verbal signs. This observation could probably be endorsed by tying it to the obsession with nationalism that was mentioned before. Lacking a glorious historical past (Brazil was a former colony of Portugal), writers, in order to foreground the national character, must turn to Brazilian nature. Most Brazilian literature since Independence in 1822, following the Imperial state, engaged in the project of nation-building; as the tropical scenario is different from the European one, to pinpoint the “natureza americana” (American nature, as the Romantic Alencar used to call the Brazilian landscape) was to stress Brazilianness. In the last decades of the 19th century, with the exhaustion of Indianism, it is safe to say that sertanista novels fulfilled this ideological role.

In the 1930s, the novel in particular and literature in general engage with social problems. In the overall account of the novel of the period, writing in 1988 Antônio Cândido observed that this kind of fiction was “neonaturalistic in character, taking advantage of the linguistic liberation undertaken by the 1922 Modernists (reality was a decisive element in this kind of novel). It attempted to show, in a direct manner, what Brazilian society was like, to identify men’s problems and anguishes, with an acute sense of context, that is, a dominant concern in regard to the setting, the society, the behaviour of the people. For this reason, the majority of the period’s novelists gave the impression that language was something that should be subordinated to theme. And theme moved to the forefront with its power of protest, accusation and revelation, as happens in narratives with a social tendency, as was common at that time, in Brazil and elsewhere.” Cândido’s observation, although it is brief, touches on some of the main features of the regionalista novel: the social commitment, the portrayal of reality, the intention to capture a social and human landscape as well as of being a form or protest against the social order, with literary language becoming secondary.

However, one must bring into the discussion some other aspects that will give more complexity to Cândido’s words. Brazil was experiencing a transition from a rural, traditional society into an urban and industrialized one. The hegemony of the landowners in power was now being shared by the new bourgeois sectors; the old ruling class—mainly composed of sugar plantation owners from the northeast and of the Paraíba valley coffee barons—was experiencing decadence at least since the turn of the century. In most cases, the novel of the 1930s will picture the social fabric from the perspective of the old patriarchal and seigniorial society now in decline, nostalgically lamenting that the “good old times” are gone. Instead of focusing on the changes that were taking place in Brazilian society then, this fiction leant towards the past. Ideologically speaking, this has been a way of providing a sort of genealogy to the new composition of the ruling classes, since an alliance between the rural landlords and the bourgeois sectors will characterize the Old Republic (1889–1930).

The paradigmatic example here would be José Lins do Rego’s sugar cane cycle, a kind of Proustian recherche or search into the colonel’s times. Graciliano Ramos’s works are more critical of the beginning of capitalism in Brazil, but it would be more appropriate to understand his fiction as one traversed by contradictions, divided between a traditional and a capitalistic order.

ROBERTO REIS

Further Reading

Dacanal, José Hildebrando, O romance de 30, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Mercado Aberto, 1982

Spanish America

In Spanish American literature the term “regionalism” overlaps with several other labels such as criollismo, mundonovismo, posmodernismo, the novel of the land, and autochthonous writing. Literary works falling under any of these categories generally present the land, people and/or customs of a particular locality as the common denominator that provides the region depicted with its identity. The use of distinctly American themes, language (popular speech, dialect, regional vocabulary), and folklore, and the insertion of social commentary and protest, are some of the most pervasive characteristics of this literature. Authors of regional narratives place special emphasis on rural settings and often portray the physical environment as a telluric force exercising control over the characters. In the so-called novel of the land, for example, nature can even assume the role of protagonist.
Elements of regionalism have been a part of Spanish American writing since its beginnings. Regional motifs can be found in every genre—from the gaucho plays of Florencio Sánchez and the essays of José Vasconcelos to African-Caribbean poetry—but regionalism as an artistic tendency has had its greatest impact in prose fiction. The heyday of the regional narrative extended roughly from 1915 to 1945 and its influence continued to be felt in the 1950s in the narratives of Juan Rulfo, Miguel Ángel Asturias and João Guimarães Rosa.

Regional novels comprised the first group of Spanish American works routinely translated into English and other European languages. Appealing to a much wider audience than the works of the Spanish American modernistas, these novels helped usher Spanish American literature into the international literary arena. Regional writers abandoned the pure aestheticism and infatuation with the foreign that characterized the early phase of Modernismo in order to concentrate on traditional themes and subject matter closer to home. Collectively, their works do not easily fall into a single style distinctive of a period, such as Realism; instead, they cover a range of techniques from the Romantic to the vanguard.

During the 19th century, Spanish American authors seemed obsessed with imitating foreign models. Following the Spanish-American War and the outbreak of World War I, imitation was no longer the rule as intellectuals from Mexico to Argentina came to the realization that the United States and Europe had ceased to serve as viable cultural models. The hemispheric celebrations around 1910 of the centennial of Spanish American independence seemed an appropriate occasion for each country to re-examine its national spirit, values and identity. Writers began to consider autochthonous American elements as suitable source material for their works. They found artistic inspiration in the physical environment and landscape, the indigenous populations, local traditions, linguistic peculiarities, and the various social, political and economic realities of their region or homeland. Regionalism and nationalism, especially cultural nationalism, became closely intertwined. America with its picturesque diversity and folkways captured the imagination of foreign audiences; at the same time, it appealed to the national pride of readers at home. To some, these works underscored Spanish America’s inherent spirituality as defined by Rodó in Ariel. As an affirmation of cultural identity, many authors utilized regional vocabulary in their writings. A regional novel of this period, for example, would often feature a glossary as an appendix to the text so as to make the work intelligible to native speakers of Spanish in other countries.

The traditional conflicts around which literature revolves such as societal clashes (man versus society), psychological turmoil within a character (man versus himself), and the struggle against the environment (man versus nature) have all found their way into regional works. Social protest, an element conspicuously absent from the modernista aesthetic, came to the forefront in the posmodernista era. Stimulated by an emerging social consciousness, writers championed the indigenous underclass and exposed injustices as they sought to forge or re-define a national identity.

The regionalist tendency eventually spread to every Spanish American country. One of the earliest manifestations of literary regionalism during the period of its ascendency was the novel of the Mexican Revolution, epitomized by Mariano Azuela’s Los de abajo (The Underdogs), published in 1915. The three most widely heralded works in the regionalist vein appeared in the 1920s. In Colombia José Eustasio Rivera documented the exploitation of rubber workers in La vorágine, 1924 (The Vortex), a novel of the jungle notable for its author’s use of poetic descriptions rather than photographic realism. In Don Segundo Sombra (1926), Ricardo Güiraldes offered a nostalgic evocation of Argentina’s national symbol, the gaucho. And in Venezuela, Rómulo Gallegos’s Doña Bárbara (1929), a novel of the plains that re-enacts the confrontation between civilization and barbarism, came to be considered by many as the country’s national book. Another leading regional writer, the Uruguayan Horacio Quiroga, devoted himself almost exclusively to the short story. Nature plays an influential role in many of his tales of violence and madness, especially those set in the harsh tropical environment of Misiones Province in the northeastern portion of Argentina.

Indigenist works, with their concern for the plight of the Indian population, a people marginalized by society and victimized by prejudice and exploitation, provide yet another variation on regional subject matter. In the Andean countries the portrayal of indigenous characters has evolved from the type found in 19th-century indianista works—the romanticized noble savage living in harmony with nature—to the brutally realistic creations drawn from the indigenista perspective. The Ecuadorian writer Jorge Icaza reflects the social and political concerns characteristic of the latter viewpoint in his famous novel Huasipungo, 1934 (The Villagers). One of the most important developments in Ecuadorian literature was the formation of the Group of Guayaquil, a trio of young writers (Demetrio Aguilera Malta, Joaquín Gallegos Lara and Enrique Gil Gilbert), who employed crude language and dialect in creating a more realistic, documentary narrative. Their short story collection Los que se van, 1930 [Those Who Leave] charted the course for much of the socially-committed literature of succeeding decades.

Regionalism continued strong in the 1940s. In Costa Rica, Carlos Luis Fallas developed the theme of anti-imperialism in his novel Mamita Yunai (1941), and in Chile Eduardo Barrios, a master of the urban psychological novel, made a noteworthy contribution to rural fiction with Gran señor y rajadíablos, 1948 [Great Lord and Hell-raiser].

Regional writing, whether its sub-category is the novel of the Mexican Revolution, the novel of the land, gaucho literature, or the indigenist narrative, focuses on the readily observable external reality of a particular region. As a result of the literary rediscovery of America that occurred during the first half of the 20th century, external reality came to be considered one of the determining factors in the definition of national and personal identity. The regionalists pursued a two-fold agenda—one aesthetic and the other sociopolitical—as they explored the literary possibilities of autochthonous themes, characters, and language. Their incorporation of telluric, geographic, racial and linguistic factors created a sense of place and produced a self-conscious literature acutely aware of its self-defining features. The best of these works transcend their provincial limitations in order to address human values, aspirations and sentiments on a universal scale.

MELVIN S. ARRINGTON, JR

See also entries on Mariano Azuela and Los de abajo, Eduardo Barrios, José de la Cuadra, Rómulo Gallegos and Doña Bárbara, João Guimarães Rosa, Ricardo Güiraldes, Jorge Icaza, Indianism, Indigenism, Horacio Quiroga, José Eustasio Rivera, Juan Rulfo
Further Reading

Carpentier, Alejo, “Problématica de la actual novela latinoamericana,” in Tientos y diferencias, Mexico City: UNAM, 1964

Franco, Jean, The Modern Culture of Latin America: Society and the Artist, London: Pall Mall Press, and New York: Praeger, 1967 [Chapters 2–4 are relevant]

José Lins do Rego 1901–1957

Brazilian prose writer

This scion of a wealthy sugar plantation family in Brazil’s northeastern state of Paraíba stands among the four giants of regionalist fiction of his region. Along with Rachel de Queiroz of Ceará, Graciliano Ramos of Alagoas, and Jorge Amado of Bahia, José Lins do Rego defines the most characteristic literary and cultural expression of 20th-century Brazil, whose influence begins in the late 1920s and extends to the present time (1997).

Lins do Rego’s university studies at the Law School of Recife (Pernambuco) brought him into contact with the sociologist Gilberto Freyre, then involved in the inauguration of a cultural revival based on the revalidation of “Region and Tradition.” In part inspired by the São Paulo Modernists of 1922 and in part reacting against a perceived over-emphasis on urban modernity and the cosmopolitan ascendency of southern Brazil, the new generation of northeastern scholars convened its first northeastern regionalist congress in 1926 and made public its manifesto in that year. Freyre would serve for decades as the guiding light of the movement from his vantage point as sociologist, while Jorge de Lima would prove to be its most illustrious poet and Lins do Rego its most prolific writer of documentary fiction.

The best and most typical of Lins do Rego’s novels are based on his own memories of childhood and adolescence on the sugar plantation, interspersed with the sometimes tragic drama of the passage of backland bandit/vigilante bands. A half dozen novels composed from 1932 to 1936, and a further one in 1943 form what is commonly called his “Sugar Cane Cycle,” with the same nucleus of characters of several generations reappearing in four or more of the works. These novels are: Menino de engenho (1932), Doidinho (1933), Bangüê, 1934 (all three of which have been translated under the general title, Plantation Boy); O moleque Ricardo, 1935 [Richard the Street Kid], Usina, 1936
[The Sugar Mill], and, although connected somewhat less directly to the home plantation, Fogo morto, 1943 [Dead Fire]. Carlos de Melo, the author’s fictional persona, is the protagonist of all but two novels of the series: he is a young boy bereft of mother and raised by grandparents and aunts on the plantation of the patriarch-grandfather, Zé Paulino (the persona of Lins do Rego’s own grandfather), in Menino de engenho, the maladjusted boarding school student in Doidinho, the newly graduated lawyer attempting to administer the semi-mechanized home plantation in Bangüê, and the failed administrator watching his plantation pass into the hands of a larger and more mechanized corporate entity in Usina. While these novels trace the childhood, adolescent education, and adult career of a wealthy white plantation boy, O moleque Ricardo and part of Usina accompany Carlos de Melo’s black playmate Ricardo on his unflagging effort to succeed in life outside the plantation environment; he goes to work in the city of Recife, joins a strike action by local laborers, is imprisoned and sentenced to a term in the national penitentiary, is subsequently released, returns to his home plantation to assume a responsible position, and ultimately dies attempting to defend the property against marauders.

Couched in a direct, accessible prose style worthy of the best in journalistic writing, the novels of the “Sugar Cane Cycle” integrate personal memoirs of the author’s own life, his observations of the broad spectrum of plantation living and administration in his native region, the experiences of others employed in the larger economic sphere of the more urban northeastern region, and a good measure of imagination to recreate a way of life already on the wane at the time of writing. There is an elegiac quality about Lins do Rego’s fiction, a penetrating melancholy of the inevitable as tradition and technical progress confront each other and individual lives are caught in the machinery of micro and macro economics. Generations come and go, either adapting to change or being pushed aside by it; man’s inhumanity to man is vividly portrayed at every turn, be it in the exploitation of wife, employee (frequently an ex-slave), or the weaker member of a socioeconomic unit. Yet the author has no “axe to grind” nor political program to advocate, unlike some other members of his generation; his perspective is at once personal and socio logical, and his characters are typical of countless others of their time and status in regional society. The picturesque quality of Menino de engenho in its vivid youthful recreation of the sights, aromas, tastes and feel of traditional plantation life, is balanced by the lurking fear always present in the narrator-protagonist’s (sub)conscious, and the cycle continues the natural evolution of the qualities present in its initial volume.

Fogo morto, perhaps Lins do Rego’s finest work, is related to the nucleus of the “Sugar Cane Cycle” in that it deals with a similar process of inevitable change and decadence, though in the context of a neighboring plantation belonging to friends of the Melo family. The novel also incorporates the marked presence and activity of cangaceiros (backland bandits), showing its kinship with another pair of Rego novels sometimes called the “Cangaço (Outlaw) Cycle”: Pedra Bonita (1938) and Cangaceiros (1953). Fogo morto is a violent work in which those who own their own land are no less prey to the conflict between government military forces and backland bandits than are those who till the lands of others; all are equally victimized, and the question of who is more or less to blame for the situation becomes a moot one in the face of the generalized agony. Three of the author’s most outstanding characters dominate the three segments of this novel; they are the decadent plantation owner Lula, the angry saddlemaker José Amaro, and the quixotic old Vitorino.

The two novels mentioned above, which form the sequential “Cangaço Cycle,” trace the life of parents and sons of a rural family caught in the atavistic net of collective guilt borne by generations of descendants of messianic cult followers from the mid-19th century. Pawns of traditional factional hatred and of the harsh natural conditions under which they live, younger family members face two “obvious” choices in so far as vocation is concerned: cultivate vengeance by joining a roving group of cangaceiros or devote themselves to the religious cult forming around the latest messianic figure in the region. Lins do Rego synthesizes in this pair of novels the complex human dynamic leading to both types of violent societal aberration without placing unilateral blame on any institution or group.

The eight novels that comprise the “Sugar Cane” and “Outlaw” cycles constitute the lion’s share of Lins do Rego’s fictional production and together comprise a broad sociological spectrum of rural life in the dry northeastern region of Brazil in the early decades of the 20th century. However, there are four other novels by him that explore facets of human awareness and behavior which, without forming a cohesive group or “cycle,” are somewhat alike in privileging psychological introspection, more urban or cosmopolitan (generally coastal) environments, and an individualistic sensibility and erotic lyricism. These novels are: Pureza, 1937; Riacho doce, 1939 [Sweetwater Creek]; Agua-mãe, 1941 [Mother Liquor]; and Eurídice, 1947. Pureza traces psychological processes in an isolated human environment, while Eurídice accompanies the anguish of passion, infidelity, and interpersonal stress against a background of urban politics of the Vargas period. Agua-mãe is a coastal novel set in the saline-processing area near Cabo Frio, with the backdrop of the inherent mysteries of night, the sea, and intergenerational incomprehension spanning three families. Riacho doce presents the drama of a young Swedish business couple assigned to Brazil by a petroleum corporation, as the wife attempts to adapt to the “new” culture that envelops them with its folklore and societal expectations. Female characters play an increasingly important role in these four novels, though Lins do Rego is clearly experimenting with a lyrical style of writing and a delicate probing of sensibility with which he is less comfortable than the more sociological backland context and documentary, journalistic style of the best of his fiction.

Among the best-known of Lins do Rego’s non-fictional prose works are his autobiography, Meus verdes anos, 1956 [My Tender Years], and the book-length essay Presença do nordeste na literatura brasileira, 1957 [Presence of the Northeast in Brazilian Literature]. His essays are of a piece with his regionalist fiction, conveying the same commitment to his land and people and the same fundamental sadness about the nature of things. His novels exercised a profound influence on Portuguese fiction writers of the World War II period, several of whom followed in his footsteps in the novelistic recreation of their own socio-geographic subregions.

MARY L. DANIEL

See also entries on Jorge Amado, Gilberto Freyre, Rachel de Queiroz, Graciliano Ramos, Regionalism: Brazil
Biography

Selected Works

Novels

O moleque Ricardo, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1935

Usina, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1936

Pureza, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1937; as Pureza: a Brazilian Novel, translated by Lucie Marion, London: Hutchinson, 1948

Pedra Bonita, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1938

Riacho doce, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1939

Agua-mãe, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1941

Fogo morto, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1943

Eurídice, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1947

Cangaceiros, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1953

Other Writings

Histórias da Velha Totônia, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1936 [children’s fiction]

Gordos e magros, Rio de Janeiro: Casa do Estudante do Brasil, 1942 [essays]

Poesia e vida, Rio de Janeiro: Universal, 1945 [essays]

Homens, seres e coisas, Rio de Janeiro: Ministério da Educação e Saúde, 1952 [essays]

A casa e o homem, Rio de Janeiro: Organização Simões, 1954 [essays]

Meus verdes anos, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1956 [memoirs]

Presença do nordeste na literatura brasileira, Rio de Janeiro: Ministério da Educação e Saúde, 1957

O vulcão e a fonte, Rio de Janeiro: Cruzeiro, 1958

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras, 11 vols, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1947

Romances reunidos e ilustrados de José Lins do Rego, 5 vols, Rio de Janeiro, José Olympio, 1960–61

Romances reunidos e ilustrados de José Lins do Rego, 12 vols, Rio de Janeiro and Brasilia: n.p., 1980
Further Reading

Coutinho, Eduardo F., O romance do açúcar: José Lins do Rego, vida e obra, Rio de Janeiro and Brasília: José Olympio, 1970

Sobreira, Ivan Bichara, O romance de José Lins do Rego, João Pessoa, Brazil: Editorial Universitária, 1971

Resistance Literature in Spanish America

Through the centuries, Latin Americans have been inventing and redefining subversive strategies that allow them to form their own everyday culture of resistance. For example, during and after the Spanish conquest and massacre of the indigenous inhabitants of the New World, the local resistance to the foreign invader was transmitted through oral tradition and through a reinterpretation of the ancient myths (i.e., Inkarri, Taki Onkoy in Peru). This type of resistance preserved both the ancient tradition and the social memory of the Quechuan and other Native Peruvian cultures.

During the early 17th century, two works Nueva Corónica y Buen Gobierno (Letter to a King) and Relación de Antigüedades deste Reyno del Piru [Account of the Antiquities of the Kingdom of Peru] were written by Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala and Joan de Santacruz Pachacuti Yamqui Sallqamaygua, respectively. These works are generally considered the first written discourses which counteract the culture of the Spanish invader. In Nueva Corónica (1612), Guaman Poma subversively criticizes the rule of the Spanish viceroyalty in Peru and informs the reader about the Incan culture. Comentarios reales de los Incas (Royal Commentaries of the Incas) is the written testimony of a bilingual mestizo who lived in both the Quechuan and the Spanish cultures. In Comentarios, Garcilaso de la Vega describes the splendor of the Incan Empire. This book is doubly subversive: published for the first time in Spain in 1609 and written in the language of the invader; it reterritorialized the hegemonic and colonialist Spanish center.

In the 18th century there were other written expressions of resistance. The appearance, clandestine circulation and publication of autobiographies, letters and diaries by Latin Americans during this century provide evidence of an insurgent spirit, not only that of the creoles, but also that of the mestizos, the indigenous people, and the slaves fighting against tyrannical Spanish rule in the colonies. Discontent gave birth to the organization of the first armed independence movements and gave voice to resistance movements that tried to free the continent. After independence, however, resistance swelled again against the unequal social order imposed on the new republics by the new dominant creole class. The creole class had managed to reproduce the same repressive colonial system of the Spanish invader. One text that cleverly documents the situation of the slaves in the colonies is Autobiografía de un esclavo [Autobiography of a Slave] written by a Cuban slave, Juan Francisco Manzano (1797–1854). The most relevant literary aspect of this text is the constant simulation of an oral discourse, one that emphasizes its testimonial function.

For the 19th-century modernista writer, resistance was aimed at the Spanish literary canon and the economic power of imperialist nations. This writer subversively started the quest for an autonomous Latin American identity. The significance of Modernismo for the Latin American cultural production of the 19th century cannot be denied. As a cultural and literary movement, Modernismo rapidly contributed to the international circulation and acceptance of Latin American literary texts. Modernismo’s cultural agenda has recently been revised and reformulated; the traditional formal criteria by which literary critics have defined and analyzed the literary works produced by the modernista writers have changed. Some outstanding literary devices of resistance employed by the modernista works are the transformation of textual forms, changes in the traditional topics and characters represented in literary works, and the process of rewriting master texts. Nevertheless, modernistas in their works still showed a marked cultural dependence on Europe. During the 19th century, the ideology of the dominant class in Latin American reproduced mainstream Western aesthetic values and the Western concept of a uniform national culture. By doing so, it excluded and repressed all other subaltern groups and ancient cultures.

The modernista writer with one of the most revolutionary projects was the Cuban poet and essayist José Martí (1853–95). Martí warned the new emergent republics against the economic power and imperialist intervention of the United States. Ismaelillo [Little Ishmael], Flores del destierro [Flowers of Exile] and En las entrañas del monstruo (Inside the Monster: Writings on the United States and American Imperialism) are some of his most subversive texts. Martí’s revolutionary vision also led him to publish a magazine devoted to children’s literature called La Edad de Oro [The Golden Age]. Rubén Darío (1867–1916), another modernista, also denounced the menace of the American imperialism in the poem, “Rooseveltt,” and in the chronicle “Cake-Walk: el baile de moda” [Cake-Walk: The New Dance], published in 1903 in La Revista Moderna de Mexico [The Modern Magazine of Mexico], an important modernista magazine edited by Jesús E. Valenzuela and Amado Nervo.

In the 19th century, women writers began to resist actively the oppression of the Latin American patriarchal societies. There was a strong Pan-American sisterhood among these women writers which permitted them to read and exchange ideas through their works. Women writers such as Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda (1814–73) Juana Manuela Gorriti (1818–92), Clorinda Matto de Turner (1852–1909) and Mercedes Cabello de Carbonera (1845–1909) denounced the hypocrisy of the dominant class and institutions of the Latin American countries. Gorriti organized literary evenings in La Paz, Lima, Santiago de Chile and Buenos Aires, where writers of both sexes read their works, discussed literary topics and analysed the political situation of their countries. These women writers reformulated the woman’s role in the new republics, criticized the corruption of their governments, as well as, the corruption of the social and religious institutions, and restored the value of the ancient cultures, collecting, and publishing native and regional oral literature. Some of the most representative resistance works that challenged the 19th century Latin American patriarchal and totalitarian societies are novels such as Aves sin nido (Birds without a Nest), Índole [Human Nature] and Herencia [Heritage] by Matto de Turner and *El conspirador: autobiografía de un hombre público [The Conspirator: Autobiography of a Public Man] by Cabello de Carbonera. The book that best illustrates the sisterhood among these women writers and their commitment to participate in a joint effort to integrate their native and national cultures, as well as, to subvert the literary canon of the period is Cocina ecléctica [Eclectic Cuisine]—a book of recipes. The repertoire of writers included in this anthology of recipes can assist the critic to start studying the cultural contribution of each of these women.

A range of strategies of resistance were deployed in the early 20th century. The Latin American writer resists the discourse of the metropolis and overcomes cultural isolation, by contributing to a Pan-American exchange of ideas through the publication of different magazines and journals which promoted avant-garde literature or (the case of Amauta in Peru) radical politics. The most well-known magazines of this period are Contemporáneos (Mexico), Revista de Avance (Cuba), Los Nuevos (Colombia), Martín Fierro (Argentina), and Las Moradas (Peru). In these magazines Latin American intellectuals discussed and redefined the sociohistorical role of the artist and the writer as subjects of historical transformation. As a result, the essay is the most representative type of resistance text written during the beginning of the 20th century. During the mid-20th century, several Latin American intellectuals and writers participated in the promotion of the European—mainly French—avant-garde movements. Two historical events clearly influenced these intellectuals: the Russian Revolution and the Spanish Civil War. Most Latin American writers supported the Republican party in Spain; some even fought on the Republican front. A unique example of resistance poetry written in the battle site is España aparta de mí este cáliz (Spain, Take This Cup from Me) by César Vallejo.

In the last three decades, aside from the production of literary discourses of resistance, several Latin American writers, critics and thinkers have also written analytic works about the Latin American culture of resistance. In the last three decades, journals such as Revista de Literatura Chilena en el Exilio [Journal of Chilean Literature in Exile] and Index on Censorship incorporate theoretical and analytic texts about the Latin American culture of resistance in their publications. Working in a different medium, the arpílleras of Chile, Bolivia and Peru, subvert official history by using their hands to weave and sew their social memory into colorful tapestries for which the material used is sackcloth.

Is there any common topic within the extensive corpus of resistance literature that can link all Latin American works of this kind? There is a metaphor that helps intersect and relate all the oral and written discourses of resistance in Latin American: the body divided, the “body in pain.” Pablo Neruda in his Confieso que he vivido (Memoirs) states “that there is an old theme, a “body divided” that recurs in the folk poetry of all the countries”. This metaphor expresses the disintegration of entire communities and cultures in Latin America as a result of violent armed and cultural repressions: Native cultures repressed, rural families forced to migrate to the overcrowded urban centers, entire families in exile, individuals still missing, books burned, etc. The function then, of oral and written resistance literatures, has been the reintegration of the Latin American body divided by means of discourses that preserve the representation of the oppressed in the social memory, educate the new generations about the transformation of the social order, and that seize the territory of the repressive culture through the voices which historically never would have been heard.

FANNY D.ARANGO-RAMOS
Further Reading

Cortázar, Julio, Textos políticos, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1985
Mariátegui, José Carlos, Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana, Lima: Amauta, 1928; as Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality, translated by Marjory Urquidi, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971
Primer coloquio sobre literatura chilena (de la resistencia y el exilio), Mexico City: UNAM, 1980
Rama, Ángel, Literatura y clase social, Mexico City: Folios, 1983

La Revue du Monde Noir

See Journals

Alfonso Reyes 1889–1959

Mexican prose writer, scholar, poet and literary translator

If one had to select Latin America’s greatest man of letters, Alfonso Reyes would surely be one of the most impressive contenders for the title. Reyes’s staggeringly prolific output spans many disciplines and styles, and his influence as a writer, as a scholar and as a cultural figure has been as profound as it would no doubt be long-lasting. His work has received a great deal of critical attention, although the often academic nature of his writing has meant that, especially outside Mexico, none of his works has ever received the sort of widespread popularity accorded to some of his more flamboyant colleagues and admirers.

The defining moment for Alfonso Reyes came in the period around or immediately after the Mexican Revolution. In conjunction with Pedro Henríquez Ureña, he founded the Ateneo de la Juventud (Atheneum of Youth), a group which later went on to enjoy a considerable literary and philosophical reputation. The Ateneo opposed the Positivist, technocratic intellectual mood prevalent during the Porfirian dictatorship of the late 19th century, and replaced the scientific rhetoric with a humanistic regard for aesthetics and classical scholarship. Reyes helped to develop a new discourse of the human spirit, the likes of which had been totally rejected under the scientific rationalism of the old order. Throughout his adult life, Reyes represented the possibility of humanist erudition in Mexico, his sheer presence exerting an influence over his peers and his successors as irresistible as that of any one of his most outstanding works.

Reyes’s written œuvre is so vast and so varied that it is difficult to reduce to one clear set of definitive statements, but all his works share certain important features. As a classical scholar of considerable talent, Reyes developed an attitude towards writing in which erudition, discipline and precision are keystones in the art of literary production. The style of his work has been commented on many times. Although Reyes deals with complex and sophisticated issues, his lucidity of expression communicates vast amounts of information with a barely perceptible stylistic ease. The work falls into several key categories: literary criticism; works on a classical theme; poetry; philosophical essays; and fictional narrative.

Reyes’s devotion to “universal” literature and literary forms is tenacious in the face of national calls to make a literature that was specifically Mexican. It would be easy to dismiss Reyes’s stance as depoliticised in comparison with some of his colleagues who took up Mexicanist or indigenist positions in the 1930s and 1940s. But it is important to remember that the position adopted by Reyes and the Ateneo was itself politically charged in the light of the scientific obsessions of the previous regime. Throughout his career, Reyes remained true to an aesthetic ideal. Cuestiones estéticas, 1911 [Questions of Aesthetics] is an early and highly influential text which upholds aesthetic value as an intangible absolute towards which it is a duty to strive. In a sense it could be argued that Reyes’s tremendous influence bequeathed to Mexico an international canon with which it had previously had little contact. It was Reyes who championed not only the classics, but the literature of Spain, especially the canonical plays of the Golden Age. It was Reyes who wrote persuasively of the delights of Chesterton and Oscar Wilde and who translated Chekhov and Jules Romain. Each of Reyes’s critical essays is a tour de force, not only of observation but also of construction and style.

However, it is the influence of the Greek and Roman classics on Reyes that is crucial. Something of the 19th-century European tradition of classical philology lives on in his writing. There is a three-fold involvement with the classics in his work: classical criticism, translation and classically-oriented invention. Reyes’s body of classical criticism ranges from Socrates to the Hellenistic philosophers; from Homer and Virgil to the essence of Greek tragedy. The essays which make up this corpus mark out a specific case for the relevance of this sort of scholarship in post-revolutionary Mexico. Rigorous and astute, they argue passionately for the importance of the classical canon. Didactic tracts on ancient rhetoric or literary criticism such as “La crítica en la edad ateniense” and “La antigua retórica,” 1941 [Criticism in the Age of Athens and Ancient Rhetoric] are persuasive testaments to Reyes’s unswerving belief in the centrality of that canon within Western civilization. Together, these essays constitute a particular version of classical literature, in which “universal” ethical and spiritual values are subjected to a thorough and profound examination.

These beliefs led Reyes to disseminate classical literature by translating some of the greatest texts, notably the Iliad (La Ilíada, published in 1951). Lucid and professional, this translation typically manages to convey something of the flavour of the original while drawing on a Mexican poetic idiom that breathes a rhythmic contemporary life into the Homeric epic.

The task of the translator, a communicator bridging chasms of language, culture and time, can in many ways be said to dominate Reyes’s output. The classics not only inspired him to take up scholarship but also to invent, or reinvent, metaphors, poetry and narrative on the basis of the classical tradition. The challenge to articulate Mexican reality from that basis is repeated again and again in his work. In “Discurso por Virgilio” (1933) for instance, Virgil’s Georgics are reworked in an evocative discussion of government wine-growing policies. In addition, the classical training of Reyes’s mind makes his a singular voice in Mexico’s political and cultural struggle to reappropriate its ancient heritage. In Vision de Anáhuac, 1917 [Vision of Anáhuac], a poetic treatment of the conquistadors’ vision of Mexico’s ancient capital, Mexico itself provides the opportunity for a new sort of classical scholarship, in which pre-Colombian civilization offers scope for precise insights on the nature of the relationship between the ancient and the modern.

Reyes’s most famous literary invention, however, is the dazzling Ifigenia cruel, 1924 [Cruel Iphigenia]. Based on a detailed reading of the versions of the myth of Iphigenia at Tauris, this piece reads like a Greek tragedy in Castilian and is written in a poetic language seldom surpassed in Latin American literature. The premise is that Iphigenia, seized away from Aulis just before sacrifice, arrives at Tauris to find herself a revered priestess, but, in contrast to the canonical version, Reyes’s heroine has lost her memory, and the drama resides in her attempt to know herself and break the cycle of violence that afflicts her family. The poem’s treatment of memory has been variously interpreted as a commentary on Mexico’s struggle with the past and its identity, or as a poetic treatment of “universal” themes of human self-knowledge, or as a personal tract on Reyes’s own position—his family were intimately involved with the dictatorship he opposed. The truth is that this strange and haunting piece itself articulates the impossible dilemma of the universal versus the particular; the responsibility towards one’s peers versus the responsibility towards oneself; the need for personal understanding versus the need to understand broader social and political historical realities.

Ifigenia cruel is a poetic masterpiece. The ability of Reyes’s work at its best to maintain an even-handed, aporetic approach to ethical questions, while creating a linguistic landscape as precise as it is rich in allusions, marks the best of his poetic output. Even early efforts, such as those collected in Pausa, 1924 [Pause] which owe much to modernista movements of the early years of the 20th century, display great originality as well as great learning. Throughout his career, Reyes produced volumes of verse which at best play with and rejuvenate forms and genres of poetic discourse, tackling the sonnet, the elegy, the romance, the epic and the lyric with as much fervour as his treatment of tragedy. Even less successful examples, which can seem so dry and academic that they work as little more than scholastic exercises in literary approximation, are always brilliantly executed.

If Reyes’s poetry can sometimes disappoint, as an essayist, his talent seems to have been endlessly consistent. On literature, on aesthetics, on ethics, on history, Reyes is always clear, precise and economical in his use of language. A mordant wit is never far from the more polemical pieces, such as Lo mexicano y lo universal, 1932 [Mexicaness and Universality]; a restrained and measured stateliness graces the pages of his most evocative criticism, such as Capítulos de literatura española, 1939 [Chapters on Spanish Literature]. Above all, however, Reyes’s great gift is rigour. The logical exposition which had previously been the preserve of the Mexican technocrats finds itself transported onto Reyes’s humanist endeavour. The arguments are sound, the logic seamless and penetrating, and the overall effect is of a discourse that is supremely compelling. It is scarcely surprising that Reyes has become the paradigm of the Latin American essayist.

Throughout the 1920s, 1930s and 1940s, Reyes prioritized the application of a rigorous intelligence to major philosophical themes. There are essays on morality, historiography, the history of language and literary theory. Apart from the unmistakable trace of European humanism, there are references to Hegel, Fichte, Nietzsche and Croce. What emerges is not so much an original thinker, who could be called a philosopher in his own right, but a tremendously wise and attentive reader whose ability to synthesise material both ancient and modern in succinct arguments sheds light on major debates. What also emerges is a pervasive ethics characterised by a notion of respect for the self and for others, and a plea for moderation which may seem unremarkable, but is extraordinary in its consistency and in the calm and uncomplicated authority of the voice which articulates it.

Reyes also reflected on the nature of the Americas and on Mexico’s cultural mix. In “Posición de America,” 1942. [The Position of America] for example, Reyes sets out his own vision of the fusion of European and native American traditions in a text which, although it rejects some of the more ecstatic claims of other American commentators on similar themes, is quietly visionary. Despite the clear desire to take part in the feast of Western civilization, Reyes remains aware of his Mexican roots and of the dynamics of the relationship between the Old World and the New.

The very reasonableness which makes Reyes such a compelling essayist also makes him a solid but unremarkable writer of narrative fiction, that type of literature which has been most successfully exported by Latin America. His stories have all the rigour and allusiveness one would expect, but have never reached a large audience. The most telling comparison is with Jorge Luis Borges, with whom Reyes shared a friendship and an occasional correspondence. Reyes’s stories display the same learning and sophistication as those of Borges, but somehow lack that twist of the bizarre imagination which have elevated the Argentine writer to international stardom. Perhaps this accounts for the fact that Reyes is little known outside Mexico. This is a pity. For all his faults, the world has produced few men of letters so complete as Alfonso Reyes.

MAURICE BIRIOTTI
Biography

Born in Monterrey, Mexico, 17 May 1889. Father, General Bernardo Reyes, was governor of the state of Nuevo Léon. Settled in Mexico City, 1906, and took part in a movement of cultural renewal and educational reform. This culminated in the foundation, with Antonio Caso, José Vasconcellos and Pedro Henríquez Ureña (a distinguished scholar from the Dominican Republic) of the Ateneo de la Juventud (Atheneum of Youth). Inaugurated the chair of Spanish Language and Literature at Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM), Mexico City, 1912. After the death of his father in 1913, accepted appointment as second secretary of the Mexican legation in France. This was the beginning of a long career in the diplomatic service which was to keep him abroad for many years. Following the German invasion of Paris in 1914, moved to Madrid where he earned his living as a literary translator and editor of the cultural section of the newspaper El Sol. In the 1920s and 1930s he occupied several important diplomatic posts, including those of ambassador to Argentina and Brazil. Returned to Mexico in 1939. Appointed director of the Colegio de Mexico, a cultural research centre that welcomed exiled scholars (such as those fleeing Franco’s Spain), and fostered research in the humanities. Also helped establish the Colegio Nacional (1945) which offered regular series of lectures in the arts and the sciences open to the general public. Elected director of the Mexican Academy of the Language in 1957. Recipient: National Prize for Literature, 1945, but the Nobel Prize eluded him despite lobbying on his behalf. Died as a result of heart attack, 27 December 1959.

Selected Works

Poetry

Huellas, Mexico City: Botas, 1922.
Ifigenia cruel, Madrid: Calleja, 1924
Romances del Río de Enero, Maastricht, Holland: Halcyon, 1933
A la memoria de Ricardo Güiraldes, Rio de Janeiro: n.p., 1934
Minuta, Maastricht, Holland: Halcyon, 1935
Cantata en la tumba de Federico García Lorca, Buenos Aires: n.p., 1937
La crítica en la edad ateniense, Mexico City: El Colegio de Mexico, 1941
Pasado inmediato y otros ensayos, Mexico City: El Colegio de Mexico, 1941
La antigua retórica, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1942
La experiencia literaria, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1942,
Los siete sobre Deva, Mexico City: Tezontle, 1942.
Última Tule, Mexico City: Editorial Universitaria, 1942.
El deslinde, Mexico City: El Colegio de Mexico, 1944
Tentativas y orientaciones, Mexico City: Nuevo Mundo, 1944
Capítulos de literatura española (II), Mexico City: La Casa de España, 1945
Por mayo era, por mayo…, Mexico City: Cultura, 1946
Cortesía, Mexico City: Cultura, 1948
Grata compañía, Mexico City: Tezontle, 1948
Letras de la Nueva España, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1948
Junta de sombras, Mexico City: El Colegio Nacional, 1949
Homero en Cuernavaca, Mexico City: Bajo el signo “Abside;” 1949

Novels

El plano oblicuo, Madrid: Europa, 1920
Verdad y mentira, Madrid: Aguilar, 1950
Quince presencias, Madrid: Obregón, 1955

Other Writings

Cuestiones estéticas, Paris: Ollendorf, 1911
Cartones de Madrid, Mexico City: Cultura, 1917
El suicida, Madrid: García y Saez, 1917
Visión de Anáhuac, San José, Costa Rica: El Convivio, 1917
Retratos reales e imaginarios, Mexico City: Lectura Selecta, 1920
El cazador: ensayos y divagaciones (1911–1920), Madrid: Biblioteca Nueva, 1921
Simpatías y diferencias, 5 vols, Madrid: Teodoro, 1921–26
Calendario, Madrid: Imprenta Ciudad Lineal, 1924
Cuestiones gongorinas, Madrid: Espasa Calpe, 1927
Horas de Burgos, Rio de Janeiro: Villas Boas, 1932
La caída, Rio de Janeiro: Villas Boas, 1933
Las vísperas de España, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1937
Mallarmé entre nosotros, Buenos Aires: Destiempo, 1938
Capítulos de literatura española, Mexico City: La Casa de España en Mexico, 1939
Norte y sur, Mexico City: Leyenda, 1944 [essays]
Ancorajes, Mexico City: Tezontle, 1951
Memorias de cocina y bodega, Mexico City: Tezontle, 1953
Trayectoria de Goethe, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1954
Parentalía, Mexico City: Los Presentes, 1954 [memoirs]
Las burlas veras, 2 vols, Mexico City: Tezontle, 1957–59
Albores, Mexico City: El Cerro de la Silla, 1960 [memoirs]
A campo traviesa, Mexico City: El Cerro de la Silla, 1960
Al yunque (1944–1958), Mexico City: Tezontle, 1960
Oración del nueve de febrero, Mexico City: Era, 1963 [memoirs]
Anecdotario, Mexico City: Era, 1968 [memoirs]
Diario (1911–1930), Guanajuato, Mexico: Universidad de Guanajuato, 1969 [memoirs]
Vida y ficción, edited by Ernesto Mejía Sánchez, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1970
Monterrey (Correo literario de Alfonso Reyes), Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires, Revistas Literarias Mexicanas (Antena, Monterrey, Examen, Número), Mexico City, 1980 [facsimile edition]

Correspondence

Correspondance (1923–52), edited by Paulette Patout, Paris: Klincksieck, 1972 [Correspondence in French between Reyes and Valery Larbaud]
Cartas echadas: correspondencia 1927–1959, edited by Héctor Perea, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1976 [Correspondence between Reyes and Victoria Ocampo]

Compilations and Anthologies

Antología de Alfonso Reyes, edited by José Luis Martinez, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1965
Antología personal, edited by Ernesto Mejía Sánchez, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1983
Translations

The Position of America, and Other Essays, translated by Harriet de Onís, New York: Knopf, 1950
Mexico in a Nutshell, and Other Essays, translated by Charles Ramsdell, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1964

Further Reading

Cuspinera, Margarita Vera (editor), Alfonso Reyes: homenaje de la Facultad de Filosofía y Letras, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1981
Homenaje de El Colegio Nacional a Alfonso Reyes, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1965
Olguín, Manuel, Alfonso Reyes: ensayista; vida y pensamiento, Mexico City: n.p., 1956
Reyes, Alicia, Genio y figura de Alfonso Reyes, Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1976
Robb, James Willis, Estudios sobre Alfonso Reyes, Bogota: El Dorado, 1976
———Por los caminos de Alfonso Reyes, Mexico City: INBA, 1981

João Ubaldo Ribeiro 1941–

Brazilian prose writer

João Ubaldo Ribeiro’s first short stories appeared in literary supplements at the end of the 1950s. His first full-length work, Setembro não tem sentido, 1968 [September Makes No Sense], waited five years for publication and tells of the frustrations of a group of intellectuals. With its prophetic air, alluding to the imposition of a military regime in the near future, it is “the charge of the light brigade of tradition.” Even at this early stage, Ubaldo Ribeiro’s work had already begun to question the myth of Brazilian national identity.

However, it was Sargento Getúlio, 1971 (Sergeant Getúlio), which established Ubaldo Ribeiro as one of Brazil’s major writers of contemporary fiction. The protagonist embodies the tragic human condition of the people of northeastern Brazil, living by conflicting values and overcome by isolation and the struggle for survival. Orality predominates in the timeless narrative of two men united by hate and violence. The figure of the sergeant has been equated with the author’s father, but in reality is an amalgamation of various personalities.

Venceecavalo e outro povo, 1974 [Venceecavalo and the Other Village]—described by the author as a fairy tale—is a parable which incorporates both tragic and comic elements in an attempt to show the fragility of those in power who turn against the community. Vencecavalo is a rebellious, picaresque hero.

Vila Real, 1979 [Royal Town], is a novel which Ubaldo Ribeiro prefers to call epic, using colloquial language in written form. It also employs the archaic structures used in the northeast of Brazil and is intended to contribute to the creation of a classic model of the region. The main character, Argemiro, is a man from the country who finds himself at the head of a resistance movement, struggling to retake the land where he lives and works following eviction by a mining company. The character is reminiscent of Antônio Conselheiro, from Canudos, who appears in both Os serîôes (Rebellion in the Backlands) by Euclides da Cunha and Mario Vargas Llosa’s La guerra del fin del mundo (The War of the End of the World). There is little action. The narrator employs an epic-poetic form, underlining the medieval traits of the sertão. Biblical influences can also be found in the depiction of religious inspiration. Elements such as the “desafío” (payada or gaucho folksong) come from the “literatura de cordel” (popular “literature on a string”).

Ubaldo Ribeiro’s most ambitious work to date is Viva o povo brasileiro, 1984 (An Invincible Memory). Dedicated to his childhood friend, film director Glauber Rocha, the novel covers three centuries, using the technique of mise en abîme to move between them. The narrative does not follow the action chronologically: it begins in 1823 in Puerta de las Ballenas on the island of Itaparica (Bahia), moves backwards to 1627 and comes forward again to 1977. It is the living history of Brazil, a denouncement of oppression which accords little importance to the official version of history, celebrated dates or heroic acts, depicting the evolution of a people in fresco form. The novel privileges lesser events and the dramas of unimportant lives by using cross sections. Ubaldo Ribeiro constructs with minute detail a historical canvas, covering the Wars of Independence, when a heroic lieutenant confronts Portuguese fire, to the 1970s, with a fierce and corrupt dictatorship. He incorporates the fantastic by parodying the Battle of Tuiuti in the Paraguayan War, when the orixás (gods of the “candomblé”) enter the fray like the gods of the Iliad.

The narrator depicts “the everyday heroes.” The main characters are the Brazilian people themselves. The narrative captures dozens of characters, souls flying above Itaparica, a world of barons, slaves (before and after abolition), native Indians, industrialists, soldiers and workers. Each section contains an individual story, like that of the caboclo (backwoodsman), Capiroba, who has had the notion of sin instilled in him by the missionaries but who prefers to eat the tender flesh of the Dutch. The stories are not unconnected. Common factors are the resistance of Itaparica and elements of the bourgeoisie of São Paulo, primitive society and its destruction, the first attempts at emancipation, the rise and fall of a rural pseudo-aristocracy and part of the landowning elite, the affirmation of a nascent mercantile bourgeoisie and the constant oppression of the Brazilian people. A pretentious relationship is developed between the real, objective world and an imaginary world of exaggeration and grotesque distortion.

The text is agile, fluent and ironic using harmonious language. Without limiting himself to the relatively unsophisticated documentalism of “literature of truth” and the naturalist theories of the 1970s, Ubaldo Ribeiro deconstructs romantic discourse while simultaneously incorporating a political element in his text instead of merely describing it. The narrator often makes use of parody of certain Brazilian authors such as José de Alencar and João Guimarães Rosa. Without intending to produce a violent literature, the author was concerned with producing works related to his roots, independent and uncolonised; in the author’s own words, texts “engaged with the affirmation of Brazilian identity.” In similar vein to Mário de Andrade’s character Macunaíma, he satirises false heroism.

In the work metaphorically entitled O sorriso do lagarto, 1989 (The Lizard’s Smile), adultery, abuse of power and urban violence are combined with the questioning of human nature and the inability of people to change the course of their lives. Using both humour and eroticism, the text deals with the transitory nature of life. A biologist, Juan Pedroso, goes through life terrorised by the stare of a lizard with two tails. Events take place on the island of Itaparica, where the biologist, his lover, a priest, a doctor and a corrupt politician are the main characters. Through science, the narrator explores the debate surrounding the dichotomy of Good versus Evil, popular versus erudite and preconceived notions of truth.

The work of João Ubaldo Ribeiro, rooted in the popular culture of Brazil, can be considered a portrait of his people and his time.

BELLA JOZEF

translated by Carol Tully

See also entries on José de Alencar, Mário de Andrade, João Guimarães Rosa, Popular Culture: Brazil, Regionalism: Brazil

Biography

Born on the Island of Itaparica, All Saints Bay, Bahia, Brazil, 23 January 1941. Attended the Federal University of Bahia, 1959–62, received LL.B in 1962; University of Southern California, Los Angeles, 1964–65, MS in public administration, 1965. Married three times: 1) Maria Beatriz Gordilho Moreira Caldas (divorced); 2) Mônica Maria Roters (divorced), two daughters; 3) Berenice de Carvalho Batella, one son and one daughter. Professor of political science at the Federal University of Bahia, and the Catholic University of Salvador, Bahia. Editor-in-Chief of the newspaper Tribuna da Bahia, Salvador, Bahia; served as journalist or editor for numerous other newspapers. Participated in the International Writers Program, University of Iowa, Iowa City. Awarded the State of Rio de Janeiro Golfinho de Ouro [Golden Dolphin] Prize; Brazilian Book Chamber Jabuti [Tortoise] Prize (twice); São Paulo Association of Art Critics Award; Brazilian National Foundation for Literature for Young People Award; Gulbenkian Foundation Scholarship (Portugal). Commander, Order of Merit of Portugal.

Selected Works

Novels
Setembro não tem sentido, Rio de Janeiro: José Álvaro, 1968
Vila Real, Rio de Janeiro: Nova Fronteira, 1979
José Eustasio Rivera 1888–1928

Colombian novelist and poet

The literary legacy of José Eustasio Rivera consists of Tierra de promisión [The Promised Land], a collection of fifty-five sonnets that blend modernista aestheticism with autochthonous thematic content, and La vorágine (The Vortex), a novel considered one of the landmarks of Spanish American regionalism. The national and international recognition garnered by these two works place him at the forefront of Colombian literature of the first half of the 20th century.

Rivera was a member of the patriotic, civic-minded “Generación del Centenario” (Centennial Generation), a group of Colombian writers who took their name from the celebration of the first hundred years of national independence. Tierra de promisión constitutes a poetic expression of his national pride. In three sections the volume offers a panoramic literary canvas of the country’s colorful rural landscapes—the jungle, the mountains and the plains. The sonnets evoke nature’s idyllic beauty and convey Rivera’s emotional response to his surroundings. The physical environment at once influences and reflects his mood. For example, when darkness falls and the swallow’s melancholy song fills the air—“la tarde se nubló de pena” (the evening clouded over with grief)—the poet shares nature’s sorrow: “mi alma también atardeció” (my soul also grew dark). Rivera’s poetry contains numerous vestiges of Spanish American Modernismo, as is illustrated by his depiction of creatures of the animal world as precious stones and art objects: a fish... becomes “un estuche de carne guarnecido de plata” (a silver-plated jewel box of flesh); a snake appears as a “rica diadema” (rich diadem) and a “pálida gema” (pale gem); a black beetle is a “vagabunda joya” (wandering jewel).

La vorágine has inspired heated debate among critics ever since its publication in 1924. They have argued over the merits of its aesthetic features as opposed to its value as a document of social protest. They have also been unable to agree on the artistic tendency or movement to which Rivera belongs. The labels applied to him and his works cover the gamut from Romantic, Parnassian, Realist, Naturalist, and modernista to post-modernista. Of these, the last seems most appropriate, at least in terms of literary chronology. La vorágine can be read as a documentary expose of the crimes committed against the caucheros (rubber workers) and also as a poetic description of man’s encounter with the treacherous beauty of the tropical landscape.

Much of the disagreement among critics centers on the semiautobiographical protagonist, Arturo Cova, who, like Rivera, is a poet. To some, Cova is ill-conceived and unconvincing, an impulsive, melodramatic figure lacking in appeal to modern readers. Others see him as a multi-faceted, introspective individual whose delicate psyche suffers from the maddening effects of the jungle’s enchantment. Cova and his companion Alicia, a young woman he has victimized, flee the city in order to avoid a scandal. Cova’s travels, his flight from Bogota to the plains and his pursuit of Alicia into the jungle, signify an archetypal journey or quest. The couple’s sojourn on the plains acquaints them with the violence and picturesque qualities of rural life. The inclusion of costumbrista scenes evoking local customs, such as the cock fight, is typical of regional works of this period. Rivera also interrupts the main narrative with an interpolated story, another characteristic common to the novel of the 1920s. The haunting legend of the jungle spirit Mapiripana provides an etiological explanation for the origin of the rivers and streams. More importantly, however, her conquest of the missionary metaphorically signals the triumph of nature over human adversaries and foreshadows Cova’s ultimate destiny.

Rivera’s works reflect popular and literary impressions of Amazonia. The depictions of the jungle in both Tierra de promisión and La vorágine incorporate stereotypical notions regarding the inherent exoticism of the tropics. In the former work, written before he had seen the rain forest, the poet was limited to creating scenes and descriptions based on popular tradition and his imagination. In writing the novel, however, he drew on an additional source—the people he met and the sights he witnessed in his travels in the jungle region. As a result, the novel is more linguistically diverse, alternating poetic descriptions (some of the identical imagery used in the sonnets) with popular speech and a rich vocabulary of regional expressions.

In the eyes of most critics, Rivera’s two major works present antithetical views of Colombia’s natural environment with Tierra de promisión showcasing the scenic beauty of the jungle and plains and La vorágine capturing the violent and inhospitable aspects of those terrains. In spite of this apparent dichotomy, his lyrics and narrative have several features in common. In both Rivera employs a tripartite structure, depicts the beauty and violence of the life-death cycle, develops the modernista theme of the pursuit of an unattainable ideal, and couches his descriptions in an impressionistic, poetic language. He privileges landscape, making it the prime subject of his sonnets and endowing it with the attributes of a character in the novel. In Tierra de promisión and La vorágine Rivera’s attitude toward the environment seems to be one of ambivalence. Although he spent most of his life in the city, he felt a deep kinship with the rural regions of Colombia. The savage paradise he created was a product of his literary imagination and personal experiences. Given the antithetical aspect of this imaginary precinct, it is not surprising that he responded to it with alternating feelings of attraction and repulsion.

In La vorágine Rivera perverts the natural order of things by means of personification and dehumanization. In the words of the rubber gatherer Clemente Silva, the trees are all “pervasive, aggressive, or hypnotic.” Once an incision is made, a liquid stream of sap begins to flow like “tragic tears” and “white blood.” When Silva becomes lost deep in the jungle without supplies, he wanders “animalizado por la floresta… masticando tallos, cáscaras, hongos, como bestia herbívora” (brutalized by the forest…chewing on plant stems, peels, mushrooms, like a herbivore). Suffering from the paralyzing effects of beriberi, Arturo Cova finds parallels between his condition and that of the trees: his swollen legs resemble the roots of certain palm trees and his blood is like “warm sap.” If, in Tierra de promisión, Rivera’s intentions were purely aesthetic, in La vorágine, he broadened his scope to include a social dimension (denunciation of injustices) as well as an artistic one (poetic descriptions of nature). His chief image in the novel, that of a devouring vortex, signifies an omnipresent menace, whether it manifests itself as tambochas (army ants) marching across the jungle floor consuming everything in their path, as piranhas stripping the flesh from the body of Cova’s adversary, Barrera, or as an anthropomorphic jungle enticing, then disorienting its victims and eventually devouring them. The most memorable appearance of the vortex occurs in the novel’s famous last line where the reader learns the fate of Cova and his party: “Los devoró la selva” (The jungle swallowed them up).

Although Rivera’s sonnets have been all but ignored by present-day scholars, his novel continues to inspire critical commentary, including postmodern readings. In The Spanish American Regional Novel, Carlos J. Alonso views Cova’s battle against hostile nature as a metaphor for the poet’s struggle with language in the act of literary creation. In a similar vein, Raymond Leslie Williams interprets the novel as a dramatization of the process of writing and Cova as “a patently literary character creating a self-consciously “literary” text—an explicitly arranged writing.” These recent assessments of La vorágine attest to its lasting significance and its centrality to any discussion of the concept of literature and the creative process in Latin America.

MELVIN S. ARRINGTON, JR

Biography

Born in Neiva, Colombia in 1888. First son in family of four boys and seven girls. Father was a modest farmer. Attended boarding school in Neiva at the age of seven, but left the following year and worked on the family farm. From then, in and out of school for several years. At the age of eighteen won government scholarship and entered teacher’s training college in Bogota, run by La Salle brothers. On leaving worked as inspector of small schools, but critical of teaching methods and officialdom. Accepted bureaucratic position in governor’s office. Enrolled in Law Faculty of National University. In September 1922, appointed secretary of the Boundary Commission which was attempting to sort out boundary disputes with Venezuela. Spent ten months in the jungle of the Orinoco region. On his return given seat by Conservative Party in the House of Representatives: resigned after three months. La vorágine appeared in 1924. Its exposure of slavery in the rubber fields of Colombia, Brazil and Venezuela provoked international interest. Travelled to New York to work on a revised version of his novel and to oversee its translation into English, 1928. Died there unexpectedly on 1 December 1928. Cause of death unknown because there was no autopsy.

Selected Works

Oda a España. El Tropical, Ibagué, Colombia, 1910 [poetry]
Tierra de promisión, Bogotá: Casa Arboleda y Valencia, 192.1 [poetry]
La vorágine, Bogotá: Tamayo y Cia, 1924; as The Vortex, translated by Earle K. James, New York: Putnam, 1935

Further Reading

Menton, Seymour, “La vorágine: Circling the Triangle,” Hispania 59 (1976)
Molloy, Sylvia, “Contagio narrativo y gesticulación retórica en La vorágine,” Revista Iberoamericana 141 (1987)
Ordóñez, Montserrat (editor), “La vorágine”: textos críticos, Bogotá: Alianza, 1987
Sommer, Doris, Foundational Fictions: the National Romances of Latin America, Berkeley, University of California Press, 1991 [Chapter 9 is on Doña Bárbara and La vorágine]

Augusto Roa Bastos 1917–

Paraguayan prose writer, poet and dramatist

Widely regarded as one of Latin America’s greatest living authors of fiction, winner of the Cervantes prize and other honors, Augusto Roa Bastos is almost certainly the best-known writer ever to come out of Paraguay. Unfortunately, Paraguay has historically exported some of its greatest literary figures by deporting or exiling them, and it is to this ironic circumstance that Roa Bastos’s international reputation is due in part. Beginning with the Paraguayan Civil War of 1947, Roa Bastos’s four decades of exile have exposed him to fellow writers and a vast readership he may never have known had he remained in his country. To say this, of course, is not to deny the personal tragedy of Roa Bastos’s exile nor is it to undervalue his lifelong commitment to Paraguay. Raised in Iturbe, a small town in the Paraguayan interior, Roa Bastos has remained very much the native son. Much of his fiction is set in and around Iturbe, and the author’s involvement with Paraguayan affairs, including politics, has never been seriously interrupted. Hence, when the fall of the Stroessner dictatorship in 1989 finally enabled Roa Bastos to return freely, he did so not as a stranger, but as a venerated elder statesman. Since then he has increased his activities in Paraguay while maintaining his long-time residence in Toulouse, France.

Roa Bastos began his literary career as a poet. Along with Josefina Pla, Hérib Campos Cervera and others, he contributed to the renewal of Paraguayan poetry in the 1940s, publishing El ruiseñor de la aurora y otros poemas [The Nightingale of Dawn and Other Poems] in 1942. Another book of verse, El naranjal ardiente [The Burning Orange Grove], did not appear till 1960, years after its contents—including Roa Bastos’s only writings in Guaraní—were composed. Roa Bastos never felt at home in his poetic vocation, however, and his efforts since the early 1950s have been almost entirely in the genre of prose fiction. Translated into a variety of languages, awarded prizes, even made into film, Roa Bastos’s fiction has truly assumed a place in the world literary pantheon. At times his narratives—and particularly his short stories—resemble those of the best Latin American regionalist writers, Mexico’s Juan Rulfo for example, or Peru’s José María Argüedas, in that they record the pulsations of a particular human community. But like Rulfo and Arguedas, Roa Bastos understood the universality of the particular. He understood that universality in art need not be achieved at the expense of a regional loyalty, and that what is common to all may well be found in what is specific to a few. Hence the global appeal of these stories about the lost and the powerless in the nether places of South America’s least understood country. Roa Bastos’s success has been precisely this: to create broadly human works of art from the regional and national tragedy of Paraguay and the profound circumstance of his own exile.

In 1953 Roa Bastos published his first book of short stories, El trueno entre las hojas [Thunder among the Leaves], in which the characters’ suffering assumes the dimensions of ancient tragedy. Like many of Roa Bastos’s other narratives, these early stories draw their thematic material from the Paraguayan context of economic instability and political repression, especially as these problems affect the rural poor. As his fiction matured, however, Roa Bastos appears to have realized that these themes, however important, are merely accidents on the surface of something at once vaster, deeper and more personal, something developed in the macrocosm of history and lived out in the microcosm of the individual. Hence many of the later stories, and even more so the novels, incorporate the historical motif of dictatorship and the personal one of exile. Story collections published while Stroessner was in power (1954–89) include, among others, El baldío [Vacant Ground], Madera quemada [Burnt Wood], Moriencia [The Experience of Dying], Cuerpo presente [Lying in State], Antología personal [Personal Anthology], and Contar un cuento y otros relatos [To Tell a Tale and Other Stories].

Roa Bastos’s first novel, Hijo de hombre (Son of Man), appeared in 1960 after winning the Losada International Novel Competition of 1959, and in 1990 the author republished it in an altered version. Hijo de hombre is in many ways the Paraguayan epic, embracing as it does much of the nation’s history, from Dr Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia’s dictatorship (1814–40) to the period immediately following the 1931–35 Chaco War with Bolivia. What unites Hijo de hombre despite the relative autonomy of its chapters is a series of thematic dichotomies—freedom/oppression, justice/injustice, heroism/betrayal, and so forth—woven into the lives of the principal characters: Miguel Vera, Gaspar Mora, Casiano and Nati Jara, and Cristóbal (Kiritó) Jara. In terms of structure, the novel generally alternates between the heroic suffering of Mora and the Jaras, and the morally ambiguous recollections of the indecisive intellectual Vera. By theme and structure, therefore, it is tempting to consign this novel to the Manichaean “good versus evil” tradition of Latin American fiction. Such an interpretation, however, fails to account for the complexities of a work of art in which none of the main characters is a mere puppet in the service of Good or of Evil. In its affirmation of a spiritualized popular struggle, Hijo de hombre may be said to anticipate the “theology of liberation” of ensuing decades, but it does so in a deeper way than merely positing the triumph of the downtrodden. For Roa Bastos, as for the best of the liberation theologians, human beings are sophisticated creatures in whom the fragile spark of redemption must be nurtured if it is not to be snuffed out. This nurturing takes place in solidarity with one’s fellow strugglers, and its process is a continuum along which Roa Bastos’s protagonists are never static, never frozen in Manichaen postures of absolute virtue or vice.

Similar affirmations may be made concerning Roa Bastos’s masterpiece Yo el Supremo (I the Supreme), except that here the focus is on a character in whom one would suppose the redemptive spark to be completely extinguished, Paraguay’s notorious dictator Dr Francia. Unlike Carpentier’s El recurso del método (Reasons of State) and García Márquez’s El otoño del patriarca (The Autumn of the Patriarch), which present composites of various dictators, Roa Bastos’s novel purports to be primarily a “dictation” by this singular historical figure, a testament which he, Roa Bastos, has merely “compiled” for posterity. By thus seeming to allow the dictator to speak for himself, Roa Bastos rescues him from the oversimplifying memory of his victims. This is not to say that Roa Bastos’s dictator is a revisionist version who “wasn’t so bad after all.” Roa Bastos’s Francia is all that we had been taught, yet also much more: profoundly evil, yet also profoundly idealistic, profoundly pitiful, profoundly moving, in short, profoundly human.

Roa Bastos’s later novels—Vigilia del Almirante, [Vigil of the Admiral], El Fiscal, [The Prosecutor] and Contravida [Counterlife]—continue his tradition of a searching humanism made potent by bold narrative experimentation. While the first two of these parallel Yo el Supremo in their narrative treatment of major historical figures (Christopher Columbus and the Paraguayan leader, Solano López, respectively), Contravida undertakes a sort of reprise of Roa Bastos’s fictional world, deconstructing and reconstructing many of the characters, settings, and themes found in his previous works. The most important feature of these novels, however, may well be the extrinsic fact that all were published in the post-Stroessner period. The relationship between Paraguay’s exiled writers and those who remained in the country has been a matter of controversy among some Paraguayans, particularly now that the exiles are free to return. Roa Bastos has inevitably—and unwillingly—been drawn into this dichotomy, but his vitality as a writer even after his return from exile is proof of the ultimate hollowness of such divisions. For most readers, Augusto Roa Bastos has earned a place above the fray, having made of his own and his country’s resilience an emblem to which all human beings can aspire.
Biography

Born in Asuncion, Paraguay, 13 June 1917. Fluent in Spanish and Guarani, spent much of his childhood in the town of Iturbe, where his father worked on a sugar plantation. Later attended military school in Asuncion, and fought as a teenager in the Chaco War against Bolivia, 1932–35. Worked in a bank in Asuncion and later editorial staff member for El Pais. Near the end of World War II, travelled in England and France. With the 1947 Civil War in Paraguay, began his exile from the country. Resident in Buenos Aires and, after 1975, in Toulouse, France, working variously as a writer and Professor of Guarani and Spanish American studies at the University of Toulouse. Visited Paraguay sporadically during this period; in 1982 was arrested again and ejected from the country. Since the end of the dictatorship in 1989, has returned freely while maintaining French residence. Recipient of the following awards: Premio de Letras del Memorial de America Latina (Brazil), 1988; Miguel de Cervantes Prize, 1989; Condecoración de la Orden Nacional del Mérito (Paraguay), 1990. Paraguayan signatory to Morelia Declaration, 1991, calling for global ecological reform and indigenous rights.

Selected Works

Novels

Yo el Supremo, Buenos Aires: Siglo XXI, 1974; as I the Supreme, translated by Helen Lane, New York: Knopf, 1986; London: Faber and Faber, 1987

Vigilia del Almirante, Asunción, Paraguay: RP Ediciones, 1992

El Fiscal, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1993

Contravida, Asunción, Paraguay: El Lector, 1994

Short Fiction

El trueno entre las hojas, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1953

El baldio, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1966

Los pies sobre el agua, Buenos Aires: CEDAL, 1967

Madera quemada, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1967

Moriencia, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1969

Cuerpo presente y otros textos, Buenos Aires: CEDAL, 1971

El pollito de fuego, Buenos Aires:ediciones de La Flor, 1974

Contar un cuento y otros relatos, edited by Ana Becciu, Buenos Aires: Kapelusz, 1984

Poetry

El ruiseñor de la aurora y otros poemas, Asuncion, Paraguay: Imprenta Nacional, 1942

El naranjal ardiente, nocturno paraguayo, Asuncion, Paraguay: Diálogo, 1960

Screenplays

Other Writings
Cándido López, Parma, Italy: F.M. Ricci, 1976
Imagen y perspectivas de la narrativa latinoamericana actual, Mexico City: UNAM, 1979
Lucha hasta el alba, Asunción: Arte Nuevo, 1979
Rafael Barrett y la realidad paraguaya a comienzos del siglo, Stockholm: Instituto de Estudios Latinoamericanos, 1981
Carta abierta a mi pueblo, Buenos Aires: Frente Paraguayo, 1986
El texto cautivo: el escritor y su obra, Alcalá de Henares, Spain: Fundación Colegio del Rey, 1990
Mis reflexiones sobre el guión cinematográfico y el guión de “Hijo de hombre,” Asunción: RP Ediciones, 1993

Compilations and Anthologies
Antología personal, Mexico City: Nueva Imagen, 1980
Escritos políticos de Augusto Roa Bastos, edited by Marta Teresa Casteros, Buenos Aires: Instituto de Estudios de Literatura Latinoamericana, 1984
Augusto Roa Bastos: antología narrativa y poética, edited by Paco Tovar, Barcelona: Ánthropos, 1991

Further Reading
Aldana, Adolfo L., La cuentística de Augusto Roa Bastos, Montevideo: Géminis, 1975
Burgos, Fernando (editor), Las voces del karaí: estudios sobre Augusto Roa Bastos, Madrid: Edelsa, 1988
——Augusto Roa Bastos, Boston: Twayne, 1978
Lewis, Tracy K., Roa Bastos: precursor del post-boom, Mexico City: Katún, 1983
——“El naranjal ardiente de Augusto Roa Bastos: cifra textual de la biculturalidad paraguaya,” in Primer simposio ardiente de Augusto Roa Bastos: cifra textual de la biculturalidad paraguaya, Asunción, Paraguay: IDIAL, 1989
Sosnowski, Saúl (editor), Augusto Roa Bastos y la producción cultural americana, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1986

Yo el Supremo

Novel by Augusto Roa Bastos
Since its publication in 1974, Yo el Supremo has assumed the status of “masterpiece” in the public eye. If taken to mean the sole climax of Roa Bastos’s distinguished career, the term is probably inappropriate, but as a tribute to the quality of this novel it is certainly correct. Yo el Supremo is commonly considered part of two trilogies: first, the triad of Latin American “dictator narratives,” of which the other two are Carpentier’s El recurso del método, 1974 (Reasons of State) and García Márquez’s El otoño del patriarca, 1975 (The Autumn of the Patriarch), and second, Roa Bastos’s own “Paraguayan trilogy,” of which the others are Hijo de hombre, 1960 (Son of Man) and El Fiscal, 1993 [The Prosecutor]. Yo el Supremo, in other words, has a deliberate place in both the broad, horizontal spectrum of contemporary Latin American letters and the deep, vertical, downward and inward probing of the best Paraguayan writing.

To consider Yo el Supremo within these trilogies only enhances qualities which it displays perfectly well on its own. Good as the other novels are, one need not read them for clues to the universality and profound personal vision of Yo el Supremo. The novel’s central character is a historical figure, the dictator Dr José Gaspar Rodríguez de Francia, who ruled Paraguay from 1814 to 1840. To reveal his protagonist’s story, Roa hit upon an ingenious and deceptively simple device: he allows the dictator to dictate. That is to say, the bulk of the text is precisely Dr Francia’s “dictation” to his secretary Patiño, a vast panoply of musings, reminiscences, facts and exhortations of which Roa Bastos declares himself merely the “compiler.” Unrestricted to conventional “this-worldly” chronologies, the novel’s action is situated posthumously and prefaced by a proclamation in the dictator’s handwriting, announcing the dismemberment of his body. Thus placed at the beginning of the novel, the proclamation has the vital function of unraveling the “dictation” which follows. Hence the reader is treated to the building and un-building of an immense, detailed panorama of Paraguayan history from colonial times to the present, a parade of figures and forces from almost two centuries of national and international evolution. Culled from various sources which the “compiler” cites in a “Final Note” at the end, this multitude of information flows together in a complex reconstruction of Francia’s life and legacy. Posterity’s judgment has been hard on Francia, but not unanimous, and it is this ambiguity which resonates so vibrantly in Roa Bastos’s narrative. By relegating himself to the status of “compiler” Roa Bastos subverts the traditional idea of the author as creator of his work, and by ceding the narrative function to the dictator, he diversifies and humanizes a man whom history is tempted to remember with onedimensional horror. Killer, monster, sadist: these images are not invalidated by the text, but they are complemented and contextualized by other images as the dictator’s own words confront documents and legends that have emerged concerning him in the course of history. Dr Francia is at once culprit and judge, tyrant and defender of his tyranny, perpetrator and justifier of policies which at least punished the corrupt and kept at bay those outside forces which would have ground Paraguay to dust. Roa Bastos’s Francia thus stands in sharp contrast to the lesser satraps of later days, especially Stroessner, whose murderous policies had no higher purpose than personal enrichment and the perpetuation of power.

Traditional scholarship would insist upon some discussion of the “themes” woven into Yo el Supremo, and indeed, one can undertake to produce a catalogue of these: liberty and repression, the moral costs of national independence, the personal hell of the tyrant, and so forth. One quickly discovers, however, that the array of these “messages” is almost innumerable, and that their individual content is probably less important than the discourse which encourages their expression. Putting it another way, we may say that discourse is content in Yo el Supremo, not in the sense of Marshall McLuhan’s famous dictum, but in the way Roa Bastos’s language embodies a vision of human interaction. In posing questions rather than solutions, in eschewing the unitary and embracing the pluralistic, in juxtaposing dictation and dissent, in gravitating always away from the entrenched and coercive Word-that-went-before and toward alternative emerging discourse, in humanizing the tyrant, Roa Bastos’s language encodes freedom. As Carlos Pacheco states in his introduction to the novel (Caracas, 1986), Roa Bastos relativizes el Supremo, placing the latter’s authoritarian voice in the company of other, contrary, voices. The dictator’s discourse vies with competing discourses, not only from political opponents and subsequent generations, but from within his own soul. This relativization, however, is not to be confused with moral relativism. As Pacheco indicates—and his echoes of Bakhtin here are quite deliberate—Roa Bastos’s well-defined position is precisely this facilitation of the multiple positions of one’s fellow human beings, this rejection of partisan monoliths, this profoundly democratic commitment to the complexity of life.

At its most superficial level, Yo el Supremo is “about” the historical figure Francia, but by installing himself in the dictator’s psyche, Augusto Roa Bastos gives us a narrative that is “within” Francia and as such, “about” the world as he sees it. And that world includes the reader. Yo el Supremo reverses the normal perspective of historical fiction, which contemplates the deeds of “real” heroes and villains from the safe haven of the ether around them, as if these protagonists were pure surface, empty sheaths of skin responding solely to surrounding stimuli. Roa Bastos’s Francia is surface substantiated by mind, heart and will; it is he who contemplates and defines his surroundings, and ultimately he who contemplates the ether in which the reader sits. The novel is about Dr Francia; but also through Francia, it is about us.

TRACY K.LEWIS AND TERESA MÉNDEZ-FAITH

Editions

First edition: Yo el Supremo, Buenos Aires: Siglo XXI, 1974
Translation: I the Supreme, by Helen Lane, New York: Knopf, 1986; London: Faber and Faber, 1987

Further Reading

Aceves, R., et al., Acercamientos críticos a “Yo el Supremo” de Augusto Roa Bastos, Guadalajara, Mexico: Universidad de Guadalajara, 1990
Seminario sobre “Yo el Supremo” de Augusto Roa Bastos, Poitiers, France: Centre de Recherches Latino-Americaines de l’Université de Poitiers, 1976
Textos sobre el texto: segundo seminario sobre “Yo el Supremo” de Augusto Roa Bastos, Poitiers, France: Centre de Recherches Latino-Americaines de l’Université de Poitiers, 1980
Weldt-Basson, Helene Carol, Augusto Roa Bastos’s “I the Supreme”: a Dialogic Perspective, Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1993
José Enrique Rodó 1871–1917

Uruguayan essayist

The foremost figure in modernista essay writing in Spanish, José Enrique Rodó's influence can be judged from two angles: his literary criticism and his philosophy of art and morality. Just as his own prose is characterised by Apollonian balance in ideas and style, he rejected the decadent versions of Modernismo prevalent in Spanish at the time. His attitude in this respect is expounded in his 1899 essay on Darío, his first work to have international repercussion, where he hails the Nicaraguan as the first professional poet in Latin America. “Nada sino el arte” (Nothing but art), Rodó approvingly finds in the best Darío. Rodó’s typical even-handed stance shows in this essay. On the one hand, he defends Darío from critics that request more life in his poetry by praising his individuality. On the other hand, as well as criticising some specific poems, Rodó attacks Darío’s more frivolous followers for their “pecado de profanación” (sin of profanation) in depriving spiritual things of their innocence. The essay closes with a piece of advice to the poet on his imminent visit to Spain: may he take with him encouragement for the flowering of the common language and renewed vigour to the uncertain youth of Spain. In fact, this is the very task Rodó set himself in his most influential work, Ariel, a short essay where he exhorts the youth of Latin America not to pursue only materialistic goals to the detriment of their spiritual development.

Rodó’s role of mentor to the young is evident throughout his work, although much of it was written in his twenties and thirties. Whilst Ariel is Rodó’s most explicit message to young Latin Americans, his most ambitious work is Motivos de Proteo, 1909 (The Motives of Proteus), where he focuses on the evolution of the personality. Inspired by the figure of Proteus, Rodó produced a work which is difficult to classify: a book of wisdom made up of 158 short chapters that can stand on their own as expanded aphorisms. The book opens with the statement that “Reformarse es vivir…” (Life is constant renewal…), and sets out to explore the tools of conscious transformation, the unconscious forces that affect the personality, the notions of vocation and genius and its lesser alternatives (such as dilettantism), the value of travelling and the positive roles of love, hope and willpower.

The reader is told that although the human self is constant changing, we should not be merely victims of change but instead strive to be its agents through self-knowledge, conviction and awareness of circumstances around us. We must not lose the curiosity of childhood and fall into personal stagnancy. We must learn to live with change not drastically but gradually: in Rodó’s own image, personal growth should follow not a straight line but a curve; we must also be ready to cope with the unexpected. These several points are made clear in chapter 7: “Rítmica y lenta evolución de ordinario; reacción esforzada da si es preciso; cambio consciente y ordenado, siempre” (Evolution following a regular pace as the ordinary pattern; forceful reaction if necessary; conscious and directed change, always). As the book’s title indicates, the self for Rodó is far from a simple or unified entity, and therefore there are sections on inner contradictions and on the fears that individuals encounter within themselves. There are, indeed, advantages to inner complexity: unlike the dilettante, the ascetic or the stoic, for whom it may inspire pleasing curiosity, craving for a static essence or passive surrendering to circumstances, Rodó proposes that from our multifacetic nature we draw inspiration for constant renewal. and evolution: individual “variación espontánea” (spontaneous variation) thus parallels the evolutionary processes in nature and society, and the “perenne reacción de los contrarios” (perennial reaction of opposites) is the stuff from which original thought arises.

Rodó’s text aims to represent development, the preface speaking of a book in perpetual becoming, an open book. This is evident also in the language used, rich in similes and metaphors from nature and traditional trades (e.g., action follows from self-discovery like he who builds a home with stones from his own quarry, or forges a sword from his own iron mine, extensive classical and modern references, and the periodic inclusion of parables that have assumed a semi-independent existence since the book was first published. One of the most famous and beautifully written is “Los seis peregrinos” [The Six Pilgrims], where four individuals abandon the journey out of doubts over their commitment, whilst the two who finally arrive at their destination represent on the one hand, the undesirable somnambulistic fervour of the fanatic and on the other, the equilibrium of the person who, whilst aware of the best of worldly experience, guides his life according to a higher goal.

The underlying philosophy in Rodó’s work is humanist and idealist in the sense that it aims to address issues that affect individuals regardless of their specific circumstances. The fact that he does not engage in the details of actual social contexts has led to criticism from different quarters, which one of Rodó’s most sensitive and incisive critics, the Uruguayan Carlos Real de Azúa (whose rambling and rich style might owe something to Rodó’s influence), has summarised with flair in his article on “El problema de la valoración de Rodó” [The Problem of Evaluating Rodó]. The main areas of attack are social and religious. The exponents of the latter criticise the absence of an appetite for the Absolute in Rodó’s protean philosophy. Those who take a social or political stance denounce the bourgeois origins of Rodó’s ideas, dismiss his liberalism as supportive of the status quo and question his dislike of mass mediocrity and his doctrine of inner freedom; they also point to the lack of specific references in his work to the burning issues of Latin America, considering Rodó’s European and urban sources of little relevance to the experience of the greatest section of Latin American society and in particular its Amerindian population. What is common in the social critiques is an unwillingness to engage with Rodó’s ideas at the level he intended them to be understood. It is evident, however, that his ideas are not incompatible with practical or political concerns. In fact, not only did Rodó write on social and historical matters (see, for instance, his essays on Bolívar or Montalvo and his study on labour in Uruguay), but he also produced several important papers during his time as a member of parliament. It is also worthy of mention to an English-speaking reader that he was a fundamental source of inspiration to the Labour politician Aneurin Bevan for whom, according to his biographer Michael Foot, “next to Marx, and in a few respects superseding Marx, Rodó had the most powerful effect on his intellectual outlook.”

Rodó’s propensity to search in European sources is understandable for a man of his time and nationality. Uruguay lacks an Amerindian culture and its population has been drawn from European immigrants (Rodó’s father was from Barcelona). As Real de Azua’s brilliant prologue to the Ayacucho edition (1976) shows, Motivos de Proteo can be related to the situation of Uruguay at the time of writing, when Rodó felt the effects of cultural asphyxia. He had planned to publish his major work in Barcelona during a journey that only materialised several years later when he became the European correspondent for a Buenos Aires newspaper. He was to die in Europe, nine months after leaving Montevideo. Three years later his remains were repatriated and buried with full state honours before a massive crowd. A sign of his national importance was the spontaneous decision by students in Montevideo to interrupt and call off a demonstration on hearing the news of his death. Rodó’s conciliatory manner—often reflected in his periodic style—could also be seen as a response to rather turbulent times in Uruguayan politics, which only ended in 1904 with the last caudillo rebellion. It may be, furthermore, that the enduring respect for Rodó in Uruguayan official circles and his inclusion in school syllabuses has contributed to the country’s tradition of political partnership and common sense during the bulk of this century.

Encyclopedia of Latin American literature        1326

GUSTAVO SAN ROMÁN

Biography

Selected Works

La vida nueva, 3 vols, Montevideo: Dornaleche y Reyes, 1897–1900
I. “El que vendrará” and “La novela nueva,” Montevideo: Dornaleche y Reyes, 1897
II. Rubén Darío, Montevideo: Dornaleche y Reyes, 1899
III. Ariel, Montevideo: Dornaleche y Reyes, 1900; as Ariel, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1988
Liberalismo y Jacobinismo, Montevideo: El Siglo Ilustrado, 1906
Motivos de Proteo, Montevideo: J.M.Serrano, 1909; as The Motives of Proteus, translated by Ángel Flores with an introduction by Havelock Ellis, London: Allen and Unwin, 1929
El mirador de Próspero, Montevideo: J.M.Serrano, 1913
El camino de Paros, Valencia: Editorial Cervantes, 1919

Compilations and Anthologies
Obras completas, 7 vols, Valencia: Editorial Cervantes, 1917–27
Further Reading

An early 20th-century thinker, such as Rodó, has fallen out of fashion, something which is reflected in the publication dates of several of the critical studies listed below. These, however, help to place him in his historical context and shed light on how the history of ideas has developed in Spanish America.

Albarrán Puente, Glicerio, El pensamiento de José Enrique Rodó, Madrid: Cultura Hispánica, 1953

Ette, Ottmar, “Así habló Próspero; Nietzsche, Rodó y la modernidad filosófica de Ariel,” Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 528 (June 1994)

Henríquez Ureña, Max, Rodó y Rubén Darío, Havana: Sociedad Educativa Cuba Contemporánea, 1918

Meyer-Minnemann, Klaus, La novela hispanoamericana del “fin de siècle,” Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1991 [Chapter three has a section on Rodó’s nueva novela]

Real de Azúa, Carlos, “El problema de la valoración de Rodó,” in his Historia visible e historia esotérica, Montevideo: Arca, 1975

——Prologue to Ariel and Motivos de Proteo, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1976

Ariel

Essay by José Enrique Rodó
The essay takes the form of a farewell speech by an old school-master. The teacher, called Prospero by his pupils, sets out to advise his class, paradigmatic of the youth of America to whom the book is dedicated, on the virtues of idealism. He does so under the gaze of a statue of Ariel which decorates his study. After an introduction which establishes the symbolic value of Ariel and Caliban in The Tempest, as the forces of reason and instinct respectively, the text is divided into six parts. Part one deals with the renovating role of youth, whose energy is needed to build the future of the continent, in particular at the current time when cynicism and despair appear to hold sway. Prospero warns that although nature has endowed youth with enthusiasm, it still requires ideals to realize its full potential. Part two expounds on the need for each individual to develop his personality in all its potential and across the full range of abilities, stressing that disinterested concerns must not be discarded for the benefit of narrow specialization. This section contains the famous story of the “hospitable King” who, though generally immersed in the life of state, retires periodically to a private chamber to meditate. The tale is an allegory of the wellrounded individual, who must find room for the pursuance of otium, that is, of creative idleness. Part three posits the awareness of beauty as the guiding principle behind education. Aesthetics and ethics are equally worthy forms of disinterested pursuit and the prevalence of one over the other implies an imbalance, as in frivolous art or stern asceticism. Part four is concerned with the utilitarian attitude, and discusses the then current view that democracy implies mediocrity; Prospero’s stance typifies Rodó’s tendency to reconcile contradictory positions by accepting the benefits of each. Democracy should combine egalitarian Christian values with Hellenic respect for hierarchy, and Prospero envisages that democracy, like science, is bound to improve through education and knowledge. The ideal state is one where all are given the same opportunity so that the best can reach positions of leadership. Part five, which became the most influential, focuses on the United States, where utilitarian goals seemed to Prospero to dominate to the detriment of disinterested moral and artistic excellence. After a complimentary review of the attributes of North American society, Prospero expresses concern over a growing Latin American nordomanía (a fixation with “the North”) which risks overlooking the subcontinent’s own roots in the Latin tradition. He is particularly critical of the United States’ apparent contempt for European civilization. Part six concentrates on Latin America. Prospero notes that already in the subcontinent there are great cities that could lose sight of cultural development, and exhorts his audience, as the forgers of the future, to follow the inspiration of Ariel, symbol of constant human self-improvement, “idealidad y orden en la vida, noble inspiración en el pensamiento, desinteres en moral, buen gusto en arte, heroísmo en la acción, delicadeza en las costumbres” (idealism and order in life, noble inspiration in thought, selflessness in morality, good taste in art, heroism in action, delicacy in habits).

The ideas which inspired Rodó were dominant at the time in the West, his main influences being French (Renan, Taine, Montaigne, Fouillée), English and American (Macaulay, Carlyle, Emerson), as well as the classics. (In his critical edition of Ariel, Gordon Brotherston presents a succinct and scholarly review of Rodó’s sources). But Rodó tended to pick and mix from these sources and to criticize them if need be, as in the case of Renan’s oligarchical theories, which he rejected as reactionary. It is also relevant to stress the historical context within which Ariel was written: in the wake of the war of 1898 when the US defeated Spain and won control over her last colonies in the continent. But although the book’s criticism of the “Colossus of the North” carries a largely implicit rejection of that country’s growing hegemony over its Latin neighbours, sight should not be lost of Rodó’s mainly philosophical enterprise. His idealism is best understood as representative of a contemporary response to the excesses of positivism and its corollary, utilitarianism.

Ariel has been the target of much praise as well as much criticism. The book and his author spawned a movement of Latin American intellectuals known as arielismo which included, at some point in their careers, such figures as Pedro Henríquez Ureña and Alfonso Reyes. In Uruguay in 1917, a students’ seminar christened itself Ariel and published a review to spread the message of the book from 1919 to 1931. It is worthy of note that the first president of Ariel was Carlos Quijano, who was to found Marcha (1939–74), an influential weekly renowned for its cultural section and for its increasingly americanista stance. Quijano, a political scientist proud of his arielista beginnings and the undisputed maestro of a whole generation of Uruguayan intellectuals, set himself the task of combining high standards of morality with a shrewd analysis of the social reality of Uruguay and Latin America.

A summary of the critical views on Rodó up to the mid-1960s is provided in the previous essay; two more recent attacks are worthy of mention. The first is Roberto Fernández Retamar’s powerful Calibán (1971). Written from both a Marxist and a Third World perspective, which sees Prospero as European invader and Caliban as enslaved Amerindian, this essay overturns the allegory of Rodó’s work: “Our symbol then is not Ariel, as Rodó thought, but rather Caliban.” Retamar’s stance is based on the notion of mestizaje, a concept which was closer to his own experience (and that of the sources he quotes, Martí, Bolívar, Vasconcelos and others from the northern part of Latin America) than to the Uruguayan Rodó. But otherwise the text is fairly respectful of its predecessor. Preferring to read Ariel at a political rather than philosophical level, the critic sees its most enduring value as a “launching pad” for later and more politically aware perceptions of the United States. He also grants that Ariel “exalts democracy, moral values, and emulation,” and calls his own essay a homage to “the great Uruguayan whose centenary is being celebrated this year.” In a postscript, “Calibán Revisited” (1986), the author gives the context to his essay: a time of tension between the revolutionary leaders in Cuba, and the “ivory tower [Latin American] intellectuals” living in Europe. There were two main reasons for the tension; the first was the writers’ support or indifference towards Mundo Nuevo, the review edited by Emir Rodríguez Monegal and reputedly funded by the CIA. (Monegal’s second edition of Rodó’s complete works is contemporary with Mundo Nuevo). The second reason was the dispute over the “Padilla case,” which led some Latin American writers in Europe to write two letters criticising Fidel Castro. Calibán is thus perhaps best seen as a response to what Rodó could symbolise to a supporter of Cuba in the context of 1971, namely a distancing by Latin American intellectuals from the social realities of their continent. A more recent and much more negative critique is Roberto González Echevarría’s chapter on Ariel in his 1985 book, The Voice of the Masters, written in Yale deconstructionist vein. The main charge, pursued by a range of associations in the chapter, concerns the “violence” implicit in the generic form of Ariel, which, it is argued, though apparently a dialogue is in effect a lecture and thus a discourse of authority. The problem with this reading is that it allocates a malice of intention to Ariel which seems unnecessary. Rodó was quite open about Ariel being a work of “propaganda” (his word) for the future of Latin America, and its didactic intention, reinforced by the choice of a classroom for the setting, is quite explicit in the essay itself. (As for Echevarría’s charges of paternalism on the part of Prospero, the reader is directed to chapter 77 of Rodó's Motivos de Proteo, on the position of the master).

It would seem as if the future of this slim volume will continue to waver between attempts to apply its contents to contemporary preoccupations and to rescue the author’s intentions and context. A sign, presumably, of its status as a seminal text.

GUSTAVO SAN ROMAN

See also entries on Caliban, Une Tempête (Aimé Césaire), Civilization and Barbarism
Editions

First edition: La vida nueva, III: Ariel, Montevideo: Dornaleche y Reyes, 1900
Critical editions: edited with an introduction by Gordon Brotherston, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967; there is a later edition, with a prologue by Carlos Real de Azua and a chronology by Ángel Rama, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1976. This volume includes Motivos de Proteo.
Translation: Ariel, by Margaret Sayers Peden, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1988 [Foreword by James W. Symington; prologue by Carlos Fuentes; glossary of names; annotated bibliography]

Further Reading

Fernández Retamar, Roberto, Caliban and Other Essays, translated by Edward Baker; foreword by Fredric Jameson, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1989

Gonzalo Rojas 1917–

Chilean poet

In one of Latin America’s “republic of poets,” namely, Chile, Gonzalo Rojas received little attention before the late 1970s. Then, with Oscuro [Darkness] in 1977 and subsequent volumes, he has been acknowledged by many critics in both his own country and Hispanic American as the most important living Chilean poet.

His relatively inconspicuous status up to the age of sixty (he had published just two books of verse before Oscuro) is partly explainable, of course by his late start in publishing. Before 1977 he had an important, if informal, role as the poet’s poet; through both personal contact and a close reading, many younger aspirants to lyrical perfection were influenced by his restless incursions into the unknown. It can also be noted that a late start in learning to read—at the age of eight in Rojas’s case—is not necessarily an obstacle to a writer’s development and proficiency.

As a person Rojas is unassuming, disarmingly natural, and also totally confident. In poetry his motivation is constant; the depth and breadth of his vision, close to infinite. In a revealing recollection, “De donde viene uno,” 1988 [Where One Comes From], he declares: “And my view of the world? My perspectives are mainly three: numinous in the context of the holy; the erotic and all the dialects of love; and that of the immediate witness of immediate life (even though it is claimed that no one testifies in favor of witness) included in that are the actions of the political witness, but without affiliation. Probably one should resort to silence. But no. Not yet. At least not yet. I’m undergoing a rebirth in the best sense, a re-childhood, a spontaneity I can hardly explain. It’s as if I allowed language to speak through me. It resembles carelessness, yet its a maximum awareness. I’m letting the waters speak, and rise, and express themselves.”

Thus, this poet strives to write on the basis of that trinity of perspectives: the spirit (lo numinoso), sexuality understood as inseparable from love, and as a privileged witness of immediate, remote and recondite things. Like Walt Whitman and Pablo Neruda before him, he considers all material and every object and circumstances to have poetic potential: for example, a squashed butterfly as the image of ultimate victimization, a search—of cosmic as well as of comic portions—for a female hair, a black cat as a metaphor of infinite dangers, Greek deities in sporadic rebirth, a mirror that doesn’t reflect, the implicit threats of a helicopter, a 14th-century archpriest on a bicycle and, over and over, a buzzing sound (el zumbido). To his ear this sound is many things: a symbol of origins, the underside of language, fear, exhilaration, a message from unknown sources and, especially, the fundamental music of poetry. In the testimony quoted above (“De done viene uno”) he recalls that when he began to write at an early age “verses buzzed in my ears, and I set about transcribing them, right away, almost as I do now.”

A distinctive feature of the leading Chilean poets of the 20th century, including Gabriela Mistral, Vicente Huidobro (his claims of having established the trend he called Creacionismo not withstanding), Neruda, Pablo de Rokha, Nicanor Parra and Rojas himself, is their extreme individuality. That is, they did not initiate movements, fashions or schools comparable to English Romanticism, Hispanic American Modernismo, or French Surrealism. Rather, they exercised the five experimental senses and registered their discoveries in a kind of expansive, continuous autobiography. Such is the case with Rojas’s poem “Carbon” [Coal], an intense recollection of his father, the persevering miner exploited by his employers and embittered by misfortune, who is about to return home late at night. In the context of his creative independence it should be noted that after a brief courtship in 1938 with a trendy and quasiSurrealist group in Chile organized and named Mandrágora by Braulio Arenas, Enrique Gómez-Correa and Jorge Cáceres, Gonzalo Rojas withdrew from it, describing its members as “lacking the genius” and originality of Europe’s best poets of the times.

Thus, varied influences rather than any current fashion strongly affected him; his favorite creators were also his heroes—those who apparently “lived” their poetry rather than writing it as a separatist ritual—and ranged from Mistral, Huidobro and Neruda in his own land to Quevedo, Whitman, Lautréamont and Vallejo elsewhere. That broad congeniality served him well in his discovery of magical mysteries.

His individuality aside, Rojas often stresses the deeper requirement of an intimate relationship between poet and listener (“Not for the reader: for the listener” is the dedication to his second largest collection—177 poems—Del relámpago [From the Lightning]. Thus, rather than a precarious development from juvenile simplicity to complex maturity as in the case with many poets, Gonzalo Rojas has given us a perennial, continuous work that reflects and reconsider and interrogates the universe at every turn.

PETER G.EARLE
Biography

Born in Chile, 1917. Member of Chilean Generation of 1938. Father a miner. Studied in the Faculty of Arts, University of Santiago. Taught miners of the Atacama desert region to read, early 1940s. Teacher in Venezuela, 1975–79. Professor at Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah, in late 1980s.Recipient of the following awards: National Prize for Literature, 1992; Reina Sofia Prize for Poetry, 1992.

Selected Works

Poetry
La miseria del hombre, Valparaiso: Romas, 1948
Contra la muerte, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1964
Oscuro, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1977
Transierro, Madrid: Taranto, 1979
Criptico y otros poemas, Iztapalapa: Universidad Autónoma Metropolitana, Unidad Iztapalapa, 1984
El alumbrado, Santiago de Chile: Ganymedes, 1986
El alumbrado y otros poemas, Madrid: Cátedra, 1987
Antología personal, Mexico City: Premiá Editora, 1988
Materia de testamento, Madrid: Hiperión, 1988
Antología de aire, Santiago de Chile: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1991
Las hermosas: poesías de amor, Madrid: Hiperión, 1991

Essays and Testimonial Works
“La palabra,” in Antología de la poesía chilena, edited by Alfonso Calderón, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1970
“Recado del errante,” in Gabriela Mistral, edited by Miella Servodidio and Marcelo Coddou, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1980
“De done viene uno,” introduction to his Materia de testamento, Madrid: Hiperión, 1988

Translation
Schizotext and Other Poems, translated by Russell M.Cluff and L. Howard Quackenbush, New York: Peter Lang, 1988

Compilations and Anthologies
Cinco visiones: selección de poemas, Salamanca: Ediciones Universidad de Salamanca, 1992

Further Reading
Coddou, Marcelo, Poética de la poesía activa, Madrid: Lar, 1984
———Nuevos estudios sobre la poesía de Gonzalo Rojas, Santiago de Chile: Sinfonteras, 1986
Manuel Rojas 1896–1973

Chilean prose writer

Manuel Rojas was born in Argentina and certain dualities of his formative years led to a constant movement, during a third of his life, between Buenos Aires and turn-of-the-century Santiago de Chile; the latter being at that time much less metropolitan than the Argentine capital. These are continuous shifts that begin to define the wandering nature both of his own self and that of his characters, with the panorama of the high Andes becoming fixed, insistently, as the focal point of his vision. He spent time also in Rosario and in Mendoza, the latter, a town on the eastern slopes of the Andes. It is in the former that he took to reading, in that domestic way that he was to recall in Hijo de ladrón, 1951 (Born Guilty), swapping serialized stories for peaches; in Mendoza he made his earliest contacts with anarchists. There he worked as a navvy on the trans-Andean Railway, then under construction; he helped to bring in the grape harvest and did several other jobs that brought him into close contact with plain, enthusiastic folk who communicated new ideas to him, sometimes extravagant convictions, but an indisputable faith in human destiny. It was his apprenticeship in life, as he was to repeat in nearly all his stories, with their pressing demands: pangs of hunger, biting cold, all of which led him to make an impassioned plea for the bare essentials which human beings must have to live with dignity.

Rojas’s production may be divided into two main periods, separated by a lengthy authorial silence. 1924, the year in which he probably settled in Chile (or 1926 when he published his first collection of short stories, Hombres del sur [Men of the South]), marks the beginning of a literary period which culminates very precisely in 1938, when the Popular Front saw victory at the polls. This is the year when Rojas published his significant collection of essays, De la poesía a la revolución [From Poetry to Revolution], which brings together essays he had conceived over a period of ten years (the earliest dates from 1930). They consist of an examination of the changes Rojas perceives in world narrative, of the criollismo that had marked Chilean literature of the previous decades; De la poesía a la revolución is also a rigorous self-criticism of Rojas’s first period as a writer, that characterized by Hombres del sur and El delincuente, 1929 [The Delinquent]. It follows that between 1938 and 1951 Rojas published nothing in book form (his contributions to the journal, Babel, are of another order and El bonete maulino, 1943 [The Bonnet from the Maule River] is largely a collection of earlier stories). This silence that lasted for over a decade was the gestation period of his most influential novel, Hijo de ladrón, which gave him a continental readership and made him the outstanding Chilean narrative writer of the first half of the 20th century.

Both in his major novels and in his last work, La oscura vida radiante [A Life of Darkness and Light], Rojas’s literary world remained firmly in the 1920s, or in the years immediately preceding them. It is on that threshold or annunciatory evening that Lanchas en la bahía, 1932 [Boats in the Bay], his most typical story of the early period takes place, and also his massive later novels: Hijo de ladrón, Mejor que el vino, 1958 [Better Than Wine] and Sombras contra el muro, 1964 [Shadows on the Wall]. Almost the last lines of the 1932 story contain the saying “A freir monos en Guayaquil” or, “take a running jump at yourself,” (something that is remembered and repeated in the 1964 novel). Effectively, these “shadows on the wall” are echoes and prolongations of earlier lives that are now shown—on what wall? We do not know whether on the Wailing Wall or that of Jericho, as is suggested to readers, in tense contradiction, until the end of this notable text.

The years before 1920 are charged with anarchist preaching. The IWW (Industrial Workers of the World), as from 1914 at least, gave some measure of organization to anarchist circles, which functioned in a chaotic way. The shadow of that unfortunate youth, Efraín Plaza Olmedo, passes through Sombras contra el muro. He belonged to anarchist legends of the period, and there is a detailed account of his misfortunes by Carlos Vicuña Fuentes in his classic testimonial, La tiranía en Chile [The Tyranny in Chile]. Sombras contra el muro also contains several references to that breviary of the anarcho-individualists, Max Stirner’s The Ego and its Property. Stirner was one of the thinkers criticized by Marx and Engels in The German Ideology and who, according to many accounts, made a considerable impact on Chilean literature of the period.

This evidence makes it possible to correct the existential or existentialist character often attributed to Rojas’s fiction. This alleged Existentialism in Rojas’s work is nothing other than the specific form taken by his anarchism, the particular tone in which anarchist experiences—via Stirner, appear in his production. The characters that people Rojas’s world, who have something of the worker, something of the drifter, and are nearly always criminally inclined, are what allows a gradual transformation of anarchism as a social ideal, in a particular subjective posture of separation, tension and hostility towards society. The narratives pass through accumulated layers of characters, from those with craft-based jobs, to those made redundant and, then, tramps until reaching specific forms of the lumpen in the occupation and activity of thieves.

Thus, in principle, Hijo de ladrón is revealed to us as a theological metaphor in which the thieves of Mount Calvary dwell with two others, the name of one being none other than Christian. The religious substratum of anarchism flowers here, inasmuch as it is the lay sedimentation of evangelical conduct. Not “son of God,” but “son of a thief”: in this ascendancy—hounded and on the fringes of society—Aniceto Hevia, the main hero of Rojas’s cycle of novels, founds his most humbled nobility, in the midst of the monotonous and wretched landscape of the lives of his fellow beings. In the 1960s Rojas was to write an important travel book about a journey to Israel, Viaje al país de los profetas, 1969 [Journey to the Land of the Prophets], and in this way Stirner and the Bible come together to offer a Utopian international gospel which Rojas, as a skilled narrator, modulates in accordance with experiences of the period and the local conditions of the trans-Andean region.

JAIME CONCHA
translated by Verity Smith

Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 8 January 1896. Family moved to Santiago de Chile, 1899. From 1900 to 1922 travelled continually from the Chilean to the Argentine side of the Andes working at a variety of jobs and learning various skills. Clashed with authorities owing to his support of anarchism. Wrote for anarchist newspapers such as La Batalla (Chile) and La Protesta (Buenos Aires), from 1915. Actor and prompter in the Teatro de Alejandro Flores, 1919–20; on tour in Argentina and Uruguay with Teatro de Mario-Padin, 1921–22. Won second prize in a two short story contests organised by Buenos Aires publications in 1922 and 1923. Continued to work in a range of jobs. Married Maria Eugenia Baeza in 1928 (died in 1936); three children. In the early 1930s he began to run the printing press of the University of Chile. Contributed to the newspaper La Últimas Noticias, 1933–41. President of the Society of Chilean Writers, 1937. Married Valeria López Edwards in 1941 (separated in 1962). Director of the Anales de la Universidad de Chile (Annals of the University of Chile), 1951. Taught at several universities in the United States from 1959 to 1963. Married Hortensia Dittborn in 1963. On his return to Chile he contributed to the literary journal Ercilla and hosted the TV programme, “Jurado Literario” (Literary Jury). Travelled abroad, 1966–67. Awarded Chilean National Prize for Literature, 1957. Died 11 March 1973.

Selected Works

Short Fiction

Hombres del sur, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1926
El delincuente, Santiago de Chile: Imprenta Universitaria, 1929
Lanchas en la bahía, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1932 [novella]
Travesía, Santiago de Chile: Nascimento, 1934
El bonete maulino, Santiago de Chile: Cruz del Sur, 1943

Novels

La ciudad de los Césares, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1936
Mejor que el vino, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1958
Punta de rieles, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1960
Sombras contra el muro, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1964
La oscura vida radiante, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1971

Other Writings

De la poesía a la revolución, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1938 [articles and essays]
Viaje al país de los profetas, Buenos Aires: Ediciones Zlotopioro, 1969

Anthologies and Compilations
Antología de cuentos, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1957

Further Reading

Bibliographies

Romanticism

In Western culture, Romanticism was the first aesthetic response to both the French and the Industrial Revolutions. In Spanish America and Brazil it acquired a character of its own. Here Romanticism coincided with the realisation of political independence which, in the majority of countries, took place during the first quarter of the 19th century and continued up to the end of the century. Romanticism evolved in stages and involved various generations.

In Brazil, the decision to move the court to Rio de Janeiro (1808), with the beginning of extensive urban planning, and the declaration of political independence (1822) provided the framework for the development of historical autonomy. Between 1820 and 1870, the social structure was altered through changes in the economic system, and wide ranging educational reforms were carried out. The abolition of slavery (though not until the 1880s in Cuba and Brazil) meant that the American republics led the way for the United States and Great Britain. Romanticism signalled the birth of the modern concept of literature. It was not a short lived phenomenon but instead an approach to life, the impact of which continues to be felt in the most original literature of the present day. With subtleties and traits which differ from those of the European school, it was the first literary movement to emerge in the history of the fledgling republics, without signalling a complete break with Neoclassical ideals.

The Spanish American nations and Brazil owe their literary independence to Romanticism. Through it they achieved freedom of thought and expression and began the process of national consolidation. As Samuel Putman puts it, “The relationship between art and society was never so intimate.” Art interacted closely with society and in the Spanish American nations writers were, above all, men of action, dedicated to reform as a form of public service. No other period can claim such wide socio-political influence. Romanticism in Spanish American and Brazilian literature sought to follow European rhythms, marking itself out as the first theory of literature with an ideological conscience, whilst at the same time insisting on giving its aesthetic a national content. It blossomed in Brazil and Argentina before the other American nations due to the close links with Europe enjoyed by these countries. In those countries with a low standard of colonial literature, like the Rio de la Plata, Romanticism triumphed vigorously. In Peru, Colombia and Mexico it was more conservative in tone and Spanish models more numerous. Despite the success still enjoyed then by some authors (Espronceda, Larra, Zorrilla), the Spanish model weakened or disappeared.

On the whole, Romantic output in Brazil conformed more to bourgeois conventions, with a moralistic aim more akin to Tennyson or Longfellow than to Byron, Keats or Nerval. The Romantic rejection of contemporary reality and industrialisation is coupled with many more progressive traits. The break with Spanish tradition was made possible by the growing relations of France and Great Britain with the American nations which were indebted to French and British doctrines for their liberty. This relationship was also aided by the personal contact of American writers with Europe. The first Argentine Romantic, Esteban Echeverría, was living in Paris when Victor Hugo’s Hernani was premièred (1830) and he found in Romanticism an aesthetic revolution which paved the way for self-expression for every national or regional group. Echeverría published his first Romantic manifesto, Elvira, o la novia del Plata, 1832, [Elvira, or The Bride of the River Plate], in the same year as the Duque de Rivas’s El moro expósito [The Moorish Foundling]. He introduced the anti-aristocratic orientation of French Romanticism, a factor which also came to the fore with the Mexican insurgents of 1820. Byron served as a model for Romanticism in the River Plate and Brazil, where Domingos José Gonçalves de Magalhães introduced Romanticism with Suspiros poéticos e saudades, 1836 [Poetic Sighs and Yearnings], which celebrates history through the lives of its heroes.

Romanticism made certain genres its own and gathered others of a typically local character. It reworked traditional forms, giving them a new dimension. The European canons were reelaborated with great originality and new myths were discovered. The new aesthetic embraced poetry, drama and fiction in particular. The mainstay was poetry, seen as a weapon in the struggle for freedom (with a particular preference being shown for anonymous popular poetry). However, the genres in vogue which had most success were the theatre and the novel. Urban Romantic fiction, a projection of the bourgeoisie, depicted, in general, a stable image of the world. The vitality of Romanticism was embodied in the theatre, the centre of incipient worldliness. Spanish America gave the mother country two of its best Romantic dramatists: Ventura de la Vega (1807–65) and Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda (1814–73). On the Brazilian stage of the period, already blessed with established companies, melodrama reached its peak. The historical novel provoked controversy in America but took root as part of the Romantic spirit. The popularisation of culture fostered a revived interest in historical knowledge. The success of the new aesthetic stemmed from characteristics individual to Romanticism and the period surrounding the foundation of the Spanish American nations. The Romantics questioned history in an attempt to affirm their nationality. Memory acquired a psycho-social role through the cult of Historicism. In Mexico, a school of writers emerged in the wake of El fistol del diablo, 1845 [The Devil’s Tiepin] by Manuel Payno, which excels in its description of customs. Typical American elements emerged in scenes of local colour and traditions. This fusion of local colour and history helped to define the national profile and supercede the tendency to imitate European models. The feuilleton (serial novel), also came to the fore through the periodical press and was a favourite with Brazilian readers. Journalistic activity played an important role, not only in its capacity as a new mode of cultural expression, but because it voiced the desires of the collective, as well as providing a vehicle for the creation of public opinion. It fostered both writing as a profession and the formation of a reading public. There are three distinguishable trends in Spanish American and Brazilian Romanticism. The first emphasizes landscape and has socio-historical ramifications. The second concentrates on indigenous issues and seeks the perfect Indian. The third is nationalist in tone and is based on the essential characteristics of the movement such as local colour. The theme of black slavery impassioned the writers of the West Indies in particular. So-called “Black Literature” still exists today. The Cuban writer Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda, who lived most of her life in Spain, where she achieved notable success, wrote the novel Sab (1841) in which the slave sacrifices his fortune and his life for the love of his mistress. Inspired by a historical topic, Avellaneda wrote Guatimozín (1846), which deals with an episode from the Conquest of Mexico and the life of Hernán Cortés.

The emerging peoples of Spanish America and Brazil were swept away by a lyricism inspired by Nature and the theme of impossible love. Von Humboldt’s journey through Spanish America provided the facts for a new vision of nature. The geographical dimension became an issue in the definition of identity. Enthused by the spirit of naturalist investigation, Europe went in search of paradise lost. Landscape should be described in terms of the spirit, from a subjective viewpoint. The feeling for Nature was integral to the work of art and a refuge from all ills. The Romantics saw Nature as the reflection of man, discovering also an aesthetic dimension to the concept of homeland. True emotive resonance could be found in the contemplation of Nature in two respects: firstly, as a projection of emotion, and secondly, linked to the desire to capture local colour (costumbrismo). Chateaubriand’s discovery of the poetry of the great forests during his trip to North America inspired the discovery of native landscape in Spanish American literature. However, the phenomena of American nature must have had different significance for Chateaubriand than for the Cuban José María Heredia (1803–39), with his melancholy and subjective reflections on nature in the poem “En el teocalli de Cholula” [In the Aztec Temple of Cholula]. The most significant Romantic novel, María (1867), by the Colombian Jorge Isaacs, employs the vision of nature offered by Chateaubriand and Bernardin de Saint-Pierre. The confrontation of Man and Nature results in the mythification of the peasant hero, the gaucho or plainsman of Venezuela. The gaucho poets are linked to a popular and spontaneous trend in poetry.

Whereas the Europeans turned to the Middle Ages as the period of the birth of nations, in Spanish America and Brazil the creation of a past was combined with the problem of national identity. The regression to medieval Europe with its troubadours and crusades was replaced in Spanish America by the memory of an indigenous heritage. The modelling of a national hero was seen as a priority by many writers. The idealisation of the Indian further developed the cliché of the “noble savage,” already present in Columbus’s letters. The break with classical mythology in favour of indigenous folklore was inspired by European Romantics such as Victor Hugo, Musset and Ferdinand Denis, who lived in Brazil. However, in many cases, Romanticism viewed the Indian as a picturesque element about to disappear or one persecuted by the cruelty of the so-called superior race (cf. Tabaré, by Zorrilla de San Martin). The principal symbol of the homeland was the Indian, who, in Europe, exemplified natural man. With Romanticism, the Indian became an aesthetic object, a literary hero and a mytho-historical ancestor, related to the restoration of the myth of childhood and, because he represented the Middle Ages, a necessary factor in the search for national origins. The most interesting novels of this period were written in Brazil. Of particular note is Joaquim Manuel de Macedo, who describes scenes of daily life and José de Alencar who wrote historical novels and also some dealing with indigenous themes. Iracema (Iracema, the Honey-Lips, a Legend of Brazil) by Alencar, is an anagram of America, symbolising the indigenous civilisation which surrenders to the white conqueror and dies in the process. Alencar highlights the need for the adaptation of foreign ways to the Brazilian atmosphere, defending native motifs, themes and, above all, the indigenous as an expression of nationality. The foremost historical novel dealing with an Indian theme is Enriquillo, 1882 (The Cross and the Sword) by the Dominican, Manuel de Jesús Galván (1834–1910). The novel tells of Enriquillo’s revolt and eventual pardon by Charles V of Spain and is based on original documents. The aesthetic aspect of the novel is sacrificed in favour of historical accuracy. The Indian is no longer a decorative figure and acquires heroic proportions with dialogues of dramatic quality. Brazilian Romanticism reaches its peak with Antônio Gonçalves Dias who gave the myth of the indigenous past poetic form.

Socio-political themes were inspired by the events of the Paraguayan War and the abolitionist campaign. Like its French model, the imagination in Romanticism replaces the conservative tone of Indian oriented themes, a development which can be seen in the mythical dedication of origin through prophecy and clairvoyance in the work of the eloquent poet, Antônio de Castro Alves (1847–71). Nationalist sentiment, one of the Utopias of Romanticism, which attempts to find an American mode of expression, is a consequence of the special situation of the fledgling nations. It is a motif which does not echo European works. The romantic period highlights the traits which are destined to define the national literatures but it does not disconnect them from the past. Having achieved political liberty, the goal became spiritual freedom. In many cases, the angst of political freedom led to exile and death, be it real or imaginary. In relation to the language of Romanticism, characterised by the emphasis on emotion and imprecision of thought, there emerged the first attempts to establish an “American language.” The main innovations were incorporated into the dictionary and vocabulary of the continent and served to give literary status to American types. After Romanticism, the national literary language no longer accorded with that of the mother country. By giving life to new forms of expression and thought, Spanish American and Brazilian Romanticism accelerated the development of a native literature, relevant to social reality. It prepared the way for the radical departures of modern times, beginning a cycle of autonomy and maturity.

BELLA JOZEF

translated by Carol Tully

Further Reading

Sílvio Romero 1851–1914

Brazilian critic

Sílvio Romero produced a quite astonishing number of studies of Brazilian literature, culture, and society during his long and distinguished career. The most important and influential of his works, however, is the História da literatura brasileira [History of Brazilian Literature], first published in 1888. While it can be argued that the major figures of nationalistic Romanticism, Antônio Gonçalves Dias and José de Alencar in particular, had created the fact of an independent Brazilian literature, the idea of Brazilian literature—its character, its origins, its relationship to the nation itself—remains in large measure the product of Sílvio Romero’s História. To one degree or another, everything that has been written about the literature of Brazil since 1888 is a reaction to—and, in many cases, an on-going argument with—Romero’s conception of the nation and its literary tradition.

Romero was a disciple of the philosopher, jurist, and Germanist Tobias Barreto (1839–89), with whom he studied at the Faculty of Law in Recife and whom he considered the greatest intellectual and writer Brazil had produced. Through Barreto, Romero came into contact with contemporary European literature, philosophy and science. These readings led Romero and Barreto’s other disciples to reject the individualism, emotionalism and idealism of Brazilian Romanticism and to see science as the salvation of humanity, of Brazil, and, even, of Brazilian literature. Barreto, Romero, and other members of what Romero always called, somewhat pompously, the “School of Recife,” tried their hands at producing antiRomantic “scientific poetry,” but these attempts largely failed as literary works.

Scientificism, however, remained the central focus of Romero’s thought; in his Da crítica e sua exata definição [On Criticism and Its Exact Definition], published in 1909, Romero defined criticism as “alguma coisa que se pode aplicar, não diretamente aos fenômenos ou fatos quaisquer da natureza ou da sociedade, porque esta é a função da ciência, sim as vistas, teorias, doutrinas, interpretações que de tais fatos deram os que deles se ocuparam” (something that cannot be applied directly to the phenomena or facts of nature or of society, which is, rather, the proper function of science, it can be applied to the views, theories, doctrines, or interpretations developed by those who dealt with those facts or phenomena). Criticism, therefore, while not quite a science, was a method of synthesis applied to literature; the goal of literary expression, in Romero’s view, was not simply or even primarily the creation of works of art but, rather, the representation of natural and social phenomena. As this emphasis on content rather than form suggests, Romero’s greatest strength was the collection of large numbers of facts and details about literary history, and there is no question that his wide-ranging and generally precise scholarship revolutionized our knowledge of colonial Brazilian literature. And because Romero’s anti-Romantic definition of literature stressed the collective rather than the individual, the second task of the critic was to organize and to classify the facts he had collected, creating a linear framework of what he called “currents” and “schools” to which all Brazilian writers could be assigned. The broad outlines of Romero’s chronology still form the basis of most Brazilian literary historiographies dealing with the period from 1500 to about the middle of the 19th century. His view of writers of his own time, however, was severely warped, both by his own concept of what literature should be and by his personal enthusiasms and antipathies. As a result, many of Romero’s judgments in this area are just plain wrong-headed. The most obvious examples are his glorification of Tobias Barreto and his insistence that Machado de Assis was, at best, a minor talent.

Underlying Romero’s vision of Brazilian literature as the product of a series of collective movements was his belief that the nation’s culture as a whole was the expression of a far vaster collective, the inhabitants of Brazil and their unique national character. One purpose of his História, then, was to define that national character, a task which Romero had set for himself as early as 1870, and which remained a central preoccupation in all of his writings. The fundamental and irreconcilable contradictions in Romero’s view of Brazil’s national character are very evident today; at least some of his contemporaries recognized them as well, and Romero’s less pompous and self-assured texts provide some evidence that he was aware of their existence. As Antônio Cândido has pointed out, these contradictions were not simply personal idiosyncrasies on Romero’s part, but reflected the intense ambivalence of the society in which he lived; some of that ambivalence survives even today.

At the most basic level, Romero was forever torn between emotion and what he defined as science. He had grown up on a plantation in Sergipe, and his intense memories of the songs and stories he had heard as a child led Romero to break with Tobias Barreto, who believed that popular culture was unworthy of scientific attention, and to begin his study of national character by collecting numerous examples what we would now call folklore. Once the task of collection was complete, however, Romero clearly could not make the connections that today seem so obvious; popular culture and literary culture are not linked in any coherent way, and the collective folk traditions of African, Amerindian and European populations in Brazil are described as almost entirely separate from each other. Romero went farther than any of his predecessors in accepting the idea that slavery and the African presence had played central roles in the creation of Brazil’s society, culture, and economy; it is typical of Romero that he roots this acceptance in nostalgic recollections of the slave women who helped raise him. Even more important, Romero admits the existence of widespread miscegenation throughout Brazilian history and society—not just Amerindian-European miscegenation, which Romantic writers like Gonçalves Dias and Alencar had endeavored to use as a metaphor for the creation of a uniquely Brazilian identity in the distant colonial past, but the on-going and far more problematic African-European miscegenation. Romero’s História, after all, was published in 1888—the year of Abolition. But while Romero is prepared to argue the centrality of those of African descent in Brazilian culture, and even to imply that the prototypical Brazilian is in fact the product of miscegenation, his readings in European science and pseudo-science and the influence of Tobias Barreto—a mulatto who spent his whole life negating his origins—conspired to undermine this radically modern and inclusive vision of Brazilian society. Romero’s life experiences and his observation of the society in which he lived pushed him towards a positive view of those of African descent and their impact on Brazil; Barreto, Social Darwinism, and Haeckel’s theories of race all pushed Romero to deny the validity of the African contribution and, in fact, to question the basic viability of a society built upon miscegenation. Romero thus simultaneously accepted and rejected miscegenation, praised the vital diversity of Brazil and feared that its inherently inferior non-European roots would forever condemn the nation to ignorance and poverty. Once again, Romero convinced himself, science was the only solution—and, once again, what Romero viewed as science turned out to be wrong: he declared that the “inferior” racial groups in Brazil were dying out as part of natural, Darwinian process, and that by sometime around 1940 the nation’s population would be entirely European. Some future historian of Brazilian literature, Romero seems to have believed, would look on his own História as essentially archaeological in nature, describing the characteristics and the enduring influence on the creation of what he called “the Brazilian soul” of racial groups long since extinct.

DAVID T. HABERLY

Biography

Born Sílvio Vasconcelos da Silveira Ramos Romero, in the town of Lagarto, province of Sergipe, Brazil, 21 April 1851. Lived with his parents on their plantation until he was five, then stayed in parents home in Lagarto until he was twelve. Father a merchant. Studied in the Ateneu Fluminense, Rio de Janeiro, 1863–67. In 1868 he began to study law at Recife. The following year he published the booklet “A poesia contemporânea e a sua Intuição Naturalista.” Became a government administrator in Estância, in the province of Sergipe, but resigned in order to enter politics; elected provincial deputy, 1875. Married Clorinda Diamantina Correia de Araújo in the same year. Left Recife in 1876 to become the municipal judge in charge of orphans in Parati, an old town in the state of Rio de Janeiro. Moved to Rio de Janeiro, 1879. Wife died in 1884, at the age of twenty-five. Worked as a teacher and as a journalist. Staff writer for the newspaper Diário de Notícias, 1891. In 1897 he became a founding member of the Brazilian Academy of Letters. Served as a federal deputy, 1900–02. Died 17 July 1914.

Selected Works

A literatura brasileira e a crítica moderna, Rio de Janeiro: Imprensa Industrial, 1880
Cantos populares do Brasil, Lisbon: Nova Livraria Internacional, 1883
Further Reading

These are the major studies of Romero’s theory and practice of criticism. The most useful is that by Antônio Cândido, the only 20th-century Brazilian critic whose scope and influence are comparable to those of Romero.

Rosa, João Guimarães

See Guimarães Rosa

Jacques Roumain 1907–1944

Haitian poet and prose writer

Jacques Roumain’s literary production is inseparable from his political engagement and from the historical events which fashioned his life. One of Haiti’s most important writers, Roumain helped to create a cultural awareness in black Haitian literature and to reorient political thought, through his poetry and fiction as well as through his journalism and speeches.

When in 1927 Roumain, the son of well-to-do landowners, returned to his native island after several years of studying and travelling in Europe, he was deeply disturbed by the social and political conditions in his country, including its occupation by the US military (1915–34). Roumain saw Haiti as a static society divided between a feudal peasant class and an exploitative mulatto Establishment. The country’s hierarchical structure reproduced the social stratification of colonialism. If a black middle-class was slowly emerging, its obsessive search for black authenticity, the “noiriste” movement, created racial myths and tensions, while the mulattoes were still viewing France as their intellectual province.

By 1928, Roumain became actively involved in the Nationalist struggle against the American occupation and set out to free Haiti from all foreign domination in every aspect of life. Participating in student strikes and writing numerous articles against the American presence, he was imprisoned on several occasions. But in 1931, when it became apparent that the new Nationalist government of Sténo Vincent would not improve conditions for the proletariat, Roumain turned to communism. Distressed by his people’s hunger, ignorance, and disease, Roumain saw their state as irremediably hopeless. He therefore joined clandestine activities aimed at creating a Haitian Communist Party. But, accused of being an anarchist, he was imprisoned in the National Penitentiary in January 1933. While in jail, he was able to continue his political activities through writing letters and essays to the press. Released from prison in 1936, he chose to leave the increasingly dictatorial government of Haiti for Belgium and finally Paris, where he pursued his training in ethnology, particularly exploring the African origins of the Haitian people. During his exile, he also travelled extensively in Martinique, Cuba, Mexico and the United States, where he studied poverty and political oppression. When in 1941 he finally returned to Haiti, he—along with Alfred Métaxs, Jean Price-Mars and others, founded an ethnological research center, the “Bureau d’Ethnologie.” As first director of the Bureau, he published a number of ethnological studies and, at the same time, devoted considerable efforts to disseminate and popularize ethnology. During that period, he supported again the intellectual and material progress of the peasants. But, at the end of 1942, Roumain was sent by the new regime of Elie Lescot to Mexico as Haiti’s charge d’affaires. A year later, he fell sick and returned to die in Port-au-Prince in August 1944.

Roumain’s literary production reflects the major political and philosophical currents in his life. The publication of Jean Price-Mars’ Ainsi parla l’oncle, 1928 (So Spoke the Uncle) which emphasizes the relationships of folklore to literature, represented for Roumain an essential step toward achieving authentic Haitian values and cultural forms. Helping to create the “indigenist” movement, Roumain supported the “Haitianization” of literature, replacing French imitation with a representation of Haiti’s own racial perspectives, sensibility and subject matters. Roumain also called attention to the South American and Harlem Renaissance authors who shared similar cultural and political experiences with Haiti.

With other intellectuals, Roumain founded the short-lived Revue Indigène, 1927 [Indigenous Review] and later La Trouée 559 [The Break Through] where he published his first, rather lyrical poems despite the indigenous claim of the founders. But by 1931, Roumain’s literary writings began to reflect his political and cultural preoccupations. La Proie et l’ombre [The Prey and the Shadow], a collection of short stories, depicts the aimlessness of bourgeois existence through several heroes, lucid enough to realize that they live in a void. All the stories of this first fictional work evoke the alienation of the privileged intellectuals unable to reach the Creole-speaking blacks. And in Les Fantoches [The Puppets], a series of scenes rather than a fully developed novel, the author casts the antithesis between two extreme classes of Haitian society, the bourgeois and the peasant, and reveals the fundamental corruption of Haitian politics.

With La Montagne ensorcelée, 1931 [The Bewitched Mountain], prefaced by Price-Mars, Roumain published his first significant literary work—a “peasant” novel, i.e., a narrative built around folk culture and reflecting his socialist leanings. The story is about a rural community which, beset by calamities, finds a scapegoat in an old woman suspected of sorcery. In their misery and despair, the peasants seek to gain control of their condition through superstitious beliefs. Through the constant shift in points of view—from neutral literary description to peasant narrative reflecting folk mentality and speech—the author guides the readers to perceive the life of the village and its inhabitants on several levels of reality. This narrative technique will contribute to the great literary achievement of Roumain’s last novel, Gouverneurs de la rosée, 1944 (Masters of the Dew). Meanwhile, Roumain continued writing poetry and published in Haïti-Journal four poems evoking the problem of race and the universal black experience.

During 1932–34, Roumain conceived the idea of writing a “cycle” of novels, alternately dealing with urban middle-class society and Haitian peasant life. During his incarceration (1934 to 1936), he worked on an urban novel, “Le Champ du potier” that remained incomplete at his death.

He began his second peasant novel, Gouverneurs de la rosée, during the first year of his exile in Belgium, finishing it eight years later. In 1944, the book appeared posthumously in Port-au-Prince and in Paris, enjoying an immediate success. Haitian in its setting, the story of Gouverneurs de la rosée conveys a universal meaning. It is the portrayal of humanity’s eternal struggle against the natural elements and against its own destructive tendencies.

When after fifteen years of Cuban plantation work, Manuel returns to his Haitian mountain village, he is confronted with the terrible droughts that have left his people hungry and split into two enemy camps. Thanks to his courage and determination and Annaïse’s love, Manuel finds a spring which, he hopes, will reconcile the villagers in a cooperative effort to direct the water through the fields and gardens of the village. Having learned in Cuba the value of worker solidarity, he attempts to convey that value to the disheartened peasants. Manuel falls victim to one man’s envy and jealousy, but his death will finally bind the village together in its recovered prosperity. Through its bilingual narrative, a mixture of classic French and Creole rendering the reality of the land, Gouverneurs de la rosée is one of the best illustrations of an indigenist aesthetic. Its stress on Voodoo as the African heritage of the Haitian people reveals Price-Mars’s influence. Further, the focus on economic life and the need to return to work on the land, as well as the imperative to fight political corruption, illustrate the thematic elements Roumain brought to Caribbean literature.

The courage and great achievement of Jacques Roumain, the writer, lie in his relentless criticism of the Haitian elite, and of the several oppressive regimes that attempted to eliminate him. In so doing, Roumain initiates a literary tradition with a consistent political mission.

MARIE-AGNÈS SOURIEAU
Biography

Born in Port-au-Prince, Haiti, 4 June 1907. Attended the Saint Louis de Gonzague secondary school, Port-au-Prince. Finished his secondary education in Berne and Zurich, Switzerland. Travelled in Germany, France and the United Kingdom. Briefly studied agronomy in Madrid but returned to Port-au-Prince in 1927. Co-founder of the Revue Indigène (1927) where he published his own short stories and poems together with his own translations into French. Appointed head of division in Ministry of Interior, 1931. Resigned and became political activist. Imprisoned in 1933 and again in 1934, after founding the Communist Party of Haiti. Sentenced by military tribunal to three years of penal servitude. This broke his health. On being released in 1936, travelled to Belgium and then to Paris where he studied Human Paleonthology at the Sorbonne. Moved to the United States in 1939 where he continued his studies at Columbia University, New York. Later, travelled to Martinique and Havana. In latter he worked with the mulatto poet, Nicolás Guillén. Able to return to Haiti in 1941. Appointed Charge d’Affaires to Mexico in 1943. Ill health obliged him to return home in 1944. Died in Port-au-Prince, 18 August 1944.

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction
La Proie et l’ombre, Port-au-Prince: La Presse, 1930
Les Fantoches, Port-au-Prince, Imprimerie de l’État, 1931
La Montagne ensorcelée, Port-au-Prince: Chassaing, 1931

Translations

Further Reading

Conturie, Christiane, Comprendre “Gouverneurs de la rosée” de Jacques Roumain, Issy-les-Molineaux, France: Classiques Africains, 1980
Juan Rulfo 1918–1986

Mexican prose writer

While a small group of friends always admired Juan Rulfo’s writings, as they read the manuscripts of the short stories later collected in El llano en llamas, 1953 (The Burning Plain) and his novel Pedro Páramo (1955), Rulfo’s great international renown came as a surprise, because it was based on only two slim books. Perhaps the surprise was greater for Rulfo, who did not publish any other novel or collection of short stories for more than twenty-five years after the appearance of El llano en llamas. Critics have called this time lapse, “Rulfo’s silence,” and the paradox is that his renown increased steadily in inverse proportion to his literary productivity, at the same time that readers anxiously expected new works from him. Rulfo’s silence is worth considering since it has a correlative in his own prose, which tends to seek the conciseness of poetry, to avoid explicitness, and to manage language as precisely as a poet would do. Implosion rather than explosion would be a key concept to understand his literary system, how he tried to write, and finally his idea of literature. A very private person, introspective and shy but at the same time humorous and witty when he felt comfortable in the presence of other people, Rulfo brought to literature these same personal qualities. And he also brought hidden aspects of his own life to his writings. One of his most read and admired short stories, “¡Diles que no me maten!” (Tell Them Not to Kill Me!) has a close relationship to a family tragedy: the killing of his father, when Juan Rulfo was still a child. It would not be surprising, then, that one of the main themes in his work is the search for the father. And that is the starting point of Pedro Páramo, when Juan Preciado relates: “Vine a Comala porque me dijeron que vivía aquí mi padre, un tal Pedro Paramo.” (I came to Comala because I was told that my father, a certain Pedro Páramo, lived here). The theme of the presence/absence of the father is fundamental not only in these two examples but throughout his work.

Rulfo came to Mexican narrative when the literary tradition of the “Novel of the Mexican Revolution” was still hegemonic, and when Mexico itself could not yet take some distance from the most belligerent and violent period in its history, the Mexican Revolution. This social and political movement started in 1910 as an uprising against Porfirio Díaz, the Dictator for more than three decades, and it did not stop even after institutional accords named a new President, because in 192.6 another uprising disturbed the fragile political equilibrium. This second uprising had religious motivations, it was called the “rebellion of the Cristeros” (self-designated followers of Christ the King) and had a strong impact on Rulfo’s imagination. This can be seen in the title story of El llano en llamas, in “La noche que lo dejaron solo” (The Night They Left Him Alone), “El hombre” (The Man) and others, together with important passages of the novel, Pedro Páramo. The impact of the Cristero rebellion, as well as autobiographical incidents, helped Rulfo shape his narrative world introducing violence in a peculiar way: sudden and stripped from any ethical consideration.

The tradition of the Mexican Revolution in the novel is important not only from a historical point of view, but mainly because Rulfo renewed this tradition in terms of both form and style. While almost every novelist of the time was representing the strong influence of French Naturalism in literature, Rulfo developed his writing in a novel fashion and helped transform Mexican narrative in a radical way. As a very disorganized and spontaneous reader, he brought to Mexican literature the distant influences of Nordic writers such as Selma Lagerlöf, C.M. Ramuz (Derborance), Sillampää, Bjornson, Hauptmann, and the first Hamsun. His influences also included the gothic element discovered in love stories such as Wuthering Heights by Emily Brontë, and all these stimuli contributed to Rulfo’s own gothicism. Rulfo put his literary universe on the borders of the fantastic, creating an almost surrealistic, moonlike space. The town of Comala is “un lugar sobre las brasas” (a place on burning embers). In Pedro Páramo, Juan Preciado arrives in Comala searching for his father, but he encounters only what seem to be ghosts, murmurs, cries emerging from the walls, until he discovers that everybody is already dead: the reader discovers that the story of Pedro Páramo is being told by a dead man, Juan Preciado, from a deep tomb. It has a complex combination of reality and dream, hope and fear, love and hate, which are never separated. This made his narrative most surprising, original and admired. There are some short stories, such as “Luvina”, in which the characters wonder where they are: “¿En qué país estamos, Agripina?...¿Qué país es éste, Agripina?” (What country are we in, Agripina? ...What sort of country is this, Agripina?), such is the dreamlike atmosphere the narrative creates.

Rulfo started writing the novel Pedro Páramo in August 1953, while a Fellow of the Centro Mexicano de Escritores. He intended to call this novel Los desiertos de la Tierra [The Deserts of the Earth]. When he finished it the following year, it bore the title Los murmullos [The Murmurs] but between January and March 1954, a fragment of it was published in a magazine, announcing the forthcoming novel as Una estrella junto a la luna [A Star Near the Moon]. All these titles refer to different aspects of the novel: the spectacular isolated landscape, the ghosts and their murmurs, the love story between Pedro Páramo and Susana San Juan. Finally, the book appeared under the title Pedro Páramo, the name of one of the main characters, because the same publishing house had recently published Los falsos rumores [The False Rumours], by Gaston García Cantú, and the publishers wanted to avoid any confusion. During the following forty years, Pedro Páramo would become the best known of all Mexican novels, and it brought its author well deserved recognition.

There has been a “mythic” reading of Rulfo’s work, mostly by other writers, like Octavio Paz and Carlos Fuentes, who see universal themes in Rulfo’s work, and even classical ones. Juan Preciado, in his search for his father, would then be a modern version of Telemachus searching for Ulysses. But there is also a more historical reading of Rulfo’s stories, considering his strong views on social and political issues, and how they were expressed in his literature. In this sense, we can read his novel and short stories as a deconstruction of political power, and also as an unavoidable critique of the economic and social reforms brought about by the new bourgeoisie which benefited from the Revolution. With great irony, “Nos han dado la tierra” (They Gave Us the Land) comments on the agrarian reform that gave the most unproductive lands to the poorest; “El día del derrumbe” (The Day of the Quake) mocks political discourse and political authorities; and Pedro Páramo is one of the most powerful portraits of the “cacique” (the local political boss) to have emerged from Mexican literature.

JORGE RUFFINELLI
Biography

Selected Works

El gallo de oro y otros textos para cine, edited by Jorge Ayala Blanca, Mexico City: Era, 1980 [film scripts]

Compilations and Anthologies

Toda la obra, edited by Claude Fell, Madrid: Archivos, 1991 [The most comprehensive and best-documented compilation of Rulfo’s works, it includes 16 studies by leading specialists]

Los cuadernos de Juan Rulfo, edited by Clara Aparicio de Rulfo, Mexico City: Era, 1994

Further Reading

Fares, Gustavo C., Juan Rulfo: la lengua, el tiempo y el espacio, Buenos Aires: Almagesto, 1994

González Boixo, José Carlos, Claves narrativas de Juan Rulfo, León: Universidad de León, 1980; revised edition, 1984

La narrativa de Juan Rulfo. Interpretaciones críticas, Mexico City: Secretaría de Educación Pública, 1974
Pedro Páramo

Novel by Juan Rulfo

In Pedro Páramo (1955), the souls of Rulfo’s dead countrymen cannot rest in peace. Anything can awake them and make them relive their squalid lives; yet nothing can ever break their solitude, in life or in death. Their search for origin is in vain: the only thing they find is paradise turned into arid heath (Mexican páramo), love into madness, life into deathwish, history into myth and exhaustion. Land, life, and even death are poisoned by anger. Rulfo has magnificently tied together the different threads from his stories in El llano en llamas, 1953 (The Burning Plain), and mixed them together in this bleak carnival, this anguished parable of modern Mexico. Through this striking yet familiar dance of death, Rulfo exorcises Mexico’s violent past and present, leaving it symbolically buried, together with his own literature, under a heap of stones which epitomizes Mexico’s malevolent patriarchs. Who could go on writing after this unforgiving reading of the Mexican “labyrinth of solitude”?

Pedro Páramo takes place in Rulfo’s native Jalisco, using this rural backdrop to symbolically represent half a century of Mexican history, from the dictatorship of Porfirio Díaz, through the Revolution, to the aftermath of the Cristero uprising in 1926–29. Behind the deceptively simple façade of his characters and their rustic discourse, hides a stunning virtuosity of narrative techniques turning the apparent chaos of narrative fragments, points of view, upside-down chronology, and causal logic into an artistic structure executed with clockwork precision. What makes the novel unique is its masterful blend of the stark vision and modern experimental techniques with Mexican folklore and traditional culture. The traditional rural culture that had emerged from the colonial baroque syncretism becomes in the hands of Rulfo a phantasmagoric, almost surrealistic vehicle for mythic unreality, black humor, social satire and the absurd. Pedro Páramo has become a part of the Mexican national myth and is one of Mexico’s founding fictions.
In all his writing, Rulfo works with the greatest economy of means. This places special emphasis on each single element of the narrative. No wonder Rulfo continued to tinker with the text—sometimes augmenting, sometimes reducing the supposed chaos—in all major editions published during his lifetime (1955, 1959, 1964, 1981). The textual segmentation, that fluctuates from one edition to another, has produced confusion among the critics. In each edition, the textual sequence is broken into different narrative fragments, yet remaining always plausible. In the last edition, Rulfo strengthened the graphic marks and established seventy segments, ranging from a couple of lines up to eight pages in length. This textual flux, similar to that of a mobile, brings into question the concept of the text itself.

The textual fluctuations are only one among the whole string of voluble characteristics present in the world of the novel, where elements like life and death, the before and after, cause without effect and effect without cause, affirmation and denial, do not exclude one another but coexist, tied together by a thread of folklore and the presence of the absurd. A change or vacillation in the microcontext that would normally stand out in a different type of work, is absorbed in this case and is perfectly naturalized by the macrocontext. Does it matter, in this topsy-turvy world, if one dream is positive in one edition and negative in another? If a skeleton is male or female? If Susana’s father and the spiritual Father blend into the same ghostly figure?

Rulfo’s characters are imprisoned within themselves as if in tombs. Their dialogues are monologues most of the time, or uncooperative responses, that produce silence, reserve, and all kinds of absurd situations. Communication advances through miscommunication and is as phantasmagoric as its participants. The beginning of the novel serves as a paradigm for this plunge into each character’s labyrinth of solitude.

The critical reception of Pedro Páramo was as absurd as the work itself and attests to the radical changes that the literary code has undergone since that time. In the 1950s, viewed from the perspective of ageing Realism, Pedro Páramo appeared to be too chaotic (especially in its first half); and it was rumored, maliciously, that the editors had to help Rulfo organize his masterpiece. After the Boom of experimentalism in the 1960s, the novel seemed actually too well organized (especially in its second half), qualifying only as a forerunner of the new novel. However, a close reading of Rulfo’s work shows that the textual and semantic mobile created by this unpretentious country fellow outmatches many textbook experiments of the smooth urban yuppies.

Readers can identify relatively easily the nuclear narratives of Pedro Páramo, although these elements must be pieced together from the polyphony of “parallel memories” of the dead. We can establish the following sequence of events: 1. Pedro Páramo’s early adolescence and his love for Susana; 2. the beginning of Pedro Páramo’s local tyranny; 3. the fast life of Miguel Páramo; 4. the return of Susana at the start of the Mexican Revolution; 5. the death of Comala following Susana’s demise and Pedro Páramo’s assassination; 6. Juan Preciado’s search for a father; and 7. the timelessness of death and the reawakening of the dead. The novel begins with Juan Preciado’s search for his father (6) and ends with Pedro Páramo’s murder, sometime before, by one of his other sons (5). This narrative framework, highlighting the father-son relationship, acts as a catalyst of meaning for what transpires in between.

The difficult part comes when the reader attempts to relate the nuclear narratives of the text to the historical chronology. A number of dates can be established with some precision, others only approximately, because the text plays at “hide and seek” with the reader. The reader-detective must continually weigh historical references and allusions, and must pay special attention to the Catholic religious cycle and its rituals. The parody of Catholic ritual symbolism is omnipresent throughout the novel. In some instances, Rulfo’s original manuscripts can help understand the apparent disorder: it appears that, at the last minute, the writer “reassigned” some segments, consolidated them around the figure of Miguel Páramo, and thus added more confusion to what he had already created.

As a result, Rulfo produced an aporia: Miguel’s death, which coincides with the appearance of Halley’s comet (May 1910), was shifted along with the comet and all related events to the end of October, thus leaving Eduvigis in the air (she was alive in May, but was already dead by October). Yet what does a little more absurdity mean in Pedro Páramo?

It is interesting to reflect on the extent to which the historical background can be reconstructed. It seems that Rulfo, who had up to a point carefully established the historical, chronological and geographic supporting structures, started to dismantle them with a vengeance. In this sense, Pedro Páramo becomes a postrealist novel, where Realism and its conventions are but a pretext for their subversion and parody.

Another way to look at the novel and organize its structure is through “latent content.” Following the principles of mythic analysis expounded by Claude Lévi-Strauss, we can broach two cycles of semantic oppositions that underlie the text of Pedro Páramo. The first cycle can be formulated as follows: 1. the overrating versus 2. the underrating of blood relations (the parent-child relationship); 3. exaggerated love versus 4. exaggerated hate (the lovers, husbands and wives, masters and servants relations). The second cycle is: 1. paradise versus 2. páramo (myth, recent history, and prophecy of future abandonment); 3. Porfirio Díaz’s dictatorship versus 4. the Revolution (modern Mexican history). In the first (individual) cycle, the excesses destroy life. In the second (social) cycle, socialized violence poisons paradise; modern Mexican history could not break with Mexico’s destructive past; modern Mexico is dominated by the curse and the myth of exhaustion.

A myth normally offers some mediation between opposites and some solution to the problems presented; Pedro Páramo does not. The novel ends with the destruction of patriarchy, but there is no solution to the absurd melodrama, no breath of air, no room for life. In comparison with Rulfo’s cosmic pessimism, the absurd endgames in Beckett have something almost comic about them; at least Beckett’s characters somehow manage, precariously, to go on living.

Critics have recognized from the start that behind the father-son relation lurks the Oedipus myth. This observation has “opened the floodgates” for archetypal criticism and has produced numerous simplified allegorical readings of the novel, based on everything imaginable, from ancient and Aztec myths to those of psychoanalysis. Yet the mythical layer of the novel relies more on Mexican realities than on the Oedipus myth. Some of these realities include the patriarchal system, social violence, the stoic resignation of the oppressed, the degradation of woman (the chingada), the deification of the mother, the absence of the father, the “mistress on the side” (casa chica or love nest), incest and sexual abuse. All these elements continue to characterize Mexican rural culture and live on under the mask of “modern” Mexico.

EMIL VOLEK
Editions

   [Includes also several articles on this work]

Further Reading

Freeman, George Ronald, Paradise and Fall in Rulfo’s “Pedro Páramo.” Archetype and Structural Unity, Morelos, Mexico: CIDOC, 1970 [An example of archetypal criticism]
Sommers, Joseph (editor), La narrativa de Juan Rulfo, Mexico City: Sep/Setentas, 1974
Volek, Emil, “Pedro Páramo de Juan Rulfo: una obra aleatoria en busca de su texto y del género literario,” Revista Iberoamericana 150 (1990); from another angle, in his Literatura hispanoamericana entre la modernidad y la postmodernidad, Cuadernos de Trabajo Nr. 9, Bogota: Facultad de Ciencias Humanas, Universidad Nacional de Colombia, 1994
A-Z
1355
Ernesto Sábato 1911–

Argentine prose writer

Early in his first collection of essays, Uno y el universo, 1945 [One and the Universe], Ernesto Sábato remarks that “Las obras sucesivas de un escritor son como las ciudades que se construyen sobre las ruinas de las anteriores” (The successive works of any writer are like cities, each built on the ruins of its predecessors). His own work demonstrates this principle time and time again: the essays frequently take up themes—and often large portions of text—from earlier essays, while the novels not only review characters and episodes, Sobre heroes y tumbas (On Heroes and Tombs) from El túnel (The Tunnel) and Abaddón, el exterminador (The Angel of Darkness) from both of those, but also incorporate material found in the essays. Indeed, in many ways Abaddón, el exterminador represents a summing-up of Sábato’s life’s work and the processes which brought it into being, though, as usual in his novels and philosophical essays, he avoids direct comment on the political affairs of the day.

Politically, Sábato has had most to say in two separate phases: first, under Aramburu in 1956, his self-defence, El caso Sábato [The Sábato Affair], and his review of Peronism, El otro rostro del peronismo [The Other Face of Peronism]; and then in 1984 the report, Nunca más [Never Again], prepared by a committee of investigation chaired by him, on the atrocities and disappearances under the military dictatorship of the 1970s. Sábato’s leaning towards the Left in these documents, though not uncritical, is as unapologetic as elsewhere in his writings.

The philosophical and literary essays (which have been considerably modified in successive editions) pursue a number of common themes. One constant concern is the development of science and the scientific method, and the search for rational explanations of observed phenomena, all too often hindered by metaphysicians and theologians. Sábato’s survey of the development of western European thought since the preSocratics virtually ignores both medieval neo-Aristotelianism and Renaissance neo-Platonism, condemning the former for its dogmatism and the latter for its mysticism, but he is equally quick to condemn any kind of facile or unthinking pragmatism. At the same time, in his view, post-Enlightenment science has become too theoretical, too abstract, expressed in mathe matical language beyond the comprehension of ordinary people, who therefore stand in awe or fear of scientists, yet are compelled to trust them.

The human element is a powerful factor for Sábato, whether the threat be ultimate nuclear darkness or some other technological disaster; the image of the human being presented in Hombres y engranajes [Men and Gears] as no more than a cog in the grinding wheels of the universal machine is reminiscent of Chaplin in Modern Times. He declares that over the past four hundred years humanity has been subjected to the tyrannies of rationalism and enlightened despotism, or Romanticism and revolution, and materialism in all its manifestations, before being faced in mid-20th century by forms of totalitarianism, both communist and fascist. Though these concerns are prominent in Abaddón, el exterminador, the three novels are devoted primarily to probing the psychological pressures exerted on individual characters in specific situations. These characters, as Sábato has stated on several occasions, frequently represent the author himself, or more accurately, aspects of his personality, making the fictions exercises in selfexploration.

Sábato’s first novel, El túnel, came out between Uno y el universo and Hombres y engranajes. The protagonist-narrator, Juan Pablo Castel, writes from an asylum for the criminally insane, where he is detained for the murder of María Iribarne, and his narrative tells the story of their brief relationship. He had observed her reaction to one work in the one-man exhibition of his paintings and, believing that she could help him to discover its meaning, sought her out. The relationship which follows their eventual chance meeting is bedevilled by his jealously possessive reaction to her insistence on maintaining both her marriage and her close friendship or affair with a distant cousin, Hunter. Finally, after obtaining what he believes to be clear evidence of her infidelity, he destroys the painting and stabs María to death. Castel leads an intensely lonely life, governed by an obsession with rationality; the painting, entitled “Maternidad” (Motherhood), contained an inset panel, depicting a woman looking out to sea, which Castel sensed was a key to his unconscious, hitherto sternly controlled in his carefully structured art. As Sábato recalls in Heterodoxia [Heterodoxy], according to Jung we all bear in our unconscious self the image of the opposite sex, and in men that expression of the feminine, the anima, is the source of art in all its forms. María Iribarne’s apparent grasp of the painting’s meaning offered him the possibility of balancing the conscious and unconscious aspects of his personality, but her inability or unwillingness to devote herself exclusively to his quest for selfknowledge drives him to despair. Castel’s insane jealousy leads him to destroy for ever his only chance of achieving psychological wholeness, and killing María Iribarne, the key to his inspiration, ends his artistic career.

Sábato continued his self-exploration through fiction in Sobre heroes y tumbas, a much longer and more complex novel than El túnel. While Sobre heroes y tumbas provides as background an account of some episodes from Argentina’s violent 19th-century history and sketches of society and culture in mid-20th century, the main story concerns the brief affair between Martin and Alejandra, which is hindered by her incestuous relationship with Fernando Vidal Olmos, her father, and ends when she kills Fernando and commits suicide by setting fire to her room in the Olmos family house. Martin left Buenos Aires soon afterwards for a new life in Patagonia. Most of this story is told by Martin to Bruno, who also had an interest in Alejandra and, some thirty years earlier, in her mother, Georgina; at that time his rival was the same Fernando Vidal Olmos, Georgina’s cousin. Fernando’s own “Informe sobre ciegos” (Report on the Blind) reveals his obsessive personality and state of mind just before he goes to his death. Bruno therefore knows Alejandra directly, learns details of her affair with Martin and Martín’s own life in discussions with him in 1955 and on his return from the south a few years later, and complements his own knowledge of Fernando through the “Informe sobre ciegos.” Fernando’s travel abroad, including contacts with Surrealist artists in Paris, and his insisting (like Castel) on reason, suggest aspects of Sábato’s own experience; like Bruno, Fernando is also close to Sábato in age. Fernando can be seen as representing the “shadow,” the dark side of the writer’s personality, while the anima manifests herself as, in turn, Fernando’s mother Ana Maria, his cousin Georgina and his daughter Alejandra. Martín serves as catalyst to Bruno’s analysis, the fiction through which Sábato plumbs his own psyche.

Sábato’s next major work was El escritor y sus fantasmas [The Writer and His Ghosts]. The first two parts, omitted in later editions, offered commentary on his two novels, developed from the answers to the questions most frequently put to him, and an essay on the forms and concerns of the contemporary novel. The more substantial third part reverts to the pattern of Uno y el universo, ranging from epigrams to extended essays on writers and themes. Here Sábato rejects the limitations imposed by a single, objective point of view, and by a realism which excludes fantasy or dreams, and argues for the novela total, the “total novel,” which attempts to incorporate all possible aspects of events and their psychological consequences for the people/characters involved.

Much of this is re-stated and put into effect in Abaddón, el exterminador, in which Bruno again serves as focus, witnessing events and hearing Sabato’s own accounts of his experiences. (The unaccented “Sabato” is the form adopted in this novel). One strand in the novel deals with political repression and its most powerful tool, torture. Marcelo, the principal victim, is the son of old friends of Sabato and involved in revolutionary politics; Sabato discusses with Marcelo and other young people the role of literature in the revolutionary struggle. The Martín-Alejandra-Fernando triangle of Sobre heroes y tumbas is replaced by Sabato-Agustina-Nacho, but this element is given less attention than in the earlier novel. Sabato explores the dark side of his psyche, personified as R., a second self, and expressed in sexual activity, frequently associated with blindness. After writing El túnel, he had been asked about Allende’s blindness by a mysterious Dr Schneider, who does not reappear until after the publication of Sobre heroes y tumbas, when he asked about the “Informe sobre ciegos,” leading Sabato to investigate Schneider’s background, in which he finds connections with Nazi Germany. Schneider represents evil, a recurring theme in the novel, linked with occult practices and apocalyptic visions, for daring to reveal which Sabato is subjected to unbearable psychological pressure. It is left to Bruno to find a tombstone bearing Sabato’s name in the cemetery where Bruno’s (i.e. Sabato’s) father was buried twenty years earlier. The inscription ends with the single word “paz” (peace), suggesting that Sabato’s struggle for self-understanding has been successful, though again at the cost of losing the sources of inspiration which lie on the dark side of the psyche.

RON KEIGHTLEY

Biography

Born in Rojas, Province of Buenos Aires, Argentina, 24 June 1911. Attended the Colegio Nacional, 1924–28; School of Physical Sciences, National University of La Plata, 1929–37, PhD in physics 1937; Joliot-Curie Laboratory, Paris, 1938; Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, 1939. Married Matilde Kuminsky-Richter in 1934; two sons. Professor of theoretical physics, National University of La Plata, 1940–45: forced to resign by the Perón

Selected Works

Novels

Essays and Other Writings
Uno y el universo, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1945
Hombres y engranajes: reflexiones sobre el dinero, la razón y el derrumbe de nuestro tiempo, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1951
Heterodoxia, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1953
El caso Sábat: torturas y libertad de prensa—carta abierta al General Aramburu, Buenos Aires: privately printed, 1956
Tango: discusión y clave, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1963
El escritor y sus fantasmas, Madrid: Aguilar, 1963
Pedro Henríquez Ureña, Buenos Aires: Ediciones Culturales Argentinas, 1967
Tres aproximaciones a la literatura de nuestro tiempo: Robbe-Grillet, Borges Sartre, Santiago de Chile: Editorial Universitaria, 1968
La convulsión política y social de nuestro tiempo, Buenos Aires: Edicom, 1969
Itinerario, Buenos Aires: Sur, 1969
La cultura en la encrucijada nacional, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de Crisis, 1973
Diálogos, in collaboration with Jorge Luis Borges, Buenos Aires: Emecé, 1976
Los libros y su misión en la liberación e integración de la America Latina, Buenos Aires: Embajada de Venezuela, 1978
Apologías y rechazos, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1979
Cuatro hombres de pueblo, illustrated by Antonio Berni, Buenos Aires: La Ciudad, 1979
La robotización del hombre y otras páginas de ficción y reflexión, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor del America Latina, 1981
Compilations and Anthologies

Obras de ficción, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1966
Obras: ensayos, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1970
Narrativa completa, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1982
Páginas de Ernesto Sábato, Buenos Aires: Celtia, 1983
Lo mejor de Ernesto Sábato, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1989

Further Reading

Dellepiane, Angela B., Ernesto Sábato. El hombre y su obra. (Ensayo de interpretación y análisis literario), New York: Las Américas, 1968
Oberhelman, Harley Dean, Ernesto Sábato, Boston: Twayne, 1970
Urbina, Nicasio, La significación del género. Estudio semiótico de las novelas y ensayos de Ernesto Sábato, Miami: Universal, 1992
Wainerman, Luis, Sábato y el misterio de los ciegos, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1971

Bibliographies

Interviews

Entre la letra y la sangre: conversaciones con Carlos Catania, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1989

Special Issues of Journals

Anthropos, Revista de Documentación Científica de la Cultura, Barcelona, 55–56 (1985)

Abaddón, el exterminador

Novel by Ernesto Sábato

Sábato’s third novel carries still further the investigation of his own psyche, first essayed in El túnel (The Tunnel) and then expanded in Sobre heroes y tumbas (On Heroes and Tombs). In the first novel the author remained wholly invisible behind the narrator, Juan Pablo Castel, and in the second Bruno serves as focus, gathering and reflecting on material drawn from various sources, but in Abaddón, el exterminador, Sábato himself (using the unaccented Sabato as his name) plays a role as one character among others. The complexities of Sobre heroes y tumbas are greatly increased, though at bottom the problem remains the same, along lines predictable from El escritor y sus fantasmas [The Writer and His Ghosts].

The initial challenge, presented in three short chapters, is for Bruno Bassan to make a novel, in Sabato’s manner, but without his collaboration, out of three disparate and apparently unconnected events: an alcoholic’s vision of a great dragon in the night sky, Marcelo Carranza’s death under torture at the hands of security police and Nacho Izaguirre’s surveillance of his sister Agustina. As the novel progresses, the reader learns that both Marcelo and Nacho were known to Sabato, while el loco Barragán’s apocalyptic vision reflects Sabato’s own.

As in Sobre heroes y tumbas, Bruno receives and comments on confidences made to him, now including those by Sabato himself, and from time to time he witnesses actions or discussions of importance for the development of the argument. Other characters, such as Quique or Carlucho, provide vital social background and commentary, but Sabato himself, as writer, philosopher, politically engaged person or simple human being remains at the heart of the novel. Scattered over more than a hundred sections of varying length is an account of Sabato’s psychological development, though not in chronological order. Reconstructed from the evidence presented, Sabato’s sexual experience begins with a pubertal infatuation with Maria Etchebarne, his schoolteacher, which ends abruptly when he finds her blinded by acid thrown in her face. In 1927, at the age of sixteen, he encounters María de la Soledad, of mysterious parentage and seemingly ageless, though of his own age—the characteristic of the anima. Following her through dark passages leading from a house in the Calle de Arcos, he finds himself in a room beneath the Church of the Immaculate Conception in Belgrano and there, under the direction of the enigmatic R., receives his sexual initiation with her; Soledad’s genitalia take the form of a single eye, recalling the eye which Fernando was forced to penetrate in the “Informe sobre ciegos.” This episode is withheld until near the end of the novel, where it becomes an explanation of all that has subsequently transpired in Sabato’s life as narrated so far; R. has by then already been established as Sabato’s dark side or Jungian shadow. While Sabato was working as a physicist in Paris in 1938, R. had manifested himself, causing the separation of Sabato from his wife M. (Matilde, in real life) and their young son. Sabato had also undergone there an extracorporeal experience in which one self had followed a woman with eyes like Maria Etchebarne’s to her apartment, where he found her with her hands covering her face, while another self had been engaged in routine activities. One of Sabato’s last actions in the novel is to revisit the house in the Calle de Arcos, now near-ruined, and follow the tunnel; what he finds there is not disclosed, but when he emerges and returns to his home, he finds his other self seated at his desk, weeping.

R. does not return until about 1972, when his purpose is to urge a reluctant Sabato to renew his writing on the Sect, using a new set of characters, however closely they may follow the pattern of Sobre heroes y tumbas. Thus Sabato becomes involved with Agustina, the sister of Nacho, whom Sabato has known since he was a small boy in Carlucho’s kiosk some ten years earlier. The relationship with Agustina is not given prominence, but her behaviour clearly resembles Alejandra’s, with Sabato as an elderly Martin. Agustina and Nacho are tormented by their incestuous relationship, made worse by his jealousy of both Sabato and Pérez Nassif, her employer; the pattern resembles the Alejandra-Fernando-Molinari triangle of Sobre heroes y tumbas, though with ages and dispositions redistributed. Nacho’s observation of Agustina with Pérez Nassif at the end of the novel is one of the three items presented for Bruno’s consideration.

Sabato’s friendship with the Carranza family and their circle provide a means of surveying Argentine social, cultural and political life. Marcelo Carranza, the son of the house, is engaged in subversive activities and has given shelter to a former comrade of Che Guevara, whose death is recounted at some length, with corroboration and/or contrasting material drawn from military documents. Sabato’s contribution to the cause takes the form of discussing the role of literature in the service of revolution in seminars and in private conversation. Marcelo’s detention and interrogation under torture bring about his death, the second of the three starting-points; his body is disposed of in a weighted sack tipped into the river.

The callous treatment of Marcelo’s corpse and the brutality of his torture, foreshadowed in the novel by the written statement of a social worker who had survived, is merely an extreme expression of the sick society documented in Nacho’s collection of newspaper cuttings. These range from letters to the editor on the twists in the plot of soap operas, and other similar trivia, to murder, pollution of the environment, Vietnam atrocities and Hiroshima. Others offer a response: Helder Camara attacks torture, Linus Pauling condemns nuclear testing. Similar matters are raised in dialogue throughout the novel, creating an atmosphere of pervasive evil. Sabato himself was forced by R. in 1938 to admit to blinding sparrows as a schoolboy in Rojas—an act attributed to Fernando in Sobre heroes y tumbas—though he insists that it was done under the dominating influence of R. In the same year he came into contact with Molinelli, whose interest in alchemy and the occult have led him to the conclusion that science is leading the world into danger in the pursuit of power; this was one of Sabato’s motives for abandoning nuclear physics.

The European political crises of 1938 are not mentioned, but the development of Nazism became a cause for concern to Sabato some ten years later, when he met the mysterious Schneider, who asked him about the significance of Allende’s blindness in El túnel. His suspicions were again aroused in 1962, when Schneider reappeared and asked about Fernando and the “Informe sobre Ciegos” in Sobre heroes y tumbas, leading Sabato to investigate Schneider’s background and possible connections with Nazi Germany and its ideology. In 1972, when Sabato’s need to write is growing, the possibility that Schneider may have reappeared alarms him. Among other extremist ideas which worry Sabato come the doctrines of Dr Alberto J. Gandulfo, according to whom Satan won the great battle in the heavens and in the guise of Jehovah has ruled the world ever since, inflicting sadistic punishment and promoting evil at every opportunity. Sabato concurs, regretting that the message is devalued by the messenger, and adding that there have always been those ready to denounce the deception, reveal the truth, and proclaim the Sect of the Blind as Satan’s active agents; Hiroshima and Vietnam were the work of Satan, as no truly good, all-powerful God could permit such evil. The dragon spread across the heavens seen by the drunken Barragán, the third of Bruno’s starting-points, announces the imminence of the final battle—Armageddon, though Sabato avoids the word. There is no vision of what may follow the great destruction.

Evil on a cosmic scale dominates human life at all levels; nations seek to destroy nations, societies are torn apart by warring factions, relationships crumble as partners fight for dominance. To all these things Sabato bears witness as a character subject to the same forces as those around him in this fiction. From within his role of character he advocates exploration of the individual psyche as a path to understanding human society as a whole—Dostoevsky and Kafka have far more to offer to the revolutionary cause than has Soviet social realism. It is here that Bruno has a role to play in the fiction. In Sobre heroes y tumbas Bruno was in possession of certain facts from the past, observed a few actions in the present and received Martín’s testimony. In Abaddón, el exterminador, Bruno observes some of the action and receives in confidence Sabato’s own accounts of events, with no distinction between the experiences of the fictional character and those of the author of the novel. Bruno, like R., is of Sabato’s age; the death of Bruno’s father in the fictional Capitán Olmos recreates the death of Ernesto Sabato’s father in Rojas. Like the character, Bruno has problems with writing, amounting to acute writer’s block. The writer’s public self is represented by Sabato/S., holding strong opinions on politics and literature, as befits an active mind, but the inner Sabato is seen in Sabato/R., subject to powers operating in the subconscious. Sight, scientific observation and reason are the enemies of the powers of darkness, capable of revealing their agents and their works. The imagery of blindness and blinding is associated with the dark side of the psyche, the shadow, and with evil, but also with the (pro)creative sexual act, here linked specifically with one manifestation of the anima, Soledad, the quest for whom in the return to the Calle de Arcos ends in failure, signalled in the weeping of the other self.

RON KEIGHTLEY

Editions

First edition: Abaddón, el exterminador, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1974

Further Reading

El túnel

Novel by Ernesto Sábato
Like Albert Camus’s L’Étranger, 1942, (The Outsider) and Camilo José Cela’s La familia de Pascual Duarte, 1942, (Pascual Duarte’s Family), El túnel takes the form of the confession of a condemned murderer, but with important differences: Meursault first tells a plain tale of the circumstances in which he killed another man and then reports how it is refashioned by opposing advocates in court; Pascual, though showing some concern about the conditions under which he writes, offers an ostensibly artless account of his life of violence up to the killing of his mother, revealing more of himself than he calculates in the process; Juan Pablo Castel takes for granted the notoriety of his crime, and constantly interrupts his story to digress on minor details or to analyse minutely his thought processes, both at the time of writing and throughout the period during which his victim, María Iribarne, dominated his life.

The story as Castel tells it is simple. In the Argentine spring of 1946, an exhibition of his paintings includes a work entitled “Maternidad” (Motherhood) which contains an inset panel, set upper left, a ventanita or small window through which can be seen a woman gazing out to sea. One visitor, later revealed as María Iribarne, spends some time contemplating this picture, causing Castel to believe that she has understood it. Some agonising months of searching for her pass before a chance encounter enables him to ask her about the painting. His clumsiness spoils their first brief exchange, but her hurried and apologetic declaration when she catches up with him restores his hope. He now knows how to find her again, and soon afterwards he waylays her and initiates a dialogue on the meaning of the painting. Before their next meeting, María contrives his encounter with her blind husband, Allende, while she is away at Hunter’s ranch. While the simple message Allende hands to him excites Castel’s passion, the very existence of Allende, together with Hunter’s reputation, and María’s devious actions, arouse in him powerful feelings of jealousy. A letter from María commenting on “Maternidad” in terms of her own experience gives him new hope, and they embark upon a sexual relationship, constantly overshadowed by his obsessive jealousy. His constant probing leads eventually to her walking out. Temporarily reconciled through letters, Castel visits Hunter’s ranch, achieving a brief happiness there when María re-enacts the ventanita scene of “Maternidad,” but with Castel inserted. Overcome with new doubts and suspicion, Castel leaves the following morning. Further attempts to see María come to nothing. Finally, driven by despair, and after destroying “Maternidad,” Castel goes back to the ranch, and spies on María and Hunter until he is convinced they are lovers. Forcing his way into the house, he kills María, repeatedly stabbing her in the belly. On returning to Buenos Aires, he tells Allende what he has done, only to be told he is a fool. In the short final chapter, Castel contemplates his situation in an asylum for the criminally insane.

All other characters can only be known through what Castel chooses to report of them, which in practice is very little; more than half of the narrative is concerned with Castel’s own thoughts, feelings and actions, and his analyses of situations. Outside the long central episode at Hunter’s ranch, there are reports of only half-a-dozen face-to-face dialogues between Castel and María, and a handful of communications by telephone.
From these data one can construct a rough account of María Iribarne’s past and present: a relationship in adolescence with a certain Juan (with resemblances to Alejandra and Marcos in Sobre heroes y tumbas), virtually ignored by Castel; a more recent affair with a man named Richard; marriage to Allende; and the suspected liaison with Hunter which Castel believes he has confirmed during his vigil on the night of her death. In her words, both spoken and written, as reported by Castel, María shows herself fully aware of the danger she represents, but he misreads her attempts to discourage him.

Juan Pablo Castel’s failure to comprehend María Iribarne’s behaviour arises from his deeply flawed, egocentric worldview. He applies what he believes to be rigorous logical reasoning to events and circumstances without recognising the possibility that human fallibility could apply to himself, and that his premises may be false. When pure chance brings about the desired outcome of his “reasoning,” in the form of the first encounter with María Iribarne, he is at a loss to know what to say to her. His “deductions” regarding her behaviour are purely intuitive, as when he accuses her of smiling at him in the darkness, or based on false logic, as when he believes that she only simulates pleasure in lovemaking because he detects in a prostitute a reaction which he finds similar María’s. These difficulties in establishing a true relationship are a product of Juan Pablo Castel’s fundamentally introspective solitude. We are informed from time to time of his aversion to critics, to art galleries, etc., but he particularly hates, or fears, societies, clubs or any other sort of group with some common interest. He prefers to remain aloof, setting his own norms and conditions.

The inset ventanita in “Maternidad” came to Castel unbidden and is out of keeping with his usual excessively formal, architectural style. He was instinctively drawn to María when he first saw her studying “Maternidad;” she appeared to empathise with the ventanita, and he swiftly concludes that she alone can provide the explanations he seeks; she seems ageless, already known to him, though she warns him that she will cause him much suffering. In short, María exhibits the characteristics of a Jungian anima. Once he has witnessed her reaction, he paints inspired by her, in a new, passionate style, quite distinct from his former manner. Feelings and emotions hitherto constrained or repressed break out on his canvases; what once were monuments and temples are now shattered ruins, as his passions erupt. Recognition of the anima has opened the way to the unconscious, the shadow or dark side of his psyche, but when María betrays his trust, through her relationship with Hunter, he is still not ready to achieve a new equilibrium and pass from the matriarchal stage to maturity by accepting her other archetypal characteristics. The ventanita is therefore the first thing he destroys, before destroying María Iribarne herself; the desperate appeal for understanding has failed. In the final chapter he tells us that he continues to paint, sure that his work is beyond the comprehension of the medical officers of the asylum. He himself has destroyed the only person capable of understanding his work, the bridge between external reality and the dark world of the creative forces within him.

As narrator, Castel declares that he will be satisfied if even one reader understands him. Through painting he had gained just such an audience, but the resulting strain on his psyche proved too great to bear. María Iribarne’s human failings, aspects of behaviour which remain alien to Castel, do not provide the control over the unconscious he needs and so he relapses into his inner world, still unable to communicate through his art.

RON KEIGHTLEY
Editions

Further Reading

Juan José Saer 1937–

Argentine prose writer and poet

In Juan José Saer’s 1983 novel El entenado (The Witness), the narrator, a Spanish cabin boy, who has been cast ashore on the banks of a great South American river, reports that the local Indians hold that a certain stretch of beach on the shore of that river is the centre of the universe. Elsewhere in the book he reports their using a word for that place, Colastiné. Saer is here revealing in condensed form the secret heart of his fictional universe, centred on Colastiné, a suburb where Saer once lived in the city of Santa Fe (in Santa Fe province in the littoral region of Argentina), the setting of most of his fiction. Unlike Faulkner or Onetti, who stake exclusive claims to a territory that is theirs by virtue of their having invented it (however closely based on places they knew), Saer’s claim to Santa Fe results from the intensity with which his characters live in the place. Reading Saer’s work one hears the cabin boy’s words echo in the dialogue that animates a twenty-one block walk through Santa Fe in Glosa, 1986 [Gloss]; in the flooding of the riverbank in “A medio borrar” [Half-Erased], from the short story collection La mayor, 1976 [Dis/Misproportions]; in the Italian’s discovery of the Argentine plains in La ocasión, 1988 (The Event), even in the ritualistic barbecue scenes in El limonero real, 1974 [The Royal Lemon Tree]. A work of an unusual degree of coherence and cohesiveness, Saer’s novels and stories often use the same characters (Tomatis, Wenceslao, el Ladeado, el Gato and others) and almost always the same setting.

Critics often cite Borges as the strongest influence on Saer; although Borges is clearly one of Saer’s literary heroes, the latter’s fidelity to place and to a group of fictional characters is much more reminiscent of Faulkner or Onetti than it is of Borges. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that Borges saves Saer from his early regionalism, and allows his later work to have a metafictional dimension that it might not have had otherwise. Nevertheless, it was in the early “regionalist” works that Saer invented the characters who people most of his later fiction, so his relation to the perennial debates about regionalism and universalism is unusually complicated.

Some of Saer’s work is strongly (some would say tendentiously or heavily) marked by the objectivist tradition of the French new novel, notably in El limonero real and Nadie, nada, nunca, 1980 (Nobody, Nothing, Never). Some of his other late fiction almost includes the telling of stories, though in most cases the telling of the story turns out ultimately to be the revelation that there is no story to tell. Thus, in El entenado, to give an example of a novel that comes close to having a plot, the narration of events halts about halfway through the book, ceding to a philosophical meditation on the meaning of the life of the now-destroyed Indian tribe. This meditation is defined as an exercise in failure: the cabin boy, now grown old, realizes that when he was among the Indians he failed to understand what he saw around him, and that those who might have been his informants are now all dead. His task becomes, then, a more urgent work of memory and analysis, precisely because his testimony is unique, though faulty.

Saer moved to France in 1968 and his literature is only obliquely related to the literature of political commitment and denunciation of the military dictatorships of the late 1960s and (better known outside Argentina) of 1976–83. In his essay on the River Plate, El río sin orillas, 1991 [The River without Banks], he discusses Perón and the military dictators at some length, but far more interesting are the tantalizing patterns of reference in his fiction. El entenado, for instance, anticipates the plethora of works on the “discovery of the New World” or the “Encounter” that appeared around 1992; Saer’s novel is a sorrowful and angry text about genocide, and yet its urgency has to do with more recent genocide. David Viñas writes in Indios, ejército y fronteras, 1982, [Indians, Army and Frontiers], that the Indians killed in the “Conquest of the Desert” were “the disappeared of 1879,” and Saer’s novel quietly recalls the more recent genocide with such details as the bodies floating in the river. Similarly, much of the power of Glosa derives from the ironic contrast between the innocent intellectualism of the two main characters, who do not know what the reader knows, that they are to be swallowed up in the catastrophies of the 1970s in Argentina.

Little of Saer’s work is available yet in English, the exceptions being El entenado, Nadie, nada, nunca and La ocasión. Widely considered the greatest of the living writers in Argentina, Saer deserves our attention. A master stylist, Saer reflects on memory and language in terms as profound as any of our contemporaries. The narrator of El entenado, for instance, writes at the beginning of his account: “Lo desconocido es una abstracción; lo conocido, un desierto; pero lo conocido a medias, lo vislumbrado, es el lugar perfecto para hacer ondular deseo y alucinación” (The unknown is an abstraction, the known, a desert; but the half-known, what is only glimpsed, is the perfect place for the movements of desire and hallucination), words that are echoed at the close of the same novel when the narrator states: “sabemos únicamente lo que condesciende a mostrarse” (we only know what condescends to reveal itself). Saer’s work seduces the imagination with glimpses into what cannot be fully revealed or fully known.

DANIEL BALDERSTON
Biography

Selected Works

Short Fiction
En la zona, 1957–1960, Santa Fe, Argentina: Castellví, 1960
Palo y hueso, Buenos Aires: Camarga Junior, 1965
Unidad de lugar, Buenos Aires: Galerna, 1967
Cicatrices, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1969
La mayor, Barcelona: Planeta, 1976

Novels
Responso, Buenos Aires: Jorge Álvarez, 1964
La vuelta completa, Rosario: Biblioteca Popular Constancio C.Vigil, 1966
El limonero real, Buenos Aires: Planeta, 1974
Nadie, nada, nunca, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1980; as Nobody, Nothing, Never, translated by Helen Lane, London and New York: Serpent’s Tail, 1993
Glosa, Buenos Aires: Alianza, 1986
La ocasión, Barcelona: Destino, 1988; as The Event, translated by Helen Lane, London and New York: Serpent’s Tail, 1995
Lo imborrable, Buenos Aires: Alianza, 1993
La pesquisa, Buenos Aires: Seix Barral, 1994

Poetry
El arte de narrar (poemas 1960–1975), Caracas: Fundarte, 1977

Other Writings
Juan José Saer por Juan José Saer, Buenos Aires: Celtia, 1986 [Includes a variety of writings by Saer himself, together with an extensive essay on his work by María Teresa Gramuglio]
Una literatura sin atributos, Santa Fe, Argentina: Universidad Nacional del Litoral, 1986
Por un relato futuro: diálogo, Santa Fe, Argentina: Centro de Publicaciones, Universidad Nacional del Litoral, 1990 [Conversation with the Argentine author, Ricardo Piglia]
Compilations and Anthologies
Narraciones, 2 vols, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1983
Further Reading

Rama, Ángel, “Los contestatarios del poder,” prologue to the anthology Novísimos narradores hispanoamericanos en Marcha, Mexico City: Marcha, 1981

Solotorevsky, Myrna, La relación mundo-escritura en textos de Reinaldo Arenas, Juan José Saer y Juan Carlos Martínez, Gaithersburg, Maryland: Hispamérica, 1993 [Chapter on Saer]

Interviews

Gustavo Sainz 1940–

Mexican novelist

Along with José Agustín, Gustavo Sainz is considered a founder of the Mexican narrative movement known as la Onda (New Wave) whose principal themes highlight the problems of the urban middle-class in Mexico City. Sainz’s first novel, Gazapo, 1965, tells the story of a young man, Menelao, who has great difficulty in separating himself economically and emotionally from his family. The story also recounts Menelao’s relationship with his girlfriend Gisela, revealed in the narrative through an erotic discourse. Using the lives of Menelao and Gisela the author portrays the urban environment of young people and the many problems they encounter in Mexico City. Structurally, Sainz employs the tape recorder as a narrative device. In this way he alters the reader’s sense of time and space in order to present the story from different points of view.

Obsesivos días circulares, 1969 [Obsessive Circular Days] focuses on two characters. Terencio, the principal narrator, works as a night watchman in a private high school. The school is owned by a gangster, Papá la Oca. The novel is characterized by political overtones since it also narrates the crimes and killings associated with Papá la Oca. This work is divided into four parts. The first centers on the life of a professional assassin employed by Papá la Oca, Sarro, and his lover, Yin. The second part describes Terencio’s vacations in Acapulco where he unexpectedly encounters his ex-wife Leticia. In this section the reader is informed of this previous relationship through Terencio’s narration of his sexual fantasies and desires for his wife. The third part focuses on a voyeuristic character, La Cripta, who also works for Terencio’s boss. This section ends and the fourth part begins when Terencio leaves for Acapulco to perform a secret mission ordered by Papá la Oca. Convinced that Papá la Oca wants to kill him, Terencio mitigates his fear of dying by reconstructing the ending of classic Mexican novels he has read, such as Carlos Fuentes’s La región más transparente (Where the Air is Clear) and Juan Rulfo’s Pedro Páramo.

Sainz’s third novel, La princesa del Palacio de Hierro, 1974 (The Princess of the Iron Palace), narrates the life of an anonymous, lower-middle-class woman who works at the Iron Palace, a Mexican department store. This nameless character typifies the Mexican middle class and the economic problems that it confronted in the 1960s and 1970s. A principal theme treated in the novel is the cultural dichotomy between different generations. Here, the older generation is identified by nationalistic icons (Agustín Lara) while the younger is associated with elements of urban culture (the use of drugs, the sexual revolution). The novel is distinguished by Sainz’s use of popular language which symbolizes this new, urban and young middle class. The setting of the novel, Mexico City, is presented as a destructive, sometimes deadly, labyrinth. These cultural conflicts and social themes symbolize the economic and social contractions of the Mexican capital, a city undergoing a process of modernization and unable to meet the demands of its growing population.

Compadre Lobo, 1977 [Godfather Lobo] recounts the life of Lobo, a young man who aspires to be a painter. A typical Bildungsroman, the protagonist/narrator takes the reader through the different stages of his life as he struggles to achieve artistic and literary recognition. The action of the story primarily takes place at night and the setting is a recreation of the working-class neighborhoods in which the protagonist was raised. Lobo’s use of popular language contrasts sharply with the official cultural discourse which dominates in his artistic world. The manner in which Sainz ends this novel marks an important moment in his narrative. It is the first time in which he uses a contemporary historical event, the silent protest of 1968 pre-dating the Tlatelolco massacre, to contextualize his narrative. It is significant since literary critics had characterized his narrative as a-historical.

The change towards a historical narrative is confirmed with Fantasmas aztecas, 1982 [Aztec Phantoms]. The setting and the action of the novel center on the excavation of the Templo Mayor in Mexico City. As the narrator/novelist rides around the city in a taxi, he guides the reader on an historical journey through Mexican history. He does this in order to present an interpretation of his generation and times as a symbolic reenactment of Aztec society and age. The narrative structure recreates this chronological and cultural juxtaposition by intertwining the past, present and future.

In Paseo en trapezio, 1985 [Trapezoid Ride], the nameless protagonist and narrator travels from New Mexico to Mexico City. On his arrival in his native city he experiences ambivalent feelings which oscillate between antagonism and nostalgia, inhospitality and melancholy, hatred and love. The protagonist’s emotions are an expression of his psychological and physical displacement which affects his sense of identity. This emptiness and displacement represents both a psychological vacuum as well as the physically-exiled status of the narrator. Two other motifs are important in this novel. First, Sainz portrays the city as an allegorical circus in order to criticize Mexican sociopolitical and cultural institutions. Second, the novel eulogizes Mexican intellectuals who are important to Sainz’s literary generation, figures such as Agustín Yáñez, José Revueltas and Parméndis García Saldaña.
The novel Muchacho en llamas, 1988 [A Young Man in Flames] is set in Mexico City during the early 1960s and narrates a creative period in the life of Sofocles, a young writer. While the protagonist reflects on the creative process itself, transforming the novel into a metatext, he also engages the reader in the actual writing of his first piece of fiction. Sofocles’s novel is the story of his adventures during approximately a year’s span in Mexico City. Thus, his narrative is a Bildungsroman which also provides a cultural testimony of the early years of an important decade in Mexican history. In this way the protagonist’s milieu supplies a palimpsest-like mosaic filled with historical and cultural references which infuse both the young man’s novel and Muchacho en llamas. The autobiographical relationship between the protagonist and Sainz is very important.

The publication of A la salud de la serpiente, 1991 [A Toast to the Serpent’s Health] marks an important moment in the evolution of Sainz’s fiction. Although Compadre Lobo used a student-led political protest as a chronological reference to mark the novel’s end, another, the 1968 Tlatelolco massacre, now serves as the principal theme of this historical narrative. Two stories are told. The first is the autobiography of a young intellectual participating in the University of Iowa International Writer’s Workshop. The writer experiences this significant event in Mexican history only at a distance and through letters sent by friends living in Mexico, Latin America and Europe. The second story is a more general “new” chronicle which tells of the massacre, an event of primary significance in understanding that particularly turbulent time as well as contemporary Mexican socio-political and cultural realities.

Retablo de inmoderaciones y heresiarcas, 1992, [Altarpiece of Immoderations and Heresies] is a Neobaroque narrative which novelistically and typographically recreates a Baroque retablo. Set in colonial Mexico, the novella narrates the struggles of a young man, accused of being a heretic, who is incarcerated by the Inquisition. This masterful narrative incorporates a number of discourses: poetic and historical, inquisitorial and religious, mystic and erotic. The novella examines the literary and cultural heritage of New Spain and begins with three epigraphs that foreground its socio-political theme: creole ideology, identity and consciousness. Sainz’s work scrutinizes the contradictions of the colonial system: the demands of creoles for representation in their government; the existence of two different economic and educational systems; the depiction of corruption in the Church; and the identification of a new mestizaje.

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 13 July 1940. Attended the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM), and the Colegio de México. Editor of El Calendario de Ramón López Velarde, the supplement La Semana de Bellas Artes, Siete magazine. Contributor to numerous newspapers and scriptwriter for radio and television. Attended the International Writing Program, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1968. Director of the literature section, Instituto Nacional de Bellas Artes, Mexico City. Professor of modern and classical languages, University of New Mexico, Albuquerque, 1981–90; Visiting Professor at the University of Northern Illinois, Dekalb and Washington University, St Louis; Professor, Indiana University, Bloomington. Awarded the Xavier Villaurrutia Prize, 1974 for La princesa del Palacio de Hierro; Guggenheim Fellowship, 1976; Tinker Fellowship, 1980.
Selected Works

Novels

Obsesivos días circulares, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1969

Compadre Lobo, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1977
Fantasmas aztecas: un pre-texto, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1982.
Paseo en trapecio, Mexico City: Edision, 1985
Muchacho en llamas, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1988
A la salud de la serpiente, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1991
Retablo de inmoderaciones y heresiarcas, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1992.
La muchacha que tenia la culpa de todo, Monterrey: Castillo, 1995
Salto de tigre blanco, Mexico City: Joaquin Mortiz, 1996

Other Writings
Gustavo Sainz, Mexico City: Empresas, 1966 [autobiography]

Compilations and Anthologies
Ojalá te mueras y otras novelas clandestinas mexicanas, Barcelona: Océano, 1982

Further Reading

Salarrué 1899–1975

Salvadorean prose writer, poet and painter

The work of Salvador Salazar Arrué, who published under the name of Salarrué, is exceptional in the context of a regional literature that historically has been ignored by the more cosmopolitan centers of culture in Latin America. He is one of the few Central American writers who has been recognized to the extent of being mentioned in many of the classic histories of Latin American literature as well as being included in numerous anthologies of the Latin American short story. His acknowledged mastery of the short story is indeed justified. What stands to be corrected, however, is the almost exclusive identification of Salarrué with his collection of stories about Salvadorean campesinos, Cuentos de barro [Clay Stories]. While these stories do figure significantly in the development of costumbrismo in Central America, and are justifiably praised for their realistic and compassionate portrayal of the indigenous population of El Salvador, they are only one of the many literary accomplishments of this highly original and prolific Salvadorean writer and artist.

It would be impossible to describe or deeply comprehend the work of Salarrué without reference to theosophy, an eclectic system of belief that strives for a synthesis, through reason and intuition, of the essential truths of religion, science and philosophy, with an ethics of universal brotherhood and social responsibility. Among the esoteric principles of theosophy are the belief in astral spheres within which one moves by desire and will, and the essential unity of all life. Salarrué, like many other writers, educators and politicians of Central America during the late 19th and early 20th centuries, was drawn to this vision of a universe guided by the dynamic interplay of the seemingly contradictory and opposing forces of masculine and feminine, yin and yang, light and dark, good and evil. He remained faithful throughout his life to his quest for an ever more profound comprehension of the nature of the universe. This spiritual quest permeates his entire oeuvre, both his writing and his painting, at times explicitly, at times as an implicit world view.

In his first published work, a short novel based on the legend of the Black Christ, he delves into a theme that continued to intrigue him until the end of his long and productive life in 1975: the nature of good and evil. In El cristo negro, 1916 [The Black Christ] he reverses the expected manifestations of good and evil to lead the reader to question accepted notions of goodness and saintliness. In later collections of short stories he returns to this theme, positing evil as an attribute of God, the infant Jesus as the Devil, saints as sinners, and sinners as saints.

As a young man, Salarrué was awarded a scholarship in 1916 by the Salvadorean government to study art at the Corcoran School of Art in Washington, DC. When he returned to El Salvador, he combined his interest in multiple spheres of consciousness with his penchant for fantasy and his unique brand of experimentation with the creative potential of language to produce his second major work, O’Yarkandal (1929), a collection of stories that defy classification, but that resemble legends, fairy tales, creation myths and archetypal dream scenes. He illustrated the book with paintings that reproduce visually this “remoto imperio” (remote empire) where one encounters cities of winged men, islands adrift in unknown seas, strange perfumes and gardens perenially in... bloom, whose first man and woman were born from the egg of a bird known as Alm-a (soul). O’Yarkandal is a book of pure creation for which Salarrué has invented even a language, bilsac, the fabrication of which he describes in the prologue as having been a euphonic and euphoric experience. His sensual, almost tactile delight in language is another of the characteristics of Salarrué’s prose that makes it identifiable and memorable.

After experimenting with the invention of language in O’Yarkandal, he published Cuentos de barro in 1933, which is considered by many critics to be his best work. Salarrué was born in Sonsonate, a region of El Salvador with a strong indigenous presence. In Cuentos de barro he recreates with great compassion the rural indigenous world he loved. While these stories are part of the at once beloved and maligned tradition of costumbrist literature so popular in Central America at the turn of the century, they do not, as is often the case with this genre, paint an innocent picture of rural simplicity, but rather face clearly the reality of a people long oppressed by a system that does not favor their class or ethnicity. Which is not to say that they are framed in a political ideology, but that Salarrué does not turn from evil or injustice, whether in the patrón (boss), the campesino, or himself, choosing rather to accept it and mold it into narrative. He has been praised in Central America not only for his mastery of the short story, but also for his humanity. Salvadorean writer Manlio Argüeta described him, in his poem entitled “Salarrué,” as “Maestro de la ternura /en un país de guerra” (Teacher of tenderness/in a country of war). Besides his ability to deal tenderly with his characters, even in their violence and vengeance, what makes these stories so appealing is the obvious love of the author for the real language spoken by the people of a specific ethnicity in a specific geographic space. The non-Salvadorean reader must make reference to the glossary invariably included in Salarrué’s books to appreciate the vernacular used in all his rural stories. Besides Cuentos de barro, these appear primarily in Trasmallo, 1954 [Net] and La espada y otras narraciones, 1960 [The Sword and Other Narratives].

Salarrué’s delight in language combines in a unique way with his sense of fantasy and humor in Cuentos de cipotes [Kids’ Stories], stories not for children, he explains in the prologue, but by children, more specifically, by the child in him. They are the stories children tell each other or tell adults, although adults never listen. They are small stories that speak like kids, full of mispronunciations, malapropisms, riddles, rhymes and invented language. They are silly, ingenious, wise and candid. The first edition was illustrated by his wife, Zelié Lardé, considered to be El Salvador’s first “primitive” artist, while the second edition was illustrated by his daughter, Maya, who followed artistically in her mother’s footsteps. Like everything he wrote, these stories are influenced by his fascination with the essential unity of all planes of existence, in this case the child that lives in the adult and the maturity of the child, the wisdom of nonsense, and the foolishness of being serious.

Finally, there are the stories some critics have called his cosmopolitan ones, but that might also be described as urbaneoteric. Besides the time he spent studying art in Washington, Salarrué also lived in New York and Washington in the early 1950s when he served as cultural attaché at the Salvadorean Embassy. These places and the kinds of people he met there appear in tales that explore such phenomena as astral travel, reincarnation, and, again, the nature of good and evil. Sophisticated settings form the background for esoteric mind games in a world of international travel, archeological digs and elegant mansions on Riverside Drive.

Salarrué was a bohemian, an eccentric, an artist and a theosophist. A Central American writer who sometimes went to cocktail parties with ambassadors and sometimes was so poor he traded his paintings for art supplies. He was a tall man with fair skin and green eyes who was once described as resembling a sleepwalker who went through life with his eyes open, but in some other world. For all his eccentricity, he was an active and important figure in Salvadorean and Central American art and literature. Critics tend to address either his telluric, socially realistic stories, such as those of Cuentos de barro, or his fantastic, imaginative narratives, such O’ Yarkandal. Sergio Ramírez, for example, in the prologue to El ángel del espejo y otros relatos, 1977 [The Angel of the Mirror and Other Tales], acknowledges the importance of both of these tendencies, but sees them as separate spheres that are never integrated. Ramón Luis Acevedo, on the other hand, suggests in his essay “Lo fantástico y lo maravilloso en O’ Yarkandal de Salarrué,” that these two worlds are perhaps not so separate as they may appear. But the nature of Salarrué’s vision has not yet been adequately described. His body of work is diverse and original. From numerous points in the universe he begins his stories, stories that inevitably end up in the same place: face to face with the mystery. A serious, full-length study of the man and his work is yet to be written. Given the range of his interests and the esoteric nature of many of his pursuits, it will be a difficult but worthwhile task.

Biography

Born Salvador Salazar Arrué in Sonsonate, El Salvador, 22, October 1899. Mother schoolteacher. Parents separated before child was born. Attended primary school in San Salvador. At the age of ten he published his first writings in the newspaper, Diario de Salvador. Secondary education at Instituto Nacional. Tutored in painting by a Russian artist. Received small grant from Salvadorean government and in 1917 started to study at Corcoran Academy in Washington, DC. Returned to El Salvador, 1919. Worked as writer and illustrator for the literary journals, Espiral and Germinal. In these he published his first regional stories accompanied by his own illustrations. Married Zelié Lardé, 1922, a primitivist painter from family of writers and intellectuals, in 1922; three daughters. Acquired interest in theosophy and esoteric literature. In 1928 began to publish in Patria [Homeland], a newspaper founded by his friend the essayist Alberto Masferrer. Later became its director and editor-in-chief. Published also in the newspaper, Queremos [We Want] and the literary journal, Cactus. After the publication of Cuentos de barro in 1933 he met Gabriela Mistral who facilitated a Chilean edition of this collection of short stories. Appointed officer in charge of cultural affairs in the US, 1946. Returned to El Salvador in 1951. General director of fine arts, 1961–64: resigned owing to inadequate government funding. Together with the poet Claudio Lars, received the highest honour accorded by the Salvadorean Academy of the Language, 1969. Died in El Salvador, November 1975.
Selected Works

Novels

El cristo negro, San Salvador: Biblioteca Nacional, 1926
La sed de Sling Bader, San Salvador: Ministerio de Educación, 1971
Catleya Luna, San Salvador: Ministerio de Educación, 1974

Short Fiction

O’Yarkandal, Cuscatlan, El Salvador: Tipografía Patria, 1929
Remontando el Uluán, San Salvador: Agua y Arena, 1932
Cuentos de barro, San Salvador: La Montaña, 1933
Eso y más, Santa Ana, El Salvador: Editorial Ir, 1940
Trasmallo, San Salvador: Ministerio de Cultura, 1954
La espada y otras narraciones, San Salvador: Ministerio de Cultura, 1960

Poetry

Compilations and Anthologies

Cuentos, with a prologue by Roque Dalton, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1968

Further Reading

Ramírez, Sergio, prologue to Salarrué: “El ángel del espejo” y otros relatos, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1977

Sebastián Salazar Bondy 1924–1964

Peruvian dramatist, poet and prose writer

In “Testamento ológrafo” [Holograph Testament], a poem written shortly before his death, Sebastián Salazar Bondy sardonically bequeaths a last image of himself: that of a man wasted away by illness, gazing sadly at the city of Lima, whose enervating atmosphere reduces hopes and dreams to frustration, and looking back on a life of frantic activity which has seen his ambitions only partially realised. That poem is a remarkably honest and accurate self-assessment, for though Salazar packed a great deal into his tragically short life, his achievements fell somewhat short of his goals. As the author of plays, poems, short stories and essays, he left behind him an estimable body of work, but he never succeeded in establishing himself as a major writer. In part, this was because he was continually experimenting with different genres and manners in search of the form of self-expression which best suited him, only to end up spreading himself too thinly. However, as “Testamento ológrafo” implies, it is also partly attributable to the limitations of the Peruvian cultural scene, which led him to divert much of his energy in other directions. Confronted with the difficulties facing a creative artist in an underdeveloped Third World country, Salazar campaigned to foster an environment in which artistic activity could flourish. He was a tireless promoter of the arts—writing book reviews, giving public lectures, editing anthologies, organising exhibitions, collaborating in the creation of journals and competitions and offering encouragement and help to aspiring young writers. Above all, he was at the forefront of a movement to develop a vigorous modern theatre: he was the country’s leading theatre critic in the 1950s. He was responsible for reorganising the Ministry of Education’s theatrical division, he was the inspiration behind the founding of the Club de Teatro company in 1953 and he was directly involved in theatrical productions as director and artistic adviser. Predictably perhaps, his endeavours failed to produce a major transformation of the Peruvian cultural environment, but they did have the effect of encouraging creativity and the fact that writers such as Mario Vargas Llosa have acknowledged their debt to him is confirmation that modern Peruvian literature would have been considerably poorer without his example and inspiration.

As a consequence of this dispersal of his energies, Salazar’s writing is uneven in quality and though it includes some fine work, its value lies mainly in its contribution to the creation of a modern cultural tradition, which he himself regarded as a national priority. Above all, his output of ten full-length dramas and eleven brief one-act plays was central to the revitalisation of the Peruvian theatre which began in the late 1940s. His career as a dramatist was marked by continual experimentation as he sought, with varying success, to reconcile the concepts of theatre as entertainment and as a vehicle for social criticism. Thus, his first play, Amor, gran laberinto [Love, the Great Labyrinth], is a political allegorical farce, with grotesque, puppet-like figures in the style of Valle-Inclán. Subsequently, he went on to cultivate a realistic type of theatre in the shape of social and historical dramas, the best of which, Rodil (1952), focuses on the eponymous leader of Spain’s last stand against the forces of independence as a symbol of the intransigent defence of conservative tradition. Later, he staged a series of satirical-costumbrist comedies on the model of the French popular theatre, the most successful being El fabricante de deudas, 1964 [The Debt Manufacturer], which adapts Balzac’s Le Faiseur [The Schemer] to the Limeñan scene to satirise the capitalist financial system. His last play, El rabdomante, 1965 [The Diviner] reverts to political allegory to explore the role of the artist in the revolutionary process.

Salazar was also a fine poet and occupies an honorable place among the generation who emerged in the 1940s and 1950s to produce one of the richest national poetries in Latin America. His is a confessional poetry written in a simple conversational style which found its best expression in the posthumously published El tacto de la araña [The Spider’s Touch]. Unashamedly sentimental in character, his verse expresses his strong emotional attachment to the people and places who make up his world, and celebrates the values of love, friendship, goodwill among human beings. Its dominant tone is perhaps one of melancholy, born of his awareness of the precariousness of all things human and of social injustice, which he felt personally as an offence against life and a blight on the country he loved. Despite that, his poetry communicates a tremendous love of life and a commitment to living it to the full with all its imperfections.

Salazar ranks, too, as one of the pioneers of modern urban fiction in that the stories of Náufragos y sobrevivientes, 1954 [Castaways and Survivors] portray the drab and precarious existence of Lima’s lower-middle classes. However, the prose work for which he is most likely to be remembered is the essay Lima la horrible, 1964 [Beastly Lima], a personal diagnosis of Peruvian society in the dissident tradition of Manuel González Prada and José Carlos Mariátegui and similar in manner to Octavio Paz’s interpretation of the Mexican national character in El laberinto de la soledad, 1950 (The Labyrinth of Solitude). Here Salazar argues that coastal Peru remains marked by the legacy of Spanish colonialism, not only in the persistence of antiquated social structures and class divisions, but in a conformist mentality conditioned by a Hispanic mythology, which has been manipulated by the ruling elite and which it is necessary to debunk in order to build a modern democratic Peru. Lima la horrible is probably Salazar’s most important work, for it encapsulates the spirit of much modern Peruvian writing and formulates the ideology underpinning it.

JAMES HIGGINS

Biography

Selected Works

Poetry
Voz desde la vigilia, Lima: Hermes, 1944
Máscara del que duerme, Buenos Aires: Botella al Mar, 1949
Confidencia en alta voz, Lima: Vida y Palabra, 1960
Vida de Ximena, Lima: La Rama Florida, 1960
Conducta sentimental, Bogotá: Celza, 1963
El tacto de la araña/Sombras como cosas sólidas, Lima: Francisco Moncloa, 1966

Short Fiction
Náufragos y sobrevivientes, Lima: Club del Libro Peruano, 1954
Pobre gente de París, Lima: Mejía Baca, 1958
Dios en el cafetín, Lima: Populibros Peruanos, 1964
Alférez Arce, teniente Arce, capitán Arce..., Lima: Casa de la Cultura del Perú, 1969 [Unfinished novel]

Plays
Amor, gran laberinto, in Teatro peruano contemporáneo, Lima: Huascarán, 1948
Rodil, Lima: Perendena, 1952
No hay isla feliz, Lima: Club de Teatro, 1954
El fabricante de deudas, Lima: Nuevo Mundo, 1964

Other Writings
Antología general de la poesía peruana, Lima: Librería Internacional de Perú, 1957
Lima la horrible, Mexico City: Era, 1964
Poesía quechua, with a translation and notes by Salazar Bondy, Mexico City: UNAM, 1964
Ollantay y cantos y narraciones quechuas, Lima: Peisa, 1974 [Translations into Castilian by José María Arguedas, César Miró and Salazar Bondy]

Compilations and Anthologies
After the death of Salazar Bondy there was a project to compile his complete works in six volumes under the title Obras de Sebastián Salazar Bondy. The first three volumes appeared in 1967, published in Lima by Francisco Moncloa: I. Comedias y juguetes; II. Piezas dramáticas; III. Poema Todo esto es mi país, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1987

Further Reading
Alfaro-Alexander, Ana María, Hacia la modernización de la narrativa peruana, New York: Peter Lang, 1992, Caballero, Juan, El teatro de Sebastián Salazar Bondy, Lima: García Ribeyro, 1975

Luis Rafael Sánchez 1936–

Puerto Rican prose writer and dramatist
Luis Rafael Sánchez first won international critical acclaim with the publication of La guaracha del Macho Camacho, 1976 (Macho Camacho’s Beat). However, this and his only other novel, La importancia de llamarse Daniel Santos, 1988 [The Importance of Being Daniel Santos], form only part of a long and successful career as a short story writer, playwright, and essayist.

In Puerto Rico, Sánchez was first recognized as a writer of short fiction, whilst his coming of age as a writer is well illustrated by the trajectory of his short story career. His first stories, from the end of the 1950s, such as “El trapito” [Beloved Rag], “Destierro” [Exile], and “Espuelas” [Spurs], generally follow the literary model set by the established writers of his youth. The work of most of these, writers such as René Marqués and Abelardo Díaz Alfaro, is characterized by an idealization of Puerto Rico’s Spanish heritage, harsh criticism of modern city life as opposed to a harmonious, traditional rural life, political didacticism, the portrayal of heroic sacrifice and a refined, literary Spanish.

With the publication of his only collection of short stories, En cuerpo de camisa, 1966 [Shirt Sleeves Unbuttoned], Sánchez extensively challenged his literary forefathers. Spanish culture succumbs to the threatening seduction of African-Antillean culture (“Aleluya negra” [Black Aleluya]), the modern city is no longer tragically threatening but is treated parodically (“Que sabe a paraíso” [The Taste of Paradise], “Etc.”), whilst the paradise lost of rural life becomes an intolerant hell for the homosexual mulatto and classless pariah who is the protagonist of “¡jum!” [Huh!]. Didacticism is replaced by irony and satire, heroic sacrifice by the marginalized anti-hero(ine)’s negotiation with mainstream culture. Meanwhile, formal Spanish is replaced by a coarsely humorous urban Puerto Rican vernacular galvanized as a baroque literary style through a recuperation of the grotesque identified with Quevedo and Valle-Inclán. This ground-breaking collection was the foundation for Sánchez’s most mature work, which developed the features that characterize En cuerpo de camisa.

Almost simultaneously with his recognition as a short story writer, Sánchez initiated his career as a playwright. His first play, the prize-winning La espera, 1959 [Waiting], is indeed based on a short story of the same name published by Sánchez in 1957 and involves the unrequited love between a solitary woman, who eventually dies of pneumonia, and the unnamed man who daily passes outside her window. Both the play and short story poignantly examine time’s existential and ultimately tragic dimensions.

Sánchez’s work as a playwright ranges over several forms. Cuento de Cucarachita Viudita, 1959 [Tale of Doñita Widowbug] is adapted from a popular folktale into children’s theatre, whilst Los ángeles se han fatigado, 1960 [The Angels Have Grown Weary], La hiel nuestra de cada día, 1961 [Give Us This Day Our Daily Bile], and…O casi el alma, 1964 [Soul by a String] are, respectively, a monologue and two naturalist works, all examining existentialist crises of identity occasioned by disillusionment and religious faith. La pasión según Antígona Pérez, 1968 [The Passion According to Antígona Pérez] combines classically tragic political drama—involving the martyrdom of a female dissident under an imaginary Latin American dictatorship—with Brechtian elements. However, it is the development of forms first explored in Farsa del amor compradito, 1960 [Farce of True Love’s Bargain], and renovated much later in Parábola del Andarín, 1979 [Parable of the Long Distance Walker], which has culminated in his finest play to date, Quíntuples, 1985 [Quintuplets].

In Farsa del amor compradito, Sánchez deploys the absurdist possibilities of commedia dell’arte, Pirandello, Valle-Inclán’s esperpento, and again Brecht’s distancing devices, to produce a playful farce, whose burlesque form is undone in Quíntuples. The leading characters of Quintuples, like those of Parábola, are the members of a show business troupe, whose exhaustion of their stereotypical roles in pleasurable performance questions the very terms of their subjectivity, thus opening the way to unforeseen socio-political and national configurations exceeding those offered by a colonial history.
In his many essays, mostly published in Puerto Rican or Spanish newspapers and magazines, Sánchez foregrounds the cultural and political context for his other writing. As in all his work, Puerto Rico’s colonial status and national identity are central concerns. He attacks what he considers the undermining of language and vital institutions under colonialism (“La generación o sea,” 1972 [The You Know Generation]), the tawdry bourgeois values that accompany colonialism (“El debut en Viena,” 1975 [Debut in Vienna]), as well as speaking up against racism (“La gente de color: cariños y prejuicios,” 1972 [People of Colour: Affection and Prejudice]). Moreover, he has written compassionately about the prejudice faced by Puerto Ricans in North America (“La guagua aérea,” 1983 [The Flying Bus]), the ties that bind them to the island, and the international invisibility of Puerto Ricans (“Puertorriqueño he nacido,” 1991 [Puerto Rican by Birth]).

Sánchez has also written essays concerning literature, music and cinema. In these, he often discusses artists and writers who have helped shape his own work, such as Fellini (“Cine de nuestro tiempo: La Dolce Vita” 1961 [Cinema of Our Time: La Dolce Vita]), James Baldwin (“De James Baldwin. Un ensayo profético,” 1963 [About James Baldwin. A Prophetic Essay]), and the Puerto Rican writer, Abelardo Díaz Alfaro (“Los lujos de la memoria,” 1991 [The Luxuries of Memory]). Moreover, the Spanish language, humour, places and events that define him as a Puerto Rican (“El cuarteto newyorkés,” 1993 [New York Quartet]), Latin American and Caribbean (“Las señas del Caribe,” 1993 [The Marks of the Caribbean]), are also discussed.

Sánchez’s recent La guagua aérea (1994), is a collection of essays that arguably excludes his more polemical work, but that provides a broad sample of his various interests as an essayist. The title essay, a revised version of his 1983 essay of the same name, formed the basis for a locally highly successful but disappointing 1993 Puerto Rican film production of, again, the same name. The movie redirected Sánchez’s critically comic reflection on the Puerto Rican diaspora into a complacently mainstream vehicle of light entertainment.

Though Sánchez has only written two novels, they, along with Quintuples, constitute the pinnacle of his work. As in his short stories and plays, the novels portray aspects of a resilient Puerto Rican popular culture whose daily survival is made possible by a reworking of the terms of its dependence. Such appropriation and dependency is further complicated by race, class and sexual considerations, so that popular culture is revealed as a network of negotiated or conflicting power relations.

In Sánchez’s earliest short stories (“El trapito” [The Little Rag]), frustrated national aspirations can only be expressed through tragically symbolic acts of violence. Hope for the fulfilment of national aspirations is obscured by the fatalistic tone of these stories, which only provide cathartic tragedy or stubbornly irrational resistance (“Espuelas” [Spurs]). As Sánchez’s work matures, there are stories of ingenious survival under colonialism by means of subterfuge (“Aleluya negra”) or the violent assertion of a degraded communality (“¡Jum!”). However, neither course of action is able to liberate the colonial subject from a national dependence that is consolidated by incorporating disputes according to its own rules. At these earlier stages, Sánchez seems to consider the colonial delimitation of a differentiated subaltern as the major obstacle to any post-colonial project beyond Free Associated Statehood. The “Associated Freedom” of the island’s relationship with the United States highlights the long-standing containment by colonialism of the emancipatory possibilities of subaltern hybridity, appropriation, and discontent. But, though there might seem to be a need for a strategic essentialism, in the face of a constitutionally preempted hybridity and violence, this is not the route Sánchez chooses to take in his two novels.

If in 1966, when En cuerpo de camisa was published, Sánchez presented the unruliness of recalcitrance as being incorporated by colonialism, in the novels, even between the novels, there is an increasing optimism inherent in Sánchez’s broadening perspectives. In La guaracha del Macho Camacho, popular culture provides a space where the subaltern colonial subject may defend communality against impersonal capitalist colonialism. Meanwhile, twelve years later, in La importancia de llamarse Daniel Santos, Puerto Rican colonial dependency is viewed in the broader context of Latin Americans’ subjection to a Third-World status. Nevertheless, if the lot of most Latin Americans is subordination, the latter is resisted in a popular culture that affirms a differentiated Latin American communality which unites multiple aspirations in a shared identity embodied by the figure of the popular hero. Thus, the legend of the bolero singer Daniel Santos locally supersedes, at the level of daily microhistories, the restrictions of dominant colonialist, capitalist and class ideologies. Consequently, particular situations in social, sexual, class, geographical and race hierarchies are highlighted as specifically defensible, even offensive, points from which to mount a concerted resistance.

If Sánchez’s developing preoccupations in the two novels and his most recent play, Quintuples, are increasingly invested in the assertiveness of popular culture, then the latter provides not only a site of resistance but also the foundations for unprecedented individual, national, and pan-American identities.

JOHN PERIVOLARIS

See also entry on Guillermo Cabrera Infante

Biography

Born in Humacao, Puerto Rico, 17 November 1936, into a working-class family. Family moved to San Juan, 1948. Actor for Puerto Rican radio in his late teens; also acted in the theatre. Studied at Humanities Faculty of the University of Puerto Rico, 1956. Scholarship to Columbia University, New York, 1959. Master’s degree from New York University, 1963. PhD from University of Madrid, 1967. Lecturer in Hispanic Literature, University of Puerto Rico, 1969. Awarded Guggenheim Fellowship in 1985, which allowed him to start writing La importancia de llamarse Daniel Santos. In the 1990s spends half the year teaching at the City University of New York (CUNY) and the rest of the time travelling and writing.

Selected Works

Novels and Short Fiction
En cuerpo de camisa, San Juan, Puerto Rico: Lugar, 1966
La importancia de llamarse Daniel Santos, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1988
Plays
Los ángeles se han fatigado, La farsa del amor compradito, San Juan, Puerto Rico: Lugar, 1960
...O casi el alma (Auto de fe en tres actos), in Teatro puertorriqueño (Séptimo festival), San Juan, Puerto Rico: Instituto de Cultura Puertorriqueña, 1965
La pasión según Antígona Pérez (crónica americana en dos actos), Hato Rey, Puerto Rico: Lugar, 1968
Farsa del amor compradito. La hiel nuestra de cada día. Los ángeles se han fatigado, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Editorial Antillana, 1976
Quintuples, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1985

Essay
La guagua aérea, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Editorial Cultural, 1994

Further Reading

Alvarado, Ana D., María Milagros López and Wanda E.Ramos, “Celebrating Life and the Rearticulation of Mytho-Misogyny: Women Unearthing the “Machosaurus,”” Sargasso, San Juan, 6 (1989) [on Daniel Santos]

González, José Luis, “Plebeyismo y arte en el Puerto Rico de hoy,” in his El país de cuatro pisos y otros ensayos, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Huracán, 1980

González Echevarría, Roberto, “La vida es una cosa phenomenal: La guaracha del Macho Camacho y la estética de la novela actual,” in his Isla a su vuelo fugitiva, Madrid: Porrúa Turanzas, 1983

Vázquez Arce, Carmen, Por la vereda tropical: notas sobre la cuentística de Luis Rafael Sánchez, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1994 [Exhaustive study of the short stories which pays due attention to tone and humour. Includes comprehensive bibliography]

La guaracha del Macho Camacho

Novel by Luis Rafael Sánchez

Luis Rafael Sánchez’s novelistic debut presents the interrelated lives of a corrupt Puerto Rican senator, Vicente Reinosa, his repressed upper-class wife, Graciela Alcántara, his working-class mulatto mistress, La China Hereje (The Heretical Chinawoman), and his wastrel son, Benny. Narrative development is minimal, since the action is centred on a massive San Juan traffic jam, from which the narration constantly digresses by means of flashbacks, fantasy, daydreams, as well as cross-cutting between episodes and characters.

If the growth of Puerto Rican cities marks the shift from an agrarian to an industrial economy, then the traffic jam that constitutes the central motif of La guaracha is perhaps a metaphor for Puerto Rico’s stagnation under capitalist North American colonialism. In this situation, the incapacity of official politics to conceive a postcolonial project that might fulfil Puerto Rican national aspirations is countered by the immediate agency of everyday life. Immediacy is afforded by the physical terms of the human body as the centre of popular communal life and is best exemplified by the guaracha (a popular form of Caribbean music) of the title. The song, “La vida es una cosa fenomenal” (Life is a Phenomenal Thing), not only provides the mass media with a vehicle capable of taking the country by storm but also provides its listeners with a much desired “dogma nacional de salvación” (national dogma of salvation).

Commodification does not limit itself to the promotion and broadcasting of hit songs but pervades all levels of Puerto Rican life, stimulates a consumerist attitude to the world, and propels personal relationships. Identity itself is modelled according to the consumption of images of media and show business stars. For instance, Graciela takes Jacqueline Onassis and Elizabeth Taylor as her role models whilst La China Hereje models herself on the Puerto Rican cabaret queen, Iris Chacón, so that the former’s middlebrow tastes situate her as middle class, whilst the latter’s distinctly lowbrow role model identifies her unmistakably as lower class.

If human and social relationships are commodified under a system of North American colonialism, then the latter’s process of modernization transforms the natural environment into an urban dystopia, the “desamparada isla de cemento nombrada Puerto Rico” (defenceless island of concrete named Puerto Rico”). However, the transformations undergone by modern Puerto Rico perhaps are never definitive.

Though the song, “La vida es una cosa fenomenal,” disguises the less than ideal conditions of everyday life in the Puerto Rican colony through the escapism of its infantile lyrics: “las trompetas hablan de cálidos encuentros de una piel con la otra, las trompetas hablan de ondulaciones lentas y espasmódicas” (the trumpets speak of the hot encounter of one skin with another, the trumpets speak of slow, spasmodic undulations). Thus, despite its packaging and apparent message, popular music clears a space for the inscription of the body, pleasure, and personal relationships in the capitalist mass media. Moreover, the undulating slowness of the rhythm suggests the implied dancer’s, or lover’s, control as a subject, rather than passive consumer. Meanwhile, the spasmodic nature of the suggested and suggestive dance points to the dancer’s powerful potential for spontaneous violence motivated by the daily physical discomfort of Puerto Rico as a “cuerpo de desconcierto” (restless body) which depends, as a colony, on an imported economic and political system whose First World aspirations it cannot or never should fulfil. But if the trumpets above have a political sound throughout, this dimension consists of intimate pleasure reclaimed in everyday life. Hence, the immediate context of a bus passenger’s despair, arising from the disparity between the dream of capitalist progress and the feeling that “el país no funciona” (the country is out of order), is not provided by established political processes, which are discredited by being represented by Vicente and other political figures satirized in the book. Instead, alienation from official channels of action leads those who do not form part of the privileged, car-owning, elites of the country, the other travellers on the same bus, to stake out their own space in a spontaneous outburst of dancing and singing to the piped-in guaracha that subsumes despair in Puerto Rican popular culture’s movable feast.

The communality of the bus scene may be contrasted to La China Hereje’s seclusion in the flat where she acts as Vicente’s sexual servant. This contrast perhaps highlights cogently the island’s uneven development, as well as the incomplete alienation of daily life, where pockets of communality resist the commerce of individuals as consumers or commodities. On the one hand, therefore, La China individually seeks self-fulfilment through identifying with the fetishized images she consumes of Iris Chacón. On the other hand, the community of bus-riding Puerto Ricans is not taken in. While on board the traffic-jammed bus, a passenger who is well aware of the limits of progress asserts that “el país no funciona” (the country is out of order), the ensuing rush-hour scene of unrushed singing and dancing represents wilfully unproductive freedom from the constraints of labour. Thus, the failure of capitalist colonialism to incorporate fully Puerto Ricans is demonstrated.

In the culturally segregated world of La guaracha del Macho Camacho, communal pleasure is the prerogative of underprivilege. Though benefitting from the material advantages of being a privileged elite, the class to which Vicente and his family belong is excluded from the “permanente fiesteo” (permanent partying) of popular culture. Vicente is plagued by the guaracha that has taken the country by storm and starts humming it contritely and without pleasure, isolated in his car. Meanwhile, Benny’s fantasies concerning his Ferrari excite him to masturbation, which is described in its unattractive “fofa desnudez” (limp nakedness) as a counterpart to the juxtaposed episode of La China Hereje’s enjoyable childhood memory of her masturbation of three cousins. Moreover, Graciela’s preoccupation with the lifestyles of the rich and famous only leads her to jealousy and an attack of hysteria, a counterpart to La China Hereje’s pleasurable identification with Iris Chacón. Significantly, the guaracha’s accompaniment of Graciela’s hysterical attack contrasts with La China’s previous enjoyment of the music Graciela considers an “himno orillero, himno repulsivo, himno populachero” (a deadbeat hymn, a repulsive hymn, a hymn of the mob”).

In La guaracha, a defence of the communal takes place within the context of the colonial marketplace, threateningly represented by the impersonal modernity of the city.
On the other hand, twelve years later, in La importancia de llamarse Daniel Santos, 1988 [The Importance of Being Called Daniel Santos] popular culture aggressively, even offensively, asserts a multiple but unified Latin American identity, made possible by Latin Americans’ personal identification with the figure of the popular hero. Thus, the legendary bolero singer, Daniel Santos, becomes the exemplary focus of a differentiated, international Latin American culture, and Sánchez’s work enters a new phase of optimism.

JOHN PERIVOLARIS

Editions

Further Reading

Gelpí, Juan G., Literatura y paternalismo en Puerto Rico, San Juan: Editorial de la Universidad de Puerto Rico, 1993 [Includes brilliant account of La guaracha in relation to major Puerto Rican debates on culture]

Severo Sarduy 1937–1993

Cuban prose writer and poet

Although his poetry, short stories and art reviews received early recognition in Havana’s established cultural circles in the 1950s, it was the novels and essays written during his Parisian exile that brought Severo Sarduy to the attention of the Western world’s literary community. His decision to live in France was an intellectual, aesthetic affirmation. Unlike the other Cuban writers who went into exile during the first years after the Cuban Revolution, Sarduy disengaged himself from any public denouncement of his country’s political situation. Also, the exploration of erotic themes and sexually explicit language in his work, frequently in a setting of gay and transvestite entertainment, could have been regarded as decadent in post-revolutionary Cuba.

As an adolescent, Sarduy’s poetry had appeared in Ciclón, an iconoclastic journal founded by Virgilio Piñera and José (Pepe) Rodríguez Feo in January 1955. But it was his incisive art criticism in Lunes de Revolución [Monday in the Revolution] that won him a fellowship to study at the École du Louvre in 1959. He left Cuba at the onset of the Revolution, enrolling at the Sorbonne after the fellowship period had ended. While he was there, Sarduy joined the Structuralist Tel-Quel group formed by Roland Barthes, Philippe Sollers, Claude Lévi-Strauss and others. His first novel, Gestos, 1963 [Gestures], was immediately translated into French, Danish, Italian, German and Polish. It was an experimental work, influenced by the action painting movement, which he transferred to the text as “action writing.” Through a fast-paced sequence of fragmented events, images and voices in the streets, Gestos captured the frenzied rhythm of Batista’s last days, under the threat of terrorism and sabotage.

Many elements of the mature novelist are already present in Gestos. Sarduy’s parody of popular culture and mass-media, influenced by American fads subliminally incorporated into Cuban society in the 1950s, as well as his preoccupation with language, identity and sense of national destiny, reappeared in many forms in his fiction. In De dónde son los cantantes, 1967 (From Cuba with a Song) Sarduy’s search for a definition of nationality enters an ontological dimension, perhaps as a result of his physical separation from the island’s geographical reality. Divided into three different stories, a complex symbolic and linguistic network connects the segments. By dealing separately with each of Cuba’s ethnic groups—the Spanish, the Chinese, the African—and their respective contributions to the nation’s history, he addresses the theme of syncretism as something already accomplished, not as a dilemma.

Sarduy’s reputation as a writer became fully established in 1972, after receiving the Medicis International Award, one of France’s highest literary honours, for his novel Cobra. As in his previous work, Sarduy continued to challenge conventional syntax and linear thought in Cobra. He again describes a world inhabited by irreverent, paradoxical characters in constant transformation, driven by erotic forces and verbal exuberance. The theme of metamorphosis as a metaphor for Cuban identity was originally introduced as a pictorial statement by artist Wifredo Lam, thus establishing the transgressive nature of Island culture. But in Cobra the changes are projected onto a cosmogenic level. Scientific discourse is incorporated into the text through epigraphs at the beginning of each chapter. They deal with the Big Bang theory, the binary star system or the gravitational phenomena of a red shift, suggesting the metaphorical conception of the characters. It is also an allusion to the myths of modern man—how he has replaced old religious beliefs with scientific “facts.”

In Maitreya, 1978 and in Colibrí, 1984 [Hummingbird] sexual changes appear as the product of displacement. Identities are never found in the long, circular voyages of the characters, who move through untamed expanses of land (sometimes the East, sometimes Latin America) and through the extravagances of their linguistic expression. They are novels of exile; an exile the author seeks to dramatize by disassembling and mythifying it.

Sarduy published a total of eight novels, the last two—Cocuyo, 1990 [The Glow Worm] and Los pájaros en la playa, 1993 [The Birds on the Beach]—being the most autobiographical. He also left several books of poetry. Most are costly, limited editions difficult to obtain, illustrated by artists such as Ehrhardt, Leonor Fini, Kuhn Weber and Ramón Alejandro. Epitafios, published posthumously, deals with the knowledge of his tragic illness and his death from AIDS.

The dialogical scope of Sarduy’s aesthetic vision took an early direction in the years he collaborated with the leading French intellectuals and theoreticians of Tel-Quel (1965–72). He was, for a while, the only Latin American writer capable of understanding Lacan, Barthes and Lévi-Strauss. His first collection of essays, Escrito sobre un cuerpo, 1969 (Written on a Body), is considered an authoritative and lucid application of structuralism in Spanish. In Barroco, 1974 [Baroque], Sarduy explains his theories on the historical relation between literary and scientific discourses. It remains as one of his most remarkable contributions to Latin American literary thought.

LOURDES GIL

Biography

Selected Works

Novels

Gestos, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1963
Colibrí, Barcelona: Argos Vergara, 1984
El Cristo de la rue Jacob, Barcelona: Mall, 1987; as Christ on the Rue Jacob, translated by Suzanne Jill Levine and Carol Maier, San Francisco: Mercury House, 1995
Cocuyo, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1990
Los pájaros en la playa, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1993

Plays

Poetry

Flamenco, Stuttgart: Manus-Presse, 1969
Mood Indigo, Stuttgart: Manus-Presse, 1969
Merveilles de la nature, Paris: Pauvet, 1971
Overdose, Las Palma, Mallorca: Inventorios Provisionales, 1972
Big Bang, para situar en órbita cinco máquinas, pour situer en orbite cinq machines de Ramón Alejandro, Montpellier: Fata Morgana, 1973; Barcelona: Tusquets, 1974
Daiquirí, Santa Cruz, Tenerife: n.p., 1980
Un testigo fugaz y disfrazado, Barcelona: Mall, 1985

Essays
Barroco, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1974
La Doublure, Paris: Flammarion, 1981
La simulación, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1982
Micro-ópera de Benet Rossell, in collaboration with Annemieke van de Pas, Barcelona: Ambit, 1984
Nueva inestabilidad, Mexico City: Vuelta, 1987
Ensajos generales sobre el Barroco, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1987
Jean Cortot, Paris: Maeght, 1992
Epitafios, Imitación, Aforismos, Miami: Universal, 1994

Further Reading

Cabanillas, Francisco, Escrito sobre Severo: una relectura de Severo Sarduy, Miami: Universal, 1995
Guerrero, Gustavo, La estrategia neobarroca: estudio sobre el resurgimiento de la poética barroca en la obra narrativa de Severo Sarduy, Barcelona: Mall, 1987
Méndez Ródenas, Adriana, Severo Sarduy: el neobarroco de la transgresión, Mexico City: UNAM, 1983
Pérez, Rolando, Severo Sarduy and the Religion of the Text, Lanham, Maryland: University Press of America, 1988
Sanchez-Boudy, José, La temática novelística de Severo Sarduy: “De dónde son los cantantes,” Miami: Universal, 1985

Bibliographies

Special Issues of Journals
Domingo Faustino Sarmiento 1811–1888

Argentine politician, educator, man of letters
Champion of the principles of the European Enlightenment in Latin America, and exemplary model of a protean Romantic spirit, Domingo Faustino Sarmiento’s career and achievements highlight many of the tensions and paradoxes between Eurocentric ideals and the problems facing the new and fledgling republics in the Americas in the 19th century. Characterized, not without reason, with such grand epithets as author of a nation, the design and magnitude of his vision of Argentina was so expansive that some of its consequences are detectable today. He is, undoubtedly, the most famous of 19th-century Argentine liberal intellectuals: educator, journalist, polemicist and politician (president of his country), with historians focusing attention primarily on his economic policies, strategies for the progressive democratization of his country, and his vision of a modern society through education. All these aspects of his life’s work and personality are to be felt in his most famous literary work, Civilización y barbarie. La vida de Juan Facundo Quiroga (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants).

In politics, Sarmiento was a lifelong opponent of caudillismo (rule by a strong man); inevitably his great adversary was Juan Manuel Rosas, the “federal” dictator and opponent of central government in Buenos Aires. Sarmiento, on the other hand, was an “unitario,” advocating the necessity in Argentina for a strong, unified form of constitution if progress was to be achieved. In 1829, the year Rosas came to power, Sarmiento fought with the “unitarios” against Rosas, and in his periods of exile in Chile he carried on an indefatigable campaign against him, in the Chilean press and in Facundo.

Facundo is a polemical work, attacking what Sarmiento considered to be the baneful influence of the gaucho’s values on Argentine political and cultural life. His main message in the first part of the book is that although the nature of the terrain makes Argentina an obvious unity, the nature of gaucho society militates against this unity. In the first chapter he begins with a description of the land and shows how the vast pampas, drained by rivers which finish in the River Plate estuary, make Argentina “una e indivisible” (one and indivisible). However, the natural unity of the Republic is not that of Rosas, which is based on brute force and terror, or as Sarmiento puts it, “la unidad en la barbarie y en la esclavitud” (unity in barbarism and slavery). It is “la unidad en la civilización y en la libertad” (unity in civilization and freedom). Life on the pampas is presented as a type of non-society, with the gaucho living an isolated and nomadic life. There are no centres of population, no towns where social customs and laws can be built up. Government is impossible, and so of course is education. The education of the gaucho, Sarmiento tells us, revolves entirely around horses; his equestrian skills lead him to scorn the town-dweller, and the habit of defying and overcoming nature (capturing a horse, killing a bull or a jaguar), engenders in him an intense sense of individualism. The whole first section of the book is enlivened by anecdotes concerning the feats of the gauchos. This is particularly true of the second chapter, which deals with various gaucho types: the rastreador (tracker), baquiano (guide), gauccho malo (a gaucho who has gone to the bad), and the payador (singer), whose skills Sarmiento relates with obvious relish, whilst attempting to demonstrate how the individualism of these types is of its nature barbaric and inimical to progress and civilization.

Sarmiento’s attitude is ostensibly to attack the gaucho, Facundo Quiroga (one of Rosas’s Federalist caudillo leaders, assassinated in Córdoba in 1835) and Rosas; in short, “barbarie.” Yet, as the work progresses his secret admiration for the gaucho becomes ever more apparent. The individualism of the gaucho, so harmful to society, is none the less admirable in itself. The very brutality of Facundo exerts a certain fascination over this liberal advocate of civilized values, and Sarmiento even goes so far as to remark that egoism and brutality are at the heart of all great characters of history. When Facundo was written, Romanticism was at its height in Spain. The great, titanic individual that Facundo Quiroga embodies could hardly fail to attract a representative intellectual writing in the 1840s: they are as much Romantic heroes as Espronceda’s “El pirata” or Rivas’s “Don Alvaro.” Thus Sarmiento’s own enthusiasm undermines his ideological polarity “civilización-barbarie,” and the ambivalent presentation of the gaucho as both villain and hero is one of the fascinations of this early example of “literatura gauchesca.”

Viajes por Europa, Africa y America [Journeys through Europe, Africa and the United States] is a travel commentary in epistolary form, a richly costumbrist account told with spirited Romantic energy, and is perhaps most interesting for revealing the extent of Sarmiento’s use of the United States as a model for his utopian vision of Argentina. Even more idealistic (and scorned as far-fetched by Sarmiento’s contemporaries) were the programs developed in his political treatise “Argirópolis,” 1850 [City of Silver], advocating a federal system unifying Argentina, Paraguay and Uruguay. Recuerdos de provincia [Memoirs of Provincial Life] is a set of memoirs evoking Sarmiento’s childhood and youth, not unlike his early autobiography Mi defensa (1843), but more mature in tone and of superior literary quality. Its purpose is partly to clear his good name in the face of slurs perpetrated against him by Rosas and his agents. This leads, however, to a propaganda exercise of his own, as he polishes and prepares his past for the great political role he is to play in the future.

Sarmiento provides the modern scholar with an inroad for the discussion of historical and critical discourses in the Americas. His seminal influence in the formation of modern Argentina, at the crux of politics and letters offers space for a rethinking of the categories of meaning used to isolate literature from history. He embodies the duality of man of letters and visionary politician, even if his vision was unrealistically Utopian and has in many ways gone unfulfilled.

FRANK MCQUADE

See also entries on Caliban, Caudillismo and Dictatorship, Civilization and Barbarism

Biography

Born in San Juan, Argentina, 15 February 1811, fifth child and only son of six surviving offspring. Learned to read at the age of four. Attended the Escuela de la Patria, San Juan, 1816–15. Strongest formative influence in his childhood was his uncle, José de Oro, a priest who assisted in his education. Grew up in rough, dangerous frontier environment in which the local caudillos (regional chieftains) fought one another for control of provinces in the Argentine interior.
Sarmiento supported the Unitarians (anti-Federalist, anti-Spanish and anti-caudillo). Forced into exile in Chile in 1831. Able to return to San Juan in 1836 where he opened the Colegio de Santa Rosa de America, a school for young ladies, 1839. Founded the newspaper El Zonda: forced to close after six issues. Imprisoned for conspiracy, released and sent into exile once more. Traveled in United States, Europe and north Africa, inspecting educational systems, 1845–48. The United States impressed him most; has been said that he analyzed it “at the high point of its possibilities.” Married Benita Martínez Pastoriza shortly after his return to Chile in 1848; separated from her at end of 1862. Governor of the province of San Juan 1862–64; ambassador to the United States 1865–68; President of the Republic of Argentina 1868–74. Died in Asuncion, Paraguay, 11 September 1888.

Selected Works

Sarmiento’s Complete Works (Obras, Santiago de Chile/Buenos Aires: F.Lajouane, 1885–1903) run to 52 volumes. Principal works include:

Mi defensa, Santiago de Chile: n.p., 1843
Civilización y barbarie. La vida de Juan Facundo Quiroga, Santiago de Chile: n.p., 1845; as Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants, or Civilization and Barbarism, translated, with an extensive introduction, by Mrs Horace Mann, New York: Hurd and Houghton, 1868
Recuerdos de provincia, Santiago de Chile: n.p., 1850
Vida de Abrán Lincoln, New York: Appleton, 1866
Conflictos y armonías de las razas en America, 2 vols, Buenos Aires: n.p., 1883

Further Reading

Anderson Imbert, Enrique, Genio y figura de Sarmiento, Buenos Aires: Editorial Universitaria, 1967
Criscenti, Joseph T. (editor), Sarmiento and His Argentina, Boulder, Colorado: Lynne Rienner, 1993
Halperin Donghi, Tulio, Iván Jaksi, Gwen Kirkpatrick and Francine Masiello (editors), Sarmiento: Author of a Nation, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994
Jitrik, Noé, Muerte y resurrección de Facundo, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de America Latina, 1968
Katra, William H., Domingo F. Sarmiento: Public Writer (between 1839 and 1852), Tempe: Arizona State University, 1985
Martínez Estrada, Ezequiel, Sarmiento, Buenos Aires: Argos, 1946
Salomon, Noël, Realidad, ideología y literatura en el “Facundo” de D.F. Sarmiento, Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1984

Special Issues of Journals
Simone Schwarz-Bart 1938–

Guadeloupean novelist

Simone Schwarz-Bart’s novels belong to the growing body of Caribbean fiction by black women writers who are reclaiming their personal stories by rewriting the histories of their peoples. Through this process of coming to narrative mastery Schwarz-Bart attempts to retrieve repressed origins and to establish a personal and collective identity. Her voice especially expresses and interprets the predicament of the Antillean woman and the reality in which she dwells—a reality anchored in the Guadeloupean soil—from the point of view of the female author, as well as of her mostly female characters. Indeed, Schwarz-Bart’s women characters are so decisive in the remaking of Antillean history that they tend to become national epic heroines. Despite their failures, they challenge and subvert their condition, recalling their heritage to those who have chosen conspicuously to silence it. As several critics have observed, Simone Schwarz-Bart has become a variation of the traditional “griot,” a storyteller of the legendary Antillean past which acquires a universal dimension in the present. Indeed, through the characters’ fundamental human suffering they are able to create an authentic art of living and a pattern for Antillean resistance.

Schwarz-Bart’s first two novels—co-authored by her husband, the French novelist André Schwarz-Bart—relate to her subsequent individual texts. The couple’s original joint goal was to reconstruct the history of Guadeloupe in a cycle of historical novels, which they never completed. In Un Plat de porc aux bananes vertes, 1967 [A Dish of Pork with Green Bananas] the non-linear narrative alternates between past and present, Paris and Martinique, Creole and French, reality and fantasy. This technique allows the reader to perceive the female protagonist’s inner life, which mirrors her painful memories and her feelings of shame and guilt. Her traumatic past symbolizes the master’s version of the Antillean people as a fallen, cursed race who deserve their sufferings. The heroine’s destructive view of herself prevents her from overcoming her alienation from a past represented by the archetypal figure of her grandmother, mentally enslaved forever.

The second collaborative novel, La Mulâtresse Solitude, 1972 (A Woman Named Solitude) recreates the poignant story of a maroon girl in Guadeloupe. This fictional biography explores the legendary, but also historical, character of Solitude—Simone Schwarz-Bart’s slave ancestor—and reinterprets the colonial bi-cultural, bi-colored Antillean society at the time of emancipation. Solitude is a pivotal figure for the Guadeloupean writer since she represents the tenacious desire to be black—to reclaim her African origin—in a white-dominated world. Offspring of the slave ship rape by a white sailor of her West African mother, Solitude is a mulatto, who cannot belong to the prevailing black community even though it is exploited and despised. Moreover, her subservient attitude and her vulnerability reflect her impotence against the white male-dominated world. Totally displaced within the violent social conflict which overwhelms her, Solitude loses her sanity before being executed for her crimes.

In contrast, Télumée Miracle, the heroine of Pluie et vent sur Télumée Miracle, 1972 (The Bridge of Beyond), symbolizes the triumph of ordinary life over annihilation and self-destruction. Télumée tells the poignant story of a poor, aged black peasant woman who has shaped her own destiny and reached inner peace. Her reminiscences are part of the history of her own people, an exploration of everyday experience told from the perspective of her chosen grandmother, whose ancestral wisdom makes her a repository of the collective memory. The female point of view is crucial since Télumée’s foremothers are extraordinary mythical heroines. Their resilience and enduring love in the face of the most terrible hardships symbolize the island’s survival and greatness. In this magnificent and rich novel, Schwarz-Bart is not so much concerned with the socio-political situation of a people as with their psyche. The writer strives to correct the “official” version of history, the colonizer’s distortions and silences, in order to establish an alternative view of her people’s destiny. Schwarz-Bart’s writing technique contributes to this re-vision. Through Télumée’s Creole voice, the text functions as a vehicle of orality. The dialectical tension between the written and oral discourse allows the author to convey the specificity of traditional oral communication with its African origin and transferral to Guadeloupe.

In a different register and seven years later, Schwarz-Bart published Ti Jean L’Horizon, 1979 (Between Two Worlds), the story of the adventures of a Guadelouppean folk hero, Ti Jean, who journeys to other continents and even to other worlds, in search of his roots. The narrative, which focuses for the first time on a male character, explores the hero’s Antillean quest for his and his people’s rightful place in the world. Through an extremely complex series of adventures which deconstruct the traditional myths associated with Antillean identity and which lead the reader along a difficult path filled with constantly shifting spaces and time limits, Ti Jean finally assumes the destiny of his island. With great irony, Schwarz-Bart proceeds to demystify the magical yearnings that have prevented the Antilleans from defining their true identity. The myth of return to Africa and of the power of the dead over the living, as well as the reverence for “Mother France,” and the lure of macho heroism are all shattered. Through his numerous ordeals, Ti Jean acquires the necessary knowledge, the true “connaissance,” that gains him access to wisdom: one’s identity is to be found at home. Guadeloupe provides the space for self-realization.

Ton Beau capitaine (Your Handsome Captain), a short play evoking the misery of an Haitian immigrant worker forced to exile in Guadeloupe, was published in 1987. Schwarz-Bart’s extensive use of music, song, dance and cassette tapes successfully convey the inarticulate eloquence of the illiterate husband and wife who, in their longing for each other, try to express their feelings. This play lacks the literary achievement of the previous novels, but it nevertheless succeeds in exposing the island’s remarkable sociocultural diversity which often translates into racial tensions. It is also a testimony to the tragedy of the destitute and exploited Haitian people.

Simone Schwarz-Bart’s fiction articulates the power of love and hope and the possibility of plenitude against silence, madness and destruction. With her beautifully crafted narrative, the Antilles find a true liberating voice and discover a regenerating landspace.

MARIE-AGNÈS SOURIEAU

Biography

Born Simone Bruman on 8 January 1938. Place of birth uncertain: in an interview published in Elle magazine (1973), Schwarz-Bart gave her place of birth as Charente-Maritime in France, adding that she did not visit Guadeloupe until she was three years old. Her mother, she said, was a governess and her father was in the army in her early childhood. Subsequently, she has given Pointe-à-Pitre, the capital of Guadeloupe, as her place of birth, possibly as a response to the criticism that her portrayal of the Caribbean is too exotic to be the work of an insider. Educated at Pointe-à-Pitre and Dakar. Left Guadeloupe in 1958 to study in France. Married the author André Schwarz-Bart in 1960; later collaborated with him on works of fiction. Two sons, Jacques and Bernard. Settled in Guadeloupe with her husband in 1978. Owner of an antiques shop in Pointe-à-Pitre.

Selected Works

Un Plat de porc aux bananes vertes, in collaboration with André Schwarz-Bart, Paris: Seuil, 1967

Further Reading

Science in Spanish American literature

Latin American narrative has long been mediated by scientific discourse, first that of the natural sciences, later that of the human sciences, and soon, it would appear, that of the communicational sciences.

The central trope of the mediation of Latin American narrative by the natural sciences is the nature metaphor, exemplified in Andrés Bello’s Silvas americanas. Bello’s description of American flora sets the tone for the many Romantic writers of the 19th century. The nature metaphor exalts the natural world and at the same time links Latin American culture with the uniqueness and wonder of the flora, fauna and physical geography of the New World. The greatness of Latin American nature was projected onto Latin American civilization and culture. This move, an extension of the Romantic notion of organic form, is illustrated in José Martí’s “Nuestra America” (Our America). Martí, it should be noted in passing, also reviewed physics books for the New York Sun.

The discourse of evolutionary 19th-century European science mediates the construction of the Latin American nature metaphor. A major influence in Latin American narrative of this period was the scientific traveler and travelogue, names such as Alexander von Humboldt, Charles-Marie de la Condamine and Charles Darwin. In both narrative and travelogue, the uniqueness of the New World is reported and then interpreted by a scientific observer whose objective “method” qualifies him to read nature and so reveal its truth. The influence of the scientific travelogue can be seen in such works as Domingo Faustino Sarmiento’s Facundo (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants), Anselmo Suárez y Romero’s Francisco, and Euclides da Cunha’s Os sertões (Rebellion in the Backlands).

With the end of World War I, and the concomitant devaluation of Positivism and general “decline of the West,” natural science lost its privileged position as master discourse. European civilization was no longer seen as the logical telos of evolution. An anthropology that recognized multiple cultures seemed to offer the possibility of a new beginning, a new way of reconstituting a fragmented world. In the New World this often meant vindicating the Indian legacy or indigenismo. The Museo de Antropología in Lima, the Instituto Nacional de Antropología in Mexico and the Sociedad de Folklore Cubano (whose first president was Fernando Ortiz) were all established in this period. Also, primarily through the work of Bronislaw Malinowski and Margaret Mead, ethnography emerged as a science in its own right. Marcel Griaule’s expedition and Claude Lévi-Strauss’s travels in Latin America were soon to happen. These and other circumstances led to the privileging of anthropological discourse.

An anthropological bent has been present in Latin American literature since its inception. It begins with Columbus who, in 1494, left Fray Ramón Pané in Hispaniola to live with the Tainos, learn their language, customs and religion, and record his findings. Pané’s Relación acerca de las antigüedades de los indios, 1498 [Account of the Antiquities of the Indians], along with other early documents such as Álvar Núñez Cabeza de Vaca’s Naufragios [Shipwrecks] establish an anthropological model, before the emergence of that discipline, that has been significant in Latin American texts until the present. But it is only after 192.0 that anthropology’s scientific discourse about culture becomes the dominant mediation in Latin American narrative. The object of scientific discourse changes from nature to language and myth, and this is reflected in Latin American narrative. A few key names serve to illustrate the extent of this change: Miguel Ángel Asturias (Leyendas de Guatemala [Legends of Guatemala]), Alejo Carpentier (¡Écuéyamba-O! [Praise the Lord!] and Los pasos perdidos (The Lost Steps), with its close parallels to Tristes tropiques [Sad Tropics]), and Lydia Cabrera (El monte [The Mountain]), also a student of Fernando Ortiz, studied ethnology in Paris in the 1930s. Severo Sarduy (De dónde son los cantantes, in English as From Cuba with a Song) was a student of Roger Bastide, and José María Arguedas (Los ríos profundos, translated as Deep Rivers) was an anthropologist, as was Miguel Barnet (Biografía de un cimarrón, in English, Autobiography of a Runaway Slave).

After 1950, as Latin America attempted once more to liberate itself from hegemonic influences, usually North American interests, the “objectivity” of anthropology and ethnography came to be questioned. The literary nature of anthropological discourse was brought to light. This crisis in anthropology has given rise to a critical metadiscourse seen in the work of anthropologists such as Clifford Geertz and James Clifford. In Latin American narrative, there appears a concomitant critique of the authoritative discourse of anthropology, for example Mario Vargas Llosa’s El hablador (The Storyteller), while authors such as Augusto Roa Bastos (Yo el Supremo, in English, I the Supreme) go so far as to point out the literary nature of the metadiscourse of anthropology.

The crisis of conscience in anthropology and ethnography created a metadiscourse in the second half of the 20th century within the social sciences and within Latin American narrative—Rayuela (Hopscotch); Yo el supremo. In a similar way, the environmental crisis of the final decades of the 20th century has produced a metadiscourse within the natural sciences and within the novel.

In the second half of the 20th century, the naturalist discourse of science gives way to the cybernetic paradigm. This new informational/communicational/cybernetic discourse has produced a new type of social text, a new reality or “hyperreality” as Jean Baudrillard would have it, and a new narrative metadiscourse. Fernando Contreras Castro’s Única mirando al mar, 1993[Unica Gazing at the Sea] is a quintessential example of this new metadiscourse. In Única, Contreras Castro turns the ethnographic gaze of science upon itself to show us the mediation of the new scientific metaphor—the cybernetic society—in the construction of the late 20th-century Latin American consumer society. In the “communicational” novel the question of identity—the traditional Latin American binaries of city/country, civilization/barbarism, European/indigenous, etc.—is elided in a disposable consumer culture in which the media “code” constitutes all identities through the very act of consumption.

Another important movement in the second half of the 20th century among Latin America poets has been the science-poetry movement, with names such as Ernesto Cardenal (Cántico cósmico) and Rafael Catalá (Cienciapoesía and the journal Ometeca). This movement aims to reconcile the differences between the humanities and the sciences by revealing the scientific mediation of literature, and the humanistic mediation of science. These newer developments foreground the mediation of techno-science in the new Latin American reality in which the operative term in culture is no longer “multi” but media. As Latin America becomes more integrated into the global information age, we can expect the mediation of the communicational sciences to play an ever more prominent role in Latin American literature.
See also entries on José María Arguedas, Carlos Germán Belli, Lydia Cabrera, Cántico cósmico (Ernesto Cardenal), Fernando Ortiz, Science Fiction, Travel Writing

Further Reading

Welch and Figueras give an overview of 19th-century scientific travel in Latin America. James Clifford explains the history of anthropology and ethnography. González Echevarría combines these two currents, adds Latin American literature and comes up with a fascinating book to which I am indebted for my brief account here. (To date, this would seem to be the only definitive work on literature and science in Latin America.) Cardenal and Catalá offer the finest in science-poetry. Also, the first half of Catalá’s book is an excellent essay in which he lays the theoretical groundwork for dissecting the mediation of the discourse of science. The journal Ometeca focuses on literature and science in Hispanic cultures; volume 2, number 2 (1991) treats Ernesto Cardenal. Arancibia, Juana Alcira (editor), Encuentro de la literatura con la ciencia y el arte, Buenos Aires: O Cruxavaes, 1990

Catalá, Rafael, Cienciapoesia. Minneapolis: Prisma, 1986

Clifford, James, The Predicament of Culture: Twentieth-Century Ethnography, Literature, and Art, Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press, 1988

Contreras Castro, Fernando, Única mirando al mar, San José, Costa Rica: ABC, 1993

Lapidot, Ema, Borges and Artificial Intelligence. An Analysis in the Style of Pierre Menard, New York: Peter Lang, 1991

Science Fiction

Science fiction in the popular sense of the term is not normally associated with Latin American literary production, since this genre is often thought to flourish only in the most technologically advanced societies. Therefore, critics who examine the production of science fiction in Latin America from this angle, claim that there is little of it. Yet in the second half of the 20th century, the development a different kind of science fiction has emerged in Latin America and Europe, one that is more “literary,” dealing not only with the physical sciences but also with politics, economics, psychology, anthropology and ethics. The stories that deal with the future and follow this trend take on political or economic changes in society as their subject leaving technology in the background. They use allegory and satire, they create Utopias or dystopias that reflect the hidden anxieties and fears of the particular historical moment. It is this new way of conceiving science fiction—one that is not limited to telling stories of sophisticated spaceships and green Martians—that launched an explosion of the genre in Latin America from the 1960s and allows it to be alive and well today.

Edgar Allan Poe and Jules Verne are seen as the major influences on 19th-century Latin American science fiction, which explains its general gothic atmosphere on the one hand, and its recurrent theme of scientific progress on the other. Most of the early Latin American science fiction stories, though, are tinted by Christian morality and want to show the danger of scientific research. The Argentine Eduardo Ladislao Holmberg is seen as one of the first writers of the genre after the publication of his novel Viaje maravilloso del señor Nic-Nac, 1875 [The Wonderful Journey of Mr Nic-Nac]. Other authors of the same period who also reflected the new scientific ideas in some of their less-known writings are Horacio Quiroga, Amado Nervo, Leopoldo Lugones and Rubén Darío. The first half of the 20th century also witnessed the occasional example of speculative fiction by prominent writers such as Macedonio Fernández, Santiago Dabove and Francisco L.Urquizo. Understandably, scientific experiments to obtain world peace was one of the most popular subjects of the genre during this time. From the 1930s on, the Argentines Jorge Luis Borges, Adolfo Bioy Casares and Roberto Arlt produced some of the best-known fiction associated with this genre in Latin America. Stories such as Borges’s El Aleph (The Aleph) mix science and metaphysics, and Bioy Casares’s La invención de Morel (The Invention of Morel and Other Stories) is considered a classic: a man taking refuge on an apparently deserted island meets a series of people who turn out to be holograms, three-dimensional reflections created by Morel’s invention, a machine that is activated by the tides. Some critics would classify this story, and Latin American science fiction in general, as belonging to the realm of the fantastic, their reasoning for this assertion being that their main forms of expression have been moral allegories and parables. These critics like to contrast Latin American production with that of the Anglo-Saxon countries by pointing out that while the latter enjoys detailed descriptions of wonderful machines, the former prefer to deal with the consequences those machines would have on human beings. That contrast, however, seems to be too crude in the light of a vast production of contemporary “Anglo-Saxon” science fiction that not only deals with outer space but, also, with psychological or social issues.

Anglo-Saxon science fiction has undoubtedly influenced its Latin American counterpart, especially from the 1950s when works by writers such as Ray Bradbury, Arthur C.Clarke and Isaac Asimov became available in translation. The Argentine Sergio Gaut admits that influence by declaring in Plural (1985) that the Latin American writers who read Anglo-Saxon science fiction in their formative years had already lost their “purity” when they first started writing their own. The 1960s witnessed a veritable explosion of the genre in Latin America, both in terms of the production of texts by authors who dedicate all their efforts to the genre and the creation of specialized magazines. A list of representative writers would prove to be too long, but some key names from this period are the Chilean Hugo Correa, the Brazilian Jerónimo Monteiros, the Cubans Miguel Collazo, Manuel Herrera and Ángel Arango, the Mexican Carlos Olvera, and the Argentines Angélica Gorodischer, Eduardo Goligorsky and Alberto Vanasco. During this period we find the first critical analyses dedicated to the study of Latin American science fiction in the light of its value and function. Thus, we find studies by critics such as Pablo Capanna, Mario Langer and Eduardo Goligorsky.

Today the genre enjoys great popularity among its faithful readers, if not a warm reception from academic literary critics, who still consider science fiction, unfairly so, to be a genre of inferior quality. Most of the authors of the genre today do not write mainstream literature, but dedicate all their efforts instead to the production of speculative fiction. Among these professional authors we should note: the Cuban Daína Chaviano, the Venezuelan Luis Britto García, the Peruvian José B. Adolph, the Uruguayan Mario Levrero, the Mexican Mauricio-José Schwarz, and, as already mentioned, Angélica Gorodischer from Argentina. The major centers of production in the 1990s are Argentina and Cuba. Argentine science fiction is strongly influenced by psychoanalysis, which reflects the importance given to this discipline in Buenos Aires as capital of the country open to ideas from abroad. The Cuban penchant for science fiction might be explained by the freedom from political censorship that results from the extrapolation of social problems to imaginary worlds that appear not to have any relation to the real one.

The bulk of Latin American science fiction has a base in the Social Sciences, although it deals with a wide variety of themes. Bernard Goorden, in his key article reprinted in Plural (1985), has identified several themes that occur in 20th-century Latin American science fiction that he considers to be original. Goorden theorizes that a continent whose population is the result of a great mixture of races produces science fiction with a strong preference for the theme of the alien, the symbolic representative of a different race. Since this genre is by no means limited to the written word, mention should be made of Eliseo Subiela’s successful movie Hombre mirando al sudeste [Man Facing Southeast], as an example of that motif. Other classic science fiction themes, such as time travel and the end of the world, are exploited in an original way by Latin American writers, yet others, such as the mad scientist, are more or less ignored by them. In any case, science fiction production in Latin America expresses Latin American conceptualizations of the future, and thus at the same time reflects Latin American conceptualizations of the present.

YOLANDA MOLINA GAVILÁN

Further Reading

General

Capanna, Pablo, Sentido de la ciencia ficción, Buenos Aires: Columba, 1966

“Coloquio a distancia: preguntas de Plural a relevantes autores de ciencia ficción latinoamericana,” Plural, Mexico City, 163 (1985)

Argentina
Manuel Scorza 1928–1983

Peruvian prose writer and poet

Manuel Scorza’s first book of poetry, Las imprecauciones [Curses] was published in Mexico in 1955. One of the stories surrounding the spelling of his last name, which was Escorza, is that this book contained a typographic error. It has also been pointed out that the writer had already used the betterknown spelling as early as 1952. These poems, like earlier ones of solidarity with Bolivian miners, show social commitment and a desire to speak for the voiceless or marginalized. He returned to Peru in 1956 and, with other writers, set up the publishing house Populibros Peruanos, which gained international attention before going bankrupt, thereby seriously affecting Scorza’s financial situation.

In 1959 the peasant leaders of the Department of Pasco organized resistance manoeuvres with resulting government oppression. Scorza joined the Movimiento Comunal de Perú (Peruvian Communal Organization) became its general secretary, and denounced the government’s actions in the media. Soon after he visited Cerro de Pasco and began reporting on the events he witnessed.

While he continued to write poetry during this period—Los adioses, 1959 [The Farewells], Desengaños del mago, 1961 [The Magician’s Disenchantments] and Requiem para un gentilhombre, 1962 [Requiem for a Gentleman], clearly, these are experiences which will be given fictive form in his cycle of novels. President Fernando Belaúnde Terry also assigned him the editorship of an anthology of modern Peruvian poetry in 1963. The volume contained the work of the Generation of the 1950s, with its writing in the tone of political combat.

After his second marriage, Scorza left Peru once more so he could write the series of works for which he has become best known, although another volume of poetry, El vals de los reptiles [The Waltz of the Reptiles] was to appear in 1970. From Paris, where he resided from 1968 until 1978, Scorza composed the lyrical yet stark story of the peasant resistance in Pasco, titled La guerra silenciosa [The Silent War]. It consists of five books, described as novels or (by the author himself), as cantares (ballads). These are: Redoble por Rancas, 1970 (Drums for Rancas); Historia de Garabombo, el invisible, 1972 (Garabombo the Invisible); El Cantar de Agapito Robles, 1977 (The Ballad of Agapito Robles); El jinete insomne, 1978 (The Sleepless Rider); and La tumba del relámpago, 1979 (Requiem for a Lightning Bolt).

For Scorza, exile became necessary in order to write but, by his own admission, it was extremely painful. He was never far from Peruvian politics, however, and was asked by the communities about which he had written to run for election for the Constituent Assembly. He did become a candidate for the FOCEP (Frente Obrero, Campesino, Estudiantil y Popular), but withdrew in protest against government intimidatory practices. He later became secretary, then vice-president, of the FOCEP (Popular Front of Workers, Students and Peasants).

The return to Paris in 1984 after several years residence in Peru may have been the result of frustration with the Peruvian political situation. Scorza was working on El verdadero descubrimiento de Europa [The True Discovery of Europe], but it was left unfinished. A trilogy was also in progress, and was to be titled Fuego y cenizas [Fire and Ashes]. Its first volume, La danza inmóvil [The Motionless Dance], appeared in 1983 and is a love story set in Paris. The second volume was to be Los pétalos de la chimera [The Chimera’s Petals].

For Scorza, literature was a forum for the judging of injustices past and present, a space where history could be reviewed and, in some cases, heard for the first time. His own writing was a constant protest against conditions suffered by the indigenous majority in Peru. Whether classified as indigenista or neoindigenista—terms with which the author himself did not agree—or as magical realism, the five works of the Guerra silenciosa cycle began with the belief that the Spanish Conquest had initiated a period in which time stood still, or more accurately, had ceased to exist, in the political and cultural sense, for the Indians. The Quechus of the Andean highlands were excluded from history and thus silenced, their world very real yet minimalized, distorted or destroyed by European elements. Except for the Quechua language, all the Andean world, from the inhabitants to the flora and fauna to the events that have been and are taking place there, is combined in the Silent War to portray a reality whose severity becomes absurd when described by Scorza. Characters metamorphosize, time ceases to exist, everything is exaggerated, and political conditions become literary farces. The almost surreal images and characters of the first book progress, however, toward the nearly total demythification and deliberate “textualization” or writing of a more accurate account, in the fifth book. Time is a vital element in Manual Scorza’s concept of Peru as nation and culture, for its serves multiple purposes, including that of contrasting the European and Indian cosmovisions, the nature and goals of official (written) history, the clash between words and deeds. Space, or place, is the other key coordinate for defining national identity, and once again points up the discrepancies in the conceptualization of reality that coexist within the national boundaries. Humour in the form of satire, parody, and irony, is another of Scorza’s techniques which expresses criticism of injustices past and present. At no point, however, is the real Peru far from the narrative. The author himself also closely shadows the narrator’s voice and literally figures as an anonymous witness on occasion. The entire cycle is an intense counterplay of oblivion versus memory, individual versus community, objective versus subjective, tradition and myth versus modernization and empirical documentation.

Whether one considers Manual Scorza to be an indigenista or neoindigenista writer, this literary modality still must be part of the cultural context out of which his work came. His work is one of profound social protest and provides a major renovation of the techniques by which the highland region had been represented in Peruvian fiction, at a time when such an effort was much needed. The intertextuality with other works, periods, genres and styles gave new life to the literature dealing with Indians, so masterfully produced by Scorza’s fellow countryman José María Arguedas, whose spiritual offspring Scorza considered himself to be. Ironically, while dealing less directly with historical reality, his novels perhaps bring the experience of himself and the marginalized peasants closer to readers of all origins.

KATHLEEN N.MARCH

Biography

Born in Lima, Peru, 9 September 1928. Developed severe asthma at an early age and the family left Lima for Acoria, Huancavelica (his mother’s village), where parents set up a bakery. Educated at a private school run by the Salesian Brothers; Colegio Militar Leoncio Prada, Lima (same school as Mario Vargos Llosa); Universidad Nacional de San Marcos, Lima. While at university became active in struggle against President Manuel Prado (1939–45). In late teens travelled to Chile and Argentina. From 1948 organized student protest against General Manuel Odría (1948–56). Arrested and imprisoned for one year. Exiled from Peru. Lived in Argentina, Chile and Brazil, working as perfume vendor, bookseller, proofreader and lecturer, then settled in Mexico. Studied at Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM). Entered poetry competition at UNAM under different names, awarded first three prizes. Became involved in Bolivian miners’ politics after publishing “Cantos a los mineros.” Returned to Peru in 1956 where he lived for 11 years. Married Lydia Hyle in 1956; one daughter and one son. In late 1950s set up the co-operative publishing house, Populibres Peruanos, with other writers, which eventually went bankrupt. Involved in peasant uprisings at Pasco in 1959. Secretary general, Movimiento Comunal del Perú. Arrested and exiled from Cerro de Pasco. Married Cecilia Hare in 1966. Left Peru in 1967 and settled in Paris for ten years. Returned to Peru, 1978. Stood as candidate for FOCEP (Frente Obrero Campesino, Estudiantil y Popular) but withdrew candidacy. Vice-president, FOCEP, 1980. Returned to Paris, 1983. Awarded the National Prize for Literature. Died in a plane crash in Spain, 27 November 1983. Three other Spanish American literary figures—Ángel Rama, his wife Marta Traba and the Mexican writer Jorge Ibargüengoitia—died in the same accident.
Selected Works

Novels
La guerra silenciosa/The Silent War series:
Historia de Garabombo, el invisible, Barcelona: Planeta, 1972; as Garabombo the Invisible, translated by Anna-Marie Aldaz, New York: Peter Lang, 1994
Cantar de Agapito Robles, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1977
El jinete insomne, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1978
La tumba del relámpago, Madrid: Siglo XXI, 1979
La danza inmóvil, Barcelona: Plaza y Janés, 1983

Poetry
Las imprecaciones, Mexico City: Viento del Pueblo, 1955
Hidalgo, Mexico City: Instituto Nacional Indigenista, 1956
Los adioses, Lima: Festivales del Libro, 1959
Desengaños del mago, Lima: Festivales del Libro, 1961
Rèquiem para un gentilhombre, Lima: Santiago Velarde, 1962

Compilations and Anthologies
El vals de los reptiles, Mexico City: UNAM, 1970 [poetry and essays]
Poesía, Lima: Secretaría de Educación y Cultura, 1986
Obra poética, Lima: PEISA, 1990
Obras completas, 6 vols, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1990–91

Further Reading
Forgues, Roland, La estrategia mítica de Manuel Scorza, Lima: Centro de Estudios para el Desarrollo y la Participación, 1991

José Asuncion Silva 1865–1896

Colombian poet and prose writer
José Asuncion Silva is often classified as a “precursor” of the Modernist movement in Spanish America, in part for chronological reasons: the year of his death, 1896, is the same as that of the older Manuel Gutiérrez Nájera, for instance and occurs after the deaths of José Martí and Julián del Casal. It also predates Rubén Darío’s Cantos de vida y esperanza, 1905 [Songs of Life and Hope], a work which many critics view as the finest poetic expression of the movement. Yet, a careful reading of Silva’s works reveals him (along with his Cuban contemporary del Casal) to be a full member of Darío’s Modernism, and indeed among its most outstanding poets.

Another, more surreptitious reason for Silva’s anomalous categorization on the edges of Modernism, is the discomfort some literary scholars feel at the heavy doses of sentiment—especially in the form of bitter sarcasm and parody—more neatly associated with the previous Romantic movement. Yet a rectification of Silva’s place in the Hispanic literary panorama brings a more judicious realization that the movement does not at all “transcend” sentiment by eliminating it, as some would have it, but by coupling it with the artistic and intellectual balances Modernism successfully brought to the frequent excesses of Romanticism. Hence—and this is no novel observation—Modernism is less a reaction against Romanticism than an incorporation of its finest contributions into early 20th-century art: a strongly conceived artistic perception, the intense struggle of the poet with society, nature, fate and self.

The relative paucity of Silva’s oeuvre remains one of the gaps in Spanish American poetry, just as the richness and beauty of what he did produce in his short life are one of its lasting monuments, both because he died, by his own hand, still a young man (at least in chronology), and because a good portion of what he himself considered his best work was lost in a shipwreck. While we cannot, of course, evaluate a writer on the basis of his lost poems, what Silva left behind, although poorly organized and still subject to dispute as to its definitive versions, is sufficiently varied, original and masterful to place him among Spanish American’s best poets of all times.

Silva’s art in many ways laments the passage of time not only in a generic, philosophical way, such as in “Día de difuntos” [Day of the Dead], but in specific historical context: the death of the old ways—tradition, stability, coherence—and profound doubts about the changes the 20th century was already producing in Latin America and of which Silva was in fact an early victim. A few decades earlier Silva would have been the beneficiary of a socio-economic system granting him immediate and all but unassailable recognition and privilege. Yet the onslaught of unfettered early 20th-century capitalism turned the family business into both an unwanted responsibility for the young Silva on the death of his father, and a confirmation for him that Jorge Manrique (the famous 15th-century Spanish poet) was right: “todo tiempo passado fue mejor” (all past times were better). The conflict between an idealized world, associated with childhood and past times, and the signs of the bad new days to come is a recurring theme in Silva’s verse, and in his only novel, De sobremesa [Table Talk].

“Los maderos de San Juan” [The San Juan Lumberyard] exemplifies Silva’s disillusionment and the feeling of powerlessness to affect the passage of time for the better. In this lovely lament, a grandmother rocks her grandson on her knee while singing a traditional children’s song, partly made up nonsense words which merely establish a rhythm imitative of the regularity of the lumberyard’s saws: “triqui triqui triqui tran/los maderos de San Juan.” Alternating with the direct presentation of this scene are the reflections of another voice, relating the grandmother’s nostalgic feelings for her own girlhood and the losses and pains that time has brought her. The voice tells us that such will assuredly be the boy’s fate as well, as it is, in Silva’s view, for all: he will remember this same scene, longing for his own innocence and her love, after his grandmother’s death. This poem could simply be a moving portrayal of the “tempus fugit” theme, but there is another, quite subtle note introduced by the poet’s intervention: where earlier he said that the woman’s knees are firm and hard and that “ambos agitados…están” (both are excited), this time her knees are “tired,” and he says “ambos conmovidos…están” (both are moved). That is to say that the boy in his innocence has somehow perceived, and hence already begun to share, his elder’s sadness: he has, then, already begun to experience the very loss and disenchantment with life that she feels during the very act of trying to protect him from them.

The lovely sadness of “Los maderos de San Juan,” the pain of love lost (“Nocturno,” his most famous poem, and “Poeta, di paso” [Poet, Speak Softly]), the absurd inevitability of death itself (“Muertos” [The Dead] and “La Calavera” [The Skull]) and the solitude of the artist (“La respuesta de la tierra” [The Earth’s Reply]) typify one Silvan attitude and the one most often associated with him. Yet the revelation of painful truths produces in other poems a quite different tonality, and we have a different Silva, one highly ironic and often sarcastically bitter toward life, fate and his times, expressed most forcefully in decadentist parody (present in Dario, but much less typical in him than in Silva). Thus he excoriates the noble-sounding ideal of the French Revolution—“Egalité”—by suggesting that the only way that a common man (to whom he applies the homely name “Juan Lanas”) and a member of the aristocratic elite—the Emperor of China—are equal is when the human beast trembles in the “sexual spasm” of orgasm: then we see that, indeed, “both are the same animal.” In other words, what binds the human species together is its vulgarity, base urges and carnal crassness. Similarly, “Madrigal” portrays a young woman’s innocent beauty (“tu tez rosada y pura, tus formas gráciles” [your pink and pure face, the grace of your form]) in exquisitely refined detail, only to be trampled: for “todo eso está, y a gritos, pidiendo un hombre” (all that is shouting out, asking for a man).

In this same parodic vein, Silva strikes out at medicine as empty, since what we really need is a cure for life, as in “Psychotherapy” and “Capsules.” Philosophy is just as vain and impotent as medicine, for he tells the studious man that “cuando llegues en postrera hora/a la última morada/ sentirás una angustia matadora/de no haber hecho nada” (when, in your last hour, you come to your final home, you will feel the killing anguish of having done: nothing). Socio-economic change produces only a mass of materialistic Sancho Panzas (the image of the robber barons of the time), nihilism and mindless violence (“Futura”). Thus he portrays, in “Lazarus,” a man miraculously returned to life, facing the world anew, only to return sobbing to his burial ground, envying the dead.

It is, at times, difficult to conjoin into one body of work tonalities and expressive modes so seemingly disparate; but Silva’s work is consistently characterized by the powerful sentiments spoken of above, expressed with the most effective stylistic control, rhythmic skill and inventive use of language, as in his famous parody of the most derivative and mushypenned followers of Dario, “Sinfonía color de fresas con leche” [Symphony in Strawberries and Milk]. Silva’s is, finally, the poetic legacy of a man whose aspirations, as in Dario, Martí and del Casal, could never be satisfied by life and its (and his own) inevitable imperfections: he thus writes from the very heart of the Modernist movement itself, to remind us of its messages to our own “Postmodern” times.

PAUL W. BORGESON, JR
Biography

Born in Bogota, Colombia, 26 November 1865. Educated at various private schools; left school in 1881 to work in his father’s import store. First poems published in 1884. Father ruined by civil war that broke out in 1885. Visited Europe in 1885 and returned to Colombia in 1889. Father died in 1887 and José Asunción’s sister, Elvira, in 1891. Appointed Secretary of the Colombian Legation in Caracas, 1894. On his return journey to Colombia in 1895, the boat on which he was travelling sank off the Colombian coast, and a number of his manuscripts were lost. Resigned from diplomatic corps. Suffered acute depression. Committed suicide, 24 May 1896.

Selected Works

De sobremesa, Bogota: Cromos, 1925
El libro de versos, 1883–1896, Bogota: Cromos, 1928
El libro de versos, facsimile edition, Bogota: Horizonte, 1945
Intimidades, edited by Hector H. Orjuela, Bogota: Instituto Caro y Cuervo, 1977

Compilations and Anthologies

Poesías. Edición definitiva, prologue by Miguel de Unamuno and notes by Baldomero Sanín Cano, Paris: Michaud, 1923
Obras completas de José Asuncion Silva, Medellín, Colombia: Editorial Bedout, 1970
Obra completa, edited by Hector H. Orjuela, Nanterre, France: Centre de Recherches Latino-Américaines, 1990

Further Reading

Camacho Guizado, Eduardo, La poesía de José Asuncion Silva, Bogota: Ediciones Universidad de Los Andes, 1968
Loveluck, Juan, “De sobremesa: novela desconocida del Modernismo,” Revista Iberoamericana, vol. 31/59 (1965)
Osiek, Betty T., José Asuncion Silva, Boston: Twayne, 1978
Silva, Bernardo Guimarães de

See Guimarães

Antonio Skármeta 1940–

Chilean prose writer
A university-trained teacher and critic of Spanish American literature, with a masters degree from New York’s Columbia University (1966), Antonio Skármeta is not only an accomplished novelist, short-story writer and film-maker, but is also a highly articulate commentator on his generation’s outlook and practice of fiction. His articles and interviews are of major importance for the understanding of many aspects of the Post-Boom. Born in Antofagasta in northern Chile of Yugoslavian immigrant origin, he is one of the relatively few Chilean writers who do not spring from the middle and upper classes and his work marks a break with the genteel tradition in Chilean fiction. After 1966 he taught at the University of Santiago, translated works by Melville, Scott Fitzgerald, Kerouac, Mailer and others, and achieved prominence by winning the Casa de las Américas Prize with his second collection of short stories Desnudo en el tejado, 1969 [Naked on the Roof]. In 1975 came the publication of his first novel Soñé que la nieve ardía (I Dreamt the Snow was Burning) completed in exile after he had been forced to leave Chile by the military coup against the Allende government, which he had supported, two years earlier. He was to spend thirteen years in exile, chiefly in West Berlin where he taught in the Academy of Cinema and Television. He wrote successful radio plays and made a number of films with the Director Peter Lillienthal, as well as publishing four more novels, including his best so far, Ardiente paciencia, 1985 (Burning Patience), also filmed.

In Skármeta’s early short stories the intellectual and existential preoccupations frequently present in Boom writing still re-emerge sporadically. But they tend to be offset by the instinctive vitality of the young protagonists, whose appearance along with their zest, youth-culture, pop music and enjoyment of sport, is often seen as part of the shift towards the Post-Boom. There is a return of confidence, indicated by the title of Skármeta’s first collection of stories, El entusiasmo, 1967 [Enthusiasm]. Here and later, brief experiences of loving sexuality, as in “La Cenicienta en San Francisco” [Cinderella in San Francisco], create epiphanic moments of affirmation of life, of yea-saying. They overcome, not just personal loneliness, but existential solitude. Chaos and absurdity give way to a sense of reconciliation with an uncontaminated world. “Otherness” is conquered; inner understanding and mutual reassurance are established. In Desnudo en el tejado Skármeta’s approach to reality is tempered by elements of fantasy, but notable stories, such as “Basketball” still deal with adolescent or post-adolescent rites of passage in which life’s hostility is disarmed.
The rise and fall of the Allende government in Chile radicalized Skármeta’s political stance and strongly influenced all his subsequent writing up to and including Ardiente paciencia. Tiro libre, 1973 [Fire at Will], his third collection of stories, marks the ideological shift, with some tales, such as “El cigarrillo” [The Cigarette] which are now overtly political. Soñé que la nieve ardía centres on a group of young people living under the Allende administration and the evolution of one of them, Arturo, who aspires to be a professional football player. The chain of events concerning him chronicles his reluctant move towards greater Left Wing commitment. The novel is dominated by two symbols: soccer, with its high rewards and star-system, standing for selfish individualism, and Arturo’s virginity, which represents his political and social immaturity. He fails as a professional player, but is finally sexually initiated by Susana, a working-class girl. Because of its political theme, its young, semi-proletarian characters and the way it reaches out towards a new balance between “observed” and “created” reality, Soñé… is one of the inaugural novels of the Post-Boom. No pasó nada, 1985 [Nothing Happened], is Skármeta’s contribution to recent exile fiction, an important genre in the Post-Boom. The young protagonist, Lucho, undergoes experiences in West Berlin, where he lives in exile with his parents, which illustrate the values of Chileanness. These, it is implicit in the novel, will survive political repression at home and be needed in the new post-Pinochet Chile. The difficulty for Skármeta was to transcend the usual limitations of exile writing: nostalgia, resentment and partisan attitudes. He overcomes them by dealing sensitively with the universal problems of adolescence, especially Lucho’s growing awareness of the other sex. A teenage affair leads to a fight with an older German boy which takes on the quality of a rite of passage to adulthood. It is followed by a symbolic reconciliation and the triumph of positive values of friendship and solidarity as Lucho’s antagonist learns to support the Chilean exile movement.

La insurrección, 1982 (The Insurrection), is set in provincial Nicaragua during the Sandinista uprising and depicts the fall of the Somoza regime in the city of León. It is as close as Skármeta ever comes to a fully committed, revolutionary novel. Few others proclaim faith in individual and collective insurrectionary effort as boldly as La insurrección. It is to be contrasted with, for example, Vargas Llosa’s Historia de Mayta, 1984 (The Real History of Alejandro Mayta), which attempts to undermine such writings. Centred on a collective protagonist, the humble Menor family, the novel develops slowly towards its climax, the neighbourhood’s attack on the local barracks, which is sprayed with petrol from a pipe passed through their houses and set on fire. The reader is brought gradually to understand and share the motives which drive the people from passivity to open rebellion against gross military oppression. Even more noteworthy than in Soñé que la nieve ardía is the active participation of women in the political struggle, which has allowed Skármeta to claim justifiably that he is a feminist writer, another factor linking him to the Post-Boom, in which feminist and other minority voices are clearly heard. By contrast, Ardiente paciencia returns to Chile and to the rise and fall of Allende. The novel is pre-eminently a love story, in which a Nobel prizewinner, the poet Pablo Neruda, figures prominently as a protective father-figure for a couple of young working-class lovers. Their idyll runs parallel to the life of the Allende government. It begins in the run-up to Allende’s election and is consummated on the night of his victory. A second climax of love-making, this time collective, comes when Neruda wins the Nobel Prize. But when the poet returns to Chile to die and Allende’s government is overthrown, the hero, Mario, a young postman, is arrested and “disappeared.” The novel, which begins happily, ends in bitterness. Nevertheless, because of its earlier lightheartedness and superb portraits of Neruda and his young protegés, surrounded by their delightful and amusing friends and neighbours, this is Skármeta’s most entertaining and brilliantly written novel to date, a major contribution to modern Spanish American fiction.

Match Ball (1989) is set in Europe and marks a new direction in Skármeta’s writing. The central character, Papst, is an archetypal figure of the masculine middle-class crisis. A married, wealthy, expatriate physician in his early fifties, working in West Berlin, where he has a lucrative practice, he falls madly in love with an enigmatic, adolescent tennis-star, Sophie Mass, destroying his marriage and his career, as well as plunging into folly and crime, while pursuing her and trying to hold off a younger rival. The theme is the rejection of hollow and unsatisfying middle-class values and the search for an impossible renewal of youth, love and sexuality. It illustrates the return to neo-romanticism characteristic of one of the main currents of writing in the Post-Boom. But underlying it is the universal fear of growing old and slipping into comfortable conformity. Match Ball is the story of the last hurrah of a man of the hippie era in a period which has been taken over by yuppies. His confession is the swan-song of a generation. Despite his unforgivable behaviour to his wife, refusal to heed warnings and utter lack of self control, Papst manages to distance himself at times from his plight and retains just enough droll self-awareness to keep our minimal interest and respect. Sophie, on the other hand, is utterly different from earlier female characters in Skármeta’s work and her motivation for leading Papst on is far from clear. She seems to be both seeking a father-figure and rejecting male domination. She remains puzzlingly imperturbable in the face of the nightmare she unleashes on her two lovers.

Up to Match Ball what matters in Skármeta is his return to a more reader-friendly manner of writing than that of the Boom writers, with strong emphasis on love-interest and on the here and now of Spanish America. These are all prominent characteristics of the Post-Boom of which he is one of the most representative writers.

DONALD L. SHAW

---

Biography

Born in Antofagasta, Chile, 7 November 1940. Attended the University of Chile, Santiago; Columbia University, New York, MA, 1966. Married Cecilia Boisier in 1964 (divorced); two sons; married Nora Preperski. Professor of contemporary Latin American literature, University of Chile, early 1970s; left Chile after military coup in 1973. Professor of screenwriting, Academy of Cinema and Television, West Berlin, 1978–81; since 1981 freelance writer and filmmaker. Returned to Chile in 1989 and is a popular TV personality; runs workshops for young writers. The novel Ardiente paciencia was adapted for film (as Il postino), directed by Michael Radford, 1994. Awarded the Casa de las Américas Prize, 1969 for Desnudo en el tejado; Daniel Belmar Prize, 1969; Biarritz Film Festival Prize, 1983; Huelva Film Festival Prize, 1983; Guggenheim Fellowship, 1986.
Selected Works

Short Fiction

El entusiasmo, Santiago de Chile: Zig-Zag, 1967
Desnudo en el tejado, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1969
Tiro libre, Buenos Aires: Siglo XXI, 1973
El ciclista de San Cristóbal, Santiago de Chile: Quimantú, 1973
Novios y solitarios, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1975
No pasó nada y otros relatos, Santiago de Chile: Pehuén, 1985
La Cenicienta en San Francisco y otros cuentos, Santiago de Chile: Andrés Bello, 1990

Novels

Soñé que la nieve ardía, Barcelona: Planeta, 1975; as I Dreamt the Snow was Burning, translated by Malcolm Coad, London and New York: Readers International, 1985
Chileno!, translated by Hortense Carpentier, New York: Morrow, 1979

Screenplay:
Ardiente paciencia, 1983

Translations

Further Reading

Lira, Constanza, Skármeta: la inteligencia de los sentidos, Santiago de Chile: Dante, 1985
Shaw, Donald L., “‘La Cenicienta en San Francisco’ by Antonio Skármeta,” Revista de Estudios Hispánicos, vol. 21/2 (1987)
———“The Structure of Antonio Skármeta’s Soñé que la nieve ardía” The Americas Review, vol. 18/3–4 (1990)
———“Fictional Technique in Skármeta’s La insurrección” Antípodas, vol. 3 (1991) ———Antonio Skármeta and the Post Boom, Hanover, New Hampshire: Ediciones del Norte, 1994
Ardiente paciencia

Novel by Antonio Skármeta

Skármeta’s most popular novel, Ardiente paciencia (Burning Patience), was first a play and then a successful movie, which the author himself directed. (More recently the novel has also inspired a moving Italian version, Il postino [The Postman]). The action takes place in and around the town of Isla Negra, on the Chilean coast, between 1969 and 1973. Its creation was owed to two circumstances: Chile’s political trauma and Pablo Neruda’s prominence on the national scene during these years. The protagonist of this tragicomedy, Mario Jiménez, is a likeable seventeen-year-old youth of modest means who accepts employment as a postman, mainly because his only client is Chile’s most famous bard, Pablo Neruda. In order to strike up a friendship with Neruda, Mario buys a copy of his Odas elementales (The Elemental Odes), asks the author to autograph it, and, through their subsequent conversations, comes to realize the power of the metaphor. Another reason for Mario’s friendship with Neruda is Beatriz González, a comely barmaid whose affection, with the aid of Neruda’s verses, Mario gradually succeeds in winning. But, just when he begins to anticipate an idyllic future with Beatriz (he fully intends to marry her), he “came up against one of Chile’s more terrifying institutions: the mother-in-law.”

Rosa de González, Beatriz’s mother, is a blunt-spoken, worldly-wise widow determined to protect her daughter from the wiles of male predators such as Mario Jiménez; she also recognizes Neruda’s love poems when Beatriz repeats them to her as Mario’s own creations. Then, in a hilarious conversation between Rosa and Neruda (with Mario concealed behind a curtain), Rosa hurls accusations of plagiarism against the youth, “a seducer of minors,” and threatens to cause him bodily injury if Neruda does not keep him away from her daughter. Being a practical woman, however, she eventually agrees to the couple’s marriage, after seeing that “the floodgates had already been flung open.”

Subsequent events include Salvador Allende’s election (September 1970), his appointment of Neruda as ambassador to France, Neruda’s winning the Nobel Prize, and the military coup against Allende (September 11, 1973). The novel ends tragically with the ailing Neruda’s return from Paris to Isla Negra, his death a few days after the coup, and Mario’s arrest and disappearance.

Much of the novel’s humor derives from its overall ironic tone and, in particular, from its ironic treatment of the four major characters, all of whom are presented by an detached, but not unsympathetic, narrator. Thus the mature Neruda, whose past love affairs are legend, contrasts sharply with Mario, the callow youth obsessed with the opposite sex and about to experience the rite of passage to manhood. On the other hand, Rosa de González’s cynical attitude toward men, coupled with her intense alarm over the effects of Neruda’s love poems, differs just as sharply from her daughter’s innocence and gullibility.

Another source of humor is Skármeta’s use of hyperbole, reminiscent of García Márquez, especially in the love scenes between Mario and Beatriz:” despegó el orgasmo de Beatriz hacia la noche sideral con una candencia que...le inspiró las siguientes palabras al cura párroco en su desvelo de la torre: ‘magnificat, stabat, pange lingua, dies irae, benedictus, kyrie eleison, angelica.’” (Beatriz released her orgasm into the starry night with such a cadence that it…inspired the parish priest doing vigil in the tower to utter these words: ‘magnificat, stabat, pange lingua, dies irae, benedictus, kyrie eleison, angelica’). Also reminiscent of García Márquez are the occasional dashes of absurd humor: “Cuando al mínimo Jiménez le debutaron los dientes, consta en los barrotes de la jaula que intentó aserrucharlos con sus lechosos caninos. Las encías coronadas de astillas introdujeron a otro personaje en la hostería y en el exangüe presupuesto de Mario: el dentista.” (When baby Jiménez began to teethe, he took to sawing off the bars of his cage with his new molars, an activity that filled his gums with splinters and added a new claimant to Mario’s rapidly declining resources: the dentist).

In another comic scene, Neruda and Mario become victims of irony when, confident that the revered poet will smooth the way for Mario’s romance with Beatriz, they play the Beatles’ recording of “Mr Postman” and dance joyfully about the room while waiting for the widow González’s arrival to speak with Neruda. But after her departure and Mario’s reappearance from behind the curtain, Neruda massages his ear, rolls his eyes, and exclaims: “…now I know what a boxer feels like when he has been knocked out in the first round.”

Humor is tempered by poignancy, however, when Neruda’s nostalgic letter from Paris asks Mario to send him a tape recording of the sounds of the sea and when Mario writes his “Ode to the Snow Over Neruda in Paris,” a beautiful poem filled with metaphors conveying how much Neruda is missed by his friends at home. Recorded on tape, Mario’s poem is followed by the cries of Pablo Neftalí Jiménez González, Neruda’s godson. Another memorable moment is Neruda’s Nobel Prize speech in Stockholm, shown on television in Chile, in which his quotation from a poem by Rimbaud reveals the origin of the book’s title: “Only with burning patience shall we conquer the splendid city that will give light, justice, and dignity to all men.”

Additional political elements deftly woven into the narrative texture include Neruda’s brief presidential candidacy for the socialist Partido Unidad Popular and, after Allende’s election, the many problems plaguing his regime: food shortages, trucker strikes, bombings by right-wingers, and street protests by middle-class women pounding on pots and pans. But far more dramatic are the brutal military coup and its aftermath: the telegrams from foreign governments offering Neruda asylum and Mario’s emotional meeting with the poet moments before he is taken to the hospital to die.

Skármeta wrote Ardiente paciencia in Germany, where he spent many years in exile after the military coup in his homeland. His novel pays homage not only to Chile’s greatest poet, but also to the Allende supporters who, like Mario Jiménez, remained in Chile and suffered the consequences. But what emerges as perhaps the most important theme of this tragicomedy is the power of language, more specifically the power of poetry, to motivate human behavior. Thus, as mentioned above, Neruda’s verses ignite amorous passion in Beatriz and fear in Rosa (whose comments are ironically sprinkled with refrains), but additional evidence of this theme is the elaborate precautions taken by the government at Neruda’s funeral in order to prevent a violent protest by the poet’s hordes of ardent admirers. And, in the final lines of the novel, we are told that military officials have, out of fear no doubt, confiscated the issues of La Quinta Rueda [The Fifth Wheel], a poetry journal to which Mario has submitted one of his poems. Skármeta himself has commented on his homage to language in his work, that is, on his efforts to capture a mixture of the cultured and popular prose used by Chileans. The oxymoron of Skármeta’s title, moreover, poetically condenses the repressed yearnings of a freedom-loving nation caught in the grip of a brutal dictatorship.

GEORGE R. MCMURRAY

Editions

Further Reading

The bibliography on Ardiente paciencia is surprisingly small. Possibly the best remarks on this novel are by the author himself in Mario Blanc’s interview listed below.
Filer, Malva E., “Ardiente paciencia.,” World Literature Today 60 (1986)

Carlos Solórzano 1922–

Guatemalan/Mexican playwright

Though Guatemalan by birth, Carlos Solórzano’s life and career have been so closely intertwined with Mexico, where he has lived since 1939, that some critics have taken recently to listing him as Guatemalan/Mexican. This great-grandson of a former president of Guatemala has combined a literary career with an academic one, having established the program “Carrera de Arte Dramático” at the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM) where he has taught for many years. Solórzano has also contributed to journals and newspapers in Europe, Puerto Rico, Latin America and the United States.

Widely acknowledged as both a scholar and critic of theater in Latin America, Solórzano’s published works include, in addition to his newspaper and journal articles, (a selection of which were published by the UNAM), two novels, two works about Latin American theater, three theater anthologies, and eleven plays. Despite his incursions into other literary genres, Solórzano’s paramount contribution to Spanish American letters lies in his drama. Though not as extensive as the work of many of his peers, his plays, however, challenge readers to rethink their position on those questions which have troubled human beings through the ages, and to do so from a universal rather than from a regional perspective. His insistence on this viewpoint aroused some criticism in Mexico, initially over the choice of his Los fantoches [The Puppets] to represent Mexico in the United Nations Theater Festival in Paris in 1963. None the less, the author defended his choice, pointing out that he had not ignored what is essentially Mexican in this play, (and by extension all his theater), but had incorporated it as a point of departure in his writing.

Solórzano’s creative writing, and in particular his writing for the theater, reveals the influence of several major European authors, an impact the dramatist freely acknowledges. While one cannot necessarily specify the precise effect on Solórzano of the different artists who fell within his purview, four names stand out: Ghelderode, Camus, Artaud and Unamuno. From a philosophical perspective, the last of these is quite important. Early on the Basque philosopher/author had captured the attention of the young Guatemalan writer to the degree that the Spaniard’s works became the topic of Solórzano’s master’s thesis as well as his doctoral dissertation. Unamuno’s impact on Solórzano is both substantive and pervasive. Fundamental in the philosophy of both men is the word “agitár” (to shake), symbolic of the reluctance of either one to accept a theory simply because someone postulates it. As Rivas remarked in his study on Solórzano, “Agitar para Solórzano implica conmover, hacer pensar al espectador.” (To agitate for Solórzano implies to move, to make the spectator think). Both authors struggle with the concept of death which they perceive as the ultimate insult to mankind. Both, while acknowledging the existence of a creator, have considerable difficulty with the institutionalized church and what they perceive as its rigidity and insensitivity.

Less ideological is the effect of the above mentioned dramatists on Solórzano’s theater. He knew both Camus and the Belgian playwright Ghelderode. To the latter he attributed the inspiration for his play, Doña Beatriz. With the former he shared many themes, chief among them the issue of good and evil and the related question of culpability. Though he had never met Artaud and knew him only through his plays, both writers have in common a poetic and religious dimension to their respective dramatic writings.

While one may consider Solórzano’s plays from various points of view, even grouping them according to thematic focus, certain traits inform all of his dramas. Principal among these is the issue of the reason for man’s being. Characters often refer to “the sin of having been born.” Whether they be the tormented puppets of Los fantoches, the harassed heroine of El sueño del ángel [The Angel’s Dream], or the bedeviled Beatriz of Las manos de Dios [The Hands of God], they rail against fate as they question in vain the rationale of their existence. In more than half of his plays the author’s anti-clerical bias figures significantly. Also customary in his theater is a preoccupation with good and evil, not in the conventional moral sense but rather in relation to the right of people to exercise their free will. In an interview with Esteban Rivas, Solórzano stated his position quite clearly when he said, “Pecar es optar…y ser dueño de su propia conciencia, de optar es el mejor bien del hombre.” (To sin is to choose… and to be master of one’s own conscience; to choose is man’s greatest good). A review of the casts of Solórzano’s plays reveals that the majority of his characters have no proper names. This technique explains the withdrawn nature and lack of communication typical of many of the characters in his dramas, which, in turn, underscores their existential aloneness.

Solórzano’s is an urbane theater which reflects not only the diversity of his intellectual and artistic experience, but also his practical training in architecture and work as a theater director. Through it runs his constant preoccupation with the relationship of man with the world in which he finds himself. In an interview with Teresa Méndez-Faith which appeared in the Fall 1984 issue of Latin American Theatre Review he acknowledged this when he said:

Pues hay un tema que sí me preocupa, que me preocupó siempre…es que yo encuentro que, en general, hemos nacido en un mundo hosíl y que a nosotros, los pobladores del siglo XX nos cuesta mucho trabajo reconciliarnos con él.

[Well, there is a theme which concerns me, which always has…the fact is that I find that, in general, we were born into a hostile world and that it costs us, the inhabitants of the 20th century a great deal of work to reconcile ourselves to it.]

FRANCESCA COLECCHIA

Biography

Born in San Marcos, Guatemala, 1 May 1922. Moved to Mexico in 1939, where he has since made his home. Attended the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM), Mexico City, degree in architecture, 1944, and PhD in literature, 1948. Married Beatrice Caso in 1946; one son (deceased) and two daughters. Received Rockefeller Foundation grant in 1948, to study drama at the Sorbonne, Paris, 1948–50. Founder and director of the Teatro Universitario Profesional, 1950–60 and Teatro Estudiantil Universitario, 1950–52. Visiting professor at several American universities including, Southern California, Kansas, Arizona, and Colombia. Has also served as correspondent for Rendez-vous du Théâtre and Primer Acto as well as drama critic for Siempre. Former director of the Museo Nacional de Teatro. Currently, Latin America area editor for the Enciclopedia Mundial del Teatro Contemporáneo. Professor at UNAM, since the mid-1990s. Awarded the Premio Universidad, Universidad Nacional Autónoma, 1989; Miguel Ángel Asturias National Literature Prize (Guatemala), 1989.

Selected Works

Plays

La muerte hizo la luz, in Revista de Guatemala, vol. 3 (October–December 1951) [one-act play]

Doña Beatriz, Mexico City: Helio, 1954

El hechicero, Mexico City: Cultura, 1955

Las manos de Dios, Mexico City: Costa-Amic, 1957

Los fantoches, Cruce de vías and El crucificado, in Tres Actos, Mexico City: El Unicornio, 1959 [one-act play]

El sueño del ángel, in Tercera antología de obras en un acto, Mexico City: Colección Teatro Mexicano, 1960 [one-act play]

El zapato, in Crononauta 2 (1966) [one-act play]

Mea culpa, in Teatro de Carlos Solórzano, Mexico City: UNAM, 1992 [one-act play]

Novels
Los falsos demonios, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1966
Las celdas, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1971

Other Writings
Espejo de novelas, Mexico City: UNAM, 1945
Teatro guatemalteco contemporáneo, Madrid: Aguilar, 1964 [anthology]
El teatro hispanoamericano contemporáneo, 2 vols, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1964 [anthology]
El teatro latinoamericano en el siglo XX, Mexico City: Pormaca, 1964
Teatro breve hispanoamericano contemporáneo, Madrid: Aguilar, 1969 [anthology]
Testimonios teatrales de México, Mexico City: UNAM, 1973

Compilations and Anthologies
Teatro, San José, Costa Rica, EDUCA, 1972 [Contains Los fantoches, El crucificado, Las manos de Dios, El sueño del ángel]
Teatro breve, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1977 [Contains El zapato, cruce de vías, El sueño del ángel, Mea culpa, El crucificado, Los fantoches]

Translations

Further Reading
Martínez-Rivas, Esteban, Carlos Solórzano y el teatro mexicano, Mexico City: Impresos Anáhuac, 1970

Osvaldo Soriano 1943–

Argentine prose writer
Osvaldo Soriano’s first novel Triste, solitario y final [Sad, Lonely and Final] was published in 1973. It was intended to be not only a tribute to Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy but also to the detective novel genre à la Raymond Chandler, demonstrably so since the first edition was dedicated to these three figures. In fact, the novel is quite obviously the result of a passionate interest in Chandler and a melancholy vignette of the most celebrated characters of the early years of Hollywood. As well as Laurel and Hardy, there are Chaplin, Philip Marlowe himself (Chandler wrote Hollywood scripts), Buster Keaton, John Wayne, Jerry Lewis, etc. Behind the tribute there is a vague criticism, mostly nostalgic although at times quite bitter, of Chaplin’s film Modern Times and a nod and a wink at the “anti-imperialist” (i.e., anti-US) criticism which dominated intellectual and literary circles in those days. This criticism is personified in the novel by Soriano himself who appears, in the third person, as a minor character.

His second novel, No habrá más penas ni olvidos (A Funny Dirty Little War), was finished by mid-1975. This was just after the death of Perón and, because of the exploits of the Triple A, the State’s repressive apparatus during that period, it was difficult to publish anything in Argentina. This was particularly true of a book like this one which dealt in allegorical terms with the political factions vying for control of the Peronist movement. The novel is set in a small provincial town called (not without a certain sarcasm) Colonia Vela. (The literal meaning is Vigil Colony. Vela has the following meanings: state of being awake; a nuisance; a funeral wake; facing the music; a candle. It is not clear which meaning(s) Soriano has in mind).

In fact the novel sets out to be a sort of pocket history of the Peronist movement, seen through the hopes, fears and failures of archetypal figures in Argentine society, as the title itself, a line from a Carlos Gardel tango, suggests. The novel did not appear until 1982 when it was published in Spain. No habrá más penas ni olvidos is perhaps Soriano’s best-known book abroad because the Argentine director, Hector Oliveira, adapted it for film, under the same title. Its commercial success, especially in Argentina, was due to the fact that the script, which is not entirely faithful to the novel, touched a particularly salient topic at that moment in Argentine history: the idea of looking back at the immediate past, at the question of recovering memory connected with what happened during the military dictatorship from 1976 to 1983.

In exile, first in Belgium then in Paris, Soriano began writing Cuartel de invierno (Winter Quarters). It is a short novel, and bearing in mind the characters and background, it can be seen as the continuation in a different form of No habrá más penas ni olvidos. Characters such as a boxer past his peak, a disillusioned ex-Communist in an authoritarian society, a middle-class family seen through its everyday life (poverty, above all) populate this novel. It is also set in the imaginary town of Colonia Vela, to some extent an allegory of Argentina not only under the 1976–83 military dictatorship but under the series of dictatorships which dominated Argentina in the previous fifty years.

Soriano’s next books, A sus plantas rendido un león, 1987 [A Lion Cowering at Its Feet] and Una sombra ya pronto serás, 1990 (Shadows) are more widely known in Europe and the US than his previous work. They belong to the period after Soriano’s return to Argentina, and they deal with what was to become a constant theme in his work: failed but somehow curious characters, sordid stories with a certain irony, arid desolate environments that somehow recall the Patagonian landscapes which Soriano knew as a child in Cipolletti. So, obscure failures can be affectionate and full of vitality at the same time; sordid, poor environments can become material paradises—unexpected as well as decadent—a mixture of humour and melancholy. The titles of these novels are also indicative of their subject matter: “A sus plantas rendido un león” (a conquered lion at their feet) is a line from the Argentine national anthem and “Una sombra ya pronto serás” (You’ll soon be a shade) is a verse from the famous tango “Caminito” (Narrow Path).

After his return from exile in 1983, the political allusions in Soriano’s writing slowly changed, notably in his recent work El ojo de la patria, 1991 [The Eye of the Fatherland], to a more interesting and solid analysis of Argentine society. A certain scepticism about everyday events and characters motivates Soriano’s narrators; at the same time it is a lucid ironical view, full of a humour both bitter and disdainful. This evolution of sorts comes to fruition in El ojo de la patria, in which countless cultural and historical stereotypes are introduced into the plot to give caustic social significance through oblique and unexpected double meanings.

As well as being a novelist, Soriano has had a long career as a journalist for various publications in Argentina and abroad. He has written about football, politics, aspects of Argentine society and literature. Artistas, locos y criminales [Artists, Madmen and Criminals] is a collection of articles that Soriano wrote for La Opinion in Buenos Aires between 1972 and 1974, which were published in 1983. Similarly, Rebeldes, soñadores y fugitivos [Rebels, Dreamers and Fugitives] published in 1987, is a compilation of articles which originally appeared in various newspapers and journals.

As part of a generation decimated by political repression, Osvaldo Soriano is one of the few Argentine writers (another example would be Horacio Vásquez Rial) who, after political and journalistic experiences, has developed creatively in more literary directions without abandoning a critical view of society.

CLAUDIO CANAPARO
translated by Ann Wright

Biography

Born in Mar del Plata (a large seaside resort on the coast of the province of Buenos Aires), Argentina, in 1943. Full-time journalist; contributed to La Opinion and Panorama. Went into exile after the military coup of 1976. Lived in Brussels and then took up residence in Paris. Returned to Argentina briefly in 1983 and settled there in 1984. (The film version of his novel No habrá más pena ni olvido was made in 1983 and later won the Silver Bear prize at the Berlin Film Festival.) Took up journalism again and writes regularly for the Buenos Aires newspaper, Página/12.

Selected Works

Novels
Triste, solitario y final, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1973
A sus plantas rendido un león, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1987
El ojo de la patria, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1992
Catelli, Nora, “Desde el vértigo hacia el abismo,” Quimera: Revista de Literatura, no. 19 (May 1982)
Ingaramo, Elías, Turbios purgatorios, Rosario, Argentina: Ideacción, 1992
Rama, Ángel, La novela en America Latina, 1920–1980, Bogota: Procultura/Instituto Colombiano de Cultura, 1982,

Interviews

Sousândrade 1833–1902

Brazilian poet
Chronologically a member of the second generation of Brazilian Romantic poets, Sousândrade diverges radically from his contemporaries in both themes and style. He is generally considered a precursor of 20th-century Imagism and Modernism, “born thirty years too soon,” more akin to Ezra Pound than to his own generation and possessing a marked awareness of international affairs and a grasp of intercontinental cultural affinities.

After completing his university studies in letters and mining engineering at the Sorbonne, Sousândrade served as a teacher of Greek in his native state of Maranhão, in northern Brazil, and also engaged in farming. He subsequently traveled widely throughout Amazônia, the Andean region, Central America, and Europe, and resided for several years in New York City before returning to Brazil; this substantial foreign experience laid the groundwork for his most famous poetic work, the thirteen-canto narrative Guesa errante [Wandering Inca] (begun in the late 1850s and published in segments between 1874 and 1877).
Guesa errante is inspired indirectly by Byron’s Childe Harold’s Pilgrimage as regards its overarching geographical structure and travel theme. It is more closely related in spirit, however, to native Andean myths of cyclical sacrifice, “rebirth,” and the magical guesa; Sousândrade identifies himself with the guesa as the semi-mythical creature flies from continent to continent, absorbing and reacting to the cultural phenomena observed in each and incorporating bits of local and national folklore and news (in the respective original languages) in a massive poem couched in quasi-limerick verse form. This epic travelogue may, in its multicultural focus and high-spirited tone, be considered a precursor of Mário de Andrade’s 1928 novel about “the hero without character,” Macunaima (Macunaima) whose protagonist travels magically to all regions of Brazil and expresses himself in an idiolectic combining baroque, Amerindian, immigrant and standard Brazilian Portuguese characteristics. Canto 10 of the Guesa errante, subtitled “O Inferno de Wall Street” [The Wall Street Inferno], recreates the ambience of the New York Stock Exchange, with intercalated newspaper headlines, street vendor calls, references to US political scandals and religious and abolitionist rhetoric of the 1860s, and contextual echoes of Platonic philosophy and European literatures. Other cantos of this “formless epic” are set in the Andean and Amazonian regions of South America (cantos 1–3), the province (later state) of Maranhão, Brazil (cantos 4–5), the urban elegance of Rio de Janeiro (canto 6), western Europe (canto 7), north-western Africa (fragmentary canto 7), Maranhão (canto 8), the Antilles, Central America, and Gulf of Mexico (canto 9), the Pacific Ocean, Colombia, Venezuela, and Peru (canto 11), an oceanic voyage around Cape Horn to Argentina, thence back to the Andes (canto 12), and finally Maranhão, Brazil (canto 13). Sousândrade’s attempt to capture, to evaluate and to compile into one gigantic poetic work the contemporary reality of three continents in the third quarter of the 19th century failed to achieve a wide reading public due to its deviance from normative Romantic patterns. Only seventy-five years later would it be “rediscovered” by analysts of Brazilian Modernism and Concretism and proclaimed to be a truly revolutionary work of literature.

Two other smaller poetic works by Sousândrade correspond more closely to the typical Romantic paradigm, though both are set in decasyllabic blank verse. These are Harpas selvagens, 1857 [Savage Harps], his first published collection, and Novo Éden, 1893 [New Eden], composed in homage to the Brazilian Republic (declared in 1889) by this ardent Republican. In both volumes, the influence of classical Greek literature and mythology is apparent, and the poetic phrase possesses an elegance and “liquid” flow not present in the Guesa errante.

MARY L.DANIEL

Biography

Born Joaquim de Sousa Andrade in São Luís, state of Maranhão, Brazil in 1833. Studied literature and mining engineering at the Sorbonne, Paris. Travelled widely throughout Latin America, Europe and the United States. Visited England where he attacked Queen Victoria in the press; left hurriedly and returned home where it is said that he sold the bricks of his house to stay alive. Lived in New York City where he published the first volume of his Obras poéticas (1874). Returned to town of Maranhão and taught Greek at a secondary school. Died in poverty and neglect at his home, the ironically named Quinta da Vitória, in 1902.
Selected Works

_Harpas selvagens_, Rio de Janeiro: Laemmert, 1857
_Novo Éden_, Maranhão: João d’Aguiar Almeida, 1893

Compilations and Anthologies
_Poesia_, Rio de Janeiro: AGIR, 1966
_Sousândrade: ineditos_, edited by Frederick G. Williams and Jomar Moraes, São Luís, Maranhão: Departamento de Cultura do Estado, 1970
_Sousândrade: prosa_, edited by Frederick G. Williams and Jomar Moraes, São Luís, Maranhão: Edições Sioge, 1978

Further Reading

Campos, Augusto and Haroldo de, _Re/Visão de Sousândrade_, São Paulo: Edições Invenção, 1964
[Includes critical texts, an anthology, glossary and bibliography]
Williams, Frederick G., _Sousândrade: vida e obra_, São Luís, Maranhão: Edições Sioge, 1976

Alfonsina Storni 1892–1938

Argentine poet

Alfonsina Storni was born in Switzerland in 1892, her parents, of Italian-Swiss origin moved back to Argentina when she was four years old and her father, an alcoholic, died in 1906. She never married, and in the struggle to support herself and her son, born in 1912, she took on a number of jobs, but concentrated when she could on teaching, journalism and poetry. She is well-known as a Latin American woman poet, but the irony that undercuts the romantic voice in her work has not been widely appreciated; it may stem from her lack of the financial or educational advantages commonly found in women who succeed in a male-dominated literary world. These difficulties perhaps accentuated her tendency to view sexual relationships with the critical as well as romantic gaze revealed in her recurrently ironical portrayal of masculinity and in the conversational poems to her mother, “Bien pudiera ser” [It May Be] and “Palabras a mi madre” [To My Mother].

Her work can be divided into three stages; the first, from _La inquietud del rosal_, 1916 [The Rosetree’s Fears], to _Ocre_, 1925 [Ochre], displays a Romantic heritage mixed with modernista influences. In the second, Storni did not publish poetry, but wrote conference papers, articles and plays, including the unsuccessful _El amo del mundo_, 1927 [Master of the World]. She made two trips to Europe and met members of the Spanish avant-garde. The influence of the Generation of 1927, particularly of Gerardo Diego and Federico García Lorca, can be seen in the return to verse which marks the third and final stage of her work. Mundo de siete pozos [World of Seven Wells] was published in 1934 and Mascarilla y trébol [Death Mask and Clover], posthumously in 1938. Storni had been treated for breast cancer in 1935, and three years later, to avoid further surgical intervention, she drowned herself off the coast at Mar del Plata on 25 October.

Storni came to regret the Romanticism of La inquietud del rosal and would have chosen to exclude it from subsequent anthologies. One poem, however, “La loba” [She-Wolf] is worth noting as an introduction to a recurrent theme in her work—alienation, after the birth of her illegitimate son, from the traditionally passive feminine role; the she-wolf, or outcast, confronts, but does not threaten, the vulnerable flock who have remained dependent on their male shepherd.

In 1918, El dulce daño [Sweet Pain], traces an erotic interlude, playing with the clichés of romantic love in “Transfusión” [Transfusion] but culminating in the rejection of the lover in “Viaje finido” [Journey’s End]. A new development then begins with “Tú me quieres blanca” [You Love Me White], which has been widely appreciated for its charming and witty dismantling of the poetic imagery of romantic love. In Irremediablemente, 1919 [Incurably], two opposing sections mark a dichotomy of passion which describes the contradictions of the female role, the first controlled and humble, the second overlaid with bitterness and anger. The harmonious visions of “Paz” [Peace], “Tarde fresca” [Cool Afternoon], “Miedo divino” [Divine Fear] and of traditional sex roles in “El hombre sereno” [Serene Man] are offset by poems such as “Hombre pequeñito” [Little Man] which mocks the male lover and the tradition of the carcel de amor (prison of love). Poems written to a mute interlocutor explore a pain often related to the subordinate female position. In “Bien pudiera ser” [It Might Well Be], she deals, in passionate and violent imagery, with women’s inherited legacy of silence, which can be challenged or disrupted through writing.

Her reputation was made in 1920 by the award of the “Primer Premio Municipal” of Buenos Aires to Languidez [Languor]. Death is a recurrent motif and subtle variations in the sense of human impotence are revealed in “Carta lírica a otra mujer” [Lyrical Letter to Another Woman] and “Borrada” [Erased]. Ocre (1925), the final collection in this first stage of her work, shows Storni’s increasing maturity. Often in sonnet form, it continues her exploration of the relationship between the sexes. Love may be a death-force, men, in “Olvido” [Oblivion], are unattainable and cold, and the ideal lover is a dream, “El engaño” [Delusion] which enslaves women to the romantic fantasies of the poem “Inútil soy” [I Am Worthless]. But this collection is also lightened by an ironic glimpse of the sex roles in poems such as “Divertidas estancias a Don Juan” [Comic Lines to Don Juan], “El tímido amante” [Timid Lover] and the light-hearted “Epitafio a mi tumba” [Epitaph on My Grave] which shows a mature, if disenchanted, love of life.

Storni spent three years with a travelling theatre company and sang in bars, although her unwillingness to admit to the latter shows her fear of compromising her social position. She also taught in drama academies and wrote a number of farces and successful plays for children. El amo del mundo was a failure, despite her bid to appeal to a wider audience by changing the original title, Dos mujeres (Two Women) to “Master of the World.” It ridicules the moral double standards of men, while showing how they too are victims of the sexual stereotyping that confines women.

After a break of almost ten years and two journeys to Europe, Storni returned to poetry. The last two collections show a new sense of personal freedom, revealed in a
A more dispassionate view of the external world. Mundo de siete pozos is influenced by a Spanish avant-garde movement, ultraísmo, and tends to abandon the theme of love to concentrate on visual detail. Many critics have pointed out the relationship between the prevalence of sea imagery in her work and her chosen death, and here “Yo en el fondo del mar” [At the Bottom of the Sea], and “Luna de marzo sobre el mar” [March Moon over the Sea] are not so much romantic projections as impressionistic visions of an external world. However, a number of poems, such as “Canción de la mujer astuta” [The Smart Woman’s Song], return with apparent inevitability to the “biological binding” of the female voice.

Mascarilla y trébol contains fifty-two unrhymed sonnets. Storni considered them her most successful work. She describes how they were written rapidly, in a trance-like state, overshadowed by the encroaching threat of death. The mask of the title has been interpreted as a death mask and the clover as the grass growing over graves; the recurrent themes are of disintegration, regeneration and salvation through writing. It opens with the powerful and disturbing “A Eros” [To Eros] which marks a reassessment and rejection of the romanticism of the earlier work. The disenchanted voice dissects her sadistic god of love and throws him back, now a useless collection of rags, into the waves. “Regreso a mis pájaros” [Return to My Birds] and “Ya estoy de nuevo” [I Am Back] explore return and reparation, and “El sueño” [The Dream], is no longer a romantic fantasy, but a disturbing prelude to death.

It is not the fear of death but the acceptance of its release which prevails, and the measured tone and gentle irony of the poem “Voy a dormir” [I Am Going to Sleep] might stand as an epitaph to Storni’s life and work. This calm leave-taking concludes in an aside, dismissing that silent male other who has dominated the work, since the poet has at last been released from the self-consciously female body that has confined both her life and her writing.

Jo EVANS

Biography

Born in Sala Capriasca, a small village in an Italian canton of Switzerland, 29 May 1892. Family had emigrated earlier to Argentina and returned in 1896, settling in the city of San Juan. Family lost their fortune in the national slump of 1903. Joined José Tallavi’s theatre company in 1907 and toured Argentina for a year. Obtained primary school teacher’s diploma in 1910; started teaching in Rosario, a city in the interior, 1911. Illegitimate son, Alejandro Alfonso, born in 1912. Moved to Buenos Aires in same year. Accepted in time by intellectual community and made friends with fellow-writer Horacio Quiroga. Earned her living through a wide range of jobs including as a drug store cashier and journalist. Held several teaching posts including one at the Labardén Children’s Theatre. Awarded the Buenos Aires Municipal Prize in 1920, for Languidez. Underwent surgery for cancer of the breast in 1935 and drowned herself on 25 October 1938 owing to a recurrence of cancer.
Selected Works

Poetry
La inquietud del rosal, Buenos Aires: La Facultad, 1916
El dulce daño, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Editorial Limitada, 1918
Irremediablemente, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Editorial Limitada, 1919
Lenguidez, Buenos Aires: Sociedad Cooperativa Editorial Limitada, 1920
Poesías, Buenos Aires: Ediciones Selectas América, 1923
Ocre, Buenos Aires: Babel, 1925
Poemas de amor, Buenos Aires: Nosotros, 1926 [prose poems]
Mundo de siete pozos, Buenos Aires: Tor, 1934
Mascarilla y trébol. Círculos imantados, Buenos Aires: El Ateneo, 1938

Plays
El amo del mundo, in Bambalinas, Buenos Aires, vol. 9/470 (16 April 1927)
Dos farsas pirotécnicas, Buenos Aires: Cooperativa Editorial Buenos Aires, 1932

Compilations and Anthologies
Teatro infantil, Buenos Aires: Ramón J.Roggero, 1950
Obra poética completa, Buenos Aires: Meridión, 1964

Translations

Further Reading
Andreola, Carlos Alberto, Alfonso Storni: inédita, Buenos Aires: Cabant, 1974
Gómez Paz, Julieta, Leyendo a Alfonso Storni, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1966
Nalé Roxlo, Conrado and Mabel Mármol, Genio y figura de Alfonso Storni, Buenos Aires: Eudeba, 1964
Phillips, Rachel, Alfonso Storni: from Poetess to Poet, London: Támesis, 1975
Rojas, Margarita, et al., Las poetas del buen humor, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1991
Surrealism

There is no doubt that Surrealism was the most influential of the inter-war avant-garde movements in Europe. The first Surrealist manifesto of 1924, written by André Breton, and signed by a group of poets and painters, grew out of the nihilism of the Parisian Dada movement in the aftermath of World War I. Against this Dada despair, Surrealism’s Utopian programme was based on Freud’s recent discoveries of the unconscious, dreamwork, libido and repression, and a Rimbaudian revolutionary call to change life. Surrealism’s leader, the poet André Breton, based all his theoretical writings on the subversive notions of automatic writing (anybody could be a poet; inspiration comes after writing as quickly as possible and not changing what emerges), and objective chance (a sudden encounter between desire and empiric reality that reveals the true or sur-reality). Both tenets suggest that the ego (common sense, rationality, the social self) had to be bypassed in order to find real inspiration, and integration with life. The aim was to catch “the real functioning of thought.” At the level of writing Breton defined Surrealist poetics as “les mots font l’amour” (words make love) with the sense that an authentic language lay waiting in the unconscious to be revealed on paper and release the poet from the snare of contradictions and inauthenticity which entraps everybody.

Behind this revolutionary call to break into a more fulfilling reality (super-reality), there was also a Surrealist group politics which had an in-group of creative individuals continuously defining themselves against their enemies (the bourgeoisie). This group energy manifested itself in games, shock tactics, manifestos, magazines, rallies, etc. In this sense Breton was seen as a tyrannical “pope” excommunicating dissidents (like Antonin Artaud) while defending the purity of his Surrealist territory. The history of Surrealism as defined by Maurice Nadeau is a narrative of this in-group’s activities. This version is concerned with French poets, mainly located in Paris. The cosmopolitan nature of the Surrealist group was made up by the painters, not limited by language, with many coming from Spain (Dalí, Domínguez, etc.) and Latin America (Matta, Lam, etc.).

From the 1924 Surrealist manifesto to Breton’s death in 1966 only a few Latin American writers actively participated in this inner circle of Parisian writers, and only because they either changed their language to French, as did the Peruvian poet César Moro who later brought his Surrealist poetics to Mexico with the International Surrealist Exhibition in 1940, and then Peru, or were immediately translated in the Surrealist magazines as was the Mexican poet Octavio Paz, a brilliant expositor of Breton’s thought (see Jason Wilson, 1979). The French language, as much as literary or political or ethical factors, kept most Latin Americans on the fringes of the main, everchanging Surrealist group lead by Breton. If Surrealism is defined along Bretonian lines, then the movement did not involve Latin American culture. But this orthodox Bretonian view is not the real story of Surrealism. For many Latin American writers Surrealism offered an exciting theory of the imagination, and a poetics that promised plenty. As something in the air Surrealism is crucial in evaluating Latin American culture from the 1930s to the 1970s. The main difference between Parisian orthodoxy and how Latin Americans adopted Surrealism is that for the latter, Surrealism was mainly an individual’s response, not a group’s, and that it remained literary rather than a praxis altering action, and defining a political stance. Many Latin American writers picked out bits and pieces of the Surrealist adventure as a personal response to the problematices of writing and being a good writer. A good example is the way the Mexican poet Xavier Villaurrutia, associated with the Contemporáneos group, developed Surrealist insights without ever calling himself a Surreal. However, there were attempts in Latin America to found Surrealist cells. In Argentina the poet and critic Aldo Pellegrini claimed to have launched the first Surrealist magazine as early as 1928, but it was not until the Peronist 1960s that a group of poets and painters, gathered round the magazine A Partir de Cero [Starting from Zero] edited by Enrique Molina from 1952 to 1956, could be said to have any literary importance. There was also a group in Chile lead by Braulio Arenas associated with the magazine La Mandrágora (1938–1943). These nuclei of mimetic Surrealist activities have been studied and anthologised by Stefan Baciu. Surrealism had a further function in Latin American poetry in that many writers defined themselves against Surrealism’s baroque facilities where automatic writing led to a rhetorical abuse of dark tropes. The list of those who reacted against Surrealism constitutes one of the main strands of the Latin American poetic tradition and includes the César Vallejo of the late 1920s onwards, the Neruda of the late 1930s on, Ernesto Cardenal, Nicanor Parra and the later politicised testimonial poets from Juan Gelman to Roque Dalton. From the distance of Latin America, Surrealism’s free rein to sloppy writing, divorced from Breton’s acute poetics, was perceived negatively as another aspect of slavish European imitation. Although André Breton denounced the prose of fictional realism, Surrealism had a surprisingly liberating effect on Latin American narrative. First there were writers who participated in the café-life of Paris on the fringes of the Surrealist activities like Miguel Ángel Asturias, Ernesto Sábat and Alejo Carpentier who adapted elements of the Surrealist adventure in their fiction. Austurias explored the otherness of the Mayan mind derived from Surrealism’s fascination with anthropology; Sábat explored the catacombs of the mind, and evil, following his friendship with Oscar Domínguez; Carpentier developed his theory of Latin America’s uniqueness—“lo real maravilloso” (the marvellous in the real)—from the Surrealism’s evaluation of le merveilleux in everyday life. Julio Cortázar is possibly the closest of the Boom writers to the Surrealist spirit in his novel Rayuela, 1963 (Hopscotch), grounded in chance play and erotics, and linked to a Surrealist tradition of dissidence that includes Rimbaud, Jarry, Artaud and Crevel. Surrealism in this general sense spread to Latin America so completely that a proper grasp of Latin American culture from the 1930s to the 1970s cannot be had without recourse to Surrealist poetics. If Surrealism is defined in a narrow Parisian way then its only great exponent in Latin America is Octavio Paz. But if it is conceived as in the air, then Surrealism helped form the continent’s main writers of the time, especially in opposition to the dogmatic and exclusive Bretonian orthodoxy, and would include key works by Huidobro, Neruda, Parra, Vallejo, Asturias, Fuentes, Sábato, Cortázar, Donoso and others.

See also entries on César Moro, Paris

Further Reading

Baciu, Stefan, Antología de la poesía surrealista latinoamericana, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1974

—— Surrealismo latinoamericano: preguntas y respuestas, Valparaiso, Chile: Universidad de Valparaiso, 1979

José Juan Tablada 1871–1945

Mexican prose writer, poet, art critic and literary translator

It has been said that to understand a man, one must understand his times. This expression is very appropriate for anyone truly interested in the work of José Juan Tablada, a writer who witnessed both the rise and fall of the Porfirio Díaz regime. Like many of the writers who lived through the belle époque and the Mexican Revolution, Tablada was influenced both positively and negatively by the political and cultural circumstances of his lifetime. Porfirio Díaz’s subsidization of the press, his modernization of Mexico, and his interest in 19th-century French culture and thought should not be overlooked, therefore, when one tries to explain the often contradictory nature of Tablada’s work. It should not come as a surprise, then, that at one point in his career Tablada is capable of writing epic poetry linking Porfirio Díaz to Juárez and a number of other illustrious warrior-saviors—Cuauhtémoc, Morelos, Hidalgo, Zaragosa—and is also able to blast Madero in his theatrical comedy Madero-Chantecler, tragi-comedia zoológico política [Madero-Chantecler: a Tragi-comedy of the Political Zoo], accusing Madero of being both a drunkard and a megalomaniac. While at another point, in his journalistic pieces, Tablada can turn around and wield a justifiable blow against US imperialism and the cultural trade offs that were being made in Mexico. Although critics have traditionally excused Tablada’s “excesses” and overlooked the merit of his prose work, even for instance, his art criticism (Tablada’s articles in International Studio, Survey Graphic and Shadowland open our eyes to the work of painters like Diego Rivera), most will agree that Tablada achieved significant success in his poetry by experimenting with modernista language and by maintaining an iconoclast posture. This poetry itself is also permeated by the same intellectual and cultural environment of his generation, and an appreciation of its true originality can only be made when one begins to understand and link Tablada’s work with his period.

Tablada’s decadentista period, the work he produced in conjunction with his participation in La Revista Moderna, 1898–1904 [The Modern Magazine], reflects the spirit that had led him early in his career to seek rehabilitation from a morphine addiction (1897). From the beginning of his poetic career, Tablada had immersed himself in the romantic rebellious spirit of French poets like: Baudelaire, Jean Moréas, Pierre Louÿs, Victor Hugo, José María Heredia and Théodore de Banville. Not only had Tablada translated the work of these and other French authors, but he resolutely believed that their poetic sense of rebellion should be reaffirmed, relived and rewritten from within Mexico.
Through decadentismo, Tablada sought to define a darker side of Modernismo; he wanted to transform the exotic “escapes” that characterized Rubén Darío’s poetry. Like his friend and collaborator Leopoldo Lugones, Tablada developed a vocabulary of exotic images that were more “sinfully” erotic. He aimed to dethrone Venus and he constantly reached for that supersensitive state of poetry which would allow him to “cut through life’s cruelty.” One consequence of Tablada’s pursuit is an increased emphasis on the metaphor in poetic construction and a heightened familiarity with French poetry, something one can find in the work of contemporary poets like Octavio Paz.

The first edition of El florilegio [The Floral Wreath] contains most of Tablada’s decadestista work. Three poems from this book are worth mentioning, because they help establish his iconoclastic use of metaphor and his particular interest in erotic exoticism. In the love poem, “Onix” [Onyx], Tablada juxtaposes a sad poet-lover with the symbolic embodiment of both a priest and a warrior-lover. Like the priest the poet-lover awaits a coming—a metaphor for the dark and obscure epoch of squashed passions. He pleads to be cleansed, to burn again in the fires of real pure love (exemplified by the priest), or be reduced to ashes. In “Laos Deu,” Tablada recounts a poet’s journey from darkness to light, from one side of faithfulness to the other—a journey of purification. Rescued from the darkness of his dreams filled with succubi, the awareness of having lived like a night owl, and the sensation of having crawled like an insect, the poet recalls the “dark mass” of his past. The poet himself still “bleeds from his penitence” and still seems intoxicated by the pleasures of the other world. In “Misa Negra” (Black Mass), Tablada expresses a poet’s wish to set aside the fiery words of previous poets in order to express more appropriately his love for a woman. Unlike other poets, the poet of “Misa Negra” prefers a poetic vocabulary that includes the smell of prayer (reverent incense of desire), the chapel (the woman’s skirt as an altar), and penitence itself (the refuge and consolation that a woman’s body provides). These three poems share not only Tablada’s awareness that ancient religions evolved from and revolved around sexual experience, but they also share the same striking opposition: erotic versus religious poetry. This union of opposites had to have been a very ironic slap-in-the-face for Mexican moralists who condoned both the Díaz regime’s institutionalized control of prostitution and promoted chaste Catholic weddings. What is more important in terms of Tablada’s work, is the new and exotic poetic territory that was formed, something that reminds one of Baudelaire’s “ugly beauty.”

This same type of dynamic opposition and Tablada’s interest in love continue to motivate the poet in the poems that he later would add to El florilegio before its second printing. Tablada reveals the same exotic eroticism in poems like “En el viejo parque” [In the Old Park]. In this case, Tablada expresses the desire that a poet should be free to release Pan from his prison of unfulfilled emotions, to lead him through every Ovidian pleasure, and to protect him from the perils of such a trip. Throughout the new edition of El florilegio, Tablada seeks to demonstrate that the exotic places of “poetry past” have already been realized in the modern world and what remains for a modern poet is to invent new exotic places. For instance, instead of writing about Japan itself, a poet should reach beyond the obvious exoticism of this foreign land. In “Noche de opium,” Tablada chooses to depict a saddened, moonstruck and beautiful Japanese princess who has decided to escape her lovesickness via an opium-induced dream.
In In the Sun and Under the Moon Tablada begins to demonstrate the brevity and conciseness that will characterize most of his later poetry. The dense vocabulary and complexity of verses in El florilegio will be exchanged for brevity both in sequence and pattern. As Tablada states in Un día...poemas sintéticos [One Da...Synthetic Poems], contemporary man needs contemporary poetry, something straightforward and ironic. This change in style, however, did not dampen Tablada’s experimental and iconoclastic nature, nor diminish the importance of his interest in French culture.

Although many poets and critics recognize Tablada’s influence over his contemporaries, especially his experimentation with haiku, few realize that many of the poems of Li-Po y otros poemas ideográficos [Li Po and Other Ideographic Poems], his most renown book of haiku, are actually translations of English translations of the original Chinese poet’s work. The true originality of Tablada’s work lies in his selection of Li Po’s poetry (Li Po is one of the most outstanding Chinese poets, particularly in terms of Romantic poetry) and the graphic manner in which Tablada transcribes his translations (The poem, “Un pájaro que trina” [A Trilling Bird], for instance, is in itself a drawing of a bird singing.). Like the French writers Judith Goncourt and Pierre Loti, who first incorporated Chinese and Japanese culture into their writing, Tablada found inspiration in the ideographic nature of the oriental text. “Día nublado” [Cloudy Day], for instance, is a poem written to be read from left to right and “Impresión de La Habana” [Impression of Havana] reads like a hypermedia text. One looks at the graphic icon of a window formed by four sentences and then reads the sentences to discover the poet’s impressions as he looks from within the window to that beyond.

Of course, not all of Tablada’s poetry is transgressive, nor should it all be linked to his early interests in French culture. In Un día... poemas sintéticos and in El jarro de flores [A Flower Vase] Tablada reverts back to his youth and his interest in nature, entomology, botany, etc. In these books of haiku, Tablada records his impressions of plants, animals and wildlife—something more consistent with the poetry of his Japanese poet and friend Asataro Okada. This same nostalgic interest in the world that surrounds him also allows Tablada to rediscover Mexico, as he returns from exile. (During the Mexican Revolution, Tablada was forced to live in Paris). In the book of poems, La feria [The Fair], Tablada continued to write this more simple and nostalgic poetry. In this book he celebrates not only the small fish-shaped soap bar of his youth, but in poems like “El figón” [The Diner] he depicts his country by recourse to stock cultural symbols; the ajonjoli (sesame seed), the nopal, the chili and the Aztec.

As Tablada approached maturity, his poetry became selfreflexive as he relived through his writing the experiences and memories of his youth. Intersecciones [Intersections] and his prose work La feria de la vida [Life’s Fair] best represent this last period of work. Again, Tablada can wander from his youthful infatuation with a prostitute named Anoñica to a perceptive criticism of journalism as it was produced at the turn of the century. Nevertheless, this more mature poetry cannot escape the influence of the belle époque nor the Modernity that the Diaz regime forced upon Mexico. Tablada’s ironic and quick wit produce in this case barbed appraisals of Mexico’s history and culture, instead of the exotic metaphors of Tablada’s decadentista poetry.

Indeed, one finds it difficult to appraise Tablada’s poetic accomplishment without first considering the cultural matrix from which it sprang. This matrix has a way of changing the order of one’s appreciation of Tablada’s experimentation. By beginning to understand the belle époque and the Mexican Revolution, one begins to define more clearly the directions of Tablada’s iconoclasm. Tablada’s poetics enabled him to fuse the European and Oriental poetic traditions with Mexican literary tradition and to generate an interest within Latin America as a whole for poetry with more graphic and metaphoric reduction, amplification, and purity. In a sense Tablada’s poetry as well as his other writing has been overlooked.

WILLIAM P. KEETH

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 3 April 1871. During his youth, he lived with his family, which included five sisters, in an upper-class neighborhood in Tacubaya. Received primary and secondary education essentially in French; attended the private school, Institución Kathain and later the Colegio de Grosso. Forced by his parents to enter the Colegio Militar (military academy) in the Chapultepec Castle. After abandoning military school, worked as an accountant for the Central Railway, where his writing talents were discovered. A friend in the accounting department arranged an interview for him with Rafael Reyes Spíndola, editor of El Universal. As Tablada’s career as a journalist matured, he contributed poetry and articles to numerous publications including: La Patria Ilustrada (1888), El Universal (1889–94), El Partido Liberal (1890), El Siglo XIX (1892–1893), El País (1893), Revista Azul (1894), Diario del Hogar (1894–1903), El Mundo (1896), Revista de Revistas (1896), La Revista Moderna (1898–1904) and El Mundo Ilustrado (1902–1904). Married Justo Sierra Méndez’s niece, Evangelina Sierra (later divorced). early stages of the Mexican Revolution as a result of his political writings. Forced into exile and lived in Texas and then New York. Married Nina Cabrera in 1918. Returned to Mexico, briefly.
Editor of Mexican Art and Life, New York. Travelled to Mexico in 1936, once more returned to New York. Published extensively on art and politics and translated many French, Portuguese and Japanese texts into Spanish. Died of a heart attack in New York City, 2 August 1945.

Selected Works

Poetry
El florilegio (poemas) 1891–1897, Mexico City: Tipografía de Ignacio Escalante, 1899
Al sol y bajo la luna, Paris: Librería de la viuda de Charles Bouret, 1918
Un día...poemas sintéticos, Caracas: Imprenta Bolívar, 1919
Li-Po y otros poemas ideográficos, Caracas: Imprenta Bolívar, 1920
La feria (poemas mexicanos), New York: Mayans Impresor, 1928

Novel
La resurrección de los ídolos, Mexico City: El Universal Ilustrado, 1924

Play
Madero-Chantecler, tragi-comedia zoológico política de rigurosa actualidad en tres actos y en verso, Mexico City: Compañía Aserradora de Maderos, 1910
Other Writings

Tiros al blanco (actualidades políticas), Mexico City: n.p., 1909

La defensa social/Historia de la campaña de la División del Norte, Mexico City: Imprimería del Gobierno Federal, 1913

Los días y las noches de París, Paris: Librería de la viuda de Charles Bouret, 1918

En el país del sol, New York: Appleton, 1919

Historia del arte en México, Mexico City: Compañía Nacional Editora “Aguilas,” 1927

La feria de la vida (memorias), Mexico City: Botas, 1937

Del humorismo a la carcajada, Mexico City: Editorial Mexicana, 1944

Compilations and Anthologies

Los mejores poemas, edited by Hector Valdés, with a prologue by José María González de Mendoza; Mexico City: UNAM, 1971

Obras, edited by Hector Valdés, 2 vols, Mexico City: UNAM, 1971–81 [Contains poetry, political satire, articles on Paris]

Sátira política, edited by Jorge Ruedas de la Serna and Esperanza Lara Velázquez, Mexico City: UNAM, 1981

Further Reading

Baciu, Stefan, Antología de la poesía surrealista latinoamericana, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1974 [Among the precursors are José Juan Tablada and the Peruvian poet José María Eguren]

Los cuatro poetas; Gutiérrez Nájera, Urbina, Icaza, Tablada, with a preliminary note by Antonio Acevedo Escobedo, Mexico City: Ediciones de la Secretaría de Educación Pública, 1944

García de Aldridge, Adriana, “Las fuentes chinas de José Juan Tablada,” Bulletin of Hispanic Studies, vol. 60/2 (1983)

Hernández Palacios, Esther, “‘Misa Negra’ o el sacrilegio inacabado del modernismo,” La Palabra y el Hombre 77 (1991)

Lara Velázquez, Esperanza, La iniciación poética de José Juan Tablada, Mexico City: UNAM, 1988

Mariscal Acosta, Áminda, La poesía de José Juan Tablada, Mexico City: Impresora Económica, 1949

Mendieta Alatorre, Ángeles, Tablada y la gran época de la transformación cultural, Mexico City: Secretaría de Educación Pública, 1966

Paz, Octavio, “Estela de José Juan Tablada,” in Las peras del olmo, Mexico City: Editorial Universitaria, 1957

Néstor Taboada Terán 1929–

Bolivian prose writer

Néstor Taboada Terán might be described as a constructive iconoclast: he has always been prepared to defy the stifling orthodoxy which he sees as a great malaise in Bolivia. He has likened this approach to breaking windows: however, his is a literature of provocation rather than of vandalism, and the value of his work has been recognised with several literary prizes in Bolivia and Argentina.

Taboada’s non-conformist nature was evident by his early twenties, and by the beginning of the 1970s he had already been under scrutiny by a succession of military governments, most notably that of Hugo Banzer who ordered his arrest in 1972. Taboada was exiled to Argentina after six months’ solitary confinement, and spent around eight years as an exile in Buenos Aires.

Taboada’s political convictions had an early influence both on the style and the subject matter of his work: his first novel El precio del estaño, 1960 [The Price of Tin] was criticised for its doctrinaire view of class struggle typical of the Bolivian mining novel, but broke with the genre in its rehabilitation of the tin baron Simon Patiño—hitherto a figure of revulsion due as much to his mixed blood, according to Taboada, as to any abuse of workers. This kind of false demonisation, whether on racial, dynastic or political grounds, has always been among the targets of his fiction.

Marxist affiliations allowed the young Taboada to travel, which resulted in writing such as Cuba, paloma de vuelo popular, 1964 [Cuba, Dove of Popular Flight], Chile con el corazón a la izquierda, 1971 [Chile with Its Heart on the Left], and the anthology Ecuador en el cuento, 1976 [Ecuador in Its Stories]. This list evinces a clear identification with Latin American rather than simply Bolivian problems; the latter are aired in novels which relate national to continental realities. This is the case with his second novel, El signo escalonado, 1975 [The Stepped Symbol]: the title refers to indigenous motifs as well as the Nazi swastika’s appearance during the 1930s, when the novel is set. The novel presents an unusual approach to the Chaco War (see the entry on Bolivia), considering its causes rather than its outcome.

It is generally thought that Taboada’s best novel is Manchay Puytu, el amor que quiso ocultar Dios [Manchay Puytu, the Love that God Sought to Hide], published in Argentina in 1977. This is based on a tale, dating from colonial times and based in the then silver-boom city of Potosi, which is used as a symbolic melting-pot. Indeed, miscegenation in ethnic and cultural terms is central to the novel and its underlying project: a vision of a multicultural Bolivia which has resolved its internal and external problems. Indigenous storytelling and European Enlightenment ideas vie with the reactionary nature of Spanish isolationism, typified by the Inquisition, as an Indian priest attempts to resolve the dilemma inherent in his situation. Padre Antonio is indigenous but serves foreign masters. This makes him a pariah, a condition well understood by the author during this period of persecution.

Several collections of short stories show a similar concern with the question of mestizaje, or cultural integration. The best-known of these, Indios en rebelión, 1968 [Rebelling Indians], deals with the indigenous population’s problems in coping with newfound responsibilities and liberties after the 1952 Revolution.

Taboada’s earlier revolutionary tendencies have been modified to a general anti-imperialist commitment evident in recent work such as Requerimiento al rey de España, 1992, [Requirement made of the King of Spain] which, in describing a visit to the Andes by Pope John Paul II, turns the discourse of colonialist enterprise on its head. The three most recent novels confirm his self-description as a historian writing fiction. Manchay Puytu is in fact the first in a trilogy of Andean historical novels. It is followed by Angelina Yupanki, marquesa de la conquista, 1992. [Angelina Yupanki, Marchioness of the conquest] which takes a historical figure from the conquest as a bridge between Indian and Spanish worlds comparable to La Malinche in Mexico. Ollantay, la guerra de los dioses, 1994 [Ollantay, War of the Gods], which reworks a Quechualanguage drama depicting Inca history, is the third. Taboada’s latest project depicts an imaginary relationship between Queen Victoria and Mariano Melgarejo, a 19th-century Bolivian president generally seen as a colourful tyrant. This era, according to legend, saw the British monarch erase Bolivia from the map. Taboada, who has been heavily criticised for addressing such material, seeks to identify and satirise the conditions which gave rise to the myth. This, and the rehabilitation of Melgarejo contained in the novel, make the work typical of the most respected living writer (and most feared polemicist) in Bolivia.

Taboada has not been concerned solely with breaking images: he has been a revisionist, addressing again points already covered by previous generations of writers. He has taken themes from Bolivian history and regenerated them and has also written historical works, such as La revolución degollada [The Throttled Revolution] and Colombia, both published in 1974. This aspect of his work shows a preoccupation with forging a new identity not only for his own country but for Latin America as a whole. It is a question of acknowledging what is already there; Taboada was born in La Paz in 1929, and consequently belongs to a generation which spent its childhood in the shadow of the Chaco War of 1932–35. This conflict broke the mould of Bolivian political life, and created the atmosphere of discontent which was to result in the 1952 Revolution. As for many of his contemporaries, it meant personal loss: when Taboada was three years old, his father died in the Chaco. As José Ortega has stated, the war also created a new challenge for the Bolivian writer: “La preocupación del novelista boliviano…desde el despertar social que trajo la Guerra del Chaco es—y continúa siendo—la eradicación de las estructuras socio-político-económicas de origen tradicional y oligárquico con el fin de realizar la progresiva incorporación del indio a la comunidad boliviana.” (The Bolivian novelist’s concern, as from the social awakening provoked by the Chaco War, is—and continues to be—the eradication of the socio-economic and political structures of traditional and oligarchic origin, so as to reinsert the Indian, bit by bit, into the Bolivian community).

As a response to this challenge, Taboada Terán has attempted to synthesise the political and historical processes of his country in a literature which makes use of microcosm, a continual movement outward from within: “Mi objetivo como escritor del País Secreto fue siempre llegar a la literatura desde adentro para obtener carta de legitimidad, si se quiere poderes sobrenaturales para decidir el destino de mis personajes.” (My objective as a writer from the Secret Country has always been to reach literature from inside so as to achieve legitimacy; if you will, so as to obtain supernatural powers to determine the destiny of my characters).

This has entailed speculation, too, on the destiny of his country. In this he has to take into account Bolivia’s ethnic diversity. Taboada is a mestizo born in La Paz. His mother, however, is from Cochabamba. This gives him a dual heritage, since the two cities have different indigenous languages, Aymara and Quechua respectively. With these languages as well as Spanish, Taboada is well-equipped to understand and observe the most populous areas of Bolivia. The geographical span of his writing does not, however, extend to the eastern and northern lowlands, which include the important city of Santa Cruz. Taboada has been criticised for this omission of the largest part of Bolivian territory. However, La Paz and Cochabamba constitute the main axis around which the country’s political and economic life has developed until recently.

Knowledge of two Indian languages has meant access to a wealth of indigenous stories and beliefs, which have been much used in Taboada’s fiction. His mother was influential in this, and an important source of material: “Mi madre fue una importante cultora de la literatura oral. En mi niñez escuché de sus labios varios relatos y uno de ellos fue la leyenda del Manchay Puytu. Cuarenta años después la llevaría a la novela.” (My mother was an important practitioner of oral literature. In my childhood I heard her tell many stories and one of them was the legend of Manchay Puytu. Forty years later I would transfer it to my novel).

Taboada’s work is notoriously difficult to categorise, since it embraces a gamut of other disciplines, including history and ethnography. His main preoccupations are with the re-examination of Bolivian reality through key moments in the country’s history, and he has described himself as a historian who works in fiction.

Among the autobiographical traits to be found in Taboada’s novels is the condition of exile which accompanies a passion for travel. Many of his characters are travellers, and all the novels feature protagonists who are deeply influenced by some form of journey. The love of travel appears to be the paternal contribution to his character; his father is described as “Andariego como gitano, sastre de obra fina, raza blanca y apellidos de prosapia chuquisaqueña” (As much of a wanderer as a gypsy, a fine tailor, a white man of Chuquisaca ancestry).

Taboada’s work can be seen as inheriting something of the tradition of Andean polemical literature unique to that region and reflecting as much white pro-indianist opinion as indigenist grievances themselves. His career aim is to give the fullest possible picture of Bolivian reality: “Tengo el ambicioso plan de llegar a una decena de novelas de corte testimonial sobre mi País Secreto” (My ambition plan is to write a dozen testimonial novels about my Secret Country). This term “país secreto” is used to convey Bolivia’s isolation from the world at large and, because of its inaccessibility, provides an accurate image despite the country’s long history of exploitation by British and US interests.

KEITH J. RICHARDS

Biography

Born in La Paz, Bolivia in 1929. Grew up with a knowledge of Quechua and Aymara languages, which has given him access to a storehouse of Indian stories and beliefs. Father died at the beginning of the Chaco War (1931–35). Involved in revolutionary Marxist politics and thus under suspicion by the authorities. Imprisoned in 1972; spent six months in solitary confinement. Settled in Argentina with his family. Returned to Bolivia alone after eight years. Cultural director in universities of Oruro and Cochabamba. Founder and editor of the journals Cultura Boliviana and Letras Bolivianas. Regular contributor to the Jesuit-run newspaper, Presencia, La Paz. Recipient of several national literary awards and, in 1978, the Faja de Honor (Sash of Honor) of the Argentine Writers’ Association for Manchay Puytu.
Selected Works

Short Fiction
Claroscuro, La Paz: Editorial e Imprenta Artística, 1948
Germen, La Paz: Editorial e Imprenta Artística, 1950
Mientras se oficia el escarnio, La Paz: Colección Popular, 1968
Indios en rebelión: hechos de la revolución boliviana, La Paz and Cochabamba: Editorial Los Amigos del Libro, 1968
El tinku de laimes y jucumanis, Santiago de Chile: Colección “Ahora,” 1970
Sweet and Sexy, Cochabamba: Cuadernos de Vientos Nuevos, 1977

Novels
El precio del estaño: una tragedia boliviana, La Paz: Librería Juventud, 1960
El signo escalonado, Buenos Aires: Ediciones del Sol, 1975
Manchay Puytu, el amor que quiso ocultar Dios, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1977
Angelina Yupanki, marquesa de la conquista, Barcelona: Apóstrofe, 1992
Ollantay, la guerra de los dioses, Buenos Aires: Quetzal, 1994

Other Writings
Cuba, paloma de vuelo popular (crónica de viaje), Oruro, Bolivia: Editorial Universitaria, 1964
Chile con el corazón a la izquierda, Oruro, Bolivia: Editorial Universitaria, 1971
Colombia: Jorge Eliecer Gaitán, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de América Latina, 1974
La revolución degollada, Buenos Aires: Centro Editor de América Latina, 1974
Bolivia en el cuento: antología de ayer y de hoy, Buenos Aires: Convergencia, 1976
Los frutos del árbol de la libertad, Cochabamba, Bolivia: Instituto de Formación y Capacitación, 1983
La difícil aurora, Cochabamba, Bolivia: Instituto de Formación y Capacitación, 1984

Further Reading
Taboada Terán, Néstor (editor), Oficio del coraje, Cochabamba, Bolivia: Editorial Los Amigos del Libro, 1981

Lygia Fagundes Telles 1923–
Brazilian prose writer
Lygia Fagundes Telles rose to prominence as a woman writer in Brazil, a country in which previously unquestioned truths, and the very possibility of truth, become problematic. This is an axiom which applies to the state of flux at all levels of social interaction, be it within the discourses of gender, race or class, or in the realm of the individual psyche. For these reasons, fragmentation, instability and change are of the essence in her writing, as is the case also with some of her contemporaries: Clarice Lispector, Carlos Drummond de Andrade and Rachel de Queiroz, to name but a few.

Of the many aspects one might choose to highlight in her prose fiction, the themes of metamorphosis, and of the struggle for power, stand out as constants in both her long and short narratives. They are present in her novels—Ciranda de pedra (The Marble Dance), As meninas (The Girl in the Photograph) - and in her short fiction: Seminário dos ratos (Tigrela and Other Stories), Antes do baile verde. Metamorphosis is seen here as a phenomenon to be considered not only in its natural forms (the life changes between birth and death) but also (and more pertinently in a consideration of this author’s work) in its “unnatural” or fantastic dimensions, usually in the context of a variety of power struggles. It is unnatural metamorphosis, of a fantastic or fairy-tale kind, that Fagundes Telles most often deploys as her central trope to produce an effect of horror in most of her writing, above all in her short stories.

But change, whether feared or desired—or both, as is often the case throughout this author’s work—can also become synonymous with revolution. Social revolution foreseen here as coming about usually through violent upheaval, lies at the heart of the deceptively fantastic universe created by Fagundes Telles. Attempts at radical change frequently originate in the margins, and target the corruption and obsolescence seen to be inherent in the status quo. This applies equally to realist plots and to those more easily classifiable as works of magical realism. The process of metamorphosis is always insinuated in a variety of power struggles which, however fantastically disguised, derive from the clear concerns of everyday reality. Although, as already indicated, sometimes the change feared is simply that associated with the natural life cycles, more often the process of change involves a tension: between the unchanged self and the threatening transforming Other; between the unchanged self and a threatening changing world; or between the uncontrollably changing self and the environment inducing that involuntary change in the disempowered self.

These changes always point implicitly or explicitly to a political undercurrent of issues of class and gender. Elsewhere, these are endorsed by the author’s occasional statements supporting social justice and women’s rights. An unequal distribution of wealth, class divisions, poverty and sexual inequality, are key preoccupations in a body of narrative fiction clearly concerned with the need for positive change in a country and in a period perceived as transitional.

However, a perceived need is not always underpinned by a belief in the likelihood of its fulfilment. The intellectual heritage of Fagundes Telles can be traced back to such precursors of pessimism as Machado de Assis, whose work she invokes in her own literary production. In the foreground is the panorama of a 20th-century Brazil, torn by political dissent and unstable regimes, which eliminates the possibility of radical change and leads to the presentation of a more sombre vision of metamorphosis-as-decay. Works such as As meninas or Seminário dos ratos provide a glimpse into a world of Realpolitik in which change signifies destruction.

Of the various recurring themes previously highlighted, sexual politics and the gender power struggle inform Fagundes Telles’s writing more insistently even than class or national politics. It is in this context that the potentially violent implications of the trope of metamorphosis are most fully explored. The author offers a vision of a patriarchal society in which women are largely disempowered. She creates female characters who turn themselves from victims into aggressors. The nature of this transformation, traceable back as far as Ciranda de pedra (1954), reappears throughout her work, in short stories such as “Confissão de Leontina” Leontina’s Confession and “Herbarium” Herbarium, each of which witnesses a disempowered young girl transformed through a hard experience of abuse (or disabuse of former beliefs), into a metaphorical or actual monster, castrater or destroyer of the male Other. The male figures are representative of oppressive patriarchal forces ultimately undone by the vengeful impulse of the rebellious female.

Metamorphosis, whether with or without the magical, fantastic, or horror elements, becomes the nihilistic response to disillusion at both individual and collective levels. In a universe of fictions in which hope of attaining a better world is inevitably disappointed, metamorphosis is the means whereby Fagundes Telles’s characters overcome near-destruction. They are newly self-invented she-devils engaged in punitive missions, which often culminate in “triumphant” murder “sem remorso, quer mesmo?” (without remorse, would you believe it?) Anger, and the refusal to offer facile, happy endings, are the characteristics that situate Lygia Fagundes Telles in an already vast corpus of women’s writing. Its trademark is a gaze defined by the “hunger, rebellion and rage” typical of earlier 19th-century gothic and near-gothic writing, as a response to social circumstances too little changed at the beginning of the 20th century.

MARIA MANUEL LISBOA

Biography

Selected Works

Short Fiction

Praia viva, São Paulo: Martins, 1944

O cacto vermelho, Rio de Janeiro: Mérito, 1949

Histórias do desencontro, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1958

A confissão de Leontina, Sá de Bandeira, Brazil: Angola, 1964
Lygia Fagundes Telles was a prominent Brazilian writer whose work is known for its intricate narrative structures and its exploration of fantastical and surreal elements. Her novels and short stories often delve into themes of family dynamics, love, and the supernatural. Here are some key titles by Lygia Fagundes Telles:

Books

- 10 contos escolhidos, Brasília: Horizonte, 1984

Novels

Compilations and Anthologies

- Seleta, edited by Nelly Novaes Coelho, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1971
- Os melhores contos, edited by Eduardo Portella, São Paulo: Global, 1984

Further Reading

Very little has been written specifically on Lygia Fagundes Telles. The works by Eliade and by Todorov listed below are general studies on the fantastic, an important aspect of her work.

- Coronado, Guillermo de la Cruz, “O ódio caímico em Lygia e Unamuno,” in Letras de Hoje, Pôrto Alegre, Brazil: PUCRS (11), 1973
- ——A ficção intertextual de Lygia Fagundes Telles, Goiânia: Cegraf/UFG, 1992
Testimonial Writing

During the 1960s, Latin America was going through a period of massive social change and upheaval. The Cuban Revolution of 1959 brought new vigor to a sclerotic Marxism with its youthful recklessness, and it appeared poised to harness the ferment to effect radical change overnight. The Revolution sought for a suitable literary genre that would best express those times of renewal, passion and expectation. In this respect, the novel failed miserably (the plight of Carpentier in producing the announced “novel of the revolution” was symptomatic). Something more agile was needed; poetry alone was not enough. A testimony of things to come was called for. In 1970 this genre was anointed by the new prize instituted by the Cuban Casa de las Américas. The splendors and the misery of the testimonio, its pretense and inner contradictions as well as its recent extinction, could not be understood without this umbilical cord to the Revolution.

This new testimonial writing emerges as a hybrid enterprise carving its space out of documentary writing, autobiographical report, eye-witness literature, the literature of resistance and protest, and the New Testament. Strangely enough, the sense of an ending and of an impending new era is of paramount importance for the very foundations of this testimony. The embrace of “apocalypse now” separates the testimonio from its closest forerunners: the nonfiction novel (Truman Capote, Norman Mailer), the new journalism, the ethnic cultural narratives (Ricardo Pozas) and the social or anthropological documents on the “culture of poverty” (popularized by Carolina Maria de Jesús and Oscar Lewis).

The foundational value of Miguel Barnet’s Biografía de un cimarrón, 1966 (The Autobiography of a Runaway Slave), needs to be recognized. Barnet manages to accomplish a real tour de force in combining, in the case of a former runaway slave, lo real maravilloso (Carpentier’s “marvelous in the real”) with the appropriate political perspective. The Biografía testifies to the fact that, within the span of one life, Cuba has come from slavery to socialist revolution. The allegorical, figural interpretation (in the sense of Erich Auerbach) of the Cuban Revolution as the climaxing telos of modern Cuban history is thus unmistakably established. Yet the very interest of Barnet’s narrative lies rather in his recovery of a specific Cuban and Caribbean cultural history, and the biography of the former slave is actually cut off at the beginning of this century. The emphasis on cultural anthropology, which turns the narrative into an encyclopedia of cultural history, characterizes some other better-known testimonial works, such as Elena Poniatowska’s Hasta no verte, Jesús mío, 1969 (Until We Meet Again), or Elizabeth Burgos Debray’s Me llamo Rigoberta Menchú, 1983 (I, Rigoberta Menchú). Rigoberta Menchú shares the contradictions of Barnet’s Biografía: both narratives are framed by the apocalyptic fervor of their times, by what appears to be the last gasp of Western Utopian modernity; yet, as narratives, they are interesting through their rescue of a Latin American premodern cultural heritage, something that has become a postmodern task. In Poniatowska, the Utopian moment is also somewhat present, through aspects of the Mexican student movement of 1968, in her collage of testimonial voices and documents in La noche de Tlatelolco, 1971 (Massacre in Mexico).

The new testimonial writing aspired to be the record of living history. Its mission was, more specifically, to challenge “official,” bourgeois history, to fill the voids in the record, to seek the other side of the coin, and generally to empower the voice of the underprivileged and the repressed. The audible voice of the witness-situated testimonial writing vis-à-vis documentary or nonfiction literature at large. Yet the muses assisting at the birth of the genre had stipulated that it should not be just any voice fitting this large category of the under-represented: this voice had to be representative of the ongoing social struggles from the revolutionary (sometimes directly Marxist) point of view. The orthodox theoreticians of the testimonio, Barnet and Margaret Randall, are refreshingly clear about this. Therefore, special witnesses and special biographies were privileged. An “enemy” could still be used, provided that he could testify about the worthiness of the revolutionary cause; thus Abelardo Cuadra’s testimony about Sandino and about the young Fidel Castro, in Hombre del Caribe, 1977 [Man of the Caribbean]. In testimonio the “other” is meant to be “us.”

This overriding clause of partisan “representativity” undercuts the specific mission of testimony. Testimonial writing, thus defined, aimed at a predetermined allegorical and political level of meaning and “usefulness.” The subversive powers of testimony were castrated in the official socialist testimonio. A genre based apparently on a contract with truth and reality produced a stream of exemplary parables of ritual social experience. It is not surprising then to find that the Lacanian imaginary of these allegories thrive on models coming from Stalinist Socialist Realism, invented in the Soviet Union in the 1930s for an analogous purpose. Among the better known testimonies, is Omar Cabezas’s La montaña es algo más que una inmensa estepa verde, 1982. (Fire from the Mountain); yet even this frame-up is humanized by the most convincing description of how corporal functions are negotiated by an urbanite in the jungle.

The problems of testimonio start with the selection and presentation of the protagonists: Rigoberta Menchú, Domitila, or Huillca are all radical left-wing political activists or labor union leaders. Yet they are presented as ordinary people. The subtitles and translations tend to stress this aspect: “an Indian woman in Guatemala,” “a woman of the Bolivian mines,” “a Peruvian peasant speaks.” In the introduction to Biografía de un cimarrón (not included in the English version), Barnet tells how he selected the protagonist for this work. He learned from the Cuban press about two interesting subjects, each over one hundred years old: a black woman—former slave, santera (practitioner of the African cult known as santería), and spiritualist—and a black man, also a former slave, but with no particular interest in cults. The latter had been a runaway and later took part in the Cuban War of Independence. After this he was involved in a brothel brawl aptly described on the back cover of the Spanish edition as “a battle against the North Americans.” Barnet says that he “dismissed the old woman” right away for the figure more representative from his point of view, Esteban Montejo. With this logic, the feisty woman protagonist of Elena Poniatowska’s Hasta no verte, Jesús mío would never make it into such a testimonio. This type of selection process reaches the level of farce in Barnet’s La vida real, 1986 [Real Life]. To write this testimony, Barnet contacted members of the Caribbean old-timers’ Leftist hangout in New York, the Julio Antonio Mella Club, found a Cuban who had immigrated to the US in the early 1950s, never returned to Cuba, yet remained Cuban and a romantic revolutionary in his heart. This “real life” story was meant to paste over the flood of the Cuban refugees from the then recent Mariel and the ever deepening moral crisis of the Revolution. Barnet wrote his well-intentioned allegorical potboiler while living in the US on a Guggenheim fellowship in the early 1980s.

A special problem is posed by the many intellectuals who have given testimony, in their own voice, to the upheavals, dramas, and tragedies of the 1960s to 1980s: the Salvadorean Roque Dalton, in his strangely prophetic autobiographical novel ¡Pobrecito poeta que era yo!, 1976 [What a Dud Poet I Was!]; the Chileans Jorge Edwards, in Persona non grata, 1973 (later editions are less self-censored), and Hernán Valdés, in Tejas Verdes: diario de un campo de concentración, 1974 (Tejas Verdes: a Concentration Camp Diary) the Guatemalan Mario Payeras; the Nicaraguan Omar Cabzas; or the Cubans Carlos Franqui, in Retrato de familia con Fidel, 1981 (Family Portrait with Fidel), Armando Valladares, in Contra toda esperanza, 1985 (Against All Hope) or, in a marginal sense, Reinaldo Arenas in Contra toda esperanza, 1992, (Before Night Falls), among others. All of them have been changed, some crushed, by their experience. Only Dalton, Valdés, Payeras and Cabzas enter the canon, because all are accepted revolutionary intellectuals (or were: Dalton was executed by his comrades in arms allegedly “for treason;” Payeras expressed more critical points of view in his later work). Edwards would not fit in with his Persona non grata, detailing his experience as Allende’s envoy to Cuba, but might come close with his Chilean post-coup non-fiction novels. The Cuban dissidents would have no chance whatsoever in spite of the ample representativity of what they have to say. It would appear that the testimonio and the channels of its propagation not only create and privilege yet another official history, but also help repress inconvenient eye-witness accounts.

There are more problems with the Latin American testimonio, such as the memory and the self-censorship of the interviewee; the invasiveness of the interview-technique, in spite of the pretended self-effacement of the interviewer; and the editing process, producing a narrative from a log of interviews and dialogues. Literarization is only another additional layer mediating between the authentic word, and world, of the Other and the domesticated end-result. Therefore, the difference between testimony and testimonial novel is much less important than the political and allegorical strictures imposed on the genre as constitutive fiction at its official birth.

Although the pre-selected witnesses appear to speak in the first-person, who is actually in control of their words? Who is the author? The legal lability of the situation is exposed in translations which upgrade the characters to “authors” and reclassify the authors of the Spanish originals as “editors,” “collaborators,” or “co-authors.” The author of the biography of a runaway slave becomes the editor of an autobiography supposedly authored by the illiterate Esteban Montejo. The point here is not so much that “characters” and “authors” appear to be reversible legal and literary fictions, but the fact that, while the scruples of the Anglo-Saxon law return to the interviewed parties authority and liability, the witnesses might have lost their authentic voices whatever their personal legal or literary status might be. Not even the Nobel Prize for Peace awarded, in 1992, to the protagonist of Me llamo Rigoberta Menchú can change this situation.

EMIL VOLEK
See also entries on Autobiography, Miguel Barnet, Roque Dalton, Jorge Edwards, Prison Writing

Further Reading

The best introduction to the problems and criticism is Sklodowska’s middle-of-the-road book; many sharper insights have appeared recently in various “second thoughts” on the testimonio. The political-allegorical strictures of the genre are espoused by its orthodox theorists, Barnet and Randall.

——La fuente viva, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1983
——“La novela testimonial: alquimia de la memoria,” Criticarte, Caracas 6 (1987)
Beverley, John, “Through all Things Modern: Second Thoughts on Testimonio,” in his Against Literature, Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993
Randall, Margaret, “¿Qué es, y cómo se hace un testimonio?” Revista de Crítica Literaria Latinoamericana 36 (1992)

Theatre in Latin America

Theatre in Brazil from 1822

A key conflict has shaped the existence of the theatre in Brazil from its inception to the present—an attraction to, and repulsion of national elements in both its written and performed versions. The many gestures toward popular culture and the equally forceful movement away from it have taken diverse forms and guises throughout the history of the dramatic arts in Brazil. Examples of this conflict are found from the outset, in the theatre of Father José de Anchieta (1534–97), which presents an almost schizophrenic split between the outdoor staging of simple, direct works performed mostly in Tupi for the native masses who were to be converted to Catholicism, and the writing of elaborate Latin pieces to be performed indoors for the students and teachers at the Jesuit colègios.
The conflict reappears in full force at the very inception of Romanticism in the theatre of Brazil, in the figures of Domingos José Gonçalves de Magalhães (1811–82), João Caetano dos Santos (1808–63), and Luís Carlos Martins Pena (1815–48). Magalhães and João Caetano are usually credited with starting Brazil’s Romantic theatre, their vastly different life experiences notwithstanding, when Caetano staged and performed the title role in Magalhães’s Antônio José ou o poeta e a inquisição [António José, or the Poet and the Inquisition], which opened in 1838, a truly remarkable year in the history of Brazilian theatre, as it also witnessed the premiere (also staged by João Caetano’s company) of Brazil’s first comédia de costumes (comedy of manners), O juiz de paz da roça (A Rural Justice of the Peace), a key development in the trend favoring the national element in Brazilian theatre. The play launched at the peak of his artistic power the career of Martins Pena, Brazil’s most accomplished creator of comedies of manners, and the nation’s first author to write solely for the theatre.

Romanticism in Brazil is often characterized as a struggle between the need for the arts to reflect the nation’s defining elements and the continued strong pull of European influences. The basic conflict recurs in the theatrical careers of poet Antônio Gonçalves Dias (1823–64) and novelist José de Alencar (1829–77), both ultimately unable to harmonize the two currents in their dramatic endeavors, although the latter’s attempts at abolitionist theatre (as in Mãe [Mother], premiered 1860) include elements of a more popular theatre. Nor did other 19th-century manifestations such as thesis plays and teatro de casaca (or “tailcoat plays,” as Realist theatre was known in Brazil), succeed in resolving the conflict, although its leading practitioners, Joaquim Manuel de Macedo (1820–82) and José Joaquim da França Júnior (1838–90), did for the most part succeed in presenting a convincing picture of national identity, as in Macedo’s O primo da Califórnia ([The Cousin from California], premiered 1855) and França Júnior’s Como se fazia um deputado ([How Representatives Were Elected], premiered 1882).

While it is essentially true that the extended influence and enormous popularity of such long drawn out 19th-century forms as the comedy of manners and its offshoot, the revue or teatro de revista (whose best-known practitioner is the prolific Artur Azevedo, 1855–1908, author of the beloved A capital federal [The Nation’s Capital], premiered 1897), deferred by several decades the coming of modernity to the stages of Brazil, it must be made clear that it was precisely those practitioners of the light theatre who kept alive the national element in the first two or three decades of this century.

Although two generations of theatre critics perpetuated the wrong notion that Brazilian Modernism generally ignored the theatre, recent studies have demonstrated that a number of the artists associated with the movement had a strong interest in the theatre and did in fact participate in the theatrical scene of their day, whether writing plays, organizing theatre groups, designing and painting sets, or directing productions. While the theatre of Oswald de Andrade (1890–1954) has deserved intense critical scrutiny since the revolutionary staging of his O rei da vela ([The Candle Baron], published 1937) by Teatro Oficina in 1967, the contributions of other Modernists—such as Eugênia and Álvaro Moreyra, Renato Viana, Flávio de Carvalho, Antônio de Alcântara Machado and Mário de Andrade, all profoundly aware of the need to enlist the theatre in their struggle for the expression of a national identity in Brazilian art—remain largely unexplored.

Modernismo’s strong nationalist streak and anti-elitist, people-oriented rhetoric paved the way for the regionalist trend that pervaded the Brazilian theatre in the 1950s and 1960s. Championed by authors such as Jorge Andrade (1922–84), Alfredo Dias Gomes (b. 1922), Ariano Suassuna (b. 1927), João Cabral de Melo Neto (b. 1920), Hermilo Borba Filho (1917–76), Rachel de Queiroz (b. 1910), and others—all members of an elite (intellectual, economic, often both) who felt the urgency to integrate the several pairs of opposing facets (national/imported, popular/elitist, traditional/avant-garde, etc)—Regionalist theatre (or, at least, its most representative works) succeeded on the thematic level while failing to take significant risks with regard to form and/or staging. Among the most successful of these plays are revisited forms with a new, social message, be it autos (such as Suassuna’s Auto da compadecida [The Rogue’s Trial], premiered 1956, and Cabral de Melo Neto’s Morte e vida severina [Death and Life of a Common Man], premiered 1965) or tragedies (such as Dias Gomes’s O pagador de promessas (Payment as Promised) and Jorge Andrade’s Pedreira das almas [Quarry of Souls], both of which were first produced in 1960).

Such formal risks were mostly the domain of innovative theatre groups that had begun to appear in the 1940s. The ongoing conflict between the two tendencies under consideration is well illustrated by a comparison between such popular-oriented groups as Teatro de Arena de São Paulo or Recife’s Teatro Popular do Nordeste, and on the other hand, the clearly elitist Teatro Brasileiro de Comédia (TBC) and the smaller companies it spawned, or were formed upon its demise. A related issue is the role of foreign producers (such as Franco Zampari) and directors (Adolfo Celi, Luciano Salce, Ruggero Jacobbi, Gianni Ratto, Maurice Vaneau, Eugênio Kusnet and especially, Zbigniew Ziembinsky) in shaping modern Brazilian theatre. The towering figure of Ziembinsky (1908–78)—who did eventually join the TBC but is more readily associated with the Rio de Janeiro-based group, Os Comediantes, which he directed in 1943 in the ground-breaking staging of Nelson Rodrigues’s Vestido de noiva (The Wedding Dress) that is generally seen as the beginning of Brazil’s modern theatre—provides the student of the ample conflicts that inform the theatre of Brazil with yet another facet of such paradoxes and antagonisms. Here we have a foreign-born and foreign-trained director and actor revolutionizing the Brazilian theatre by introducing to its stages long-overdue contributions from Expressionism, Jungian psychology, dramatic representations of myth, innovative uses of sound, lighting and stage division -but doing so upon the solid textual structure provided by Nelson Rodrigues’s vision and artistry.

Equally important and closely related to these fundamental oppositions are the cases of Black theatre groups (such as the Teatro Experimental do Negro, directed by Abdias do Nascimento (b. 1914)) and student theatre groups (the theatre arm of CPC-UNE, and several university ensembles), both with profound political implications for their contemporaries of the 1940s, 1950s, and early 1960s, as well as for their followers and students in subsequent decades.

During the military regime of 1964–85, especially in the late 1960s and early 1970s, the period when repression was most intense, the equation assumes a new feature, as the popular element—as appropriated by members of the intellectual elite -is identified with those who were actively resisting the dictatorship. This is most obvious in plays such as Se correr o bicho pega, se ficar o bicho come ([If You Run the Beast Will Catch You, if You Don’t It Will Eat You] first performed in 1966) and other works by Oduvaldo Viana Filho (Vianinha; 1936–74). The musical element takes center stage in productions of groups such as Opinião and in the historical plays of Arena, Arena conta Zumbi ([Arena Tells the Story of Zumbi, premiered 1965) and Arena conta Tiradentes ([Arena Tells the Story of Tiradentes] premiered 1967), both co-authored by the group’s co-directors, Augusto Boal (b. 1931) and Gianfrancesco Guarnieri (b. 1934). Music is also central to another historical allegory of the resistance theatre of the 1960s and 1970s, Chico Buarque (b. 1944) and Ruy Guerra’s Calabar, o elogio da traição [Calabar, in Praise of Treason], published in 1973 but banned from the stage until 1979). Elements of the Absurd tradition are also incorporated into the Brazilian theatre of protest, as is evident in such plays as Leilah Assunção’s Fala baixo senão eu grito [Speak Softly or I’ll Scream], premiered in 1969 and Roberto Athayde’s Apareceu a Margarida (Miss Margarida’s Way), premiered in 1973, as well as in the discovery and productions of the heretofore never-staged plays of the 19th-century genius, Joaquim José de Campos Leão (Qorpo-Santo, 1829–83). A number of plays of the period and of subsequent years as well, depict the experiences of those whom the oppressor has determined to be “marginal:” the unemployed or underemployed, prostitutes, pimps, thieves, drug addicts, street children, homosexuals. Foremost among playwrights of this line is Plínio Marcos (b. 1935), the author of two of the most important plays of the period, Dois perdidos numa noite suja, 1966 [Two Lost in a Filthy Night] and Navalha na carne, 1967 [Razor in the Flesh], Following the gradual abolition of censorship and the return to a more democratic regime in the late 1970s and early 1980s, previously banned plays could finally be staged, foremost among them Vianinha’s Rasga coração, 1979 [Heart Rending] and João Ribeiro Chaves Neto’s Patética, 1980 [Pathétique].

The 1980s and first half of the 1990s saw a number of trends and developments: the preeminence of the stage director, or encenador, with Antunes Filho (b. 1929), Gerald Thomas (b. 1954), Bia Lessa (b. 1958) and Geraldo Villella (b. 1960) as the most salient names; a shift away from political commitment and social protest, and toward a more intense interest in examining the individual experience, often returning to childhood and adolescence in search of answers and solace, traits eminently noticeable in the plays of Naum Alves de Souza and Maria Adelaide Amaral (both born in 1942,); the widely accepted recognition of Nelson Rodrigues as the most important playwright in the history of Brazilian theatre, made possible by a series of stagings of Nelson’s plays done by Antunes and Grupo Macunaima in the early and mid-1980s (Nelson Rodrigues: o eterno retorno [Nelson Rodrigues: the Eternal Return] and Nelson 2 Rodrigues); stage adaptations of texts from other genres or of plays from other periods and/or theatre traditions (for example, Pessoal do Victor’s dramatic version of Marcelo Rubens Paiva’s autobiography, Feliz ano velho [Happy Old Year] in 1983; Augusto Matraga, Macunaima’s 1986 stage rendition of the last short story in Guimarães Rosa’s Sagarana [1946]; Ornitorrinco’s stagings of Molière’s Le Malade imaginaire and Shakespeare’s A Midsummer Night’s Dream in 1989–1991; and Bia Lessa’s 1994 version of Robert Musil’s novel O homem sem qualidades [Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften; The Man without Qualities]); the emergence of the inimitable work of Denise Stoklos (b. 1950), whose approach shares a good deal with performance art and can be traced to the most essential aspects of the theatre, hence Stoklos’s characterization of her art as Teatro Essencial; and finally, the continued success of major international theatre festivals in São Paulo, Belo Horizonte, Curitiba and Londrina.

Even the briefest of introductions to Brazilian theatre must take into account the longstanding opposition between a theatre centered (geographically as well as intellectually) on the Rio de Janeiro-São Paulo area, and the theatre located in other, traditionally “peripherical” states (regionalist theatre’s gestures and advances notwithstanding). The passage of time and the enormous penetration of television have not fundamentally changed such state of affairs, with the most prestigious groups, such as present-day Grupo Macunaima (directed by Antunes Filho), Teatro do Ornitorrinco (directed by Cacá Rosset), Companhia da Opera Seca (directed by Gerald Thomas), Boi Voador (directed by Ulysses Cruz), and Uzyna Uzona (directed by José Celso Martínez Correa, former leader of Grupo Oficina), all located in São Paulo. A related issue is, whether these groups are indeed the most outstanding ones, or are they the groups that happen to be singled out by most critics, who in turn, happen to be based in the Rio de Janeiro-São Paulo area. This state of affairs excludes (or at least, marginalizes) a number of prominent groups located in other parts of the country, as for example, Londrina’s Grupo Delta, Pórtio Alegre’s Cem Modos and Tear, Belo Horizonte’s Galpão and Giramundo, and Acre’s Poronga. Worthy of special attention, as a successful reconciler of a number of these oppositions and antagonisms, is Grupo União e Olho Vivo, led by a veteran of the struggle for popular theatre in Brazil, César Vieira (Edibal Almeida Piveta, b. 1931).

Although not known for cradling theorists of the theatre, Brazil has produced at least one major name—Augusto Boal. In spite of a penchant for controversy and his many years away from Brazil, Boal has written seminal theoretical pieces—Teatro do oprimido e outras poéticas políticas, 1974 (Theater of the Oppressed); Técnicas latinoamericanas de teatro popular, 1975—that continue to be of central importance to the issues addressed above. Other names worthy of note are either more traditional critics (Décio de Almeida Prado, Sábato Magaldi and Yan Michalski) or younger, university-trained critics who have been active in more recent years, such as Edélcio Mostaço, Mariângela Alves de Lima and Alberto Guzik.

A consideration of the split between popular theatre and bourgeois theatre in the theatre of Brazil should include authoritarianism and the role of the State, in various forms and degrees of intervention, be it through the Serviço Nacional de Teatro (or any of the other names the organ has had through the years), through subsidies (for building theatres and other spaces; for tickets to Projeto Mambembão and others), awards, overt or indirect censorship, the closing down of theatres, the arrest and torture of actors and directors, and so forth. The issue of authoritarianism, so deeply interwoven with Brazilian culture and politics, also encompasses the composition of a theatrical canon. Diverse as its shapers have been throughout its history, the canon or body of works chosen to typify the theatre of Brazil is remarkable for its consistent exclusion of large groups that ought to have been represented but were marginalized by virtue of their slight economic and political strengths, which in turn, must be explained by the repression they have been subjected to since colonial times.

Finally, a word about representation: italicizing the verb in the previous paragraph is deliberate. Normally a rather loaded term, “representation” takes on additional urgency in theatre criticism. Issues of race, class, gender and sexual orientation acquire additional relevance when we deal with the performing arts. In the context of dependency (whether economic, political, cultural, etc), “representation” begs to be more carefully thought out. In the case of the theatre of Brazil, one point that must be questioned is who is or has been representing whom, and on what grounds. The legitimation or denunciation of the canon that has resulted from such representations must be the ultimate goal of any serious study of the history of the theatre in Brazil.

SEVERINO J. ALBUQUERQUE

Theatre in Colombia, Cuba, Mexico and Peru

Colombia

In 19th-century Colombia, the earliest expressions of this genre include the politically focused, neoclassically inspired plays of José Fernández Madrid (1788–1830) and Luis Vargas Tejada (1802–29). These dramatists were concerned not so much with the plight of the downtrodden, as with disseminating an image of the native American as a “noble savage.” By these means they sought to press their case for an end to colonial rule. Such plays were undramatic and didactic in nature, yet they skillfully exploited the view of the Spaniards as colonial oppressors and the Catholic Church as their handmaiden.

The two most important initiators of Colombia’s modern theatre are Antonio Álvarez Lleras (1892–1956) and Luis Enrique Osorio (1896–1966). Influenced by Ibsen and the Spanish playwright Jacinto Benavente, Álvarez Lleras produced realistic thesis dramas, aimed at social reform, while Osorio wrote plays of more direct social protest influenced by dramatists such as Shaw, Pirandello and O’Neill. It was not until the contemporary period that the more popularly oriented theatre began to flourish. In particular, the work done by the Nuevo Teatro and its drama theorist, Enrique Buenaventura, helped to create a more socially engaged theatre which utilized dance, song and satire. Despite inevitable differences in stylistic and thematic concerns, Colombian popular theatre shares with Spanish Golden Age tragedy the notion, expounded by Lope de Vega, for example, of enseñar entreteniendo, that is, both to entertain and to teach a moral and often, a political lesson that could easily be grasped by the audience. It was during these formative years of the late 1960s that the Colombian theatre began the violent and dogmatic process of breaking away from a dependent cultural tradition. This was essential in order to create a thematics and stylistics that could represent not only the continent, but the cultural and political specificity of Colombia. The flavor of this experimental theatrical movement is most clearly displayed within the context of festivals and workshops (talleres), theatre collectives, university groups and the popular theatre movement.

The role of Enrique Buenaventura, Santiago García and Carlos José Reyes in developing the New Popular Theatre is significant, since each dramatist not only contributed to Colombia’s national dramaturgy and to restructuring its means of production, but each one also helped to lay the basis for Latin American dramatic theory. Enrique Buenaventura, a leading playwright in Colombia, and one of Latin America’s best directors and theoreticians, pioneered this new theatrical form in the 1950s. He brought to this task first-hand knowledge of three of the most dynamic exponents of Brechtian theatre: the Berliner Ensemble, Giorgio Strehler’s Piccolo Teatro di Milano, and Jean Vilar’s T.N.P., in France. By democratizing both the production and consumption of Colombian drama through the incorporation of oral tradition and popular culture in their dramatic and performance texts, Enrique Buenaventura in Cali (Teatro Experimental de Cali or TEC) and Santiago García in Bogotá (La Candelaria), have been able to combine social commitment with artistic integrity. Colombian dramatists experiment continuously with dramatic form, accepting European as well as Latin American dramatic trends while seeking an original expression capable of communicating their unique regional reality. The undeclared civil war known as la Violencia (The Violence) that plagued Colombia between 1948 and 1965, is the subject of Buenaventura’s one-act plays collected in Papeles del infierno, 1968 [Documents from Hell]. The same period is explored in García’s Guadalupe, años sin cuenta, 1975 [Guadalupe, Uncounted Years], a collective production based on exhaustive historical research of primarily by means of oral history.

Carlos José Reyes is also concerned with la Violencia and its sociopolitical consequences in such plays as Bandidos [Bandits] or Farsa de una guerra de nunca acabar, 1962 [Farce about a Never-ending War] and Soldados, 1967 [Soldiers] each of which contains sketches of the brutality of la Violencia both among the common people and within the armed forces.

Collective creation in Colombian theatre underscores the contemporary dramatists’ need to create in accordance with the needs of their time and people. The in-depth research undertaken among the people for themes and forms of dramatic expression which, ultimately to emerge from them; the involvement of the public, actors and dramatists in the creative process from the preliminary research into the subject matter through the final staging of the play; and the elaborate reworkings of previous texts based on public feedback. This theory of drama seeks to assist in bringing about basic structural changes in Colombian society, and it leaves behind both regional tradition and the writing culture that was the exclusive domain of a ruling elite.

Cuba

The use of theatre for political ends is a constant in the trajectory of Cuban drama from colonial times to the end of the 20th century. However, a different kind of theatre began around 1936, one which espoused a cosmopolitan conception of art directed to a minority audience. The socially-oriented dramatists writing at the same time tended strongly toward a simplistic propaganda theatre with a direct sociopolitical message rather than an open-ended, consciousness-raising dénouement.

From the late 19th century until roughly 1930, the politically expressive sainete (farce), the local variant of the Spanish género chico (consisting of short comedies and operettas) was the dominant fare for theatre-goers in Havana. Such works depicted urban slums within the context of a series of confrontations or melodramatic scenes played by character types speaking (or singing) in urban discourse with a musical background. Even as crude commercial theatre, these sainetes served as vehicles for expressions of political resentment.

In the early 1960s José Triana (see separate entry) and Antón Arrufat revitalized the tragic form and combined strong political content, dramatic metaphor and creative theatrical structures to produce an internationally recognized theatre. Triana’s Medea en el espejo, 1960 [Medea in the Mirror], Parque de la fraternidad, 1962 [Fraternity Park], La muerte del ñeque, 1963 [The Death of Enterprise] and La noche de los asesinos, 1965
(The Criminals), and Arrufat’s Los siete contra Tebas [The Seven Against Thebes] as metaphoric commentaries on Cuban society, led to major political and artistic polemics within Cuba. Whether the plays were intended to be counterrevolutionary by their authors or not, they were interpreted as such, and this was a critical factor leading to a tightening of censorship and an increasing sovietization of literature. Another dramatist who suffered in this period was Virgilio Piñera (see separate entry), by far the most outstanding Cuban playwright of the 20th century, and one who had a considerable impact on Arrufat.

The formation of contemporary Cuban theatre owes much also to the work and influence of popular theatrical groups and the proliferation of festivals (the first of these took place in Havana in 1961), specialized journals, and the emergence of a number of organizations dedicated to stimulating theatrical production and research. Cuba’s Teatro Cueva, founded as early as the 1930s, sought to reach the populace with experimental pieces which did not conform to the narrow demands of commercial theatre (the aforementioned sainete), but attempted rather to produce a national theatre concerned with the broader issues of socioeconomic conditions in a broad spectrum of Latin American countries. It is due to such a broad-based vision combined with the desire for experimentation of form that the theatre of sociopolitical overtones of such dramatists as Triana and Arrufat was given fertile ground in which to develop. A further expression of independent theatre’s desire to reach the populace, rather than to be confined to major urban centers, was the surge of theatre collectives in the 1960s, such as the Teatro Escambray, a sociodidactic theatre with a focus on the immediacy of both clarifying and resolving a current social problem. Founded in 1968 by Sergio Corrieri, the Grupo Teatro Escambray calls on the public to act as an assembly of commentators at the close of each theatrical piece, much in the manner of the Brazilian Augusto Boal’s forum theatre. An open discussion among all parties—audience members and theatre practitioners—is used as a means of resolving conflict and bringing about immediate change. Indeed, in tandem with its sociopolitical goals, the Castro regime sought to elevate the cultural experience of the Cuban people through theatre and promoted the shift of theatrical activity from the capital to the provinces by traveling Brígadas del Teatro (Teatrova, Teatro La Yaya, Teatro de Acero, among others).

Cuban revolutionary theatre uses drama as a vehicle for doctrinal principles and the exaltation of “patriotic” denunciation, public confession of errors, and the absolute dedication to production. This socialized form of Cuban theatre is known as the Teatro Nuevo (the New Theatre). It focuses on the return of Cuban theatre to the people through some form of collective creation and the staging of particular issues or problems of immediate interest or concern to the communities within which these drama companies work. In more recent years, however, with the waning of enthusiasm for collective theatre for both historical and political reasons, there has been something of a resurgence of an author-centered theatre, the psychological portrayal of individualized characters, and the predominance of written texts over collectively debated performance-texts with multiple versions. And in these plays there is a re-examination of identity, the Cuban living in his country and the exiled Cuban, generational conflicts, and a more unbiased self-introspection of the country and its people. As a step out of the domain of collective creations, Alberto Pedro Torrientes’s Week-end en Bahia examines the conflicts that emerge between the Cuban who has remained in his native land and the self-exiled Cuban who has chosen to emigrate to the United States. Although an authorial bias is present in this dramatic piece, respect for both political choices is maintained in Torrientes’s work. With the institutionalization of the Cuban Revolution completely integrated into the sociopolitical and economic fabric of Cuban society and its longevity assured, at least until the death of Fidel Castro, there is currently a mandate from the public to develop alternate modes of theatrical expression in order to demonstrate diverse perspectives rather than to re-enforce a single point of view. Emerging artists in Cuba articulated a new set of expectations: that they be allowed to make theatre for themselves without government intervention or influence. This has resulted in Havana’s reorganization of its cultural policy since 1989 and, just as Lezama Lima is a cult figure among young poets, so the absurdist plays of Virgilio Piñera have entered the Cuban canon.

Mexico

Mexican literature, strictly speaking, was born with the Independence movement just after the turn of the 19th century. But Mexican literature, the theatre in particular, is as old as the earliest civilized inhabitants of Meso-America. Historically, theatre in Mexico has been a powerful force for social change from pre-Columbian times, and it has frequently combined religious and political concerns with performance practice to create a style of drama unique to the region. From the earliest contacts between Cortés and the Aztecs through the Spanish-influenced colonial theatre to the politically charged contemporary drama, Mexican theatre has been used as a vehicle of religious conversion and cultural coercion, political propaganda and satire, as well as social denunciation and reform. Early Mexican drama comprised only occasional pieces (productions without dialogue or written in crude language for the purpose of evangelizing the Indians) and secular comedies presented as interludes at religious festivals.

Since its independence from Spain, Mexico has become one of the major theatrical centers in Latin America, giving rise to a number of experimental groups on the popular theatre front, the government-sponsored Instituto Nacional de Bellas Artes (INBA) and its subdivision, the Escuela de Arte Dramático founded in 1947, as well as hosting countless theatre festivals for amateur and avant-garde groups. But the creative spirit of aesthetic and sociopolitical revolution, incorporating such major European trends as existentialism, the theatre of the absurd, and the theatre of cruelty and of ritual did not become the hallmark of Mexican theatre until the mid-20th century. Indeed, one critic, Antonio Magaña Esquivel in his Medio siglo de teatro mexicano [Half a Century of Mexican Theatre], goes as far as to state that prior to 1928, “Mexican theatre could not find its place and aspiring dramatists had nowhere to go.” For their part, Ruth Lamb and Antonio Magaña Esquivel, in their Breve historia del teatro mexicano [Brief History of the Mexican Theatre], note that the early years of the 20th century even saw a decline from previous years. It was apparent that during the 19th century Mexican theatre did not have an artistic or cultural function and popular theatrical representations were often “subliterary” comedies of political satire. However, in the period 1928–43 a new consciousness emerged which led to the establishment of theatrical groups and a renewed interest in so-called serious drama. These groups emphasized trends and techniques of the contemporary European and American stages, bringing Mexican theatre into the mainstream of world drama. The Grupo de los Siete, 1923 (Group of Seven), for example, set Pirandello, Chekhov, O’Neill, and others as their models. Later groups such as Villarrutia’s Grupo de Ulises (1928) and the Teatro Orientación (Orientation Theatre, 1932–34 and 1938–39) also followed European and US trends. And it was from the government-sponsored Teatro de Orientación that several talented dramatists emerged, including the group’s founder Celestino Gorostiza (1904–67) and Xavier Villarrutia (1903–50) who made a considerable contribution to the new Mexican theatre. Under the direction of Salvador Novo (1904–74), the Theatre section of INBA fostered the development of theatre research and production, providing financial support as well as professional stimulation for dramatists, actors, and directors.

The prolific playwright Emilio Carballido (b. 1925) was the outstanding product of the Novo-inspired revival, blending the Mexican circumstance with an appeal that transcended the personal. In spite of the major contributions of such dramatists and, later, that of the documentary theatre of Vicente Leñero, Mexican theatre did not gain popular acceptance and critical viability until the early 1950s. Although Mexican theatre suffered several significant declines in the mid-1920s and the mid-1940s, a new generation of dramatists stimulated theatrical production, first in 1928 and then in 1947, and once again in 1967. It was in the late 1960s that several young writers, still laboring in university talleres or workshops (primarily those of Emilio Carballido), began to write and then to publish and stage plays on university magazines and theatres. At the same time or shortly thereafter, other classes and workshops were organized under the direction of Luisa Josefina Hernández, Hugo Argüelles, Héctor Azar and Vicente Leñero, to name only the most well-known. It was the beginning of a “new generation” of dramatists. The first wave of such plays (1967–73) was, in great part, drama of social protest written from the perspective of a youthful generation and reflective of a generation gap as part of their dramatic conflict. Subsequently, plays showed greater thematic depth and progressively more conscious use of formal elements, becoming also more “popular” in focus. The “Nueva Dramaturgia” series sponsored by the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de Mexico (UNAM) was created exclusively for the young playwrights, producing quality works on a variety of themes, which were staged not only in the capital but also throughout Mexico and even abroad. In contrast to the commercially successful realistic, traditional dramas of social commentary rather than social protest about interpersonal relationships of the 1950s and early 1960s (plays by Luis G. Basurto, Wilberto Cantón, Jorge Ibargüengoitia, Sergio Magaña and Rafael Solana), these new works were more socially conscious and more technically innovative (Emilio Carballido, Luisa Josefina Hernández, Vicente Leñero, Hugo Argüelles, Héctor Azar, Maruxa Vilalta, Carlos Fuentes, Sabina Berman, Tomás Espinosa, Oscar Liera, Victor Hugo Rascón Banda, Oscar Villegas, Jesús González Dávila and Carlos Olmos). Many of these playwrights demonstrate a shift in thematic focus away from the problems of the generation gap and toward an examination of Mexico’s history, culture, folklore and society, the question of what comprises reality, and they include criticism of the power structure.

While in most of Latin America theatre groups and creación colectiva were of some importance during the 1960s and 1970s, Mexico has no groups of comparable stature to Colombia’s La Candelaria and TEC (Teatro Experimental de Cali), Chile’s ICTUS, and Argentina’s Teatro Abierto, since collective theatre has not made any significant inroads into new Mexican drama, perhaps because its theatre companies have experimented rather less with alternative forms of creating and staging plays. In contrast to the pattern of institutional violence, political instability, censorship, and exile prevalent in other Latin American countries, Mexico’s Nueva Dramaturgia movement has responded to relative political stability and the promises that emerged from the Mexican Revolution: a looking toward the past for an understanding of the present. But in consonance with other Latin American countries during the 1960s and 1970s, Mexican theatre was rich in experimental, independent, or fringe theatre groups that performed in the street, in city squares, in schools, on rooftops, or wherever else that was available to them. This marginal theatre included teatro al aire libre (open-air theatre), teatro de la sierra (theatre of the mountains), teatro regional (regional theatre), teatro participativo (participatory theatre), teatro estudiantil (student theatre), el tercer teatro (the third theatre), teatro de la calle or carpas (street or tent theatre) and teatro independiente (independent theatre), all of which played a peripheral role to the dominant theatrical culture.

Contemporary Mexican theatre of the post-1968 era clearly testifies to the distance that Mexican dramatic expression has traveled from its uncertain origins in the pre-Hispanic legacy, in its Spanish colonial heritage, and in its modern independence and revolutionary movements. Authors like Elena Garro and Luisa Josefina Hernández have contributed to the survival of a Mexican theatrical tradition and have helped keep Mexico abreast of recent trends. For example, the development of Hernández as a playwright, coincides closely with the evolution of Mexican drama generally, from psychological realism to theatre of cruelty and impact drama, from farce, comedy, tragicomedy to a theatre of commitment. From La paz ficticia, 1960 [The Fictive Peace] through La historia de un anillo, 1961 [The Story of a Wedding Band] to La fiesta del mulato, 1966 (The Mulatto’s Orgy) and Quetzalcoatl (1968), Luisa Josefina Hernández’s nonrealistic theatre challenges the primacy of form over content as it examines certain incidents in Mexican history that can be made to reveal insights into basic Mexican traits and mentalities.

Peru
Theatrical representation played an important role in lending pomp and ceremony to the religious ritual that sustained the power of the Inca empire. Drama is at the core of official celebrations in which drama, oratory, actors, music and dance came together to provide an allegory of state theology and to communicate the heroic deeds of Inca warriors. When the Incan empire was in decline, another dramatic form arose—the dramatization of comedy, fables and sarcastic poetry—as a means of criticizing both their human enemies and their own gods. Much indigenous literary expression in the form of drama and spectacle was lost, except in isolated rural areas, during the colonial period.

Modern Peruvian theatre began to flourish after World War II. Its resurgence is related to the publication of a trilogy of award-winning plays, Percy Gibson Parra’s Esa luna que empieza, 1946 [That Rising Moon], Juan Ríos’s Don Quijote (1946), and Sebastián Salazar Bondy’s Amor, gran laberinto, 1948 [Love, the Great Labyrinth]. With the founding of the Dirección Nacional de Teatro (National Theatre Office) in 1946, theatrical groups were formed and literary competitions were established with the subsequent production of plays that were universal, psychological and poetic. Since the 1950s Peruvian dramatic production has been dominated by group theatre and university-sponsored theatre. But it is a tribute to Salazar Bondy (see separate entry) that Peruvian theatrical expression moved away from folklore and foreign archetypes. Founder of the Club de Teatro (The Theatre Club) in 1953, Salazar Bondy contributed a series of works dedicated to Peruvian reality later in his life dealing with social marginalization, lack of communication, loss of freedom, and human suffering through Brechtian modes of dramatization in No hay isla feliz, 1954 [There is No Happy Island], El fabricante de deudas, 1964 [The Debt Manufacturer] and El Rabdomante, 1965 [The Diviner]. There are many theatre groups that use Andean perspectives on reality in the form of music, the oral tradition, legend, and myth to highlight present-day social conflict and raise consciousness.

But it was Eugenio Barba’s theatre group, Odin Teatret (Odin Theatre) which is credited with transforming Peruvian theatre with its production at the 1978 Ayacucho theatre competition. This initiated a movement known as El Teatro del Cuerpo (The Theatre of the Body). Thereafter, collective theatre proliferated with Yego Teatro Ensamble, Ayllu (Communal Theatre), Cocolido, Mesa de Teatro, the renowned Cuatrotablas (Four Planks) and Yuyachkani, from which many of the aforementioned groups sprang as splinter groups. Both the highly successful groups of Cuatrotablas and Yuyachkani present a vanguard theatre combined with the 1960s technique of collective theatre’s careful investigation of local realities, placing socioeconomic problems in relief for analysis and the open-ended questioning of participatory audiences, often set within a festival-like atmosphere incorporating song, dance and musical accompaniment as a hallmark of its popular roots. The prolific theatre production within Peru during the 1970s and 1980s, in particular, reflects its overriding commitment since colonial times to capture the essence of Andean traditions and culture and thus establish some semblance of national identity. This is based on the integration of the sierra (highlands) into a national project, the creation of social awareness and cultural identity despite the multicolored, paradoxically static yet mobile environment from which it sprang. In recent years several theatrical organizations have been formed in Peru: Federación Nacional de Teatro Peruano (National Federation of Peruvian Theatre, 1971), Federación Nacional de Teatro Popular del Perú (National Federation of Popular Theatre of Peru, 1972), Teatro Nacional Popular (National Popular Theatre, 1972), Asociación Nacional de Escritores y Artistas (National Association of Writers and Artists, 1983), Centro Peruano de Autores Teatrales (Center for Peruvian Dramatists, 1983) and Movimiento de Teatro Independiente (The Movement for Independent Theatre, 1985), which sponsors the literary journal Colectivo (Confluence) begun in 1987. Due to the existence of such groups, both experimental and popular theatre have been promoted throughout the country, especially at the grassroots level. The New Theatre in Peru initiated in the 1970s and early 1980s presents a diverse array of themes and dramatic approaches ranging from the theatre of the absurd and black humor of the marginalized in urban settings in Juan Rivera Saavedra’s dramas, the plays of social and class conflict in the works of Grégor Díaz and Hernando Cortés, Jorge Acuña’s mime theatre, to Victor Zavala’s popular theatre of national acclaim. Finally, Mario Vargas Llosa adds a more cosmopolitan dimension to his dramas, La señorita de Tacna, 1981 (The Young Lady from Tacna) and Kathie y el hipopótaram, 1983 (Kathy and the Hippopotamus) by cultivating a self-conscious literature that reflects on the author’s creative struggle with his work of art.

ELENA DE COSTA
The Theatre of the Southern Cone—Argentina, Chile and Uruguay

It is the attempt to forge an environment in which theatre could flourish that presents itself as a constant in the history of the theatre of Argentina, Uruguay and Chile, the countries of the Southern Cone. The articulation of this goal can be summarized in three broad categories: the creation of an informed audience through the translation and production of international theatre; the promotion of national authors; the creation of schools where theatre professionals would be formed. These were already present in the aims of the Sociedad del Buen Gusto Teatral (Society for Good Taste in the Theatre), founded in Buenos Aires in 1817, which sought to shake off European influence and to foster national output. This impulse is shared in Chile where the Generation of 1842, through Andrés Bello in particular, was fundamental in actively promoting Romantic theatre. And it is the Romantic, combining love, politics and tragedy, that opens the way for the treatment of national issues in Esteban Echeverría (1805–51), and Luis Ambrosio Morante (1755–1837) in the River Plate, and Salvador Sanfuentes (1817–60) and Eusebio Lillio (1826–1910) in Chile.

An indication of the success of the creation of a theatre environment, despite the instability and dictatorships of the 19th century, is to be found in the vitality of the theatre of the River Plate at the turn of the 20th century. Largely, this is due to the growth of sophisticated audiences: in the Teatro Colón, Buenos Aires could boast one of the most modern theatres in the world, and Montevideo had the impressive Teatro Solís. The audiences knew the best theatre from Europe, and were aware of the latest international theatre, the key dramatists, directors and actors. And although the period is largely characterised by a dependence on and adherence to European drama, the fact that the early years of the 20th century are regarded as something of a Golden Age is testimony to the fact that the foundations for national theatres had been laid.

In Chile it is costumbrismo (sketches of local customs) that follows from Romanticism and becomes the dominant theatrical form. 1858 saw El jefe de familia [The Head of the Household] by Alberto Blest Gana (1830–1920) and La beata [The Pious Woman] by Daniel Barros Grez (1834–1907), both local comedies of manners, and regarded as the first Chilean dramas. El tribunal de honor [The Court of Honour] by Daniel Caldera (1855–96) was based on local scandal, and brought local themes into the theatre. And, developing from costumbrism, the Realist works of Antonio Acevedo Hernández (1886–1962) are linked to the growing workers’ movement. Armando Moock (1894–1936), chronicled the everyday drama of the petite bourgeoisie, tackling problems of modernity and incipient feminism. The culmination of costumbrist drama was, surely, the production in 1928 of La viuda de Apablanza [The Widow of Apablanza] by Germán Luco Cruchaga (1894–1936), a lament for the betrayal of old values.

There is general critical agreement that one of the key moments in the theatre of the River Plate is that of the production by the travelling circus family, the Podestá Brothers of Uruguay, of the gaucho pantomime Juan Moreira (1884). Dramatized from the already popular serialized novel by Eduardo Gutiérrez, Juan Moreira was based on a gaucho forced to deal with a changing social order, in which he feels increasingly marginalized. and victimized. Performed at first as a pantomime, it was scripted in 1886, initiated gaucho drama, and later entered the established theatres of Buenos Aires, where it would inevitably wither. The gaucho drama saw its natural end when Martiniano Leguizamón (1858–1935) in Calandria, 1896 [Songbird] sought to turn the gaucho into a creole, to make him part of the new social order.

It was this new social order that provided the backdrop for Uruguay’s Florencio Sánchez (1875–1910), who has been called Latin America’s first dramatist. His early work proved him to be an acute and accurate observer of local life and customs, as well as a dedicated creator of “dramas de tesis,” plays that developed a specific argument and declaration of point of view, sometimes of a solution. These plays are based largely in the rural areas, constantly evoking a disappearing world, where the old and the new values sit uncomfortably alongside one another, a vision that culminates in the bleak Barranca abajo, 1905 [Downhill Struggle].

The other form that shaped the development of theatre the turn of the century was the Spanish sainete. Commercial in design and popular in appeal, the sainete was largely costumbrist in nature and relied on popular caricatures and social satire. The sainete criollo, reliant on tragicomedy, and using the language of the marginalized communities was a reflection of the lives of recent immigrants, mostly from Italy, who struggled in the miserable conditions of the conventillos, or tenement blocks. If the sainete criollo seemed to look to use the hopeless struggles of the recent immigrants as entertainment, then the grotesco criollo, descended from the Italian grotesque, and which emerged with Armando Discépolo (1884–1936) and Francesco T. Defillipis Novoa (1889–1930), explored their anguished sense of dislocation and disenchantment, the in-capacity to find a way out of the marginalized position they inhabited. In plays such as Discépolo’s Stefano (1928), and Defillipis Novoa’s He visto a Dios, 1930 [I Have Seen God], the dynamics of the old and the new, the internal and the external, laughter and tragedy do battle, often erupting in verbal or physical violence, the ineffectual response of those imprisoned in the New World, in which they have invested all their dreams. If gaucho theatre is the beginning of a portrayal of national reality in drama, then the grotesco criollo is a form that gave expression in theatre to specific experiences of the new Latin American, and in so doing created a voice that would have resonances throughout the 20th century.

With these dramatists, as well as poetic innovators like Juan Guzmán Cruchaga (1896–1979) in Chile, the first years of the 20th century did indeed look promising. But this period is followed by the comparative poverty of the following years, until the creation of the first independent theatre in 1930, the Teatro del Pueblo (The People’s Theatre) under the direction of Leonidas Barletta, part of a movement towards independent theatres that was evidenced throughout Latin America. It was independent theatre, that is, theatre that is not commercial in nature, and that does not depend on subsidies, that provided a revitalization of the art, by establishing a type of manifesto for theatre production and practice. Between then and the 1960s the independent theatres—groups such as Juan B. Justo (1933), Teatro la Máscara (1937), Teatro El Galpón (1949) in Uruguay under the direction of Atahualpa del Cioppo, and the Teatro Popular Ictus (1955) in Chile—became the backbone of theatre.

In Chile the creation of university theatres gave the impulse needed in a theatre that was deemed to have stagnated and allowed commercial concerns to take over. By the late 1930s, however, a new generation was propelling intellectual change, largely from within the universities. In 1941, the Teatro Experimental de la Universidad de Chile, and in 1943, the Teatro de Ensayo de la Universidad Católica were founded. Again the aims of these groups are enlightening. The Teatro Experimental de la Universidad de Chile stated these as the diffusion of classical and modern theatre, the formation of theatre schools, the dissemination of theatre beyond social elites, and the introduction of a professional attitude to theatre.

What, in many ways, is the rearticulation of the intellectual and artistic aims of the new nation states in the 19th century takes on its own shape and dynamic in the 20th. So we see the new theatre groups seeking to expand their audiences through touring, through schools accessible to as many as possible and through the forms of creation adopted. The key new form was collective creation, the dominant form of the highly politicized and radicalized 1960s. It relied on group dynamic, on the elaboration of the text through workshops, improvisation, investigation, and would often include open discussion with the audience.

What came to be known as the new Latin American theatre was the breeding ground for the dramatists and directors who have shaped the theatre of the second half of the 20th century, in some cases to the present day. A substantial group of dramatists emerged from the university theatres in Chile. Luis Alberto Heiremans (1928–1964) was a poetic dramatist of stylized realism, with such plays as El abanderado, 1962 [The Outlaw]. Sergio Vodanovic occupied himself with the middle classes, with social justice, struggles in Deja que los perros ladren, 1959 [Let the Dogs Bark] and Viña: tres comedias en traje de baño, 1964 [Viña del Mar: Three Comedies in a Bathing Suit] and Nos tomamos la universidad, 1971 [We Took the University]. Egon Wolff gave Chile such enduring plays as Los invasores, 1963 [The Invaders], Flores de papel, 1970 [Paper Flowers], later adding La balsa de la Medusa, 1984 [The Raft of the Medusa] to complete a trilogy about the political upheavals and complacencies of the middle classes. Jorge Díaz was the first Chilean dramatist to explore the theatre of the absurd with El cepillo de dientes, 1961 [The Toothbrush]. Later, in Topografía de un desnudo, 1966 [Topography of a Naked Man] he joined writers such as Isidora Aguirre (b. 1919) whose Población Esperanza, 1959 [Shanty Town Called Hope] and Los papeleros, 1963 [The Paper Gatherers] enter into a social and politically committed arena of theatre, and whose musical comedy La pérgola de las flores, 1960 [The Flower Market] must be classed as one of the great Latin American hits.

In Argentina Samuel Eichelbaum was active in the independent movement. Conrado Nalé-Roxlo was in the vanguard of theatre expression exploring a theatre of the imagination in a conscious attempt to fight the boundaries of the predominant natural realism, in La cola de la sirena, 1941 [The Mermaid’s Tail], Una viuda difícil, 1944 [A Difficult Widow].

1957 saw the first Festival de Teatro Libre, opened with a performance of Agustín Cuzzani’s (1924–87) great success, El centroforward murió al amanecer [The Centre Forward Died at Dawn] by the Teatro la Máscara. The same year saw Tres historias para ser contadas [Three Stories to Be Told] by Osvaldo Dragún (b. 1929)—an early work of an author who has long united experimentation in form with social commitment. And in the 1960s a number of dramatists whose world can be said to rooted in the tradition of the grotesque emerged. Roberto Cossa’s grotesque vision would come into its own in the

At the core of the new theatre movement in Uruguay was Atahualpa del Cioppo, instrumental in bringing to the public both international drama and the work of new Uruguayan writers. Juan Carlos Patron’s (1905–79) Procesado 1040, 1957 [Accused Number 1040] was one of the biggest successes of Uruguayan theatre, and dealt with the lack of defenses of the ordinary man in the face of the state machine. Andrés Castillo, founder of the Teatro Universitario, is the author of No somos nada, 1966 [We Are Nothing], a work of social denunciation using the grotesque. Two playwrights active in the 1950s and 1960s were committed to critical appraisal of their society as well as to innovation in terms of the means of expression of the social imagination. They were Carlos Maggi (b. 1922) with such plays as La biblioteca, 1959 [The Library], and Mauricio Rosencof (b. 1933) with, for example, Los caballos, 1967 [The Horses]. Both fell silent with the military rule in the 1970s, Rosencof was imprisoned from 1972–85, and Maggi was silent throughout the dictatorship.

It is in the 1970s, when the three countries fell under military rule, that the term Southern Cone acquires a cultural and social coherence. The impact of the dictatorships is notorious: theatres were closed, individuals were captured and tortured, groups went into exile, and different levels of censorship were at work. The initial years saw the disintegration and disarticulation of the independent theatres, and a general disorientation in terms of finding theatre languages to express the new reality. The voices that emerged were defined by a response to the need to occupy a space of opposition, and similar themes run through the period: the arbitrary use of power, the diminishing social space, marginalization, fragmentation of social structures.

In Chile, Ictus opened the way for effective comment on the regime with Pedro, Juan y Diego, 1976 [Peter, John and Diego], and the group Taller de Investigación Teatral followed with Tres Marías y una Rosa, 1979 [Three Maries and One Rose], New voices to emerge are those of Marco Antonio de la Parra (b. 1952), who created scenic worlds of the cruelly absurdist limbo in which people lived, and Juan Radrigón (b. 1937), who explored the world of extreme and powerless marginality. In Argentina Griselda Gambaro focused on the grotesque mechanics of authoritarianism in plays such as La malasangre, 1982 [Bitter Blood] and Del sol naciente, 1984 [Of the Rising Sun], as did Eduardo Pavlovsky’s El Señor Lafargue (1983). The project of the group Teatro Abierto ‘81 became an intellectual cause célèbre, and laid the foundation for a series of original plays by writers such as Roberto Cossa. And in Uruguay similar themes inform Mercedes Rein and Jorge Curi’s El herrero y la muerte, 1981 [The Blacksmith and Death], Carlos Manuel Varela’s Alfonso y Clotilde, Alberto Paredes’s Decir adiós, 1979 [To Say Goodbye], Pedro Orgambide’s Prohibido Gardel, 1978 [Gardel is Forbidden], and Jacobo Langsner’s popular Esperando la carroza, 1974 [Waiting for the Carriage], a “grotesque in two acts.”

There are two elements that characterize this theatre, and that pave the way for present day trends. One is that it follows almost without exception the ethos and aesthetics of the independent theatres. And the second is that there had been created in all three countries an encoded theatre language which was nevertheless absolutely transparent to the initiated audience, creating a real complicity within the theatre space. By the 1980s these elements are perceived to be restrictive, and an impulse for change, a search for a new language, new forms of creation and a certain distancing from this complicity from the audience began to become manifest. The work of Andrés Pérez, Alfredo Castro and Mauricio Celedón in Chile, of groups like Los Macocos and Los Melli in Argentina, and Alvaro Ahunchain and Luis Vidal in Uruguay are all testimony to these trends. Following reports in the Latin American Theatre Review (1992), three main identifying features can be noted tentatively. First, that there are few new dramatists, texts are elaborated collectively; second, there is a tendency towards an incorporation of other forms into the theatre; and third, there has been a move towards a more intimate, less discursive and naturalist style. Looking on from the outside, the sense is of a rearticulation of the creation of the theatre environment, and also of a theatre that is ready to enter the world stage, but now not to borrow as in the 19th century, but to offer a real resilience and identity.

CATHERINE BOYLE

Contemporary Chicano Theatre

The work of Luis Valdez with El Teatro Campesino (The Peasant Theatre) in the 1960s is generally accepted not only as the foundation for contemporary Chicano drama but also as one of the most important and influential contributions to contemporary Chicano literature as a whole. Like much agitprop theatre of the period, Valdez’s actos (acts) blended Brechtian method with direct socio-political criticism, popular humor, the use of stereotypes, slapstick and satire. The first actos of the mid-1960s treated issues related to labor problems and were performed by field workers for field workers with a view to raising consciousness and encouraging support for the United Farmworkers Union (UFW).

A significant aspect of Valdez’s early work, which has a bearing on subsequent literature, is that his characters spoke the popular, interlingual blend of English and Spanish employed by many Chicanos. None the less, by 1967 Valdez had dissociated himself from the UFW and his productions became more professional and began to break new ground thematically and stylistically. His pieces started to explore the diversity of the Chicano experience in other contexts such as education, the city and Vietnam and increasingly incorporated pre-Columbian and mythical themes in such a way as to create a contrast with the realism of his earlier work.

Just as much of the poetry of the Movement period is characterized by its concern for the socio-cultural and historical reality of the Chicano community, albeit expressed in highly individual and diverse ways, theatre follows a similar trajectory. While Luis Valdez continued to employ drama as a didactic vehicle, his thematic foci broadened and culminated in a form of ritualistic theatre called “mitos” (myths) which blended pre-Columbian and Christian beliefs in an attempt to address and to shape Chicanismo (Chicano identity) at a spiritual level. Another group that emerged in the early 1970s to rival El Teatro Campesino and to pursue the realist approach, increasingly being discarded by Valdez, was the Santa Barbara Teatro de la Esperanza (Theatre of Hope).
Under the direction of Jorge Huerta, Esperanza offered a collectively oriented, documentary theatre influenced by Brechtian ideas. The latter characteristics are exemplified in their most accomplished work Guadalupe (first performed in 1974) which dramatized contemporary events concerning a case of educational discrimination.

Compared with poetry and narrative, there has been significantly less dramatic output by Chicanos over the last two decades. Luis Valdez has remained a constant presence and, although his theatre has become progressively more crafted and complex, it still displays elements present in his early actos and mitos. A case in point is his award-winning Zoot Suit (1977), which later became a successful film. Another enduring figure since the mid-1970s has been Carlos Morton who has written a number of plays notable for their varied stylistic character and their thematic breadth. His works include sociodocumentary pieces on contemporary events (The Many Deaths of Danny Rosales, 1974 and The Savior, 1986), recontextualized versions of works from other traditions (Johnny Tenorio, 1983 and The Miser of Mexico, 1989) and satirical reworkings of Christian myth (El Jardín, 1974 [The Garden] and Pancho Diablo, 1989).

Like other genres, Chicano drama of the 1980s attested to an ongoing accommodation of previously repressed voices. Although Estela Portillo’s 1971 play The Day of the Swallows treated a lesbian character ostracized by her community, it was not until the 1980s that Chicanos and Chicanas began again to address issues of sexuality openly in drama. Two of the more significant works in this respect were Edgar Pomba’s Reunion (1981), the first Chicano play to bring male homosexuality to the stage, and Cherríe Moraga’s Giving Up the Ghost (1985) which deals with lesbian sexuality. In the same way that Moraga’s play is formally innovative, breaking with traditional theatrical conventions and syntax, the work of Denise Chávez also borders more on the realm of performance than that of conventional theatre. Particularly noteworthy is Chávez’s Novena narrativas y ofrendas Nuevomexicanas, 1987 [Narrative Novena and New Mexican Offerings] which comprises nine monologues by women representative of diverse Chicana experiences.

In the context of performance, nevertheless, perhaps the most important contribution has been the collective work of teatropoesía [theatre-poetry] by San Francisco area Chicanas, Tongues of Fire, a hybrid assemblage of pieces drawn from different genres which comprises an articulation of a complex, plural Chicana subject. Just as there is no singular author of the work, no unitary characters are developed by means of a traditional, linear narrative; rather the participation of the multiple performers of the pieces serves to explore the range of Chicana experiences and identities as well as the possibilities of linking the multiple aspects of the latter.

WILSON NEATE

Further Reading

Brazil

—— The Modern Brazilian Stage, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1992

General Studies on Theatre in Spanish America or Ibero America
—— Técnicas latinoamericanas de teatro popular, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1975
De Costa, Elena, Collaborative Latin American Popular Theater: from Theory to Form, from Text to Stage, New York: Peter Lang, 1992.
Luzuriaga, Gerardo, Introducción a las teorías latinoamericanas del teatro, Puebla, Mexico: Universidad Autónoma de Puebla, 1990
Rizk, Beatriz, El nuevo teatro latinoamericano: Una lectura histórica, Minneapolis: Prisma Institute, 1987
Roster, Peter and Mario Rojas (editors), De la colonia a la postmodernidad: teoría teatral y crítica sobre teatro latinoamericano, Buenos Aires: Galerna, 1992,
Solórzano, Carlos, El teatro latinoamericano en el siglo XX, Mexico City: Pormaca, 1964
Studies on the Theatre in Individual Spanish American Countries

Argentina

Marial, José, Teatro y país. (Desde 1810 a Teatro Abierto), Buenos Aires: Agon, 1983

Chile

Colombia

Reyes, Carlos José and Maida Watson Espener (editors), Materiales para una historia del teatro en Colombia, Bogotá: Instituto Colombiano de Cultura, 1978

Cuba

Colón, Edwin Teurbe and José Antonio González, Historia del teatro en La Habana, Santa Clara, Cuba: Letras Cubanas, 1980 [Definitive work on the history of Cuban theatre]

Ecuador

Mexico

Del-Río, Marcela, Perfil del teatro de la Revolución Mexicana, New York: Peter Lang, 1993

Usigli, Rodolfo, Mexico en el teatro, Mexico City: Imprenta Mundial, 1932; as Mexico in the Theater, translated by Wilder P. Scott, University, Mississippi: Romance Monographs, 1976

Paraguay

Peru
Mariátegui, José Carlos, Nuestro teatro y su actual período de surgimiento, Lima: Teatro de la Universidad de San Marcos, 1969

Anthologies of Brazilian and Spanish American Plays (including some in English translation)
Quackenbush, L. Howard (editor), Teatro del absurdo hispanoamericano, Mexico City: Patria, 1987

Contemporary Chicano Theatre

Anthologies
Garza, Roberto J. (editor), Contemporary Chicano Theater, Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1976

Critical Studies
———Chicano Theater: Themes and Forms, Ypsilanti, Michigan: Bilingual Press, 1982
———“Cherrie Moraga’s Giving Up the Ghost and the Representation of Female Desire,” Third Woman, vol. 3/1 (1986)
Coined in the 1940s by the Cuban anthropologist and theorist of African-Cuban movements, Fernando Ortiz (1881–1969), the term is used as a refinement of, and in contrast to the Anglo-American sociological term, “acculturation,” which describes a process of assimilation and absorption of minority cultures by dominant ones. Transculturation seeks to describe cultural transformation in terms of a synthesis of systems which produces new and differentiated cultural hybrids. The interaction of values of European colonialism and the New World provides the principal environment for this form of cultural encounter.

The attempts of a “dominant” culture to circumscribe the characteristics of another society in its own terms or its own image is discernible as far back as the earliest Spanish and Portuguese chronicles, such as those of Columbus and Pero Vaz de Caminha. These explorers draw upon European referents in order to chart and represent the New World, thereby re-inventing it in terms of their own perceptions. In the 20th century the interaction of fusing cultures is explored with anguish in the work of the Peruvian novelist José María Arguedas, as he traces the confrontation between Andean, Quechua culture and the 20th-century forces of modernization. Transculturation may also be seen in the complex shifting of racial and social interrelationships in the United States today, with both the integration and the sense of conscious differentiation of the Chicano. The mixing of cultures at the “borders” where they find each other is part of the writings of, for example, the Chicana Gloria Anzaldúa.

The late Uruguayan critic Ángel Rama was chiefly responsible for the introduction of the term into literary studies in the 1970s. Rama examined the phenomenon of transculturation, both for dispossessed peoples and for the writer and intellectual, in both the sense of “culture shock” and in the discovery of the cultural diversity traditionally obscured by the belief that the (South American) continent is a homogeneous unit. Transculturation also has implications for a post-colonial unpacking of cultural power relations. In her study of 18th-and 19th-century travel writing, Mary Louise Pratt examines the German explorer and naturalist Alexander von Humboldt’s legacy in the Americas, as his vision of South America is taken up by political figures such as Bolivar, or writers, such as Alejo Carpentier—principally in Los pasos perdidos (The Lost Steps) and Tientos y diferencias [Gropings and Differences]. She demonstrates how the process can be appraised from the opposite direction, as Humboldt’s Romantic vision is itself revealed to be a transcultural product. A Euro-American view, in this sense, can be seen to have been constructed as much from the outside in as from the inside out.

Transculturation is a process which takes place in the “contact zone” between the peripheral and the dominant metropolitan culture, but involves not only superimpositions of aspects of the dominant culture, but also mechanisms of selection and absorption. The fusion of two or more interacting cultures, for example in the case of Cuba—an archetypal colonial crossroads—has been described in terms of “grafts and transplants,” of synthesis and transformation, and not simply of dominance and imposition by a “superior” culture. The spread and adaptation of theories of transculturation for contemporary literary and historical study, therefore, propose a de-emphasis on binarisms and straightforward oppositions in social, political and sexual power relations, and a new focus on what Diana Taylor calls “long term reciprocities;” for, rather than being a resistance theory, such as feminism, which may abolish itself in achieving a new assertion of sexual power hegemony, transculturation is a theory of processes, emphasising the vitality of minority structures in the face of assumptions of colonial subordination or cultural indebtedness.

FRANK MCQUADE

See also entry on Fernando Ortiz

Further Reading

Pratt, Mary Louise, Imperial Eyes: Travel Writing and Transculturation, London and New York: Routledge, 1992

Translation

Brazil

Translation has always been of paramount importance to Brazil, a country on the outer edge of Western civilization. In the 1990s, 80% of all the printed material in Brazil, from user manuals to literary works, including every conceivable genre, are translations.

Prior to the arrival of Europeans, the population of the subcontinent that was to become the Brazilian nation consisted of semi-nomadic Indian tribes—variously estimated by scholars to have numbered between one and five million individuals—who spoke between two and three thousand different languages which have now been divided by researchers into 102 language groups and three large families: Tupy, Macro-Ge and Arawak. There is evidence that such human groups were in contact, and it may be safely assumed that such contact included oral translations, since Indian languages completely lacked writing systems.

The arrival of Europeans brought an even greater linguistic variety to the subcontinent. The first document produced by this arrival bears evidence of the first translation act in Brazil. This is the letter written by Pero Vaz de Caminha, the scribe of the Portuguese fleet commanded by Admiral Pedro Álvares Cabral (1467–c.1520) that reached Brazil on 21 April 1500. Caminha’s letter of 1 May 1500 reports the finding of new lands to the Portuguese king, Dom Manuel I (1415–1512), and describes how Europeans and natives interacted by means of gestures.

The letter also describes how a few men were left behind, to live with the Indians, and learn their language. Throughout early colonial times this situation often repeated itself.
Either convicted deportees deliberately left behind by their captains, or adventurers shipwrecked on the shores of Brazil, many Europeans learned Indian languages and became interpreters and were known as “linguas” (literally “tongues”). The services of such professionals were used when colonizers’ raiding parties were sent inland to capture and enslave Indians or to search for gold and precious stones.

When Jesuit priests went to Brazil to attempt to convert the Indians in 1549, they found that the languages spoken by the Indians living along the coast of Brazil bore such similarity that a lingua franca had developed, called Abanheenga. Perceiving the usefulness of a lingua franca for their missionary purposes, the Jesuits produced a simplified version of this language, which they called Nheengatu, or “beautiful language,” and gave it a written form.

Father José de Anchieta (c.1533–97), who has been beatified by the Catholic Church and is known as “The Apostle of Brazil,” wrote the Arte da gramática na língua mais usada na costa do Brasil [Art of the Grammar of the Most Used Language on the Coast of Brazil]. Soon, other religious texts were translated into Nheengatu, such as the Catechism and the Summary of Christian Doctrine. Nheengatu, also known as lingua geral (general language), was taught at the Jesuit colleges, so that it eventually became widespread in colonized Brazil, being used not only as a means of communication between Indians and Europeans, but also among Brazilians, that is, Europeans who had become established in Brazil and their often mixed-race offspring. Nheengatu was used even in the administrative and legal affairs of the colony, with the result that “linguas,” or interpreters remained in full demand by the administration. Even Africans, brought to Brazil as slaves to work in the fields and mines when it was realized that the Indians were unable to adapt to forced labour, learned Nheengatu. Although the Africans too developed their own linguae francae, a form of Yoruba in the north and northeast, and Congoese in the south, the colonizers’ system of separating Africans of the same language (Yoruba, Kimbundu, Hausa and others) and of separating families upon arrival in Brazil prevented any African language from having the same impact as Nheengatu.

The dominance of Nheengatu came to an end, however, when, in 1759, the Marquis of Pombal (1721–82), virtual dictator of Portugal and its colonies between 1750 and 1777, who feared the growing power of the Jesuits, expelled them from Portugal and Brazil, forbade the use of Nheengatu in Brazil, and closed all the Jesuit colleges.

From this point onwards, the hegemony of Portuguese was ensured, aided by several factors. Foreign invasions were consistently fended off; borders with Spanish American nations were agreed upon either peacefully or by military action; and the Indians were either absorbed into the general, Portuguesespeaking population by miscegenation, decimated by European diseases to which they had no immunity or by the severity of forced labour, or pushed into the recesses of the sub-continent by those who wanted their lands. There are today 150,000 Indians in Brazil, living in reserves, of which 30% are native speakers of Portuguese.

The need of translations therefore became one of communication mainly with foreign nations and individuals. Already in 1850, legislation was passed that regulated the profession of sworn translator. Sworn translators are those who translate official documents; and they are much needed by the importexport business, among others.
The publication of translated works, however, came late to Brazil. All manufacture was forbidden in the colony by the Portuguese Crown, which of course included the printing business. The importation of books into Brazil suffered the same heavy censorship that was applied to the book trade in Portugal. It was not until the Portuguese Royal family, fleeing Napoleon’s troops, came to Brazil in 1808 that a legally operating printing house was established in Brazil, the Impressão Régia (Royal Press) founded by the Prince Regent Dom João (later Dom João VI; 1767–1826).

The first work published by Impressão Régia was a translation of Leonhard Euler’s (1707–1783) Elements of Algebra. Many academic and scientific works were published in rapid succession, perhaps in an attempt to quench the country’s thirst for knowledge. The first literary translation published by Impressão Régia was of Alexander Pope’s Essay on Criticism, translated and annotated by Fernando José de Portugal, the Marquis of Aguiar (1752–1817). During this period, however, most of the translations were from French, or from other languages via French or Spanish, which is known as “indirect translation.”

Impressão Régia enjoyed the monopoly over the printing industry until 1822, when Brazil became independent. From that moment on, it became possible for a Brazilian printing industry to develop. This development, however, was slowed down by the lack of machinery and raw materials in Brazil, a consequence of the ban on industries during colonial times. As a result, post-colonial Brazilian writers such as José de Alencar (1829–1877) and Machado de Assis (1839–1908) had their works published in Europe by such publishing houses as Livraria Garnier and Livraria Bertrand in Paris. In this way, the business of publishing Brazilian works flourished in Europe.

During the early stages of the publishing industry in Brazil, most translated works were reprints of translations already published in Portugal. It was not until the publishing business achieved a certain degree of development that Brazilian translations became predominant. The work of Brazilian writers Monteiro Lobato (1882–1948) and Érico Veríssimo (1905–75) as translators and editors greatly contributed towards this.

By the 1970s, publishing had become fully established in Brazil, with the country having become an exporter of paper pulp. The number of published translations grew, and the major language of translation turned from French into English, as a result of Brazil having fallen under the sphere of influence of the United States.

Although the influence of foreign writers on Brazilian ones may be attributed to translations, as Onêdia Barboza has discussed in Byron no Brasil: traduções, 1974 [Byron in Brazil: Translations], it is equally valid to point out that Brazilian intellectuals have normally been able to read in a foreign language, chiefly French and Spanish, and later English. It is in fact Brazil’s major writers that have been its translators, such as: Manuel Bandeira, Cecília Meireles, José Lins do Rego, Carlos Drummond de Andrade, Rachel de Queiroz, Lúcio Cardoso and Clarice Lispector.

A major contribution to the evolution of translation in Brazil was made by Hungarian-born Paulo Rónai (1907–73), author of the first Brazilian work on the subject, Escola de tradutores, 1952 [School of Translators], followed by Homens contra Babel, 1964 [Men against Babel] and A tradução vivida, 1976 [Translation Experienced]. Rónai, working with Aurélio Buarque de Hollanda Ferreira (1910-) translated and edited the collection Mar de histórias, 1945 (A Sea of Stories) and later the collection of classics from all over the world called “Nobel Library.” The work on the translation of these selections was a veritable proving ground for translators new to the task.

At present a Brazilian theory of translation is being developed. Known as the “cannibalist” theory of translation, its principles have become known outside the frontiers of Brazil. The authors of this theory are the Campos brothers, Haroldo and Augusto, Concrete poets who have translated authors such as Pound, e.e. cummings, Joyce, Mallarmé, Mayakovsky, Valéry, Poe, and Lewis Carroll, among others. Their views of translation are derived from the works of Walter Benjamin, Roman Jakobson and Ezra Pound. The main source of inspiration for them, however, has been the idea of “cannibalism” expounded by the Brazilian Modernist Movement of 1922, chiefly the Manifesto canibalista [Cannibalist Manifesto] by Oswald de Andrade. According to Andrade’s theory, a colonized people devours what the colonizers offer them, but spits out what is noxious to them; what they keep make wholly theirs by altering it to suit their own needs.

HELOISA GONÇALVES BARBOSA

Further Reading

No Brazilian work to date deals specifically with the history of translation. A few pointers may be found in Paes, José Paulo, Tradução, a ponte necessária: aspectos e problemas da arte de traduzir, São Paulo: Ática, 1990. Additional works used in this compilation are listed below.

Anchieta, José de, Arte gramática da língua mais usada na costa do Brasil, São Paulo: Edições Loyola, 1990 [facsimile of the 1595 edition]

Andrade, Oswald de, Do pau-brasil à antropofagia e às utopias: manifestos, teses de concursos e ensaios, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1970

Campos, Augusto de and Haroldo de Campos (editors and translators), Panorama do Finnegan’s Wake, São Paulo: Perspectiva, 1970

Campos, Augusto de, Verso, reverso, controverso, São Paulo: Perspectiva, 1978

—— O anticrítico, Lisbon: Ática, 1960; São Paulo: Companhia das Letras, 1986

—— A operação do texto, São Paulo: Perspectiva, 1976

Houaiss, Antônio, O português no Brasil, Rio de Janeiro: UnibradeCentro de Cultura, 1985

Rónai, Paulo, Babel e antibabel, São Paulo: Perspectiva, 1970

Spanish America

Due to the explosive appearance of Hispanic American literature on the international literary scene beginning in the 1960s, its spectacular presence today in English translation is wondrous. The growing body of diverse texts in translation—especially in fiction and poetry—attests to an expanding interest in the Hispanic world by English readers. In part, the transition of the world toward a postmodern global village supports attention of cross-cultural interests and exoticism. It is experienced through the food, the sensual music, the romantic climes, and the colorful, primitive beauty of Hispanic America as it continues to lure technology-driven, fast-paced, urban, First World reader/tourists into its mysterious, multicultural web. The power of this exoticism can be appreciated by the overwhelming success of Laura Esquivel’s best seller, Como agua para chocolate, 1989, translated in 1992, as Like Water for Chocolate. The other aspects involving translation—historical, professional, commercial and technical—also provide useful insights into the nature of this volcanic eruption of translated literature from Hispanic America.

Early interest in Hispanic American literature in the English-speaking world is due largely to the translations by Harriet de Onís of Social Realist novels, chronicles, essays and short stories. Her, perhaps, over-prolific output as a literary translator includes the following texts: Martín Luis Guzmán’s El águila y la serpiente, 1928 (The Eagle and the Serpent), Ciro Alegría’s El mundo es ancho y ajeno, 1941 (Broad and Alien is the World) and a selection from Ricardo Palma’s Tradiciones peruanas, published in 1945 under the title The Knights of the Cape and 37 Other Selections from the Tradiciones peruanas, Alfonso Reyes’s The Position of America, and Other Essays, 1950. De Onís also translated outstanding Brazilian works such as Grandes sertãos: veredas, 1956 (The Devil to Pay in the Backlands, 1963) by João Guimarães Rosa. Within a generation or two, other female translators—Edith Grossman, Helen Lane, Margaret Sayers Peden and Suzanne Jill Levine—would pick up the gauntlet to become internationally famous for their translations of Hispanic American fiction. In fact, Levine has gone one step further by writing a book on translation, The Subversive Scribe: Translating Latin American Fiction (1991), focusing primarily on her translations of Cuban writer Guillermo Cabrera Infante’s fiction, especially Tres tristes tigres, 1965 (Three Trapped Tigers, 1971).

The so-called Boom period of fiction in the 1960s signified literary experimentation and creativity, giving international notoriety to Hispanic American writers, as in the case of Jorge Luis Borges, who was awarded the Fomentor Prize with Samuel Beckett in 1961. The multitude of translations that followed the Boom period is due mainly to the early work of Gregory Rabassa, who undertook to translate the most challenging writers such as Gabriel García Márquez, Mario Vargas Llosa, José Lezama Lima and Julio Cortázar. The impact of two of his translations, Hopscotch (1966) by Julio Cortázar, and One Hundred Years of Solitude (1970) by Gabriel García Márquez, has been considerable; in fact, Margaret Sayers Peden, whose translations include Carlos Fuentes’s
The Hydra Head (1978), Terra Nostra (1976), and Distant Relations (1982), believes that Hopscotch, “must surely be considered one of the breakthrough publications in Latin American literature in the English-speaking world, setting the stage for many works to follow,” as she observes in the Handbook of Latin American Studies. North American novelist John Barth and critic Larry McCaffery agree; and Johnny Payne, in his landmark study, Conquest of the New Word: Experimental Fiction and Translation in the Americas (1993), confirms their statements: “One Hundred Years of Solitude, the New Word, the “single work,” looms large as a continent, invigorating all post-1960s fictional innovation.”

In a quieter way, the discovery through translations of major Hispanic American avant-garde poets—César Vallejo, Vicente Huidobro, Pablo Neruda—occurred during the 1960s. In an effort to move away from European influences and redefine notions of self and identity in their poetry, North American poets increasingly looked abroad. Robert Bly, as poet, critic and translator, spearheaded an effort to introduce Surrealism into North American poetry through Spanish and Spanish American poets. Bly welcomed Hispanic American poetry as the most relevant contemporary poetry because of its particular surrealist impulse that draws on the poet’s inner life as well as on the outside world. Bly stated in an article of 1958 that “if we look abroad, we see some astonishing landscapes: the Spanish tradition, for instance, of great delicacy, which grasps modern life as a lion grabs a dog, and wraps it in heavy countless images, and holds it firm in a terrifically dense texture, in which there is Pablo Neruda, a great poet ten times over, as well as García Lorca and César Vallejo.” Bly, along with the poet James Wright, produced the first English translation of the Peruvian poet César Vallejo in 1962, Twenty Poems of César Vallejo. They collectively produced Neruda and Vallejo: Selected Poems in 1972. John Felstiner’s fascinating book, Translating Neruda: the Way to Macchu Picchu (1980), discusses Neruda’s reception in the United States and evaluates English translations (including Bly’s) of the poet’s works, listing thirty-six, including his own renditions, from 1934 to 1976 (five in the 1930s and 1940s, five in the 1950s, eight in the 1960s, and eighteen in the 1970s). Interestingly, other important North American poets, among them W.S. Merwin, Denise Levertov, William Carlos Williams, Mark Strand and Langston Hughes have translated and continue to translate poetry by Neruda, Vallejo, Octavio Paz and Nicolás Guillén.

With this growing body of translated works of fiction and poetry, a certain pattern has emerged with a handful of Hispanic authors dominating the panorama of literary translation in recent times. In his essay, “Hispanic Fiction in Translation: Some Considerations Regarding Recent Literary History,” in Language at the Crossroads (1988), Michael Scott Doyle points out that the pattern may be due to an “imbalanced historical appreciation of Hispanic fiction by the American reader. Translators and publishers can provide historical corrective to this imbalance by making available in the future a greater representation of contemporary Hispanic novelists and short story writers.” Here Scott Doyle reveals that out of a list of 190 writers represented by 140 titles in translation in the United States, Spain accounts for 18% (35 titles); Argentina, 25% (25 titles); Mexico, 15%; Cuba, 11%; Peru, 8.5%; Colombia, 7%; Chile, 5%; Ecuador and Guatemala, less than 3% each; Nicaragua, Puerto Rico, and Uruguay, just over 1% each; El Salvador, less than 1%; and seven countries—Bolivia, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Honduras, Panama, Paraguay and Venezuela were not represented in English. Nine authors—Jorge Luis Borges, Alejo Carpentier, Julio Cortázar, José Donoso, Carlos Fuentes, Gabriel García Márquez, Juan Goytisolo, Manuel Puig and Mario Vargas Llosa—account for 77 of the 140 titles in English. Nine from a list of 190 writers, 4.7% of the total constitute 55% of the translations into English in the United States. In the world of book reviews of translations, Margaret Sayers Peden has noted that the number of reviews between 1965 and 1988 of Mario Vargas Llosa’s works, form an inverted pyramid, from one in 1965 to seventy-six in 1987–88: “Vargas Llosa exploded in English-language consciousness in 1986; prior to that year, forty-nine reviews appeared in the sources I consulted; forty-three reviews were published in 1986 alone.”

Doyle concludes his study saying that what was once too little of a good thing, contemporary Hispanic American fiction, has turned into too much of too little, the over representation of a select few. While today the numbers and players may have changed the aforementioned statistics somewhat, there is growing concern as to the possible effects of such skewed figures; in fact, Johnny Payne’s book probes the deeper structures of this phenomenon: “The dissemination of Latin American fiction in translation none the less has produced many positive results in terms of bringing a modicum of world attention…to Latin American literature. Likewise, my project here has not been to present the Boom as nothing more than a calculated instance of economic opportunism but rather to suggest how a body of literature, selectively produced and disseminated in conjunction with certain cultural crises and the economic demands of consumer culture, becomes subject to extremely limited possibilities of interpretation within that culture.”

Payne’s exciting study is indicative of the level at which writers, translators, critics and reviewers are beginning to examine the world of literary translation in the 1990s. There has been a profusion of works in translation, including new critical editions of older, “classical” works, i.e., The Underdogs, by Mariano Azuela, first published in serial form in an El Paso newspaper in 1916, and now considered the most representative novel of the Mexican Revolution. By the 1960s it had become one of the best-known and most translated works of Spanish American literature. In 1979, Stanley L.Robe produced a translation of the original El Paso version. Other English translations appeared in 1930, 1963 and 1979, which were based presumably on an enlarged Mexican edition of 1920. The latest (1992) critical edition by Frederick H. Fornoff includes an introduction by Seymour Menton, the translation itself, a glossary and a section of “Background and Criticism.” Evelio Echevarría has said that this latest edition “offers plenty of material for the historian and the professor of international literature. But the book can also be enjoyed at a simpler level. It is essentially a compelling tale of human conflicts, grippingly told.”
One important factor contributing to the explosion of post-Boom translations of Hispanic American literature in recent times in the United States is greater translation of women writers, whose works have hit the best-seller lists and been made into movies (Like Water for Chocolate by Laura Esquivel, and The House of the Spirits by Isabel Allende). Another factor is the expanding publication of anthologies in translation, especially poetry and short stories; for instance, Nora Erro-Peralta’s Beyond the Border: a New Age in Latin American Women’s Fiction (1991), Celia Correas de Zapata’s Short Stories by Latin American Women: the Magic and the Real (1990), Ilan Stavan’s Tropical Synagogues: Short Stories by Jewish-American Writers (1994), Thomas Colchie’s A Hammock beneath the Mangoes: Stories from Latin America (1991), Carmen Esteves’s Green Cane and Juicy Flotsam: Short Stories by Caribbean Women (1991) and Barbara Paschke’s Clamor of Innocence: Central American Short Stories (1988). Another significant factor concerns the publishers. Besides the mainstream New York publishers who continue to publish the canonized Boom writers, it is important to point out the role of university presses and, amazingly, small presses, have played in expanding the corpus. The long-established Pan American Series at the University of Texas Press is considered a cornerstone of published translations of Spanish American literature. The University of Nebraska Press has created the Latin American Women Writers series. Other universities—University of California, Los Angeles and Wayne State University—publish translations in their Latin American Literature and Culture series. A formidable, growing press that has made a significant contribution is the Latin American Literary Review. Finally, examples of the efforts being made by small presses include City Lights Press (San Francisco), Curbstone Press (Willimantic, Connecticut), and White Pine Press (Fredonia, New York), the last of which in 1987 initiated its Secret Weavers Series, in response to the neglect suffered by Latin American women as writers and citizens in a marginalized position in Latin American society. According to its editor, Chilean author and Wellesley College Professor Marjorie Agosín, the series presents “for the first time in English the most powerful and striking voices of 20th-century Latin American women writers, both contemporary writers and their mentors, weaving a landscape of ritual magic and imagination.”

Critical studies concerning diverse issues facing the translator of Latin American literature are also beginning to surface. For some time now, the journal Translation Review (University of Texas, Dallas) has been providing articles focusing on problems of reviewing translations of Hispanic American literature, fidelity in the translation of titles, and the need to consider new translations of earlier works. One important compilation of critical studies, Translating Latin America: Culture as Text, produced from a 1990 conference sponsored by the Center for Research in Translation, State University of New York at Binghamton, delves into serious issues confronting the translator, such as: new modes of transculturation, bilingualism, and code-switching (English-Spanish), especially with the increase in Latin American and Chicano writers in the United States working in two languages, that is, an interlanguage; a growing body of testimonial narrative, a hybrid genre that incorporates diverse forms of discourses in the texts; the translated new novel as a text for studying and teaching of historical themes: authority and subordination, gender relationships, military-civilian relations, the city and the countryside, contemporary politics, history and the search for identity, and possible futures; “translational imperialism,” according to Clayton Eshelman, in which a First World translator works on a Third World writer, that is, the translator as colonizer; translating race and culture, in which terms tainted by their racist history would call into question their usage; the limitations of American (unlike British) English that lacks, except for the South, the types of dialects that can be represented typographically; and the study of actual differences between the original and the translation, resulting from certain shifts, displacements, additions, omissions, puns, jokes, clichés, rhymes, or expletives. And always looming on the horizon is the outright bad translation, not because the translator does not understand the language, but because he or she does not know the culture. In order to interpret a literary text successfully, critics must first understand the originating culture of that text; similarly, translators often must translate an entire culture in order to translate a single literary text better. In that way, serious problems could be avoided, as outlined in a recent review of a translation of recent Mexican short stories by Debra Castillo: “[Her]…translation is flawed by her literal renderings of too many large words and by awkward phrases …Ponderous phrases, common in Mexican literature, are particular and peculiar to that culture. In English, they are embarrassing. Take license, translators!” Translation may be totally impossible, but it’s absolutely necessary.

DICK GERDES

Further Reading

General
Sur, “Problemas de la traducción,” special issue dedicated to translation (Buenos Aires, January–December 1976)

Literary Translation in Relation to Latin America
Aparicio, Frances R., Versiones, interpretaciones y creaciones, Gaithersburg, Maryland: Hispámerica, 1991 [Has historical dimension and also considers “translation” from painting to the written word]
Travel Literature

It is only recently with Paul Fussell’s Abroad (1980), that travel writing began to be taken seriously, and studied at universities. But what constitutes travel literature is still being defined. A genre approach reveals the travel book to be an eclectic and refreshing hybrid of memoir, essay and autobiography in the realist mode, dealing with a verifiable place, and with an identifiable narrator. The genre approach does not decide quality, but does make the apparently simple travel narrative more complex by exploring the many narrative devices (dialogue, plot, characterization, etc.) employed. A further approach would be to explore the travel book within a self-referential tradition of travel writing, this being the one adopted by both James Buzard and Stephen Greenblatt, where problems of writing and invention and realism are encoded in the narratives themselves. A third approach to travel literature would be to see it as an expression of ideology, and part of the centre-periphery debate, this being the angle explored by Edward Said and Mary Louise Pratt. Here the traveller is a representative of impersonal historical forces, and travel literature a sub-theme of the discourse of imperialism. A fourth approach would look into the problematics of recording and remembering, looking at diaries, different versions, the illusion of realism, attempts at creating visual images, and how brute experience is transferred into words.

In complex ways Latin America is the creation of foreigners writing about the New World, from the earliest chroniclers like Bernal Díaz, to scientific travellers like Alexander von Humboldt and Charles Darwin, to later literary explorers such as D.H.Lawrence and Graham Greene. These texts are aimed at those back home, and hope to dissipate ignorance and awaken envy, though poor travel books confirm prejudice and stereotype. The version of Latin America that this tradition of foreigners gives depends on many factors from length of stay to familiarity with local culture, but the aim is to offer a vision of a different place in terms of a rhetoric of cultural shock. Fiction can carry this informative task just as efficiently and travelogues often overlap with narrative, and sometimes vie with narrative as in the case of Lawrence or Greene on Mexico. Many realist novels are read as “news from somewhere” and seek to instruct.

Indeed, much of Latin American literature can be seen as a parallel attempt to those travelogues written by foreigners, but with the intention to inform native readers about ignored parts of their own continent, especially given the Latin American cultural fascination with Europe and abroad, and the frequent hostility between neighbouring countries. The realist tradition of narrative in Latin America that opens with Horacio Quiroga, and is often called “regionalist,” functions rhetorically as travel writing creating verifiable images of hinterlands (Gallegos, Rivera, Azuela etc.). Later writers like Rulfo or Carpentier establish their verisimilitude from implicit travel books, a point examined by González Echevarría in his study Myth and Archive (1990). García Márquez’s Macondo is a metaphor of this unexplored, off-the-tourist-route Latin America, often ignored by urban Latin Americans themselves. But it is Alejo Carpentier’s Los pasos perdidos, 1953 (The Lost Steps), that mimics a trip up the Orinoco in the wake of Raleigh and Humboldt to establish itself as the seminal fusion of travel book and novel exploring Latin America’s hidden uniqueness.

There is not a strong tradition of Latin American empirical observation or of Latin American travel writing, and even less on travelling within the Latin American continent. Sarmiento is a good example of a writer capable of creating a hybrid text based on travel literature and including biography, geography, essay and diatribe. This applies to Facundo, 1845 (Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants), but his actual travel writing only explored the United States and Europe. For a native tradition of verifiable observations the reader has to turn away from the few like Vasconcelos who have written explicit travelogues, and read poets like Neruda or Cardenal or fiction writers like Quiroga, Rivera or García Márquez, to match the kind of observations made by the great foreign travellers in Latin America.

JASON WILSON

Further Reading

Karsen, Sonja, “Latin America through French, German and Austrian Eyes,” in her Ensayos de literatura e historia iberoamericana, New York: Peter Lang, 1988

Dalton Trevisan 1925–

Brazilian short story writer

Recognized critically as Brazil’s most outstanding contemporary short story writer, Dalton Trevisan none the less provokes debate in view of his repetitive dramatization of seemingly trivial themes of populist behavior, all taking place in his hometown of Curitiba in the southern state of Paraná. His stories incessantly depict lower-middle and working-class mores as well as marginalized taboo figures such as prostitutes and homosexuals who belie the chaste codes of a provincial society colonized by standards of appearance. He is considered something of a literary taboo by some critics, and his deliberate repetition of the same figures, situations and circumstances across all collections has been misunderstood. Moreover, from an elitist position, Trevisan’s scabrous and dark repetitive tales may be falsely misconstrued as the exploitation of the shallow thematics of cheap sex and domestic violence. However, in the more than twenty collections since his first in 1959, Novelas nada exemplares [Far from Exemplary Tales], Trevisan has been acknowledged over the years as an innovator in Brazilian fiction because his stories and vignettes not only evoke the popular as a sustained subject matter for literature, but also explore and introduce new formulations of the story genre. With his juxtaposition of clipped tales, novellas, aphorisms, reflections, poems and dialogue tableaux in the same collection, Trevisan blurs the parameters of the short story genre. Thus, in form as well as in content, his novellas are not exemplary in terms of conventional story narrative. This formal and thematic irreverence is demonstrated in his aesthetic experimentation with calculated ellipsis, minimalist dialogue, scant description, and brief—even one sentence—dramas, categorized specifically by the author as haiku, tales that identify trenchantly with the cultural behavior and widespread hardships of Brazil’s popular classes. This identification was evidenced early in Trevisan’s career after publishing his first stories in Joaquim, the 1946 literary magazine that motivated a young generation of Curitiban writers, frustrated by provincial isolation, toward new visions and expressive approaches that would connect them with the outside world. During the same period, Trevisan began to edit and publish his tales in the typographical form of popular chapbooks known in Brazil as the literatura de cordel, printed and performed by modern working-class troubadours. Trevisan’s recent republication of some of these as ministórias in the colloquially driven Ah, É? (1994) point to his unbroken link to Brazil’s oral tradition.
Critical studies on Trevisan have alluded to his use of populist themes but few have developed his connection to Brazil’s popular oral tradition. Addressing Trevisan’s type of populist scenarios, performed by anti-heroes of lost illusions, as the expression of a modern picaresque, Wilson Martins also interprets Trevisan’s insistence on the popular as descendant of Brazil’s 19th-century Manuel Antônio de Almeida and his realistic treatment of common types. However, Trevisan’s approach differs in his popular voicing because he expresses these in an unadorned prose that reproduces the clipped banalities and colorful idioms of uncultured Johns and Marys who reappear pervasively in collection after collection. Here, popular voices are not manipulated by the God-shots of Naturalist omniscience. Instead, Trevisan’s mastery of popular voicing emerges in his use of visceral dialogue and other narrative techniques of immediacy such as first-person and interior monologue. In addition, Trevisan’s stories intensify popular cultural voicing beyond the patrimonialist vision found in the politics of official culture, often promoting the popular as exotic folklore. His prose neither succumbs to the self-exoticism frequently attributed to Latin American nationalist fiction, nor does it portray paternally a picturesque or epic panorama of the folk and their lore. Employing the persona and orality of the popular, Trevisan restages everyday modes of living and survival to call attention to an often unforgettable aspect of Brazilian society. In doing so, he imparts the ubiquitous presence of working-class values, depravities and fantasies, revolving around the themes of sex and death where social and psychological vampires in the form of machistaminded men stalk women who in some cases learn to fight back, albeit, never escaping unscathed from these encounters. By creating mock-melodramatic situations that become comic via an unobtrusive irony, Trevisan’s disturbingly stark treatment above all allows the different but familiar characters to speak for themselves. This comedic and ironic stance undoes the sameness implied in mass and elite cultures’ frequently melodramatic or stereotypical image of the popular classes because Trevisan shows the myriad of differences, diversifications and contradictions within similar situations. In perfecting this type of voicing via a stylistic reworking of former tales, Trevisan also evokes the variations-on-a-theme technique, a basic rule of universal composition expressed in the form of variation as practiced by the cordel composers and singers. In cultivating identification through repetition, Trevisan is able to refine the different nuances of language and behavior that make his voices come alive.

With an original style highlighting the mythology of an urban cosmos that harbors rapists, adultresses, cuckolders and murders, reminding the reader of the lurid tabloids of popular rags, Trevisan uses prototypes whose linguistic banalities and contemporary slang pique the reader’s curiosity and, ironically, the recognition of a covert and taboo form of existence that pulsates secretively behind closed doors. The images of blood-red passion and violence manifested in each story collection, where social and moral codes are deconstructed, paint the pervasive harm that people inflict on each other, thereby implying the treacherous ways a socially-rooted authoritarian system infiltrates the souls of individuals and turns them into warring instruments of individual violence. Trevisan’s allusions to the insidious tyranny in the recesses of a closeted Curitiba signal his evocation of a hypocritical and repressed world where the treatment of women may serve as a disturbing reminder of other forms of societal repression. For example, the use of the sexually explicit is central to Trevisan’s social and political views of power and subjugation. He thus appropriates erotica to unmask the oppressive components in society. In this vein, the actions of his subjugated female characters striking back aggressively can be seen as an attempt to revolt against patriarchy. This pattern of behavior is most evident in his 1988 collection Pão e sangue [Bread and Blood]. Here, in the context of social satire, Trevisan’s unobtrusive critical eye strives to expose socio-religious cultural myths and codes that are transgressed by his characters, perhaps suggesting that certain patriarchal and ecclesiastical norms may no longer serve as valid ethics.

Canonized as Brazil’s foremost contemporary writer after having won in 1968 the much coveted State of Curitiba national prize for the best short story writer, Trevisan has been prolific and steady in his publications. While all of his collections maintain similar themes, it was his 1974 collection, O pássaro de cinco asas [The Bird with Five Wings], that witnessed the beginning of a change in the story genre with the inclusion of a few haiku pieces. Ever since, Trevisan appears to be aiming for the perfect haiku, while at the same time producing non-haiku narratives. Readily apparent in such collections as Essas malditas mulheres, 1982 [Those Damned Women] and Pão e sangue among others, this combination is also reproduced in his most recent publication, Dinorá: novos mistérios, 1994 [Dinorá: New Mysteries], a collection that contains poems and even a novella-like story along with intertextual responses to the Bible and to certain novels by Machado de Assis. Although Trevisan experimented in 1985 with an actual novella, A polaquinha, depicting the sordidness of a lower-middle class girl’s descent into prostitution, his voice continually returns to the short form as the vehicle for his sardonic picture of a debased human comedy. Seen by some critics as a stylistic minimalist, Trevisan nevertheless creates a vast world of strife, passion and violence in characters who travel repeatedly upon a via crucis of belief, want and affliction. His gallery of Joãos and Marias presents a Brazilian everyman and everywoman from the lower classes who seek solace from an urbanized world of injustice and adversity. With his original vision and postmodernist art, Trevisan “bridges the gap” by awakening an often elitist and complacent reading public to a daring view of the popular.

Translated into many languages, including English, Spanish, German, Dutch and Polish, Trevisan’s stories and dialogues served as the script for Joaquim Pedro de Andrade’s 1975 film, A guerra conjugal [Conjugal War]. Owing to the growing acceptance and validation of Trevisan’s special brand of narrative, it is expected that more translations will be forthcoming, especially if one bears in mind that the one and only story collection in English translation was published more than twenty years ago.

NELSON H. VIEIRA

Biography

Born in Curitiba, Brazil, 14 January 1925. Has chosen to spend his life in his native Curitiba where he worked in the family’s ceramic factory after abandoning the study of law. In 1945 began to write police reports and to review films for Curitiban newspapers. Travelled to Europe in 1950. Married in 1953. Founded the literary journal Joaquim, 1946 in which he published his early short stories; in the 1950s, published stories in cheap newsprint editions at his own expense. Recipient of the following important awards: Brazilian Book Chamber; Pen Club of Brazil; National Short Story Competition. Trevisan shuns publicity and for this reason remains a somewhat mysterious figure.
Selected Works

Novelas nada exemplares, Rio de Janeiro: José Olympio, 1959
Cemitério de elefantes: contos, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1962
O vampiro de Curitiba, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1965; as The Vampire of Curitiba and other Stories, translated by Gregory Rabassa, New York: Knopf, 1971
A guerra conjugal, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1969
O pássaro de cinco asas: contos, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1974
A faca no coração, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1975
Abismo de rosas: contos, Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira, 1976
A trombeta do anjo vingador, Rio de Janeiro: Codecri, 1977
Crimes de paixão, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1978
Virgem louca, loucos beijos, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1979
Lincha tarado, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1980
Meu querido assassino, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1983
Contos eróticos, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1984
A polaquinha, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1985
Pão e sangue, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1988
Em busca de Curitiba perdida, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1992
Ah, É?, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1994
Dinorá: novos mistérios, Rio de Janeiro: Record, 1994

Further Reading

José Triana 1931–

Cuban dramatist and poet
José Triana’s literary career is inextricably connected to the cause of Cuban liberation. Raised in Bayamo, the cradle of the Cuban War of Independence of 1868, by a father who was both a fervent defender of the Republic during the Spanish Civil War and an avid promoter of local culture, including theater, Triana came early on to see an easy affinity between revolution and theater. For political reasons, among them having participated in the 26th of July Movement, Triana found himself obliged to move to Spain in 1955. There, in exile, he wrote El Mayor General hablará de Teogonía, 1960 [The Major General Will Speak on Theogony]. This first play is ostensibly written against the tyranny of the 1920s, but is in reality directed against the Cuban dictator Batista, who had assumed office for the second time in 1952. The double time frame, which emphasizes the unchanging nature of tyranny in two distinct decades, is an early indication of what is to become a recurrent theme in Triana’s dramatic production: the form or the structure of power is not affected by changes in the ideological contents.

The next three plays, Medea en el espejo, 1960 [Medea in the Mirror], El parque de la Fraternidad, 1962 [Fraternity Park] and La muerte del Ñeque, 1964 [The Death of Enterprise] underscore the need to establish a new sociopolitical structure in order to escape the vicious circle of revolution and repression. In these three pieces, Triana seeks to demonstrate the need for a new way of ordering human relationships. Triana parodies the “official” history in an effort to give voice to the marginalized elements of Cuban society that constitute the Island’s “unofficial” history.

La muerte del Ñeque illustrates Triana’s dramatic trajectory. Though the action in the play takes place in the 1950s, and can be read as an indictment of political corruption under Batista, it is also a warning of things to come after the Cuban Revolution, as corruption had indeed begun by late 1963 and early 1964. Triana’s point, soon to be proven by the Castro government, is that the same corruption and repression that was present under Batista would inevitably resurface after Castro came to power. For Triana, as long as power is conceived of in terms of struggle, repression must inevitably accompany this struggle. Only a new order, a new structure, can change the process.

From this line of thought, then, emerged Triana’s best-known play, La noche de los asesinos (The Criminals) (written in 1964, produced in 1966 and winner of the Casa de las Américas Prize in 1965). A central feature in La noche is the constant interchange of roles among the three characters, Cuca, Lalo and Beba. The three siblings take turns playing the roles of Father, Mother, Neighbor, Police, Judge, Prosecutor and Witness in an ongoing “play within a play,” a continuing projet whose subject matter—never realized—is the murder of their parents. The play is a critique of the revolutionary process. No matter what role each character assumes, they can find no escape from the cyclical violence of the struggle for power. Violence always leads to reciprocal violence. The roles available to them are predetermined by the competitive, spectral coding that mediates relations of power. The house in which the children perform their play within a play serves as a metaphor of the national/family structure which constrains the repertoire of possible roles within Cuba’s system of sociopolitical communication and exchange. The children argue over changing the names of the rooms—the living room is to be called the kitchen and vice versa—but fail to see that the structure of the house is not affected by changing the names of the rooms (ideologies). They still remain trapped within the structure of the house. The repetitive oscillation through time between dominator and dominated that first appeared in El Mayor General is highlighted in La noche. Though the names and ideologies may change—Castro for Batista or Ortega for Somoza—the violent and repressive nature of the struggle for power remains the same through time. Revolutionary “progress” is illusory. In fact, the claim of each new revolution to create a “new” reality is shown to be a fiction, a myth. So long as the nature of the struggle for power remains constant, the only changes are in the identities of the individuals who fill the role of victimizer and victim. As the play demonstrates, the role of “victim” is a necessary one, for the children define themselves in opposition to their parents, who represent authority. The children cast the blame for their misery onto each other and onto their parents, while the parents, in their turn, do the same. Lalo justifies his own violent acts as a response to the violence perpetrated on him by his parents, claiming his parents initiated the violence. His parents punctuate the sequence of events in the opposite manner, and so blame Lalo for introducing the violence. In the “trial” that takes place in the play, the parents take turns blaming each other for initiating the violence in their (the parents’) relationship. Within the structure of the struggle for power, a symmetrical oscillation is established. No matter how the parties to the conflict punctuate their relations, as long as they accept the frame imposed by the violent nature of the power struggle they are doomed to an eternal repetition, to an oscillation ad infinitum. Thus the ritualized repetitive element of murder, or ritual sacrifice, highlighted in the play is part and parcel of the nature of the struggle for power. The revolution brings change only in terms of defining who shall be the sacrificial victim, and as Triana demonstrates, this definition is a direct function of power: those without power are defined as “victim” by those with the power to do so.

Thus, another aspect of Triana’s work deals with those defined as sacrificial victim and their relation to the official version of history. Triana’s professional and personal life is illustrative of the changing winds of power. When La noche was first performed it was hailed as a cultural achievement of the Cuban Revolution. It was not long, however, before it became obvious that what had at first appeared to be a critique of the Batista regime could be applied with equal facility to the Castro government. Triana’s support among the Cuban cultural elite soon eroded and he was forced first into internal exile, forbidden to write or publish, and later, in 1980, was again exiled from Cuba. The same people that had at first supported him now abandoned him and finally drove him once more from his homeland. After La noche, we may note a new dimension in Triana’s theatrical production. Whereas in the earlier plays he had dealt with the social groups that inhabited the margins of Cuban society—blacks, mulattos, the impoverished—in an attempt to show that these groups too were worthy of a tragic dimension, that their lives had passion and meaning, in the plays that follow La noche Triana deals with the problems of racism, sexism, honor, hypocrisy and repression in a manner that includes and indicted the middle and upper classes. Palabras comunes, a reworking of Diálogo para mujeres, 1979 [Dialogue for Women], is the story of a white, middle-class Cuban family during the transition from Spanish to North American rule, from 1894 to 1914. As is so often the case in Triana’s plays, the work simultaneously refers to the Cuba of the 1980s. The play points out the sexual and racial hierarchy of power relations—white male at the top and black female at the bottom—that permits the exploitation of those defined as beneath one in this hierarchy. The concept of honra (honor) is the motor that drives the sexual and racial economy. The female characters in the play produce and reproduce, across the generations, the Oedipal pattern of sexual repression and inhibition that constrains their social communication and exchange. To contest these relations of power is to be marked as “other” or sacrificial victim, a fate which befalls Victoria in the play. Honra is the social equivalent of the political structure that constrains the revolutionary struggle for power. Both structures, and they overlap and are intertwined, generate an endless cycle of repression and violence, an eternal repetition of the same process. Though the names of the players may change from context to context, the rules of the game appear immune to change. Thus the allegorical structure of the house in La noche—nation, family, government—and the allegorical words that constrain our social selves—honra, be it family honor, a woman’s honor, or personal honor—both represent those shared structures, our social and political norms or rules, that define and limit our sociopolitical communication, both in word and in deed. What Triana seeks to manifest through his theater is the need to contest the structures that trap us in a narrow range of actions, in a repetitive series of endless oscillations between what only appear to be choices, but are in reality two sides of the same coin, the same endless cycle of violence and repression, of honor, hypocrisy and revenge. Both honra and revolution require an “other,” a sacrificial victim. And when that victim gains power, be s/he man or woman, black or white, capitalist or Marxist, the only alternative available under the present structuring of power is to continue the cycle. Triana points out the ultimate futility, and human cost, of seeking change within a sociopolitical structure that essentially permits only two options in its repertoire of social roles: victim or victimizer, master or slave. Triana shows the fruitlessness of contesting relations of power from within the structure that informs these relations and the need to evolve beyond a system trapped in endless cycles of reciprocal violence.

JERRY HOEG

Biography

Selected Works

Plays

El parque de la Fraternidad, Havana: UNEAC, 1962 [Includes Medea en el espejo and El Mayor General hablará de Teogonía]

La muerte del Ñeque, Havana: Ediciones R., 1964

Palabras comunes, in Tramoya. Cuaderno de Teatro de la Universidad Veracruzana, 1987
Ceremonial de guerra, Honolulu: Editorial Persona, 1990

Poetry
De la madera de los sueños, Madrid: Gráficos Bachende, 1958
Coloquio de sombras, in Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos 374 (1981)
Aproximaciones, Málaga: Plaza de la Marina, 1989
Cuaderno de familia, Málaga: Dador/Quinto Centenario, 1990

Compilations and Anthologies
Teatro, Madrid: Verbum, 1991 [Contains Medea en el espejo, La noche de los asesinos, Palabras comunes]

Further Reading
Campa, Ramón de la, José Triana: ritualización de la sociedad cubana, Madrid: Cátedra, 1979
Lolo, Eduardo, Las trampas del tiempo y sus memorias, Miami: Hallmark, 1991
Nigro, Kirsten (editor), Palabras más que comunes: ensayos sobre el teatro de José Triana, Boulder: Colorado: Society of Spanish and Spanish-American Studies, 1994
Ortega, Julio, “La noche de los asesinos” Cuadernos Americanos 164 (1969)
Taylor, Diana (editor), En busca de una imagen: ensayos críticos sobre Griselda Gambaro y José Triana, Ottawa: Girol, 1989
Zalacaín, Daniel, Teatro absurdista hispanoamericano, Valencia: Albatros/Hispanófila, 1985

Tropiques

See Journals
U

Ubaldo Ribeiro, João

See Ribeiro

Uruguay

19th- and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

The Uruguayan literary canon is a pedagogical apparatus, a monument to and of the National Imaginary, and the crystallization of a social struggle for cultural hegemony. With this in mind, and considering that any synthesis is also a system of exclusions, some key moments in Uruguayan cultural history will be mapped-out, mostly through canonical literary texts.

The foundations of Uruguayan literature can be traced to Francisco Acuña de Figueroa (1790–1862) and Bartolomé Hidalgo (1788–1822). Although both are canonized as Neoclassicists, they paradigmatically represent the main fractures that inform 19th-century literature until the advent of Modernismo. Acuña de Figueroa is the foremost Neoclassic poet in the La Plata area. Author of the national anthem, among many other celebratory, commissioned works, Acuña has been considered a mediocre lyric and heroic poet, but an extraordinary satirist. His burlesque poetry includes epigrams, chronicles of bull-fighting and parodic epic poems full of political and literary allusions. One of the canon’s untouchables due to his shifting, opportunistic politics, Acuña has lately been re-evaluated as a distant forerunner of concrete and visual poetry. The recent re-publication of his licentious Nomenclatura y apología del carajo [Nomenclature and Apology of the Prick] and the religiously ambiguous game-prayer “La Salve multiforme” [The Multiform Salve] are cases in point.

While Acuña represents the erudite colonial and urban letrado (man of letters), Hidalgo, a mulatto fully immersed in the revolution for independence, is the founder of gauchesque poetry. The gauchos, seminomadic, landless rural peons, became, because of their skillful riding and cattle herding, the main source of manpower in the Wars of Independence. Hidalgo’s genius was to appropriate the gaucho’s oral culture and to transform it into a literary genre. He invented a gauchesque language, hybrid literary forms (the cielitos [song and dance] and dialogues), and a new mode of production which combined urban printing techniques with rural singing performance. Gauchesque poetry and theatre, which should not be confused with gaucho culture, are, by far, the most original cultural apparatus in 19th-century Latin America. Both Acuña’s and Hidalgo’s productions exemplify the early fracture between two publics, two markets, two opposing cultures, a contradiction usually referred to as one between the elitist and the popular, the city and the countryside, the traditional and the new, or, as Domingo Faustino Sarmiento put it, between “civilization and barbarism.” This contradiction traverses the history of the entire region, and its axis is gauchesque literature, the intermediary between the letrado’s organizational projects and the gaucho’s social needs. Originally attracted to the revolutionary camp by Hidalgo’s cielitos, the gauchos were later drafted by the armies of opposing political parties during countless civil wars. Thus arises a second, truly propagandistic gauchesque production. It coincides with the exile of the Romantics of the Young Argentine movement to Montevideo, where they united with their Uruguayans counterpart around the periodical El Iniciador [The Initiator], and is best represented by Hilario Ascasubi (1807–75) and Estanislao del Campo (1834–80), both Argentines by birth. Their literary production, both gauchesque and letrado, during the Great War (1836–51) however, pertains to a pre-national culture of this region, independent of state boundaries. Antonio Lussich’s Los tres gauchos orientales [The Three Oriental Gauchos] and José Hernández’s El gaucho Martín Fierro (The Gaucho Martín Fierro), two key texts published in 1872, deal with more specifically national issues. The combined impact of economic modernization and the civil wars culminates in the gauchos’ virtual extinction by the end of the 19th century. This situation empowers the transformation of gauchesque poetry into criollismo, a “tamed gauchesque poetry,” and an elegy to the vanishing gaucho, symbolically elevated to a national ideomyth at the very time of his real social decimation. Creole writers, such as Alcides de María (1858–1908) and Orosmán Moratorio (1852–98), led by Elías Regules (1860–1929), the founder of traditionalism, spread this Neoromantic, nationalistic creed from journals such as El Fogón ([The Camp Fire] 1895–1913), as resistance to the tremendous impact of massive immigration, technological modernization, and economic adaptation to international capitalism.

Neoromanticism, associated with the creation of a national historiography by Francisco Bauzá (1849–99), Isidoro de María (1815–1906) and Carlos María Ramírez (1848–98), pervaded other foundational discourses, necessary corollaries to the institutionalization of the modern state, which included paramount educational reform by the positivist philosopher José Pedro Varela (1845–79). Juan Zorrilla de San Martín (1855–1931)—the Poet of the Fatherland—invented a Carlylean national mythology in La leyenda patria, 1879 [Legend of the Fatherland] and Tabaré (1888). These long, epic poems—oratorical rhetoric in verse—established the nation’s foundational ideomyths in the extinct Charruan warriors and defeated caudillos, who automatically became the very pillars of the Uruguayan national imaginary. Fusing Walter Scott’s Romanticism with Realist aesthetics, Eduardo Acevedo Díaz’s (1851–1924) historical novels and gaucho romances founded a national narrative obsessed with the remnants of an ideologically unresolved past.

With the turn of the century, the literary and cultural climate changed gear. The NeoRomantics, torn between Positivist pragmatism and spiritualist idealism in their efforts to forge a National Imaginary, gave way to a new generation, born in the complex ideological flux of modernity, who initiated a creative, cultural explosion. Several aesthetic trends and contradictory philosophical schools converge in the amorphous generation of 1900. Canonical modernista poetry, characterized by its aestheticism, cosmopolitanism, exoticism and apparent escapism, is to be found in the figures of Julio Herrera y Reissig (1875–1910), Roberto de las Carreras (1873–1964), María Eugenia Vaz Ferreira (1875–1924) and Delmira Agustini (1886–1914). All of them, however, produced an excessive Modernismo: Agustini’s overt sexuality pushed patriarchy to its limits, de las Carreras’s dandyism scandalized social decorum, Herrera’s hyperbolic and metaphoric gunfire deconstructed the very premises of modernista aesthetics. Because these modernistas were denied the traditional role of letrados, as members of a class in the process of extinction and due to their reluctance to professionalize in capitalist terms, their self-marginalization led them to capture the inner contradictions of peripheric modernity, and consequently to produce the most ferociously ambiguous response to it. Another sort of ambiguity pervades the naturalistic, creole short-stories by Javier de Viana (1868–1926), and the more ambitious production of Carlos Reyles (1868–1926), a rich land-owner like Viana, who applied in his modernista-criollista novels and essays a conservative theory fusing Nietzsche, Marx and Social Darwinism, in order to demonstrate the natural superiority and national necessity of his class. Reyles developed his “ideology of strength” in direct response to the politics of José Batlle y Ordóñez (1856–1929) who, from a base of urban, lower-middle classes, blue-collar workers and immigrants, transformed the Uruguayan state into the most socially oriented democracy in the Americas. This democratic revolution made possible the consolidation of a new imaginary of the Model Republic, based on cosmopolitan insularism: Uruguay became an oddity, an almost European enclave on Latin American soil. Horacio Quiroga (1878–1937), another prominent member of the 1900 Generation, also reacted against the inevitability of mass society, though in a very tangential and complex way. He exiled himself to the Argentine jungles of Misiones, where, isolated from modern affairs, he cultivated a primitive self-image and perfected his metaphysically exotic short stories, which he published in Argentine magazines, thus becoming a truly modern professional writer.

Prominent in the climate of Batlle’s Model Republic was the “social question,” promoted by two of the main ideological discourses of modernity, anarchism and socialism. Although most of the modernistas adhered to some sort of libertarianism, there were a few decided activists. Ángel Falco (b. 1885) and Álvaro Armando Vasseur (1878–1969) projected the progressive cosmopolitanism of the city through their poetic rhetoric of barricade, a quasi-mystical defense of the down-trodden, and a proletarian internationalism diluted by a certain aristocratic intellectualism. Eventually, most of the anarchist poets would be co-opted by Batllism, while Emilio Frugoni (1880–1969) would become the upmost symbol of socialist politics. But it was theatre, the only truly popular media of the time, which allowed for the expression of anarchist and socialist ideas. It was in fact, an international theatre, covering a common market in both Argentina and Uruguay and was the most original mode of cultural production, following the gauchesque. This theatre arose from the mimes performed in itinerant creole circuses and was developed by the bi-national Podestá family. It combined drama, music and dance, fused creolist payadas (improvised song versification) with the Neoromantic folletín (serialized novels), and adapted European minor genres to allow for the symbolic representation of conflicting cultures and ideologies. Florencio Sánchez (1875–1910) and later, Ernesto Herrera (1889–1917) are the major representatives of a myriad of dramatists who portrayed in hundreds of plays the conflicts brought about by modernization, as expressed through such themes as the vanishing gaucho, struggling immigrants, class conflicts, ethnic differences, pre-capitalist and capitalist generations. Despite its general critique of traditional values, this theatre conveys the most radical analysis of the impact of peripheric modernization on the city and the countryside.

The most internationally renowned essayist of the generation of 1900 is José Enrique Rodó (1872–1917), whose early Ariel (1900) catapulted him to continental acclaim. Written in reaction to the Spanish-American War and the US seizure of Cuba and Puerto Rico, Ariel provided young Hispanic American intellectuals with a compensatory ideology for resisting US expansionism in a symbolic way. Arielism became a trademark of Hispanic American spiritual superiority and inner sovereignty as opposed to the materialist ideology espoused by US capitalism. Despite his cultural anti-imperialism, Rodó despised mass society, and opposed Batlle’s democratic project, in another dubious reaction to peripheric modernity that goes well beyond Uruguayan borders and continues to infuse Latin American thought even now.

Once the most radical excesses of Modernismo began to recede, the divergent strands of criollismo, internationalism, aestheticism, exoticism and theatrical realism converged in a modern nationalist revival, sparked by the various European vanguardisms. This movement, which embraces all forms of art, is best exemplified in painting, and in particular by Pedro Figari’s (1882–1950) multi-faceted production, including early theorization in Arte, estética, ideal, 1912 [Art, Aesthetics, Ideal], a partially failed, pedagogical institutionalization of “industrial art,” modeled after the Arts and Crafts School, and his own painting, best described as universal nativism. Figari accomplished the bucolic representation of local people and landscapes, with an ironic twist that harmonized the nostalgic recovery of popular traditions with a cosmological Utopia well-embedded in his post-impressionist palette. It is symptomatic that his Nativism coincided with the consolidation of a modern, urban society, and explains the reproduction of the rural landscape from an already urban and cosmopolitan point of view. This is equally true of Eduardo Fabini’s musical impressionism (1882–1950), the poetry of Fernán Silva Valdés (1887–1975), Pedro Leandro Ipuche (1889–1976) and José Alonso y Trelles (who wrote under the pseudonym El Viejo Pancho, 1857–1924), the chronicles by Justino Zavala Muniz (1898–1968), the rural short stories by Francisco Espinola (1901–73) and Juan José Morosoli (1899–1957), the popular legends by Serafín J. García (1908–85), and the somber novels by Enrique Amorim (1900–60). Although universal nativism seems to extend to most of the artistic and literary production of the 1920s, a strictly urban and cosmopolitan literature, as exemplified by Alberto Zum Felde’s literary criticism (1889–1976), begins to establish itself with increasing prominence. Theatrical production, directly linked to urban audiences since Sánchez’s founding years, tended in this direction. José Pedro Bellán (1889–1930) dealt with women’s emancipation in a patriarchal society in both his novels and his theatre. This heated political issue concludes, under Carlos Vaz Ferreira’s humanist pragmatism (1873–1958), with one of the most advanced legal corpus in the Americas. Juan Parra del Riego (1894–1925), a Peruvian by birth, celebrated popular culture in his experimental, polirhythmic poetry on soccer, just as Alfredo Mario Ferreiro (1899–1959) paid tribute to any and all modern artifacts in his ultimately nostalgic Futurism. This absurdist, humoristic and sometimes fantastic literature led to Felisberto Hernández’s (1902–64) overcharged atmospheres and Kafkaian translation of Uruguayan intrahistory. Despite its apparent Utopianism, exemplified in the universal constructivism of José Torres García’s art (1874–1949) and the jubilant optimism of the poetry of Juana de Ibarbourou (1895–1979), this literature was already mined with a certain melancholic skepticism. It heralded the open criticism of the generation of 1945, another promotion loosely organized around several periodicals, among them Carlos Quijano’s Marcha (1939–74). The hypercriticism of the generation of 1945, traced duly back to the philosophy of Vaz Ferreira, must be interpreted as an intellectual reaction to the first signs of the economic, social, political and imaginary crises of the Model Republic. This explains the fact that while previous production was eminently literary, literature from the 1950s on will be inextricably bound to social, historical and political discourses. Indeed, some of the best writers are anthropologists (Daniel Vidart), historians (Alberto Methol Ferré and José Pedro Barrán), philosophers (Arturo Ardaio and Juan Luis Segundo), literary critics (Emir Rodríguez Monegal and Ángel Rama), or all of the above (Carlos Real de Azúa). The crisis of the Model Republic led to a complete revision of Uruguayan nationhood. Many embraced some sort of revolutionary politics; others fell prey to a profoundly existential nihilism. Both cases are paradigmatically represented by Mario Benedetti and Juan Carlos Onetti, respectively. Benedetti’s novels, short stories and journalistic articles portrayed Montevidean everyday life so candidly that all his books, coinciding with an editorial boom, became instant best-sellers. The middle classes identified with Benedetti’s ironically irreverent rendition of Uruguayan hegemonic culture, and helped to challenge society’s self-image at the time of its crisis. Onetti, a master novelist, represents a full-fledged indictment of Uruguayan culture as well, and perhaps its more exact interpretation. In all of his novels Onetti develops a sordid and tangoesque world of alienated, perversely sexist and solitary characters who reflect the bankruptcy of the “Switzerland of America.” Like many other writers and intellectuals, Onetti was forced into exile in 1975 by the military dictatorship. His refusal to return from Spain after neodemocratic restoration in 1985, and his wish not to be buried on Uruguayan soil, must be read as his ultimate statement. But Onetti’s harshness toward Uruguayan culture is not exceptional. The ethical inquiry in Carlos Martínez Moreno’s novels or the oppressive depiction of marginal experiences in Armonía Somers, is paralleled in the poetry of Humberto Megget (1926–61), Ida Vitale (b. 1928), Idea Vilariño (b. 1920), Liber Falco (1906–55) and Sarandy Cabrera (b. 1923). The founding in 1942 of the Comedia Nacional, through the united efforts of writer and politician Zavala Muniz, author-impresario Ángel Curotto and the Spanish-born actress Margarita Xirgu, began a second theatrical Golden Age, which extended, in the 1950s and 1960s, into the full-fledged production of an independent theatre movement. Numerous troupes stage plays by Andrés Castillo, Antonio Larreta, Carlos Maggi and Mauricio Rosencof, who explore and dissect social and cultural disintegration through the combination of absurdist and expressionist comedy and carnivalesque, grotesque tragedy.

By the end of the 1960s, Uruguay had entered into a definitive social and political crisis. Economic debacle, institutional instability, trade-unionist defiance, urban guerrilla warfare, and military repression shaped the climate of violent confrontation that forged literary responses to a now unstable universe. The poetry of Hugo Achúgar, Jorge Arbeleche, Nancy Bacelo, Washington Benavides, Marosa di Giorgio, Circe Maia and Walter Ortiz y Ayala, and narratives by Anderssen Banchero, Gley Eyherabide, Híber Conteris, Sylvia Lago, Mario Levrero, Cristina Peri Rossi and Teresa Porzecanski, all share a political urgency manifested in an allegorical leap of the imagination. Their sense of urgency can probably be best exemplified by Eduardo Galeano’s best-seller Las venas abiertas de América Latina, 1971 (The Open Veins of Latin America), in which his nervously journalistic style contrasts sharply with an ambitious scope.

The military coup of 1973 marked the beginning of the end. Neofascist repression forced most of the intelligenśia into exile, thus breaking Uruguayan cultural production in two: a culture of exile, which, cut loose from its moorings, drifted between a nostalgic longing for the no longer viable Model Republic, and its own enrichment through marginality in other hegemonic environments. The counterculture of exile, a culture of endurance due to repressive military politics under neofascism, was forced to resort to non-canonical artistic and literary means. This climate nurtured a highly coded poetry that added the new voices of Rafael Courtoise, Alfredo Fressia, Ibero Gutiérrez, Alicia Migdal and Eduardo Milán. The “popular song” movement, the main vehicle of cultural resistance, became the cauldron for a renaissance of several subcultural genres such as carnival’s murga and African-Uruguayan candombe, as well as rural folk music and several trends of fusion rock. Some of the best poetry was produced to be sung, in exile by Alfredo Zitarrosa or Jaime Roos, or in exile, by Leo Maslia, Horacio Buscaglia, Fernando Cabrera, and murga bands such as La soberana and Falta y resto.

After the restoration of neodemocracy in 1985, the counterculture of exile gave way to a proliferation of subcultures, on a fragmented scene characterized by intense confrontation, aesthetic diversity, and the emergence of new cultural practices and artistic discourses. The testimonial literature by Fernando Butazzoni, Eleuterio Fernández Huidobro, Ernesto González Bermejo and Rosencof, and the narrative inquiry into the colonial and indigenous past by Alejandro Paternain, Tomás de Mattos and Napoleón Baccino Ponce de León, as well as the plays of Milton Schinca and Alberto Restuccia, contribute to a new questioning of national identity. The popular subcultures, suppressed until now, have created a place for themselves. Popular song is no longer enough to convey the creativity of the youngest poets, who resort to graffiti, underground magazines, performances and presses devoted exclusively to production on the edge of hegemonic culture. The liminal post-vanguardist poetry by Cecilia Álvarez, Héctor Bardanca, Lalo Barrubia, Luis Bravo, Silvia Guerra, or Gustavo Wojciechowski, complements narratives by Pablo Casacuberta, Mario Delgado Aparain, Leo Masliah, Elbio Rodriguez Barilari and Gabriel Vieira, who all seek, through the hybridization of genres and styles, to translate the perplexity of a culture at the postnational crossroads. They produce, alongside other liminoid discourses such as graffiti, rock or carnival, the most profound demystification of hegemonic Uruguayan culture ever witnessed. Paradoxically, they prove, as well, its inner vitality in the postmodern transnational arena.

ABRIL TRIGO
Further Reading

Moraña, Mabel, Memorias de la generación fantasma, Montevideo: Montesexto, 1988
Oreggioni, Alberto (editor), Diccionario de literatura uruguaya, 3 vols, Montevideo: Arca, 1987–91
Rama, Ángel (editor), Cien años de raros: antología y prólogo, Montevideo: Arca, 1966
Trigo, Abril, Caudillo, estado nación. Literatura, historia e ideología en el Uruguay, Gaithersburg, Maryland: Hispamérica, 1990

Special Issues of Journals

Afro-Hispanic Review, vol. 12/2 (Fall 1993) [Contains several articles on African-Uruguayan writers]

Rodolfo Usigli 1905–1979

Mexican dramatist

Nearly forty plays, created over a period of as many years and ranging from one-act farces to a full-length historical drama in verse, constitute the dramatic work of Rodolfo Usigli. Few have been translated, many of them are still unperformed and many remained unpublished until the collected edition in two volumes (1963–66), which regrettably did not include the Shavian prefaces Usigli wrote for some of the plays—they were reprinted in a third volume (1979). Fortunately, Usigli’s detailed stage directions make the action of his plays easy to visualise, compensating in some measure for the lack of performances.

Usigli’s comedies and dramas of family life typically present cases of marital infidelity, clashes between generations, and secrets from the past which threaten the present. In El niño y la niebla, 1936 [The Child and the Mist], Marta attempts to turn Daniel, the son of her loveless marriage to Guillermo Estrada, against his father, and through hypnopaedic suggestion she persuades the boy, a sleepwalker, that he must kill Guillermo. Daniel wakes up as he is about to shoot, goes out and kills himself. Marta refuses to leave Guillermo for her lover Mauricio, fearing that any other child of hers would inherit her family’s madness, which she has now recognised in Daniel. Mental instability also plays a part in Jano es una muchacha, 1952 [Janus is a Girl]; Marina, schoolgirl daughter of Víctor Iglesias, has unknowingly repeated her dead mother Arcelia’s fascination with a brothel, which Victor is forced to admit that he owns; Arcelia’s experiences there were the result of her sense of guilt after being raped. Victor further confesses that his real love, which he has suppressed for years, is for Arcelia’s sister Eulalia; horrified and disgusted, Eulalia kills him. The secret concealed from Carlos Torres-Mendoza in La familia cena en casa, 1942 [The Family Dines at Home] concerns his dead father’s conduct; Carlos believes his friend Enrique’s accusation that his malpractice and swindling had created the family fortune. His mother Matilde sets matters right by revealing that her husband had in fact secretly helped Enrique’s father to avoid loss of all his assets and later supported Enrique’s family when his mother’s gambling had threatened ruin. The farewell tour by Verónica in La función de despedida, 1949 [Farewell Performance], begins in her home town, where she stays in a guest-house run by Manuel, the childhood sweetheart whom she had left behind when she set out on her stage career. Véronica’s recognition of Manuel comes late, but in time to prevent him from repeating the errors of the past by frustrating his own children’s ambitions.

Excessive respect for appearances and the concealment of true motives, which provide so much of the material for the plays on social themes, were easily carried over into Usigli’s political satires, a subgenre he cultivated throughout his career. His first explorations of the field produced the Tres comedias impolíticas, 1933–35 [Three Impolitic Comedies], in the first of which, Noche de estío [A Night in High Summer], during what proves to be an abortive communist coup, the General/President makes a spirited defence of the Mexican Revolution and the benefits it has brought, and of his own exercise of power, to two of his ministers and four members of the younger generation of varied views, but once the danger has passed his chief concern is to ensure that what has transpired remains secret. The second play, El Presidente y el ideal [The President and the Ideal], presents, in a series of sketches set in a school, a university, a newspaper office, an army mess, a peasant community, a café and a meeting of mothers of schoolchildren, the comic effects of the introduction of President Ávalos’s doctrinaire socialist program. The politicians declare that Ávalos must soon fall, but when they and the military meet at the residence of “el Jefe” (the General of Noche de estío) to confront the president, it is Ávalos who emerges triumphant, while the former leader is expelled—just as Calles was by President Cárdenas following the Mexican presidential election of 1934. Such specific reference to contemporary politics is avoided in the third play of the set, Estado de secreto [State of Secrecy], which portrays the corrupt dealings of a minister of sufficient guile and influence as to be able to deceive the president over a murder committed by one of his aides and eventually to achieve the president’s resignation. The minister of La última puerta, 1934–36 [The Last Door], is never seen, and indeed his very existence is doubted by those who attend his office daily; when they mount an assault on his office, he resigns. Inadequate cultural policies and corrupt administration are also a main issue in La exposición, 1955–59 [The Exhibition], though much of the play concerns art, artists and their critics in modern Mexico, where by that time Usigli himself had held various influential official positions.

One other play falls within this category, though it is not set in Mexico but in “Indolandia,” the southern neighbour of powerful “Demolandia;” Un día de éstos, 1953
(One of These Days), deals with the fortuitous accession to the presidency of a senior official, following the assassination of the country’s political leaders. Gómez Urbina’s principal tasks as president are to investigate the assassinations and prepare for new elections; his efficiency enables him to discover the truth, but as a former president is involved, he needs to gain the people’s support for administering justice. This he does by provoking Demolandia, expelling the ambassador on the grounds of unwarranted interference in Indolandian affairs, and blackmauling former presidents into paying off the national debt from the fortunes they built up during their terms in office. An attempted assassination fails, but brings on a fatal heart attack, whereupon the politicians immediately break into a squabble over the succession. The fantasy world of Indolandia and Demolandia may not offer any realistic solution to Mexican problems, but the play includes acute observations on contemporary geopolitics, with Maoist China, Argentina and Britain also appearing under transparent aliases.

Gómez Urbina in some ways recalls César Rubio, the central character of El gesticulador, 1938 (The Great Gesture, or Another Caesar), and Usigli’s most complex creation. César, a historian who taught the Mexican Revolution in Mexico City, moves north to his home town in search of a better living, against the wishes of his children. His opportunity comes through exploiting his knowledge of a leading figure of the Revolution who shared his name and birthplace to impress Bolton, a young US historian. When Bolton publicises his “discovery” of the legendary César Rubio, César is caught up in local politics, becoming the official PRI candidate for the provincial governorship. His knowledge of his namesake and of the Revolution makes his success certain, causing his rival, who had killed the other Rubio in 1916, to have him assassinated. Like Gómez Urbina, César emerges from obscurity to demonstrate real ability to formulate policy, but he is not given the chance to put his ideas to the test. His tragic flaw is the self-delusion which leads him to adopt another man’s identity, in the belief that his policies will benefit Mexico. As in his other political plays, Usigli points clearly to popular disillusionment with the results of the revolutionary struggle, not least because of the corruption which bedevils the higher echelons of the ruling party. The Revolution itself in 1915–17, seen from the sidelines of a working-class suburb of Mexico City, is presented in Las madres, 1949–60 [Mothers], a loosely-structured pageant of a society at war, torn apart by factions, where fathers are mostly away at the front, replaced as role models by brutal soldiery.

Usigli’s preoccupation with Mexico’s identity underlies his three major historical plays. The earliest, Corona de sombra, 1943 (Crown of Shadows), deals with the brief reign of the Emperor Maximilian, seen in flashback during a conversation in 1927 between a Mexican historian and Maximilian’s widow Charlotte. The scenes from the past show Maximilian as convinced of the necessity to draw all Mexicans into the political process, against the advice of criollo aristocrats and European military commanders. In the historian’s view Maximilian achieved true independence for Mexico, though failing personally. An earlier opportunity to establish Mexican independence presented itself to Cortés, who in Corona de fuego, 1943 (Crown of Fire), is seen contemplating an alliance with Cuauhtémoc, eventually rejected in favour of the benefit to be gained from loyalty and obedience to Charles V of Spain. The circumstances of the miracle at Tepeyácatl in 1531, which created the conditions for the cult of Our Lady of Guadalupe, are the subject of Corona de luz, 1963 (Crown of Light): for Fray Juan de Zumárraga, bishop of Mexico, the true miracle lies in the acceptance of the event by the Indian population as a miracle of their own, not alien but Mexican.

RON KEIGHTLEY

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 17 November 1905. Both parents were recent immigrants to Mexico. Father died when Rodolfo was a baby; Polish mother a beneficial influence in his formative years. She raised four children during the decade of the Mexican Revolution and, despite a tough life, taught her children Polish, German and French. Usigli struggled against both physical handicaps (poor eyesight and hearing) and poverty. Unable to complete secondary education, but attended adult evening courses for two years (1923–25). By 1933 he was working at the Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM) and held an administrative post in the Ministry of Education. Recieved a Rockefeller scholarship to study drama at Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1935–36. Joined diplomatic service and spent period 1944–46 in France. Able to meet George Bernard Shaw whom he had venerated for many years. El gesticulador premiered in Mexico City in 1947 and was a success. Travelled abroad again in 1956 and held diplomatic posts in Lebanon (1957–60) and Norway (1960–72). Returned to Mexico in early 1970s. Last years were of loneliness and bitterness because his dramaturgy had been superseded by that of a younger generation. Died in Mexico City, 8 June 1979.

Selected Works

Plays
Teatro completo de Rodolfo Usigli, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 3 vols, 1963–79 [A full list of these plays is given in the bibliography of Peter R. Beardsell’s study on Usigli (see below)]

Essays
México en el teatro, Mexico City: Imprenta Mundial, 1932; as Mexico in the Theater, translated by Wilder P. Scott, University, Mississippi: Romance Monographs, 1976
Anatomía del teatro, Mexico City: Gráficas Menhir, 1967
Conversaciones y encuentros de Rodolfo Usigli, Mexico City: Novaro, 1974

Novel
Ensayo de un crimen, Mexico City: América, 1944

Poetry
Conversación desesperada, poemas, Mexico City: Caudernos de México Nuevo, 1938

Further Reading

Arturo Uslar Pietri 1906–

Venezuelan prose writer

Arturo Uslar Pietri is certainly one of the most renowned writers of contemporary Venezuelan literature. The depth of his culture, the breadth of his interests and the range of his publications are impressive: for almost seven decades (since the 1920s) he has been making frequent contributions in the following fields: poetry, short stories, journalistic articles, novels, plays, and essays are part of his voluminous work.

Uslar’s vocation for public service explains the form and orientation of the major part of his essayistic work. Very few of his essays are of a lyrical or speculative nature. Most of them, before being collected in books, have appeared in “Pizarrón” [Blackboard], a weekly syndicated column that he has been publishing with very few interruptions, since 1947. Uslar’s special talent is to present even the most complicated subject in a clear and understandable way. His goal has been to reach not just an intellectual elite, but the largest possible audience. Many of his articles deal with current events he interprets with characteristic lucidity and synthetic power. He frequently resorts to catchy phrases and symbols to convey his ideas. In July 1936 in an article appearing in a Caracas newspaper he coined the phrase “Sembrar el petróleo” (Sowing Our Oil). With remarkable insight he warned of a future catastrophe if the economic benefits derived from oil were not used to improve Venezuela’s agricultural output and create new industries that would free the country from its dependence on that product. Years later, in De una a otra Venezuela, 1950 [From One Venezuela to Another], he identified as Venezuela’s defining historical plight, the battle against the Minotaur of Oil, a monster devouring the vital substance of his country. The exorbitant and foolish squandering by Venezuelans of the profits from petroleum is the “festín de Baltasar” (Belshazzar’s feast). The message of future doom, he said, was already visible, just as it was to the biblical king in the midst of his orgy.

In many of his essays Uslar searches for the identity of Venezuelans and Latin Americans. In Letras y hombres de Venezuela, 1948 [Men and Literature in Venezuela], he identified important traits in the collective soul from which Venezuelan literature stems: a passion for equality, a messianic cult and the psychology of the mestizo. In other essays Uslar expands his search to find the true source of Latin American uniqueness. Some of his observations had previously appeared in the writings of José Vasconcelos, Alfonso Reyes and Germán Arciniegas. But Uslar’s original contributions to the subject are also important. In Las Nubes, 1951 [The Clouds], mestizaje is described as the essential feature of Latin American identity. For Uslar, though, the racial aspect is not as important or significant as the cultural one. He believes that many 19th-century thinkers erred in seeing the mixing of races as an undesirable trait of inferiority: “They forgot that Europe was a veritable racial hodge-podge and that the mixing of races… was far from being the sole cause or only form of cultural mestizaje.” This latter characteristic, according to Uslar, may be seen, for example, in Latin American art and literature, where the linear succession of schools and epochs which characterizes Europe, is replaced by a simultaneous coexistence of old and new tendencies. In Godos, insurgentes y visionarios, 1986 [Conservatives, Insurgents and Visionaries], Uslar invites Latin Americans to accept all the elements of their past and cast aside the prejudices that have prevented them from fully understanding their heritage, or the representative nature of the many caudillos (strong men) that have dominated their history.

This deep desire to understand the past may explain why, to this date, Uslar has written mostly historical novels. Uslar sees history not only as an explanation of the past, but also as “an opportunity for creating the future.” Rather than being interested in the linear history of events and people, he has focused on “that process of making and unmaking, more suitable for the novelist than the historian” (Del hacer y deshacer [About Doing and Undoing]). Uslar’s seven novels, published between 1931 and 1990, cover an ample historical panorama. The most successful of them and one that has received the greatest critical acclaim is Las lanzas coloradas, 1931 (The Red Lances). The most important episodes in this novel take place at the beginning of 1814, a period characterized by furious battles between the royalist Boves and the generals in the rebel camp. The reduced historical space allows a more dramatic and poetic presentation of the plot. Before deciding to write this novel, Uslar had thought of preparing a movie script. Many critics have pointed out the cinematographic qualities of this work. Uslar’s focus changes alternatively between the two main characters. This parallelistic technique is also used with respect to Boves and Bolívar, whose arrivals are announced by powerful and rhythmic leitmotifs.

The language has the most varied nuances, from the colorful deformations in the fables told by the African slaves, to the graphic description of the gory battles where blood itself has a life of its own. Uslar illuminates a tragic period of Venezuelan history and present the conflict as a veritable civil war where class and racial hatred play a significant role. Las lanzas coloradas gives an epic flavor to its battle scenes and spins a story that keeps its readers enthralled. The novelist integrates successfully the lyrical, dramatic and epic elements in his work, without the unnecessary interference of the narrator, or the excessive details of other historical novels.

Uslar’s subsequent novels did not attain the critical success enjoyed by Las lanzas coloradas. Critics noted the traditional format and lack of experimentation in these works. Uslar’s conservative formal approach may be explained by his desire to give more depth and prominence to the periods and events related to his protagonists. Furthermore, he was not willing to enhance artistic creativity at the expense of historical truthfulness. In his last two novels, La isla de Róbinson, 1981 [Robinson’s Island], and La visita en el tiempo, 1990 [The Recurring Visit], non-traditional techniques are added. In the former, two different streams of time illuminate Simon Rodríguez’s personality, ideas, triumphs and failures. In the latter, mythopoetic elements associated with Hamlet, Calderón’s...
Segismundo and Don Juan are developed and woven around the figure of Don John of Austria, the winner at the battle of Lepanto. These novels represent a modest but significant attempt by Uslar to satisfy some of his critics’ objections, without resorting to the falsification evidenced in some popular historical novels written by other Latin American writers.

Uslar’s short stories have received greater critical acclaim than his novels. He has shown in that genre the desire to revise constantly and to renew his themes, emphases, techniques and narrative approaches. Uslar’s first collection of short stories, Barrabás y otros relatos, 1928 [Barabbas and Other Stories], had a great impact on Venezuelan letters. Most critics consider this book a landmark that signals the beginning of the modern short story in Venezuela. Before Barrabás, the dominant approach had been criollismo, with its often plastic and superficial native landscape and excessive description of “typical” garments and dialect. Barrabás does not completely exclude the native scenery (six of its sixteen stories have regional settings), but it generally avoids stereotypical language or the usual small town setting of costumbrista stories. The influence of avant-garde movements in Barrabás may be detected in its metaphorical images and in the use of oneiric or subconscious states. The cosmopolitan element is present in several stories. One of them, which provides the name to the collection, depicts Barabbas as a passive human being involved involuntarily in a trascendental event.

In his second collection, Red, 1936 [The Net], Uslar effectively introduces magical realism in Latin American letters. A few years later, he would define this orientation as the “treatment of man as a mystery in the midst of realistic data” and also as “a poetic discovery or denial of reality” (Letras y hombres). In magical realism, there is an unusual fact or circumstance whose logic or satisfactory explanation is withheld by the writer. More than one third of the stories in Red can be ascribed to magic realism. On the other hand, almost all the stories in the book have native settings. The avant-garde images so prevalent in Barrabás are practically absent. Literary techniques are much more varied and include the use of counterpoint, superposition of time levels, unattributed dialogs, personification and alliteration.

In Treinta hombres y sus sombras, 1949 [Thirty Men and Their Shadows], Uslar again changes his approach. He continues to present criollo scenarios, but does away with metaphoric recourses while using the simplest or most direct descriptive techniques. Uslar realizes a deeper immersion into his country’s rural environment and its culture by incorporating a modest amount of dialectal words and expressions, and a greater representation of collective psychology and folkloric elements related to the oral tradition of Indians and other rural communities.

In his last two collections of short stories, Uslar changes course again. This time, magic realism and rural settings lose importance to urban environments and political and metaphysical themes. In Pasos y pasajeros, 1966 [Sketches of Travellers], he uses more often than before the first-person narrative voice in order to attain a more intimate approach to his characters. In Los ganadores, 1980 [The Winners], the apocalyptical theme acquires significant relevance.

Arturo Uslar’s many talents and versatility have inspired admiration in many fellow Latin Americans. He has been called “a tropical Goethe” and the most intelligent Venezuelan of his generation. Jorge Luis Borges once said, in order to describe his many achievements, that there were many men in that single name.
In spite of these tributes, Uslar’s recognition has not been as widespread as that achieved by the Boom writers. It is possible that his centrist and moderate positions on political and economic matters have contributed, outside Venezuela and Spain, to the lesser appreciation of his work, a preterition that stands in contrast with the greater appeal enjoyed by other Latin American writers on the left side of the political spectrum. Uslar’s important contribution to the historical novel (besides Las lanzas coloradas) may one day receive its due when less subjective evaluative criteria prevail. Regardless of his lack of success outside the essay and the short story, Uslar’s extraordinary versatility and profound intuition makes him stand out, like Unamuno in his time, as a towering figure in the public life of his country. Arturo Uslar has gained recognition, not only for his literary achievements but also for having served, since the 1930s, as a committed thinker trying to bring awareness, understanding and resolution to the most pressing and intricate problems of his time.

JORGE MARBÁN

Biography

Selected Works

Short Fiction
Barrabás y otros relatos, Caracas: Vargas, 1928
Red, Caracas: Elite, 1936
Treinta hombres y sus sombras, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1949
Pasos y pasajeros, Madrid: Taurus, 1966
El prójimo y otros cuentos, Barcelona: Bruguera, 1978
Los ganadores, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1980

Novels
Las lanzas coloradas, Madrid: Zeus, 1931; as The Red Lances, translated by Harriet de Onís, New York: Knopf, 1963
El camino de El Dorado, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1947
El laberinto de fortuna: un retrato en la geografía, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1962
El laberinto de fortuna: estación de máscaras, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1964
Oficio de difuntos, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1976
La isla de Robinson, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1981
La visita en el tiempo, Madrid: Mondadori, 1990

Plays
Teatro, Caracas and Madrid: EDIME, 1958 [Includes El día de Antero Albán, La Tebaida, El dios invisible and La fuga de Miranda]
Chío Gil y las tejedoras, Caracas: Vargas, 1960

Essays
Letras y hombres de Venezuela, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1948
De una y otra Venezuela, Caracas: Mesa Redonda, 1950
Las nubes, Caracas: Ministerio de Educación, 1951
Tierra venezolana, Caracas: EDIME, 1953
Breve historia de la novela hispanoamericana, Caracas: EDIME, 1954
El otoño en Europa, Caracas: Mesa Redonda, 1954
Valores humanos, Caracas: EDIME, 1955
La ciudad de nadie; El otoño en Europa; Un turista en el Cercano Oriente, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1960
Del hacer y deshacer de Venezuela, Caracas: Ateneo, 1962.
En busca del nuevo mundo, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1969
El globo de colores, Caracas: Monte Ávila, 1975
Fantasmas de dos mundos, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1979
Bolívar hoy, Caracas: Monte Ávila, 1983
Godos, insurgentes y visionarios, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1986
Los venezolanos y el petróleo, Caracas: Banco de Venezuela, 1990
La creación del Nuevo Mundo, Madrid: Mapfre, 1991

Anthologies and Compilations
Obras selectas, Caracas: EDIME, 1967
Cuarenta ensayos, edited by Efrain Subero, Caracas: Monte Ávila, 1990
Cuarenta cuentos, edited by Efrain Subero, Caracas: Monte Ávila, 1990
Cuentos de la realidad mágica, Madrid: Mondadori, 1992,

Further Reading

There are very few studies on Arturo Uslar Pietri in English. In Spanish, Domingo Miliani is considered to be the most important critic of his narrative work. Uslar’s conservative positions have elicited a few negative appraisals from Marxist critics such as Mario Sezichman and Manuel Caballero. The bibliography by the Fundación Polar and Alexis Márquez’s intertextual analysis of Uslar’s historical novels are among the most important recent contributions to the understanding and critical appraisal of his work.

Barrientos, Juan José, “Aguirre y la rebelión de los Marañones,” Cuadernos Americanos, nueva época 2 (March–April 1948)

Eskenazi, Margarita, Uslar Pietri: muchos hombres en un solo nombre, Caracas: Caralex, 1988

Fabbiani Ruiz, José, “De Barrabás a Treinta hombres y sus sombras,” in Cuentos y cuentistas, Caracas: Cruz del Sur, 1951

Fundación Polar, Contribución a la Biblio-hemerografía de Arturo Uslar Pietri, Caracas: Ex-Libriss, 1989

Garmendia, Salvador, prologue to Moscas, árboles y hombres, Barcelona: Planeta, 1972

——“La visita en el tiempo de Arturo Uslar Pietri: estructuras míticas en una novela histórica,” Explicación de textos literarios, vol. 22/1 (1993)

Márquez Rodríguez, Alexis, Historia y ficción en la novela venezolana, Caracas: Monte Ávila, 1991

——Arturo Uslar Pietri: renovador del cuento venezolano, Caracas: Monte Avila, 1969

——“Arturo Uslar Pietri. La lucha con el minotauro,” Revista Iberoamericana vol., 60/166–67 (January–June 1994)

Oropeza, José Napoleón, Para forjar un rostro: notas sobre la novelística venezolana actual, Valencia, Venezuela: Vadell, 1984

Peña, Alfredo, Conversaciones con Arturo Uslar Pietri, Caracas: Ateneo, 1978

Polanco Alcántara, Tomás (editor), El valor humano de Arturo Uslar Pietri, Caracas: Ediciones de la Academia Nacional de la Historia, 1984

Sczichman, Mario, Uslar. Cultura y dependencia, Caracas: Vadell y Hermanos, 1975

Vivas Maldonado, José Luis, La cuentística de Arturo Uslar Pietri, Caracas: Ediciones de la Universidad Central, 1963
Luisa Valenzuela 1938–

Argentine prose writer.

The most marked characteristic of Luisa Valenzuela’s fiction is a pushing against censorship of all kinds. She said, in an unpublished interview of 1984: “Yo creo que las cosas hay que decirlas. Que lo que se tiene que evitar son las barreras de la autocensura, o peor que la autocensura, las barreras de esa censura interna que te impide decir ciertas verdades, y que te impide decir así, lo que en el fondo uno está queriendo decir, sin saberlo.” (I believe that things must be said. That what must be avoided are the barriers of self-censorship, or worse than self-censorship, the barriers of that internal censorship which prevents you from saying that which deep down you really want to say without realising it). This striving for a kind of freedom takes the form of writing which often plays with language, with shifting narrators, with perceptions of the unconscious, and reveals tremendous humour.

Her first novel, _Hay que sonreír_, 1966 (Clara) shows interestingly feminist leanings. It describes with sympathy and humour the events in the life of a naive young prostitute whose main ambition is to “use her head.” The novel plays on the paradigm of the “good woman/whore,” as the girl is “saved” by a series of men, all of whom exploit and silence her in different ways. There is an ironic twist towards the end in an episode in which she is at last permitted to “use her head,” but rather than using it as she had imagined, for thought, she is allowed to use it only as an object, an Aztec flower in a side-show. Ultimately, in a further twist, in what becomes an almost inevitable, logical step, her throat is cut, thus severing the recalcitrant head. It is a theatrical enactment of the archetypal Greek image which equates woman with matter and the body and man with the mind or the head. Any attempt at disrupting this state of affairs leads to a revelation of the difficulties surrounding women’s access to thought and to language.

This was followed by a collection of short stories, _Los heréticos_, 1967 [The Heretics], which again has a playful quality, and whose subject matter is encapsulated in its title, and then in 1972 by what is without a doubt her most radical novel, _El gato eficaz_, 1972 [The Effective Cat].

It is virtually impossible to provide any meaningful synopsis of this novel since it has virtually no plot or stabilising elements. It is, however, a very richly textured work, a _tour de force_ which plays with masks, one of Valenzuela’s obsessions, and with supple, shifting narrators to create a work which can be seen ultimately to deconstruct the notion of binary oppositions: black/white, life/death, and most fruitfully, masculine/feminine. The novel constantly emphasises the cultural nature of rigid notions of femininity, and pleads at its end for a rebirth, a need for greater openness and fluidity in our views of identity and gender difference.

The horrendous political violence in Argentina, which began in the mid 1970s, was to have a profound effect on Valenzuela’s work. As she said in an interview given to Magdalena García Pinto: “There comes a time when you can’t break away from it, when the horror becomes so great that silencing it is worse.” While the playfulness, humour and fragmentation continue, the focus is now on the fear, violence and disappearances which had become an overwhelming reality.

_Aquí pasan cosas raras, 1975 (Strange Things Happen Here),_ is a series of short stories, charged with a mordant humour, which with great humanity point out the pain, the tragedy and often also the absurdity of this terrible political situation, and it is reflected to a greater or lesser degree in all of Valenzuela’s subsequent work, even, it could be said, in a novel that would appear to be distanced in both time and space, the later _Novela negra con argentinos, 1990 (Black Novel with Argentines)_ This work, which has some of the characteristics of a thriller; is set in New York, among Argentine exiles, but the paranoia apparent in their lives and the difficulties that they encounter conjure up almost a mirror image of the psychological mindset and violence which had existed in their homeland.

Probably the most interesting novel to have emerged from this period is one which deals overtly with the political situation, _Cola de lagartija, 1983 (The Lizard’s Tail)_ The key players in this work are a wizard; a thinly-disguised López Rega, Argentina’s Minister of Welfare during Perón’s last government and that of his third wife, Isabel; and others representing Perón himself, his second wife, Evita, long dead, but still a potent myth in Argentine culture and the military rulers. On the other side are the Argentine people, particularly those opposed to the terror, symbolised by a writer by the name of Luisa Valenzuela. But while these references to historical fact are crucial to an understanding of the novel it is far from being a historical or even realist text, rather it works within the realms of myth, of metaphor, of the unconscious and of the materiality of language. The wizard plots his dreams of omnipotence to the point where he actually implodes, and in the meantime the counter-force, Luisa Valenzuela, works constantly seeking increasingly inventive tactics to bring about his downfall. Ultimately by becoming ever more fluid, even to the extent of rewriting language, she is the one who survives to tell the tale, while his rigidity and arrogance are self-defeating.

So it is that even in this unusual novel which is so specific in terms of its setting and of the situation it portrays, Valenzuela’s major themes return. For it is by means of a language outside of normally accepted discourse, beyond the tentacles of censorship, that freedom is achieved, and this struggle is particularly relevant for women who must get beyond the limitations imposed on them and search for what she describes in “_Mis brujas favoritas_” (My Favourite Witches) as “un lenguaje femenino en absoluto emparentado con aquellas azucaradas palabras con las que hemos sido recubiertas a lo largo de siglos” (a feminine language which has absolutely nothing to do with those sickly-sweet words we have been coated with over the centuries).

LINDA CRAIG
Biography

Selected Works

Novels

Hay que sonreír, Buenos Aires: Américalee, 1966; translated as Clara, in Clara: Thirteen Short Stories and a Novel, 1976

El gato eficaz, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1972

Short Fiction

Los heréticos, Buenos Aires: Paidós, 1967

Aqui pasan cosas raras, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1975; translated as Strange Things Happen Here: Twenty-Six Short Stories and a Novel, 1979

Libro que no muerde, Mexico City: UNAM, 1980

Donde viven las águilas, Buenos Aires: Celtia, 1983; translated as Up Among the Eagles, in Open Door, 1988

Blame, New York: Simon and Schuster, 1992

Síntesis, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1993

Anthologies in Translation

Clara: Thirteen Short Stories and a Novel, translated by Hortense Carpentier and Jorge Castello, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1976 [Includes the novel Hay que sonreír and the stories from Los heréticos]

Strange Things Happen Here: Twenty-Six Stories and a Novel, translated by Helen Lane, New York: Harcourt Brace, 1979 [Includes the novel He Who Searches and the stories from Aquí pasan cosas raras]

Other Writings
“Mis brujas favoritas,” in Theory and Practice of Feminist Literary Criticism, edited by Gabriela Mora and Karten Van Hooft, Ypsilanti, Michigan: Bilingual Press, 1982,
“The Other Face of the Phallus,” in Reinventing the Americas, edited by Bell Gale Chevigny and Gari Laguardia, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986

Further Reading
Cordones-Cook, Juanamaria, Poética de transgresión en la novelística de Luisa Valenzuela, New York: Peter Lang, 1991
Magnarelli, Sharon, Reflections/Refractions: Reading Luisa Valenzuela, New York: Peter Lang, 1988 [At time of publication the most comprehensive critical work on Valenzuela]
Martínez, Nelly Z., El silencio que habla: aproximación a la obra de Luisa Valenzuela, Buenos Aires: Coregidor, 1994

Special Issues of Journals
Review of Contemporary Fiction: Luisa Valenzuela Number, vol. 6/3 (Fall 1986)
César Vallejo 1892–1938

Peruvian poet and prose writer

César Vallejo vies with the Chilean poet, Pablo Neruda, for the coveted honor of best Spanish American poet of the 20th century, yet the semantic difficulty of his poetry has often meant that he is not as well-known outside the Spanish-speaking world as he deserves to be. Author of a novel, short fiction, two dramas, a collection of essays on Marxism and literary theory, two books on Soviet Russia, and over two hundred newspaper articles, Vallejo is now mainly remembered for his poetry. Anyone who reads his biography—a string of unhappy love affairs, imprisonment on trumped-up charges, inability to find stable employment either in Peru or in Europe, recurring bouts of debilitating illness, expulsion from France, marriage to a domineering and sometimes cruel wife—will not be surprised to find that he had little luck when it came to publishing his work. The majority of his work—and, in particular, his poetry—was published posthumously. His first collection of poems, Los heraldos negros, 1918 (The Black Heralds)—they actually came out a year later—was published in Lima; epigonically Romantic, they nevertheless hinted at what was to come later. Trilce (1922), again published in Lima, is a collection of avant-garde poems, heavily influenced by the new literary works Vallejo was reading at the time in magazines from Europe. From the time Vallejo moved to Paris in 1923 until his death in 1938, however, he published no new poetic works (Trilce was re-issued as a friendly gesture by some Spanish friends during his exile in Madrid, after being expelled for political reasons from France in the early 1930s). Were a number of poetic works not discovered among his posthumous papers by his widow, Georgette de Vallejo, we might never have been the wiser, and Vallejo would have been remembered as a good poet of the minor league. His widow, in 1939, published a collection of her late husband’s poems (by now she was beginning to assert ownership rights in a way that offended some of Vallejo’s artistic contemporaries such as the Spanish poet, Juan Larrea) which she named Poemas humanos, and which included a collection of poems entitled “Poemas en prosa” and another collection entitled “España, aparta de mí este cáliz” (Spain, Take This Cup from Me). The wisdom of this title was questioned by some, notably by Juan Larrea; more important than the title, however, is the question as to how many of these poems Vallejo would have published as they were, and how many he would have submitted to further revision. The latter is likely, since Vallejo was an extremely meticulous and language-conscious poet, and the poems which now appear in Poemas humanos are of uneven quality. The question as to when the poems were written is also a much-debated one; the poems collected under the title “Poemas en prosa” can be identified as having being written in the mid to late 1920s, given their allusion to contemporary events; the poems collected as “España, aparta de mí este cáliz” were clearly written in response to the Spanish Civil War as it unfolded before Vallejo’s horrified eyes (war broke out in July 1936, Vallejo died in April 1938, and the conflict ended in May 1939). (In a curious twist of fate, a collection of poems entitled España, aparta de mí este cáliz, was uncovered in 1981 in the Montserrat Monastery; a member of the religious order there who had a soft spot for poetry—of whatever political persuasion—had concealed a number of them, which were hot off the press in Barcelona, knowing that Franco’s troops would destroy them if they came across them). The poems entitled Poemas humanos present more of a problem but, by analysing their allusions to historical events, it is possible to deduce that they were written over a period of time from the late 1920s to the mid-1930s, and typed up over a period of about six months preceding Vallejo’s death.

Vallejo’s work is best understood if split into five main stages which are: 1915–18 Modernismo; 1919–26 the avant-garde; 1927–31 Marxism (Trotskyism gradually transformed into Stalinism); 1932–35 political disillusionment; 1936–38 Christian Marxism. Representative of the first phase are his collection of poems, Los heraldos negros, which shows clear signs of Vallejo’s literary apprenticeship in Modernismo, but also hints at a new poetic voice, one which eschews the Graeco-Roman world of mythology in favour of a mythology of the quotidian, and uses Christian symbology in incongruous, disorientating contexts. Some poems openly question God’s role in the universe, some demonstrate the stirrings of an Amerindian consciousness, and others hint at the growth of social concern for the have-nots of the world. Poems such as “A mi hermano Miguel” [To My Brother Michael] show Vallejo’s skill in the use of colloquial language and everyday situations, tied to his ability to conjure up the world of the child, that would become the hallmark of his poetry. Some of these concerns would continue in his later collection of poems, Trilce—published not coincidentally it would seem in the same year as Joyce’s Ulysses—such as the poems dedicated to his immediate family, and those which conjure up the lost magic of childhood. But there is also a palpable change in poetic diction and subject-matter. Some of the poems talk about the sexual act in a way that is remarkably explicit given the time they were published. Most of the poems demonstrate Vallejo’s willingness to expand the resources of the Spanish language in order to create a new vision: neologism, provincialism, archaism, typographical innovation, letter spacing, caligrammatics, slang and legalese all find their way into his poetic armoury. Vallejo had certainly learned many of these techniques through his reading of avant-garde poetry from France, and to some extent Spain in magazines such as Cervantes and Cosmópolis, but the results were much more original. A typical poem of this phase is Trilce XIX (see essay, below).

His Poemas en prosa were written approximately between 1923 and 1927 when Vallejo was already installed in Paris, and are mainly vignettes of his everyday life. Poemas humanos, written probably, as mentioned above over an extended period from the later 1920s to the mid-1930s, show evidence of Vallejo’s growing political commitment over those years; Vallejo was a frequent visitor to the bookstore of L’Humanité, the communist newspaper, he read Marxist and Leninist theory, and his poetry reflects this shift towards the political sphere. About one half of the poems of Poemas humanos take the collective realm as their point of departure; some of these express enthusiasm for the collective ethos of communism, some express dismay at the exploitation and pain experienced by the proletariat, while others express disillusionment with politics and politicians. The other half of the poems have a personal focus and typically show us the poet bemoaning his fate. One of the best poems of this period is “Los desgraciados” [Wretched Beings] which uses Christian imagery to focus on the exploitation of the proletariat.

España, aparta de mí este cálib, published in 1939 and written during the first two years of the Spanish Civil War (1936–38), is a paean to the Republican militiamen who were fighting against Franco’s trained military troops; it expresses a political faith in the Republican cause through the motif of Christian resurrection, a rather unusual choice given the proletarian and often anti-clerical bias of the Republicans, and especially the communists who supported the Republican war effort. Some of the best poems of España, aparta de mí este cáliz focus on a war hero; poem III, for example, describes the life and death of a railwayman, Pedro Rojas, and expresses the continuing force of the ideal for which he died by having him resurrected in the final stanza. Likewise, “Masa” (Mass), perhaps Vallejo’s most famous poem, focuses on a moment on the battlefield when a dead Republican militiaman is miraculously brought back to life through the collective love of mankind.

Perhaps most significant about Vallejo’s work is the way it straddles the First and the Third Worlds; Vallejo lived roughly two-thirds of his life in the Third World (Peru:
1892–1923), and one-third in the First World (France: 1923–38: excluding short sojourns juvenilia (Los heraldos negros and Trilce) were influenced by iconoclastic literary movement of First-World provenance (Modernismo and the avant-garde), this would tend to make Vallejo a Third-World writer dependent, like his nation’s economy, on the First World. But his years in Europe, and especially his reading of Marxist philosophy, changed the framework of that dependency. The mystique of Paris, the City of Light, so visible from the colonial periphery of Peru disappeared as Vallejo approached the source of its power, and this pilgrimage eventually led to a harsh critique of imperialist politics.

From the articles he wrote during the late 1920s it is clear that Vallejo saw Marxism as providing a clear answer to the question as to why the developed world was as it was and the underdeveloped world as it was, since it revealed the exploitation of the Other (whether as proletariat or prime-matter nation) which underlies capitalism. Vallejo, in effect, thereby reversed the process—so common in anthropology—whereby the knowledge of the Native Informant is “stolen,” technologized and circulated as First World scholarship; Paris became the Native Informant, and cultural counterexploitation was able to take place. What is more, Vallejo’s conversion to Marxism while in Europe provided him with an intellectual “non-Western” home within the intellectual climate of Paris and, in the process, sketched out the blueprint of a cultural path that later generations of Latin American intellectuals would follow.

Biography

Born in Santiago de Chuco, Peru, 16 March 1892. Attended a secondary school in Huamachuco, 1905–08; Trujillo University, 1910–11, but left to find employment, resumed formal studies, 1913–17, BA, 1915. Worked in his father’s notary office, in mine offices, as a tutor, and in an estate accounts office. Teacher at Centro Escolar de Varones and Colegio Nacional de San Juan while at Trujillo University. Moved to Lima in 1918 and taught at Colegio Barrós, 1918–19, and another school, 1920. Visited his home town, Santiago de Chuco, in 1918 and became unintentionally involved in a political riot. Fled to Trujillo but arrested and imprisoned there for three and a half months. Teacher at Colegio Guadalupe, 1921–23. Moved to Paris in 1923 and thereafter lived in Europe. Secretary, Iberoamerican press agency, 1925; contributed to the magazines Mundial and Variedades, Lima. Co-founder, with Juan Larrea, Favorables-Paris-Poema: closed after two issues, 1926. Travelled to the Soviet Union, 1928. Married Georgette Phillipart, and the couple travelled through Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. Member of the Spanish Communist Party, 1930; expelled from France because of his political activity and moved to Madrid. Translator for the publishing house Cenit. Returned to Paris, clandestinely in 1932 and lived in extreme poverty; made two further trips to Spain, 1934 and 1937. Died in Paris of tuberculosis, 15 April 1938.

Selected Works

Poetry

Trilce, Lima: Talleres Tipográficos de la Penitenciaría, 1922; as Trilce, translated by Rebecca Seiferle, Riverdale-on-Hudson, New York: Sheep Meadow Press, 1992,

España, aparta de mí este cáliz, Mexico City: Seneca, 1939; as Spain, Take This Cup from Me, translated by Clayton Eshleman and José Rubia Barcia, New York: Grove Press, 1974

Short Fiction

Escalas melografiadas, Lima: Talleres Tipográficos de la Penitenciaría, 1923 Fabla salvaje, Lima: Colegio La Novela Peruana, 1923

Novel

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras completas, 3 vols, Lima: Mosca Azul, 1973–74

Poesía completa, edited by Juan Larrea, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1978

Obra poética, edited by Américo Ferrari, Madrid: CSIC, 1988

Anthologies in Translation

Rusia en 1931: reflexiones al pie del Kremlin, Madrid: Ulises, 1931
Further Reading

Flores, Ángel (editor), Aproximaciones a César Vallejo, 2 vols, New York: Las Américas, 1971
Higgins, James, César Vallejo en su poesía, Lima: Seglusa, 1989
Lambie, George, El pensamiento político de César Vallejo y la guerra civil española, Lima: Milla Batres, 1993
Larrea, Juan, César Vallejo y el surrealismo, Madrid: Corazón, 1976
———, Al amor de Vallejo, Valencia: Pre-Textos, 1982
Ortega, Julio (editor), César Vallejo, Madrid: Taurus, 1975
———, La teoría poética de César Vallejo, Providence, Rhode Island: Del Sol, 1986

Bibliographies

Trilce XIX

Poem by César Vallejo
The poem chosen for analysis, Trilce XIX, is representative of the early work of César Vallejo, and is a superb example of Spanish American avant-garde poetry of the 1920s. It reads as follows:

A trastear, Hélpide dulce, escampas, cómo quedamos de tan quedarnos.
Hoy vienes apenas me he levantado.
El establo está divinamente meado y excrementido por la vaca inocente
y el inocente asno y el gallo inocente.

Penetra en la maría ecuménica.
Oh sangabriel, haz que conciba el alma, el sin luz amor, el sin cielo,
lo más piedra, lo más nada,
hasta la ilusión monarca.

¡Quemaremos todas las naves!
¡Quemaremos la última esencia!
Mas si se ha de sufrir de mito a mito,
y a hablarme llegas masticando hielo,
mastiquemos brasas,
ya no hay dónde bajar,
ya no hay dónde subir.

Se ha puesto el gallo incierto, hombre.

[By strumming, sweet Helipede, you uncloud/how we remain in what is left to us./Today you come as soon as I have risen/The stable is being divinely urinated and defecated by the innocent cow/and the innocent ass and the innocent cock//Penetrate the ecumenical mary /Oh saintgabriel, face what the soul conceives/the lightless love, the skyless/the stoniest, the most nothing/ up to the monarchical illusion//We will burn every nave! /We will burn the ultimate essence!/But if we must suffer from myth to myth/and to talk to me you come chewing ice,/let’s chew living coals,/now there’s nowhere to fall,/now there’s nowhere to rise./The cock itself has doubted, man.]

This poem was written when Vallejo was in prison in 1921, and it describes a mind clutching at straws, trying to make sense of his life after the recent death of his mother, a failed relationship and a bad career move. The poem opens with the poet’s description of a half-vision of the Greek god of Hope, Hélpide, although this apparition seems distant and deceptive given that the poet still finds himself trapped on earth (l. 2). In stanza 2, the poet berates Hope for coming to visit him when he has only just got up, and this introduces a note of trivialization which runs its course through the rest of the poem. The remainder of stanza 2 then turns to another type of Hope, the birth of Christ, although since he refers to the stable having excrement and urine in it, we are at the furthest remove from the naïve pietism of the Christmas card. Stanza 3 opens with another scene which is likely to be the growth of the Christian Church; here Hope is described as “penetrating” the “Ecumenical Mary” (a metonym for the Church), but, again, since Valiejo refers to Hope creating a number of things which are hardly positive (“love without light…until the monarchical illusion”), we again see that the poet is being ironic. In stanza 4, the poet describes the paths traced out as similar to two great events of history; the first when, in Veracruz in 1519, Cortes burned his boats and forced his men to accompany him in their seemingly foolhardy mission to conquer the Aztec empire, and the second involving the medieval experiment of alchemy in which metals were melted down in order to discover their quintessence and turn them into gold. By stanza 6, the poet advises Hope to take a more realistic stance. “If you are always bringing me different newer versions of Hope,” he seems to be saying, “at least bring me one which will stay put if you chew it over.” Hence the reason for the at first odd reference to “masticating” ice and masticating cinders. Cinders will stay in your mouth, while ice (like the illusion of an ill-founded hope) will soon melt and disappear. Given this impossible situation, as the poem concludes, there seems to be no way out, either up (to heaven) or down (to hell) (ll. 17–18). The last line of the poem is supremely ironic; given the above, even the cockerel which was meant to crow three times during the night preceding the Crucifixion when Peter, according to the synoptic gospels, was betraying Christ, has forgotten his lines. But now we have a sense of the overall meaning of the poem, it is important to remember that its semantic power derives not from its idea but from the way in which it has been expressed.

What follows is a reading which emphasizes the rhetorical dimension of the poem and, for the sake of convenience, four aspects of the poem, crucial for any close textual analysis, will be examined separately: melopoeia, phanopoeia, third-person knowledge, and literary allusiveness. For ease of comprehension a poetry map is appended (p. 825) which shows how these four elements fit together.

With regard to the melopoeia/signifier level of Trilce XIX, it is clear that the poem has no fixed metric scheme (indeed it seems to be almost a failed sonnet), but it does have rhymes such as “levantado-meado” (ll. 3–4), “hielo-cielo” (l. 9, l. 15) and assonant rhymes such as “alma-nada” (l. 8, l. 10) and “hielo-incierto” (l. 15, l. 19); thus the deliberate disruption of the rhyme scheme gives a sense of fragmentation which suits the mood of the poem. Trilce XIX has some examples of Joycean word-play, such as “excrementido” which fuses together “mentido” and “excrementado” and introduces the notion that the holiness of the Nativity is belied by animal excrement, as well as “sangabriel,” a porte-manteau word in which the Archangel Gabriel has been demoted twice, once from archangel to saint and once through loss of his capital letter; playing with upper- and lower-case letters was a very common feature of Vallejo’s verse of this period and derived from the avant-garde, mainly French, poets he was reading at the time. Thus, Vallejo is exploring the melopoeic level of language in order to create new meanings; he is starting from the signifier and engendering the signified rather than vice-versa.

With regard to the phanopoeic qualities of the poem, Trilce XIX demonstrates sensitivity to the visual arrangement of words; in particular the use of the blank space in l. 11 suggests emptiness and visually reinforces the meaning of “nada” of the previous line. The favoured rhetorical figure, clearly ahead of the others, is the metaphor. Metaphor is be understood, given its etymology (“meta,” change+“pherein,” to bear) as the description of two ideas or objects as if identical; unlike the metonym or the synecdoche, the metaphor is not based on customary associations, but instead provides access to a new vision. A good example is the “hielo/brasas” contrast in stanza 5, which suggests a distinction between the competing philosophies of idealism and materialism (a very common struggle, indeed, within the Romantic mind, and one whose power was not lost on Vallejo). The contrast posited in the metaphor is “hielo”=idealism just as “brasas”=materialism; chewing on “cinders” is a strikingly graphic way of describing the pain involved in ruminating on the material limitations of human existence.

Unlike the metaphor, the metonym involves the substitution of one thing for another, and perhaps the best way to grasp the difference between metaphor and metonym is to see the latter, following its etymology (“meta” change+“onoma,” name) in terms of substitution of a name, and as possessing a more prosaic quality; in this context we may recall that the celebrated Formalist, Roman Jakobson, saw metonymy as the favourite device of prose (and the metaphor as the best trope for poetry). (In a novel, for example, we could see the array of characters as metonymic substitutions for the people that the novelist knew in real life; thus Vetusta is a metonymic substitution for Oviedo in Clarín’s classic 19th-century novel, La Regenta). In Vallejo’s poem we have one clear example of metonymy: “Hélpide” is a metonym for hope (=the Greek word for hope, here personalized), although Vallejo, as with Saint Gabriel, has deliberately mis-spelt it (“Elpide” is the customary transcription). There are also some synecdoches in Vallejo’s poem. The synecdoche, as its etymology suggests (“sun” with+“dekhesthai” to take), means the substitution of a part for the whole, and it can be a very effective device in poetry. The American poet, Robert Frost, for example, was fond of calling himself a “Synecdochist” because he believed that it is the nature of poetry “to have intimations of something more than itself” and much the same might be said of Vallejo’s verse. A good example in Vallejo’s poem is “la maría ecuménica” to signify the Church, since the Virgin Mary is part of the Church.

With regard to third-person knowledge, Trilce XIX clearly expresses a great deal of metaphysical uncertainty about the truth value of the Incarnation. With regard to religion, the poem has many references to the synoptic gospels, some of which have already been touched on, such as the Archangel Gabriel, the Nativity scene, and Peter’s denial of Christ. Most of these events are treated ironically, as already noted; but it is important to underline that this is not a poem expressing indifference to spiritual matters such as one might find in the work of a Matthew Arnold; Vallejo’s poem expresses an anguished uncertainty about Christian doctrine, and particularly the Immaculate Conception, and the possibility that it has led to an illusory belief in a spiritual kingdom (“hasta la ilusión monarca”). With regard to mythology, the central idea of the poem is that mankind has been shunted from one belief system to another without rhyme or reason (“sufrir de mito a mito”). There is a crucial reference to Greek culture in the form of the Greek god of Hope, as already noted. In suggesting that the Greek god of Hope was reincarnated in the form of Christ (ll. 1–6), the poem alludes to a very common intellectual pattern of the Renaissance, namely, the demonstration that the Classical world was a necessary prelude to the Christian world; Vallejo, here, however, is invoking the idea, only to dismiss it as inconsequential.

In terms of literary allusiveness, we should note immediately that Trilce XIX is written in the avant-garde style of the poems which Vallejo was reading in magazines such as Cosmópolis and Cervantes which arrived in Lima from Europe in the first two decades of the century and revolutionized the artistic ambiance of the time. In Trilce Vallejo explored typographic lay-out on the page, switch-coding letter cases (namely the untraditional use of capital and lower-case letters), as in “sangabriel” discussed above.

When looking at Vallejo’s poem from these four vantage points (melopoeia, phanopoiea, third-person knowledge and literary allusiveness), we arrive at a clearer sense of how the poem demonstrates imaginative and intellectual power. The main idea of the poem is its questioning of the truth value of the master narratives of Western civilization (Greek and Christian culture), and its use of irony to make that point. Vallejo reinforces his sense of metaphysical anguish by disrupting the system of language; in a world in which metaphysical uncertainties are subverted, Trilce XIX argues, language itself is not immune from destabilization.

See also entry on Avant-Garde

Editions

Further Reading

---

Blanca Varela 1926-

Peruvian poet

Blanca Varela published her first volume of poetry, Ese puerto existe [That Port Exists], in 1959, a decade and a half after her Peruvian contemporaries had begun making their public appearance. She is, however, linked with the poets Javier Sologuren, Jorge Eduardo Eielson, Sebastián Salazar Bondy, and the painter Fernando de Szyszlo through friendships, aesthetic affinities and common intellectual interests, which can be appreciated in her collaboration with them in the editing of the journal Amaru (1967–71), founded and directed by the poet Emilio Adolfo Westphalen.

Since its beginnings, Varela’s poetry has generally been confined to a small circle of select readers, which has expanded recently. The limited distribution and analysis of her works is due, in part, to the fact that her literary production consists of relatively few texts; to the long silences between the publication of each work—five books during a period of more than thirty-five years; the limited contact with academia; and a wary attitude towards literary competitions, public appearances and readings. In the last decade, her poetry has been recognized and distributed throughout the continent thanks to the publication in Mexico of Canto villano [Plain Song], a collection containing almost all her works dating up to 1986. At the time of publication, her most recent book had appeared in 1994.

As with the rest of her contemporaries, Varela took part in the study of the cultural situation of 20th-century Peru, and became familiar with post-war European culture at first hand. While she was married to Fernando de Szyszlo, they lived in Europe and the United States for several years before returning to Peru.

At first glance, one perceives a strong, almost unbearable, emotional intensity in Varela’s poetic language. With regard to this, in an interview she gave in 1978, she stated: “I think that poetry resides not in the quantity but in the intensity. It’s like working at very high temperatures that don’t permit one to remain there for long periods of time. The poet works in very delicate zones of the conscious.” Critics such as José Miguel Oviedo and Roberto Paoli have recognized in the emotions presented in Varela’s poetry a Surrealist “morality of passion” and a “parasurrealist climate,” respectively.

Her poems accumulate surprising images, possessing great associative possibilities, and dealing with oneiric or illusory atmospheres, as in “Puerto Supe” [Port Supe]: “cielo, sombra veloz/nubes do espanto, oscuro torbellino de alas” (sky, fleeting shadow/clouds of fear, dark whirlwind of wings), or in “Historias de Oriente” [Stories of the Orient]:
“Cierta mañana Cosme abrió los ojos y vio a su perro envuelto en una nube azul./Con un alfiler lo persiguió varios meses” (One morning, Cosme opened his eyes and saw his dog wrapped in a blue cloud./With a pin he chased him for several months).

Varela achieves this emotional force in part through the careful use of metaphors of apparent sentimentality that, placed side by side, do not flow subtly one into the other but rather create frictions of diverse qualities. The play of emotions is transported from an atmosphere of collective illusion to an atmosphere where the intimate is coldly observed. Her metaphors force the cohabitation of a melodramatic rhetoric and a corporeal vocabulary whose rawness dangerously approaches scatology. Varela suggests scenarios where everyday relationships, emotional routines, commonplace topics within families, are illusions hidden behind unconscious social expectations: tranquil love, a stable economy, one’s own home, an attractive body, permanent happiness. This can be seen in the poem “Vals del Ángelus” [Waltz of the “Angelus”]: “Ve lo que has hecho de mí, la madre que devora a sus crias, la que se traga sus lágrimas y engorda, la que debe abortar en cada luna, la que sangra todos los días del año”. (Look what you have made of me, the mother that devours her offspring, the one that swallows her tears and grows fat, the one that must abort with each moon, the one that bleeds every day of the year), also in “Secreto de familia” [Family Secret]: “la piel del hombre se quema con el sueño/arde desaparece la piel humana/sólo la roja pulpa del can es limpia/la verdadera luz habita su legaña/tú eres el perro/tú eres el desollado can de cada noche/sueña contigo misma y basta” (The skin of man is burned by the dream/the human skin burns disappears/only the red pulp of the dog is clean/the true light inhabits the secretion of its eyes/you are the dog/you are the skinned cur of each night/dream about yourself and that’s all), or in “Último poema de junio” [Last Poem of June]: “Pienso en esa flor que se enciende en mi cuerpo. La hermosa, la violenta flor del ridículo. Pétalo de carne y hueso. ¿Pétalos? ¿Flores? Peciosismo bienvestido, muerte de hambre, vade-retro. (I think about that flower that ignites inside my body. The beautiful, violent flower of the ridiculous. Petal of flesh and bone. Petals? Flowers? Well-dressed exquisiteness, pitiful, vade-retro).

With her poetry, Varela disturbs the collective dream constructed around one’s possible capacity for uncalculated or unconscious love. Her critics also find a strong presence of dissatisfaction, scepticism, rudeness, bareness, humour, irony, helplessness and self pity, that are refined and strengthened throughout her literary production.

The collective dream of domestic stability evoked by Varela is a way of linking the routine with the fragile reaffirmation of identity that the individual finds in intimacy. According to Cristina Graves, this option arises from the female condition of the writer: “Because the house, the home, represents the illusion par excellence of stability and security, and women, in particular, assume the responsibility for maintaining the appearance of ‘normality’ despite their capacity to ‘turn the page,’ to see the other side of things. Women will dream of life day after day in their ‘paradise’ of appearances in order not to destroy the illusion of security, of eternity.”

Varela also disturbs this “paradise” with constant references to animals. Among her fauna, insects and pets abound as in “Lady’s Journal”: “el ratón te contempla extasiado/la araña no se atreve a descender ni un milímetro más a la tierra/el café es un espectro azul sobre la hornilla” (the mouse contemplates you in ecstasy, the spider does not dare descend one more millimetre towards the earth/the coffee is a blue ghost over the burner) and in “Secreto de familia” [Family Secret]: “es un sueño estás sola/no hay otro/la luz no
The power of Varela’s poetry and the freedom with which it has transgressed certain tacit limits of our collective perception, among them those corresponding to the realm of patriarchy and masculine insecurity, has made her work one of the most important points of reference in discussions regarding gender and literature written by Peruvian women in the second half of the 20th century.

Luis Rebazas-Soraluz

Biography

Born in Lima, Peru, 1926. Married Fernando de Syzlo (separated); has children. Lived in the United States and Paris for many years. Director of the Peruvian branch of the Mexican publishing house, Fondo de Cultura Económica.

Selected Works

Poetry

Ese puerto existe y otros poemas, Xalapa, Mexico: Universidad Veracruzana, 1959
Luz de día, Lima: La Rama Florida, 1963
Valses y otras falsas confesiones, Lima: Instituto Nacional de Cultura, 1972
Canto villano, Lima: Arybalo, 1978
El libro de barro, Madrid: Ediciones del Tapir, 1993
Ejercicios materiales, Caracas: Fondo Editorial Pequeña Venecia, 1994

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading

Ferrari, Américo, “Varela: explorando los ‘bordes espeluznantes,’” [Canto villano], Hueso Húntero 21 (1986)
Graves, Cristina, “Con el ángel entre los dedos,” Hueso Húmero 4 (1980)
Ortega, Julio, “Blanca Varela,” in his Figuración de la persona, Madrid: Edhasa, 1971
Paoli, Roberto, “Itinerarios de renuncia, de mesura y de aventura: Abril, Moreno Jimeno, Varela, Romualdo,” in his Estudios sobre literatura peruana contemporánea, Florence: Università degli Studi di Firenze, 1985
Paz, Octavio, “Destiempos de Blanca Varela,” in his Puertas al campo, Mexico City: UNAM, 1966

Bibliography

Mario Vargas Llosa 1936–

Peruvian prose writer and dramatist

Mario Vargas Llosa’s prolific narrative work—one of the most representative and influential of the so-called Boom of the Spanish American novel in the 1960s—can be grouped into two lengthy periods (perhaps three if the tendencies and preoccupations that have begun to emerge in his work of the 1980s crystallize in future ones). The first group consists of Los jefes, 1959 [The Leaders], his only collection of short stories, the novella Los cachorros, 1967 (The Cubs), and the novels La ciudad y los perros, 1963 (The Time of the Hero), La casa verde, 1966 (The Green House) and Conversación en La Catedral, 1969 (Conversation in The Cathedral). The intention, subject-matter and form of these works could not be more varied, above all in the case of the novels, but they constitute a whole in terms of the complexity of the narrative project and the aesthetic vision they convey. The novels’ connections with the world of Los jefes and Los cachorros should not be overlooked altogether, since they form part of the same fictive world in which violent or marginalized characters and misfits preponderate.

What the three novels show is a geometric progression in the number of stories told and the ways these interact. The basic design of La ciudad y los perros is binary: a microcosm (the Leoncio Prado School) and a macrocosm (the city, Lima and its outskirts); each with its own tone, rhythm and sources of conflict, the two being presented in opposition and forming a contrast. In La casa verde the structure has a scrupulously symmetrical arrangement, regulated by five main stories and two vast, opposed spaces (on the one hand, Piura on the northern coast of Peru; on the other, the Amazonian jungle). Between their interstices there flow minor episodes and incidents which turn the whole into a labyrinthine but rigorous design of constantly expanding times, spaces and adventures.

Conversación en La Catedral is structurally less symmetrical than the earlier novel, but its scope is even wider, having the proportions of a veritable historical saga. A striking feature of all these novels is how the various plots are interwoven, the number and range of characters and, in addition, the virtuosity of the techniques employed to represent objective reality, the moral consequences of interpersonal relations, the introspective attitude of the meditation on history, etc., in a highly dramatic way. Vargas Llosa’s efforts are always directed towards being inclusive and centripetal, spurred on by the unattainable ideal of the “novesla total” (total novel): creating a double of the real world, as complete as possible and governed by its own laws; better said, a fictive rival of the original from which it sprang. For this reason, according to the author’s notion of literature, the novelist can be seen as a “deicide,” a craftsman intent on denying, surpassing or completing the divine creation, adding his own imaginary constructions.

Although in La ciudad y los perros and Conversación en La Catedral there are elements associated with urban realism (which he discovered through the so-called “Generation of the 1950s” during his formative years in Lima), it must be acknowledged that in the rest of his work the author has shown a reiterated predilection for wild open spaces where adventures on a grand scale are still possible. The jungle has proved to be a favourite setting, being present in several of his novels. There is a strongly “regionalist” strand in him that can be related to the novels of that aesthetic which flourished in the 1930s. The jungle, the desert, the parched Brazilian north-east (the sertão) are areas that have allowed him to examine the conduct of characters who must square up to an environment, their own or otherwise, always hostile and presenting a challenge they inevitably find attractive. Owing to the absence of a set of socially valid norms, these are ideal spaces for rebels, adventurers or the dispossessed who, having nothing to lose, can dream of escaping from the pressures of the “establishment” and invent a destiny tailor-made for them. The young cadets and their cynical army instructors in La ciudad y los perros; the traffickers in rubber, the villainous buddies and prostitutes of La casa verde; the corrupt politicians, venal journalists and “Zavalita,” the thwarted intellectual, of Conversación en La Catedral, are all very different but have a common destiny of violence, degradation and frustration.

Vargas Llosa’s second creative phase begins with Pantaleón y las visitadoras, 1973 (Captain Pantoja and the Special Service), and is followed by La tía Julia y el escribidor, 1977 (Aunt Julia and the Scriptwriter), La guerra del fin del mundo, 1981 (The War of the End of the World), Historia de Mayta, 1984 (The Real Life of Alejandro Mayta), ¿Quién mató a Palomino Molero?, 1986 (Who Killed Palomino Molero?), El hablador, 1987 (The Storyteller), Elogio de la madrastra, 1988 (In Praise of the Stepmother) and Lituma en los Andes, 1993 (Death in the Andes). In effect, we have here two series within the same period of production, something which may well become easier to discern in time: on the one hand there are the essentially political novels (La guerra del fin del mundo, Historia de Mayta and Lituma en los Andes); on the other, those that re-elaborate autobiographical events or concern his own novelistic theory (Pantaleón y las visitadoras, La tía Julia y el escribidor, ¿Quién mató a Palomino Molero?). This is a period marked by a reflective attitude, as much concerned with the fundamental questions about modern Latin American society as with the narrative art he uses to represent them. To a greater or lesser extent, both modes of this period reveal that the author has modified considerably his quest for the totalizing narrative, concentrating now on less complicated stories within more restricted spatio-temporal limits, although the contrapuntal effect which involves the parallel development of two or more stories remains fundamental to his art. In the same way, it is notorious that his (original) realist convictions have undergone a crisis: now, rather than displaying the extensive possibilities of realism, his interest lies in underlining its limitations, the inevitable treason that the language of fiction practices on the objective world and real experience.

Of his most recent production, the work which is both most significant and ambitious in scope is, without doubt, La guerra del fin del mundo; also the most unusual in his repertoire, since it is the only one that does not take place in Peru and whose theme is not taken directly from life. Instead it is a re-elaboration of materials taken from a book, the classic Os sertões, 1902. (Rebellion in the Backlands), by Euclides da Cunha. In the Brazilian original, da Cunha describes the extraordinary rebellion of Canudos provoked by a messianic leader, Antônio Conselheiro, who imperilled the stability of the new Brazilian republic until it was bloodily quelled. On this basis the author creates a vast picture, one of epic proportions, in which he freely reconstructs events from Brazilian history as a case study that permits him to reflect on questions still relevant now; religious fanaticism, the role of intellectuals and politicians, violence, tradition and social change, and so on. Historia de Mayta focuses political reflection on Peru itself, presenting it in the context of the country’s present crisis, at the same time as it comments on the dilemma of writing a novel on those subjects and in those circumstances. Lituma en los Andes is the author’s first excursion into the Andean world, torn apart by terrorist violence and the tensions it imposes on an archaic world ruled by mythical beliefs and customs.

Pantaleón, La tía Julia, Quién mató, and Elogio have a lighter touch and a farcical slant. The presence of humour in these novels is related to his new attitude towards the realism of his first period and to his desire to use fiction as a vehicle for self-reference and, at times, self-parody. This is very clear in La tía Julia, but also in Historia de Mayta and El hablador; increasingly, the narrator abandons the lofty objectivity of his early novels to assume a role in his own fiction, at once engendering and criticizing it. There is another type of parody in ¿Quién mató a Palomino Molero?, which uses the stock components of the thriller but distorts them, so as to give the story the grotesque air of a police romp. This conscious exaggeration is present also in Elogio. Although this is the author’s first erotic novel, it is most definitely not the first in which the elements of perversion and transgression in the sphere of sexuality put in an appearance. On the contrary: it has been a characteristic feature—apparent as from La ciudad—that he is an admirer of Bataille, Sade and licentious literature in which he sees another expression of the individual’s eternal rebellion against the norms of the social world.
Vargas Llosa has accompanied this process of aesthetic renewal with the development of other interests. He underwent experiences that produced a marked readjustment of his intellectual and personal positions. His work as a critic, which began early through his journalism, produced consistent results as from the 1970s; among these are his study Gabriel García Márquez: historia de un deicidio, 1971 [García Márquez: the Story of a Deicide], 1971, his essay La orgía perpetua. Flaubert y’”Madame Bovary, 1975 (The Perpetual Orgy) and, since then, collections of articles on literature, culture and politics, titled Contra viento y marea, 1983 [Against Wind and Tide], and Desafíos a la libertad, 1994 [Challenges to Freedom]. But that complex process can be better appreciated in El pez en el agua, 1993 (A Fish in the Water), a remarkable book of memoirs that offers, once again in contrapuntal mode, the story of his childhood and youth together with that of his immersion, many years later, in the world of politics. La señorita de Tacna, 1981 (The Young Lady from Tacna), marks the start (or the re-start, if one takes into consideration a remote, adolescent foray into theatre) of a period of intense interest in this genre. His other plays to date are Kathie y el hipopótamo, 1983 (Kathy and the Hippopotamus), La Chunga, 1986 and El loco de los balcones, 1993 [The Madman of the Balconies].

Biography

casa verde Critics’ Annual Prize for Theatre (Argentina), 1981 for La señorita de Tacna; Prince of Asturias Prize (Spain), 1986; Miguel de Cervantes Prize, 1994.

Selected Works

Novels

Short Fiction
- Los jefes, Barcelona: Rocas, 1959; translated in The Cubs and Other Stories, 1979

Plays
- El loco de los balcones, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1993
Essays and Other Writings

La novela en América Latina; diálogo, in collaboration with Gabriel García Márquez, Lima: Milla Batres, 1968

La literatura en la revolución y la revolución en la literatura, in collaboration with Julio Cortázar and Oscar Collazos, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1970

Historia secreta de una novela, Barcelona: Tusquets, 1971

Gabriel García Márquez: historia de un deicidio, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1971

La novela y el problema de la expresión literaria en Perú, Buenos Aires: América Nueva, 1974

José María Arguedas: entre sapos y halcones, Madrid: Cultura Hispánica del Centro

Iberoamericano de Cooperacion, 1978

La utopia arcaica, Cambridge: Cambridge University Centre for Latin American Studies, 1978

Entre Sartre y Camus, Rio Piedras, Puerto Rico: Huracán, 1981

La cultura de la libertad, la libertad de la cultura, Santiago de Chile: Fundación Eduardo Frei, 1985

Diálogo sobre la novela latinoamericana, in collaboration with Gabriel García Márquez, Lima: Perú Andino, 1988

Carta de batalla por Tirant lo Blanc, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1991

Desafíos a la libertad, Madrid: Aguilar, 1994

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras escogidas, Madrid: Aguilar, 1978

Further Reading

Boland, Roy C., Mario Vargas Llosa: Oedipus and the “Papa” State, Madrid: Voz, 1988

Booker, M.Keith, Vargas Llosa among the Postmodernists, Gainesville: University Presses of Florida, 1994

Gerdes, Dick, Mario Vargas Llosa, Boston: Twayne, 1985

Magnarelli, Sharon, The Lost Rib, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania: Bucknell University Press, 1985 [Chapter on La ciudad y los perros]

Oviedo, José Miguel (editor), Mario Vargas Llosa, Madrid: Taurus, 1981
La casa verde

Novel by Mario Vargas Llosa

La casa verde is Vargas Llosa’s second novel, and some would argue his best. Like several others, it draws heavily on his personal experiences; not long after its publication in 1966, the author explained the genesis of La casa verde in lectures which later were published in the form of a short book entitled Historia secreta de una novela, 1971 [The Secret Story of a Novel]. In that book, he tells of two formative experiences in his life which provided the basis for the novel.

The first is a year (1945) that he spent in Piura, a town near the coast in northern Peru; he was then still a young boy, and had just come back from Bolivia to live in his native country. He recalls how with his friends he would spy on a mysterious green house on the outskirts of town, a house which would come to life at night, exercising a somehow evil attraction on the boys, who dubbed its ladies “habitantas” and taunted its patrons with cries of recognition, without really understanding quite what their activities were. Another important recollection from this time is of a run-down suburb called the “Mangachería,” whose people were noisy, violent and hostile to outsiders, especially to their rivals in a more prosperous suburb known as the “Gallinacera.” The mature Vargas Llosa would later revisit Piura and understand the sordid details of the “casa verde.” Piura came to provide one of the main settings for the novel, with activity centred on that brothel.

The other main setting is the jungle, and this is seen to have arisen from a second of the author’s formative experiences: in 1957 he went on a trip into the interior with a group of anthropologists from San Marcos University, learning about the Indians he would later portray; he visited a Catholic mission, saw the dedication of the nuns but also became aware of how Indian girls were being drafted into servitude or prostitution on the coast; he heard of the activities of rubber traffickers, of how an Indian chief called Jum had been tortured for standing up to them; finally, he listened to tales of a rubber-dealer of Japanese descent who was said to have many wives and a private kingdom. These two settings and the experiences described are developed in La casa verde. (Vargas Llosa explains that writing was a matter of dressing things up to mask the truth, rather as if the process were akin to a striptease in reverse). The “casa verde” of the title may therefore be understood to refer both literally to the building in Piura and metaphorically to the jungle. The female protagonist who provides the major link between the two settings is an Indian girl, transported from the one to the other, to work in the brothel in Piura, where she is nicknamed “Selvática” (a name that suggests her roots in the jungle).

La casa verde is, formally at least, as complex as Vargas Llosa’s first novel and it employs some of the same narrative devices. Five storylines unfold and are seen to intertwine in a narrative structure that has been said to mimic a complex river system, and indeed, is central to the novel is a story being told by a character who is travelling all the while down a river. Along with his recollections and confessions to his companion, we have the tales of other characters, told in different sections of the narrative, and in somewhat different styles.

The reader is faced with a bewildering start to the novel, whose opening pages do not take time to introduce characters in any apparently logical or cohesive way; during the opening section of the book the reader must largely guess who the participants are, which of them is talking at any given time, and what significance it all may have. The first section presents military men dealing with nuns at a jungle mission from which Indian girls escape. Only much later will the reader understand that here were presented the essential elements of the narrative, its main theme and two of its main characters.

One of Vargas Llosa’s aims is to come closer to a simultaneity of events than is generally thought possible in literature; thus, for example, he may seek ways of conveying the perception of the fly on someone’s nose at the same time as the perception that someone else is talking, at the same time as the perception that an observer of this is feeling hungry. In other words, he attempts to undermine the linearity inherent in language. Indeed, this may be seen as symptomatic of his narrative strategy on a grand scale: the comfortable chronology which may serve to organize events into palatably logical sequences is abandoned in favour of a jigsaw effect: pieces which do not seem immediately to fit into a pattern or to bear relation to each other, until, eventually, a full picture emerges. And, again like a jigsaw, the final picture that emerges is not absolutely precise. The rationale behind all this complication is that life itself comes in chaotic and inconvenient bits which we must piece together into patterns as best we can, while truth is not as absolute as we might perhaps prefer it to be. Mention should also be made of the extensive use of what the author calls “vasos comunicantes,” by which he means a technique involving an apparent exchange between characters who exist in different times and places; for example, two characters are in conversation and one is recounting some past experience to the other when the protagonists of that past experience seem to come to life in the narrative present, addressing the listener directly. It is a technique somewhat like a cinematic flashback, and one used with great frequency and variety. This technique is particularly important as a unifying force in _La casa verde_, because it forges narrative bridges between distant settings and over a timespan of decades.

Reference has already been made to five main storylines. One involves the role of a jungle mission from which girls are taken to prosperous coastal families; from this mission comes the virginal Bonifacia, who will become Selvática once a prostitute in Piura. A second is that of Fushía, the man of Japanese parentage, who is travelling the Marañón river with an old friend and telling him his life story, on his way to die of leprosy in the jungle. A third concentrates on the brothel, founded by a stranger who is reputed to have ridden unannounced into town one day, the enigmatic Don Anselmo; the activities in the “casa verde” outrage the righteous Padre García who sees to it that it is burned to the ground, but it rises like the Phoenix from the ashes, rebuilt by Anselmo’s daughter Chunga, while he becomes the resident harpist. Fourthly, there is an account of the activities of the “caucheros” (rubber dealers) in the jungle, the abuse of and rebellion by Indians, and the role in all this of the garrison. Finally, there is the story of the self-styled “Inconquistables,” a group of hard-drinking and gambling youths from the Mangacheria who frequent the “casa verde.”

On the fringe of this last group is Sergeant Lituma; apart from Selvática, he is the only character to act in both the jungle and coastal settings, and therefore is of particular significance. Introduced in the very first words of the novel (though not identified by name) he is there in the jungle with the garrison, where Bonifacia is, while he will also have a relationship with her years later once she has been renamed Selvática and is working in her new location, Piura. (Lituma—and to a lesser degree some other characters in _La casa verde_—reappears in later works by Vargas Llosa, including the recent _Lituma en los Andes_).

There are some ninety characters in _La casa verde_ and they may usefully be grouped in relation to each of the main settings. In the jungle setting, we find those in the mission, of whom Bonifacia is by far the most important; there are the Indians (in particular Jum as defender of rights and sufferer of torture); present by implication but always faceless are “the authorities” who in fact operate from a base of ignorance in Lima; two characters stand out from among the personnel of the garrison: Lituma, for reasons already mentioned, and Delgado, a captain whose personal desire for revenge allows the assault on Jum; lastly, there are the “caucheros,” who include the unscrupulous Reátegui, Fushía and his confessor-companion Aquilino, and the partner of several of them and mother of some of their children, Lalita. As to Piura, we have Anselmo, Chunga and Selvática as main characters attached to the brothel; the lower-middle class “Gallinacera” is represented by Juana Baura and Toñita (the latter having had a child, Chunga, by Anselmo); the prosperous or influential Piurans are represented by Padre García, Dr Zevallos, and the Seminario family (with which Lituma has crossed swords); finally, there are the “Inconquistables,” two of whom (Lituma and Josefino) have been romantically involved with Selvática.

The formal divisions of the novel require comment because they relate closely to the dynamics of action and character development. The novel has four parts, followed by an Epilogue; each begins with an opening chapter which the author has elsewhere called an “umbral” (threshold). In addition to an “umbral,” Parts 1 and 3 each contain four further chapters; parts 2 and 4 each have three. Thus a structural link exists between 1 and 3 and between 2 and 4. However, the chapters themselves are subdivided into shorter sections, numbering five in the cases of parts 1 and 2, and four in the cases of parts 3 and 4. Thus another structural link, cutting across the first, is set up between 1 and 2 on the one hand, and 3 and 4 on the other. Furthermore, the Epilogue has a total of five components if one includes the “umbral” in the count, four if one does not, thus pointing to two of the previously mentioned configurations. All of which makes for structural elegance; but more importantly, the formal links also suggest thematic ones, establishing patterns that enhance and direct the reading. A small but significant illustration is the fact that each grouping of five sections begins in the jungle and ends in Piura, hinting at the oppositions and transitions that are the very backbone of the novel, and implicit in its title.

From the foregoing it will be seen that there is a complex series of interrelationships among the characters, often involving love, parentage or violence. Insofar as it is clear, the picture that emerges by the end of the novel is not edifying: it is largely one of abuse and betrayal. The solidarity of the “Inconquistables” is a sham; it is even Selvática who maintains them with her earnings. The agents of religion, ostensibly civilizing the natives, have in fact been sending them into a life of servitude and sordidness. Economically, the Indians are victims of criollo greed. Selvática, clumping about awkwardly in her ill-fitting heels, is living proof, an anachronism, just like the green house flourishing in the coastal desert. It is with some irony that Anselmo’s establishment is said to have brought civilization to Piura.

Not surprisingly, the early Vargas Llosa was often called a pessimist, yet he himself rejected that accusation, and other critics have talked of “environmental determinism” or fatalism. In this respect the Epilogue to the novel is worthy of attention, since unlike most, it does not simply introduce material subsequent to the main action, but takes the reader back to the beginning, and relates events that must have occurred at the start of it all thus forcing the reader to reconsider what has been read. Two particular episodes in the Epilogue deserve comment: in one, Fushía dies and Nature obscures the smell and sight of his body, suggesting that we have come full circle (somewhat as in Carpentier’s story Viaje a la semilla (Journey Back to the Source); in the other, Reátegui brings an Indian girl (presumably the one who will become Bonifacia/Selvática) to the jungle mission, as if really to begin the story.

The picture remains somewhat indistinct as the novel ends, the jigsaw pieces now largely in place: the truth is not absolute, the “facts” never quite clear. Love does appear to be a matter of commerce or the use of women by men (but wasn’t there genuine tenderness between the disabled Toñita and Anselmo?; isn’t Lalita, worn out and ugly though she is, also a survivor for whom we have a sneaking respect?). And was there ever really a first “casa verde,” or was it, like the Phoenix, a myth?

Motivated by deeply felt concerns for social justice, Vargas Llosa shook his audience during his speech of acceptance on winning the prestigious Rómulo Gallegos prize in 1967; the role of the writer, he claimed, was to criticize the status quo: “La literatura es fuego” [Literature Burns]. Yet, trenchant though its socioeconomic criticisms are, La casa verde is not simply a piece of propaganda. It is a very carefully structured and controlled literary artefact whose roots are also aesthetic, a novel that takes some satisfaction in its own ambiguities and considerable formal elegance.

PETER STANDISH
Historia de Mayta

Novel by Mario Vargas Llosa
Since the publication in 1963 of La ciudad y los perros (The Time of the Hero), Mario Vargas Llosa’s literary production has been defined by his relentless study of Peruvian historical processes and society, and by his critical commentary on political and religious fanaticism, extreme conditions which predictably bring about apocalyptic consequences. His Conversación en La Catedral 1969 (Conversation in The Cathedral) is a devastating indictment of the deterioration of Peru’s moral fiber, the result of years of political corruption and betrayal, social decay, and the loss of all sense of personal integrity. A controversial figure in his own country and abroad, Vargas Llosa has consistently and overtly injected his personal, social and political ideology into his fiction, with varying degrees of success.

Historia de Mayta, 1984 (The Real Life of Alejandro Mayta), a novel that exhibits the structural complexities for which the Peruvian novelist is well known, examines the events of a failed, Marxist-Leninist insurrection which actually took place in the Peruvian Andes in the early 1960s. Vargas Llosa’s novel reconstructs this obscure episode but places it in 1958, a year before the military victory of the Cuban Revolution. The ideological implications of this act of fiction are obvious. The emergence in Peru in 1980 of a wave of political terrorism, unprecedented by its blind violence, had shocked the country and the world. An extremist Maoist revolutionary movement operating under the name of Sendero Luminoso (Shining Path) had laid siege to the newly elected populist government of Fernando Belaúnde Terry, a fragile democracy trying to assert itself after twelve years of socialist military dictatorship. Ironically, it was during Belaúnde’s first term as President—he was deposed by a military coup—that he had stamped on several guerrilla movements that had erupted in the wake of Fidel Castro’s success. By placing the fictitious events before they had actually happened, the author sends the clear message that the orgy of violence perpetrated by Sendero Luminoso had its origin in the almost romantic insurrections of the 1960s, ill-fated revolutionary attempts led mostly by inexperienced intellectuals.

Written on several narrative temporal levels, the novel is a vastly modified reconstruction of the real events. Led by the flat-footed, overweight, ageing Trotskyist Alejandro Mayta, and by the self-proclaimed socialist, second lieutenant Vallejos, a ragtag band of adolescent would-be insurgents take up arms and head for the Andean highlands, but is quickly overtaken and decimated by the police. Vallejos is summarily executed, Mayta is captured, and the badly shaken boys are returned to their shocked parents. The insignificance of this farcical episode would have remained in historical obscurity had it not been for the investigation carried on by a writer—the novel’s narrator and real protagonist—intent on recreating, twenty-five years later, the events of the aborted revolt with the purpose of using them as material for a novel.

During the course of his research, the novelist-narrator interviews a number of people whose testimonies serve to create a conflictive image of Mayta’s personality, from his childhood as a devout boy destined for priesthood, to his alleged homosexuality and failure as a clandestine ideologue whose revolutionary doctrines did not produce any followers. In the process of creating a novel within a novel, Vargas Llosa appeals to the narrative techniques that have characterized his writing. The chronological sequence of events is distorted by the multiple intersection of texts that the reader has to reconstruct in order to have access to the whole story. The strategy of narrative fragmentation cuts across the different levels of “reality” in the fiction and allows the novelist-narrator to insert himself in the text as a protagonist who produces multiple and contradictory versions of Mayta’s life. The proliferation of claims to the real life of Alejandro Mayta serves the purpose of integrating the author’s ideology and of presenting his critical appraisal of social revolution in general. To this effect the novel presents an apocalyptic vision of Peru; United States Marines and Cuban troops are invading the country, with civil war, pestilence and famine posing the imminent threat of total destruction. It is in this atmosphere of social deterioration that the novelist-narrator desperately tries to finish his novel, an obsession about the act of writing that can be attributed to Vargas Llosa himself through his well-known commentaries on his art.

The multiple contradictions in the text are progressively revealed through the conversations between the novelist-narrator and those who claim that have known Mayta. The image of the well-intentioned, albeit naive revolutionary, is thoroughly demolished, and the picture that emerges is that of a man who has failed at everything that he has attempted, from his tortuous marital life to the inept implementation of his political convictions. It soon becomes evident to the reader that the multiple constructs of Mayta’s life are nothing but lies, inventions by the novelist-narrator who takes advantage of an obscure character to create a fiction. This twist in the novel is a confirmation of Vargas Llosa’s contention that fiction is more effective than history in the recreation of the past. The presence in the novel of “reliable” witnesses and of a chronicler who records their testimonies is the affirmation that the writing of historical fiction entails the re-reading and re-writing of an official history. The effect of this subversive act is to provide the conditions for literary imagination to confront and challenge what passes for historical truth.

ISMAEL P. MÁRQUEZ
José Vasconcelos 1882–1959

Mexican essayist, educator and politician

Reading José Vasconcelos’s Memorias [Memoirs] and most of his other works, and taking into account his very active participation in Mexican politics during and after the Revolution, gives one a clear impression of his strong-headedness and egocentricity. Vasconcelos was a writer of high moralistic ambition and strong temperament, Rector of the National University (1920–21) a vigorous Secretary of Public Education (1921–24), a presidential candidate himself in 1929, and a candid critic of Mexican culture and governmental practices for the rest of his life.

In Memorias (1936–39), particularly in the second of its four volumes La tormenta [The Storm], Vasconcelos repeatedly asserts his role as civic missionary, often contrasting those he considers to be morally and politically virtuous (spiritual descendants of the legendary Mayan Messiah Quetzalcóatl) like Madero and his supporters, and those he characterizes as actively and hypocritically evil (descendants of the truculent Aztec god of war Huitzilopochtli) like Victoriano Huerta and his collaborators. In his own memoirs (El río [The River]) Luis Cardoza y Aragón has written “his idiosyncrasy (his intellectual capacity aside) shows itself in his ability to love and hate at the same time.” That “ability” permeates Vasconcelos’s historical and theoretical essays as well as his autobiographical writing—for example, La raza cósmica, 1925 (The Cosmic Race), Indología, 1926 (Indiology), Bolivarismo y monroísmo, 1934 (Bolivar’s Ideals versus the Monroe Doctrine), Breve historia de Mexico, 1937 (A Brief History of Mexico), and Estética, 1933 (My Aesthetics). Thus, his temperament was inseparable from his moral imperatives; for him, human conduct was driven by the extremes of good and bad, with little room for compromise. He lacked the measured detachment of his stylistically more refined contemporaries, Alfonso Reyes and José Ortega y Gasset, and channeled his epic wrath into the writing of his political and cultural allegations.

In Ulises criollo [A Creole Ulysses], and its sequel La tormenta, the author narrates his experiences from childhood (including an elementary school year in Eagle Pass, Texas) to the time of his appointment as Rector of the National University of Mexico in 1920. The third and fourth volumes of Memorias, El desastre [The Disaster] and El proconsulado [The Proconsul], are more politically detailed but less coherent than Ulises criollo and La tormenta. They embrace the author’s experience as rector and re-organizer of the national university and as Secretary of Education, in which capacity he established a nationwide system of public schools and libraries, a vigorous literacy campaign, and a massive publishing program of textbooks; furthermore, he made the walls of the National Palace and several other public buildings available to the muralist painters, Diego Rivera, José Clemente Orozco, David Alfar Siqueiros and Roberto Montenegro.

Over a decade before, Vasconcelos had been an influential member, together with Alfonso Reyes, Antonio Caso, Pedro Henríquez Ureña, Martín Luis Guzmán, Julio Torri and others, of the Ateneo de la Juventud [Athenaem of Youth], founded in October, 1909. The group represented a cultural rebellion against the Positivist philosophy which they believed had been used and abused by Porfirio Díaz’s regime as a pretext for maintaining social and economic inequality; the Ateneo’s sentiments were clearly pro-revolutionary.

From that time, and at an intensified pace starting in 1921, Mexican art and literature experienced a new sense of national autonomy. Indigenous culture, which for three decades preceding the Revolution had been systematically ignored by administrators and the intellectual elite, was now enhanced and incorporated into the work of many artists and writers. Mestizaje (racial mixture and synthesis) was esteemed in all its ethic and esthetic potentiality; and it found eloquent expression in Vasconcelos’s most frequently mentioned work, La raza cósmica. In this short book and its thematic sequel, Indología, as well as in his long and rambling Estética, the author concentrates on the future of Mexico and Latin America rather than their past frustrations. His synonym for the cosmic race is “the fifth race,” referring to an idealized synthesis of the world’s four basic ethnic groups: African, Anglo-European, Indian and Asiatic. The evolutionary result would be a eugenically pleasing people (at least to Vasconcelos; “the ugly shall not procreate,” he declares bluntly) who would establish its Utopian and aesthetically pleasing capital of spiral-shaped buildings in the climatically pleasing region of the Amazonian basin. And the innate human desire for beauty would ultimately dissolve all material adversity.

That same desire permeated his personal relationships, as well as his writing; and it underlies a sensualized and irrationalistic philosophy which he applied to all reality.
Accordingly the recurrent image of “Adriana,” alias Elena Arizmendi, the lover who haunts the pages of Ulises criollo and La tormenta, symbolizes his Romantic quest of impossible perfections. Paradoxically, Vasconcelos the civilizer, the educator, and the political hero (who actually won the presidential election stolen from him by fraud in 1929) was not immune to deplorable prejudices (including a brief courtship with Nazi and Fascist dogma in 1940 and 1941). Privately and publicly he was a Dionysian spirit who lived and wrote as a tragic figure; he had portrayed himself as a modern Ulysses, but the adventures he experienced in his succession of exiles were notably less stimulating than those of Homer’s hero. His tragedy is seen in the contrast between the ideals he articulated as an educator and civic crusader in his best works, written mostly in the decade starting in 1925, and his frustrations and largely recalcitrant opinions over the last twenty years of his life. It is in that context that his vigorous and uneven works should be read.

PETER G. EARLE

Biography

Born in Oaxaca, Mexico, 28 February 1882. Both parents were a strong formative influence.
Mother well read and encouraged son to read and discuss literary works. Father was a customs inspector and thus family moved frequently along the US border. This enabled child to attend school in the US. Studied law at the National School of Jurisprudence, graduated in 1905.
Married Serafina Miranda in 1909 (died), two children. Co-founder of Ateneo de la Juventud (Athenaeum of Youth), 1909; it existed as a formal body only until 1914 but played crucial part in revival of culture after deadening official policy of Positivism. From 1910 to 1930 absorbed in revolutionary and political activities. Supporter of Francisco Madero who was killed in 1913.
Imprisoned by General Victoriano Huerta who assumed control on Madero’s death. Appointed minister of Public Education in 1914, but left for New York the following year when his own faction was defeated. Stayed in US until assassination of Venustiano Carranza in May, 1920.
Travelled in US and visited Peru. Dedicated himself to several business ventures. On returning to Mexico, headed Ministry of Public Education, 1920–24—a vast undertaking and the most valuable service Vasconcelos rendered to his country. Resigned in order to stand for governorship of state of Oaxaca. Lost the election and alleged fraud. Went abroad in 1925, first to Europe and subsequently taught at several universities in the US (Chicago, Stanford, Berkeley). After the assassination of Álvaro Obregón (1928), before he took office as president of Mexico, Vasconcelos returned in 1929 to stand for presidency. Lost, and again alleged fraud.
Returned to US and declared himself the legal Mexican head of state. Debarred from re-entering Mexico for this reason. Lived and worked abroad for ten years. Returned to Mexico in 1938.
For next twenty years played active part in intellectual life of Mexico. Director of National Library, Library of Mexico and founding member of El Colegio de Mexico. Married Esperanza Cruz in 1942, one son. Died in Mexico City, 30 June 1959.

Selected Works

Autobiography
Memorias, 2 vols, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1982
Ulises criollo, Mexico City: Botas, 1935
La tormenta, Mexico City: Botas, 1936
El desastre, Mexico City: Botas, 1938
El proconsulado, Mexico City, Botas 1939

Prose Works
La raza cósmica, Barcelona: n.p., 1925; as The Cosmic Race, translated by Didier T. Jaen, Los Angeles: California State University, 1979
Indología: una interpretación de la cultura ibero-americana, Paris: Agencia Mundial Librería, 1926
Estética, Mexico City: Botas, 1933
Bolivarismo y monroísmo, Santiago de Chile: Ercilla, 1934
Breve historia de Mexico, Mexico City: Botas, 1937
La flama: los de arriba en la revolución, Mexico City: Continental, 1959

Compilations and Anthologies
Páginas escogidas, edited by Antonio Castro Leal, Mexico City: Botas, 1940
Discursos, 1920–1950, Mexico City: Botas, 1950
Obras completas, 4 vols, Mexico City: Libros Mexicanos Unidos, 1957–61
José Vasconcelos y la Universidad, edited by Álvaro Matute and Ángeles Ruiz, Mexico City: UNAM, 1983
Obra selecta, edited by Christopher Domínguez Michael, Caracas: Biblioteca Ayacucho, 1992

Further Reading
Bar-Lewaw Mulstock, Itzhak, José Vasconcelos, vida y obra, Mexico City: Clásica Selecta Editora Librera, 1966
Blanco, José Joaquín, Se llamaba Vasconcelos: una evocación crítica, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1977
Cardoza y Aragón, Luis, El río. Novelas de caballería, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1986
De Beer, Gabriella, José Vasconcelos and His World, New York: Las Américas, 1966
Haddox, John H., Vasconcelos of Mexico, Philosopher and Prophet, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1967
Magdaleno, Mauricio, Las palabras perdidas, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1956
Martínez, José Luis, “La obra literaria de José Vasconcelos,” in his Literatura mexicana, siglo XY, vol. I, Mexico City: Antigua Librería Robredo, 1949
Robles, Martha, Entre el poder y las letras. Vasconcelos en sus memorias, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1989

Interviews
Carballo, Emmanuel, in Protagonistas de la literatura mexicana de siglo XX, Mexico City: Empresa Editoriales, 1986
Ana Lydia Vega 1946–

Puerto Rican prose writer

Ana Lydia Vega began to write in the 1970s, a time when prose writing flourished in Puerto Rico. Publications like Zona de Carga y Descarga [Loading and Unloading Zone] and Penélope o el otro mundo [Penelope or the Other World] were established, providing island writers with suitable outlets for their material. Vega, a professor of French language and literature at the University of Puerto Rico, is one of the island’s most innovative short story writers of the second half of the 20th century. Her collections of short fiction include Virgenes y mártires, 1981 [Virgins and Martyrs], Encancaranublado y otros cuentos de naufragio, 1982, [Encancaranublado and Other Shipwreck Stories], Pasión de historia y otras historias de pasión, 1987 [A Passion for History and Other Stories of Passion], and Falsas crónicas del sur, 1991 (True and False Romances). She also edited and collaborated in a collection of essays entitled El tramo ancla: ensayos puertorriqueños de hoy, 1988 [The Stretch of Anchor: Puerto Rican Essays of Today] and recently a number of her essays that appeared previously in the island’s newspapers have been published as Esperando a Loló y otros delirios generacionales, 1994 [Waiting for Lolo and Other Generational Deliriums].

Vega’s prose style and use of language are bold and innovative; women’s rights, the plight of the exploited, and, in general, the Caribbean area together with its people and history are always at the forefront of her reflections and concerns.

The short story, “Pollito Chicken,” [Chick Chicken] from the collection Vírgenes y mártires serves as an example of Vega’s innovative style and discourse. The title of the short story refers to a children’s bilingual song which, among other tools, was utilized by the American colonial government during the first half of the 20th century to transform Puerto Ricans into English speakers. Spanish-English code-switching is used in the story to indicate the main character’s distorted identity and ideological confusion. Susie Bermúdez, a young Puerto Rican woman who has lived in the United States for a decade, devalues her culture and her compatriots and wishes to become fully integrated into North American society even though it views her as inferior. Although this character always speaks in English, during a crucial moment in which her unconscious takes over, she reverts to Spanish, thus, at least at a deep level, her Puerto Rican identity is affirmed. As Diana L.Vélez states: “The ideological project of this story is that of national unity, unity between the asimilaos [assimilated] and the islanders, for, though she might deny it, Suzie Bermúdez is, in the final analysis, a Puerto Rican just like the island puertorriqueños, [Puerto Ricans] who are Ana Lydia Vega’s ideal readers.”

Many of Vega’s works are concerned with portraying women’s changing role in Puerto Rican society and exploring women’s relationships with men. In “Letra para salsa y tres soneos por encargo” [Letter for Salsa and Three Songs by Request], from Vírgenes y mártires, sex roles are reversed as the woman assumes the initiative in a male/female relationship and throws off the trappings of female victim. After several days of being treated as a sexual object and putting up with the verbal harassment of a man who seems solely dedicated to loathing in the streets, she answers his advances with a simple question: “¿Vamos?” (Shall we go?) and drives him to a motel where she proceeds to pay the bill and lead him to the hotel room. Having become her sexual object, the man is unable to perform sexually. The story includes three possible endings, entitled “Soneo I,” “Soneo II,” and “Soneo III.” All three endings show that the woman is politically concerned and aware of her position as a member of the oppressed working class, while it is suggested, especially in “Soneo III,” in which we see the man return to his usual street corner where he continues his verbal harassment of women, that Puerto Rican men are being left behind as women adapt to the new social and economic developments. Also the role of woman as writer is examined in stories like “Pasión de historia” from the collection Pasión de historia y otras historias de pasión and “Cuento en camino” [Travel Story] from Falsas crónicas del sur. In the first of the two, the main character, Carola, travels to Europe to work on a novel based on the violent murder of a Puerto Rican woman by an ex-lover. Ironically, the would-be writer ends up murdered by her own ex-lover. In the last scene of “Cuento en camino” we are faced by a young woman who tells the reader that her head is full of words and that she cannot wait to get home, sit at her desk, and take out her typewriter.

The stories collected in Encancaranublado y otros cuentos de naufragio are a denunciation of the exploitation and oppression suffered by the native inhabitants of the Caribbean. In the first story of the collection, “Encancaranublado,” three men, one Haitian, one Dominican, and one Cuban find themselves aboard a tiny boat floating in the Caribbean sea. For them this sea becomes nothing more than a dangerous body of water that separates them from the “pursuit of happiness.” Their goal is Miami, Florida and on their way there they begin to compare the economic and social situations in their three nations. Their conversation develops into a fight making all three end up in the water. Eventually an American ship picks them up and they are sent to the lower levels of the vessel accompanied by these words from the captain, “Get those niggers down there and let the Spiks [Puerto Ricans] take care of ‘em.” The story underscores the lack of solidarity among the people of the Caribbean and also the unjust relationships based on economic imbalance and racial discrimination which exist between the United States and the Caribbean islands. The lack of unity among the people of the Caribbean is also the subject of the story “Puerto Príncipe abajo” [Puerto Príncipe Down There] from Virgenes y mártires which is divided into ten short sections each entitled “Diapositiva” [Slide] and each presenting a description of a Haitian scene. In this story a group of Puerto Rican tourists travel to Haiti and, as its title suggests, the group spends its time there as if “looking down” at Haitians and their society. Their condescending attitude is exhibited through, for example, racist comments such as, “Ave María, qué oscuridad, como está el prieto ahí…” (Holy Mary, what darkness, how many niggers…). Moreover, the Puerto Rican tourists pity the Haitians and view their country’s poverty as a direct result of its condition as an independent nation while the text implies that Puerto Ricans should pity themselves for their own colonial status. Vega proposes in these two stories that it is the disunion among its people, negative racial attitudes, and lack of pride in things from the Caribbean that is leaving Antilleans at the mercy of more powerful nations.

Puerto Rican history becomes the focus of Vega’s work in the last story of Pasión de historia, “Sobre tumbas y heroes (Folletín de caballería boricua)” [About Tombs and Heroes: a Puerto Rican Chivalresque Soap] and in Falsas crónicas del sur. The first questions the methods used by historians while the second is a collection of stories and anecdotes about the history of Puerto Rico’s southern area. Some of the events that inspire the stories are well known, such as the central event, the Ponce massacre of 1937, of the story “Un domingo de Lilliane” [One of Lilliane’s Sundays]. Looking at the collection as a whole, one notices that many of the stories have a female protagonist and that they are organized in chronological order covering Puerto Rico’s history from 1859 to the present. The first story of the collection, “El baúl de Miss Florence: Fragmentos para un novelón romántico,” [Miss Florence’s Trunk: Fragments for a Romantic Trash Novel] is set during slavery and its main character is a female English tutor, Miss Florence. Vega’s story represents a female version of history that rises out of the interstices allowed by official history. It is Vega’s own Falsas crónicas that answers Miss Florence’s questions, “¿Quién leerá estos labios mudos? ¿Quién desenterrará mi truncada historia de amor y le pondrá palabras?” (Who will read my silent lips? Who will unearth my truncated love story and put words to it?) as the book becomes an example of how a female narrative voice may retell the history of a Caribbean island and simultaneously inscribe women in this history.

In conclusion, Vega’s work examines the changing values of Puerto Rican society and the influence of the colonial North American presence on the Island. Through an especially biting humour she examines the contradictions and distortions of traditional Puerto Rican values. Generally her characters, male and female, belong to the working class. Most importantly, Vega’s language rises out of Puerto Rican popular culture and serves as a tool for social criticism.

LINDA M. RODRÍGUEZ

Biography

Selected Works

Short Fiction

Vírgenes y mártires, in collaboration with Carmen Lugo Filippi, Río Piedras, Puerto Rico: Antillana, 1981

Encancaránublado y otros cuentos de naufragio, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1982

Pasión de historia y otras historias de pasión, Buenos Aires: Ediciones de La Flor, 1987

Cuentos calientes, Mexico City: UNAM, 1992,

Esperando a Lolo y otros delirios generacionales, San Juan, Puerto Rico: Editorial de la Universidad de Puerto Rico, 1994

Further Reading
Fernández Olmos, Margarite, “From a Woman’s Perspective: the Short Stories of Rosario Ferré and Ana Lydia Vega,” in Contemporary Women Authors of Latin America, Brooklyn New York: Brooklyn College Press, 1983

Interview

---

Venezuela

19th- and 20th-Century Prose and Poetry

There are different ways of portraying the literature of a country. In the following brief account the chosen method is one that could be particularly productive for both the lay reader and the reader acquainted with Venezuelan literature. A contrast between this national tradition and the Spanish American one as a whole underscores the most striking feature of the Hispanic world: the paradoxical homogeneity of unmistakably diverse regions and cultures. Throughout its historical development, Venezuelan literature has played different roles in the Latin American context; sometimes it has been a leading influence, sometimes almost a marginal provincial voice. The following observations will try to define not only a history, but also a set of useful elements to depict in general terms what is unique about a particular country and its writers.

In comparison with other areas of Spanish America, such as Central America, the Middle Andes or the Caribbean, the poverty of the Venezuelan colonial period in the literary realm is notorious, due to a lack of sophisticated pre-Columbian societies and also to the peripheral administrative condition of Captaincy-General, which failed to attract a large number of European colonists, including artists. The scarcity of memorable texts before Independence, therefore, invests the letters of the first decades of the 19th century with a Golden Age aura. Andrés Bello was the first Venezuelan writer who was influential in other countries, but it is important to bear in mind that he represents the ideals of a generation of his compatriots that decisively participated in the political reform of all Spanish America: Simon Rodríguez, Francisco de Miranda and Simon Bolívar, among others. One should notice that the writings of these men emphasized what could be useful for society in every intellectual enterprise. The most commonly used genres are the moral epistle, the essay, the diary, the political speech, i.e., varieties of literature close to the treatise or oratory, left behind by later aesthetic trends, such as Romanticism. It is arguable that modern Venezuelan literature was born under the rule of 18th-century European Enlightenment ideals, especially those of pragmatic involvement in creating a country. During the 19th century, nearly all Venezuelan literature shows... signs of this initial influence. In the years that followed the separation from Spain, literature was rarely considered an independent institution. Instead, it was a device intended to improve communication among intellectuals and their society; in fact, it was deliberately used as a means of education or caveat.

The goal of freeing Latin America from European domination was a long term cultural problem as well as an immediate political task for both Bello and Rodríguez. A poem such as Bello’s Alocución a la poesía, 1823 [Address to Poetry] suggests a literary conflict between the New and the Old Worlds that is expressed, nevertheless, in traditional European terms (the metrical pattern of the Spanish silva and the use of Horatian and Virgilian quotations) that perfectly render Bello’s cautious and moderate separatist views. On the other hand, Sociedades americanas en 1828 [Latin American Societies in 1828], a long essay, with several versions written and published by Simon Rodríguez between 1828 and 1842 in different South American cities, is noticeably more audacious in its demand for New World originality. This volume even attempts to create a new way of writing by incorporating mathematical symbols and distributing paragraphs, words, and sentences on the space of the page in order to emphasize graphically and to analyze certain ideas. Regardless of the revolutionary projects of Bellos and Rodríguez, it is essential to remember that although both were always conscious of the European roots of their thought, their way of thinking was modern in the sense of privileging the need for invention and cultural renewal. With these authors as founding fathers, Venezuelan literature is linked to modernity from its very beginning and owes very little to the colony or to the indigenous societies.

The international scope of action of the Venezuelan liberators scattered a whole generation of reputable writers throughout many nations. Bello published his most important poems in England and then chose Chile as his new home; Rodríguez, after spending many years in Europe, travelled extensively through the Andes and finally died in Peru; Miranda lived in Europe, fought for the independence of the United States, participated in the French Revolution, and ended his life as a prisoner in Spain; Bolívar went to Europe, campaigned through the Antilles and the Andes, and died in Colombia. Because Venezuela was deprived of its most brilliant thinkers, ruined by a ferocious war of independence (which reduced the national population by a third) and immediately thereafter torn apart by decades of civil wars and political crisis, the rest of the 19th century could be described as a relatively weak era of minor authors. This was not the case in other Spanish American nations such as Argentina and Chile, which saw the beginnings of a stable and uninterrupted literary tradition in their first years of republican life. Oratorical genres and texts involved with political institutions prevailed from the 1830s to the 1880s. This fact could be interpreted as a survival of the idea of literature as a social tool, but also as the incapacity of Venezuelan society to develop a sense of literature as an autonomous institution. The familiar essay, the novel, and the short story are scarce and far from being coherent systems of aesthetic contact between authors and public. The only exception to this rule in the map of genres is the artículo de costumbres (the periodical essay of manners). Venezuela provided the ideal place for its full development as a collective literary form of expression, since it fulfilled the need for narratives and for the subjective reflection of both writers and readers. This explains the strength and abundance of this genre and the relative dearth of the novel or the predictable essay. Juan Manuel Cagigal, Fermín Toro, Daniel Mendoza, Nicanor Bolet Peraza and Francisco de Sales Pérez are only a few of the many authors who saw the artículo de costumbres as a vehicle to convey their ideas and to exhibit their fictional techniques, which were subordinated to the goal of depicting national reality, especially in its more regional and daily aspects. Daniel Mendoza, in particular, is the Spanish American writer who most eagerly tried, around the 1840s, to create a variety of costumbrismo closer to the New World than to the classical Spanish authors of the genre: Larra, Mesonero Romanos and Estébanez Calderón.

There exists yet another possible explanation for the absence of a solid novelistic tradition in Venezuela during the 19th century: the persistence of Neoclassicism, which did not favor such kind of literature in the Hispanic world. Other artistic movements, Romanticism and Realism, for instance, though already widely spread throughout Spanish America in the 1830s and 1840s, never enjoyed in Venezuela the continuity and vigor of Neoclassical poetics; at least, these trends were not in violent opposition in this country as they were in Argentina or Chile. Some of the most representative Venezuelan writers of the 19th century (Fermín Toro, Cecilio Acosta, José Antonio Calcaño) were ambiguously attracted by a variety of preferences. Several others dogmatically shared the conservative Neoclassical ideals which somehow accompanied the literary tastes of the Spanish Royal Academy; in fact, the Venezuelan Rafael María Baralt was the first Latin American ever to become a member of that institution in 1853. Both his style as a poet and orator and his purist views about the Spanish language were famous internationally. His celebrity was never to be matched by the efforts of his fellow countrymen who defended individualism and sentimental subjectivity and tried to follow the Romantic revolution in literature (José Antonio Maitín, Juan Vicente González).

By the end of the 19th century costumbrismo became more peripheral; writers of fiction and essay, increasingly prestigious. Moreover, the presence of Romantic ideas and stylistic elements finally seemed to be strengthened in the prose of Eduardo Blanco and the verses of Juan Antonio Pérez Bonalde. In the 1880s and 1890s the conflict between what was considered to be “foreign” and what was “national” deepened as an aesthetic factor. Undoubtedly, the consequence of this was the appearance of one of the most constant debates in Venezuelan literary life ever: the struggle between cosmopolitismo and criollismo (a word which in Spanish America stands for nationalism and, hence, not to be hastily associated with the English word Creole). The art of the Americas knows this false dichotomy under different names; in Venezuela, though, this superficial contradiction has adopted, at least until the 1980s, a more constant and violent tone among critics and writers, who have opposed modernistas against criollistas at first, then, sometimes loosely, regionalistas against vanguardistas, intimistas against comprometidos [engaged], líricos against urbanos and so on.

Spanish American Modernismo, José Martí and Rubén Darío being its founders and leaders, tried to reach a compromise on the dispute. Venezuelan Modernismo, in particular, denied the existence of contraries and instead synthesized them in a rather emphatic way. Leading magazines like El Cojo Ilustrado [The Cultivated Limper] (1892–1915) and Cosmópolis (1894–95) clearly proposed the gathering of cultural introspection and extrospection as one of their dearest goals. For example, the three directors of Cosmópolis, Pedro César Dominici, Pedro Emilio Coll and Luis Manuel Urbaneja Achelpohl, wrote in a wide aesthetic spectrum that ranged from the most exquisite and Parisian decadence (Dominici) to a dramatic realism that closely portrayed the people and habits of the nation in an urgent project of patriotic redemption (Urbaneja Achelpohl). Indeed, the two Venezuelan authors linked to the modernista movement who were to become internationally renowned and certainly memorable, Manuel Díaz Rodríguez and Rufino Blanco Fombona, are excellent models of the reconciliation of supposedly antagonistic preferences. In two of the most representative Latin American novels of the turn of the century, Ídolos rotos, 1901 [Broken Idols] and Sangre patricia, 1902. [Patrician Blood], Díaz Rodríguez showed the fictional possibilities of Modernismo as a drive for metaliterary validation and the acceptance of a new form of idealism, while Peregrina, his last novel (1920), “returns” to regional imagery, though without renouncing the previous pattern of quasi-mystical stylistic refinement. Rufino Blanco Fombona, on the other hand, in his vehement and barbaric tone, transformed from a gallant and almost decorative poet into a preacher of patriotism and political art.

A point to be underscored in Venezuelan Modernismo, which was the second opportunity the country had to be a leading presence in Spanish American literature, is the importance of its prose genres (essay, novel, short-story) and the general irrelevance of its poetry, the contrary of what happened in the rest of the Hispanic world. Ironically, perhaps the most attractive poet of Venezuela during the first three decades of the 20th century was José Antonio Ramos Sucre, a posmodernista rediscovered in the 1960s, who chose prose as a suitable vehicle for his poetry.

The first half of the 20th century is, in Venezuela, an age of dominant meditation about national problems and identity. One of the main consequences of this self-questioning was the revitalization of surviving 19th-century trends such as Realism and Naturalism in the novels of Rómulo Gallegos, who mapped the country in books that systematically depicted different environments: Doña Bárbara (1929) and Cantalcaro (1934) (the southwestern and central plains), Canaima (1936) (the southeastern jungle), and so forth. Venezuela became an object to be explored and understood not only spatially, but also chronologically; the essay, the short story and the novel frequently engaged in the dramatization of historical events as in the works of Arturo Uslar Pietri, Mariano Picón-Salas, Mario Briceño Iragorry, or Isaac Pardo, while contemporary history was also dealt with in narrative and testimonial genres by authors such as José Rafael Pocaterra, Ramón Díaz Sánchez and Miguel Otero Silva. Poetry lingered on a conservative combination of folksy Romanticism and modernista exquisiteness as in Andrés Eloy Blanco or Aquiles Nazoa. As a result, the international avant-garde, whose influence was so powerful at the time in other Spanish American countries (Peru, Argentina, Chile), never became firmly entrenched in Venezuela. The experimental or individualistic consciousness had almost nothing to do with the didactic and provincial spirit most Venezuelan writers shared before the 1960s.

Of course, there were some exceptions. Fernando Paz Castillo and Jacinto Fombona Pachano avoided any sort of poetry of manners and sometimes reached a sincere tone of intimate meditation. Although Teresa de la Parra wrote realistic novels, as did Gallegos, the psychological depth and autonomy of her characters rejected any use of fiction as a direct political device. The same should be said of the later narratives of Enrique Bernardo Núñez, who succeeded in insinuating a mythic side of Latin American history. Also remarkable is the unique work of Julio Garmendia, one of the few Venezuelans who dared to write fantastic short stories in the 1920s and who, consequently, has only been recognized as a major author many decades later.
As already suggested, Venezuelan literature synchronized again with the rest of Spanish American literature only around the 1950s. Since this time, the skills associated with writing as a progressive political activity have been disappearing, increasingly thwarted by a concern with individual, aesthetic, metaphysical and even religious matters.

Such diversity is fully expressed in the poetry of Vicente Gerbasi, Juan Liscano and Juan Sánchez Peláez, who are certainly inspired by some surviving Romanticism, but thoroughly sublimated by the Surrealist experience. Gerbasi’s sober affective world, Liscano’s polyphonic blend of eroticism and paced meditation, and Sánchez Peláez’s dreamlike verbal imagery are almost classic models for contemporary poets. Their efforts made possible, thereafter, in the 1960s and 1970s, the reshaping of the landscape and the human understanding of it in the lyrical creations of Ramón Palomares, Enrique Hernández D’Jesús, Luis Alberto Crespo and Eugenio Montejo. Montejo in particular has developed a complex vision of the universe in which the poetic persona becomes an element of a harmonious cosmos expressed in the poem by means of peacefulness and equilibrium. Other significant poets already well-known before the 1980s are Alfredo Silva Estrada, Francisco Pérez Perdomo, Juan Calzadilla, Jorge Nunes, Rafael Cadenas, Armando Romero and Julio Miranda, all of whom write with highly intellectual, even abstract overtones, brought down to earth sometimes by the expression of affection (Nunes), sometimes by looking at reality in unexpected perspectives (Miranda).

Among the latest trends in Venezuelan poetry is the combination of colloquial speech and urban or everyday topics represented in the 1980s by groups such as Tráfico and Guaire (named after a polluted river that runs through Caracas). This type of poetry is connected to a truly Latin American tendency whose internationally imitated canon includes Ernesto Cardenal and José Emilio Pacheco. Rafael Arráiz Lucca and Blanca Strepponi are two of the Venezuelan poets of the 1980s whose work has been evolving in the 1990s into more complex and personal patterns, far from any tribalism or simplistic avant-garde.

Contemporary Venezuelan narrators owe a great deal to El falso cuaderno de Narciso Espejo, 1952 [Narcissus Mirror’s Apocryphal Notebook] and La misa de Arlequín, 1962, [Harlequin’s Mass], the later novels of Guillermo Meneses, milestones in a national tradition of fictional texts about the reading and writing of fiction. With the publication of these books, narrative experiments became common among Venezuelans and the legacy of early Modernist European and North American writers was finally assimilated. Oswaldo Trejo, for instance, explores the possibilities of linguistic playfulness inspired by the literary adventures of James Joyce or Raymond Queneau; Salvador Garmendia elaborates a gloomy variety of social expressionism (named informalismo by critics such as Ángel Rama); fragmentary techniques and distortion in the representation of time are used by Luis Britto García, Adriano González León and Carlos Noguera; and still other authors, such as José Balza, deepen Meneses’s metafictional discoveries by adding to them an overrefined style which certainly reveals an amazing persistence of Modernismo in Venezuelan narrative practices.

During the so-called Boom of the Latin American novel, Venezuela was certainly absent from the world stage. The reason is not to be found in the aesthetic quality of the national production, since at least the works of Meneses and Salvador Garmendia have been highly praised by international critics. Rather, the explanation seems to be related to a precise social phenomenon: the 1960s and 1970s were decades of democratic consolidation and apparent economic prosperity in Venezuela, in contrast to the rest of the region. Venezuela did not attract the world’s attention and, even more significantly, was not publicized abroad by political émigrés interested in making their homeland known. In the 1990s, since the Boom is over and the country is submerged in a pitiful financial crisis, all conditions seem favorable for an international rediscovery of Venezuelan novelists. Some works of the 1980s and 1990s prove that Venezuela is ready to enter a period of mature and thoughtful use of certain technical devices that Latin American authors from the 1960s and 1970s made well-known. Intertextuality, for instance, is now a conscious means of creation. Homo Sapiens (1990) by Oscar Rodríguez Ortiz and Voces al atardecer, 1990 [Voices at Dusk] by Francisco Rivera are superbly designed junctions of quotations and allusions in which writing and reading become inseparable tasks. Rodríguez Ortiz adds an elegant raid into the realm of eroticism to the textual collage of his short novel. Rivera, on the other hand, while structuring a vast, realistic and highly complex text which takes into account all the varieties of Spanish spoken in Caracas, succeeds in depicting characters and situations that interweave convincingly and constitute moving representations of human passions along with a subtle series of meditations on the process of artistic creation. Another interesting development in the new narrative is the contribution of detective fiction to texts that exhibit their own genre theory: Los platos del diablo, 1985 [The Devil’s Dishes] by Eduardo Liendo is perhaps the best example. Other noteworthy authors of fiction of recent years are Humberto Mata and Antonio López Ortega.

Since the 1950s, the essay, like the narrative, has acquired an international conscience in Venezuela. To the nationalistic autism of topics and oratorical expression dominated by the pedagogical and collective impulse in the 1930s, 1940s and 1950s, the new texts have opposed an aesthetic understanding of the world, in which the individual has found a place and organizes the production of knowledge. From that standpoint, the most respected and influential essayists of contemporary Venezuela are Juan Liscano, Guillermo Sucre and Francisco Rivera, whose ideas of the essay are based on the distinction of personal and artistic reasoning from other rigidly institutionalized forms of research.

MIGUEL GOMES

See also entries on Rómulo Gallegos, Miguel Otero Silva, Teresa de la Parra, Arturo Uslar Pietri

Further Reading

Karsen, Sonja, Ensayos de literatura e historia iberoamericana, New York: Peter Lang, 1988

[Chapter on Venezuela contains sections on Rufino Blanco Fombona and Doña Bárbara]

Liscano, Juan, Panorama de la literatura venezolana actual, Caracas: Alfadil, 1984

Picón-Salas, Mariano, Formación y proceso de la literatura venezolana, Caracas: Monte Ávila, 1984

Rama, Ángel, Ensayos sobre literatura venezolana, Caracas: Monte Ávila, 1985
Érico Veríssimo 1905–1975

Brazilian prose writer

Along with Jorge Amado, Érico Veríssimo became one of the most popular Brazilian writers. Their respective debuts coincided with the regional developments of the Brazilian modernist movement. The former became one of the great names from the northeast, the latter shone from the opposite extreme of the country, the southern region. Within Veríssimo’s vast corpus of fiction, complemented by memoirs and travel books, two great novelistic cycles stand out: the first, providing a synchronic picture, consists of urban social novels and narrates the saga of the petty bourgeoisie in the south, contemporaneous with the author. The second, of epic dimensions, is the diachronic mosaic developed in the trilogy O tempo e o vento (Time and the Wind). From the novel Clarissa (the starting point of the novelist’s career) to Saga, in the fashion of Honoré de Balzac, Veríssimo presented a chronological history of a group of characters. So, even though initially the reader is introduced to the existential conflicts of the adolescent Clarissa and her cousin, the proud Vasco, in a small country village, the reader will re-encounter both characters transferred to the capital of the state, Pôrto Alegre, where they face the challenges of life in a big city. In Caminhos cruzados (Crossroads and Destinies), Veríssimo experiments with the technique of “counterpoint” (inspired by the English writer Aldous Huxley), which he would develop further in his later works. Through this technique different points of view (in this case the writer’s and the characters’) are juxtaposed. This narrative fragmentation works as a formal record of the very fragmentation of reality, and of the identity crisis of the individual in modern society. On the other hand, Veríssimo, like Huxley, fuses fiction and essay by using the narrator’s voice to elaborate reflections on social politics and philosophy.

In the cycle O tempo e o vento, which consists of three parts (O continente [The Continent], O retrato [The Picture] and O arquipélago [The Archipelago]), the “counterpoint” technique is employed to juxtapose temporal levels: present time against past time. The reconstitution of the latter is organized by an explicit relationship with the former. Two hundred years in the history of two southern families are covered, the Terra Cambará and the Amaral, a saga coinciding with the very formation of Rio Grande do Sul (Brazil’s most southerly state), whose heroic settlement dating back to the 18th century is here recorded. It is therefore the epic of a region, from the initial land disputes between the Portuguese and the Spaniards during the colonial period, to the separatist struggles in the early 19th century (when the “farrapos” fighting the “imperialists” attempted to secede from the rest of Brazil), to important events in the mid-20th century. However, it is also the saga of patriarchal society in this part of the American continent since the author narrates its acclimatization, its apogee, and final decadence when challenged by the new emerging social class that had already been predominant in Europe and the US for some time, i.e., the bourgeoisie. And so the historical reflections motivated by O tempo e o vento go beyond regional boundaries to the point of allowing an analysis of social problems in the Brazil of Veríssimo’s own period, which relate also to the whole of Latin America.

In O senhor embaixador (His Excellency the Ambassador) and O prisioneiro [The Prisoner] Veríssimo departs, for the first time, from the context of Rio Grande do Sul, in order to write a kind of international political novel. The social engagement of the author then became explicit and was further accentuated when, with the novel Incidente em Antares [Incident in Antares], he returned to a Brazilian context to fictionalize the historic moment of strict censorship and political repression experienced in Brazil in the 1970s. Thus in his last novel, conceived with the techniques of magical realism, seven corpses that were not buried because of a strike promote a critique of the prevailing moral and social system.

TERESINHA V.ZIMBRÃO DA SILVA

Biography

Born in the city of Cruz Alta, Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, 17 December 1905. Education interrupted by separation of his parents. Obliged to take on a job as clerk. Decided on a career in letters after the publication of one of his stories in a Porto Alegre journal. Secretary of the magazine Revista do Globo [World Review] and later became its editor. Translated literary texts for the publishing house, Globo. In 1941, spent three months in the United States at the invitation of Department of State. Taught at the University of California, Berkeley, 1943; lectured at a number of universities and stayed in the US until 1946. Director of the cultural division of Pan-American Union, Washington, DC, 1953–56. Travelled to Europe in 1959. Suffered a heart attack in 1961. Continued to write and travelled frequently to Europe; visited Israel in 1966. In 1972, a national celebration of his contribution to literature was held in Brazil. First Brazilian writer to live by his pen, the first to gain best-seller status and the first to attempt the modern, urban novel. Died in Porto Alegre, 28 November 1975.

Selected Works

Novels

Clarissa, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1933

Olhai os lírios do campo, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo 1938; as Consider the Lilies of the Field, translated by Jean Neel Karnoff, New York: Macmillan, 1947

Saga, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1940

O tempo e o vento: O retrato, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1951

O tempo e o vento: O continente, O retrato; O arquipélago, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1961
O senhor embaixador, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1965; as His Excellency the Ambassador, translated by Linton Barrett and Marie McDavid Barrett, New York: Macmillan, 1967
O prisioneiro, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1967 Incidente em Antares, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1971

Children’s Literature
As aventuras do avião vermelho, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1936
Rosemaria no castelo encantado, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1936
As aventuras de Tibicuera, que são também as aventuras do Brasil, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1937
Os três porquinhos pobres, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1937
O urso com música na barriga, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1938
Aventuras no mundo da higiene, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1939
Outra vez os três porquinhos, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1939
Viagem à aurora do mundo, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1939
A vida do elefante Basílio, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1939
A vida de Joana d’Arc, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1940
Gente e bichos: histórias infantis, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1956

Travel Writing
Gato preto em campo de neve, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1941
A volta do gato preto, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1946
Israel em abril, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1969

Other Writings
Fantoches, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1932 [short fiction]
Brazilian Literature: an Outline, New York: Macmillan, 1945
Solo de clarineta: memórias, 2 vols, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1973–76

Compilations and Anthologies

Further Reading

The works of Érico Veríssimo have not received the critical acclaim they deserve, a situation that has improved only to some extent since the publication of the monograph by Flávio Loureiro Chaves.
Chaves, Flávio Loureiro, Érico Veríssimo: realismo e sociedade, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Globo, 1976
Zilberman, Regina, A literatura no Rio Grande do Sul, Porto Alegre, Brazil: Mercado Aberto, 1982
Xavier Villaurrutia 1903–1950

Mexican poet, dramatist and prose writer

There can have been few writers so devoted to the cause of literature as Xavier Villaurrutia, critic, poet, playwright and cultural commentator. A towering, enigmatic figure in the history of 20th-century Mexican literature, his importance is easier to reflect upon than to analyse in detail. The work for which he is most famous, his lyric poetry, amounts to little more than a slim volume, and yet its influence, seldom fully acknowledged, resonates throughout Latin America.

Villaurrutia was a key member of the Contemporáneos group of writers and thinkers which emerged in the 1920s and 1930s and whose participants identified themselves firmly as the inheritors of European “universal” literary and aesthetic values. Rejecting the nationalistic calls to write a politicised and specifically Mexican literature, this group found in Villaurrutia the embodiment of much that it stood for: possessed of a remarkable literary intelligence and a singular devotion to the most minute literary detail, as well as a prodigious knowledge of classical, romantic and contemporary literature, Villaurrutia stands out as one of Mexico’s greatest men of letters. It is perhaps ironic that despite his pains-taking devotion to the “universal” canon, his reputation has mainly flourished in Mexico, while that of some of his more overtly Mexicanist contemporaries has spread throughout the literary and critical communities of Europe and the United States.

Perhaps the best way to approach Villaurrutia’s work is to examine the numerous pithy and astute pieces of literary criticism which he wrote. These essays give us first of all a sense of his literary antecedents: Rilke, Cocteau, Valéry, Nerval among European writers; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, Ramón López Velarde, Rafael López and Alfonso Reyes, among Mexicans. They also provide a flavour of Villaurrutia’s unique literary sensibility. Rigorously subjecting itself to the task of a painstaking exegesis, his literary criticism is a masterpiece of precise observation and constitutes a philosophical treatise on the nature of reading and understanding; in particular, articulating a Titanic struggle between emotion and intellect in which for the most part the intellect emerges triumphant.

This struggle finds its echoes in Villaurrutia’s most famous and important literary output, his poetry. Critics tend to agree that this can be divided into three discrete periods, each with a distinctive solution to the question of the relationship between rigour, technique and restraint on the one hand, and the need to give voice to the most effusive and intangible of human feelings on the other.

The early poetry, best represented in Reflejos, 1926 [Reflections], is a pyrotechnic display of brilliant effects. There is a compelling precision in the writing: no rhythm is insufficiently elaborated; each punctuation mark appears to have been located with an almost scholarly attention to detail. What the poems lack in heartfelt emotional content, they make up for in their muscular play of wit and erudition. Poetic references, classical allusions and unexpected puns abound. This is poetry about poetry itself. Words, cut adrift from the constraints of context or common meaning, acquire a deconstructive force, a logic of their own as irony gains the upper hand.

It is commonly acknowledged that Villaurrutia’s best poetry was still to come. When Nocturnos, 1931 [Nocturnes] and, especially, Nostalgia de la muerte, 1938 (Nostalgia for appeared, the youthful brilliance of the early work came into contact with the mature workings of a literary and philosophical intellect. These works maintain an extraordinary equilibrium between style and content, thinking and feeling, word and meaning. The central preoccupations are night and death, and they are worked through with dazzling insights.

Night is portrayed as that time at which experience is suspended in a kind of liminality which is both terrifying and liberating. Death, particularly in “Décima muerte,” (Tenth Death) the poem which has come to epitomise Villaurrutia’s talent, emerges as shaping our essential human condition, identifying a profound metaphysical loneliness. Although death was later to become a theme adopted as part of Mexico’s own cultural heritage, in Villaurrutia (overly at least) the treatment has less to do with Mexican folk attitudes than with the work of the French poets and Rilke, as well as a weighty and impressive European philosophical tradition, which includes Max Scheler and, according to some critics, Martin Heidegger. However, something of the quintessentially Catholic, Mexican nature of Villaurrutia’s experience is never far from the surface.

The poetry of Villaurrutia’s third period has fared less well with critics. When Canto a la primavera, 1948 [Song to Spring] appeared, it was clear that an important change had taken place in his literary attitudes. Here, Villaurrutia attempts to give free rein to his emotions and to achieve an exuberant homage to such traditional poetic themes as Spring, love and desire. The intellectual restraint of the earlier work gives way to a passionate poetic outburst controlled only by the metrical demands of the form. Critics have tended to dismiss this later work as unworthy of Villaurrutia’s talent and good taste, but there is much here that deserves closer attention. For one thing, the technical and linguistic mastery has scarcely diminished; for another, these poems have tended to be read without a trace of wit: recognition of the irony they articulate transforms them and makes them rather more problematic than their detractors would have us believe.

While Villaurrutia’s reputation rests mainly on his poetry, it is important not to ignore the significant contribution he made to theatre. Along with Rodolfo Usigli, he stands as one of the most important dramatists in Mexico’s history. Writing drama took up most of Villaurrutia’s creative energies, particularly in his later years and his output is both copious and influential.

The five one-act plays collected in Autos profanos, 1941 [Profane Sacramental Autos] represent Villaurrutia’s early dramatic work. They belong to a world which is as strange as it is timeless. The characters, who can appear stiff or unrealistic, are cast as representatives of different intellectual positions in a series of animated philosophical debates which shun the conventions of realism in favour of the precise development of an argument. There is something of the Platonic dialogue in these pieces, and yet the poet’s attitude to language and the delicate architectural balance of the prose rescue the plays from incurring the charge of being dry or scholastic.

Villaurrutia’s early plays with their expertly-crafted plots were a great success. His later plays were also performed to great public and critical acclaim. However, they work better when read than performed. The profound religious and philosophical musings of La hiedra, 1941 [Ivy] or La mujer legítima, 1943 [The Legitimate Wife] articulate eternal enigmas of human interaction in a dramatic texture so dense with allusions and subtle ironies that the plays come alive only with the most attentive and concentrated reading.
One especially provocative example of this later work, Invitación a la muerte, 1944 [Invitation to Death], takes as its premise Hamlet’s existential and ethical crisis, transposing it onto a young Mexican grappling with the dilemmas of modern Mexico. In this piece perhaps more than any other, it is possible to perceive in sharp focus the tension between Mexicanness and universality so fundamental to Villaurrutia’s literary stance. The various aporias posited by the drama both mark out the boundaries of this dichotomy and signal Villaurrutia’s rigorous and forward-looking rejection of easy philosophical answers.

Villaurrutia’s output also includes criticism of film, theatre and the visual arts, as well as the prose piece, Dama de corazones, 1928 [Lady of Hearts] which is an innovative and unusual avant-garde attempt at a novel consisting of tortured and demanding interior monologues. This is certainly worthy of more critical attention than it has so far received, with its fine prose style and careful exposition.

As a man of letters, Villaurrutia excelled. Through its profound impact on later writers such as Octavio Paz, his poetry, criticism and drama will no doubt continue to exert a singular influence over Mexican literature for some time to come.

MAURICE BIRIOTTI

Biography

Born in Mexico City, 27 March 1903. Attended the Colegio Francés; Escuela Preparatoria Nacional; and the School of Jurisprudence. Abandoned study of law because he became financially independent. Co-founder, with Jaime Torres Bodet, of the review La Falange (The Phalanx), 1922. Joined civil service and was employed first in Ministry of Health and later in editorial department of Ministry of Education. Helped to found the reviews Ulises (1927–28) and Contemporáneos (1928). Founded the Teatro Ulises (1928) and, with José Gorostiza, the Teatro Orientación. Spent the academic year 1935–36 at Yale Drama School, having won a Rockefeller Foundation scholarship. In 1936 founded the drama group of the Electrician’s Union and was its director until 1939. Appointed to chair at National Drama School. On the surface, at least, Villaurrutia’s life was rather uneventful. This may be because of his homosexuality which, in the context of the period, made prudent the adoption of a low profile. Died of a heart attack in Mexico City, 25 December, 1950. After his death, the Xavier Villaurrutia prize was established in his honour.

Selected Works

Poetry

Reflejos, Mexico City: Cultura, 1926
Dos nocturnos, Mexico City: Barandal, 1931
Nocturnos, Mexico City: Fábula, 1931
Nocturno de los Ángeles, Mexico City: Hipocampo, 1936
Nocturno mar, Mexico City: Hipocampo, 1937

Plays
Cirilo Villaverde 1812–1894

Cuban prose writer

Cirilo Villaverde’s long and active life spans almost the entire 19th century. Born on a sugar plantation near the town of San Diego de Núñez in Pinar de Río province, Cuba, and dying in New York where he lived in exile for decades, he led a life rich in political episodes and conspiracies as well as literary activities. Some maintain that his life was his best work, unquestionably an exaggeration when one considers his monumental novel Cecilia Valdés (Cecilia Valdés, or Angel’s Hill), which offers the reader a totalizing vision of the Cuba, especially Havana, of his time.

Villaverde’s formative childhood years were spent in the country on the plantation where his father held a job as medical doctor tending to the slaves, and there the boy saw with his own eyes the evils of slavery. This left an indelible impression on his mind and imagination, as he himself has recorded: “I stayed there until the age of six or seven, witnessing while I played and ran about almost all the scenes of cruelty, that on the threshold of old age, I painted in my novel Cecilia Valdés.”

In 1837 he began his pursuit of literature, publishing his first stories and short novels in little magazines or newspapers. His earliest fictions, like El espetón de oro, 1838 [The Golden Sword]—considered to be the first novel published in Cuba—were of an exalted Romantic nature, full of horror and violent deaths. Another of these novels, El ave muerte [The Death Bird], deals with incest, a theme Villaverde develops very significantly in Cecilia Valdés later on. The quality of these early works, of accentuated sentimentality and artificiality, is questionable. The author himself sought to forget them, not even mentioning them when many years afterwards he gave a summary of his previous works in a prologue to Cecilia Valdés in 1882.

More importantly, he published an early version of Cecilia Valdés, first as a short story, then as a novel in 1839, which emphasizes costumbrista aspects, but does not really touch on the antislavery theme omnipresent in the 1882 definitive edition. Other works Villaverde published during these years were El penitente, a historical novel set in 18th-century Havana with interesting descriptions of city life but which portrayed exaggeratedly idealized characters. During these years he also wrote El guajiro [The Cuban Peasant] in 1842, published much later in 1890, a story based on a white country peasant type from his native province, describing customs there with a certain gusto, and Dos amores [Two Loves], published in serial form in 1843, and as a book in 1858, a sentimental novel mixed with some strong realistic touches. Finally, Villaverde paid homage again to his native western Pinar del Río province in a compelling work, La excursión a Vuelta Abajo [The Excursion to Vuelta Abajo], published first in Havana newspapers in 1838–39 and 1843, much later in book form in 1891. In this volume of costumbrista sketches, the author paints in stark vivid strokes the human misery occasioned by slavery.

Starting in 1834, Villaverde took part in a noted literary circle in Havana headed by Domingo del Monte, a significant cultural promoter of this period. Del Monte tried to get his group to abandon Romanticism and write in a more realistic fashion. He astutely foresaw that changing the literary focus was a possible way of changing society in Cuba, especially aspects dealing with slavery. Out of this Del Monte group emerged various antislavery novels. As Ivan Schulman has pointed out, del Monte was essentially very conservative. He truly wanted to do away with the slave trade, but without violence or upheaval and—what seems unthinkable to readers of today—“finally cleanse Cuba of the African race.” Villaverde did not follow many of his mentor’s ideas, for he was imprisoned in 1848 because of his participation in political activity against the government. He escaped from jail and fled to Florida.

During the long years of exile spent mainly in New York, Villaverde abandoned his novel writing career and turned his attention almost wholly to political activities, seeking Cuba’s separation from Spain. First he favored annexation to the United States, but when this plan fell apart, he promoted Cuba’s independence. In 1855 he met another Cuban exile, Emilia Casanova, who was very active in the separatist movement. They married and she helped him in all his activities. His former enthusiasm for fiction was now focused on sociopolitical writing and journalism. He returned to Havana only twice during the years abroad, first in 1858 to 1860 when the Spaniards granted an amnesty, only later to revoke it, and for a two week visit in 1888. In 1879, after a lapse of forty years, he set about finishing his long antislavery masterpiece, Cecilia Valdés, which was published in New York in 1882.

Unlike many other Cuban exiles living in New York, Villaverde did not belong to the wealthy bourgeoisie. Though he produced a considerable body of minor works—journalism, costumbrista sketches and short novels—and fought with his pen for Cuba’s freedom, today his fame rests squarely on his extraordinary novel Cecilia Valdés.

GEORGE D. SCHADE

Biography

Born in the region of Vuelta Abajo, Pinar del Río, Cuba, 28 October 1812. Sixth of ten children. Father worked as a medical doctor on a sugar plantation where there were over 300 slaves. In 1823 sent to Havana for schooling. Studied philosophy and law at the Seminario de San Carlos, obtaining a law degree in 1834. After practicing briefly this profession, he gave it up, exasperated by the widespread corruption he found among judges and lawyers. For a while he taught at the Colegio Real Cubano in Havana and also at La Empresa in Matanzas. Joined literary circle formed by Domingo del Monte. Delmontine circle believed in reform rather than in abolition of slavery. In the 1830s abandoned creative writing for politics. By 1847 he was a conspirator in the Club de La Habana, a group which supported independence from Spain only as a first step towards annexation by the US. Joined Narciso López in failed uprising against colonial governor in 1848. Captured and jailed, but managed to escape to Florida after a few months. Travelled to New York where he acted as secretary to Narciso López. López organized three abortive expeditions to Cuba, was captured and executed in 1851, whereupon Villaverde returned to journalism and teaching. When the first War of Cuban Independence (the Ten Years’ War) broke out in 1868, Villaverde supported independence from Spain without annexation. Founded and edited magazines in New York and New Orleans. Opened school in New Jersey in 1874. Made two trips to Cuba. During the first (1858) he bought a publishing house, La Antilla, and helped to found the magazine La Habana. Died in New York, 20 October 1894.

Selected Works

El espetón de oro, Havana: Imprenta Oliva, 1838
Teresa. Novela original, Havana: n.p., 1839
La joven de la flecha de oro, Havana: Imprenta Terán, 1841
El libro de cuentos y las conversaciones, Havana: n.p., 1847
General López, the Cuban Patriot, New York: n.p., 1851
Further Reading

Most of the criticism on Villaverde’s work is confined to Cecilia Valdés. The paucity of general studies and of critical material on other works by this author is reflected in the list below.

Sánchez, Julio C., La obra novelística de Cirilo Villaverde, Madrid: Orbe Novo, 1973

Cecilia Valdés

Novel by Cirilo Villaverde

Cirilo Villaverde first published a short primitive edition of Cecilia Valdés in 1839. After a forty year lapse due to the vagaries of an exile’s life, he was only able to finish his work and publish the definitive edition in 1882. Its full title was Cecilia Valdés, o La Loma del Ángel: novela de costumbres cubanas (literally, Cecilia Valdés, or Angel Hill: a Novel of Cuban Customs); the important subtitle calls attention to one of the novel’s main features, the portrayal of 19th-century Cuban life and customs. Villaverde incorporated the early version, with some changes, into the 1882 edition as the beginning chapters of his monumental book. Here, it is this definitive edition that will be examined, since it constitutes the real novel.

Since its publication many have come to regard Cecilia Valdés as a national novel, associated with Cuba’s identity and struggle for freedom. Villaverde’s heroine has been immensely popular over the years with the Cuban public, renowned in a musical revue as well as in several film versions: a legendary figure. Indeed, her compatriots recognize her, though they never have read a page of the book. Alert readers interested in identification will also realize that Villaverde’s initials are the same as Cecilia’s: CV. Critics have been more grudging to pay homage, though many, especially the Cubans, seem full of praise for the realistic and accurate portrayal of Spanish colonial Cuba. But, well into the 20th century, eminent critics failed to recognize the novel’s worth: for example, Anderson Imbert complained about “its melodramatic plot” and “crude realism without novelistic expression,” an unduly harsh judgment. Raimundo Lazo, though he lauds many of the novel’s virtues, still finds fault with the author’s novelistic technique. Only in the last twenty-five years has Cecilia Valdés come to be better understood and appreciated in all its aspects. Cedomil Goic brushed aside attacks on Villaverde’s “simple novelistic art,” perceptively calling the novel “one of the first expressions of a narrative world presented in a complex and multicolored fashion.” If we examine the work in depth, not only its vigorous antislavery protest and theme, but also its dense texture, exterior structure and interior design, we will discover that it yields up rich treasures and unexpected finds.

Typical of many voluminous 19th-century novels, Cecilia Valdés runs to 500 or 600 pages in many editions. It is divided into four parts with a very brief concluding epilogue. The time frame spans only nineteen years, from Cecilia’s birth in 1812 to the birth of her daughter in 1831, encapsulating the incestuous love affair between the gorgeous, light-skinned mulatta Cecilia and Leonardo Gamboa, white, rich and the spoiled son of a Spanish slave trader, Don Cándido. The lovers, unbeknownst to them, have the same father, and this makes for considerable suspense, even though the reader knows from the start.

In Part I, Villaverde introduces us to the young lovers with their respective families and also devotes much space to the description of a typical mulatto party called La Cuna. In the detailed account of this colorful celebration, the author advances his plot by presenting many of the characters who attend, including Cecilia and Leonardo. In Part II, Villaverde lingers on the world of high society and the Spanish masters in Havana. Here he includes a lengthy description of a fancy ball which contrasts sharply with La Cuna. In Part III, the scene shifts to the country. Some episodes take place at the coffee plantation of Isabel Ilincheta, Leonardo’s fiancée and a kindly, humanitarian young lady beloved by her slaves. The rest of the action in this part occurs at La Tinaja, an infamous sugar plantation belonging to Don Cándido Gamboa where the slaves are treated monstrously. In Part IV, the narrator takes us back to the streets of Havana, where we plunge into the underworld. Finally, we learn what happens to various characters in the succinct epilogue, which ends with an allusion to Dionisio (one of the Gamboa’s town slaves) being condemned to hard labor building streets, just as the novel opened with a minute description of the Havana streets where Cecilia played as a little girl, charming everyone. The novel contains other interesting parallels, such as Leonardo’s lost Swiss gold watch, which turns up at various odd times and places in the text and which augurs ill for what may happen to him in the end.

The novel unfolds, then, in its leisurely three-decker way with subplots and coincidences, long stretches of description interlarded with lively narration, often in dramatic dialogue, and we get to see past Villaverde’s sometimes awkward mechanisms into what the author humanly knows: excesses of every sort—greed, stupidity, cowardice, manipulativeness, dissoluteness, prejudice (especially racial), ambition, pride, pretension and cruelty. On one level, the author presents us with an ample portrayal of the socioeconomic and cultural worlds of early 19th-century Cuba. This vision includes all social classes and castes, starting at the top with members of the Spanish colonial government, then the military hierarchy, then the commercial world with its shopkeepers and street vendors, the educational institutions, markets, fiestas, etc. and in Part III, how life in the country differs markedly from life in the big city. Through all this multicolored reality, the reader becomes acquainted with a large number and variety of characters of different races, colors and mixes—all shades of black, white and brown—and their ways of living and working.
Besides this painting of the period on a grand scale, two other important thematic strands weave synchronically through the volume: first, a series of love stories (couples and couplings) and second, an exploration of the problem of slavery, which seems to seep into all parts of the novel, corrupting and corroding life. Most of the love affairs are adulterous and some, incestuous. Incest, particularly, represents a collapse of family values, and the author mirrors this collapse in his description of crumbling Spanish colonial palaces, a decomposition echoed even more poignantly seventy-five years later by another Cuban novelist, Alejo Carpentier, in El acoso (The Chase).

In addition to the rivalry for Leonardo between Cecilia and Isabel, another woman, doña Rosa de Sandoval, plays a key role in the amorous intrigue. Mother of Leonardo and from one of the wealthiest families in Havana, she has a domineering, manipulative personality, and like Cecilia, is prone to jealous rages—provoked by the past love affairs of her husband, Don Cándido. She also displays an almost unhealthy passion for her son, whom she has ruined by giving in to his every whim, even setting up a house, ironically, for Cecilia, where the two can have their trysts. Most of the other characters in the book tend to come across as rather more one-dimensional, typifying some element of society. Thus we have Cecilia’s grandmother, Señá Josefa, who raises the girl, all self-abnegation and sacrifice; Leonardo, superficial and spineless as the idle rich young man; Nemesia, Cecilia’s friend and José Dolores’s sister, all intrigue and astuteness who knows how to excite Cecilia’s jealousy, etc.

The stories of all the couples/lovers, mostly unmarried but in each case with one of the parties wanting to marry, are interwoven skillfully into the plot: Cecilia/Leonardo, Leonardo/Isabel, Cecilia/José Dolores, Cándido/Rosa, and Cándido/Charo (Cecilia’s mother who went insane after her baby daughter was born and taken from her). In each of the above cases, the tragic outcome of their love lies in the problems engendered in this society dominated by slavery and racial mixing (in the context of a racist society). For example, at the end of the novel, José Dolores, egged on by the furious Cecilia, kills Leonardo before he can marry Isabel. The individual domestic discord repeats over and over the social disharmony at the heart of Cuban society.

Readers of Cecilia Valdés have always been greatly impressed by the theme of slavery rampant in the novel, and especially in recent times, outraged at the brutal way it is depicted in the volume. We know that Villaverde was attacking with reform in mind when he described the wretched living conditions of many of his black characters. Doris Sommer, struck by what she calls the “slipperiness of racial relations” in the book, maintains that “hardly anyone in Cecilia Valdés escapes the charge of racism, not the mulatta, nor her white lover, and certainly not the white narrator.” Villaverde, who spent most of his life battling against the Spanish tyranny in Cuba and protesting vigorously at the treatment of blacks by the whites, would doubtless agree with the first part of this indictment alluding to Cecilia and Leonardo, the lovers, but would most likely be puzzled or indignant at the inclusion of the white narrator/author, i.e., himself, in this racist charge. Despite such a possible blemish, the novel holds up well. And Sommer’s negative reaction lends credence to the notion of the book’s multicolored variety and ambiguity, for it continues to yield fresh and contradictory readings.

GEORGE D. SCHADE

See also entries on Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda, A escrava Isaura (Bernardo Guimarães)
Editions

Critical edition: edited with an introduction by Jean Lamore, Madrid: Cátedra, 1992, [An excellent and up-to-date assessment of the novel by this French Hispanist. Especially good on slavery, the drama of the mulattos, and Cecilia as myth and reality]

Further Reading

Álvarez García, Imeldo (editor), Acerca de Cirilo Villaverde, Havana: Letras Cubanas, 1982. [The editor has gathered together in this useful volume 22, articles on the author and Cecilia Valdés, ranging from 19th-century contemporaries like Ramón de Palma, Manuel de la Cruz and José Martí to Jean Lamore]

David Viñas 1929–

Argentine prose writer and dramatist

David Viñas presents somewhat of a paradox in terms of literary criticism devoted to his prodigious, genre-diverse and yet highly unified corpus. In spite of having continuously published novels, plays, short stories and essays since 1955 and having been awarded numerous literary prizes, Viñas has received relatively little critical attention in comparison with other Latin American writers like Gabriel García Márquez and Mario Vargas Llosa, both of whom also incorporate their national histories into their works. Few writers have investigated their national history with as much depth and passion as Viñas. He constantly probes Argentina’s history with the aim of finding a solution to what he considers the debilitating circularity of Argentine and, by extension, Latin American, history. The cyclical movement of Argentina’s history constitutes the central theme and focal point of his corpus, and this repetitive movement condemns Argentina and Latin America to repeat the errors of the past. Part of the explanation for the paucity of critical attention may stem from the fact that from the publication of his first novel, Cayó sobre su rostro, 1955 [He Fell on His Face], Viñas has not deviated from his essential focus on investigating Argentine history, even in the face of the spectacular successes of the Latin American Boom writers. His work is a constant process of questioning and denunciation, often within a Marxist dialectical framework of thesis and antithesis. While the sociopolitical and historical focus of his literary work may have mistakenly led critics to consider his fiction less innovative and original in comparison with other Boom writers, he nevertheless shares their deep concern with the circularity of history.

Of Viñas’s many works, his 1967 novel, _Los hombres de a caballo_ [Men on Horseback], and _Cuerpo a cuerpo_, 1979 [Face to Face], clearly demonstrate the dynamic evolution of his writing and the depth and coherence of his vision. In Jorge G. Castañeda’s far-reaching study of the Latin American Left, _Utopia Disarmed: the Latin American Left After the Cold War_ (1993), he says of Argentina: “Argentina has always imported and exported revolutionaries. Argentines have mixed exile, revolution, and travel as have few others. They have also repeatedly defied all efforts of inclusion into a tidy classification of the hemisphere’s leftist revolutionary or reformist currents. The Argentine armed left, in so far as it can be identified as such, has had a disproportionate—and rarely constructive—fluence on the Latin American universe.” This contradictory stance manifests itself in David Viñas’s writing and his vision of history.

雒los hombres de a caballo, one of the first texts to deal extensively with the Perón era, focuses on the military establishment, the repository of tradition. Viñas sees this institution as the embodiment of bourgeois values and the liberal ideology which no longer perpetuates itself on a national but on a continental level. The novel centers on Operation Ayacucho which takes place at the end of 1964. Ironically, the name Ayacucho that the military uses to christen their operation designed to eradicate the guerillas was also the name of the 1824 battle which marked the end of Spanish domination in Latin America. Viñas’s bifocal view of history leads him to structure his novel as a contrapuntal tension between past and present, a circular movement in which the positive aims of the 1824 Ayacucho campaign are transformed into a military operation to eradicate them.

In a more restricted sense, the novel centers on the life of a military family—the Godoy family—and their participation in Argentine history. The novel’s complex structure of historical mirrors-mirages opens the door to a more meditative stance on the nature of history. The novel is divided into three long segments which correspond to the preparatory stages for the military operation, the operation itself, and the return to Buenos Aires. Within each chapter Viñas has inserted sections which describe the past of Emilio’s family. His father, grandfather, great-grandfather and great-great-grandfather were all military men, and Emilio’s son will bear the same name as the first Godoy—José María. Metaphorically, then, the circle will be complete and Argentina will remain locked in its closed, circular history. Although Emilio starts to question this circular process, he never breaks out of the vicious circle, and his family’s identity can only be defined in military terms. Viñas clearly shows that the military tradition renews itself from one generation to the next like a self-fulfilling prophecy, and that tradition is rarely questioned. In this novel, the roles and the errors of the past repeat themselves in an endless cycle. At each step Viñas questions and denounces this atrophied tradition in order to shake the foundations of the old order which continues to obstruct Argentina’s development.

In 1979, Viñas published his darkest and perhaps most technically innovative novel, _Cuerpo a cuerpo_, (his original title was Tango), which he wrote during his exile in Spain and after his two children, Mini and Paco, and his two friends, Haroldo Conti and Rodolfo Walsh, had disappeared without a trace. The novel centers on the investigation of the journalist, Gregorio Yantorno, of the life of General Alejandro C. Mendiburu. The structure of the novel recreates the tango of Argentine history through the face to face (or face-off) of contrapuntal fragments from different historical periods which underscores the circular movement of Argentine history within a closed circuit. If Viñas structures Cuerpo a cuerpo like Los hombres de a caballo, he pushes this collage technique to the limit, superimposing different levels and epochs in a series of sixty-nine sections. Argentina’s history spirals inward and, with each cycle, the process of fragmentation continues to increase. History remains indissolubly linked to the sclerotic traditions of the military establishment which adamantly rejects any idea of change or evolution.

As Yantorno penetrates layer after layer of the general’s life, he discovers a series of events which not only link Argentina’s past and present but also create a past-present; that is, while the novel centers on contemporary Argentina, it never loses sight of the circular movement of national history as embodied in the military establishment. Although the novel certainly bears witness to and denounces the atrocities perpetrated by the Argentine military regime during the late 1970s, it also indicts General Mendiburu and reveals the emptiness of the military establishment. As Estela Valverde points out in her book, David Viñas: en busca de una síntesis de la historia argentina, 1989 [David Viñas: In Search of a Synthesis of Argentine History], the journalist Yantorno is the alter ego of David Viñas, for both are determined to discover the truth and reveal the true underpinnings of Argentine history. In addition, according to Valverde, General Mendiburu is also an alter ego of Viñas, the person he could have become if he had let himself be swept up in the circular flow of Argentine history. General Mendiburu is the person who simultaneously exposes and embodies the idea of the Argentina’s historical circularity, and he recognizes the lack of synthesis not only in Argentine but also in Latin American history. In this novel Viñas moves beyond the illusions of Los hombres de a caballo. The military establishment remains locked in its historical circularity, and the writer no longer plays an effective role in his country’s destiny. The novel’s structure underlines the pessimism and extreme process of fragmentation which Argentina’s historical circularity has produced.

Viñas’s intense focus on national history shows that it constantly oscillates between thesis and antithesis without ever reaching a creative synthesis which can produce positive change. According to Viñas, Argentines have willfully ignored their circular history which condemns them to repeat the errors of the past. In short, they lack any historical memory. Viñas also believes that only the military possesses a sense of tradition and an awareness of the past, so that it embodies the values and essence of Argentina. The military sets a dangerous precedent since it acts only out its own limited sense of identity, and this can lead to the horrors of the late 1970s in Argentina or the failed dream of omnipotence of the Falklands War in 1982. Viñas depicts a world of Manichean binary oppositions in which no synthesis is possible, in which Argentina continues to move in a closed circle leading to increasing fragmentation and disillusionment. Unlike many of the Latin American Boom writers who similarly view history as circular, Viñas remains solidly rooted within the confines of national history. Although his novels certainly extend far beyond the borders of Argentina, the circular movement of history in his works spirals inward towards an uncertain fate.
See also entry on The Historical Novel

Biography

Born in Buenos Aires, Argentina, 28 July 1929. Educated initially by “curas y militares” (priests and army officers); studied at the University of Buenos Aires; received doctorate from the University of Rosario, Argentina. Co-founder, with his brother Ismael, of the journal Contorno, 1953–57. Being a Marxist he suffered considerably during the military dictatorship in Argentina, 1976–83; spent period 1973–83 in exile, teaching at universities in Germany, Denmark and California. Returned to Argentina in 1984. Professor of Literature at the University of Buenos Aires, since the mid-1990s. Used the pseudonym Raquel Weinbaum when writing for the press. Also writes scripts for film and television. Recipient of the following awards: National Prize for Literature, 1962. and 1971; Casa de las Américas Prize, 1967; Argentine Critics’ Prize, 1970 and 1973; National Theatre Prize, 1972.

Selected Works

Novels

Cayó sobre su rostro, Buenos Aires: Doble P: 1955
Los años despiadados, Buenos Aires: Letras Universitarias, 1956
Un dios cotidiano, Buenos Aires: Kraft, 1957
Los dueños de la tierra, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1959
Dar la cara, Buenos Aires: Jamcana, 1962
Los hombres de a caballo, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1967
Cosas concretas, Buenos Aires: Tiempo Contemporáneo, 1969
Jauría, Buenos Aires: Granica, 1974
Cuerpo a cuerpo, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1979
Claudia conversa, Buenos Aires: Planeta Argentina, 1995

Short Fiction

Las malas costumbres, Buenos Aires: Jamcana, 1963

Essays

1. De Sarmiento a Cortázar, 1971
2. Apogeo de la oligarquía, 1975
3. La crisis de la ciudad liberal, 1973
En la semana trágica, Buenos Aires: Jorge Álvarez, 1966
Argentina: ejército y oligarquía, Havana: Casa de las Américas, 1967
De los montoneros a los anarquistas, Buenos Aires: C.Pérez, 1971
Grotesco, inmigración y fracaso: Armando Discépolo, Buenos Aires: Corregidor, 1973
¿Qué es el fascismo en Latinoamérica?, Barcelona: La Gaya Ciencia, 1977
Ultramar, Madrid: Edascal, 1980
Contrapunto político en América Latina: Siglo XX, Mexico City: Instituto de Capacitación Política, 1982
Indios, ejército y frontera, Mexico City: Siglo XXI, 1982
Anarquistas en América Latina, Mexico City: Katún, 1983

Plays
Lisandro, Buenos Aires: Merlin, 1971
Dorrego, Maneobras, Túpac Amaru, Buenos Aires: Ediciones Cepe, 1974

Biography
Louis Pasteur, in collaboration with Marta Eguía, Madrid: Hernando, 1977

Further Reading
Cano, C.J., “Épica y misoginia en Los hombres de a caballo” Revista Iberoamericana 96–97 (1976)
Foster, David William, “David Viñas: lecturas desconstructivas y correctivas de la historia socio-cultural argentina,” Ideologies and Literature (Fall 1987)
Shaw, Donald L., Nueva narrativa hispanoamericana, 2nd edition, Madrid: Cátedra, 1983 [Chapter 6 has section on Viñas]

Vuelta

See Journals
María Elena Walsh 1930–

Argentine poet, prose writer and author of children’s literature

When still a teenager María Elena Walsh won acclaim from the Argentine cultural elite for her first book of poetry, Otoño imperdonable, 1947 [Unforgivable Autumn], whose melancholic tone, formal perfection and elegiac idealism led anthologists to include her among the Neoromantic poets of the Generation of 1940. A plaquette, Apenas viaje [Brief Journey], and the joint volume with Ángel Bonomini, Baladas con Ángel [Ballads with Angel], followed in 1948 and 1952, respectively. However, increasingly disillusioned by both poetry and politics in Argentina, and unwilling to continue the creative activity she described as “bordering on madness,” Walsh left to live in Europe in 1952–56. In Paris, with poet and ethnomusicologist Leda Valladares, she formed the duo “Leda and María” and enjoyed considerable success singing traditional folklore in night-clubs and music-halls, thus acquiring the musical training she would employ so magisterially later. This was the first of the various changes in direction that would characterize her remarkably versatile public career.

Walsh has always taken pride in her Anglo-Argentine family legacy of words and play in two languages. Europe, therefore, afforded her “a reconciliation with paradise lost” that inspired the poetry for children she also set to music and adapted for stage and television. Her work both broke with the traditional paradigm of much foundational children’s literature designed to “inculcar respetabilidad, historia versificada y obediencia” (inculcate respectability, patriotism and obedience), and also provided an intelligent alternative to the contemporary cultural colonization by the US embodied in the Walt Disney productions. Following the example of José Sebastián Tallon, she sought to amuse and challenge her child audience in order to encourage intellectual autonomy. Her chief sources of inspiration came from the nursery rhymes, limericks of Edward Lear, and Lewis Carroll’s Alice, the ballads and carols of Hispanic folklore, and the ingenious wordplay of French Surrealist Robert Desnos’s Chantefleurs et Chantefables, 1944 [Singingflowers and Singingfables]. Walsh’s intention was, however, to adapt, to make “spiritual” rather than literary translations of poetic play, which readers from Argentina—and, indeed, from all Spanish America—could seize immediately. Thus, an ugly demon from Brazil lent his particularly euphonious name to her first collection of poems for children, Tutú Marambá, that appeared in 1960. Typically Walsh exorcised any evil connections by reassuring her young readers about the redemptive powers of the friendship of “the excellent people who live in this house of paper.” These included Confite the cat, the feminist monkey Jacinta in all her silken finery, a grandmotherly but studious cow from Humahuaca, the tragic Ophelia Mouse, and, perhaps most memorable of all, the not too distant relative of Old Mother Hubbard, Doña Anémona Disparate, herself. They were joined in 1963, in El reino del revés [The Topsy-Turvey Kingdom], by, among others, Monoliso and his passion for the Twist, Don Enrique del Meñique, and Manuelita the tortoise who undertook an epic journey from Pehuajó to Paris. Most of these characters appeared in Walsh’s shows for children that enjoyed long runs and an extended life in the recordings of her wonderfully inventive musical settings. Keeping up the momentum, in 1965, “como un bicho en la punta del lápiz [y] se ponen a correr por su cuenta en el papel” (like an insect which having fallen in the inkwell [and] then runs wildly across the page), came Walsh’s collection of limericks, Zooloco [The Zoolological Gardens], while in the following year Walsh turned to prose, recounting tales of the magical forest of Gulubú, and delighting in the various vicissitudes of an elephant named Dailán Kifki. With changes in the sociopolitical climate in Argentina, however, the light-heartedness of much of the early whimsy faded as, in 1977 in Chaucha y Palito [Nickel and Dime], Walsh felt constrained to argue more directly in favour of social justice and greater tolerance of difference.

Until recently children’s literature has rarely merited serious consideration but new studies underscore the creativity and innovative subversiveness of Walsh’s topsy-turvey world of the mind at play that offers an alternative order from which to question and reinterpret perceived reality. Writing from what she ironically calls the “despised suburbs of Mount Parnassus,” Walsh has exploited a richly poetic vein with verve and talent in order to create a new lore for cebollitas (as children are called in the popular idiom of the River Plate), that has deservedly achieved classic status.

Following the success of her shows for children, in the late 1960s Walsh turned to an adult audience, putting on a series of one woman performances of the type she had admired in the café-concerts of Paris. Blending together with her own considerable charisma, the professionalism of French entertainers Charles Trenet and Georges Brassens and the combination of folklore and social concerns she found in Brecht and the American protest singer Woody Guthrie, Walsh virtually metamorphosed the urban folksong. For ten years from 1968 she enthralled audiences with her quizzical look at Argentine society, shot through with nostalgia, tenderness, solidarity, and, increasingly, anger at the persistent infringement of civil liberties in that period. Two collections made available the lyrics of her songs, Juguemos en el mundo [Let’s Play in the World] in 1970, and Cancionero contra el mal de ojo [A Songbook against the Evil Eye] in 1976, while recordings by Walsh herself and later, most notably, by Susana Rinaldi and the Zupay Quartet, captured the breadth of her musical eclecticism that aligned so memorably baguala, zamba and guajira with Bach and Ravel, or tango and jazz.

In 1965, with Hecho a mano [Made by Hand], Walsh had again “agonized a little longer” to produce a new aesthetic for poetry that would be distinctly colloquial in tone and centred on contemporary issues, without losing the technical mastery that had been her hallmark from the beginning. Particularly innovative are her eight poetic “epistles” celebrating woman as lover, subject rather than object of desire. Hecho a mano is a pivotal work, with obvious connections through pastiche and parody with her poetic nonsense for children, and some clear indications of the use of different registers, humour, and the decidedly feminist content of the writing that followed. If Walsh published little between 1978 and 1982, poems like “Contratango” [An Anti-tango], “Fiesta patria” [Civic Holiday] and “Solo de madre” [Solo for a Mother] were valiant rallying cries against the power of the patriarchy, once more epitomized in Argentina by military uniforms. These and almost all Walsh’s previous poetry were collected in the anthology of 1984, Los poemas [Poems]. The change in 1990 to prose for her “palimpsest,” Novios de antaño [Hearthrobs of Yesteryear], “an autobiographical fantasy” depicting life in the decade 1930–40, brought Walsh her first best-seller for adult readership.

Always an outspoken feminist, Walsh has used most imaginatively a variety of genres to combat “la horripilante misoginia y niñofobia de nuestra cultura hebreocristiana” (the horrifying misogyny and child phobia of our Judeo-Christian culture) and also to celebrate feminism as “this century’s real revolution.” Thus, in her writing for children Walsh has systematically avoided sexual stereotypes by foregrounding instead some new-age protagonists like the Indian medicine woman in her revisionist rendering of the British invasion of Argentina in 1806, El diablo inglés, 1974 [The English Devil], the aeronautical grandmother of Bisa Vuela (1985), or, most recently, in La nube traicionera, 1989 [The Treacherous Cloud], her free version of one of French novelist George Sand’s tales for children, “Le nuage rose,” where Luisa, “the cloud-spinner,” demonstrates how the female tradition can be a positive source of strength and solidarity. Equally, in her popular songs Walsh has immortalized the army of undervalued women who are exploited in the home, in domestic service, and in underpaid teaching jobs. More subversively, writing in the late 1960s and early 1970s within the conventions of the woman’s page and television soap operas, forms that most feminists refused to consider seriously, Walsh deliberately set out to undermine the passive, ultra-conservative image of the traditional female role in society.

The subversive quality of Walsh’s writing was not lost on the military junta: one of her poems published in 1979 for wide diffusion in the daily press, “Complicidad de la víctima” [Complicity of the Victim], caused her name to be placed on the black list, whilst radio and television stations were advised against airing her work at this time. But Walsh returned, “like the cicada” of possibly her most famous song, “Como la cigarrilla,” [Like the Cicada] her symbol of indomitability with which so many throughout Latin America have identified. The essays she wrote for the newspaper El Clarín during the worst years of the Proceso (the 1976–83 military dictatorship) displayed extraordinary lucidity and courage that won her respect both within Argentina and outside. These were collected in 1993, together with some earlier writings, under the title of the article that stunned readers on 17 August 1979 by the audacity of her denunciation of systematic political repression, Desventuras en el País-Jardín-de Infantes [Misadventures in Kindergarten Country]. They attest the constancy of Walsh’s imaginative, ethical approach to social issues in a country where censorship and acquiescence have so often been the accepted way of life.

In a long and multi-faceted career Walsh has used successfully a variety of modes of expression to reach the general public that, in turn, has responded with affection by venerating her as a familiar icon of Argentine popular culture.

K.M. SIBBALD
Biography

Born near Buenos Aires, Argentina, 1 February 1930. Father of mixed Irish and English stock; mother of Spanish descent. Father worked on the railways and was musically inclined. Studied at the National School of Fine Arts, but although she obtained a degree, was a mediocre student. Published poems in national newspapers and magazines in her mid-teens. Spent three years in the United States, then travelled to Europe with a friend and fellow-folklorist, Leda Valladares. Settled in Paris where they earned their living by performing in clubs. On returning to Argentina they toured the provinces with their folk songs. Began to write for children in 1950s and to work for children’s television in 1959. Started one woman shows in 1966. Co-wrote and co-produced a film for children in 1971, “Jugamos en el mundo” [Let’s Play in the World].

Selected Works

Poetry
Otoño imperdonable, Buenos Aires: privately printed, 1947; Buenos Aires: Ediciones del Bosque, 1948
Apenas viaje, Buenos Aires: El Balcón de Madera, 1948
Baladas con Ángel, published with Argumento del enamorado by Ángel Bonomini, Buenos Aires: Losada, 1952
Casi milagro, Montevideo: Cuadernos Julio Herrera y Reissig, 1958
Hecho a mano, Buenos Aires: Fariña, 1965
Los poemas, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1984
Las canciones, Buenos Aires: Seix Barral, 1994

Children’s Literature
El reino del revés, Buenos Aires: Fariña, 1963
Zoo loco, Buenos Aires: Fariña, 1964
Cuentopos de Gulubú, Buenos Aires: Fariña, 1966
Dailán Kifki, Buenos Aires: Fariña, 1966
El diablo inglés, Buenos Aires: Estrada, 1974
Angelito, Buenos Aires: Estrada, 1974
El país de la geometría, Buenos Aires: Estrada, 1974
La sirena y el capitán, Buenos Aires: Estrada, 1974
Chaucha y Palito, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1977
Bisa Vuela, Buenos Aires: Hispamérica, 1985
La nube traicionera, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1989 [A free version of “Le nuage rose” by George Sand]

Other Writings
Aire libre, Buenos Aires: Estrada, 1967 [school reader]
Novios de antaño (1930–1940), Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1990
Desaventuras en el País-Jardín-de-Infantes, Buenos Aires: Sudamericana, 1993 [newspaper articles]

Compilations and Anthologies
Versos folklóricos para cebollitas, Buenos Aires: Fariña, 1966
Versos para cebollitas, Buenos Aires: Fariña, 1966
Emilio Adolfo Westphalen 1911–

Peruvian poet and prose writer

Prior to the 1980s, Emilio Adolfo Westphalen never published an edition of poetry larger than 200 copies and during the years from 1936 to 1979 stopped publishing poetry altogether (at certain points even stopped writing poetry). This limited distribution and misleading “period of inactivity” have helped to obscure the importance of Westphalen’s contribution as a poet, writer, and critic of both literature and art. Few people realize that even during Westphalen’s “period of inactivity” he had advanced, as editor, two important avant-garde magazines (Las moradas, 1947–49 and Amaru, 1967–71), worked as a professor of pre-conquest art, and toured three countries (Italy, the United States, and Mexico) as a cultural attaché or ambassador for Peru. Indeed, Westphalen is not simply an orthodox Surrealist poet of the 1930s, his work has significantly matured, and he has influenced two or three generations of Peruvian writers and artists in a multifarious way. The nature of this influence has only begun to be questioned, understood and weighed.

As a “literate” poet, Westphalen has read extensively. Nevertheless, one can still substantiate an argument that would demonstrate how Westphalen’s work has been significantly influenced by the works of Eguren (Simbólicas), Vallejo (Trilce), Juan Ramón Jiménez (Platero y yo [Platero and I]) and several others. Westphalen has also benefited from the catalysis of friendship. Among Westphalen’s closest friends are Martín Adán, Estuardo Nuñez, Xavier Abril, José María Arguedas and César Moro. These combined influences have been instrumental in forming a poetry that, in the most general descriptive terms, seems mystical, allusive, passionate—a poetry of silences, simultaneity, and unlimited space.

Westphalen’s first period, that of the 1930s, is characteristically more hermetic and much harder to understand than his later work. This initial poetry includes: Las insulas... extrañas [Strange Islands], Abolición de la muerte [Abolition of Death], parts of “Belleza de una espada clavada en la lengua” [Beauty of a Sword Piercing One’s Tongue], from the book of the same title, and Cuál es la risa [What is Laughter], published some forty-five years later thanks to the efforts of André Coyné. With the exception of Cuál es la risa, these early works have been republished along with the autobiographical essay, “Poetas en la Lima de los años treinta” [Lima Poets in the 1930s] in Otra imagen deleznable [Another Fragile Image]. Westphalen’s interests in experimental poetry, Surrealism, and the Spanish mystics led him during this early period towards an exploration of the individual and his passion or desire. For Westphalen, this exploration occurs in a poetic reality inclusive of both conscious and subconscious elements, a poetic world where one migrates between the real and the “marvelous.” Many times Westphalen’s world is decentered, dispensing with the traditional corporeal “yo” (first person “I”).

The poetry that Westphalen has written after 1980 (his second period of poetry) is predominantly more brief than his earlier work; it is comprised of compact imagery, contains less complicated semantic structures, and frequently is written in the prose poem form. This poetry includes: Arriba bajo el cielo [Above Below the Sky], Máximas y mínimas de sapiencia pedestre [Maxims, Maxima and Minima of Pedestrian Sapience], Ha vuelto la Diosa Ambarina [The Amber Goddess has Returned], and Belleza de una espada clavada en la lengua. The latter is an anthology of both Westphalen’s early and late poetry; however, it does not include the poems in Cuál es la risa nor those in Ha vuelto la Diosa Ambarina.

The most popularly embraced poems of Westphalen’s production are those that were written during his early period in Las ínsulas extrañas and in Abolición de la muerte. In the first collection of poems, Westphalen uses a poetic language constructed from archetypical images: shadow, fire, water, blood and tears. The title Las ínsulas extrañas alludes to the mysticism of St John of the Cross, although for Westphalen this allusion does not embody the entire mystical process of spiritual purification. Westphalen is only interested in the silent inner music that the mystic pursues and the struggle to describe this experience. The second collection, Abolición de la muerte is an extended allegory dedicated to the poet’s pursuit of his beloved one, a young nymph, or beauty itself. In this instance, Westphalen’s poetry is even more baroque and surreal. In many poems a series of descriptive images or “overlay” quickens to the point of stream-of-consciousness.

A closer examination of Las ínsulas extrañas reveals how Westphalen seeks to define those internal islands of thought and emotion characteristic of mysticism. He explores love, passion, and desire in both conscious and subconscious territories. The majority of these poems describe the altered emotive states of a soul in its union with and separation from the beloved. Both the beloved and the soul itself are often described as natural forms other than the corporeal body. Westphalen’s poetic world often appears open-ended and evanescent.

In Westphalen’s free verse, there are no signals to indicate when voices have changed; there are no tags to prioritize one particular voice or to authenticate one message, feeling, or image. Westphalen collages together both multiple points of view and images. Only repetition and isotopic cohesion preserve a fleeting poetic nucleus. Often Westphalen uses hyperbolic comparisons and semantic dissociation in order to accentuate the synesthetic nature of one’s existence within nature and the desire to fuse with the beloved.

Westphalen’s poetic composition reminds one of Huidobro’s parachutes or even Lorca’s guitar strings. Eyes can become new skies and horizons, internal and external visions; trees can represent human struggle, shoes the march of time. The poetic “yo,” “Ud.,” “tú” (the first person “I” and second person formal and informal “you”) become malleable. Westphalen intensifies this same complicated web of baroque-like description in works such as Abolición de la muerte, this time with less fragmentation of subjects. One might consider Cuál es la risa Westphalen’s most Surreal and experimental extension of this same poetic.

Despite the critical emphasis placed on Westphalen’s early works, one should not overlook his more mature prose poetry. Although less hermetic, these works still reveal noteworthy skill. In fact, reading Westphalen’s work chronologically backwards can help to unlock some of his early imagery. For instance, in the collection of poems “Porciones de sueño para mitigar avernos” [Pieces of Dreams to Mitigate Hells] included for the first time as part of Belleza de una espada clavada en la lengua, Westphalen directs our attention to those extremely emotional yet seemingly inconceivable moments when we feel as if we have died or our soul has been amputated. In Ha vuelto la Diosa Ambarina Westphalen pursues ineffable poetic moments. This time he demonstrates how signs, words, and gestures have no meaning in themselves, but rather serve only as “pointers.”

As in his earlier work, Westphalen stresses how closing one’s eyes can reveal more than contemplating night itself. In Nueva serie [New Series], Westphalen overtly mixes social criticism with his poetic agenda. He criticizes contemporary society’s devaluation of death and its role in defining life. In Remanentes de naufragio [Remnants of a Shipwreck] Westphalen uses one-sentence prose poems to emphasize those unreal and impossible spaces that only the poetic and philosophical imagination can conceive. And finally in Máximas y mínimas de sapiencia pedestre he explores many of the same common threads of his poetic imagery (fate, dreams, pain, water, sexual desire); however, this time Westphalen uses a colloquial style similar to that of a story, fairy tale, or joke.

The only works of Westphalen’s late period that do not echo his earlier poetry are Arriba bajo el cielo and El niño y el río [The Boy and the River]. These collections were written separately but published together forming only one part of Belleza de una espada clavada en la lengua. The first group of poems is a short allegory in which a black-martin’s behavior, a symbol of Rome’s typical socialite, is juxtaposed against an owl’s behavior—Giorgio de Chirico’s intellectual curiosity and ghostlike existence. The second work, dedicated to Arguedas (most probably because of Arguedas’s fond remembrances of those childhood Quechuan fables he heard) tells a fable of a child and his adventures beside and within a river. For Westphalen the river assumes mythical proportions and becomes a magical playground where a child innocently discovers the beauty and mystery of nature.

Whether one chooses to start at the beginning or wishes to read Westphalen’s poetry chronologically in reverse, one will inevitably encounter this poet’s labor—to congeal the allusive moment, feeling, or thought. In each period of his work, Westphalen creates a system of images that expresses these thoughts and feelings in a mutually imaginary and real world. In both his more colloquial framework or more surreal and experimental web of images, Westphalen pushes the reader beyond words, signals towards a marvelous/real space that heightens his/her synesthetic experience and echoes of mythical beginning. For Westphalen, poetry, like music, should be constructed utilizing silence; a poet must divide and break up silence—what is not said, not known, at times not seen, something dreamed, something ineffable and unexplored.

WILLIAM P. KEETH

See also entries on Martin Adán, César Moro, Surrealism, César Vallejo

Biography

Born in Lima, Peru, in 1911. Attended Deutsche Schule preparatory school, and studied originally to be a civil engineer. After failing a university entrance exam, he changed direction and began pursuing his real interest, literature. Thereafter, he studied in the Facultad de Letras at the National University, San Marcos, Lima. After publishing his first two books of poetry, Westphalen worked on the first Surrealist Exhibition in Lima, helped publish and edit four avant-garde magazines, and became a professor of pre-Columbian art. Later, he served as a cultural attaché in New York and in Rome. From 1971 to 1983 he again travelled as a cultural attaché in Italy, Mexico and Portugal. Currently lives in Lima, although as reported in El Comercio (29 December 1994), is suffering from both illness and poverty.

Selected Works

Poetry
Las ínsulas extrañas, Lima: Compañía de Impresiones y Publicidad, 1933
Abolición de la muerte, Lima: Ediciones Perú Actual, 1935
Otra imagen deleznable, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1980
Arriba bajo el cielo, Lisbon: n.p., 1982
Máximas y mínimas de sapiencia pedestre, Lisbon: n.p, 1982,
Ha vuelto la Diosa Ambarina, Mexico City: UNAM, 1989
Belleza de una espada clavada en la lengua, Lima: Ediciones Richay, 1986

Other Writings
Dos soledades, in collaboration with J.R. Ribeyro, Lima: Instituto Nacional de Cultura, 1974

Further Reading

Alquie, Ferdinand, Filosofía del surrealismo, Barcelona: Seix Barral, 1974
Women’s Writing

19th Century

The first task that the student of 19th-century Spanish American women’s literature must undertake is to examine the cultural conditions which allowed the entry of women into public discourse after three centuries of virtual intellectual anonymity. Apart from solitary figures such as Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, colonial literature was largely produced by men and addressed to a male audience. In contrast, the 19th century saw the advent of the Latin American woman writer who wrote not only for a specific female readership but for the nation as a whole. This phenomenon needs to be considered in the context of a complex process of cultural modernization in which the emergence of the novel as a privileged literary genre plays a central role. The novel, in the view of the liberal intelligentsia, was to have a “civilizing” influence on a reading public in need of modern cultural paradigms, by focusing on the healing charms of the domestic order and thereby counterbalancing the violent avatars of political life taking place at the time. As the private sphere of family affections became established as a narrative focus in the novel, women came to be highly valued as special creatures who, by virtue of their “natural” purity and moral strength, were capable of contributing to the task of nation formation. A number of important novels were published under titles that suggest the mobilization of symbols that encouraged the identification of the imagined nation with a bourgeois feminine sphere, e.g., Soledad, 1847 [Solitude] and Amalia, 1851 (Amalia: a Romance of the Argentine) by the Argentines Bartolomé Mitre and José Mármol respectively; Julia (1861) by the Peruvian Luis Benjamín Cisneros; Clemencia (1869) by the Mexican Ignacio Manuel Altamirano; and the much celebrated María, 1867 (María, a South American Romance) by the Colombian Jorge Isaacs, among others. In most of these novels, gender distinctions were used to play with the oppositions of civilization and barbarism and colonialism and republicanism. In the case of the Argentine novels, the “true” symbolic nation was perceived as feminine and inserted within a discursive polarity that saw the urbane-spiritual-modern heroine in opposition to the materialistic-rustic-authoritarian male villain.

The above occurred at a time when Latin American societies were experiencing a profound transformation of values under the impact of their encounter with Northern European modernity. The secularization that women were undergoing—access to education and the demise of colonial models of feminine conduct—contributed to making the period propitious for women’s entry into public discourse. A flurry of romances, legends, essays and serialised fiction signed by women were published both in book form and in that quintessential 19th-century literary space—the periodical press. However, it is clear that women writers did not identify with the master narratives of nationalism circulating at the time, which constructed the newly founded republics as essentially Christian, white and western. Rather, deconstructing the civilization/barbarism opposition, they allied themselves with those groups that were being marginalized by the projects of modernization, particularly Indians, ex-slaves and women. The Cuban Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda’s novel Sab (1841) is an abolitionist narrative published half a century before slavery was finally abolished in her native Cuba. In a later novel, the eponymous hero Guatimozín (1846) represents the trials and tribulations of a people in their struggle against the invading forces of Cortés. In the case of the Peruvian Clorinda Matto de Turner, her two novels of life in the Andes Aves sin nido, 1889 (Birds without a Nest), and Índole, 1892 [Human Nature], explores the viability of a mestizo as opposed to a creole national culture. The Colombian Soledad Acosta de Samper published, among a myriad of other works, the novel Dolores (1867), a lucid study of leprosy seen in its symbolic dimension as a disease of punishment for dissent resulting in social isolation. The Argentine Juana Manuela Gorriti gives a space in her prolific productions to the voices of persecuted gauchos, Guaraní and Quechua Indians, black slaves and their descendants, and above all, to women as the subaltern gender. Their perspectives offered an alternative version to the one circulated by official history. In Los misterios del Plata, 1846 [The Mysteries of the River Plate], Juana Manso de Noronha successfully interweaves a critique of political tyranny with a critique of marriage, where the notion of the domestic order as harmonious and separate from the dangers of public life is demolished. Other writers, amongst them the Argentine Mercedes Rosas de Rivera and the Peruvians Mercedes Cabello de Carbonera and Teresa González de Fanning, explored critically the few and restricted roles available to women in modern societies. In Blanca Sol (1889), a novel written by Cabello, the eponymous heroine commits herself to a loveless marriage in order to secure economic and social stability. The novel ends dramatically when, alone and abandoned, she enters a life of prostitution to support her children, thus illustrating the limitations of a social system that offered few options to women outside marriage.

It is possible to argue that in some countries, like Argentina and Peru, 19th-century life was dominated by a feminine belles-lettres presence; and that in the specific case of Peru, literary life was dominated by women. In others, the most notorious case being that of Mexico, a different process seems to have taken place in the sphere of literary production which resulted in a masculinization of literary discourse. It is hoped that as the field begins to attract critical attention from Hispanists, studies focusing on the specificity of single countries with their particular and complex social and historical interrelations will become available and will throw light on the many questions that remain unresolved.

FRANCESCA DENEGRI

See also entries on Soledad Acosta de Samper, Juana Manuela Gorriti, Clorinda Matto de Turner
20th Century

From a fin-de-siècle perspective, the biased notion that women were not capable of matching dominant masculine artistic quality has been rectified. Women’s writing in the 20th century has been the focus of steady and growing interest from both the general public and from critics in the field of literary studies. In mapping out the literary tapestry Latin American women writers have woven during this century, it is helpful to conceptualize it as a complex and varied spectacle appearing in front of the reader. As the access of women to lettered culture increased, so they entered the textual dialogue with their male contemporaries and with women in other cultures. At first, in small numbers, with a steadier output by mid-century, women’s writing has reached substantial proportions in the last quarter of the 20th century. 20th-century women writers have cultivated not only all the traditional literary genres, but have also explored new textual possibilities and have revitalized others. Creative writing amounted partly to a process of appropriation and reappropriation of some traditional strategies, partly to a substantial revision of the canon. Thematically, women writers have explored in their stories and poems charted and uncharted territories as they imagine multiple stories of women’s diverse life experiences. These protagonists constitute a multifarious gallery of female characterization that signals the vitality of female literary production. Linguistically, in many cases, they have tested the limits of language in experimental writing in prose, poetry and drama. In brief, they have founded, and expanded, a cultural space of their own from which to speak, and in which to inscribe the female subject. In this regard, female writers have entered the scene of writing in earnest. The result is that they have produced an innovative body of writing that is easily identifiable within the literary production of 20th-century Latin America.

The public emergence of women writers that began during the modernization process in Latin America, a process which first exhibited particular vitality in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, Mexico and Uruguay, was followed by a more rapid pace of modernization that included the struggle for civil rights. Involvement in various demands for equal justice with men brought about more women’s involvement in Bolivia, Peru, Colombia, Venezuela, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Guatemala, Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic. From journal writing and memoirs, poems and novels at the turn of the 19th century, to the writing of intimate and dramatic poetry, to extensive cultivation of the short story, drama, and the novel, to testimonials of abuse and oppression, women have acceded to the world of letters, and in many cases, received widespread recognition from a sceptical cultural establishment on an unprecedented scale. At the end of the 20th century, some Latin American women writers have become well-known, and, in some cases, they have overshadowed major male figures as in the case of the Chilean Isabel Allende and the Mexican Laura Esquivel. Their works has been translated and read throughout the world; they have received major awards, and have remained in the top best-sellers’s lists in several countries. Both these writers share the celebrity status so cherished in the finde-siècle postmodernist cultural scene. Allende’s novels have been selected and bought for scripts of elaborate Hollywood cinema productions, as in the case of The House of the Spirits, starring Meryl Streep and Jeremy Irons, or Of Love and Shadows. Similarly, the widely acclaimed Mexican production of *Like Water for Chocolate brought a major box-office success and celebrity status to author Laura Esquivel, a film based on her first novel, Como agua para chocolate. The remarkable success of their first published work has brought recognition to other writers, as in the case of the Mexican Elena Garro with her memorable Los recuerdos del porvenir (Recollections of Things to Come), or, more recently, to Mexican Ángeles Mastretta with her novel Arráncame la vida (Mexican Bolero).

When Latin American women began to write, the strategy they used was the appropriation of male models, to deconstruct the overriding patriarchal production process of meaning, by which the male imaginary assigned women the all encompassing role of womb. By locating women within the symbol of cyclical fertility, personal female experience was devalued, and this in turn, entailed excluding them from the discourse of knowledge. A critique of the status of women in society has been documented in the subcontinent since the 16th century, in the writings of the Mexican nun Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz.

It is a feature of women’s writing to perform the transgressive act of creating a space in the cracks and interstices of the masculine canon. Women in Latin American write to engender a parallel space for the inscription of female voices within a textual practice that attempts restitution of a devalued space and time. To this end, they have cultivated the geography of quotidian life, they have travelled the labyrinth of love as an alternative to romance, they have inscribed the stories of a long struggle for individual and collective identity, or they have documented the horrors of physical and psychological abuse, torture and oppression as gesticulations of individual and institutional revenge.

Concerned with canonical depictions of female characters and culture in male writing, women’s writing has fostered a dynamic in, at least, two different directions: on the one hand, women scholars have engaged in surveying the archives to recover lost or forgotten texts about the lives of women in convents in the colonial period throughout the Latin American subcontinent, as they have recovered and published 19th-century diaries, letters, short stories, novels and poems; on the other, contemporary female writers have focused specifically on the infinite wealth of women’s stories that has expanded considerably the scope of women’s experience. From a reflexive perspective then, both activities achieve a positive balance in the sense of having constructed a body of literary texts that has advanced considerably our knowledge of women’s lives and culture.

MAGDALENA GARCÍA PINTO

See also entry on Best-Sellers

Further Reading

In the 1970s and 1980s literary critics have centred their attention on female literary production of earlier periods. This activity has also stimulated the publication of anthologies to disseminate the work of lesser-known or new authors, as is the case of Women’s Writing in Latin America edited by Sara Castro-Klaren, Sylvia Molloy and Beatriz Sarlo in 1991, or The Renewal of the Vision: Voices of Latin American Women Poets, edited by Marjorie Agosín and Cola Franzen in 1987.

General
Agosín, Marjorie, Silencio e imaginación: metáforas de la escritura femenina, Mexico City: Katún, 1986

——Las hacedoras; mujer, imagen, escritura, Santiago de Chile: Cuarto Propio, 1993

Davies, Catherine (editor), Women Writers in Twentieth Century Spain and Spanish America, Lampeter, Wales: Edwin Mellen Press, 1993

Studies on Women Writers from Individual Countries in the Region

Fares, Gustavo and Eliana Hermann, Escritoras argentinas contemporáneas, New York: Peter Lang, 1993

Masiello, Francine, Between Civilization and Barbarism: Women, Nation and Literary Culture in Modern Argentina, Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1992

Anthologies in Translation

Bibliographies

Interviews

Special Issues of Journals
“Latin American Women’s Contemporary Writing and Arts,” Review: Latin American Literature and Art 48 (Spring 1994)

Workshops

A “taller literario,” or literary workshop, is a seminar, discussion group, or the like, which emphasizes an exchange of ideas and the demonstration and application of techniques, skills, etc. Literary workshops encompass a variety of genres—theatre, poetry, and prose (short fiction and testimonial writing). Perhaps one of the most significant contributions of the new social/popular movements in Latin America has been the creation of a political culture manifested in a broader concept of democracy and methods of political resistance, entailing novel forms of organization and of cultural action. A particularly striking example of popular culture as resistance and community building, expressed not only in the language of opposition but in an attempt to transform personal experiences into artistry are the literary workshops which have sprung up throughout Latin America today. Typically, literary workshops or talleres have taken three distinct forms in Latin America: first, creative writing sessions designed to stimulate literary talent and to complement literacy or educational programs; second, therapeutic writing sessions (usually initiated through the oral medium) designed to alleviate private pain as well as providing a record for the public archive, particularly of traumatic events, such as political torture and execution, “disappearances,” destitution and other such atrocities; and third, more action-oriented writing workshops modeled after the Brazilian pedagogue Paulo Freire’s concept of conscientization (an awareness of one’s own oppressive situation and a demonstration of the oppressed’s ability to transform this state of oppression through self and social empowerment). The community-based literary works resulting from such workshops serve as alternative, people-controlled media that provide information, an outlet for social discontent and, in general, drastically improve interpersonal communication within the community, often leading to community building. The latter usually takes the form of theatre collectives. Such literacy- or culture-based workshops view education as a means for promoting community or “revolutionary” action, usually in the form of the renowned theatre workshops using the dramaturgical methods of Freire’s fellow countryman, Augusto Boal (see separate entry). Furthermore, the concept of talleres has been influenced by the tenets of the Theology of Liberation whereby Christ’s message of love can only be actualized in a society without exploitation, a society responsible for its own destiny. The talleres are thus an attempt not only to widen access to literary creation, but also to create new audiences and to develop artistic forms capable of expressing the experiences specific to the country of origin, two pre-conditions for the growth of an autonomous national artistic tradition. The participants in the talleres often bear witness to daily events, chronicling and commenting like the storytellers of oral poetry on acts of persecution and hardship experienced by the people.

For the teatristas (theatre workshop members) of Latin America to reveal reality is to denounce it. But in the context of the workshop where open discussion and debate are encouraged among the participants, a denunciation of reality signifies also an effort to reconstruct it. To call the endeavors of dramatic facilitators theatre workshops in a strictly literary or performance sense, however, is a misrepresentation of the broader scope of such organized groups. One of the main functions of this theatre of liberation, as it is often called, is to organize communities utilizing drama as a vehicle. Intricately linked to the philosophy espoused by liberation theology, theatre groups not only work to promote cultural activity in rural areas, but also help with community and even agricultural development, reforestation and more (as was the case in Alan Bolt’s Nicaraguan-based community theatre movement and so-called “Bamboo” Workshops).

The theatrical production that was created from these workshops through collective cultural action encouraged the development of economic people’s co-operatives. In addition, they contributed to the effective organization of strikes and political rallies, and provided the people with a range of skills. The collective method of creation and the documentary theatre, originally used as an investigative medium in connection with national or international issues of relevance, have now given way to more practical approaches to community building—in a literal sense—than the rhetoric of the previously politically-oriented theatre collectives. The overarching project of many of these workshops is to foment popular culture as a process of self-discovery, transformation and liberation through critical insights into cultural histories, traditions and recent events. Thus, the educational theatre of the talleres and the political theatre of the colectivos (collectives) complement one another in that they are both firmly rooted in popular theatre.

In 1989, the Escuela Internacional de Teatro de la America Latina (The International Theatre School of Latin America and the Caribbean) was founded. Its purpose is to allow workshops to exchange strategies and approaches to the theatre as a contribution to the continuing search for a Latin American and Caribbean identity. Supported by Cuba’s prestigious Casa de las Américas (a Cuban government institution devoted to the promotion of Latin American culture, ideas, and art), the “school” (an international workshop of sorts itself) seeks “the defence and exploration of a Latin American and Caribbean identity in addition to the ideals of liberation and sovereignty for our peoples” (the school’s constitution dated 2.8 April 1989). The feria de talleres (workshop fairs), which accompany these and other more local theatre workshops, generally focus on dramaturgy, popular dance, karate, music, singing, masks, movement, and debates on various artistic, cultural and social issues. Often renowned guest playwrights (such as Argentina’s Osvaldo Dragún) or directors (such as Santiago García, founder and director of the theatre collective La Candelaria of Bogota, Colombia) are invited from abroad to share their insights with the workshop members. Raw materials based on a performer’s exploration of themes and images usually result in theatre facilitators, in conjunction with the teatrístas, assembling a performance text.

Perhaps the country that is most identified with literary workshops, poetry talleres in particular, is Nicaragua when the Sandinistas were in power in the 1980s. Ernesto Cardenal, poet, liberation theologian and then Minister of Culture showed his organizational skills by promoting popular culture as a vehicle for a new national identity, a project that was a major part of Sandinista government policy. The governmentsponsored poetry workshops invited participants, including the newly literate, to express their experience in poetry. These poems contribute to the formation of a written popular memory without documentary emphasis. Their aim is to locate emotion precisely in time and place, in the vernacular, by using a modern open poetics rather than trying to imitate prestigious poetic forms of the past. This discourse about the collective sphere averts what is called a “culture of silence” in which there is an erasure of memory of such significant events by creating a culture of dissent and witness, of mutual affirmation through the voice of the community. The Nicaraguan poetry workshops were organized by the Ministry of Culture throughout the country as an experiment (not only in the rural sectors), but also among the army, the police force, the air force, the state secret police and Somocista prisoners. Advocating a simple poetry defined as exteriorismo, which concentrates on verbal economy and observed reality, Cardenal set out his own set of rules for writing poetry used in the workshops—free verse and the vernacular. One of the basic tenets of the Nicaraguan poetry workshops was the weaving of memory and everyday life, so that the war against the dictatorial regime of Somoza would be recalled not in an idealized official version but as moments of personal affectivity, as faces, names, gestures—a living “album” of personal experience. The poetry workshops were thus concerned with individual memory in the expression of poetic creativity. Imitating Brazilian cantadores or minstrels and the gaucho payador, to some degree, the organizers of such workshops took the role of the oral poets—to process and disseminate information in a rural locality—and applied it to the written text. The purpose of this oral approach was to foster the first acts of writing of a populace which had only recently acquired literacy through an intensive literacy campaign just after the Sandinista Revolution.

Here, granted lack of space, Nicaragua has been selected to illustrate the function and objectives of literary workshops in a revolutionary context. Another obvious example is Cuba where, again, after 1959 an elaborate network of talleres were developed as a way to make literature and the arts accessible to a wider range of people and to encourage them to write about their local history. In addition, there is a rich culture of these talleres in Brazil, Colombia, Chile and the Central American countries.

ELENA DE COSTA

Further Reading

Johnson, Kent (editor and translator), A Nation of Poets: Writings from the Poetry Workshops of Nicaragua, Los Angeles: West End Press, 1985

Agustín Yáñez 1904–1980

Mexican prose writer and journalist

Agustín Yáñez is the author of one of the most seminal works of modern Mexican fiction—the novel Al filo del agua, 1947 (The Edge of the Storm). His production includes numerous novels, essays and newspaper articles. So prolific was Yáñez as a writer that only a selection of his works can be reviewed here.

Flor de juegos antiguos, 1942. [A Flowering of Old Games] consists of short stories recreating the author’s infancy and early adolescence. Set in Guadalajara, they celebrate its smells, noises, colours and streets; the life of a Mexican child described through his surroundings. In his next collection of short stories, Archipiélago de mujeres, 1943 [Women’s Archipelago], the “state of adolescent sensibilities” as Yáñez himself calls it, is portrayed both through the landscape and the social situations he develops. Los sentidos al aire, 1964 [Senses into the Air] and La ladera dorada, 1978 (The Golden Hillside), also collections of short fiction, symbolise maturity and old age respectively. They complete this cycle in which Yáñez tried to describe in narrative form, through the perception of his characters and their milieu, what he himself called the stages of the “Mexican man.”

Despite being born in Guadalajara, Agustín Yáñez was spiritually and mentally a mountain man; that is he belonged to the mountains of Jalisco, Caxcama and especially Yahualica. The essay Yahualica (1946) and even more so Al filo del agua, developed this perception of mountains, a way of linking to an oral tradition, an indigenous past and a constant presence of the geography as the contours of the land are a definitive affirmation of the meaning of the characters. Al filo del agua was the result of a conflict; on the one hand, the encounter/loss of Yáñez’s highland roots—his past, tradition, family ties and on the other, the political interests of the public figures, the illustrious academic and the practicing Catholic. In this sense, Al filo del agua can be considered in some ways to be the first social novel of present-day Mexico. It is a novel in which the misery and poverty of a region, its possible causes, motives and reasons are described through the eyes of a storyteller, with his own prejudices, ideas and values. The history of the Mexican novel in this century has in Al filo del agua a standard-bearer whose influence has still not stopped. Modernity, invented by 20th-century critics, and attributed to this novel, is in fact the basic element in Al filo del agua.

La tierra pródiga [The Prodigal Land], is a novel which uses social and geographical description; brimming with allegorical references to Yáñez’s native Jalisco. The problems of the rural Mexican bourgeoisie are explored and as an outward manifestation of this idea, their land presents a socio/geographical challenge. According to Jean Franco among others, La tierra pródiga should also be classed as atypical.

Las tierras flacas, 1962 (The Lean Lands) gives an account of the vicissitudes (isolation, money problems) of small landowners on arid, barely workable, infertile land, and Ojerosa y pintada, 1960 [Haggard and Made-up], a portrait of the Mexican capital, complete this cycle which Yáñez himself called “the country and the people.”

Las vueltas del tiempo, 1973 [The Turns of Time] with its casual, predominantly conversational style and La creación, 1959 [The Creation] whose theme is artistic creativity and in which well-known celebrities mingle with fictional characters, are not typical of the apparently homogeneous nature of Yáñez’s other stories.

Prolific writer, teacher and essayist, civil servant and insatiable journalist, Yáñez was not, as Carlos Monsiváis put it, “a bad writer with a good book.” Yáñez was not only a writer, but also a clever, wise and erudite journalist who joined the literary elite of his time. José Revueltas, who belonged to the same generation, said that he was “a bureaucrat of intelligence and a croupier of literature.” Jean Franco, perhaps less critically, offers a more accurate description: “Yáñez matches perfectly the image of the bourgeois intellectuals who came after Cárdenas searching for national regeneration. They often moot the idea of writing literature suited to creating and consolidating the collective consciousness; an instrument for creating America; literature’s supporting role in education; that through educating people it is possible to change society.”

Informed, up-to-date and observant, Yáñez, like Octavio Paz and many other writers of his generation, was an administrator in many governments and of one single regime. Such a statement, contrary to what the actual literary establishment in Mexico might think, does not detract or add to his writings. “Yáñez, the timid upstart,” concludes Franco, “may not be to our taste but it doesn’t diminish in the slightest the literary work of this shadowy novelist.”

Yáñez’s writings fall into a constant pattern in Mexican literature, that of the intellectual linked to the establishment. They can be considered an allegory par excellence of a whole intellectual class who moulded cultural life in Mexico after the Revolution; mid-way between academia and non-denominational opinion (Catholic and provincial), vacillating between government and a pretence at opposition. For Yáñez, literature was subsidiary to his work as a civil servant, journalist or man of ideas; this attitude is what defines him best. Despite his impressive literary output, he will surely be remembered more as an important figure in literary and educational institutions than as a good writer. His place, if we need to assign him one, lies in the political chronicle of Mexico’s social institutions rather than in the history of the Mexican novel. To paraphrase Carlos Monsiváis, we could say that Augustín Yáñez was an acquiescent journalist who wrote an unexpected book.

Biography

Born in Guadalajara, Mexico, 4 April 1904, into family of labourers. Raised in very conservative environment. Studied law in Guadalajara and trained as a teacher of literature. Published essays and literary translations in the Guadalajara journal Bandera de provincias. Obtained Masters at

Selected Works

Short Fiction

Flor de juegos antiguos, Guadalajara: Universidad de Guadalajara, 1942
Archipiélago de mujeres, Mexico City: UNAM, 1943
Los sentidos al aire, Mexico City: Instituto Nacional de Bellas Artes, 1964
La ladera dorada, Mexico City: Grijalbo, 1978

Novels

Al filo del agua, Mexico City: Porrúa, 1947; as The Edge of the Storm, translated by Ethel Brinton, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1963
La creación, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1959
Oferosa y pintada, Mexico City: Libro-Mex Editores, 1960
La tierra pródiga, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1960
Las vueltas del tiempo, Mexico City: Joaquín Mortiz, 1973

Essays

Por tierras de Nueva Galicia, Guadalajara: Revista Avanza, 1928
Espejismo de Juchitán, Mexico City: UNAM, 1940
Genio y figuras de Guadalajara, Mexico City: Abside, 1942,
El contenido social de la literatura iberoamericana, Mexico City: El Colegio de Mexico, 1944
Fichas mexicanas, Mexico City: El Colegio de Mexico, 1945
Yahualica, Mexico City: Editorial de la Cámara de Diputados, 1946
Don Justo Sierra: su vida, sus ideas y sus obras, Mexico City: UNAM, 1950
Discursos por Jalisco, Mexico City: Editorial Porrúa, 1958
Días de Bali, Mexico City: Edición del Banco del Pequeño Comercio, 1964
Santa Anna: espectro de una sociedad, Mexico City: Océano, 1982

Further Reading

Carballo, Emmanuel, Diecinueve protagonistas de la literatura mexicana del siglo XX, Mexico City: Empresas Editoriales, 1965 [Lengthy section on Yáñez]
Dellepiane, Ángela B. “Releyendo Al filo del agua” Cuadernos Americanos, vol. 34/201 (1975)
Martínez, José Luis, prologue to Yáñez’s Obras escogidas, Mexico City: Aguilar, 1968
[“Introduction” would be a more accurate term since it is over 100 pages long] Alicia Yáñez Cossío 1929–

Ecuadorian prose writer

Although her earliest publications were poems that dealt with such themes as maternal love and social injustice, since the appearance of her first novel in 1973 (Bruna, soroche y los tíos) [Bruna, Altitude Sickness, Aunts and Uncles], Alicia Yáñez Cossío has distinguished herself as one of Ecuador’s principal novelists of the last twenty-five years. Author of five published novels and one collection of short stories, Yáñez Cossío has overcome the legacy of one-book writers in Ecuador. Her continued growth and productivity as an author have contributed to creating both a standard of excellence for future writers and an awareness that an on-going narrative tradition does exist in Ecuadorian literature. Moreover, her literary achievements are especially impressive when bearing in mind that to date few women in Ecuador have been recognized as major contributors to national letters.

Yáñez Cossío’s success, however, has not come about without considerable sacrifice. It has long been said that to publish in Ecuador is to remain unpublished. An inadequate and inefficient publishing apparatus at both the regional and national levels has prevented most Ecuadorian writers from reaching their readers. Limited editions and poor distribution of books have practically cut off Ecuadorian writers from the international circuit. Such has been the fate of Yáñez Cossío. Of course, the effects of this general malaise suffered by most Ecuadorian writers has been exacerbated in Yáñez Cossío’s case. Because she is a woman in a male dominated profession/society, expectations and standards have frequently been colored by prejudice and unfounded skepticism.

Despite such capricious accusations as her having imitated García Márquez’s Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude), or the reluctance by some to read her work assiduously, Yáñez Cossío has persevered. Her fiction knows no boundaries with regards to themes and narrative techniques. Corruption, social injustice, the role of women, the excesses of consumer-driven societies, and the dangers of technology are just a few of Yáñez Cossío’s preferred themes; irony, satire, hyperbole, caricature, and parody constitute her principal modes of expression. This thematic and technical diversity, however, does not lack coherence and unity. In each work, Yáñez Cossío responds and reacts to one underlying concern—the tensions and conflicts inherent in a world that wavers between tradition and change.

Most of Yáñez Cossío’s work focuses on life in Ecuador’s central range of the Andes where her characters find themselves torn between the forces of an oppressive colonial past and the dehumanization of modern society’s infatuation with material gain. Yáñez Cossío avoids simplistic dichotomies, however. The power of her novels and short stories lies in her ability to capture the complexities and contradictions that characterize the struggle to achieve a balance between the best of the old and the new. While she makes clear that continuing to live in the past threatens to asphyxiate her characters with its taboos and anachronistic conventions, she also warns her readers against blindly sacrificing traditional values for the gold and glitter of consumerism.

In Bruna, soroche y los tíos, a young woman rebels against a patriarchal society and becomes a kind of clarion for social change. Bruna is not only a symbol of the emergence of a new woman in search of a more meaningful lifestyle, but she also constitutes a role model for all youth who must accept the challenge of creating a new society capable of succeeding in the modern world. Yo vendo unos ojos negros, 1979 [I Sell Some Dark Eyes], Yáñez Cossío’s second novel, reiterates her deep concern over women’s place in modern society and the need to overcome the taboos and traditions which continue to stifle growth and development. At the same time, she insists on the need for solidarity between women and men, particularly in their struggle to create a new socioeconomic order based on social justice and freedom. With regards to La cofradía del mullo del vestido de la Virgen Pipona, 1985 [The Sisterhood of the Sacred Vestments of the Plump Virgin] and La Casa del Sano Placer, 1989 [The House of Wholesome Pleasure], Yáñez Cossío continues examining her favorite themes, but with a definite turn towards parody and satire. These later novels reveal clearly an evolution in her command of narrative technique and humor.

To conclude, Alicia Yáñez Cossío is one of a number of Ecuadorian writers who await serious critical attention and adequate distribution beyond national borders. Her work to date exemplifies the major tendencies and artistic quality of much of Latin America’s post-Boom fiction. Readers of contemporary narrative fiction interested in the Andean region and/or Latin American women writers will find much to enjoy in Yáñez Cossío’s work.

MICHAEL HANDELSMAN

Biography

Born in Quito, Ecuador, in 1929. Married the Cuban anthropologist, Luis Campos with whom she has five children, all of whom have been raised in Ecuador. In 1952, she received a scholarship to study journalism at the Institute of Hispanic Culture in Madrid, Spain. Teacher at the Cotopaxi Academy in Ecuador for many years. In 1972, her first novel, Bruna, soroche y los tíos, was awarded first prize in a literary competition for the novel sponsored by Guayaquil’s leading newspaper, El Universo.
Selected Works

Novels
Bruna, soroche y los tíos, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1973
Yo vendo unos ojos negros, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1979
Más allá de las islas, Quito: Don Bosco, 1980
La cofradía del mullo del vestido de la Virgen Pipona, Quito: Planeta, 1985
La Casa del Sano Placer, Quito: Planeta, 1989

Short Fiction
El beso y otras fricciones, Bogotá: Ediciones Paulina, 1975

Poetry
Poesía, Quito: Casa de la Cultura Ecuatoriana, 1974

Further Reading
Handelsman, Michael, “En busca de una mujer nueva: rebelión y resistencia en Yo vendo unos ojos negros de Alicia Yánez Cossío,” Revista Iberoamericana 144–45 (July–December 1988)
The national poet of Uruguay, Juan Zorrilla de San Martín is the foremost local representative of Romanticism and one of the last Romantic poets in Spanish. His most famous work, Tabaré, came out the same year as Rubén Darío’s Azul, 1888 [Blue]. A committed but liberal Catholic, Zorrilla engaged in debates with the prevailing contemporary positivists, who nevertheless respected him. He wrote in different genres but with a consistency of sentiment and belief across all of his work. He began as a poet and later turned to the essay; he is also one of the greatest exponents of public oratory in modern Spanish.

His first important piece, La leyenda patria, 1879 [Legend of the Fatherland], already contained the programme Zorrilla was to support throughout his life: the celebration of patria and God. The poem was written soon after his return home from a long stay in Argentina and Chile where his parents had sent him for a Catholic education that was not easily available in a Uruguay then dominated by rationalism. The leyenda was Zorrilla’s contribution to a (belated) poetry competition set up to inaugurate a monument celebrating Uruguay’s declaration of independence from Brazil in 1825. Although the poem far exceeded the length specified by the rules, it was unanimously hailed as the winner by the crowd who gathered to listen to the author recite it in what by all accounts was an enthralling performance. Zorrilla’s two main concerns are conspicuous in the poem: it begins “Es la voz de la Patria... Pide gloria.../Yo obedezco esa voz.” (It is the voice of the Nation. It demands glory.../I obey that voice.); and it ends “¡Protege, oh Dios, la tumba de los libres!/Protege a nuestra patria independiente,/Que inclina a Ti tan sólo,/Sólo ante Ti, la coronada frente.” (Protect, oh God, the grave of the free!/Protect our independent nation,/Which bows before You only,/Only before You, its crowned head).

Zorrilla’s success on this occasion set him up as the nation’s orator; from then on he was to express popular and official feelings at home and abroad often throughout his life. Two examples of this work are his speech in Montevideo in 1920 on the arrival from Italy of the remains of Enrique Rodó, his famous compatriot, and his oration of 1892. at La Rábida when he was chosen to represent all Latin American delegates during the celebrations of the 400th anniversary of Colón’s arrival in America. Zorrilla’s other main contribution to nation-building is the voluminous La epopeya de Artigas, 1910 [The Epic of Artigas], commissioned by the government as a source of inspiration to potential sculptors of a statue of the national hero of Uruguay, José Gervasio Artigas (1764–1850). The work is historical, and although written in a literary tone, it is a major contribution to the revisionary movement against the black legend which surrounded Artigas during the 19th century. The epopeya is a sort of Facundo in reverse; like Sarmiento, Zorrilla sees his subject as the personification of his country; but unlike his predecessor, who saw Facundo Quiroga as a despicable result of Argentina’s barbaric circumstances (and who put Artigas in the same class, Sarmiento’s book being one of the sources of Artigas’s Leyenda negra), Zorrilla’s subject is positive: Artigas is “el héroe autóctono” not only of Uruguay but of Spanish America as a whole. Amongst other parallels with Sarmiento’s Facundo, Zorrilla uses geography and history to buttress his vision of the man and his country (e.g., Uruguay is different from Brazil on grounds of language, and from Argentina for its having its own natural ports and a considerable history as a detached zone of the United Provinces of the River Plate). Zorrilla’s reflections on nationhood continued to occupy him until his later life, when he published one of his finest essays, El sermón de la paz, 1924 [The Sermon on Peace]. A further illustration of Zorrilla’s close symbiosis with his country’s development is the decision by the Bank of Uruguay to finance the publication of his complete works in 1929 as a homage on the fiftieth anniversary of La leyenda patria. Supervising the sixteen volumes of this edition was one of Zorrilla’s last tasks before his death.

But the work of Zorrilla’s which has achieved most renown outside the River Plate is Tabaré, 1888 (Tabaré: an Indian Legend of Uruguay). A text highly respected at home, still enjoying popular favour and forming part of school syllabuses, it is one of the great narrative poems in modern Spanish. Its plot would have appealed to both inhabitants of the River Plate and Spaniards of the time.

Tabaré tells of the ill-fated blend of Spain and the American continent in the person of the eponymous hero, a blue-eyed mestizo son of a Charrúa chief and a captive Spanish woman. Tabaré grows to be a sad and melancholy character who is confused about his identity: half pagan Indian, half Catholic Spaniard (he was baptized by his mother shortly before her death). His improbable nature, it is suggested, makes it impossible for him to survive. The plot tells how Tabaré is captured by the men of the Spanish Captain Don Gonzalo de Orgaz, who had come to the Charrúa land accompanied by his wife Doña Luz and his sister Blanca. When the latter sees Tabaré, she becomes enthralled by the peculiarity of his being a mestizo with blue eyes; the Indian for his part grows disturbed on seeing in the girl Blanca a new version of his dead mother. Although at first Tabaré does not speak to Blanca, he spends his nights awake by her tent. His noctambulist habits preoccupy Doña Luz, who persuades her husband to release the Charrúa so as to protect the girl, although Blanca herself continues to be fascinated by the Indian. During an attack on the Spanish post, the young Charrúa chief Yamandú captures Blanca with libidinous plans. When the sexual consummation is about to take place, Tabaré arrives to rescue the girl and to kill Yamandú. As he is returning with Blanca in order to hand her back to her brother, the latter mistakes the sobbing of an ambiguously enamoured Blanca who is sad at the impossibility of interracial love, and he kills Tabaré.
Until recently, criticism of Tabaré was mild, and whilst the poetic merits of the work were generally acknowledged, faults were found concerning its lack of realism, its epic pretensions, or the imperfections of the references to the Tupi language allocated by Zorrilla to the Charrúas. As tastes changed, and in particular as the 1992 debate over the Spanish conquest of America developed, the work invited new readings. It was always clear that Tabaré could be read productively as an idealized account of the beginnings of Uruguay. This was justified by two external aspects to the poem. The first was the official absence of Indians in Uruguay since shortly after the country’s independence in 1830; the second factor was the overt intention of the author’s work in general to contribute to the construction of a Uruguayan national identity. There has been a series of recent studies which stress this aspect. Hugo Achúgar notes that “la respuesta estético-ideológica que realizaba el patricio letrado Zorrilla, atendía a un proyecto histórico superior: la consolidación de la nacionalidad” (the aesthetic and ideological response of the educated patrician Zorrilla fitted a higher historical project: the consolidation of national identity). For her part, Doris Sommer says that Zorrilla’s text expresses a contemporary revival of Catholic humanism in Spanish America. Javier García Méndez (1992.) has seen Tabaré as a cultural buttress to the contemporary political and economic demands to make the country appealing to foreign trade. More specifically, the two last-mentioned critics see the poem as a Romantic mechanism to settle the accounts with the official extermination of the Charrúas in Uruguay, Sommer speaks of a “collective exorcism.” These recent critiques are powerful, but may make Zorrilla’s ideological programme for Tabaré sound more hermetic that it appears in the poem. Although it is clear, as these critics say, and as Zorrilla himself openly states to his wife in the poem’s “Dedicatoria,” that the native American had to disappear to allow for the birth of a new Hispanic and Christian nation, the poem also suggests that there is a certain price to pay for that privilege. As it turns out, the pain of Blanca-Spain at the outcome is not negligible and her evident fascination for Tabaré has to be repressed.

GUSTAVO SAN ROMÁN

See also entries on Indianism, Juan León Mera

Biography

Born in Montevideo, Uruguay, 28 December 1855; father Spanish, from Santander; mother, Uruguayan, died two years after the child’s birth. Educated mostly with Jesuits in Santa Fe, Argentina; studied law at the University of Santiago, Chile, graduated in 1877. Returned to Montevideo to work as judge, 1878. Married Elvira Blanco Sienra. Founder of the Catholic newspaper El Bien Público, 1879. Professor of Literature, 1880–85. Corresponding member of the Royal Academy of the Spanish language, 1885. Fled to Argentina after incurring the displeasure of President General Santos. In 1887 his wife died at Tigre, outside Buenos Aires; Zorrilla and children returned to Montevideo. Editor of revived El Bien Público; deputy for Montevideo until 1890. Married Concepción Blanco, his first wife’s sister, in 1889 (died in 1907). From 1891–98 Plenipotentiary Minister first in Spain, where he delivered some famous speeches, and then in France, his post ceasing after new disagreement with president Juan Lindolfo Cuestas. Editor of El Bien Público, for another period, 1899–1904. Professor of international law, 1899–1906, and Professor of art theory, 1907–31, University of Montevideo. Appointed as signatory of notes at National Bank, 1903; beginning of consistently good relations with presidents; delivered many official speeches. Died in Montevideo, 3 November 1931.

Selected Works

Notas de un himno, Santiago de Chile: La Estrella de Chile, 1877
La leyenda patria, Montevideo: La Reforma, 1879
Huerto cerrado, Montevideo: Dornaleche y Reyes, 1900
Conferencias y discursos, Montevideo: Barreiro y Ramos, 1905
La epopeya de Artigas, 2 vols, Montevideo: Barreiro y Ramos, 1910
Detalles de la historia rioplatense, Montevideo: Claudio Garcia, 1917
El sermón de la paz, Montevideo: El Siglo Ilustrado, 1924
El libro de Ruth, Montevideo: Arduino Hermanos, 192.8

Compilations and Anthologies

Obras completas, 16 vols, Montevideo: Imprenta Nacional Colorada, 1930
Correspondencia de Zorrilla de San Martín y Unamuno, edited by Arturo Sergio Visea, Montevideo: INIAL, 1956
Obras escogidas, Madrid: Aguilar, 1967

Further Reading

Ibáñez, Roberto, “La leyenda patria y su contorno histórico,” in Homenaje al poeta Juan Zorrilla de San Martín, Montevideo: Cámara de Senadores, 1959
Lauxar (Osvaldo Crispo Acosta), Juan Zorrilla de San Martín, Montevideo: La Casa del Estudiante, 1955
INDEXES
The name(s) in parentheses after the title will direct the reader to the appropriate entry, where full publication information is given. The date given is that of first publication. Revised titles and English-language translations, if different from the original, are listed, with their appropriate dates. Titles that appear in bold are subjects of individual essays.

ABC de Castro Alves (Amado) 1941
A la Madre (Walsh) 1981
A la memoria de Ricardo Güiraldes (Reyes) 1934
A la orilla del mundo y primer día (Paz) 1942
A morta (O. Andrade) 1937
A partir de Manhattan (Lihn) 1979
A sus plantas rendido un león (Soriano) 1987
A través de mi espejo (Diego) 1981
Abaddón, el exterminador (Sábato) 1974
Abierta oscuridad (Gelman) 1994
Abismo de rosas (Trevisan) 1976
Abolición de la muerte (Westphalen) 1935
Abolición de la propiedad (Agustín) 1969
Aborígenes (Martínez Moreno) 1964
Abrojos (Darío) 1887
Absurdo entre cuatro paredes (Dorfman) 1968
Acerca de la escritura (Peri Rossi) 1991
Acomodador (Ferré) 1986
Acoso (Carpentier) 1956
Actos de fe en Guatemala (Asturias) 1980
Acuario (Alegría) 1955
Açúcar (Freyre) 1939
Adán (Huidobro) 1914
Adán Buenosayres (Marechal) 1948
Adelaide Ristori (Machado de Assis) 1955
Adiós a mamá (Arenas) 1995
Adiós, poeta (Edwards) 1990
Adiós Robinson (Cortázar) 1984
Adioses (Onetti) 1954
Adioses (Scorza) 1959
Adjectivo y sus arrugas (Carpentier) 1980
Adrogué (Borges) 1977
Adúltera (Martí) 1935
Adventures of a Photographer in La Plata (Bioy Casares) 1989
Adventures of Maqroll (Mutis) 1995
Adversos milagros (Bioy Casares) 1969
Aeronauta (Meireles) 1952
Afanes (Bioy Casares) 1983
Affaire d’honneur (Hibbert) 1988
África (Arlt) 1991
Africania de la música folklórica de Cuba (F.Ortiz) 1950
Agonía de “Rasu-Ñiti,” (Arguedas) 1962
Agosto (Fonseca) 1990
Agrestes (Melo Neto) 1985
Agua (Arguedas) 1935
Agua de arroz (Lihn) 1968
Agua-mãe (Rego) 1941
Agua que no has de beber (Cisneros) 1971
Agua quemada (Fuentes) 1981
Água viva (Lispector) 1973
Agua y cauce (Otero Silva) 1937
Agua y la noche (J.L.Ortiz) 1933
Agua y viento (Paz) 1959
Aguafuertes españolas (Arlt) 1936
Aguafuertes porteñas (Arlt) 1933
¿Aguila o sol? (Paz) 1951
Águila y la serpiente (Guzmán) 1928
Águilas (Mallea) 1943
Aguiluchos (Marechal) 1922,
Aguja de marear (García Calderón) 1936
Ah, É? (Trevisan) 1994
Ahi viene la plaga (Agustín) 1985
Ainsi parla l’Oncle (Price-Mars) 1928
Airborn (Paz) 1981
Aire conmovido (J.L.Ortiz) 1949
Aire frío (Piñera) 1959
Aire libre (Walsh) 1967
Aires de Mexico (Prosas) (Altamirano) 1940
Akeké y la justice (Barnet) 1978
Al bello aparecer de este lucero (Lihn) 1983
Al filo del agua (Yáñez) 1947
Al margen (Barrett) 1912
Al pie de la letra (Castellanos) 1959
Al sol y bajo la luna (Tablada) 1918
Al yunque (Reyes) 1960
Alabanza del bolo alimenticio (C.Belli) 1979
Álamo y el viento (J.L.Ortiz) 1947
Alba sube (J.L.Ortiz) 1937
Albananza del reino (Mutis) 1985
Albores (Reyes) 1960
Álbum de familia (Castellanos) 1971
Álbum de zoología (Pacheco) 1985
Album familiar (Alegria) 1982
Alclasán (Asturias) 1939
Além do apenas moderno (Freyre) 1973
Aleph (Borges) 1949
Alfarrá bios (Alencar) 1873
Alférez Arce, teniente Arce, capitán Arce (Salazar Bondy) 1969
Alguien que anda por ahí (Cortázar) 1977
Alguma poesia (C.Andrade) 1930
Alhajadito (Asturias) 1961
Alhos & bugalhos (Freyre) 1978
All Fires the Fire (Cortázar) 1973
All Green Shall Perish (Mallea) 1967
Alléluia pour une femme-jardin (Depestre) 1982
Alma (O.Andrade) 1917
Alma do Lazaro (Alencar) 1873
Alma matinal (Mariátegui) 1950
Alma y las colinas (J.L.Ortiz) 1956
Almacén como otro cualquiera (Diego) 1978
¡Alocución bolivarense! (Núñez) 1885
Alta traición (Pacheco) 1985
Altazor (Huidobro) 1931
Alternating Current (Paz) 1973
Alto es el sur (Asturias) 1952
Alturas de Macchu Picchu (Neruda) 1950
Alucinados (D’Halmar) 1935
Alumbrado (G.Rojas) 1986
Amalia (Mármol) 1855
Amar se aprende amando (C.Andrade) 1985
Amar, verbo intransitivo (M.Andrade) 1927
Amares (Galeano) 1993
Amarillo celeste (S.Ocampo) 1972
América es un ajiaco (F.Ortiz) 1940
América, fábula de fábulas (Asturias) 1972
América Latina para entenderme mejor (Galeano) 1990
Americanas (Machado de Assis) 1875
Amigos y maestros de mi juventud (Gálvez) 1944
Amirbar (Mutis) 1990
Amistad funesta (Martí) 1885
Amo del mundo (Storni) 1927
Amor, amores (C.Andrade) 1975
Amor brujo (Arlt) 1932
Amor, ciudad atribuida (Morejón) 1964
Amor con amor se paga (Martí) 1876
Amor desenterrado (Adoum) 1993
Amor em Leonoreta (Meireles) 1951
Amor en los tiempos del cólera (García Márquez) 1985
Amor es más laberinto (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1692
Amor, gran laberinto (Salazar Bondy) 1948
Amor insurrecto (G.Belli) 1984
Amor mundo (Arguedas) 1967
Amor que dormía (Cuadra) 1930
Amor y vino (Aguilera Malta) 1946
Amores de Afroditá (Buitrago) 1983
Amorim (Amorim) 1923
Amortajada (Bombal) 1938
Amour a mort (Moro) 1957
An Tan Revolisyon (Condé) 1989
Anaconda (Quiroga) 1921
Anaforuana (Cabrera) 1975
Anagó (Cabrera) 1957
Analecta del reloj (Lezama Lima) 1953
Análisis ideológico de los tiempos de la conjugación castellana (Bello) 1841
Analogía (Matto de Turner) 1897
Anarquía (González Prada) 1937
Anarquistas en America Latina (Viñas) 1983
Anatomía del teatro (Usigli) 1967
Ancorajes (Reyes) 1951
Andamos huyendo Lola (Garro) 1980
Andorinha, Andorinha (Bandeira) 1966
Andrés Pérez, maderista (Azuela) 1911
Anecdotario (Reyes) 1968
Anfítrión (Edwards) 1987
Ángel (Arévalo Martínez) 1920
Ángel caído (Echeverría) 1871
Ángel de la sombra (Lugones) 1926
Ángel del espejo (Salarrué) 1977
Ángel inclinado (J.L. Ortiz) 1938
Angel of Darkness (Sábato) 1991
Ángeles se han fatigado (Sánchez) 1960
Angelina Yupanki, marquesa de la conquista (Taboada Terán) 1992
Angelito (Walsh) 1974
Anguish (Ramos) 1972
Angústia (Ramos) 1936
Anillo de silencio (Alegria) 1948
Anillos (Neruda) 1926
Animal de palabras (Martínez Moreno) 1987
Animales en el folklore y la magia de Cuba (Cabrera) 1988
Animales y hombres (Monterroso) 1972
Año en California (Gorriti) 1846
Anoche (Asturias) 1943
Años de mocedad (Bioy Casares) 1963
Años despiadados (Viñas) 1956
Another Way to Be (Castellanos) 1990
Answer (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1994
Ante varias esfinges (Ibargüengoitia) 1960
Anteojos de azufre (Moro) 1958
Antes de que mueran (Lange) 1944
Antes del novecientos (Bioy Casares) 1958
Antes do baile verde (Telles) 1970
Antes que anochezca (Arenas) 1992
Antigona furiosa (Gambaro) 1988
Antígona Vélez (Marechal) 1965
Antigone en créole (Morisseau-Leroy) 1953
Antigua retórica (Reyes) 1942
Antiguas literaturas germánicas (Borges) 1951
Anti-Lázaro (N. Parra) 1982
Antipoems (N. Parra) 1972
Ant-Killers (Sarduy) 1985
Antología de aire (G. Rojas) 1991
Antología de la literatura fantástica (Bioy Casares, Borges, S. Ocampo) 1940
Anunciaciones (Gelman) 1988
Aparición de lo invisible (García Ponce) 1968
Apartamiento (Marqués) 1965
Apenas viaje (Walsh) 1948
Apocalypse (Cardenal) 1977
Apogeo de la oligarquía (Viñas) 1975
Apologías y rechazos (Sábat) 1979
Apple in the Dark (Lispector) 1967
Apprenticeship (Lispector) 1986
Aprendizagem ou o livro dos prazeres (Lispector) 1969
Aprendizaje (Alegria) 1970
Apriencia desnuda (Paz) 1973
Aproximaciones (Triana) 1989
Apuntes para una declaración de fe (Castellanos) 1948
Apuntes sobre la vida militar de Francisco Villa (Campobello) 1940
Aqui pasan cosas raras (Valenzuela) 1975
Aqui yace la espuma (Carrera Andrade) 1950
Árbol (Bombal) 1939
Árbol adentro (Paz) 1987
Árbol de Diana (Pizarnik) 1962
Árbol de la estirpe humana (Girri) 1978
Árbol entre dos muros (Pacheco) 1969
Árbol y sus sombras (Ferré) 1989
Árboles de Buenos Aires (S.Ocampo) 1979
Arbres musiciens (Alexis) 1957
Arcadia todas las noches (Cabrera Infante) 1978
Arc-en-ciel pour l’Occident chrétien (Depestre) 1967
Archipelago de mujeres (Yáñez) 1943
Arco y la lira (Paz) 1967
Arctic Poems (Huidobro) 1974
Ardiente paciencia (Skármeta) 1983
Arenas contre Tiradentes (Boal) 1967
Arenas contra Zumbi (Boal) 1970
Argentina (Gálvez) 1913
Argentina (Viñas) 1967
Argentina en nuestros libros (Gálvez) 1935
Argentina en pedazos (Piglia) 1993
Argument of Latin America (Fuentes) 1963
Argumentação contra a morte da arte (Gullar) 1982
Ariana, a mulher (Moraes) 1936
Ariel (Rodó) 1900
Ark for the Next Millennium (Pacheco) 1993
Armas e corações (Dourado) 1978
Armas secretas (Cortázar) 1959
Armes miraculeuses (Césaire) 1946
Armonias (Mármol) 1851
Armonias (Palma) 1865
Around the Day in Eighty Worlds (Cortázar) 1986
Arpa y la sombra (Carpentier) 1979
Arquipélagos (Veríssimo) 1961
Arquitectura de la vida nueva (Asturias) 1928
Arrecifes de coral (Quiroga) 1901
Arreglo de las deudas flotantes, de tesorería (Núñez) 1856
Arriba bajo el cielo (Westphalen) 1982
Art, Authenticity and Latin American Culture (Vargas Llosa) 1981
Art of Birds (Neruda) 1985
Arte brasileira hoje (Gullar) 1973
Arte, ciência, e trópico (Freyre) 1980
Arte de envolver pescado (Cisneros) 1990
Arte de la palabra (Lihn) 1980
Arte de pájaros (Neruda) 1966
Artefactos (N.Parra) 1972
Artemis (Larreta) 1896
Artículos diversos (Barrett) 1913
Artificial Respiration (Piglia) 1994
Artigos de jornal (Freyre) 1935
Artista aprendiz (Dourado) 1989
Artista barquero (Gómez de Avellaneda) 1890
Artista y la época (Mariátegui) 1959
Artistas, locos y criminales (Soriano) 1983
Arturo, la estrella más brillante (Arenas) 1984
Asalto (Arenas) 1991
Asalto (García Márquez) 1983
Asas de um anjo (Alencar) 1860
Asesino desvelado (Amorim) 1945
Ashes of Izalco (Alegría) 1989
Así en la paz como en la guerra (Cabrera Infante) 1960
Así se escribe un cuento (Giardinelli) 1992
Asimetría (Pitol) 1980
Asleep in the Sun (Bioy Casares) 1978
Asomos (Gelman) 1980
Aspectos da literatura brasileira (M.Andrade) 1943
Aspectos de la literatura gauchesca (Borges) 1950
Assault (Arenas) 1994
Assombrações do Recife velho (Freyre) 1955
Assumed Name (Piglia) 1995
Astillero (Onetti) 1961
Astros del abismo (Agustini) 1924
At Night the Cats (Cisneros) 1985
Atentado (Ibargüengoitia) 1964
Athanar (Marechal) 1970
Atlas (Borges) 1985
Atormentados (Arévalo Martínez) 1914
Atrapados (Icaza) 1972
Au Matin de la négritude (Depestre) 1990
Audiencia de los confines (Asturias) 1957
Aún (Neruda) 1969
Aunt Julia and the Scriptwriter (Vargas Llosa) 1982
Aura (Fuentes) 1962
Aura del Novecientos (Martínez Moreno) 1969
Aus den Augen Verlieren/Desaparecer (Dorfman) 1979
Auto de frade (Melo Neto) 1984
Auto dos ilhéus (Filho) 1981
Auto mariano para recordar la milagrosa aparición (Fernández de Lizardi) 1813
Autobiografía de Irene (S.Ocampo) 1948
Autobiography of a Runaway Slave (Barnet) 1968
Autógrafos cubanos (Barnet) 1990
Automne régulier (Huidobro) 1925
Autonautas de la cosmopista (Cortázar) 1983
Auto-retrato (C.Andrade) 1989
Autos profanos (Villaurrutia) 1941
Autres (Bioy Casares) 1974
Autumn of the Patriarch (García Márquez) 1976
Avanzada (Azuela) 1940
Ave, palavra (Guimarães Rosa) 1970
Aventura de Miguel Littín (García Márquez) 1986
Aventura de un fotógrafo en La Plata (Bioy Casares) 1985
Aventura e rotina (Freyre) 1953
Aventuras de los jóvenes dioses (Galeano) 1984
Aventuras de Tibicuera (Veríssimo) 1937
Aventuras democráticas (Guzmán) 1931
Aventuras do avião vermelho (Veríssimo) 1936
Aventuras grotescas (Guíraldes) 1915
Aventuras no mundo da higiene (Veríssimo) 1939
Aventuras perdidas (Pizarnik) 1976
Aventuras sigilosas (Lezama Lima) 1945
Aventureros (Gallegos) 1913
Aves sin nido (Matto de Turner) 1889
¡Ay vida, no me mereces! (Poniatowska) 1985
Ayapá (Cabrera) 1971
Ayer es nunca jamás (Pacheco) 1978
Azor (Ibarbourou) 1953
Azul (Darío) 1888

Babel bárbara (Peri Rossi)
Babelandia (Aguilera Malta) 1985
Bacchante (Hibbert) 1902
Bagaçêira (Almeida) 1928
Bagatelas (Barreto) 1923
Bahía de silencio (Mallea) 1940
Bahia de todos os santos (Amado) 1945
Bahía Sonora (Buitrago) 1976
Baile das quarto artes (M.Andrade) 1943
Baja el clamor de las sirenas (García Calderón) 1919
Bajo el oprobio (González Prada) 1933
Bajo el signo de la Cibeles (Carpentier) 1979
Bajo el sol de la medianoche rojo (C.Belli) 1990
Bajo la garra anglo-francesca (Gálvez) 1953
Bajo tu clara sombra (Paz) 1937
Bajo un manto de estrellas (Puig) 1983
Bajo zarpas de la quimera (Westphalen) 1991
Baladas (González Prada) 1939
Baladas con Ángel (Walsh) 1952
Baladas para el-rei (Meireles) 1925
Baladas para un sueño (Morejón) 1989
Baladas peruanas (González Prada) 1935
Baldío (Roa Bastos) 1966
Baltasar (Gómez de Avellaneda)
Balún Canán (Castellanos) 1957
Bandido do rio das Mortes (Guimarães) 1904
Bangüé (Rego) 1934
Banquete (M. Andrade) 1977
Banquete de Severo Arcángelo (Marechal) 1966
Barca de hielo (Mallea) 1967
Barca dos homens (Dourado) 1961
Barroco Concerto (Carpentier) 1991
Barrabás (Uslar Pietri) 1928
Barren Lives (Ramos) 1961
Barroco (Sarduy) 1974
Barulhos (Gullar) 1987
Batalla de José Luna (Marechal) 1970
Batalla de Nicaragua (García Márquez) 1979
Batallas en el desierto (Pacheco) 1981
Batalla de los colores (Dorffman) 1986
Batman en Chile (Lihn) 1973
Battles in the Desert (Pacheco) 1987
Bay of Silence (Mallea) 1944
Beach (Sarduy) 1985
Beata Maria do Egito (Queiroz) 1958
Beatle final (Marechal) 1981
Bebidas azules (Martínez Moreno) 1969
Bedside Manners (Valenzuela) 1995
Before Night Falls (Arenas) 1993
Bejeweled Boy (Asturias) 1971
Bel morir (Mutis) 1989
Bela e a fera (Lispector) 1979
Belazart (M. Andrade) 1934
Bella dama sin piedad (Castellanos) 1984
Bellas armas reales (Argueta) 1979
Belle Amour humaine (Alexis) 1957
Belleza de una espada clavada en la lengua (Westphalen) 1986
Bells of Agony (Dourado) 1988
Belo belo (Bandeira) 1948
Belshazzar (Gómez de Avellaneda) 1914
Beso (Yáñez Cossío) 1975
Beso de la mujer araña (Puig) 1976
Bestiario (Arreola) 1958
Bestiario (Cortázar) 1951
Bestiario (Girri) 1976
Bestiarium (Loynaz) 1992
Betrayed by Rita Hayworth (Puig) 1971
Between Two Worlds (Schwarz-Bart) 1981
Biblioteca esencial (Posse) 1991
Big Bang (Sarduy) 1973
Big Mama’s Funeral (García Márquez) 1968
Biografía de Ignacio Ramírez (Altamirano) 1889
Biografía de un cimarrón (Barnet) 1966
Biografía del general Don Dionisio de Puch (Gorriti) 1868
Biografía para uso de los pájaros (Carrera Andrade) 1937
Biografías de hombres ilustres o notables (Acosta de Samper) 1883
Birds without a Nest (Matto de Turner) 1904
Bisa Vuela (Walsh) 1985
Black Hell (Aguilera Malta) 1977
Black Heralds (Vallejo) 1990
Black Novel with Argentines (Valenzuela) 1992
Black Sheep (Monterroso) 1971
Blame (Valenzuela) 1992
Blanco (Paz) 1967
Blood of Requited Love (Puig) 1984
Blow-Up (Cortázar) 1968
Blue Blood (Aguilera Malta) 1948
Boca del tigre (Posse) 1971
Bocage (Bilac) 1917
Bocetos al lápiz de americanos célebres (Matto de Turner) 1889
Body Snatcher (Onetti) 1991
Bogavantes (Posse) 1970
Bois d’ébène (Roumain) 1945
Boises (Glissant) 1979
Boitempo (C. Andrade) 1969
Boletines de mar y tierra (Carrera Andrade) 1930
Bolívar (Asturias) 1955
Bolívar hoy (Uslar Pietri) 1983
Bolivarismo y monroísmo (Vasconcelos) 1934
Bolivia en el cuento (Taboada Terán) 1976
Bom humor (Bilac) 1939
Bon Voyage, Mr President (García Márquez) 1995
Bonete maulino (M. Rojas) 1943
Bonjour et adieu a la negritude (Depestre) 1980
Book of Embraces (Galeano) 1991
Book of Fantasy (Bioy Casares, Borges, S. Ocampo) 1971
Book of Imaginary Beings (Borges) 1969
Book of Sand (Borges) 1977
Boom in Spanish American Literature (Donoso) 1977
Boqueirão (Almeida) 1935
Boquitas pintadas (Puig) 1969
Boreales, miniaturas y porcelanas (Matto de Turner) 1909
Born Guilty (M. Rojas) 1955
Borra del café (Benedetti) 1992
Borradores (Girri) 1982
Borrones y borradores (Glantz) 1992
Bosses (Azuela) 1956
Bow and the Lyre (Paz) 1973
Brandão entre o mar e o amor (Ramos) 1942
Brasileiro em terras portuguesas (Freyre) 1953
Brasileiro entre os outros hispanos (Freyre) 1975
Brasileiro perplexo (Queiroz) 1963
Brasis, Brasil, e Brasilia (Freyre) 1960
Brazil (Freyre) 1945
Brazilian Tenement (Azevedo) 1926
Brejo das almas (C.Andrade) 1934
Breve diccionario del argentino exquisito (Bioy Casares) 1971
Breve historia de Mexico (Vasconcelos) 1937
Breve santoral (S.Ocampo) 1984
Bridge of Beyond (Schwarz-Bart) 1974
Brief History of Brazilian Literature (Bandeira) 1958
Brief Life (Ónetti) 1976
Brisa profunda (J.L.Ortiz) 1954
Brizna de paja en el viento (Gallegos) 1952
Brother Asno (Barrios) 1969
Bruna, soroche y los tíos (Yáñez Cossío) 1973
Bruzundagas (Barreto) 192.2.
Buen mudar (C.Belli) 1986
Buenas conciencias (Fuentes) 1959
Buenos Aires Affair (Puig) 1973
Buenos Aires y sus aspectos (Amorim) 1967
Buenos días, Fidel (Guillén) 1959
Bufo & Spallanzani (Fonseca) 1985
Buried Mirror (Fuentes) 1992.
Burlas veras (Reyes) 1957–59
Burning Patience (Skármeta) 1987
Burning Plain (Rulfo) 1967
Burnt Water (Fuentes) 1980
Buscadores de oro (Monterroso) 1993
Búsqueda del comienzo (Paz) 1973
Bustos y rimas (Casal) 1893

C.Z. (Canal Zone) (Aguilera Malta) 1935
Caballeresa del sol (Aguilera Malta) 1964
Caballero encantado y la moza esquiva (F.Ortiz) 1910
Caballeros del delito (López Albújar) 1936
Caballo alado (S.Ocampo) 1972
Caballo perdido (F.Hernández) 1943
Caballo y su sombra (Amorim) 1941
Cabaña (García Ponce) 1969
Cabeza de Goliat microscopía de Buenos Aires (Martínez Estrada) 1947
Cabeza de la hidra (Fuentes) 1978
Caçador de tatu (Queiroz) 1967
Cacau (Amado) 1933
Cachivaches (Palma) 1900
Cachoeira de Paulo Afonso (Castro Alves) 1876
Cachorros (Vargas Llosa) 1967
Caciques (Azuela) 1917
Cacto vermelho (Telles) 1949
Cada objeto es un mundo (Carrera Andrade) 1959
Cadastre (Césaire) 1961
Cae la noche tropical (Puig) 1988
Caetana’s Sweet Song (Piñón) 1992.
Caetés (Ramos) 1933
Cagliostro (Huidobro) 1934
Cahier d’un retour au pays natal (Césaire) 1947
Caída (Reyes) 1933
Caída (Sarduy) 1978
Caiman (Hibbert) 1988
Caja de cristal (Ferré) 1982
Caja de zapatos vacía (Piñera) 1986
Calcomanías (Girondo) 1925
Calderonadas (López Albújar) 1930
Calendario (Reyes) 1924
Calendario histórico y político (Fernández de Lizardi) 1824
Calendario histórico y pronóstico político (Fernández de Lizardi) 1825
Calendario manual y guía universal de forasteros en Venezuela (Bello) 1810
Calendario para el año de 1825 (Fernández de Lizardi) 1825
Calibán (Gálvez) 1943
Cálices vacíos (Agustini) 1913
Call for the Destruction of Nixon and Praise for the Chilean Revolution (Neruda) 1980
Calle de la tarde (Lange) 1924
Calle de la vida y de la muerte (Larreta) 1941
Calor das cosas (Piñón) 1980
Calzada de Jesús del Monte (Diego) 1949
Camarada Pantoja (Azuela) 1937
Cambio de armas (Valenzuela) 1982
Cambio de piel (Fuentes) 1967
Camera Lúcida (Elizondo) 1983
Camilo (Isaacs) 1937
Caminho de pedras (Queiroz) 1937
Caminho para a distância (Moraes) 1933
Caminhos cruzados (Veríssimo) 1935
Camino a Babel (Varela) 1986
Camino de El Dorado (Uslar Pietri) 1947
Camino de Paros (Rodó) 1919
Camino de Santiago (Carpentier) 1958
Camino del sol (Carrera Andrade) 1958
Caminos de la muerte (Gálvez) 1928
Campaign (Fuentes) 1991
Campana (Fuentes) 1990
Campeón desparejo (Bioy Casares) 1993
Campo (Gambaro) 1967
Campo geral (Guimarães Rosa) 1964
Campo nuestro (Girondo) 1946
Campo traviesa (Reyes) 1960
Canaã (Aranha) 1902
Canaan (Aranha) 1921
Canaima (Gallegos) 1936
Canción de gesta (Neruda) 1960
Canción de las figures (Eguren) 1916
Canción de nosotros (Galeano) 1975
Canción de Rachel (Barnet) 1969
Cancionero contra el mal de ojo (Walsh) 1976
Cancionero sin nombre (N.Parra) 1937
Canciones (C.Belli) 1979
Canciones del más acá (Benedetti) 1993
Canciones en la noche (Huidobro) 1913
Canciones para cantar en las barcas (Gorostiza) 1925
Canciones rusas (N. Parra) 1967
Canciones y cuentos del pueblo quechua (Arguedas) 1949
Cándido López (Roa Bastos) 1976
Cangaceiros (Rego) 1953
Cantaclaro (Gallegos) 1934
Cantando en el pozo (Arenas) 1982
Cantar de Agapito Robles (Scorza) 1977
Cantar de ciegos (Fuentes) 1964
Cántaro fresco (Ibarbourou) 1920
Cantata en la tumba de Federico García Lorca (Reyes) 1937
Cantate d’octubre a la vie et a la mort du commandant Ernesto Che Guevara (Depestre) 1968
Cántico cósmico (Cardenal) 1989
Cántico espiritual (Gálvez) 1923
Cantidad hechizada (Lezama Lima) 1970
Cantilenas (García Calderón) 1920
Canto a la Argentina (Dario) 1914
Canto a la primavera (Villaurrutia) 1948
Canto a las fortalezas volantes (Carrera Andrade) 1945
Canto al puente de Oakland (Carrera Andrade) 1941
Canto ceremonial contra un oso hormiguero (Cisneros) 1968
Canto de San Martín (Mareschal) 1979
Canto errante (Dario) 1907
Canto escolar (S. Ocampo) 1979
Canto general (Neruda) 1950
Canto kechwa (Arguedas) 1938
Canto nacional (Cardenal) 1973
Canto villano (Varela) 1986
Cantos a Berenice (Orozco) 1977
Cantos ceremoniales (Neruda) 1960
Cantos de la mañana (Agustini) 1910
Cantos de otro siglo (González Prada) 1979
Cantos de solidão (Guimarães) 1852
Cantos de vida y esperanza, (Dario) 1905
Cantos del peregrino (Mármol) 1847
Cantos para soldados y sones para turistas (Guillén) 1937
Cantos populares do Brasil (Romero) 1883
Caos (Bioy Casares) 1934
Caperucita en la zona roja (Argueta) 1977
Capitães da areia (Amado) 1937
Capitanes sin barco (D’Halmar) 1934
Capitu (Telles) 1993
Capítulos de literatura española (Reyes) 1939–45
Captain Pantoja and the Special Service (Vargas Llosa) 1978
Captains of the Sands (Amado) 1988
Captain’s Verses (Neruda) 1972
Cara de Ana (F. Hernández) 1930
Cara de la desgracia (Onetti) 1960
Cara del villano (Puig) 1985
Caras y las máscaras (Galeano) 1984
Caravana pasa (Dario) 1902
Cardboard House (Adán) 1990
Caribbean Discourse (Glissant) 1989
Caridades de la Señora de Tordoya (López Albújar) 1955
Carlos Reyles (Martínez Moreno) 1968
Carnaval (Bandeira) 1919
Carnaval afuera, carnaval adentro (Marqués) 1971
Carne de René (Piñera) 1952
Carreta (Amorim) 1932
Carreta (Marqués) 1963
Carta abierta a mi pueblo (Roa Bastos) 1986
Carta aérea a mis amigos de America (Asturias) 1952
Carta atenagórica (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1692
Carta de amor a Tut-ank-Amen (Loynaz) 1953
Carta de batalla por Tirant lo Blanc (Vargas Llosa) 1991
Carta de noche (Barnet) 1982
Carta para Alejandra (Adoum) 1952
Cartas a mi madre (Gelman) 1989
Cartas a un amigo (Echeverría) 1873
Cartas a una pelirroja (Cortázar) 1990
Cartas de amor (Asturias) 1989
Cartas de Italia (Mariátegui) 1969
Cartas de un emigrado (Carrera Andrade) 1933
Cartas del Palomar (Buitrago) 1988
Cartas do próprio punho sobre pessoas e coisas do Brasil e do estrangeiro (Freyre) 1978
Cartones de Madrid (Reyes) 1917
Cartucho (Campobello) 1931
Casa brasileira (Freyre) 1971
Casa colonial (Gálvez) 1939
Casa con dos puertas (Fuentes) 1970
Casa da paixão (Piñón) 1972
Casa de arena (Neruda) 1966
Casa de campo (Donoso) 1978
Casa de cartón (Adán) 1928
Casa de la mente (Girri) 1970
Casa de la tribu (Pitol) 1989
Casa de los espíritus (Allende) 1982
Casa de pensão (Azevedo) 1884
Casa del abuelo (Buitrago) 1979
Casa del arco iris (Buitrago) 1986
Casa del pan (Diego) 1978
Casa del Sano Placer (Yánez Cossio) 1989
Casa del verde doncel (Buitrago) 1990
Casa e o homem (Rego) 1954
Casa en la playa (García Ponce) 1966
Casa en la tierra (Poniatowska) 1980
Casa grande e senzala (Freyre) 1933
Casa inundada (F.Hernández) 1960
Casa junto al río (Garro) 1983
Casa sin reloj (Marqués) 1962
Casa verde (Vargas Llosa) 1966
Casa y el ladrillo (Benedetti) 1976
Casas muertas (Otero Silva) 1955
Case du commandeur (Glissant) 1981
Casi milagro (Walsh) 1958
Casilla de los Morelli (Cortázar) 1973
Caso Morel (Fonseca) 1973
Caso Sábato (Sábato) 1956
Castalia bárbara (Jaimes Freyre) 1899
Castelar (Darío) 1899
Castigo de Dios (Giardinelli) 1993
Cataclismo de Damocles (García Márquez) 1986
Catauro de cubanismos (F. Ortiz) 1923
Categorías de teatro popular (Boal) 1972
Catleya Luna (Salarrué) 1974
Cauces de la poesía mexicana (Gorostiza) 1988
Caudrivio (Paz) 1965
Cautiverio (Gálvez) 1935
Cavalheiro de antigamente (Dourado) 1992
Cayó sobre su rostro (Viñás) 1955
Cazador (Reyes) 1921
Cecilia Valdés (Villaverde) 1839
Celdas (Solórzano) 1971
Celestino antes del alba (Arenas) 1967
Cementerio de tordos (Pitol) 1982
Cemiterio de elefantes (Trevisan) 1962
Cencerro de cristal (Güiraldes) 1915
Cenicienta en San Francisco (Skármeta) 1990
Cenizas de Izalco (Alegría) 1966
Censors (Valenzuela) 1988
Centaur (Marechal) 1944
Centauro (Marechal) 1940
Centena (Paz) 1969
Central (Arenas) 1981
Century of the Wind (Galeano) 1988
Cerca del fuego (Agustín) 1986
Ceremonial de guerra (Triana) 1990
Ceremonias (Cortázar) 1968
Ceremonias del alba (Fuentes) 1991
Certain Lucas (Cortázar) 1984
Cervantes o la crítica de la lectura (Fuentes) 1976
Cetro de José (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1692
Chac Mool (Fuentes) 1973
Champ d'îles (Glissant) 1953
Champs de l’aurore (Lhérisson) 1893
Chanaân (Aranha) 1902
Change of Light (Cortázar) 1980
Change of Skin (Fuentes) 1968
Chantaje (Asturias) 1964
Charleston (Donoso) 1960
Chase (Carpentier) 1989
Chateau de grisou (Moro) 1943
Chaucha y Palito (Walsh) 1977
Chaves (Mallea) 1953
Che comandante (Guillén) 1967
Chico Carlo (Ibarbourou) 1944
Childhood (Ramos) 1979
Children of Segu (Condé) 1989
Chile con el corazón a la izquierda (Taboada Terán) 1971
Chile from Within (Dorfman) 1990
Chileno! (Skármeta) 1979
China 1964 (Galeano) 1964
Chistes ParRa desorientar a la policía (N. Parra) 1983
Cholos (Icaza) 1937 chosen (Carpentier) 1970
Christ on the Rue Jacob (Sarduy) 1995
Christmas in the Mountains (Altamirano) 1961
Christopher Unborn (Fuentes) 1989
Chronicle of a Death Foretold (García Márquez) 1982
Chronicles of Bustos Domecq (Bioy Casares, Borges) 1976
Chrorinho brejeiro (Trevisan) 1981
Chulla Romero y Flores (Icaza) 1958
Chunga (Vargas Llosa) 1986
Chúo Gil y las tejedoras (Uslar Pietri) 1960
Cicatrices (Saer) 1969
Ciclista de San Cristóbal (Skármeta) 1973
Ciclo de palestras sobre o teatro brasileiro (Boal) 1981
Cidade sitiada (Lispector) 1948
Ciegos (Loveira) 1922
Cielo con las manos (Giardinelli) 1981
Cien años de soledad (García Márquez) 1967
100 crónicas escolhidas (Queiroz) 1958
Cien sonetos de amor (Neruda) 1960
Ciencias ocultas (Arlt) 1991
Cifra (Borges) 1981
Ciles alucinada, San José (Herrera y Reissig) 1916
Cinco minutos (Alencar) 1856
Cinco poemas australes (Marechal) 1937
Cinco poemas uruguayos (Amorim) 1935
Cinco visiones (G.Rojas) 1992
Cinza das horas (Bandeira) 1917
Ciranda de pedra (Telles) 1954
Círculo vicioso (Agustín) 1974
Cisnes (Darío) 1905
Citas y comentarios (Gelman) 1982
City of Kings (Castellanos) 1993
Ciudad ausente (Piglia) 1992
Ciudad de la memoria (Pacheco) 1989
Ciudad de las columnas (Carpentier) 1970
Ciudad de los Césares (M.Rojas) 1936
Ciudad de Luzbel (Peri Rossi) 1993
Ciudad de nadie (Uslar Pietri) 1960
Ciudad junto al río inmóvil (Mallea) 1936
Ciudad pintada en rojo (Gálvez) 1948
Ciudad real (Castellanos) 1960
Ciudad sin ángel (Adoum) 1995
Ciudad y los perros (Vargas Llosa) 1963
Ciudadano del olvido (Huidobro) 1941
Ciudades desiertas (Agustín) 1982
Civilice a su troglodita (Allende) 1974
Civilisation de bosalle (Condé) 1978
Civilización y barbarie (Sarmiento) 1845
Clã do jaboti (M. Andrade) 1927
Clamor (Larreta) 1959
Clandestine in Chile (García Márquez) 1987
Clandestine Poems (Dalton) 1984
Clara (Valenzuela) 1976
Clara dos Anjos (Barreto) 1948
Clarissa (Veríssimo) 1933
Clarivigilia primaveral (Asturias) 1965
Claro enigma (C. Andrade) 1951
Claroscuro (Taboada Terán) 1948
Claudia conversa (Viñas) 1995
Claves por Rita Montaner (Barnet) 1987
Clemencia (Altamirano) 1869
Climas (Pitol) 1966
Clotilde en su casa (Ibargüengoitia) 1956
Cobra (Sarduy) 1972
Cobrador (Fonseca) 1979
Coca (Martínez Moreno) 1970
Cocina ecléctica (Gorriti) 1890
 Cocuyo (Sarduy) 1990
Cofradía del mullo del vestido de la Virgen Pipona (Yánez Cossío) 1985
Cofre volante (S. Ocampo) 1974
Coisas do alto (Moraes) 1993
Coiteiros (Almeida) 1935
Cola de lagartija (Valenzuela) 1983
Cola de zorro (Buitrago) 1970
Cola mágica (Gambaro) 1976
Cold Air (Piñera) 1985
Cold Tales (Piñera) 1988
Coleira do cão (Fonseca) 1965
Cólora buey (Gelman) 1965
Colibri (Sarduy) 1984
Colombia (Taboada Terán) 1974
Colonié du Nouveau Monde (Condé) 1993
Coloquio de las perras (Ferré) 1990
Coloquio de sombras (Triana) 1981
Colóquio unilateralmente sentimental (Bandeira) 1968
Color del verano (Arenas) 1991
Color que el infierno me escondiera (Martínez Moreno) 1981
Comentarios reales (Cisneros) 1964
Comentarios reales de los Incas (Garcilaso de la Vega) 1609
Comiendo en Hungría (Asturias, Neruda) 1969
Como agua para chocolate (Esquivel) 1989
Como e porque sou e não sou sociólogo (Freyre) 1968
Como en la guerra (Valenzuela) 1977
Como higuera en un campo de golf (Cisneros) 1972
Compadre Lobo (Sainz) 1977
Compañeras de Mexico (Poniatowska) 1990
Compêndio da história da música (M. Andrade) 1929
Compendio de gramática castellana (Bello) 1841
Compendio de historia de la literatura (Bello) 1850
Compère Général Soleil (Alexis) 1955
Composiciones (Gelman) 1986
Comunidades de España y del Perú (Arguedas) 1968
Con esta boca, en este mundo (Orozco) 1992
Con las primeras luces (Martínez Moreno) 1966
Con manos de fantasma (Dalton) 1987
Con y sin nostalgia (Benedetti) 1977
Concepción del cosmos (Arévalo Martínez) 1954
Concierto barroco (Carpentier) 1974
Condenados (O. Andrade) 1941
Condesa sangrienta (Pizarnik) 1971
Condição humana (Freyre) 1972
Condición necesaria (Girri) 1960
Conducta sentimental (Salazar Bondy) 1963
Confabulario (Arreola) 1952
Conferencias (Barrett) 1954
Conferencias y discursos (Zorrilla de San Martín) 1905
Confidencia en alta voz (Salazar Bondy) 1960
Confieso que he vivido (Neruda) 1974
Configurations (Paz) 1971
Confissão de Leontina (Telles) 1964
Conflictos y armonías de las razas en América (Sarmiento) 1883
Confrontaciones (Agustín) 1984
Congress (Borges) 1970
Congress (Borges) 1974
Conjunciones y disyunciones (Paz) 1969
Conjunctions and Disjunctions (Paz) 1974
Conjurados (Borges) 1985
Conocimiento y expresión de la Argentina (Mallea) 1935
Conquistadores (Jaimes Freyre) 1928
Consagración de la primavera (Carpentier) 1978
Consider the Lilies of the Field (Veríssimo) 1947
Conspiración vendida (Ibargüengoitia) 1965
Conspiradores (Ibargüengoitia) 1981
Constancia (Fuentes) 1989
Consuelo (Castro Alves)
Consuelo (Echeverría) 1834
Contar un cuento (Roa Bastos) 1984
Contemplação de Ouro Preto (Mendes) 1954
Contenido social de la literatura iberoamericana (Yáñez) 1944
Contos nègres de Cuba (Cabrera) 1936
Contextos (Elizondo) 1973
Continuación (S. Ocampo) 1981
Contos fluminenses (Machado de Assis) 1872
Contos populares do Brasil (Romero) 1885
Contra la muerte (G. Rojas) 1964
Contra los puentes levadizos (Benedetti) 1966
Contra viento y marea (Vargas Llosa) 1983–90
Contrapunteo cubano del tabaco y el azúcar (F. Ortíz) 1940
Contrapunto político en América Latina (Viñas) 1982
Contraseña (Galeano) 1985
Contravida (Roa Bastos) 1994
Contribuição para uma sociologia da biografia (Freyre) 1968
Convergences (Paz) 1987
Convergência (Mendes) 1970
Conversación con los difuntos (Diego) 1991
Conversación desesperada (Usigli) 1938
Conversación en La Catedral (Vargas Llosa) 1969
Conversaciones con chicos (Gambaro) 1976
Conversaciones con Raimón (Galeano) 1977
Conversation in The Cathedral (Vargas Llosa) 1975
Convidados de agosto (Castellanos) 1964
Convidados de piedra (Edwards) 1978
Convidados de plata (Carpentier) 1972
Convulsión política y social de nuestro tiempo (Sábato) 1969
Coplas de Juan Descalzo (Guillén) 1979
Coplas de navidad (N.Parra) 1983
Corazón amarillo (Neruda) 1974
Corazón con que vivo (Guillén) 1975
Cordelia (Martínez Moreno) 1961
Cornelia frente al espejo (S.Ocampo) 1988
Corona patriótica (Palma) 1853
Coronación (Donoso) 1957
Coronación de la espera (Girri) 1947
Coronation (Donoso) 1965
Coronel no tiene quien le escriba (García Márquez) 1957
Corpo (C.Andrade) 1984
Corpo de baile (Guimarães Rosa) 1956
Corpo vivo (Filho) 1962
Corral abierto (Amorim) 1956
Corriente alterna (Paz) 1967
Córso de rei (Boal) 1985
Cortesía (Reyes) 1948
Cortiço (Azevedo) 1890
Coruja (Azevedo) 1890
Cosas concretas (Viñas) 1969
Cosas en su sitio (Paz) 1971
Cosmografía (Bello) 1848
Cosmoagonías (Peri Rossi) 1988
Cosmoagontias (Peri Rossi) 1988
Cosmografía (Bello) 1848
Costilla de Eva (G.Belli) 1986
Cotidianas (Benedetti) 1979
Counselor Ayres' Memorial (Machado de Assis) 1972
Cría ojos (Dorfman) 1979
Criador de gorilas (Arlt) 1941
Crime na Calle Relaton (Melo Neto) 1987
Crime na flora (Gullar) 1986
Crimen del otro (Quiroga) 1904
Crimes de paixão (Trevisan) 1978
Criminals (Triana) 1971
Críptico (G.Rojas) 1984
Crisálidas (Machado de Assis) 1864
Crisis de la ciudad liberal (Viñas) 1973
Crisis sobre un sermón (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1692
Cristián y yo (D’Halmar) 1946
Cristo de la rue Jacob (Sarduy) 1987
Cristo negro (Salarrué) 1926
Cristóbal nonato (Fuentes) 1987
Crítica e fantasía (Bilac) 1904
Crítica en la edad ateniense (Reyes) 1941
Crítica literaria (Mariátegui) 1969
Crocodile (F.Hernández) 1976
Crónica de la intervención (García Ponce) 1982
Crónica de las Indias (Carrera Andrade) 1965
Crónica de una muerte anunciada (García Márquez) 1981
Crónica del Niño Jesús de Chilca (Cisneros) 1981
Crónica del puerto de Veracruz (Pacheco) 1986
Crónica regia (Mutis) 1985
Crónica trovada da cidade de Sam Sebastiam do Rio de Janeiro (Meireles) 1965
Crónicas da provincia do Brasil (Bandeira) 1937
Crónicas de “Puck” (Gutiérrez Nájera) 1943
Crónicas de Bustos Domecq (Biyo Casares, Borges) 1967
Crónicas de nuestra America (Boal) 1977
Crónicas del 71 (Benedetti) 1972
Crónicas latinoamericanas (Galeano) 1972
Cronicón de sí mismo (Arlt) 1969
Cronopios and Famas (Cortázar) 1969
Croquis mexicanos (Mistral) 1979
Crossing the Mangrove (Condé) 1995
Crossroads (Solórzano) 1993
Crossroads and Destinies (Veríssimo) 1956
Cruce de vías (Solórzano) 1959
Crucificado (Solórzano) 1959
Cruz en la Sierra Maestra (Aguilera Malta) 1960
Cruzado (Mármol) 1851
Cuaderno cubano (Benedetti) 1969
Cuaderno de escritura (Elizondo) 1969
Cuaderno de familia (Triana) 1990
Cuaderno de Granada (Morejón) 1984
Cuaderno de poesía negra (Ballagas) 1934
Cuaderno salteño (Amorim) 1942
Cuaderno San Martín (Borges) 1929
Cuadernos de infancia (Lange) 1937
Cuadernos de la tierra (Adoum) 1952–61
Cuadernos de navegación (Marechal) 1966
Cuadernos de todo y nada (Fernández) 1972
Cuahatemoc (Gómez de Avellaneda) 1898
Cuando entonces (Onetti) 1987
Cuando era feliz e indocumentado (García Márquez) 1973
Cuando quiero llorar no lloro (Otero Silva) 1970
Cuando ya no importe (Onetti) 1993
45 días y 30 marineros (Lange) 1933
Cuaresma del Duque Job (Gutiérrez Nájera) 1946
Cuartele de invierno (Soriano) 1982
Cuarto mundo (Eltit) 1988
Cuatro (Martínez Moreno) 1967
Cuatro canciones para el Che (Guillén) 1969
Cuatro chupos (Paz) 1985
Cuatro contactos con lo sobrenatural (Arévalo Martínez) 1971
Cuatro de oros (Diego) 1991
Cuatro hombres de pueblo (Sábato) 1979
Cuatro para Delfina (Donoso) 1982
Cuba Libre (Guillén) 1948
Cuba, paloma de vuelo popular (Taboada Terán) 1964
Cuban Counterpoint (F. Ortiz) 1947
Cubanidad y cubanía (F. Ortiz) 1964
Cubanidad y los negros (F. Ortiz) 1939
Cubs (Vargas Llosa) 1979
Cueca larga (N. Parra) 1958
Cuentopos de Gulubú (Walsh) 1966
Cuentos andinos (López Albújar) 1920
Cuentos calientes (Vega) 1992
Cuentos color de humo (Gutiérrez Nájera) 1920
Cuentos de amor (Amorim) 1938
Cuentos de amor, de locura y de muerte (Quiroga) 1917
Cuentos de arena y sol (López Albújar) 1972
Cuentos de barro (Salarrué) 1933
Cuentos de cipotes (Salarrué) 1945
Cuentos de Eva Luna (Allende) 1990
Cuentos de Juan Bobo (Ferré) 1981
Cuentos de la selva para niños (Quiroga) 1918
Cuentos de Lilus Kikus (Poniatowska) 1967
Cuentos de muerte y de sangre (Guíraldes) 1915
Cuentos fatales (Lugones) 1924
Cuentos frágiles (Gutiérrez Nájera) 1883
Cuentos fríos (Piñera) 1956
Cuentos morales (Piglia) 1995
Cuentos negros de Cuba (Cabrera) 1940
Cuentos para adultos, niños, y retrasados mentales (Cabrera) 1983
Cuentos para una inglesa desesperada (Mallea) 1926
Cuentos paramilitares (Dorfman) 1986
Cuentos peruanos (García Calderón) 1952
Cuentos secretos (Onetti) 1986
Cuentos venezolanos (Gallegos) 1949
Cuerpo a cuerpo (Viñas) 1979
Cuerpo presente (Pitol) 1990
Cuerpo presente (Roa Bastos) 1971
Cuerpos y ofrendas (Fuentes) 1972
Cuestiones estéticas (Reyes) 1911
Cuestiones gongorinas (Reyes) 1927
Cuestiones y razones (Girri) 1987
Cultura ameaçada (Freyre) 1942
Cultura de la libertad, la libertad de la cultura (Vargas Llosa) 1985
Cultura en la encrucijada nacional (Sábato) 1973
Cultura entre dos fuegos (Benedetti) 1986
Cultura, ese blanco móvil (Benedetti) 1985
Cultura posta em questão (Guillar) 1964
Cumandá (Mera) 1879
Cumpleaños (Fuentes) 1969
Cumpleaños de Juan Angel (Benedetti) 1971
Curfew (Donoso) 1988
Cuzcatlán (Argueta) 1986
Cyclone (Asturias) 1967

Dador (Lezama Lima) 1960
Dailán Kifki (Walsh) 1966
Daily Daily (Guillén) 1989
Daimón (Posse) 1978
Daiquirí (Sarduy) 1980
Dama de corazones (Villaurrutia) 1928
Danças dramáticas do Brasil (M.Andrade) 1959
Danza inmóvil (Scorza) 1983
Dar la cara (Viñas) 1962
Dar la vuelta (Gamarro) 1987
Darío y más Darío (G.Rojas) 1967
Dark Room (Lihn) 1978
David (Cisneros) 1962
David y Jonatán (Marqués) 1970
Days and Nights of Love and War (Galeano) 1983
De amor y de sombra (Allende) 1984
De aquí en adelante (Argueta) 1967
De Francesca a Beatrice (V.Ocampo) 1924
De la amorosa inclinación a enredarse en cabellos (Glantz) 1984
De la madera de los sueños (Triana) 1958
De la poesía a la revolución (M.Rojas) 1938
De las raíces y del cielo (J.L.Ortiz) 1958
De lo barroco en el Perú (Adán) 1968
De los montoneros a los anarquistas (Viñas) 1971
De los 26 a los 35 (Loveira) 1917
De mi casona (López Albújar) 1924
De noticias e não noticias faz-se a crónica (C.Andrade) 1974
De Perfil (Agustín) 1966
De poetas e de poesia (Bandeira) 1954
De Sainte Domingue a Haití (Price-Mars) 1959
De sobremesa (Silva) 1925
De tejas arriba (Carrasquilla) 1936
De tierra brava (López Albújar) 1938
De viaje por los países socialistas (García Márquez) 1978
De vida o muerte (Martínez Moreno) 1971
Dead Girls (Ibargüengoitia) 1983
Dear Diego (Poniatowska) 1986
Death and the Maiden (Dorfman) 1991
Death in the Andes (Vargas Llosa) 1996
Death of Artemio Cruz (Fuentes) 1964
Death without End (Gorostiza) 1969
Débat autor des conditions d’un roman national (Alexis) 1957
Decapitated Chicken (Quiroga) 1976
Décima muerte (Villaurrutia) 1941
Décimas (V.Parra) 1970
Decir sí (Gambaro) 1981
Deep Rivers (Arguedas) 1978
Defectos escogidos (Neruda) 1974
Defensa del marxismo (Mariátegui) 1934
Defensa social (Tablada) 1913
Defesa nacional (Bilac) 1917
Dejemos hablar al viento (Onetti) 1979
Del amor y otros demonios (García Márquez) 1994
Del encuentro nupcial (Pitol) 1970
Del fenómeno social de la transculturación y de su importancia en Cuba (F.Ortiz) 1940
Del hacer y deshacer de Venezuela (Uslar Pietri) 1962
Del humorismo a la carcajada (Tablada) 1944
Del natural (Barrios) 1907
Del relámpago (G.Rojas) 1981
Del sol naciente (Gambaro) 1984
Del uno al seis (Amorim) 1932
Deliciosa e sangrenta aventura latina de Jane Spitfire (Boal) 1977
Delincuente (M.Rojas) 1929
Demonio de los Andes (Palma) 1883
Demônio familiar (Alencar) 1857
Demônios (Azevedo) 1893
Demonios ocultos (Posse) 1987
Dentro da noite veloz (Gullar) 1975
Dentro & fuera (C.Belli) 1960
Derecho de asilo (Carpentier) 1972
Derniers Rois Mages (Condé) 1992
Desafíos a la libertad (Vargas Llosa) 1994
Desastre (Vasconcelos) 1938
Desastres do amor (Trevisan) 1968
Desatinos (Gambaro) 1965
Desaventuras en el País-Jardín-de-Infantes (Walsh) 1993
Descenso y ascenso del alma por la belleza (Marechal) 1939
Descoberta do mundo (Lispector) 1984
Desconsideraciones (García Ponce) 1968
Descripción de un naufragio (Peri Rossi) 1974
Descubrimiento de America que todavía no fue (Galeano) 1986
Desde entonces (Pacheco) 1980
Desde Europa (Vallejo) 1987
Desde la cola del dragon (Edwards) 1973–77
Desde lejos (Orozco) 1946
Desembocadura (Amorim) 1958
Desencantos (Machado de Assis) 1861
Desengaños del mago (Scorza) 1961
Deseo de la palabra (Pizarnik) 1975
Desesperanza (Donoso) 1986
Desexilio (Benedetti) 1984
Desfile del amor (Pitol) 1984
Deshoras (Cortázár) 1983
Desierto (Quiroga) 1924
Desierto entra en la ciudad (Arlt) 1950
Deslindes (Reyes) 1944
Desnudo en el tejado (Skármeta) 1969
Desolación (Mistral) 1922
Despierta mi bien, despierta (Alegría) 1986
Despistes y franquezas (Benedetti) 1989
Despojamiento (Gambaro) 1981
Después del día de fiesta (Gambaro) 1994
Después del temporal (Amorim) 1953
Desquite (Azuela) 1941
Desterrados (Quiroga) 1926
Destierro (Cisneros) 1961
Destín des Caraíbes (Morisseau-Leroy) 1941
Destino del Caribe (Morisseau-Leroy) 1941
Detalles de la historia rioplatense (Zorrilla de San Martin) 1917
Detén (Alegria) 1977
Deuses de casaca (Machado de Assis) 1866
Devil to Pay in the Backlands (Guimarães Rosa) 1963
Devil’s Church (Machado de Assis) 1977
Devil’s Pit (Lillo) 1959
Devocionario nuevo y completísimo (Gómez de Avellaneda) 1867
Día (Tablada) 1919
Día de Antero Albán (Uslar Pietri) 1958
Día de tu boda (Glantz) 1982
Día en la vida (Argueta) 1980
Diablo inglés (Walsh) 1974
Diacoute (Morisseau-Leroy) 1953–72
Diálogos de amor de León Hebreo (Garcilaso de la Vega) 1989
Diamantes y pedernales (Arguedas) 1954
Diana, o la cazadora solitaria (Fuentes) 1994
Diana, the Goddess Who Hunts Alone (Fuentes) 1995
Diario de amor (Gómez de Avellaneda) 1928
Diario de Gabriel Quiroga (Gálvez) 1910
Diario de la guerra del cerdo (Bioy Casares) 1969
Diario de Lecumberri (Mutis) 1960
Diario de muerte (Lihn) 1989
Diario de poeta (Adán) 1975
Diario de una señorita que se fastidia (T.de la Parra) 1922
Diario que a diario (Guillén) 1972
Diary of the War of the Pig (Bioy Casares) 1972
Días como flechas (Marechal) 1926
Días de Bali (Yáñez) 1964
Días de la noche (S.Ocampo) 1970
Días de tu vida (Diego) 1977
Días enmascarados (Fuentes) 1954
Días lindos (C.Andrade) 1977
Días por vivir (Martínez Moreno) 1960
Días siguientes (Galeano) 1963
Días y las noches (Lange) 1926
Días y las noches de París (Tablada) 1918
Días y noches de amor y de guerra (Galeano) 1978
Diaspora (Peri Rossi) 1976
Diatribe de amor contra un hombre sentado (García Márquez) 1994
Dibaxu (Gelman) 1994
Didáctica (Lugones) 1910
1989/1990 (Girri) 1990
17 disparos contra lo porvenir (Bioy Casares) 1933
Dientes blancos (Aguilera Malta) 1956
Dieu nous l’a donné (Condé) 1972
Diez Mandamientos (Girri) 1981
Diez noches de Francisca Lombardo (Eltit) 1989
Diferencias y semejanzas entre los países de la América Latina (Martínez Estrada) 1962
Difícil aurora, Cochabamba (Taboada Terán) 1984
Dinorá (Trevisan) 1994
Dios cotidiano (Viñas) 1957
Dios en el cafetín (Salazar Bondy) 1964
Dios invisibles (Uslar Pietri) 1958
Dios no nos quiere contentos (Gambaro) 1979
Dios trajo la sombra (Adoum) 1959
Dioses y hombres de Huarocharí (Arguedas) 1966
Dique seco (Asturias) 1964
Dirty Poem (Gullar) 1990
Disciplina do amor (Telles) 1980
Discos visuales (Paz) 1968
Discours antillais (Glissant) 1981
Discours sur le colonialisme (Césaire) 1951
Discourse on Colonialism (Césaire) 1972
Discovering the World (Lispector) 1992
Discurso pronunciado…en la instalación de la Universidad de Chile (Bello) 1848
Discursos (Lange) 1942
Discursos de primavera (C.Andrade) 1977
Discursos por Jalisco (Yáñez) 1958
Discusión (Borges) 1932
Distancias doradas (Buitrago) 1964
Distant Relations (Fuentes) 1982
Diva (Alencar) 1864
Divagaciones y fantasías (Gutiérrez Nájera) 1944
Divertimento (Cortázar) 1986
Divertimentos (Diego) 1946
Divertimentos y versiones (Diego) 1967
Divino Narciso (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1690
Doce canção de Caetana (Piñón) 1987
Doce cuentos peregrinos (García Márquez) 1992
12 siluetas (Cuadra) 1934
Dr Brodie’s Report (Borges) 1972
Dr Getúlio, sua vida e sua glória (Gullar) 1968
Dogma socialista (Echeverría) 1846
Dogs of Paradise (Posse) 1989
Doguicimi (Morisseau-Leroy) 1961
Doidinho (Rego) 1933
Dois dedos (Ramos) 1945
Dolor paraguayo (Barrett) 1909
Dolores (Acosta de Samper) 1867
Dolorosa y denuda realidad (García Calderón) 1910
Dom Casmurro (Machado de Assis) 1899
Domar a la divina garza (Pitol) 1988
Domingo siete (Poniatowska) 1982
Domingos en Hyde Park (V.Ocampo) 1936
Dominicales (Carrasquilla) 1934
Domitilo quiere ser diputado (Azuela) 1918
Don Catrín de la Fachenda (Fernández de Lizardi) 1832
Don de febrero (López Velarde) 1952
Don Goyo (Aguilera Malta) 1933
Don Juan (Marechal) 1978
Don Juan 38 (Amorim) 1959
Don Justo Sierra (Yáñez) 1950
Don Quixote or, the Critique of Reading (Fuentes) 1976
Don Segundo Sombra (Güiraldes) 1926
Doña Barbara (Gallegos) 1929
Doña Beatriz (Solórzano) 1954
Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands (Amado) 1969
Dona Flor e seus dois maridos (Amado) 1966
Dona Sinhá e o filho padre (Freyre) 1964
Doncella (Gallegos) 1957
Donde son los cantantes (Sarduy) 1967
Donde van a morir los elefantes (Donoso) 1995
Donde viven las águilas (Valenzuela) 1983
Done viene uno (G.Rojas) 1988
Don’t Ask Me How the Time Goes By (Pacheco) 1978
Donzela e a moura Torta (Queiroz) 1948
Doom of Damocles (García Márquez) 1986
Doorman (Arenas) 1991
Dora, Doralina (Queiroz) 1975
Dorando la píldora (Dorfman) 1985
Dormir al sol (Bioy Casares) 1973
Dorrego (Viñas) 1974
Dos amores (Villaverde) 1858
Dos congresos (Martí) 1985
Dos crímenes (Ibargüengoitia) 1979
Dos darsas pirotécnicas (Stormi) 1932
Dos fantasías memorables (Bioy Casares, Borges) 1946
Dos fundaciones de Buenos Aires (Larreta) 1933
2000 (Neruda) 1974
Dos Nocturnos (Villaurrutia) 1931
Dos retratos (Lange) 1956
Dos señores conversan (Bryce Echenique) 1990
Dos soledades (Westphalen) 1974
Dos Venecias (Ferré) 1992,
Dos vidas del pobre Napoleón (Gálvez) 1954
Dos viejos pánicos (Piñera) 1968
Doscientas ballenas azules (Glantz) 1979
200 exercícios e jogos para o ator e o não-ator (Boal) 1977
Dostoevsky’s Last Night (Peri Rossi) 1995
Double Flame (Paz) 1993
Doublure (Sarduy) 1981
Doubtful Strait (Cardenal) 1995
Doze noturnos de Holanda (Meireles) 1952
Draft of Shadows (Paz) 1979
Dream of Heroes (Bioy Casares) 1987
Dreamtigers (Borges) 1963
Drums for Rancas (Scorza) 1977
Du Réalisme Merveilleux des Haïtiens (Alexis) 1956
Duas aguas (Melo Neto) 1956
Dueños de la tierra (Viñas) 1959
Dulce daño (Storni) 1918
Duques de Endor (Arévalo Martínez) 1940
Dyakout 1, 2, 3 (Morisseau-Leroy) 1983

Eagle and the Serpent (Guzmán) 1930
Eagle or Sun? (Paz) 1970
Ebony Wood (Roumain) 1972
¡Ecce Pericles! (Arévalo Martínez) 1945
Ecopoemas (N.Parra) 1982,
Ecos del alma (Huidobro) 1911
Écrivain et la catastrophe (Sábato) 1986
Ecuador amargo (Adoum) 1949
Ecuatorial (Huidobro) 1918
¡Écule-yamba-Ó! (Carpentier) 1933
Edad despareja (Amorim) 1938
Edades poéticas (Carrera Andrade) 1958
Edge of the Storm (Yáñez) 1963
Egberto Gismonti (Gullar) 1979
Ejercicios materiales (Varela) 1994
El que vendrá (Rodó) 1897
El que vino a salvarme (Piñera) 1970
Eldorado y las ocupaciones nocturnas (Adoum) 1961
Elegía (Ibarbourou) 1967
Elegía (Neruda) 1974
Elegía a Jacques Roumain en el cielo de Haiti (Guillén) 1948
Elegía a Jesús Menéndez (Guillén) 1951
Elegía cubana (Guillén) 1952
Elegía sin nombre (Ballagas) 1936
Elegías italianas (Girri) 1957
Elemental Odes (Neruda) 1990
Elementary Odes (Neruda) 1961
Elementos de la noche (Pacheco) 1963
Elementos del desastre (Mutis) 1953
Elogio de Ameghino (Lugones) 1915
Elogio de la danza (Morejón) 1982,
Elogio de la madrastra (Vargas Llosa) 1988
Elogio de la sombra (Borges) 1969
Elogio de las cosas de la tierra (Mistral) 1979
Elsinore (Elizondo) 1988
Elvira (Echeverría) 1832,
Em busca de Curitiba perdida (Trevisan) 1992
Embajador de Torlania (Arévalo Martínez) 1960
Emergency Poems (N.Parra) 1972
Emisarios (Mutis) 1984
Empeños de una casa (Juan Inés de la Cruz) 1692
Empire’s Old Clothes (Dorfman) 1983
Emulo lipolidón (Asturias) 1935
En Bética no bella (C.Belli) 1961
En busca del nuevo mundo (Uslar Pietri) 1969
En Cuba (Cardenal) 1972
En cuerpo de camisa (Sánchez) 1966
En el aura del sauce (J.L.Ortiz) 1970–71
En el costado de la luz (Argueta) 1968
En el mundo de los seres ficticios (Gálvez) 1961
En el mundo de los seres reales (Gálvez) 1965
En el país del sol (Tablada) 1919
En el restante tiempo terrenal (C.Belli) 1988
En el revés del cielo (Orozco) 1987
En la creciente oscuridad (Mallea) 1973
En la humedad del secreto (Dalton) 1994
En la letra (Girri) 1972
En la masmédula (Girondo) 1954
En la masvida (Girondo) 1972
En la pampa (Larreta) 1955
En la sangre (Cambaceres) 1887
En la semana trágica (Viñas) 1966
En la verbena de Madrid (García Calderón) 1920
En la zona (Saer) 1960
En las calles (Icaza) 1935
En las montañas (Jaimes Freyre) 1906
¿En qué piensas? (Villaurrutia) 1938
En un hermoso día de verano (Jaimes Freyre) 1907
En una ciudad llamada San Juan (Marqués) 1960
Encancaranublado (Vega) 1982
Encarnação (Alencar) 1875
Encounters (García Ponce) 1989
Encuentros (García Ponce) 1972
End of the Game (Cortázar) 1967
Enemigo rumor (Lezama Lima) 1941
Enemigo y la mañana (Adoum) 1952
Enemigos del alma (Mallea) 1950
Engenheiro francês no Brazil (Freyre) 1940
Enigma interior (Gálvez) 1907
Ensaios de sociologia e literatura (Romero) 1901
Ensayo de un crimen (Usigili) 1944
Ensayos quemados en Chile (Dorfman) 1974
Enseignements de l’histoire (Lhérisson) 1894
Entenado (Saer) 1983
Entrada en materia (García Ponce) 1968
Entrañas de niño (Carrasquilla) 1914
Entre crotos y sabihondos (Arlt) 1969
Entre cubanos (F.Ortiz) 1913
Entre dos tíos y un tío (Mera) 1891
Entre la dicha y la tiniebla (Diego) 1986
Entre la novela y la historia (Gálvez) 1962
Entre la piedra y la flor (Paz) 1941
Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda (Adoum) 1976
Entre Sartre y Camus (Vargas Llosa) 1981
Entrevista (Giardinelli) 1986
Entry into Matter (García Ponce) 1976
Enthusiasm (Skármeta) 1967
Enumeración de la patria (S.Ocampo) 1942
Envenenada (F.Hernández) 1931
Envíos (Girri) 1967
Epigráfas (Cardenal) 1961
Epílogo wagneriano (Herrera y Reissig) 1902
Episodios novelescos de la historia patria (Acosta de Samper) 1887
Epístolas y poemas (Dario) 1885
Epitafios, Imitación, Aforismos (Sarduy) 1994
Epitaph of a Small Winner (Machado de Assis) 1952
Epopeya de Artigas (Zorrilla de San Martín) 1910
Eras imaginarias (Lezama Lima) 1971
Eréndira (García Márquez) 1983
Ermitaño de Glória (Alencar) 1873
Ermitaño de Muquêm (Guimarães) 1866
Éros dans un train chinois (Depestre) 1990
Erosiones (Glantz) 1984
Errancia sin fin (García Ponce) 1981
Esa fauna (Monterroso) 1992
Esa sangre (Azuela) 1956
Esau and Jacob (Machado de Assis) 1966
Esau e Jacó (Machado de Assis) 1904
Escada (O.Andrade) 1921
Escalas melografiadas (Vallejo) 1923
Escándalo y soledades (Girri) 1956
Escena contemporánea (Mariátegui) 1925
Escola das facas (Melo Neto) 1980
Escolha o seu sonho (Meireles) 1964
Escrava Isaura (Guimarães) 1875
Escrava que não é Isaura (M.Andrade) 1925
Escravo nos anúncios de jornais brasileiros do século XIX (Freyre) 1963
Escrito a ciegas (Adán) 1961
Escrito en Cuba (Lihn) 1969
Escrito sobre un cuerpo (Sarduy) 1969
Escriptor latinoamericano y la revolución posible (Benedetti) 1974
Escriptor y sus fantasmas (Sábato) 1963
Escuela doméstica (Mera) 1880
Ese mosaico fresco sobre aquel mosaico antiguo (Marqués) 1975
Ese puerto existe (Varela) 1959
Esfinge (Carrión) 1961
Esguince de cintura (Glantz) 1994
Eso y más (Salarrué) 1940
Espace d’un cillement (Alexis) 1959
Espacios métricos (S.Ocampo) 1945
Espada (Salarrué) 1960
Espada encendida (Neruda) 1970
España (Guillén) 1937
España, aparta de mí este cáliz (Vallejo) 1939
España contemporánea (Darío) 1901
España en el corazón (Neruda) 1937
España leal (Aguilera Malta) 1938
España y algunos españoles (Gálvez) 1945
Espantapájaros (Girondo) 1932
Espectros (Meireles) 1919
Espejismo de Juchitán (Yáñez) 1940
Espejo de agua (Huidobro) 1916
Espejo de Lida Sal (Asturias) 1967
Espel de novelas (Solórzano) 1945
Espejo enterrado (Fuentes) 1992
Esperando a Lolo (Vega) 1994
Espejón de oro (Villaverde) 1838
Espíritu de aristocracia (Gálvez) 1924
Espiritualismo español (Gálvez) 1921
Espumias flutuantes (Castro Alves) 1870
Esquecer para lembrar (C.Andrade) 1979
Essas malas vuellenes (Trevisan) 1982
Esta mañana (Benedetti) 1949
Estación de los Desamparados (Lihn) 1982
Estación de máscaras (Uslar Pietri) 1964
Estación violenta (Paz) 1958
Estado equitativo (Lugones) 1932
Estampas de la Biblia (Ibarbourou) 1934
Estancias del olvido (Poniatowska) 1986
Estanque inefable (Carrera Andrade) 1922
Estas estórias (Guimarães Rosa) 1969
Estas páginas mías (Arreola) 1985
Estas ruínas que ves (Ibargüengoitia) 1975
Estatua casera (Biyo Casares) 1936
Este domingo (Donoso) 1966
Este pueblo necesita (Gálvez) 1934
Estética (Vasconcelos) 1933
Estética da vida (Aranha) 1921
Estimados congéneres (Lange) 1968
Estrada do mar (Amado) 1938
Estranha vida banal (Gullar) 1989
Estrecho dudoso (Cardenal) 1966
Estrela da manhã (Bandeira) 1936
Estrela da tarde (Bandeira) 1960
Estrela da vida inteira (Bandeira) 1965
Estudos helénicos (Lugones) 1923–24
Estudos de literatura contemporânea (Romero) 1885
Et les Chiens se taisaient (Césaire) 1956
Etapas da arte contemporânea (Gullar) 1985
Étape de l'évolution haïtienne (Price-Mars) 1929
État de poésie (Depestre) 1980
Eternal Curse on the Reader of These Pages (Puig) 1982
Eterno feminino (Castellanos) 1975
Étincelles (Depestre) 1945
Euridice (Rego) 1947
Europa después de la lluvia (Peri Rossi) 1987
Eva Burgos (Amorim) 1960
Eva Luna (Allende) 1987
Evangelio en Solentiname (Cardenal) 1976–78
Evaristo Carriego (Borges) 1930
Event (Saer) 1995
Evolché (Peri Rossi) 1971
Examen (Cortázar) 1986
Examen de nuestra causa (Girri) 1956
Excursion a Vuelta Abajo (Villaverde) 1891
Exiles (Quiroga) 1987
Existenciales (Girri) 1988
Exorcismos de esti(lo) (Cabrera Infante) 1976
Exóticas (González Prada) 1911
Experiencia literaria (Reyes) 1942
Expiación (Alencar) 1867
Explosion in a Cathedral (Carpentier) 1963
Expresión americana (Lezama Lima) 1957
Éxtasis de la montaña (Herrera y Reissig) 1943
Extracción de la piedra de locura (Pizarnik) 1968
Extravagario (Neruda) 1958
Eyes of the Interred (Asturias) 1973

Fabla salvaje (Vallejo) 1923
Fabricante de deudas (Salazar Bondy) 1964
Fabricante de fantasmas (Arlt) 1950
Fábulas (Gelman) 1971
Fábulas de la garza desangrada (Ferré) 1982
Fabuloso reino de Quito (Carrera Andrade) 1963
Faca no coração (Trevisan) 1975
Faces and Masks (Galeano) 1987
Factores humanos de la cubanidad (F. Ortiz) 1940
Facundo (Sarmiento) 1845
Fair (Arreola) 1977
Falenas (Machado de Assis) 1870
Fall (Sarduy) 1985
Falsas crónicas del sur (Vega) 1991
Falsos demonios (Solórzano) 1966
Falta que ama (C. Andrade) 1969
Fama (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1700
Familia de la noche (Carrera Andrade) 1953
Familia lejana (Fuentes) 1980
Famille des Pitée-Caille (Lhérisson) 1905
Family Album (Alegría) 1990
Family Ties (Lispector) 1972
Family Tree (Glantz) 1991
Fanlights (Marqués) 1971
Fantasías eróticas (Peri Rossi) 1991
Fantasmas aztecas (Sainz) 1982
Fantasmas de carne y hueso (Edwards) 1993
Fantasmas de dos mundos (Uslar Pietri) 1979
Fantasmas del día del león (Galeano) 1967
Fantoches (Roumain) 1931
Fantoches (Solórzano) 1959
Fantoches (Veríssimo) 1932
Fantomas contra los vampiros multi-nacionales (Cortázar) 1989
Farabeuf (Elizondo) 1965
Farda, fardão, camisola de dormir (Amado) 1979
Farewell to the Sea (Arenas) 1986
Farewells (Onetti) 1992
Farsa del amor compradito (Sánchez) 1960
Fascismo sudamericano (Mariátegui) 1975
Fazendeiro do ar e poesía até agora (C. Andrade) 1953
Fe de vida (Loynaz) 1994
Federación Panamericana del Trabajo (Loveira) 1916
Feiras e mafuás (Barreto) 1953
Felicidad con menos pena (Gambaro) 1967
Felicidad, ja ja (Bryce Echenique) 1974
Felicidade clandestina (Lispector) 1971
Federación Panamericana del Trabajo (Loveira) 1916
Feria (Arreola) 1963
Feria (Tablada) 1928
Feria de farsantes (Amorim) 1952
Feria de la vida (Tablada) 1937
Ferrements (Césaire) 1960
Fervor de Buenos Aires (Borges) 1923
Festival of the Greasy Pole (Depestre) 1990
Ficciones (Borges) 1944
Fichas mexicanas (Yáñez) 1945
Fictions (Borges) 1965
Fiestre (Otero Silva) 1939
Fiesta afrocubana del Día de Reyes (F. Ortiz) 1925
Fiesta del hierro (Arlt) 1991
Fiesta en noviembre (Mallea) 1938
Fiesta in November (Mallea) 1969
Figura de paja (García Ponce) 1964
Figuraciones (García Ponce) 1982
Figuras y aspectos de la vida mundial (Mariátegui) 1970
Figuras y figurones (González Prada) 1938
Fijeza (Lezama Lima) 1949
Filadelfía, paraíso de conspiradores (Guzmán) 1933
Filhos da Candinha (M. Andrade) 1943
Filhos pródigos (Telles) 1978
Filigranas (Palma) 1892
Filomena Borges (Azevedo) 1884
Filosofía del entendimiento (Bello) 1881
Filosofícula (Lugones) 1924
Fin de siglo (Pacheco) 1984
Fin del mundo (Neruda) 1969
Fin del viaje (Neruda) 1982
Final del juego (Cortázar) 1956
Final Mist (Bombal) 1982
¡Finis Britannia! (Huidobro) 1923
Firefly (Azuela) 1979
Fiscal (Roa Bastos) 1993
Fish in the Water (Vargas Llosa) 1994
Flama (Vasconcelos) 1959
Flamenco (Sarduy) 1969
Flauta de papel (Bandeira) 1957
Flies (Azuela) 1956
Flights of Victory (Cardenal) 1985
Flor de juegos antiguos (Yáñez) 1942
Flor de Lís (Poniatowska) 1988
Flor de poemas (Meireles) 1972
Flor oculta de la poesía cubana (García Marruz) 1978
Flores del destierro (Martí) 1933
Floresta de los guacamayos (Carrera Andrade) 1964
Florida del Inca (Garcilaso de la Vega) 1605
Florida of the Inca (Garcilaso de la Vega) 1988
Florilège du romanesque haïtien (Alexis) 1959
Florilegio (Tablada) 1899
Flowers from the Volcano (Alegría) 1982.
Fogo morto (Rego) 1943
Folhas de outono (Guimarães) 1883
For Voice (Sarduy) 1985
Fora da pista (Filho) 1978
Forbidden Passion (Peri Rossi) 1993
Força do destino (Piñón) 1977
Foreign Legion (Lispector) 1986
Forma e exégese (Moraes) 1935
Formación de una cultura nacional indoamericana (Arguedas) 1975
Formation ethnique (Price-Mars) 1939
Formigueiro (Gullar) 1991
Forte (Filho) 1965
Four Poplars (Paz) 1985
Fourth World (Eltit) 1995
Fracasados (Azuela) 1908
Fragmentos a su imán (Lezama Lima) 1977
Fragrance of Guava (García Márquez) 1983
Francisco y Francisca (Cabrera) 1976
Fräulein (M. Andrade) 1933
Friviolamente (García Calderón) 1908
From Cuba with a Song (Sarduy) 1972
From Eve’s Rib (G. Belli) 1989
From Nicaragua with Love (Cardenal) 1986
Frontera de cristal (Fuentes) 1995
Frutos de mi tierra (Carrasquilla) 1896
Frutos del árbol de la libertad (Taboada Terán) 1983
Fuego de Prometeo (Fernández de Lizárdy) 1811
Fuente viva (Barnet) 1983
Fuerte es el silencio (Poniatowska) 1980
Fuerzas extrañas (Lugones) 1906
Fuga de Miranda (Uslar Pietri) 1958
Fugues (Alegría) 1993
Fulano de Tal (F.Hernández) 1925
Fulgar y muerte de Joaquín Murieta (Neruda) 1967
Fully Empowered (Neruda) 1975
Fundación de la imagen (Morejón) 1988
Fundador (Piñón) 1969
Funerales de la Mamá Grande (García Márquez) 1962
Funny Dirty Little War (Soriano) 1986
Furia (S. Ocampo) 1959
Furias (Piñera) 1942.
Furor matutino (Agustín) 1985
Fútbol a sol y sombra (Galeano) 1995

Gabriel Andaral (Mallea) 1971
Gabriel García Márquez and the Invention of America (Fuentes) 1987
Gabriela, Clove and Cinnamon (Amado) 1962,
Gabriela, cravo e canela (Amado) 1959
Gaby Brimmer (Poniatowska) 1979
Galería de místicos y de insurgentes (Carrera Andrade) 1959
Gallego (Barnet) 1981
Gallina degollada (Quiroga) 1925
Gallo de oro (Rulfo) 1980
Games for Actors and Non-Actors (Boal) 1992.
Ganadores (Uslar Pietri) 1980
Ganarse la muerte (Gambaro) 1976
Garabombo the Invisible (Scorza) 1994
Garatuja (Alencar) 1873
Garden Next Door (Donoso) 1992,
Garimpeiro (Guimarães) 1872
 Gatita (D’Halmar) 1917
Gato (García Ponce) 1984
 Gato eficaz (Valenzuela) 1972
Gato malhado e a Andorinha Sinhá (Amado) 1976
Gato preto em campo de neve (Veríssimo) 1941
Gaúcho (Alencar) 1870
Gaúcho de Los Cerrillos (Gálvez) 1931
Gaúcho Martin Fierro (J.Hernández) 1872
Gazapo (Sainz) 1965
Genealogías (Glantz) 1981
Generaciones y semblanzas (Paz) 1987
General en su laberinto (García Márquez) 1989
General History of Peru (Garcilaso de la Vega) 1966
General in His Labyrinth (García Márquez) 1990
General López, the Cuban Patriot (Villaverde) 1851
General Quiroga (Gálvez) 1932
Generales y doctores (Loveira) 1920
Género negro (Giardinelli) 1984
Genesis (Galeano) 1985
Genio y figura de José Enrique Rodó (Benedetti) 1968
Genio y figuras de Guadalajara (Yáñez) 1942
Gente de la ciudad (Edwards) 1961
Gente e bichos (Veríssimo) 1956
Geografía de la novela (Fuentes) 1993
Geografía infructuosa (Neruda) 1972
Geografías (Benedetti) 1984
Georgic of the Tropics (Bello) 1981
Gerardo (Larreta) 1953
Gerbe de sang (Depestre) 1946
Gerbe pour deux amis (Morisseau-Leroy) 1945
Germen (Taboada Terán) 1950
Gestos (Sarduy) 1963
Gethsemani, Ky (Cardenal) 1960
Gilberto poeta (Freyre) 1980
Girl from Ipanema (Moraes) 1982
Girl in the Photograph (Telles) 1982
Giroflê, Giroflá (Meireles) 1956
Glass Box (Ferré) 1986
Globo de colores (Uslar Pietri) 1975
Gloria de don Ramiro (Larreta) 1908
Glory of Don Ramiro (Larreta) 1924
Glosa (Saer) 1986
Glosario de afronegrismos (F. Ortiz) 1924
Godos, insurgentes y visionarios (Uslar Pietri) 1986
Goig (Bryce Echenique) 1987
Gold of the Tigers (Borges) 1977
Golden Harvest (Amado) 1992
Golden UFOs (Cardenal) 1992
Gonzaga ou a revolução de Minas (Castro Alves) 1875
Good Conscience (Fuentes) 1961
Goodbyes (Onetti) 1990
Gorda de porcelana (Allende) 1984
Gordos e magros (Rego) 1942
Gospel in Solentiname (Cardenal) 1978–82
Gotán (Gelman) 1962
Gouverneurs de la rosée (Roumain) 1944
Gracia (Gambaro) 1972
Gracias por el fuego (Benedetti) 1965
Grafitos (González Prada) 1937
Grafógrafo (Elizondo) 1972
Gramática castellana (Bello) 1937
Gramática de la lengua castellana (Bello) 1847
Gran familia de los Laris (Gálvez) 1973
Gran literatura ecuatoriana del 30 (Adoum) 1984
Gran señor y rajadiablos (Barrios) 1948
Gran Serafín (Bioy Casares) 1967
Gran zoo (Guillén) 1967
Grande Argentina (Lugones) 1930
Grande arte (Fonseca) 1983
Grande sertão: veredas (Guimarães Rosa) 1956
Grandeza (Carrasquilla) 1910
Grandeza de los oficios (Mistral) 1979
Grata compañía (Reyes) 1948
Grave with No Name (Onetti) 1992
Graveyard of the Angels (Arenas) 1987
Great Zoo (Guillén) 1973
Green House (Vargas Llosa) 1968
Green Pope (Asturias) 1971
Grenada Notebook (Morejón) 1984
Gringo viejo (Fuentes) 1985
Grito de libertad en el pueblo de Dolores (Fernández de Lizardi) 1827
Grotesco, inmigración y fracaso (Viñas) 1973
Gruta del silencio (Huidobro) 1913
Guagua aérea (Sánchez) 1994
Guajiro (Villaverde) 1890
Guaracha del Macho Camacho (Sánchez) 1976
Guarani (Alencar) 1857
Guásinton (Cuadra) 1938
Guatemala (Galeano) 1967
Guatemalan Sociology (Asturias) 1977
Guayasamín (Adoum) 1996
Guerra conjugal (Trevisan) 1969
Guerra de los hermanos (Glantz) 1982
Guerra del fin del mundo (Vargas Llosa) 1981
Guerra del tiempo (Carpentier) 1958
Guerra dos Mascates (Alencar) 1873–74
Guerra gaucha (Lugones) 1905
Guerra interior (Mallea) 1963
Guerra silenciosa (Scorza) 1970–79
Guerrilla de Mexico (Guzmán) 1915
Guesa errante (Sousândrade) 1874–77
Guía de la joven poesía ecuatoriana (Carrera Andrade) 1939
Guía de Ouro Preto (Bandeira) 1938
Guía-mapa de Gabriel Arcano (Piñón) 1961
Guía práctico, histórico e sentimental da cidade da Recife (Freyre) 1934
Guirmalda con amores (Biyo Casares) 1959
Guirmalda del silencio (Carrera Andrade) 192.6
Guitarra (Echeverría) 1842,
Guitarra indócil (V.Parra) 1978
Gunther Stapenhorst (Arreola) 1946

Há uma gota de sangue em cada poema (M.Andrade) 1917
Ha vuelto la Diosa Ambarina (Westphalen) 1989
Habana para un infante difunto (Cabrera Infante) 1979
Habla el algarrabo (V.Ocampo) 1959
Hablador (Vargas Llosa) 1987
Hablando en plata (Poniatowska) 1987
Hablar de poesía (García Marruz) 1986
Hace tiempos (Carrasquilla) 1935–36
Hacedor (Borges) 1960
Hacia el sur (Gelman) 1982,
Hacia la liberación del lector latinoamericano (Dorfman) 1984
Hadriana dans tous mes rêves (Depestre) 1988
Haiti chérie (Condé) 1987
Hallali (Huidobro) 1918
Hallazgo y otros cuentos del mar (Lillo) 1956
Hallucinated City (M. Andrade) 1968
Hallucinations (Arenas) 1971
Hampa afro-cubana (F. Ortiz) 1906
Han tocado a degüello (Gálvez) 1951
Hand and the Glove (Machado de Assis) 1970
Happytown (Morisseau-Leroy) 1982.
Hard Rain (Dorfman) 1990
Harp and the Shadow (Carpentier) 1990
Harpas selvagens (Sousândrade) 1857
Hasta aquí (Benedetti) 1974
Hasta no verte, Jesús mío (Poniatowska) 1969
Hay que sonreír (Valenzuela) 1966
He Who Searches (Valenzuela) 1979
Heartbreak Tango (Puig) 1973
Hechicero (Solórzano) 1955
Hechizo de Tomayquichua (López Albújar) 1943
Hecho a mano (Walsh) 1965
Hechos y leyendas de nuestra América (Aguilera Malta) 1975
Hechos y relaciones (Gelman) 1980
Helena (Machado de Assis) 1876
Helicópteros (Dalton) 1980
Helicopters in the Kingdom of Peru (Cisneros) 1981
Hell Has No Limits (Donoso) 1972
Heptamerón (Marechal) 1966
Heraldos negros (Vallejo) 1919
Hérémakhonon (Condé) 1976
Herencia (Matto de Turner) 1895
Heréticos (Valenzuela) 1967
Heritage of Quincas Borba (Machado de Assis) 1954
Hermano asno (Barrios) 1922
Hermano Quiroga (Martínez Estrada) 1957
Hermosas (G. Rojas) 1991
Héroe de las mujeres (Bioy Casares) 1978
Heroic and Creative Meaning of Socialism (Mariátegui) 1995
Heroínas mexicanas (Fernández de Lizardi) 1955
Heróis e vilões no romance brasileiro (Freyre) 1979
Heterodoxia (Sábato) 1953
Hidalgo (Scorza) 1956
Hidalgo conquistador (Acosta de Samper) 1907
Hidalgos de Zamora (Acosta de Samper) 1898
Hidden Life (Dourado) 1969
Hiedra (Villaurrutia) 1941
Hiel nuestra de cada día (Sánchez) 1976
High Art (Fonseca) 1986
High Noon in Latin America (Fuentes) 1983
Highroad of Saint James (Carpentier) 1970
Hija de Jefte (Jaimes Freyre) 1889
Hijo de hombre (Roa Bastos) 1960
Hijo de la pampa (Lugones) 1916
Hijo de ladrón (M.Rojas) 1951
Hijo pródigo (Arévalo Martínez) 1956
Hijos del aire (Paz) 1981
Hijos del limo (Paz) 1974
Hills of Massabielle (Condé) 1991
Hijos del aire (Paz) 1981
Hijos del aire (Paz) 1974
Hills of Massabielle (Condé) 1991
Hijas del aire (Paz) 1981
Hijas del limo (Paz) 1974
Hills of Massabielle (Condé) 1991
Holandesen en America (Acosta de Samper) 1888
Holy Place (Fuentes) 1972
Holy Saturday (Martinez Estrada) 1988
Holy Smoke (Cabrera Infante) 1985
Holy Wednesday (Galvez) 1934
Homage to the American Indians (Cardenal) 1973
Hombre de los ojos azules (Galvez) 1928
Hombre de paja (Buitrago) 1964
Hombre planetario (Carrera Andrade) 1959
Hombre que hablaba de Octavio de Cadiz (Bryce Echenique) 1985
Hombre que lo tenia todo, todo, todo (Asturias) 1981
Hombre que parecia un caballo (Arevalo Martinez) 1915
Hombre sensible (Arlt) 1991
Hombre y sus sueños (Marques) 1948
Hombres de a caballo (Vinas) 1967
Hombres de maiz (Asturias) 1949
Hombres del hombre (Barrios) 1950
Hombres del sur (M.Rojas) 1926
Hombres en soledad (Galvez) 1938
Hombres en su siglo (Paz) 1984
Hombres y engranajes (Sabato) 1951
Home is the Sailor (Amado) 1964
Homem (Azevedo) 1887
Homem de branco (Filho) 1987
Homem de fevereiro ou marzo (Fonseca) 1973
Homem sem profissao (O.Andrade) 1953
Homen, cultura, e trôpico (Freyre) 1962.
Homenaje (Mutis) 1986
Homenaje a Angel Cuadra (Arenas) 1981
Homenaje a los indios americanos (Cardenal) 1969
Homenaje a W.C.Williams (Girri) 1981
Homens, seres e coisas (Rego) 1952
Homero en Cuernavaca (Reyes) 1949
Hondero entusiasta (Neruda) 1933
Hondura (Arevalo Martinez) 1947
Honradas (Carrión) 1917
Hopscotch (Cortazar) 1966
Hora da estrela (Lispector) 1977
Hora de las ventanas iluminadas (Carrera Andrade) 1937
Hora de todos (Arteola) 1954
Hora O (Cardenal) 1960
Horas de Burgos (Reyes) 1932
Horas de lucha (Gonzalez Prada) 1908
Horas de sol (Agustin) 1994
Horas doradas (Lugones) 1922
Horas nuas (Telles) 1989
Horizon carré (Huidobro) 1917
Horizontes y bocacalles (Amorim) 1926
Horno (Cuadra) 1932
Horse and His Shadow (Amorim) 1943
Hortensias (F.Hernández) 1950
Hostigante verano de los dioses (Buitrago) 1963
Hour of the Star (Lispector) 1986
House in the Country (Donoso) 1984
House in the Sand (Neruda) 1990
House of Mist (Bombal) 1947
House of the Spirits (Allende) 1985
House on the Beach (García Ponce) 1994
How to Read Donald Duck (Dorfman) 1975
Huairapamushcas (Icaza) 1948
Huasipungo (Icaza) 1934
Huellas (Reyes) 1922
Huerto cerrado (Bryce Echenique) 1968
Huerto cerrado (Zorrilla de San Martin) 1900
Huésped de mi tiempo (Alegría) 1961
Humaitá (Gálvez) 1929
Human Poems (Vallejo) 1969
Humanario (Cortázar) 1976
Huracán (F.Ortiz) 1947
Hydra Head (Fuentes) 1978

I Dreamt the Snow was Burning (Skármeta) 1985
I the Supreme (Roa Bastos) 1986
I, Tituba, Black Witch of Salem (Condé) 1992
Ilaí García (Machado de Assis) 1878
Ida y vuelta (Benedetti) 1963
Ideas y críticas (Barrett) 1915
Ideología y política (Mariátegui) 1969
Idioma de los argentinos (Borges) 1928
If Poetry is to be Written Right (Lihn) 1977
Ifigenia (T.de la Parra) 1924
Ifigenia cruel (Reyes) 1924
Ilha maldita (Guimarães) 1879
III-Fated Peregrinations of Fray Servando (Arenas) 1987
Ilona llega con la lluvia (Mutis) 1987
Imagen (Arreola) 1984
Imagen pasajera (Asturias) 1959
Imagen primera (García Ponce) 1963
Imagen y perspectivas de la narrativa latinoamericana actual (Roa Bastos) 1979
Imágenes y visiones (García Ponce) 1989
Imaginación y violencia en América (Dorfman) 1970
Imaginações pecaminosas (Dourado) 1982
Imaginary Zoo (Borges) 1969
Impenetrable (Gambaro) 1984
Imperio jesuítico (Lugones) 1904
Importancia de llamarse Daniel Santos (Sánchez) 1988
Imposible equilibrio (Giardinelli) 1995
Imprecaciones (Scorza) 1955
Impresiones y sensaciones (Darío) 1925
Impressões de leitura (Barreto) 1956
Impuras (Carrión) 1919
Impurezas do branco (C.Andrade) 1974
In Cuba (Cardenal) 1974
In Evil Hour (García Márquez) 1980
In Praise of Darkness (Borges) 1974
In Praise of the Stepmother (Vargas Llosa) 1990
In Search of the Present (Paz) 1990
Incendio de la Compañía (Bello) 1841
Incidente em Antares (Veríssimo) 1971
Incitación al Nixoncidio y alabanza de la revolución chilena (Neruda) 1973
Incredíble y triste historia de la cándida Eréndira (García Márquez) 1972
Indagações de hoje (Gullar) 1989
Indes (Glissant) 1956
Indicios pánicos (Peri Rossi) 1970
Indies (Glissant) 1992
Indios, ejército y frontera (Viñas) 1982
Indios en rebelión (Taboada Terán) 1968
Índole (Matto de Turner) 1892
Indología (Vasconcelos) 1926
Industrias de Atenas (Lugones) 1919
Inés (Garro) 1995
Infância (Ramos) 1945
Infante’s Inferno (Cabrera Infante) 1984
Infierno (Martínez Moreno) 1988
Infierno de todos (Pitol) 1965
Infierno musical (Pizarnik) 1971
Infierno negro (Aguilera Malta) 1967
Infierno tan temido (Onetti) 1962
Infinite Plan (Allende) 1993
Influencia de España en la formación de la nacionalidad centroamericana (Arévalo Martínez) 1943
Influencia del Africa en las literaturas antillanas (Depestre) 1972
Información para extranjeros (Gambaro) 1987
Information for Foreigners (Gambaro) 1992
Informe de Brodie (Borges) 1970
Informe del cielo y del infierno (S.Ocampo) 1970
Informe personal sobre la situación (Adoum) 1973
Inframundo (Rulfo) 1980;
Ingleses (Freyre) 1942
Inhabited Woman (G.Belli) 1994
Inmaculada (García Ponce) 1989
Inmensas preguntas celestes (Cisneros) 1992
Inmersos en el silencio (Marqués) 1976
Inmorales (Loveira) 1919
Innocent Erendira (García Márquez) 1978
Inquietud del rosal (Stormi) 1916
Inquisiciones (Borges) 1925
Inseguridad de la vida obrera (Gálvez) 1913
Inside the Monster (Martí) 1975
Insônia (Ramos) 1947
Instante y revelación (Paz) 1982
Instantes del Perú (Garcia Calderón) 1941
Instituciones de derecho romano (Bello) 1843
Insulas extrañas (Westphalen) 1933
Insurgências e ressurgências atuais (Freyre) 1983
Insurrección (Skármeta) 1982
Insurrección del sud (Echeverría) 1849
Insurrection (Skármeta) 1983
Integração portuguesa nos trópicos (Freyre) 1958
Intention poétique (Glissant) 1969
Interlunio (Girondo) 1937
Interpretación de Rubén Darío (Carrera Andrade) 1964
Interpretaciones hispanoamericanas (Carrera Andrade) 1967
 Interrupciones (Gelman) 1989
Intervenciones y pretexto (Glantz) 1981
Íntima (Agustini) 1907
Intimidades (Silva) 1977
Inundación castálida (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1689
Invasion (Piglia) 1967
Invención de Morel (Bioy Casares) 1940
Invención y la trama (Bioy Casares) 1988
Inventando que sueño (Agustín) 1968
Inventario (Arreola) 1976
Inventario de asombros (Diego) 1983
Invention of Morel (Bioy Casares) 1964
Invincible Memory (Ribeiro) 1989
Invitación (García Ponce) 1972
Invitación a la muerte (Villaurrutia) 1944
Invitadas (S.Ocampo) 1961
Iphigenia (T.de la Parra) 1994
Iracema (Alencar) 1865
Irás y no volverás (Pacheco) 1973
Ironia e piedade (Bilac) 1916
Irremediablemente (Storni) 1919
Isabel viendo llover en Macondo (García Márquez) 1967
Isla a mediocidad (Cortázar) 1971
Isla de güijes (Barnet) 1964
Isla de Robinson (Uslar Pietri) 1981
Isla desierta (Arlt) 1965
Isla en peso (Piñera) 1943
Isla Negra (Neruda) 1970
Isla virgen (Aguilera Malta) 1942
Islas a la deriva (Pacheco) 1976
Islas Marias (Guzmán) 1959
Ismaelillo (Martí) 1882
Israel em abril (Veríssimo) 1969
Itching Parrot (Fernández de Lizardi) 1942.
Itinerario (Paz) 1993
Itinerario (Sábato) 1969
Itinerário de Passárgada (Bandeira) 1954
Itinerarios del insomnio (Cabrera) 1977

Jacob y el otro (Onetti) 1965
Jadinkreyol (Morisseau-Leroy) 1977
Jaguar (Aguilera Malta) 1977
Jail Prison Memoirs (Ramos) 1974
Janela do caos (Mendes) 1949
Jardim noturno (Moraes) 1993
Jardim selvagem (Telles) 1965
Jardín (Loynaz) 1951
Jardín de al lado (Donoso) 1981
Jardín de invierno (Neruda) 1974
Jardín de senderos que se bifurcan (Borges) 1942
Jardines de Academo (Jaimes Freyre)
Jarro de flores (Tablada) 1922
Jaurú (Piglia) 1967
Jauría (Viñas) 1974
Jefes (Vargas Llosa) 1959
Jerónimo y su almohada (Larreta) 1944
Jesuit (Alencar) 1919
Jesuita (Alencar) 1867
Jeux pour acteurs (Boal) 1989
Jinete insomne (Scorza) 1978
João Boa-Morte, cabra marcado p’ra morrer (Gullar) 1962
João Miguel (Queiroz) 1932
Jogador de sinaça e mais historinhas (Queiroz) 1980
Jornadas de agonía (Gálvez) 1929
Jorobadito (Arlt) 1933
José Trigo (Paso) 1966
Journal d’un animal marin (Depestre) 1964
Journey Back to the Source (Carpentier) 1970
Joven de la flecha de oro (Villaverde) 1841
Juan Bobo y la Dama de Occidente (Marqués) 1956
Juan Carlos Castagnino (Amorim) 1945
Juan Criollo (Loveira) 1927
Juan Soriano y su obra (Fuentes) 1984
Juana Lucero (D’Halmar) 1902
Juárez (Asturias) 1972
Jubiabá (Amado) 1935
Júbilo y fuga (Ballagas) 1931
Juchitán de las mujeres (Poniatowska) 1989
Juego en que andamos (Gelman) 1959
Juegos (Roá Bastos) 1979
Juegos alegóricos (Girri) 1993
Juegos de agua (Loynaz) 1947
Juegos de Carolina y Gaspar (Roá Bastos) 1994
Juegos florales (Pitol) 1982
Juegos peligrosos (Orozco) 1962
Juerga de los polichinelas (Arlt) 1991
Juguete rabioso (Arlt) 1926
Juicios sumarios (Castellanos) 1966
Junta de sombras (Reyes) 1949
Juntacadáveres (Onetti) 1964
Just Before Falling Asleep (F.Hernández) 1977
Just Like a Woman (Castellanos) 1984

Kasamansa (Morisseau-Leroy) 1977
Kathie and the Hippopotamus (Vargas Llosa) 1990
Kathie y el hipopótamo (Vargas Llosa) 1983
Kenningar (Borges) 1933
Kingdom of this World (Carpentier) 1957
Kiss of the Spider Woman (Puig) 1979
Knife All Blade (Melo Neto) 1980
Knights of the Cape (Palma) 1945
Koeko, Iyawó, Aprende Novicia (Cabrera) 1980
Konfidenz (Dorfman) 1995

La que buscaba Don Juan (Larreta) 1937
Laberinto de amor (Marechal) 1935
Laberinto de fortuna (Uslar Pietri) 1962–64
Laberinto de la soledad (Paz) 1950
Labyrinth of Solitude (Paz) 1961
Labyrinths (Borges) 1962
Laços de família (Lispector) 1960
Ladera dorada (Yáñez) 1978
Ladera este (Paz) 1969
Lado de la sombra (Bioy Casares) 1962
Laferrière (Viñas) 1965
Lagar (Mistral) 1954
Lagar II (Mistral) 1992
Lágrima de mujer (Azevedo) 1879
Laguna de los nenúfares (V.Ocampo) 1926
Laguna sagrada de San Joaquín (Cabrera) 1973
Lámpara en el molino (D’Halmar) 1914
Lampe d’argile (Larreta) 1915
Lampião (Queiroz) 1953
Lanchas en la bahía (M.Rojas) 1932
Land of Angels (Cisneros) 1985
Lenguidez (Storni) 1920
Lanzallamas (Arlt) 1931
Lanzas coloradas (Uslar Pietri) 1931
Largo atardecer del caminante (Posse) 1992
Largo da Palma (Filho) 1981
Last Song of Manuel Sendero (Dorfman) 1987
Last Waltz in Santiago (Dorfman) 1988
Latin America (Fuentes) 1985
Latinoamérica (Asturias) 1968
Latitudes (Carrera Andrade) 1934
Law of Love (Esquivel) 1996
Lázaro (Aguilera Malta) 1941
Leaf Storm (García Márquez) 1972
Lean Lands (Yáñez) 1968
Lecturas para mujeres (Mistral) 1923
Leer y escribir (Martínez Estrada) 1969
Legião estrangeira (Lispector) 1964
Léguas da promissão (Filho) 1968
Lendas e romances (Guimarães) 1871
Lengua de pájaro (Morejón) 1971
Lengua en la mano (Glantz) 1983
Lengua sagrada de los ñáñigos (Cabrera) 1988
Lenguaje de Buenos Aires (Borges) 1963
Lenguas de diamante (Ibarbourou) 1919
Leonor de Mendonça (Gonçalves Dias) 1847
Leprosorio (Arenas) 1989
Letra e (Monterroso) 1987
Letra y solfa (Carpentier) 1975
Letras de emergencia (Benedetti) 1974
Letras de la Nueva España (Reyes) 1948
Letras del continente mestizo (Benedetti) 1967
Letras y hombres de Venezuela (Uslar Pietri) 1948
Letrillas (González Prada) 1975
Letter to a King (Guaman Poma de Ayala) 1978
Letter to Maurice Thorez (Césaire) 1957
Lettre a Maurice Thorez (Césaire) 1956
Lettre d’amour (Moro) 1944
Ley de amor (Esquivel) 1995
Ley de Herodes (Ibargüengoitia) 1967
Leyenda patria (Zorrilla de San Martín) 1879
Leyendas de Guatemala (Asturias) 1930
Leyes de la versificación castellana (Jaimes Freyre) 1912
Lézarde (Glissant) 1958
Liberalismo mexicano en pensamiento y acción (Guzmán) 1947–50
Liberalismo y Jacobinismo (Rodó) 1906
Libertad bajo palabra (Paz) 1949
Libertarias (González Prada) 1938
Libertinagem (Bandeira) 1930
¡Libranos de todo mal! (Buitrago) 1989
Librito de cuentos y las conversaciones (Villaverde) 1847
Libro blanco (Agustini) 1907
Libro de arena (Borges) 1975
Libro de barro (Varela) 1993
Libro de Dios y los húngaros (Cisneros) 1978
Libro de las décimas (Guillén) 1980
Libro de los abrazos (Galeano) 1989
Libro de los mangleros (Aguilera Malta) 1929
Libro de los paisajes (Lugones) 1917
Libro de los seres imaginarios (Borges) 1967
Libro de los sonetos (Guillén) 1984
Libro de Manuel (Cortázar) 1973
Libro de mis primos (Peri Rossi) 1969
Libro de preguntas (Neruda) 1974
Libro de quizás y de quién sabe (Diego) 1989
Libro de Ruth (Zorrilla de San Martín) 1928
Libro del Buen Salvaje (Cisneros) 1994
Libro del destierro (Carrera Andrade) 1970
Libro fiel (Lugones) 1912
Libro levemente odioso (Dalton) 1988
Libro que no muerde (Valenzuela) 1980
Libro rojo para Lenin (Dalton) 1986
Libro sin tapas (F. Hernández) 1929
Libros y su misión en la liberación e integración de la América Latina (Sábato) 1978
Lição de coisas (C. Andrade) 1962
Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants (Sarmiento) 1868
Lightning of August (Ibargüengoitia) 1986
Ligia Cruz (Carrasquilla) 1926
Like the Night (Carpentier) 1970
Like Water for Chocolate (Esquivel) 1993
Lilus Kikus (Poniatowska) 1954
Lima la horrible (Salazar Bondy) 1964
Limaduras de Hephaestos (Lugones) 1910
Limonero real (Saer) 1974
Lincheta tarado (Trevisan) 1980
Línea de fuego (G. Belli) 1978
Línea de la vida (Girri) 1957
Linguística general (Peri Rossi) 1979
Líneas tortas (Ramos) 1962
Línvera (Larreta) 1932
Li-Po (Tablada) 1920
Lira dos cinqüent’anos (Bandeira) 1940
Lira paulistana (M. Andrade) 1946
Lírica de percepciones (Girri) 1983
Lisandro (Viñas) 1971
Literatura argentina y realidad política (Viñas) 1964
Literatura brasileira e a crítica moderna (Romero) 1880
Literatura en la revolución y la revolución en la literatura (Cortázar, Vargas Llosa) 1970
Literatura hispano-americana (Bandeira) 1949
Literatura sin atributos, Santa Fe (Saer) 1986
Literatura uruguaya del siglo veinte (Benedetti) 1963
Literatura y conciencia política en America Latina (Carpentier) 1969
Literaturas germánicas medievales (Borges) 1966
Lituma en los Andes (Vargas Llosa) 1993
Lvívida luz (Castellanos) 1960
Livro de uma sogra (Azevedo) 1895
Lizard’s Smile (Ribeiro) 1994
Lizard’s Tail (Valenzuela) 1983
Llama (Arévalo Martínez) 1934
Llama blanca (García Calderón) 1924
Llama doble (Paz) 1993
Llano en llamas (Rulfo) 1953
Llegó Margó (Ibargüengoitia) 1956
Lo amargo por dulce (S. Ocampo) 1962,
Lo demás es silencio (Monterroso) 1978
Lo inmorbible (Saer) 1993
Lo propio, lo de todos (Girri) 1980
Lo que son los yerbales (Barrett) 1910
Loco amor viene (Ibargüengoitia) 1961
Loco de los balcones (Vargas Llosa) 1993
Locura de ser santo (Gálvez) 1967
Loma del Ángel (Arenas) 1987
Longo sonho do futuro (Barreto) 1993
Looking at the Mona Lisa (Castellanos) 1981
Loores de Nuestra Señora (Ibarbourou) 1934
Lope de Aguirre (Ibarbourou) 1979
Los de abajo (Azuela) 1916
Los que aman, odian (S.Ocampo) 1946
Lost Steps (Carpentier) 1956
Love (Cardenal) 1974
Love in Practice (Cardenal) 1977
Love in the Time of Cholera (García Márquez) 1988
Love is Repaid by Love (Martí) 1947
Love Till Death (Moro) 1973
Luanda, Beira, Bahia (Filho) 1971
Lucas Procópio (Dourado) 1984
Lucha hasta el alba (Roa Bastos) 1979
Luchino Visconti (Elizondo) 1963
Lúcia McCartney (Fonseca) 1969
Luciérnaga (Azuela) 1932
Luciola (Alencar) 1862
Lugar de origen (Carrera Andrade) 1945
Lugar sin límites (Donoso) 1966
Luis Greve, muerto (Bioy Casares) 1937
Luisa en el país de la realidad (Alegría) 1987
Luisa en Realityland (Alegría) 1987
Lujuria (Eltit) 1995
Lumpérica (Eltit) 1983
Luna caliente (Giardinelli) 1983
Luna de enfrente (Borges) 1925
Luna de miel (Gálvez) 1920
Luna se hizo con agua (Amorim) 1944
Luna silvestre (Paz) 1933
Lunario sentimental (Lugones) 1909
Lunas de oro (Herrera y Reissig) 1915
Lus e o trópico (Freyre) 1961
Lustre (Lispector) 1946
Luta corporal (Gullar) 1954
Luz de día (Varela) 1963
Luz do chão (Gullar) 1978
Luz es un abismo (Orozco) 1993
Luz que regresa (Elizondo) 1985
Luz y luna (Poniatowska) 1994

Maçã no escuro (Lispector) 1961
Macho Camacho’s Beat (Sánchez) 1980
Macunaima (M.Andrade) 1928
Madeira feita cruz (Piñón) 1963
Madera quemada (Roa Bastos) 1967
Madero-Chantecler (Tablada) 1910
Madrid (Aguilera Malta) 1936
Madrigal en ciudad (Gambaro) 1963
Mãe (Alencar) 1862
Maestra normal (Gálvez) 1914
Mafuá do Malungo (Bandeira) 1948
Magdalena peruana (Bryce Echenique) 1986
Magisterio y niño (Mistral) 1979
Mahagony (Glissant) 1987
Maitreya (Sarduy) 1978
Making Waves (Vargas Llosa) 1996
Mal metafísico (Gálvez) 1916
Mala hora (García Márquez) 1962
Mala yerba (Azuela) 1909
Maladrón (Asturias) 1969
Malas costumbres (Viñas) 1963
Malasangre (Gambaro) 1984
Malazarte (Aranha) 1911
Maldición (Azuela) 1955
Maldición eterna a quien lea estas páginas (Puig) 1980
Maldito amor (Ferré) 1986
Malemort (Glissant) 1975
Malhora (Azuela) 1923
Malinche, sus padres y sus hijos (Glantz) 1994
Mamá Blanca’s Souvenirs (T.de la Parra) 1959
Mamá X (T.de la Parra) 1923
Mancha de Don Quijote (D’Halmar) 1934
Manchay Puytu, el amor que quiso ocultar Dios (Taboada Terán) 1977
Manifestes (Huidobro) 1925
Manifesto antropófago (O. Andrade) 1928
Maniobras (Viñas) 1974
Man-Making Words (Guillén) 1972
Mano desasida (Canto a Macchu Picchu) (Adán) 1964
Mano en el retrato (Lange) 1969
Mano infinita (J.L. Ortíz) 1951
Manos de Dios (Solórzano) 1957
Manos de Mamá (Campobello) 1949
Manos del día (Neruda) 1968
Mansión de Araucaima (Mutis) 1973
Mansions and the Shanties (Freyre) 1963
Manual de zoología fantástica (Borges) 1957
Manual for Manuel (Cortázar) 1984
Manuel Aldano (Arévalo Martínez) 1922
Manuel d’histoire a l’usage des écoles de la republique (Lhérisson) 1907
Manuela (Aguilera Malta) 1967
Manuscrit de mon ami (Hibbert) 1923
Mão e a luva (Machado de Assis) 1874
Maqroll (Mutis) 1992
Mar absoluto (Meireles) 1945
Mar morto (Amado) 1936
Mar que es el morir (Otero Silva) 1965
Mar y las campanas (Neruda) 1974
Mar y sus pescaditos (Castellanos) 1975
Marble Dance (Telles) 1986
Marcel Duchamp (Paz) 1968
Marcela (Azuela) 1932
Marchanta (Azuela) 1944
Marco zero (O. Andrade) 1943
María (Isaacs) 1867
María de mi corazón (García Márquez) 1983
María Luisa (Azuela) 1907
Mariana o el alba (Marqués) 1965
Marilyn Monroe (Cardenal) 1975
Marquês de Caxias (Alencar) 1867
Marquesa de Yolombó (Carrasquilla) 1928
Marronage et le vaudou (Lhérisson) 1905
Martin Fierro (Borges) 1953
Martir del Sacramento San Hermenegildo (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1692
Mary My Dearest (García Márquez) 1983
Más acerca de la poesía mulata (F.Ortiz) 1936
Mas all érótico (Paz) 1993
Más allá (Quiroga) 1935
Más allá de las islas (Yánez Cossío) 1980
Más que señora humana (C.Belli) 1986
Mascar (Dorfman) 1988
Máscara del que duerme (Salazar Bondy) 1949
Máscaras (Dorfman) 1988
Más que señora humana (C.Belli) 1986
Masquerilla y trébol (Storni) 1938
Masques et visages (Hibbert) 1910
Massacre in Mexico (Poniatowska) 1975
Masters and the Slaves (Freyre) 1946
Masters of the Dew (Roumain) 1974
Mât de cocagne (Depeste) 1979
Matadero (Echeverría) 1871
Matadores de hormigas (Sarduy) 1978
Mataláché (López Albújar) 1928
Match Ball (Skármeta) 1989
Maten al león (Ibargüengoitia) 1969
Matéria de carpinteria (Dourado) 1975
Materia de testamento (G.Rojas) 1988
Materia memorable (Castellanos) 1969
Materias (Mistral) 1978
Matrimonio inconveniente (Mera) 1893
Maurisco ou os paulistas em São João del Rei (Guimarães) 1877
Máximas y mínimas de sapiencia pedestre (Westphalen) 1982
Mayapán (Cardenal) 1968
Mayor (Saer) 1976
Mayor General Hablará de Teogonía (Triana) 1962.
Me mataron entre todos (Gálvez) 1962.
Mea Cuba (Cabrera Infante) 1992,
Mea culpa (Solórzano) 1992.
Medea en el espejo (Triana) 1962.
Media vida deslumbrados (Icaza) 1942.
Medicina popular de Cuba (Cabrera) 1984
Médicos, doentes e contextos sociais (Freyre) 1983
Medio pollito (Ferré) 1976
Meditación en el umbral (Castellanos) 1985
Meditación en la costa (Mallea) 1939
Meditation on the Threshold (Castellanos) 1988
Megañon (Marechal) 1970
Mejor es Meneallo (Benedetti) 1961
Mejor que el vino (M. Rojas) 1958
Memoirs of Pancho Villa (Guzmán) 1965
Memorandum on Martinique (Césaire) 1947
Memoria del fuego (Galeano) 1982–86
Memoria sobre la pampa y los gauchos (Bioy Casares) 1970
Memoria y olvido (Paso) 1994
Memorial de Aires (Machado de Assis) 1908
Memorial de Isla Negra (Neruda) 1964
Memorial de María Moura (Queiroz) 1992,
Memorias (Vasconcelos) 1947
Memoria del fuego (Galeano) 1982–86
Memórias de cocina y bodega (Reyes) 1953
Memorias de España, 1937 (Garro) 1992.
Memórias de Lázaro (Filho) 1952
Memorias de Mamá Blanca (T.de la Parra) 1929
Memorias de Pancho Villa (Guzmán) 1938–40
Memórias de un condenado (Azevedo) 1886
Memórias do cárcere (Ramos) 1953
Memórias póstumas de Brás Cubas (Machado de Assis) 1881
Memórias sentimentais de João Miramar (O. Andrade) 1924
Memories of Lazarus (Filho) 1969
Memory of Fire (Galeano) 1985–88
Men of Maize (Asturias) 1974
Meninas (Telles) 1973
Meninhas (Queiroz) 1976
Menino antigo (C. Andrade) 1973
Menino de engenho (Rego) 1932
Mensajes indios (Asturias) 1967
Merveilles de la nature (Sarduy) 1971
Mesa redonda sobre el monolingüismo quechua y aymara (Arguedas) 1966
Metal rosicler (Meireles) 1960
Meu querido assassino (Trevisan) 1983
Meus poemas preferidos (Bandeira) 1966
Meus verdes anos (Rego) 1956
Mexico en el teatro (Usigli) 1932
Mexico in a Nutshell (Reyes) 1964
Mexico in the Theater (Usigli) 1976
Mexico sin retoque (Poniatowska) 1987
Mexico visto a ojo de pájaro (Poniatowska) 1968
Mexico y Cortés (Viñas) 1978
Mexico y la revolución mexicana (Otero Silva) 1966
Mi beligerancia (Lugones) 1917
Mi confabulario (Arreola) 1979
Mi defensa (Sarmiento) 1843
Mi otro yo (D’Halmar) 1924
Mi patria (Amorim) 1960
Microgramas (Carrera Andrade) 1940
Micro-ópera de Benet Rossell (Sarduy) 1984
Miel derramada (Agustín) 1992
Miel para la luna (Amorim) 1969
Mientras se oficia el escarnio (Taboada Terán) 1968
Miércoles santo (Gálvez) 1930
Migration des cours (Condé) 1995
Mil y una calorías (Glantz) 1978
Milagre no Brasil (Boal) 1976
Milagro (Carrión) 1903
Militant Poetry (Dalton) 1983
Mina el mozo, héroe de Navarra (Guzmán) 1932
Minas de prata (Alencar) 1865–66
Mineraí noir (Depestre) 1956
Miniatures (López Albújar) 1895
Minus Sign (C.Andrade) 1981
Minúsculas (González Prada) 1901
Minuta (Reyes) 1935
Minutero (López Velarde) 1923
Mío Cid Campeador, hazaña (Huidobro) 1929
Mirada (Marqués) 1975
Mirada en el centro (Agustín) 1977
Miradas perdidas (García Marruz) 1951
Mirador de Próspero (Rodó) 1913
Mirador terrestre (Carrera Andrade) 1943
Mirando vivir (Barrett) 1912
Miro la tierra (Pacheco) 1986
Mirror of a Mage (Huidobro) 1931
Mis amigos y los comerciantes del Cauca (Isaacs) 1875
Mis brujas favoritas (Valenzuela) 1982
Miscast (Elizondo) 1981
Miseria del hombre (G.Rojas) 1948
Missing (Dorfman) 1982
Mr Taylor & Co. (Monterroso) 1982
Mistério da Tijuca (Azevedo) 1883
Mistério de coelho pensante (Lispector) 1967
Misterio del ramo de rosas (Puig) 1987
Mistérios (Telles) 1981
Misterios naturales (Carrera Andrade) 1972
Misteriosa desaparición de la marquesita de Loria (Donoso) 1980
Moça deitada na grama (C.Andrade) 1987
Modelo para la muerte (Biyo y Borges) 1946
Modernos ficcionistas brasileiros (Filho) 1958
Moi, laminaire (Césaire) 1982
Moi, Tituba, sorcière noire de Salem (Condé) 1986
Moleque Ricardo (Regó) 1935
Momento de morir (Posse) 1979
Mona que le pisaron la cola (Ferré) 1981
Moneda de hierro (Borges) 1976
Moneda del forastero (Carrera Andrade) 1958
Monkey Grammarian (Paz) 1974
Mono gramático (Paz) 1974
Monodias (Girri) 1985
Monólogo de la casta Susana (Cisneros) 1986
Monos enloquecidos (Cuadra) 1951
Monsieur Toussaint (Glissant) 1961
Montagne ensorcelée (Roumain) 1931
Montañas del oro (Lugones) 1897
Montaraces (Amorines) 1957
Monte (Cabrera) 1954
Monte da Alegría (Dourado) 1990
Monterrey (Reyes) 1980
Montevideanos (Benedetti) 1959
Montuío ecuatoriano (Cuadra) 1937
Mood Indigo (Sarduy) 1969
Moralidades actuales (Barrett) 1910
Moriencia (Roá Bastos) 1969
Morirá lejos (Pacheco) 1967
Moros en la costa (Dorfman) 1973
Mort d'Oluwémi d'Ajumako (Condé) 1973
Mortalha de Alzira (Azevedo) 1894
Moscas (Azuela) 1918
Mother and Son (Freyre) 1967
Motives of Proteus (Rodó) 1929
Motivo es el poema (Girri) 1976
Motivos de Proteo (Rodó) 1909
Motivos de San Francisco (Mistral) 1965
Motivos de son (Guillén) 1930
Motivos estéticos (Eguren) 1959
Movimento modernista (M. Andrade) 1942
Movimiento obrero en los Estados Unidos (Loveira) 1915
Movimiento perpetuo (Monterroso) 1972
Mucambos do nordeste (Freyre) 1937
Muchacha que tenía la culpa de todo (Sainz) 1995
Muchachas de Buenos Aires (Arlt) 1969
Muchacho en llamas (Sainz) 1988
Muecas para escribientes (Piñera) 1987
Muertas (Ibargüengoitia) 1977
Muerte (Benedetti) 1968
Muerte de Artemio Cruz (Fuentes) 1962
Muerte de Honorio (Otero Silva) 1963
Muerte de Narciso (Lezama Lima) 1937
Muerte de Sevilla en Madrid (Bryce Echenique) 1972
Muerte del estratega (Mutis) 1988
Muerte del Ñeque (Triana) 1964
Muerte en las calles (Gálvez) 1949
Muerte hizo la luz (Solórzano) 1951
Muerte no entrará en palacio (Marqués) 1970
Muerte sin fin (Gorostiza) 1939
Muerte y la brújula (Borges) 1951
Muerte y la doncella (Dorfman) 1992
Muerte y la niña (Onetti) 1973
Muerte y transfiguración de Martín Fierro (Martínez Estrada) 1948
Muertes (Orozco) 1952
Muertes históricas (Guzmán) 1958
Muestraio del Mundo (Diego) 1968
Mujer del río Sumpul (Alegria) 1987
Mujer Diógenes (López Albújar) 1972
Mujer domada (Azuela) 1946
Mujer en la sociedad moderna (Acosta de Samper) 1895
Mujer habitada (G. Belli) 1988
Mujer imaginaria (Edwards) 1985
Mujer legítima (Villaurrutia) 1943
Mujer muy moderna (Gálvez) 1927
Mujer para cada acto (Aguilera Malta) 1970
Mujer que sabe latín (Castellanos) 1973
Mujeres, animales, y fantasías mecánicas (Arreola) 1972
Mujeres en espejo (Glantz) 1985
Mulata de tal (Asturias) 1963
Mulato (Azevedo) 1881
Mulâtresse fille de Louis XIV (Hibbert) 1901
Mulâtresse Solitude (Schwarz-Bart) 1972
Mulatta and Mister Fly (Asturias) 1967
Mulatto (Azevedo) 1990
Mulher que matou os peixes (Lispector) 1968
Mundo alucinante (Arenas) 1969
Mundo da paz (Amado) 1951
Mundo de José Luis Cuelvas (Fuentes) 1969
Mundo de los maharachías (Arévalo Martínez) 1939
Mundo de los recuerdos (Gorriti) 1886
Mundo de los sueños (Dario) 1917
Mundo de siete pozos (Stormi) 1934
Mundo enigma (Mendes) 1945
Mundo maravilloso de Guillermo Enrique Hudson (Martínez Estrada) 1951
Mundo nosasito (Salarrué) 1975
Mundo para Julius (Bryce Echenique) 1970
Mundo que o português criou (Freyre) 1940
Muñeca rusa (Bioy Casares) 1991
Murilogramas (Mendes) 1965
Museo de cera (Edwards) 1981
Museo de la Novela de la Eterna (Fernández) 1967
Museo de los esfuerzos inútiles (Peri Rossi) 1983
Museo salvaje (Orozco) 1974
Museos abandonados (Peri Rossi) 1969
Museu de tudo (Melo Neto) 1975
Music of the Spheres (Cardenal) 1990
Música ao longe (Veríssimo) 1935
Música de cámara (Guillén) 1979
Música en Cuba (Carpentier) 1946
Música sentimental (Cambaceres) 1884
Musiquilla de las pobres esferas (Lihn) 1969
Mutaciones de la realidad (Orozo) 1979
Mutismos (Morejón) 1962
My House is on Fire (Dorfman) 1990
Myrtha (Lhérisson) 1892
Myself with Others (Fuentes) 1988
Mystery of the Rose Bouquet (Puig) 1988

Na Bahia em 1943 (Freyre) 1944
Na vertigem do día (Gullar) 1980
Nacha Regules (Gálvez) 1919
Nacimientos (Galeano) 1982
Nada a Pehuajós (Cortázar) 1984
Nada, nadie (Poniatowska) 1988
Nada que ver (Gambaro) 1972
Nada se escurre (Lihn) 1949
Nadie encendía las lámparas (F.Hernández) 1947
Nadie, nada, nunca (Saer) 1980
Naranja (Larreta) 1947
Naranja maravillosa (S.Ocampo) 1977
Naranjal ardiente, nocturno paraguayo (Roa Bastos) 1960
Naranjo o los círculos del tiempo (Fuentes) 1993
Narda o el verano (Elizondo) 1966
Narracion sumaria de mi vida (Arévalo Martínez) 1968
Natif-natal (Morisseau-Leroy) 1948
Náufragos y sobrevivientes (Salazar Bondy) 1954
Nave de los locos (Peri Rossi) 1984
Navegaciones y regresos (Neruda) 1959
Navidad en las montañas (Altamirano) 1871
Navio negreiro (Castro Alves) 1880
Near to the Wild Heart (Lispector) 1990
Necesidad de libertad (Arenas) 1986
Négre a la cour de Louis XIV (Hibbert) 1901
Negro qui hizo esperar a los ángeles (García Márquez) 1972
Negro sensible (Fernández de Lizardi) 1825
Negros curros (F.Ortiz) 1926–27
Negros y la transculturación (F.Ortiz) 1951
Neptuno alegórico (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1689
Néronisme de Rochambeau (Hibbert) 1901
New Islands (Bombal) 1982
New Time for Mexico (Fuentes) 1996
New World in the Tropics (Freyre) 1959
Nicaragua (Alegría) 1982
Nicaragua, tan violentamente dulce (Cortázar) 1983
Nicaraguan Sketches (Cortázar) 1989
Nietzsche el conquistador (Arévalo Martínez) 1943
Nieve (Casal) 1892
Nieve del almirante (Mutis) 1986
Night (Veríssimo) 1956
Nine Guardians (Castellanos) 1958
Niño azul para esa sombra (Marqués) 1961
Niño que enloqueció de amor (Barrios) 1915
Nirvana (D’Halmar) 1918
No bastan los átomos (Aguilera Malta) 1955
No habrá más penas ni olvido (Soriano) 1982
No hay censura (Agustín) 1988
No hay isla feliz (Salazar Bondy) 1954
No hay tal lugar (Pitol) 1967
No Man’s Land (Onetti) 1994
No me agarran viva (Alegría) 1983
No me esperen en abril (Bryce Echenique) 1995
No me preguntes cómo pasa el tiempo (Pacheco) 1969
No One Writes to the Colonel (García Márquez) 1968
¡No pasarán! (Paz) 1936
No pases esta puerta (Agustín) 1992,
No pasó nada (Skármeta) 1985
No pronunciarás (Glantz) 1980
No son todos los que están (Adoum) 1979
No todo es vigilia la de los ojos abiertos (Fernández) 1928
Nobody, Nothing, Never (Saer) 1993
Noche (García Ponce) 1963
Noche a la deriva (Orozco) 1984
Noche de los asesinos (Triana) 1965
Noche de resurrecciones (Paz) 1942,
Noche de Tlatelolco (Poniatowska) 1971
Noche toca a su fin (Gálvez) 1935
Noche vienes (Poniatowska) 1979
Nochebuena (Carrión) 1924
Noches en el Palacio de la Nunciatura (Arévalo Martínez) 1927
Noches tristes y día alegre (Fernández de Lizardi) 1818–19
Noción de patria (Benedetti) 1985
Noções de história das literaturas (Bandeira) 1940
Nocturno de Bujara (Pitol) 1981
Nocturno de los Ángeles (Villaurrutia) 1936
Nocturno europeo (Mallea) 1935
Nocturno mar (Villaurrutia) 1937
Nocturno XXXII (Darío) 1905
Nocturno y elegía (Ballagas) 1938
Nocturnos (Villaurrutia) 1931
Noite (Veríssimo) 1954
Noite de S.João (Alencar) 1857
Noite sem madrugada (Filho) 1983
Nombrar las cosas (Diego) 1970
Nombre (Gambaro) 1975
Nombre custodio (Asturias) 1959
Nombre falso (Piglia) 1975
Nombre olvidado (García Ponce) 1970
Nombres (S.Ocampo) 1953
Nombres y figuras (Pizarnik) 1969
Nordeste (Freyre) 1937
Norte y sur (Reyes) 1944
Nós e a Europa germânica (Freyre) 1971
Nosotros (García Calderón) 1946
Nosotros decimos no (Galeano) 1989
Nostalgia de la muerte (Villaurrutia) 1938
Nostalgia del futuro (Cardenal) 1982
Nostalgia for Death (Villaurrutia) 1993
Nota de cem (Filho) 1973
Notas de un himno (Zorrilla de San Martín) 1877
Notas de un novelista (Mallea) 1954
Notas del hijo pródigo (Adoum) 1953
Notas sobre algunas formas subsidiarias de la penetración cultural (Benedetti) 1979
Notas sobre la experiencia poética (Girri) 1983
Nothing, Nobody (Poniatowska) 1995
Noticia de un secuestro (García Márquez) 1996
Noticias de la Quimera (Diego) 1975
Noticias del Imperio (Paso) 1987
Nova reunião (C.Andrade) 1983
Nove histórias em grupo de três (Dourado) 1957
Novela latinoamericana en vísperas de un nuevo siglo (Carpentier) 1981
Novela mexicana contemporánea y su valor testimonial (Castellanos) 1965
Novela negra con argentinos (Valenzuela) 1990
Novela nueva (Rodó) 1897
Novela que comienza (Fernández) 1941
Novela y el problema de la expresión literaria en Perú (Vargas Llosa) 1974
Novela y la vida (Mariátegui) 1955
Novelário de Donga Novais (Dourado) 1976
Novelas do aprendendo (Dourado) 1980
Novelas nada exemplares (Trevisan) 1959
Novelas y cuadros de la vida sur-americana (Acosta de Samper) 1869
Novelista en la universidad (Asturias) 1971
Novelista y las novelas (Gálvez) 1949
Novia de Lázaro (Loynaz) 1991
Novia robada (Onetti) 1968
Novios de una aldea ecuatoriana (Mera) 1872
Novios y solitarios (Skármeta) 1975
Novo Éden (Sousândrade) 1893
Nube traicionera (Walsh) 1989
Nubes (Uslar Pietri) 1951
Nuestra America (Martí) 1977
Nuestra señora del mar (Ballagas) 1943
Nueva burguesía (Azuela) 1941
Nueva Corónica y Buen Gobierno (Guaman Poma de Ayala) 1612
Nueva inestabilidad (Sarduy) 1987
Nueva música clásica (Agustín) 1968
Nueva novela hispanoamericana (Fuentes) 1969
Nueva refutación del tiempo (Borges) 1947
Nueva tormenta (Bioy Casares) 1935
Nuevas aguafuertes porteñas (Arlt) 1960
Nuevas cartas de Nueva York (Martí) 1980
Nuevas odas elementales (Neruda) 1956
Nuevas páginas libres (González Prada) 1937
Nueve ensayos dantescos (Borges) 1982
Nueve lunas sobre Neuquén (Amorim) 1946
Nuevo mar para el rey (Aguilera Malta) 1965
Nuevo tiempo mexicano (Fuentes) 1994
Nuevos cuentos andinos (López Albújar) 1937
Nuevos cuentos de Bustos Domecq (Bioy Casares, Borges) 1977
Nuevos sermones y prédicas del Cristo de Elqui (N.Parra) 1979
Numa e a Ninfa (Barreto) 1915
Nunca mais (Meireles) 1923

O (Cabrera Infante) 1975
O casi el alma (Sánchez) 1965
O meu mestre imágínario (Dourado) 1982
O meu próprio romance (Aranha) 1931
O que se diz e o que se entende (Meireles) 1980
O que tinha de ser (Alencar) 1912
Oasis en la vida (Gorriti) 1888
Obra aberta e a filosofia da praxis (Gullar) 1968
Obscene Bird of Night (Donoso) 1973
Obsceno pájaro de la noche (Donoso) 1970
Obsesivos días circulares (Sainz) 1969
Ocasión (Saer) 1988
Ocasos de sangue (Almeida) 1954
Ocre (Storni) 1925
Octaedro (Cortázar) 1974
Octubre imprescindible (Morejón) 1983
Oda a España (Rivera) 1910
Odas elementales (Neruda) 1954
Odas para el hombre y la mujer (Marechal) 1929
Odas seculares (Lugones) 1910
Of Love and Other Demons (García Márquez) 1995
Of Love and Shadows (Allende) 1987
Office of Tenebrae (Castellanos) 1977
Oficina de la paz de Orolandia (Arévalo Martínez) 1925
Oficina no. I (Otero Silva) 1961
Oficio de ángel (Barnet) 1989
Oficio de difuntos (Uslar Pietri) 1976
Oficio de tinieblas (Castellanos) 1962
Oficio del siglo veinte (Cabrera Infante) 1960
Ogro filantrópico (Paz) 1979
Oh de casa! (Freyre) 1979
¡Oh, Hada Cibernética! (C.Belli) 1961
Ojerosa y pintada (Yáñez) 1960
Ojo (Girri) 1964
Ojo de la mujer (G.Belli) 1991
Ojo de la patria (Soriano) 1992
Ojos de los enterrados (Asturias) 1960
Ojos de perro azul (García Márquez) 1972
Old Gringo (Fuentes) 1985
Old Rosa (Arenas) 1989
Olga Catalina (Cuadra) 1925
Olhai os lírios do campo (Veríssimo) 1938
Olhinhos de gato (Meireles) 1980
Olinda (Freyre) 1939
Oliveira Lima, Don Quixote gordo (Freyre) 1968
Ollantay, la guerra de los dioses (Taboada Terán) 1994
Olor de la guayaba (García Márquez) 1982
On Heroes and Tombs (Sábat) 1981
On Human Rights (Fuentes) 1984
On Poets and Others (Paz) 1986
Onda y escritura en Mexico (Glantz) 1971
Onde estivestes de noite (Lispector) 1974
One Day of Life (Argueta) 1984
One Earth, Four or Five Worlds (Paz) 1985
One Hundred Love Sonnets (Neruda) 1986
One Hundred Years of Solitude (García Márquez) 1970
One Word to the Other (Paz) 1992
Ópalos (Herrera y Reissig) 1919
Open Door (Valenzuela) 1988
Open Veins of Latin America (Galeano) 1973
Ópera dos mortos (Dourado) 1967
Operário em construção e outros poemas (Moraes) 1975
Opiniones (Darío) 1906
Oppiano Licario (Lezama Lima) 1977
Opus 10 (Bandeira) 1952
Oración del nueve de febrero (Reyes) 1963
Oración por Marilyn Monroe (Cardenal) 1965
Oráculo sobre Managua (Cardenal) 1973
Orange Tree (Fuentes) 1994
Orchids in the Moonlight (Fuentes) 1986
Ordem e progresso (Freyre) 1959
Order and Progress (Freyre) 1970
Orfeu da Conceição (Moraes) 1956
Organización de la paz (Lugones) 1925
Organización del proletariado (Mariátegui) 1967
Orgia perpetua (Vargas Llosa) 1975
Orígenes (Adoum) 1952
Orikis (Barnet) 1978
Orillas del Ebro (Larreta) 1949
Orillas del Hudson (Guzmán) 1920
Orilleros (Bioy Casares) 1955
Oro de los tigres (Borges) 1972
Oro de sol (Cuadra) 1924
Oro y tormenta (Ibarbourou) 1956
Orquesta de cristal (Lihn) 1976
Orquideas a la luz de la luna (Fuentes) 1982
Ortometría (González Prada) 1977
Os escravos (Castro Alves) 1883
Oscura vida radiante (M.Rojas) 1971
Oscuras manos del olvido (Diego) 1942
Oscuridad es otro sol (Orozco) 1967
Oscuro (G.Rojas) 1977
Oscuro esplendor (Diego) 1966
Otán Iyebiyé (Cabrera) 1969
Other Face of the Phallus (Valenzuela) 1986
Other Inquisitions (Borges) 1964
Other Mexico (Paz) 1972
Other Voice (Paz) 1991
Other Weapons (Valenzuela) 1985
Otoño del patriarca (García Márquez) 1975
Otoño en Europa (Uslar Pietri) 1954
Otoño imperdonable (Walsh) 1947
Otra aventura (Bioy Casares) 1968
Otra estirpe (Agustini) 1923
Otra gente (Buitrago) 1973
Otra imagen deleznable (Westphalen) 1980
Otra mitad (Martínez Moreno) 1966
Otra vez el mar (Arenas) 1982
Otra voz (Paz) 1990
Otras inquisiciones (Borges) 1952
Otro día nuestro (Marqués) 1955
Otro, el mismo (Borges) 1969
Otro rostro del peronismo (Sábato) 1956
Ottra vez Eros (Peri Rossi) 1994
Ou isto ou aquilo (Meireles) 1964
Our America (Martí) 1979
Ours the Earth (Morejón) 1990
Outra vez os três porquinhos (Veríssimo) 1939
Outro amor do Dr Paulo (Freyre) 1977
Outsider (Sábato) 1950
Oveja negra (Monterroso) 1969
Overdose (Sarduy) 1972
Ovnis de oro (Cardenal) 1988
Oxcart (Marqués) 1969
O’Yarkandal (Salarrué) 1929

Padre Casafús (Carrasquilla) 1914
Padre mío (Eltit) 1989
Pagaré a cobrar (Alegría) 1973
Páginas de un pobre diablo (Barrios) 1923
Páginas libres (González Prada) 1894
Páginas vueltas (Guillén) 1982
País de la cola de paja (Benedetti) 1960
País de la geometría (Walsh) 1974
País do carnaval (Amado) 1931
País secreto (Carrera Andrade) 1940
Paisaje célebre (Morejón) 1993
Paisajes y leyendas (Altamirano) 1884
Paisano Aguilar (Amorim) 1934
Paixão medida (C. Andrade) 1980
Paixão segundo G.H. (Lispector) 1964
Pájaros en la playa (Sarduy) 1993
Pájaros y los hombres (Amorim) 1960
Palabra (G. Rojas) 1970
Palabra (Gelman) 1994
Palabra educación (Arreola) 1973
Palabra mágica (Monterroso) 1983
Palabras (Galeano) 1990
Palabras andantes (Galeano) 1993
Palabras comunes (Triana) 1987
Palabras cruzadas (Poniatowska) 1961
Palace of the White Skunks (Arenas) 1990
Palacio de las blanquisimáis mofetas (Arenas) 1980
Palacio Nacional (Fuentes) 1986
Palindroma (Arreola) 1971
Palinuro de Mexico (Paso) 1977
Palinuro of Mexico (Paso) 1989
Palo de balsa (Cuadra) 1938
Palo y hueso (Saer) 1965
Paloma de vuelo popular (Guillén) 1958
Palos al viento (López Albújar) 1972
Pameos y meopas (Cortázar) 1971
Pampa (Güiraldes) 1954
Pampa y su pasión (Gálvez) 192.6
Pañamanes (Buitrago) 1979
Panorama de los Estados Unidos (Martínez Estrada) 1947
Panorama histórico-literario de nuestra América (Benedetti) 1982
Panoramas de la vida (Gorriti) 1876
Pantaleón y las visitadoras (Vargas Llosa) 1973
Pão de ouro (Guimarães) 1879
Pão e sangue (Trevisan) 1988
Papá (Huidobro) 1934
Papa verde (Asturias) 1954
Papéis avulsos (Machado de Assis) 1882
Papeles de Pandora (Ferré) 1976
Papeles de recienvenido (Fernández) 1929–44
Para esta noche (Onetti) 1943
Para la voz (Sarduy) 1978
Para las seis cuerdas (Borges) 1965
Para leer al Pato Donald (Dorfman) 1971
Para nacer he nacido (Neruda) 1977
Para no esquecer (Lispector) 1979
Para que duela menos (Bryce Echenique) 1995
Para romper el silencio (Alegria) 1984
Para uma menina com uma flor (Moraes) 1966
Para una tumba sin nombre (Onetti) 1974
Para viver um grande amor (Moraes) 1962
Parábola e Siciliana (Mendes) 1959
Paradiso (Lezama Lima) 1966
Paraíba e seus problemas (Almeida) 1922
Parajes de una época (Morejón) 1979
Parece mentira (Villaurrutia) 1934
Parecido (Lange) 1966
Paredes (Gambaro) 1979
Paredón (Martínez Moreno) 1963
Parentalia (Reyes) 1954
Paris: la revolución de Mayo (Fuentes) 1968
Paris 1922–1923 (Asturias) 1988
Paris, situación irregular (Lihn) 1977
Parole des femmes (Condé) 1979
Parque de la Fraternidad (Triana) 1962
Parques abandonados (Herrera y Reissig) 1919
Pasado amor (Quiroga) 1929
Pasado en claro (Paz) 1975
Pasado inmediato (Reyes) 1941
Pasajera (Ibarbourou) 1967
Pasando y pasando (Huidobro) 1914
Pascuas del tiempo (Herrera y Reissig) 1913
Paseo Ahumada (Lihn) 1983
Paseo en trapezio (Sainz) 1985
Pasión de historia (Vega) 1987
Pasión de Roma (Larreta) 1937
Pasión prohibida (Peri Rossi) 1986
Pasión según Antigona Pérez (Sánchez) 1968
Pasión según Eva (Posse) 1994
Pasión según San Pedro Balbuena que fue tantas veces Pedro (Bryce Echenique) 1977
Pasión y muerte del cura Deusto (D’Halmar) 1924
Pasionarias (Palma) 1870
Pasos de López (Ibargüengoitia) 1982
Pasos perdidos (Carpentier) 1953
Pasos y pasajeros (Uslar Pietri) 1966
Pássaro de cinco asas (Trevisan) 1974
Passe-temps (Lhérisson) 1893
Passion According to G.H. (Lispector) 1988
Passions and Impressions (Neruda) 1983
Past Caring (Onetti) 1995
Pastel de choclo (Dorffman) 1986
Pastorela en dos actos (Fernández de Lizardi) 1817
Pastores da noite (Amado) 1964
Pata da gazila (Alencar) 1870
Pathless Grove (Juanina Inés de la Cruz) 1950
Patio (Edwards) 1952
Patos, elefantes y heroes (Dorffman) 1985
Patria fuerte (Lugones) 1930
¡Patria o muerte! (Guillén) 1973
Patriot (Barreto) 1978
Pattern for a Tapestry (Dourado) 1984
Paula (Allende) 1994
Paulinécia desvairada (M. Andrade) 1926
Paulina Lamberti (Isaacs) 1952
Pausa en la selva (Amorim) 1950
Payador (Lugones) 1916
Pays mélél Nanna-ya (Condé) 1985
Pays rêvé, pays réel (Glissant) 1985
Pecado mortal (S. Ocampo) 1966
Pedra Bonita (Rego) 1938
Pedro Páramo (Rulfo) 1955
Pedro y el capitán (Benedetti) 1979
Pegadas (Azevedo) 1897
Pelota, un sueño y diez centavos (Aguilera Malta) 1988
Pen, Sword, Camisole (Amado) 1985
Pena de extrañamiento (Lihn) 1986
Penitencia y el mérito (Girri) 1957
Penitente (Villaverde) 1889
Pensador Mexicano (Fernández de Lizardi) 1962
Pension les Alizés (Condé) 1988
Penúltima puerta (Mallea) 1969
Pép-la (Morrisseau-Leroy) 1978
Pequeña crónica de grande días (Paz) 1990
Pequena historia da música (M. Andrade) 1942
Pequeñas maniobras (Piñera) 1963
Pequeños cantos (Pizarnik) 1971
Pequeños infiernos (Dalton) 1970
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Year</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Pequeno oratório de Santa Clara (Meireles)</td>
<td>1955</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peras del Olmo (Paz)</td>
<td>1957</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perdido (Ibarbourou)</td>
<td>1950</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perdido en su noche (Gálvez)</td>
<td>1958</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peregrinación (Marqués)</td>
<td>1944</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peregrinaciones (Dario)</td>
<td>1901</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peregrinaje de Gualpo (Echeverría)</td>
<td>1873</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peregrino en su patria (Paz)</td>
<td>1987</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peregrinos de piedra (Herrera y Reissig)</td>
<td>1910</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perfil de Euclides e outros perfis (Freyre)</td>
<td>1944</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perfiles (Gorriti)</td>
<td>1892</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Péricole (García Calderón)</td>
<td>1940</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Periodismo militante (García Márquez)</td>
<td>1978</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Periquillo Sarniento (Fernández de Lizardí)</td>
<td>1816</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Periquito el Aguador (Onetti)</td>
<td>1986</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perjurio de la nieve (Bioy Casares)</td>
<td>1945</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perjury of the Snow (Bioy Casares)</td>
<td>1964</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perlita Lila (Cuadra)</td>
<td>1925</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Permiso para vivir (Bryce Echenique)</td>
<td>1993</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perpetual Orgy (Vargas Llosa)</td>
<td>1986</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perros del paraíso (Posse)</td>
<td>1983</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Persecución (Arenas)</td>
<td>1986</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Persecución y muerte de minorías (García Márquez)</td>
<td>1984</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perseguidor (Cortázar)</td>
<td>1967</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Persona non grata (Edwards)</td>
<td>1973</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Personas en la sala (Lange)</td>
<td>1950</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Persuasion de los días (Girondo)</td>
<td>1942</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perto do coração selvagem (Lispector)</td>
<td>1944</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Perú—tradiciones cuzqueñas (Matto de Turner)</td>
<td>1884</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peruanicemos al Perú (Mariátegui)</td>
<td>1970</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peso de la noche (Edwards)</td>
<td>1964</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pesquisa (Saer)</td>
<td>1994</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pesquisa trágica (Lillo)</td>
<td>1963</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pessoas, coisas e animais (Freyre)</td>
<td>1981</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Petit Pays (Alegria)</td>
<td>1983</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pez en el agua (Vargas Llosa)</td>
<td>1993</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Philosopher or Dog? (Machado de Assis)</td>
<td>1954</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Philosophy of the Understanding (Bello)</td>
<td>1984</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Piano Stories (F.Hernández)</td>
<td>1993</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pie sobre el cuello (C.Belli)</td>
<td>1964</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Piedra absoluta (Adán)</td>
<td>1966</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Piedra arde (Galeano)</td>
<td>1980</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Piedra de sol (Paz)</td>
<td>1957</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Piedra fina y el pavorreal (Barnet)</td>
<td>1963</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Piedra pulida (Morejón)</td>
<td>1986</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Piedra que era Cristo (Otero Silva)</td>
<td>1984</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Piedras de Chile (Neruda)</td>
<td>1960</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Piedras del cielo (Neruda)</td>
<td>1970</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pies sobre el agua (Roa Bastos)</td>
<td>1967</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pieza oscura (Lihn)</td>
<td>1963</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pigeon (Martínez Moreno)</td>
<td>1966</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Pirata fantasma (Aguilera Malta) 1950
Piratas en Cartagena (Acosta de Samper) 1886
Pistóia, cemitério brasileiro (Meireles) 1955
Pit (Onetti) 1991
Plan de evasion (Bioy Casares) 1945
Plan for Escape (Bioy Casares) 1975
Plan infinito (Allende) 1991
Plano oblicuo (Reyes) 1920
Plantation Boy (Rego) 1966
Plat de porc aux bananes vertes (Schwarz-Bart) 1967
Playa (Sarduy) 1965
Playa sola (Girri) 1946
Plaza de las carretas (Amorim) 1937
Plebiscito a Fidel Castro (Arenas) 1990
Plenitude (Morisseau-Leroy) 1940
Plenos poderes (Neruda) 1962
Pluie et vent sur Télumée Miracle (Schwarz-Bart) 1972
Pobre Barba Azul (Villaurrutia) 1948
Pobre gente de Paris (Salazar Bondy) 1958
Pobre negro (Gallegos) 1937
¡Pobrecito poeta que era yo! (Dalton) 1976
Poco de historia (Gambaro) 1988
Poderío de la novela (Mallea) 1965
Poema de Chile (Mistral) 1967
Poema de Robot (Marechal) 1966
Poema del otoño (Darío) 1910
Poema sujo (Gullar) 1976
Poema y antipoema a Eduardo Frei (N.Parra) 1982,
Poemas árticos (Huidobro) 1918
Poemas clandestinos (Dalton) 1980
Poemas de amor (Fuentes) 1971
Poemas de amor (Guillén) 1964
Poemas de amor desesperado (S.Ocampo) 1949
Poemas de este tiempo y de otro (Lihn) 1955
Poemas de la creación (Marechal) 1979
Poemas de la oficina (Benedetti) 1956
Poemas de otros (Benedetti) 1974
Poemas de Sidney West (Gelman) 1969
Poemas de un novelist (Donoso) 1981
Poemas del hoy por hoy (Benedetti) 1961
Poemas desconocidos (González Prada) 1973
Poemas elegidos (Girri) 1965
Poemas escritos na India (Meireles) 1962
Poemas humanos (Vallejo) 1939
Poemas italianos (Meireles) 1968
Poemas manuables (Guillén) 1975
Poemas místicos (Güiraldes) 1928
Poemas náufragos (Loynaz) 1992
Poemas para combatir la calvicie (N.Parra) 1993
Poemas para la recién Hegada (Gálvez) 1957
Poemas revolucionarios (Castro Alves) 1945
Poemas sin nombre (Loynaz) 1953
Poemas solariegos (Lugones) 1928
Poemas solitarios (Güiraldes) 1928
Poemas y antipoemas (N.Parra) 1954
Poems without Name (Loynaz) 1993
Poesía até agora (C.Andrade) 1948
Poesía de observación (Girri) 1973
Poesía de paso (Lihn) 1966
Poesía de uso (Cardenal) 1979
Poesía en pánico (Mendes) 1938
Poesía errante (C.Andrade) 1988
Poesía liberalde (Mendes) 1947
Poesía militantte (Dalton) 1983
Poesía no eres tú (Castellanos) 1972
Poesía quechua y pintura abstracta (Westphalen) 1975
Poesía rusa contemporánea (N.Parra) 1967
Poesía viva (Alegria) 1984
Poesía y miltancia en America Latina (Dalton) 1963
Poesía y resistencia (G.Rojas) 1974
Poet is a Little God (Huidobro) 1990
Poeta (Mármol) 1842
Poetas comunicantes (Benedetti) 1972
Poète à Cuba (Depestre) 1976
Poética de romance (Dourado) 1973
Poética y estética creacionistas (Huidobro) 1994
Poétique de la relation (Glissant) 1990
Poetry and Militancy in Latin America (Dalton) 1981
Polaquinha (Trevisan) 1985
Policrítica en la hora de los chacales (Cortázar) 1987
Poliedro (Mendes) 1974
Política de fusion (Herrera y Reissig) 1902
Política revolucionaria (Lugones) 1931
Pollito de fuego (Roa Bastos) 1974
Ponta de lança (O.Andrade)
Por el mar de las Antillas anda un barco de papel (Guillén) 1977
Por el monte abajo (C.Belli) 1966
Por fuerza mayor (Lihn) 1975
Por la integración de blancos y negros (F.Ortiz) 1943
Por la noche los gatos (Cisneros) 1989
Por la patria (Eltit) 1986
Por la revolución, por la poesía (Depestre)1969
Por los extraños pueblos (Diego) 1958
Por los tiempos de Clemente Colling (F.Hernández) 1942
Por mayo era, por mayo (Reyes) 1946
¿Por qué? (Cabrera) 1948
¿Por qué prohibieron el circo? (Giardinelli) 1983
Por qué soy cristiano (Mera) 1891
Por tierras de Nueva Galicia (Yáñez) 1928
Por un caminito así (Arévalo Martínez) 1947
Por un relato futuro (Piglia) 1990
Por un relato futuro (Saer) 1990
Porão e sobrado (Telles) 1938
Portero (Arenas) 1989
Portrait of a Paladin (Huidobro) 1931
Portuguese Integration in the Tropics (Freyre) 1961
Posdata (Paz) 1970
Posesión (Mallea) 1958
Posición en la vida (Gallegos) 1954
Position of America (Reyes) 1950
Posthumous Reminiscences of Bras Cubas (Machado de Assis) 1955
Potpourri (Cambaceres) 1882
Pouco acima do chão (Gullar) 1949
Pourquoi ils écrivent en créole (Morisseau-Leroy) 1954
Pozo (Onetti) 1939
Pozo del Yocci (Gorriti) 1869
Prados de la conciencia (Martínez Moreno) 1968
Praia viva (Telles) 1944
Precio del estaño (Taboada Terán) 1960
Prefácios desgarrados (Freyre) 1978
Preguntas al azar (Benedetti) 1986
Préhistoire d’Afrique a l’histoire d’Haïti (Price-Mars) 1962
Premios (Cortázar) 1960
Presbiterianas (González Prada) 1909
Presença do açúcar na formação brasileira (Freyre) 1975
Presencia (Cortázar) 1938
Presencia (Onetti) 1986
Presencia del Ecuador en Venezuela (Carrera Andrade) 1963
Presencia lejana (García Ponce) 1968
Presentación al templo (Castellanos) 1952
Presentacion de Buenos Aires (Amorim) 1936
President (Asturias) 1963
Presiones y diamantes (Piñera) 1967
Primavera con una esquina rota (Benedetti) 1982
Primavera interior (Aguilera Malta) 1927
Primeiras estórias (Guimarães Rosa) 1962
Primeiro andar (M.Andrade) 1926
Primeiro caderno do aluno (O.Andrade) 1927
Primero de mayo (Amorim) 1949
Primero sueño (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1692
Princesa del Palacio de Hierro (Sainz) 1974
Princess of the Iron Palace (Sainz) 1987
Principio del placer (Pacheco) 1972
Principios de ortología y métrica de la lengua castellana (Bello) 1835
Principios del derecho de gentes (Bello) 1832
Prisión perpetua (Piglia) 1988
Prisioneiro (Veríssimo) 1967
Prisioneiros (Fonseca) 1963
Privilegios de la vista (Paz) 1987
Problemas brasileiros de antropologia (Freyre) 1943
Problemas de la indentidad del hombre negro (Depestre) 1978
Proconsulado (Vasconcelos) 1939
Profesores (N.Parra) 1971
Profil d’une œuvre (Condé) 1978
Proie et l’ombre (Roumain) 1930
Prójimo (Uslar Pietri) 1978
Proletariado y su organización (Mariátegui) 1970
Prólogo (Bioy Casares) 1929
Propiedades de la magia (Girri) 1959
Propios como ajenos (Cisneros) 1989
Propoganda y ataque (González Prada) 1939
Propósito de frades (Freyre) 1959
Propósito de Morão (Freyre) 1959
Prosa del observatorio (Cortázar) 1972
Prosa menuda (González Prada) 1941
Prosas profanas (Darío) 1896
Prosoemas (Dalton) 1987
Prostibulario (Amorim) 1967
Próxima (Huidobro) 1934
Proyecciones culturales del momento argentino (Marechal) 1947
Proyecto de Código civil (Bello) 1846
Prueba de amor (Arlt) 1991
Pruebas al canto (Dorfman) 1980
Psalms (Cardenal) 1981
Psychiatrist (Machado de Assis) 1963
Pubis angelical (Puig) 1979
Pueblo de Dios y de mandinga (Alegria) 1985
Puertas al campo (Paz) 1966
Puertorriqueño dócil (Marqués) 1975
Puesta en claro (Gambaro) 1987
Punta de plata (Arreola) 1958
Punta de rieles (M.Rojas) 1960
Pureza (Rego) 1937
Purificación en la calle del Cristo (Marqués) 1972

Quadrante (Meireles) 1962–63
Quase de verdade (Lispector) 1978
Quase ministro (Machado de Assis) 1864(?)
Quase política (Freyre) 1950
Quatrième Siécle (Glissant) 1964
Que aman, odian (Bioy Casares, V.Ocampo) 1946
¿Qué es el budismo? (Borges) 1976
¿Qué es el fascismo en Latinoamérica? (Viñas) 1977
Que se van (Aguilera Malta) 1930
Qué solos se quedan los muertos (Giardinelli) 1985
Quem matou Aparecida? (Gullar) 1962
Queremos tanto a Glenda (Cortázar) 1981
Querido Diego, te abraza Quiela (Poniatowska) 1978
Quetzalcóatl (Cardenal) 1985
Quién de nosotros (Benedetti) 1953
Quien habla no está muerto (Girri) 1975
¿Quién mató a Palomino Molero? (Vargas Llosa) 1986
Quiero (Amorim) 1954
Quijote de El Dorado (Aguilera Malta) 1964
Quijotita y su prima (Fernández de Lizardi) 1818
Quincas Borba (Machado de Assis) 1891
Quince presencias (Reyes) 1955
Quintuples (Sánchez) 1985
Quinze (Queiroz) 1930
Quiroga que yo conoci (Amorim) 1983
Quitanderas (Amorim) 1924

Rachel’s Song (Barnet) 1991
Radiografía de la cultura ecuatoriana (Carrera Andrade) 1964
Radiografía de la pampa (Martínez Estrada) 1933
Rainbow for the Christian West (Depestre) 1972
Rainbow of Desire (Boal) 1995
Raiz del hombre (Paz) 1937
Raiz salvaje (Ibarbourou) 1922
Raíz y el camino (Poniatowska) 1985
Rama hacia el este (J.L. Ortiz) 1940
Raros (Darío) 1896
Ras del sueño (Benedetti) 1967
Rastro de tu sangre en la nieve (García Márquez) 1982
Ratos entretenidos (Fernández de Lizardi) 1819
Rauch (Güiraldes) 1917
Ravine aux Diables (Morisseau-Leroy) 1982
Ravinodyab (Morisseau-Leroy) 1982
Rayito de estrella (Asturias) 1925
Rayuela (Cortázar) 1963
Raza cósmica (Vasconcelos) 1925
Razón de ser (Carpentier) 1976
Razón humana (Mallea) 1959
Reader’s nuestro que estás en la tierra (Dorfman) 1980
Real envido (Gambaro) 1984
Real Life of Alejandro Mayta (Vargas Llosa) 1986
Realidad nacional desde la cama (Valenzuela) 1990
Reasons of State (Carpentier) 1976
Rebeldes, soñadores y fugitivos (Soriano) 1987
Rebelión (Gallegos) 1946
Rebelión de los conejos mágicos (Dorfman) 1987
Rebelión de los niños (Peri Rossi) 1980
Recado del errante (G. Rojas) 1980
Recados para America (Mistral) 1978
Recife (Bandeira) 1984
Recife, sim! Recife, não! (Freyre) 1967
Re-cite (Sarduy) 1985
Reclamation Hopton (Hibbert) 1988
Recollections of Things to Come (Garro) 1969
Récolte (Morisseau-Leroy) 1946
Reconquista de America (F. Ortiz) 1910
Recordações do escrivão Isaías Caminha (Barreto) 1909
Recuerdo de Tijuana (Puig) 1985
Recuerdos de provincia (Sarmiento) 1850
Recuerdos del porvenir (Garro) 1963
Recuerdos olvidados (Benedetti) 1988
Recurso del método (Carpentier) 1974
Recurso del supremo patriarca (Benedetti) 1974
Red (Mallea) 1968
Red (Uslar Pietri) 1936
Red Lances (Uslar Pietri) 1963
Redoble por Rancas (Scorza) 1970
Reencuentro de personajes (Garro) 1982
Reflections on Spanish-American Poetry (Carrera Andrade) 1973
Reflejos (Villaurrutia) 1926
Reflexões de uma cabra (Almeida) 1971
Reforma política en Colombia (Núñez) 1885
Refranes de negros viejos (Cabrera) 1955
Região e tradição (Freyre) 1941
Regina Landa (Azuela) 1939
Region más transparente (Fuentes) 1958
Registro del mundo (Carrera Andrade) 1940
Regla Kimbisa del Santo Cristo del Buen Viaje (Cabrera) 1977
Reglas de Congo (Cabrera) 1979
Reglas del secreto (S.Ocampo) 1991
Regreso a casa (Elizondo) 1982
Rei da terra (Trevisan) 1972
Rei da vela (O.Andrade) 1937
Reina del Plata (Posse) 1988
Reinaldo solar (Gallegos)
Reino (Mistral) 1983
Reino de este mundo (Carpentier) 1949
Reino de la imagen (Lezama Lima) 1981
Reino del revés (Walsh) 1963
Reino milenario (García Ponce) 1970
Reinos originarios (Fuentes) 1971
Reis vagabundos (Bandeira) 1966
Relaciones (Gelman) 1973
Relaciones culturales entre el Ecuador y Francia (Carrera Andrade) 1967
Relámpagos de agosto (Ibargüengoitia) 1964
Relato (Sarduy) 1978
Relato de un náufrago que estuvo diez días (García Márquez) 1970
Relato del extranjero (Adoum) 1955
Relato veneciano de Billie Upward (Pitol) 1992
Reliquias de Casa Velha (Machado de Assis) 1906
Remate de males (M.Andrade) 1930
Rembrandt de l’Hermitage (García Marruz) 1992
Remontando el Uluán (Salarrué) 1932
Renacimiento en España (Herrera y Reissig) 1919
René’s Flesh (Piñera) 1988
Renga (Paz) 1972
Repeticiones (Glantz) 1979
Repisas (Cuadra) 1931
Reportaje (Benedetti) 1958
Reportajes (Galeano) 1967
Reposo del fuego (Pacheco) 1966
Republic of Dreams (Piñón) 1989
República dos sonhos (Piñón) 1984
República independiente de Miranda (Lihn) 1989
République d’Haïti et la république Dominicaine (Price-Mars) 1953
Requerimiento al rey de España (Taboada Terán) 1992,
Réquiem para el diablo (Aguilera Malta) 1978
Réquiem para un gentilhombre (Scorza) 1962
Requiem por Faulkner (Onetti) 1975
Resentimiento (Mallea) 1966
Residence on Earth (Neruda) 1946
Residencia en la tierra (Neruda) 1933
Resonancias del camino (Zorrilla de San Martin) 1896
Respiración artificial (Piglia) 1980
Responso (Saer) 1964
Respuesta a Sor Filotea (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1700
Ressurreição (Machado de Assis) 1872
Rest is Silence (Veríssimo) 1946
Resto é silêncio (Veríssimo) 1943
Resurrección de los ídolos (Tablada) 1924
Retablo de inmoderaciones y heresiarcas (Sainz) 1992
Retalhos de jornais velhos (Freyre) 1964
Retorno (Mallea) 1946
Retrato (Veríssimo) 1951
Retrato cultural del Ecuador (Carrera Andrade) 1965
Retrato de Zoe (Elizondo) 1969
Retrato en la geografia (Uslar Pietri) 1962
Retrato natural (Meireles) 1949
Retratos reales e imaginarios (Reyes) 1920
Return to Mexico (Fuentes) 1992,
Return to My Native Land (Césaire) 1968
Reunião (C. Andrade) 1969
Revolução na America do Sul (Boal) 1960
Revolución de Cuba vista desde Nueva York (Villaverde) 1869
Revolución degollada (Taboada Terán) 1974
Revolución en bicicleta (Giardinelli) 1980
¿Revolución en la revolución? (Dalton) 1970
Revolución radical en Antioquia (Isaacs) 1880
Rey se acerca a su templo (Agustín) 1978
Reyes (Cortázar) 1949
Riacho doce (Rego) 1939
Richard trajo su flauta (Morejón) 1967
Right of Sanctuary (Carpentier) 1970
Río de Janeiro (Alencar) 1857
Río que sólo corre de noche (Gambaro) 1988
Río sin orillas (Saer) 1991
Ríos profundos (Arguedas) 1958
Ripening (Glissant) 1959
Rires et pleurs (Durand) 1896
Risco do bordado (Dourado) 1970
Rítmos indígenas de Mexico (Campobello) 1940
Robotización del hombre (Sábato) 1981
Roca (Lugones) 1938
Rock de la cárcel (Agustín) 1985
Rodeada está de sueño (Mallea) 1944
Rodil (Salazar Bondy) 1952
Rodinelas (Eguren) 1929
Rogelio (Carrasquilla) 1926
Rol de la manzana (Carrera Andrade) 1935
Romance brasileiro de 30 (Filho) 1969
Romance de Santa Cecilia (Meireles) 1957
Romance negro e outras histórias (Fonseca) 1992
Romanceiro da inconfidência (Meireles) 1953
Romancero (Lugones) 1924
Romancero aux étoiles (Alexis) 1960
Romances del Río de Enero (Reyes) 1933
Romances del Río Seco (Lugones) 1938
Romanticismo en la poesía castellana (Vallejo) 1954
Románticos (García Calderón) 1938
Romulus (Hibbert) 1908
Rosa (Meireles) 1957
Rosa de la espinela (Adán) 1939
Rosa de los vientos (Ibarbourou) 1930
Rosa do povo (C. Andrade) 1945
Rosa profunda (Borges) 1975
Rosa separada (Neruda) 1974
Rosario de Eros (Agustini) 1924
Rosas de Engaddi (Arévalo Martínez) 1923
Rosaura (Güiraldes) 1922
Rosaura, a enjeitada (Guimarães) 1883
Rosemario no castelo encantado (Veríssimo) 1936
Rostros de Mexico (Castellanos) 1966
Rostros del amor (Onetti) 1968
Rostros y climas (Carrera Andrade) 1948
Roua Kréon (Morisseau-Leroy) 1978
Royal Commentaries of the Incas (Garcilaso de la Vega) 1966
Rubén Darío (Rodó) 1899
Rubí no umbigo (Gullar) 1979
Rueda dentada (Guillén) 1972
Rufino Tamayo (García Ponce) 1967
Ruisenhor de la aurora (Roa Bastos) 1942
Rumania, su nueva imagen (Asturias) 1964
Rumbo de la rosa (Lange) 1930
Runa yu pay (Arguedas) 1939
Rusia ante el segundo plan quinquenal (Vallejo) 1965
Rusia en 1931 (Vallejo) 1931
Russian Doll (Bioy Casares) 1992

Sab (Gómez de Avellaneda)
Sabor eterno (Ballagas) 1939
Sacred Cow (Eltit) 1995
Sacred Families (Donoso) 1977
Sacrificadas (Quiroga) 1920
Sacrificio en el Monte Moriah (Marqués) 1969
Saga (Veríssimo) 1940
Sagarana (Guimarães Rosa) 1946
Sagrada familia (Barnet) 1967
Sagres (Bilac) 1898
Saída? Onde fica a saída? (Gullar) 1967
Saison a Rihata (Condé) 1981
Saison au Congo (Césaire) 1966
Saisons choisies (Huidobro) 1921
Sala de armas (Piñón) 1973
Sala de espera (Mallea) 1953
Salamandra (Paz) 1962
Salarios del impío (Gelman) 1993
Salmos (Cardenal) 1964
Salomé y Judith (Castellanos) 1959
Salto de tigre blanco (Sainz) 1996
Salud de la serpiente (Sainz) 1991
Salvador (Argueta) 1990
Salvaje (Quiroga) 1920
Salve, Regina (Carrasquilla) 1903
Sálvese quien pueda (Ibariñengoitia) 1975
Salvo el crepúsculo (Cortázar) 1984
San Gabriel de Valdivias (Azuela) 1938
San Isidro (V.Ocampo) 1941
Sang rivé (Glissant) 1961
Sangre azul (Aguilera Malta) 1948
Sangre de amor correspondido (Puig) 1982
Sangre de Medusa (Pacheco) 1958
Sangre devota (López Velarde) 1916
Sangurimas (Cuadra) 1934
Santa Anna (Yáñez) 1982
Santa María del Buen Aire (Larreta) 1935
Santito de la toldería (Gálvez) 1947
Santo oficio de la memoria (Giardinelli) 1991
São Bernardo (Ramos) 1934
São Jorge dos Ilhêus (Amado) 1944
Sargento Getúlio (Ribeiro) 1971
Sarmiento a Cortázar (Viñas) 1971
Sátiro (Huidobro) 1939
Saulo (Isaacs) 1881
Saverio el cruel (Arlt) 1950
Schizotext (G.Rojas) 1988
Se correr o bicho pega, se ficar o bicho come (Gullar) 1981
Se está haciendo tarde (Agustín) 1973
Sea and the Bells (Neruda) 1988
Sea of Death (Amado) 1984
Sea Ud. breve (Villaurrutia) 1938
Seara vermelha (Amado) 1946
Season in Rihata (Condé) 1988
Season in the Congo (Césaire) 1968
Secuestro (García Márquez) 1982
Secuestro del general (Aguilera Malta) 1973
Sed de lo perdido (Diego) 1993
Sed de Sling Bader (Salarrué) 1971
Ségou (Condé) 1984
Segu (Condé) 1987
Segunda sangre (Amorim) 1950
Seis cuentos para ganar (Donoso) 1985
Seis problemas para don Isidro Parodi (Bioy Casares, Borges) 1942
Sel noir (Glissant) 1960
Selvagem da ópera (Fonseca) 1994
Semana de colores (Garro) 1964
Semblanza de nuestro país (Güiraldes) 1972
Semblanzas de America (García Calderón) 1922
Semejante a la noche (Carpentier) 1958
Semillas para un himno (Paz) 1954
Seminário dos ratos (Telles) 1977
Seminarista (Guimarães) 1872
Sén (Hibbert) 1988
Sendas perdidas (Azuela) 1949
Sendero (Güiraldes) 1932
Sendero de humildad (Gálvez) 1909
Senhor embaixador (Veríssimo) 1965
Senhora (Alencar) 1875
Señor de la burbuja (Salarrué) 1927
Señor Monitot (Arévalo Martínez) 1922
Señor Presidente (Asturias) 1946
Señor Saco con respecto a la revolución de Cuba (Villaverde) 1852
Señora en su balcón (Garro) 1960
Señores e indios (Arguedas) 1976
Señorita de Tacna (Vargas Llosa) 1981
Sentidos al aire (Yáñez) 1964
Sentimental Journey around the Hungarian Cuisine (Asturias, Neruda) 1969
Sentimental Memoirs of John Seaborne (O.Andrade) 1979
Sentimento do mundo (C.Andrade) 1940
Separate Rose (Neruda) 1985
Ser como ellos (Galeano) 1992
Serafim Ponte Grande (O.Andrade) 1933
Seraphim Grosse Pointe (O.Andrade) 1979
Serena y alta figura (Poniatowska) 1986
Sergeant Getúlio (Ribeiro) 1978
Sermon de la paz (Zorrilla de San Martin) 1924
Sermones y prédicas del Cristo de Elqui (N.Parra) 1977
Sermons and Homilies of the Christ of Elqui (N.Parra) 1984
Sertanejo (Alencar) 1875
Servço del-Rei (Dourado) 1984
Servos da morte (Filho) 1946
62: modelo para armar (Cortázar) 1968
Sete pecados capitais (Guimarães Rosa) 1964
Setembro não tem sentido (Ribeiro) 1968
Seven Interpretative Essays on Peruvian Reality (Mariátegui) 1971
Seven Madmen (Arlt) 1984
Seven Nights (Borges) 1984
Seven Serpents and Seven Moons (Aguilera Malta) 1979
Sevilha andando (Melo Neto) 1989
Sextinas (C.Belli) 1970
Sexto (Arguedas) 1961
Shadows (Soriano) 1993
Shepherds of the Night (Amado) 1966
Ship of Fools (Peri Rossi) 1989
Shipyard (Onetti) 1968
Showdown (Amado) 1988
Shrouded Woman (Bomboal) 1948
Si dulcemente (Gelman) 1980
Siameses (Gambaro) 1967
Siete ensayos de interpretación de la realidad peruana (Mariátegui) 1928
Siete imágenes de Bolivia (Galeano) 1971
Siete locos (Arlt) 1929
Siete lunas y siete serpientes (Aguilera Malta) 1970
Siete noches (Borges) 1980
Siete sobre Deva (Reyes) 1942
Siglo de las luces (Carpentier) 1962
Siglo del viento (Galeano) 1986
Signals from the Flames (Pacheco) 1980
Signatura de la esfinge (Arévalo Martínez) 1933
Signo escalonado (Taboada Terán) 1975
Signo y el garabato (Paz) 1973
Signos en rotación (Paz) 1965
Signos y obras (Mariátegui) 1959
Silencio de la luna (Pacheco) 1994
Silhouette de nègres et de négrophiles (Price-Mars) 1960
Simbad (Mallea) 1957
Simbolicas (Eguren) 1911
Simetrias (Valenzuela) 1993
Simpatías y diferencias (Reyes) 1921–26
Simulación (Sarduy) 1982
Simulacres (Hibbert) 1923
Sin ambages (Adoum) 1989
Sin amor (Azuela) 1912
Sin ir más lejos (Dorfman) 1986
Sin rumbo (Cambaceres) 1885
Sinceridades (Asturias) 1980
Síndrome de naufragios (Glantz) 1984
Sinfonía concluida (Monterroso) 1994
Singing from the Well (Arenas) 1987
Singing Mountaineers (Arguedas) 1957
Sinos da agonia (Dourado) 1974
Siren and the Seashell (Paz) 1976
Sirena (Martínez Moreno) 1968
Sirena y el capitán (Walsh) 1974
Sitio a Eros (Ferré) 1980
Six Problems for Don Isidro (Bioy Casares, Borges) 1981
62: a Model Kit (Cortázar) 1972
Slaughter House (Echeverría) 1959
So-Called Latin American Writing (Valenzuela) 1993
So Spoke the Uncle (Price-Mars) 1983
Sobrados e mucambos (Freyre) 1936
Sobre arte y oficios (Benedetti) 1968
Sobre con versos (Amorim) 1925
Sobre cultura femenina (Castellanos) 1950
Sobre el militarismo (González Prada) 1978
Sobre heroes y tumbas (Sábat) 1961
Sobre la grama (G.Belli) 1974
Sobre la misma tierra (Gallegos) 1943
Sobrevivo (Alegría) 1978
Socialismo en Yucatan (Loveira) 1916
Sociedad secreta Abakuá (Cabrera) 1959
Sociología (Freyre) 1945
Sociología da medicina (Freyre) 1967
Sociología guatemalteca (Asturias) 1923
Sofía de los presagios (G.Belli) 1990
Sol bajo las patas de los caballos (Adoum) 1981
Sol de domingo (Guillén) 1982
Sol del domingo (Dario) 1917
Sol y los Mac Donald (Marqués) 1957
Solar de la raza (Gálvez) 1920
Soledad de America Latina (García Márquez) 1983
Soledad sonora (V.Ocampo) 1950
Soledades de Babel (Benedetti) 1991
Solar de la conscience (Glissant) 1956
Soles truncos (Marqués) 1959
Solidão solitude (Dourado) 1972
Solitario de amor (Peri Rossi) 1988
Solo a dos voces (Paz) 1973
Solo de clarineta (Verissimo) 1973–76
Sólo mientras tanto (Benedetti) 1950
Sólo un aspecto (Gambaro) 1973
Solombar (Meireles) 1956
Solerón (Villaurrutia) 1954
Soluna (Asturias) 1955
Sombra (Eguren) 1929
Sombra del caudillo (Guzmán) 1929
Sombra del humo en el espejo (D’Halmar) 1924
Sombra e exílio (Dourado) 1950
Sombra ya pronto serás (Soriano) 1990
Sombras como cosas sólidas (Salazar Bondy) 1966
Sombras contra el muro (M.Rojas) 1964
Sombras de obras (Paz) 1983
Sombre del convento (Gálvez) 1917
Some Write to the Future (Dorffman) 1991
Somoza, expediente cerrado (Alegría) 1993
Son del corazón (López Velarde) 1932
Son entero (Guillén) 1947
Son of Man (Roa Bastos) 1965
Soñar despierto (Diego) 1988
Sonatinas (Ferré) 1989
Soñé que la nieve ardía (Skármeta) 1975
Sonetos a Sophía (Marechal) 1940
Sonetos de Italia (Asturias) 1965
Sonetos de lo diario (Paso) 1958
Sonetos del amor en octubre (Amorim) 1954
Sonetos del jardín (S.Ocampo) 1946
Song of Protest (Neruda) 1976
Song of the Heart (López Velarde) 1995
Sóngoro cosongo (Guillén) 1931
Sonhos d’ouro (Alencar) 1872
Sonrisas de Paris (crónicas) (García Calderón) 1920
Sopro do vida (Lispector) 1978
Sor Juana’s Dream (Juana Inés de la Cruz) 1986
Sorriso do lagarto (Ribeiro) 1989
Soulstorm (Lispector) 1989
South American Jungle Tales (Quiroga) 1922
Souvenir of the Ancient World (C.Andrade) 1976
Spain, Take This Cup from Me (Vallejo) 1974
Spanish Language in South America (Borges) 1964
Spider Hangs Too Far from the Ground (Cisneros) 1970
Splendour and Death of Joaquin Murieta (Neruda) 1966
Still Another Day (Neruda) 1984
Stones of Chile (Neruda) 1986
Stones of the Skies (Neruda) 1987
Stop! C’est magique! (Boal) 1980
Stories of Eva Luna (Allende) 1991
Story of a Shipwrecked Sailor (García Márquez) 1986
Storyteller (Vargas Llosa) 1989
Strange Pilgrims (García Márquez) 1993
Strange Things Happen Here (Valenzuela) 1979
Stream of Life (Lispector) 1989
Strong Wind (Asturias) 1969
Su majestad el fútbol (Galeano) 1968
Suave patria (López Velarde) 1983
Sub sole (Lillo) 1907
Sub terra (Lillo) 1904
Suecede lo que pasa (Gambaro) 1983
Suelo natal (Quiroga) 1931
Sueño (Juana Inés de la Cruz)
Sueño de los heroes (Bioy Casares) 1954
Sueño de una noche de Navidad (Cuadra) 1930
Sueño del ángel (Solórzano) 1960
Sueño realizado (Onetti) 1951
Sueños de mala muerte (Donoso) 1985
Sueños de Natacha (Ibarbourou) 1945
Sueños nucleares de Reagan (Dorfman) 1986
Sueños son vida (Jaimes Freyre) 1917
Sueños y realidades (Gorriti) 1865
Sugestões para uma nova política no Brasil (Freyre) 1956
Suicida (Reyes) 1917
Suicida com medo da morte (Boal) 1992
Suite de amor, angustia y soledad (Alegría) 1951
Sul da Bahia (Filho) 1976
Suma y sigue (Alegría) 1981
Sumiço da santa (Amado) 1988
Summa de Maqroll el Gaviero (Mutis) 1990
Sun Stone (Paz) 1963
Suor (Amado) 1934
Superman y sus amigos del alma (Dorfman) 1974
Supersticiones y buenos consejos (Cabrera) 1987
Susana y los jóvenes (Ibargüengoitia) 1955
Swallow and the Tomcat (Amado) 1982
Sweet and Sexy (Taboada Terán) 1977
Sweet Diamond Dust (Ferré) 1988
Tabaré (Zorrilla de San Martin) 1888
Taberna y otros lugares (Dalton) 1969
Tacto de la araña (Salazar Bondy) 1966
Tagore en las barrancas de San Isidro (V.Ocampo) 1961
Tajimara y el gato (García Ponce) 1986
Tal Lucas (Cortázar) 1979
Tala (Mistral) 1938
Talvez poesia (Freyre) 1962
Tamaño de mi esperanza (Borges) 192.6
Tamarugal (Barrios) 1944
Tamayo en la pintura mexicana (Paz) 1959
Tan triste como ella (Onetti) 1963
Tangarúpá (Amorim) 1925
Tango (Sábado) 1963
Tañido de una flauta (Pitol) 1972
Tantas veces Pedro (Bryce Echenique) 1981
Tapadas (Mariátegui) 1976
Taratuta (Donoso) 1990
Tarde (Bilac) 1919
Tarde del dinosuro (Peri Rossi) 1976
Tarde o temprano (Pacheco) 1980
Taxi e crónicas no Diário Nacional (M.Andrade) 1976
Teatro de las humildes (Herrera y Reissig) 1913
Teatro de signos/transparencias (Paz) 1974
Teatro do oprimido (Boal) 1974
Tebaida (Uslar Pietri) 1958
Tebas do meu coração (Piñón) 1974
Técnicas latinoamericanas de teatro popular (Boal) 1975
Teia (Dourado) 1947
Telescopio en la noche oscura (Cardenal) 1993
Temas de amor (Amorim) 1960
Temas de educación (Mariátegui) 1970
Temas de nuestra America (Mariátegui) 1960
Temas y variaciones (Edwards) 1969
Temblar Katatay (Arguedas) 1972
Temblar/El sueño del pongo (Arguedas) 1980
Temblor de cielo (Huidobro) 1931
Tempest (Césaire) 1985
Tempête (Césaire) 1969
Tempo das frutas (Piñón) 1966
Tempo de amar (Dourado) 1952
Tempo de aprendiz (Freyre) 1979
Tempo e eternidade (Mendes) 1935
Tempo e o vento (Veríssimo) 1949
Tempo espanhol (Mendes) 1959
Tempo morto e outros tempos (Freyre) 1978
Tenda dos milagres (Amado) 1969
Tengo (Guillén) 1964
Tenía que suceder (Larreta) 1943
Tent of Miracles (Amado) 1971
Tentativa del hombre infinito (Neruda) 1926
Tentativas y orientaciones (Reyes) 1944
Teología y pornografía (García Ponce) 1975
Teoría del infierno (Elizondo) 1992
Teoría do não-objeto (Gullar) 1959
Terceira feira (Melo Neto) 1961
Tercer libro de las odas (Neruda) 1957
Tercera residencia (Neruda) 1947
Teresa (Villaverde) 1839
Teresa la limeña (Acosta de Samper) 1868
Tereza Batista (Amado) 1972
Termina el desfile (Arenas) 1981
Ternura (Mistral) 1924
Terra dos meninos pelados (Ramos) 1939
Terra Nostra (Fuentes) 1975
Terras do sem fim (Amado) 1943
Terre inquiète (Glissant) 1954
Terremoto y después (Benedetti) 1973
Terror argentino (Barrett) 1971
Tesoro de los incas (Gorriti) 1929
Tesoro perdido (Ibargüingoitía) 1960
Testamento del Pensador Mexican (Fernández de Lizardi) 1963
Testamento y despedida del Pensador Mexicano (Fernández de Lizardi) 1827
Testigo fugaz y disfrazado (Sarduy) 1985
Testimonio de Juan Peña (Reyes) 1930
Testimonios (V.Ocampo) 1935–77
Testimonios sobre Mariana (Garro) 1981
Testimonios teatrales de Méjico (Solórzano) 1973
Textos costeños (García Márquez) 1987
Thazar (Hibbert) 1907
Theater of the Oppressed (Boal) 1979
They Won’t Take Me Alive (Alegría) 1987
Third Bank of the River (Guimarães Rosa) 1968
This Earth, That Sky (Bandeira) 1988
This Endless Malice (Lihn) 1969
This Sunday (Donoso) 1967
Three Marias (Queiroz) 1963
Three Trapped Tigers (Cabrera Infante) 1971
Ti Jean L’Horizon (Schwarz-Bart) 1979
Tía Julia y el escribidor (Vargas Llosa) 1977
Tiempo de abrazar (Onetti) 1974
Tiempo de odio y angustia (Gálvez) 1951
Tiempo manual (Carrera Andrade) 1935
Tiempo mexicano (Fuentes) 1971
Tiempo nublado (Paz) 1983
Tiempo que destruye (Girri) 1952
Tiempo y las palabras (Adoum) 1992
Tiempos iluminados (Larreta) 1939
Tientos y diferencias (Carpentier) 1964
Tierra de nadie (Onetti) 1941
Tierra de promisión (Rivera) 1921
Tierra en la boca (Martínez Moreno) 1974
Tierra más ajena (Pizarnik) 1955
Tierra natal (Gorriti) 1889
Tierra pródiga (Yáñez) 1960
Tierra siempre verde (Carrera Andrade) 1955
Tierra venezolana (Uslar Pietri) 1953
Tierras de la memoria (F.Hernández) 1965
Tierras flacas (Yáñez) 1962
Tierras solares (Dario) 1904
Tieta (Amado) 1977
Tigre (Aguilera Malta) 1956
Tigre azul (Galeano) 1988
Tigrela (Telles) 1986
Til (Alencar) 1872
Timbiras (Gonçalves Dias) 1857
Time and the Wind (Veríssimo) 1951
Time of the Hero (Vargas Llosa) 1966
Tinisima (Poniatowska) 1992
Tinku de laimes y jucumanis (Taboada Terán) 1970
Tiranosaurio del Paraguay da sus últimas boqueadas (Roa Bastos) 1986
Tiro libre (Skármeta) 1973
Tiros al blanco (actualidades políticas) (Tablada) 1909
Tito y Berenice (Marqués) 1970
Tlacotalpan (Poniatowska) 1987
To Live is to Love (Cardenal) 1972
To the Bay Bridge (Carrera Andrade) 1941
Tobogán (S.Ocampo) 1975
Tocaia grande (Amado) 1984
Tocar el cielo (Cardenal) 1983
Todas las rosas (Glantz) 1985
Todas las sangres (Arguedas) 1964
Todo al vuelo (Dario) 1912
Todo empezó el domingo (Poniatowska) 1963
Todo Mexico (Poniatowska) 1990–93
Todo puede suceder (Amorim) 1955
Todo veredor perecerá (Mallea) 1941
Todos los fuegos el fuego (Cortázar) 1966
Todos los gatos son pardos (Fuentes) 1970
Ton Beau capitaine (Schwarz-Bart) 1987
Tonel de Diógenes (González Prada) 1945
Tonight (Onetti) 1991
Topoemas (Paz) 1971
Tormenta (Vasconcelos) 1936
Torotumbo (Asturias) 1967
Torquemada (Boal) 1972
Torre (Mallea) 1951
Torre de Casandra (Lugones) 1919
Tortuga ecuestre (Moro) 1957
Tour Eiffel (Huidobro) 1918
Toussaint-Louverture (Césaire) 1960
Tout a coup (Huidobro) 1925
Tout-monde (Glissant) 1993
Trabajos del mar (Pacheco) 1983
Trabajos perdidos (Mutis) 1965
Trabajos y la noches (Pizarnik) 1965
Tradiciones (Palma) 1872–83
Tradiciones cuzqueñas (Matto de Turner) 1886
Trafalgar Square (Moro) 1954
Tráfico (Amorim) 1927
Tragedia de las equivocaciones (Villaurrutia) 1950
Tragedia de los ñáñigos (F.Ortiz) 1950
Tragedia de un hombre fuerte (Gálvez) 1922
Tragedia del padre Arenas (Fernández de Lizardi) 1827
Tragedia no mar (Castro Alves) 1880
Tragédie du Roi Christophe (Césaire) 1963
Tragedy of King Christophe (Césaire) 1970
Tragicomedia mexicana (Agustín) 1990–2
Traición de Rita Hayworth (Puig) 1968
Traidores (S.Ocampo) 1956
Traje del fantasma (Arlt) 1969
Trama celeste (Biyo Casares) 1948
Trampa del pajonal (Amorim) 1928
Transfiguración de Jesús en el Monte (García Marruz) 1947
Tránsito Guzmán (Gálvez) 1956
Transierro (G.Rojas) 1979
Trash (Almeida) 1978
Trasmallo (Salarrué) 1954
Tratados en La Habana (Lezama Lima) 1958
Travelling in the Family (C.Andrade) 1986
Travels in the United States in 1847 (Sarmiento) 1970
Traversée de la mangrove (Condé) 1989
Travesía (Dorfman) 1986
Travesía (M.Rojas) 1934
Travesía de extramares (Adán) 1950
Travesías (Mallea) 1961–62
Trayectoria de Goethe (Reyes) 1954
Trayectoria del polvo (Castellanos) 1948
Trehos escolhidos (Aranha) 1970
Tree Between Two Walls (Pacheco) 1969
Tree of Life (Condé) 1992
Tree Within (Paz) 1988
Tregua (Benedetti) 1960
Treinta hombres y sus sombras (Uslar Pietri) 1949
37 poemas de Mao Tsetung (Adoum) 1974
Trepadora (Gallegos) 1925
Tres aproximaciones a la literatura de nuestro tiempo (Sábato) 1968
Tres caras de Venus (Marechal) 1970
Tres de cuatro soles (Asturias) 1977
Tres discursos para dos aldeas (Fuentes) 1993
Três histórias na praia (Dourado) 1955
Três histórias no internato (Dourado) 1978
Tres inmensas novelas (Huidobro) 1935
Três Marias (Queiroz) 1939
Tres novelitas burguesas (Donoso) 1973
Tres poemas sobre la Pasion (Marechal) 1967
Três porquinhos pobres (Veríssimo) 1937
338171 T.E. (V. Ocampo) 1942
Tres tristes tigres (Cabrera Infante) 1965
Trescientos millones (Arlt) 1932
Trials of a Respectable Family (Azuela) 1979
Tribulaciones de una familia decente (Azuela) 1918
Trilce (Vallejo) 1922
Trilogía cristiana (Güiraldes) 1915
Trilogia do exílio (O. Andrade) 1917–21
Triple Cross (Sarduy) 1972
Triste fin de Policarpo Quaresma (Barreto) 1915
Triste piel del universo (Mallea) 1971
Triste, solitario y final (Soriano) 1973
Trombata do anjo vingador (Trevisan) 1977
Tronco do ipê (Alencar) 1871
Tropical Night Falling (Puig) 1991
Trozos de vida (González Prada) 1933
Truce (Benedetti) 1969
True and False Romances (Vega) 1994
Trueno entre las hojas (Roa Bastos) 1953
Truenos y arco iris (G. Belli) 1982
Tu, so tu, puro amor (Machado de Assis) 1881
Tuerto es rey (Fuentes) 1970
Tumaméia (Guimarães Rosa) 1967
Tumba (Agustín) 1964
Tumba del relámpago (Scorza) 1979
Tumba sin nombre (Onetti) 1959
Túnel (Sábato) 1948
Tungsten (Vallejo) 1988
Tungsten (Vallejo) 1931
Tunnel (Sábato) 1988
Túpac Amarú (Viñas) 1974
Turista en el Cercano Oriente (Uslar Pietri) 1960
Turno do ofendido (Dalton) 1962
Tutú Marambá (Walsh) 1960
Twentieth-Century Job (Cabrera Infante) 1991
Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair (Neruda) 1969
Two Crimes (Ibargüengoitia) 1984

Ubirajara (Alencar) 1874
Ulises criollo (Vasconcelos) 1935
Última aventura del llanero solitario (Dorfman) 1979
Última canción de Manuel Sendero (Dorfman) 1982
Última escala del tramp steamer (Mutis) 1989
Última inocencia (Pizarnik) 1976
Última lección (Loveira) 1924
Última mudanza de Felipe Carrillo (Bryce Echenique) 1988
Última niebla (Bombal) 1935
Última noche de Dostoievski (Peri Rossi) 1992
Última Tule (Reyes) 1942
Última voluntad (Carrión) 1903
Últimas estrofes (Castro Alves) 1895
Último guajolote (Poniatowska) 1982
Último patriota (Gallegos) 1957
Último rostro (Mutis) 1990
Último round (Cortázar) 1969
Último solar (Gallegos) 1920
Último viaje (Benedetti) 1951
Último viaje del buque fantasma (García Márquez) 1976
Últimos días de una casa (Loynaz) 1958
Ulramar (Viñas) 1980
Una y otra Venezuela (Uslar Pietri) 1950
Under a Mantle of Stars (Puig) 1985
Underdogs (Azuela) 1992
Unidad de lugar (Saer) 1967
Union (García Ponce) 1974
Unipersonal de Don Agustín de Iturbide (Fernández de Lizardi) 1823
Universal History of Infamy (Borges) 1971
Uno y el universo (Sábato) 1945
Uno y la multitud (Gálvez) 1955
Until We Meet Again (Poniatowska) 1987
Up Among the Eagles (Valenzuela) 1988
Urso com música na barriga (Veríssimo) 1938
Úselo y tírelo (Galeano) 1994
Usina (Rego) 1936
Uso de la palabra (Castellanos) 1974
Ustedes, por ejemplo (Benedetti) 1953
Utopía arcaica (Vargas Llosa) 1978
Uvas y el viento (Neruda) 1954

Vaca sagrada (Eltit) 1991
Vaga música (Meireles) 1942
Vagamundo (Galeano) 1973
Valiente mundo nuevo (Fuentes) 1990
Valle de las hamacas (Argueta) 1970
Valores diarios (Girri) 1970
Valores humanos (Uslar Pietri) 1955
Vals de los reptiles (Scorza) 1970
Vals de Mefisto (Pitol) 1984
Valses y otras falsas confesiones (Varela) 1972
Vampire of Curitiba (Trevisan) 1972
Vampiro de Curitiba (Trevisan) 1965
Vanguardia e subdesenvolvimento: ensaios sobre arte (Gullar) 1969
Vanguardías literarias (Martínez Moreno) 1969
Vanishing Point (Cabrera Infante) 1970
Varia invención (Arreola) 1949
Variaciones en clave de mí (Alegría) 1993
Várias histórias (Machado de Assis) 1896
Vastas emoções e pensamentos imperfectos (Fonseca) 1988
Végetations de clarté (Depestre) 1951
Vegetations of Splendor (Depestre) 1981
Veinte años (Amorim) 1920
Veinte poemas de amor y una canción desesperada (Neruda) 1924
Veinte poemas para ser leídos en el tranvía (Girondo) 1922
Veladas literarias de Lima (Gorriti) 1892,
Velhas (Filho) 1975
Velhos marinheiros (Amado) 1961
Velorio del solo (Gelman) 1961
Venas abiertas de America Latina (Galeano) 1971
Vencevalo (Ribeiro) 1974
Vendedora de nubes (Poniatowska) 1979
Venezolanos y el petróleo (Uslar Pietri) 1990
Venganza del cóndor (García Calderón) 192–4
Venha ver o pôr-do-sol (Telles) 1988
Ventana en el rostro (Dalton) 1961
Ventana sobre Sandino (Galeano) 1985
Verano (Donoso) 1955
Verano en Tenerife (Loynaz) 1958
Verão no aquário (Telles) 1963
Verbos y gerundios (Palma) 1877
Verdad de las mentiras (Vargas Llosa) 1990
Verdad y mentira (Reyes) 1950
Versificaçao em língua portuguesa (Bandeira) 1956
Versiones (Diego) 1970
Versiprosa (C. Andrade) 1967
Versos de Martí (García Marruz) 1968
Versos de salón (N. Parra) 1962
Versos del capitán (Neruda) 1952
Versos sencillos (Martí) 1891
Via crucis del hombre puertorriqueño (Marqués) 1971
Via crucis do corpo (Lispector) 1974
Via única (Alegría) 1965
Viagem (Meireles) 1939
Viagem (Ramos) 1954
Viagem a aurora do mundo (Veríssimo) 1939
Viagem maravilhosa (Aranha) 1929
Viaje a Ipanda (Arévalo Martínez) 1939
Viaje a La Habana (Arenas) 1990
Viaje a la semilla (Carpentier) 1944
Viaje a Nicaragua (Dario) 1909
Viaje al centro de la fábula (Monterroso) 1981
Viaje al país de los profetas (M. Rojas) 1969
Viaje alrededor de una mesa (Cortázar) 1970
Viaje de la primavera (Marechal) 1945
Viaje de recreo (Matto de Turner) 1909
Viaje olvidado (S. Ocampo) 1937
Viaje por países y libros (Carrera Andrade) 1961
Viaje superficial (Ibargüengoitia) 1960
Viajero de Agartha (Posse) 1989
Viajero y una de sus sombras (V.Ocampo) 1951
Viajeros (Jaimes Freyre) 1900
Viajes en la America ignota (Ibargüengoitia) 1972
Viajes, ensayos y fantasías (Asturias) 1981
Viajes por Europa, Africa y America (Sarmiento) 1849–51
Victor et les barricades (Condé) 1989
Victoria no viene sola (Amorim) 1952
Vida (Arévalo Martínez) 1914
Vida (Freyre) 1962
Vida (Herrera y Reissig) 1913
Vida blanca (Mallea) 1960
Vida breve (Onetti) 1950
Vida conyugal (Pitol) 1991
Vida de Abrán Lincoln (Sarmiento) 1866
Vida de Joana d’Arc (Veríssimo) 1940
Vida de Ximena (Salazar Bondy) 1960
Vida do elefante Basílio (Veríssimo) 1939
Vida e morte de M.J.Gonzaga de Sá (Barreto) 1919
Vida e paixão de Pandonar, o terrível (Ribeiro) 1983
Vida em segredo (Dourado) 1964
Vida en el amor (Cardenal) 1970
Vida entera (Piñera) 1960
Vida íntima de Laura (Lispector) 1974
Vida multiple (Gálvez) 1916
Vida nueva (Rodó) 1897–1900
Vida passada a limpo (C.Andrade) 1959
Vida perdurable (García Ponce) 1970
Vida real (Barnet) 1986
Vidas ejemplares (Giardinelli) 1982
Vidas secas (Ramos) 1938
Vie scélérate (Condé) 1987
Vieja Rosa (Arenas) 1980
Viendo mi vida pasar (Barnet) 1987
21 son los dolores (V.Parra) 1976
Viento distante (Pacheco) 1963
Viento entero (Paz) 1965
Viento fuerte (Asturias) 1949
Vientos contrarios (Huidobro) 1926
Vientos de exilio (Benedetti) 1983
Viernes de Dolores (Asturias) 1972
View of Dawn in the Tropics (Cabrera Infante) 1978
Vigilantes (Eltit) 1994
Vigilia del Almirante (Roa Bastos) 1992
Vigilia estéril (Castellanos) 1950
Vigilias (Alegría) 1953
Vila Real (Ribeiro) 1979
Vilbône (Morisseau-Leroy) 1982
Vilda exagerada de Martin Romaña (Bryce Echenique) 1981
Villagers (Icaza) 1964
Vingança de Charles Tiburone (Ribeiro) 1990
Viola de bolso (C. Andrade) 1952
Violencia y enajenación (Galeano) 1971
Violent Land (Amado) 1945
Viioleta del pueblo (V. Parra) 1976
Violetas e caracóis (Dourado) 1987
Violín y otras cuestiones (Gelman) 1956
Virgem louca, loucos beijos (Trevisan) 1979
Virgen del sol (Mera) 1861
Virgenes y mártires (Vega) 1981
Vision de Anáhuac (Reyes) 1917
Visionário (Mendes) 1941
Visita en el tiempo (Uslar Pietri) 1990
Visitaciones (García Marruz) 1970
Visitante de niebla (Carrera Andrade) 1947
Visitas al cielo (Amorim) 1929
Visitor of Mist (Carrera Andrade) 1950
Vislumbres de la India (Paz) 1995
Víspera del hombre (Marqués) 1959
Víspera indeleble (Benedetti) 1945
Vísperas de España (Reyes) 1937
Vísperas de Fausto (Bioy Casares) 1949
Vista del amanecer en el trópico (Cabrera Infante) 1974
Viudas (Dorfman) 1981
Viúvinha (Alencar) 1857
Viva o povo brasileiro (Ribeiro) 1984
Viva Sandino (García Márquez) 1982
Viventes das Alagoas (Ramos) 1962
Viviendo (Peri Rossi) 1963
Vocabulario Congo (Cabrera) 1985
Vocación terrena (Carrera Andrade) 1972
Vocation de l’élite (Price-Mars) 1919
Voces de nuestro tiempo (Galeano) 1981
Voices of the Dead (Dourado) 1980
Volcán y el colibrí (Carrera Andrade) 1970
Volta do gato preto (Veríssimo) 1946
Voluntad de vivir manifestándose (Arenas) 1989
Vorágine (Rivera) 1924
Vortex (Rivera) 1935
Voz de la vida (Lange) 1927
Voz desde la vigilia (Salazar Bondy) 1944
Voices d’África (Castro Alves) 1880
Vozes da cidade (Meireles) 1965
Vrindaban, Madurai (Paz) 1965
Vuelo de buen cubero (Bryce Echenique) 1988
Vuelos de victoria (Cardenal) 1984
Vuelta (Paz) 1976
Vuelta al día en ochenta mundos (Cortázar) 1967
Vuelta completa (Saer) 1966
Vuelta de la locura (Cuadra) 1932
Vuelta de Martín Fierro (J. Hernández) 1879
Vueltas del tiempo (Yáñez) 1973
Vulcão e a fonte (Rego) 1958
Wager (Machado de Assis) 1990
Walking Words (Galeano) 1995
War of the End of the World (Vargas Llosa) 1984
War of the Saints (Amado) 1993
War on Time (Carpentier) 1970
Watch Where the Wolf is Going (Skármeta) 1991
We Love Glenda So Much (Cortázar) 1983
We Say No (Galeano) 1992
Week-end en Guatemala (Asturias) 1956
West Indies, Ltd (Guillén) 1934
When the Tom-Tom Beats (Roumain) 1995
Where the Air is Clear (Fuentes) 1960
Where the Island Sleeps like a Wing (Morejón) 1985
White Llama (García Calderón) 1938
White Teeth (Aguilera Malta) 1963
Who Killed Palomino Molero? (Vargas Llosa) 1987
Widows (Dorfman) 1983
Windy Morning (F.Hernández) 1977
Winners (Cortázar) 1965
Winter Garden (Neruda) 1986
Winter Quarters (Soriano) 1989
With Walker in Nicaragua (Cardenal) 1984
Witness (Saer) 1990
Woman Named Solitude (Schwarz-Bart) 1973
Woman of the River (Alegría) 1989
Woman who Killed the Fish (Lispector) 1988
Wonderwall (Cabrera Infante) 1968
World for Julius (Bryce Echenique) 1992
Writer in the Catastrophe of Our Time (Sábato) 1990
Writer’s Reality (Vargas Llosa) 1990
Writes of Passage (Cabrera Infante) 1993
Written on a Body (Sarduy) 1989

Xaimaca (Gúiraldes) 1923
X-Ray of the Pampa (Martínez Estrada) 1971

Y ahora, la mujer (Arreola) 1975
Y así cayó don Juan Manuel (Gálvez) 1954
Y así sucesivamente (S.Ocampo) 1987
Y este poema-río (Alegría) 1988
Y la vida sigue (Barrios) 1925
Y Matarazo no llamó (Garro) 1991
Yahualica (Yáñez) 1946
Yawar fiesta (Arguedas) 1941
Yayá García (Machado de Assis) 1976
Yemayá y Ochún (Cabrera) 1974
Yerro candente (Villaurrutia) 1945
Yesterday y mañana (Benedetti) 1987
¡Yo! (Campobello) 1929
Yo el Supremo (Roa Bastos) 1974
Yo fui feliz en Cuba (Loynaz) 1933
Yo me fui con tu nombre por la tierra (Adoum) 1964
Yo voy unos ojos negros (Yánez Cossío) 1979
Yo voy más lejos (Amorim) 1950
Young Lady from Tacna (Vargas Llosa) 1990
Youngest Doll (Ferré) 1991
Your Handsome Captain (Schwarz-Bart) 1989

Zaghi, mendigo (Jaimes Freyre) 1905
Zapato (Solórzano) 1966
Zarco (Altamirano) 1901
Zarco (Carrasquilla) 1925
Zero Hour (Cardenal) 1980
Zoe (Jaimes Freyre) 1894
Zogoibi (Larreta) 1926
Zona sagrada (Fuentes) 1967
Zoo loco (Walsh) 1964
Zorro de arriba y el zorro de abajo (Arguedas) 1971
Zoune chez sa ninnaine (Lhérisson) 1906
Zozobra (López Velarde) 1919
Abad, Diego José, 215
Abbad y Lasierra, Íñigo, 681
Abente, Carlos F., 622
Abente y Lago, Victorino, 620
Abreu, Caio Fernando, 147
Abreu, Casimiro de, 140
Abri, Xavier, 853
Acevedo Díaz, Eduardo, 580, 810
Acevedo Hernández, Antonio, 792
Achúgar, Hugo, 811
Acosta, Agustín, 237, 240
Acosta, Cecilio, 839
Acosta, Delfina, 622
Acosta, Ivan, 243
Acosta, José de, 216, 217
Acosta, Oscar, 426
Acosta, Wilfredo Máximo, 622
Acosta de Samper, Soledad, 1–3, 163, 856
Acuña, Jorge, 791
Acuña de Figueroa, Francisco, 809
Adán, Martín, 3–4, 285, 648, 853
Adolph, José B., 760
Adoum, Jorge Enrique, 5–8
Agosín, Marjorie, 449, 801
Agosti, Héctor, 531
Aguado, Pedro de, 210
Agueros, Jack, 687
Aguiar, Adriano M., 620
Aguilar, Rosario, 108
Aguilar Mora, Jorge, 672
Aguilera Garraimu, Marco Tulio, 232
Aguilera Malta, Demetrio, 14–16, 280, 434, 704
Aguinis, Marcos, 449
Aguirre, Isidora, 793
Aguirre, Margarita, 201
Aguirre, Mirta, 194, 238
Aguirre, Nataniel, 127
Aguirre, Raúl Gustavo, 63
Agustín, José, 16–18, 554, 636, 671, 672, 744
Agustini, Delmira, 18–20, 295, 431, 810
Ahunchán, Alvaro, 794
Alba, Patricia, 650
Albán, Laureano, 232
Alberdi, Juan Bautista, 55, 56, 57, 296, 465, 515, 516, 580
Albizu Campos, Pedro, 683
Albizures, Miguel Ángel, 388
Albizúrez Palma, Francisco, 388
Alcántara Almánzar, José, 264
Alcides, Rafael, 240
Alegre, Francisco Javier, 215
Alegre, Manuel Araújo Porto, 140
Alegría, Alonso, 648
Alegría, Ciro, 400, 465, 493, 648, 800
Alegría, Claribel, 20–23, 290
Aleixandre, Vicente, 93
Alemán, Vicente, 426
Alencar, José de, 23–25, 140, 141, 142, 312, 319, 559, 713, 727, 728, 786, 799
Alexis, Jacques-Stéphen, 25–27, 255, 320, 473
Alfaro, Hugo, 451
Alfaro Cooper, José María, 230
Algarín, Miguel, 687, 688
Allende, Isabel, 115–17, 201, 302, 507, 550, 630, 671, 672, 673, 801, 856
Allende, Salvador, 269, 270, 283, 530, 765, 766, 767
Almáfuerte, 60
Almeida, José Américo de, 27–28, 145, 234, 695, 703
Almeida, Júlia Lopes de, 143
Almeida, Manuel Antônio de, 141
Alonso, Dora, 194, 238, 490
Alonso, Manuel, 681, 682
Alonso, Rodolfo, 63
Alonso y Trelles, José, 811
Alpersohn, Marcos, 448
Alsina, José Arturo, 623
Altamirano, Carlos, 453
Altamirano, Ignacio Manuel, 29–30, 545, 547, 548, 580, 855
Alva Ixtlixóchitl, Fernando de, 213
Alvarado Tezozomoc, Hernando de, 213
Alvarenga, Manuel Inácio da Silva, 140
Alvares de Azevedo, Josephina, 300
Álvarez, Cecilia, 812
Álvarez, Julia, 266
Álvarez, Luis, 240
Álvarez, Soledad, 264
Álvarez Baragaño, José, 240
Álvarez Castro, Miguel, 287
Álvarez de Velasco y Zorrilla, Francisco, 211
Álvarez Gardeazabal, Gustavo, 208
Álvarez Lleras, Antonio, 788
Álvaro Bravo, Armando, 240
Alves, Miriam, 12
Alvim, Francisco (Chico), 146
Amado, Jorge, 11, 12, 31–33, 145, 257, 313, 319, 465, 530, 664, 695, 703, 705
Amaral, Maria Adelaide, 787
Amaral, Raúl, 623
Amaral, Suzana, 313, 485
Amaral, Tarsila do, 143, 144
Amarilis, 217
Amaya Amador, Ramón, 426, 426
Ambrogi, Arturo, 287, 288
Amorim, Enrique, 36–37, 367
Amunátegui, Miguel Luis, 196
Anarchism, 100, 724
Anaya, Rudolfo, 191, 192
Anchieta, José de, 785, 798
Anderson, Benedict, 318
Anderson Imbert, Enrique, 257
Andrade, Carlos Drummond de, 38–41, 42, 144, 559, 782, 799
Andrade, Joaquim Pedro de, 312, 313
Andrade, Jorge, 786
Andrade, Mário de, 11, 41–43, 143, 144, 313, 398, 439, 475, 559, 713, 772, 786
Andrade, Olegario V., 58, 60
Andrade, Oswald de, 11, 44–46, 143, 144, 145, 219, 475, 559, 786, 799
Ángel, Alucía, 209
Ansaldo Briones, Cecilia, 282
Antanasio Fuentes, Manuel, 646
Antín, Manuel, 403
Antonia Lucía del Espíritu Santo, 217
Anzaldúa, Gloria, 192, 437, 588
Apollinaire, Guillaume, 368, 428
Appleward, José Luis, 621, 623
Aragón, J. Emilio, 287
Aragon, Louis, 606
Arango, Ángel, 760
Arango, Luis Alfredo, 387
Arango y Parreño, Francisco de, 235
Aranha, José Pereira da Graça, 46–47, 144
Arau, Alfonso, 316
Araujo, Max, 388
Araujo, Roberto, 290
Araya, Seidy, 232
Arbéleche, Jorge, 811
Arbez, Jacobo, 387
Arce, Manuel José, 388
Arciniegas, Germán, 815
Ardaio, Arturo, 811
Arenas, Braulio, 199, 200, 775
Arenas, Reinaldo, 48–52, 167, 240, 243, 295, 475, 544, 667, 672, 673, 784
Aréstegui, Narciso, 646
Arévalo Martínez, Rafael, 52–53, 385, 386
Arévalo, Juan José, 387
Arguedas, Alcides, 127, 128, 400
Arguedas, José María, 65–67, 121, 193, 216, 294, 440, 441, 491, 507, 530, 574, 648, 649, 694, 716, 758, 762, 797, 853, 854
Argüelles, Hugo, 790
Argüello, Manuel E.B., 623
Argüello Mora, Manuel, 230
Argueta, Manlio, 68–70, 230, 248, 290, 746
Arias, Abelardo, 62
Arias, Arturo, 388
Arias, Aurora, 264
Aridjis, Homero, 466, 554, 674
Arinos de Melo Franco, Afonso, 142
Arlt, Roberto, 70–73, 227, 491, 597, 651, 669, 760
Armand, Octavio, 243
Arosemena, Justo, 615
Arosemena, Mariano, 615
Arósteguy, Abdón, 59
Arozarena, Marcelino, 13
Arráiz Lucca, Rafael, 840
Arreola, Juan José, 74–76, 552, 635
Arrieta, Rafael A., 60
Arroyo, Anita, 194
Arroyo, Justo, 618
Arrufat, Antón, 240, 241, 452, 544, 789
Artaud, Antonin, 768, 775
Arteche, Miguel, 198, 199
Arzáns Orsúa y Vela, Bartolomé de, 126, 127
Arzola, Marina, 685
Ascasubi, Hilario, 54, 404, 809
Ascensio Segura, Manuel, 646
Asimov, Isaac, 760
Asis, Jorge, 63
Assunção, Leilah, 787
Asturias, Miguel Ángel, 52, 76–81, 133, 386, 388, 389, 441, 465, 475, 506, 530, 574, 627, 678, 704, 758, 775, 776
Athayde, Roberto, 787
August, Bille, 316
Avant-Garde, 83–84, 219, 304, 368, 386, 404, 428, 467, 494, 546, 550, 551, 559, 588, 647, 669, 673, 683, 708, 775, 790, 800, 816, 825, 844, 853
Avila, Affonso, 146
Avila, Francisco de, 216, 693
Avila Echazú, Edgar, 127
Avilés Fabila, René, 554
Ayala Aquino, Gumercindo, 622
Aybar, Manuela, 263
Aymara Literature, 85–87, 128, 780
Azar, Héctor, 790
Azcona de Cranwell, Elizabeth, 63
Azevedo, Aluíssio, 24, 87–89, 142, 143
Azevedo, Artur, 786
Azevedo, Manuel Álvares de, 140, 395
Azofeifa, Isaac Felipe, 232
Aztec Empire, 35, 577
Azuaga, Moncho, 621
Azuela, Mariano, 89–92, 314, 465, 549, 704, 801, 803
Babenco, Hector, 316
Babiana Benítez, María, 681
Baca, Jimmy Santiago, 192
Bacardi, Emilio, 238
Bacelo, Nancy, 811
Báez, Cecilio, 623
Báez, Ernesto, 623
Bähr, Eduardo, 426
Bakhtin, Mikhail, 718
Balboa, Silvestre de, 235
Balbuena, Bernardo de, 213, 465
Balcárcel, José Luis, 387
Ballagas, Emilio, 13, 93–94, 238
Balsells Rivera, Alfredo, 386
Balza, José, 840
Balzac, Honoré de, 420, 840
Banchero, Anderssen, 811
Banchs, Enrique, 60
Bandeira, Manuel, 42, 94–96, 143, 559, 799
Baquero, Gaston, 239, 240, 260
Baquíjano y Carrillo, José, 218
Baralt, Guillermo A., 684
Baralt, Rafael María, 839
Barba Jacob, Porfirio, 295, 386
Barbieri, Vicente, 61
Bardanca, Héctor, 812
Barreiro Saguier, Rubén, 621, 622, 623
Barletta, Leónidas, 61, 71, 792
Barnet, Miguel, 82, 96–97, 240, 660, 672, 758, 784
Barnoya, José, 388
Baroque, 210, 213, 214, 245, 456, 457, 460, 461, 510
Barra, Eduardo de la, 197
Barrán, José Pedro, 811
Barreda, Gabino, 545
Barrera, Claudio, 426
Barrera Valverde, Alfonso, 281
Barreto, Afonso Henrìques de Lima, 98–99, 145
Barreto, Bruno, 313
Barreto, Lefty, 687
Barreto, Tobias, 728, 729
Barrett, Rafael, 100–02, 620, 623
Barrios, Eduardo, 103–05, 197, 556, 705
Barrios, Francisco, 623
Barrios de Chungara, Domitila, 128, 512, 601, 784
Barros, Pía, 201
Barros, Raquel, 199
Barros Arana, Diego, 196
Barros Grez, Daniel, 196, 792
Barroso, María Alice, 257
Barrubia, Lalo, 812
Barthes, Roland, 372, 452, 543, 550, 625, 753
Basileo Acuña, José, 231, 232
Basutro, Luis G., 790
Bataille, Georges, 372
Batres Montúfar, José, 287, 385
Baudelaire, Charles, 777
Bauzá, Francisco, 810
Bayley, Edgar, 63
Beauvoir, Simone de, 182, 301, 308
Becciú, Ana, 658
Becerra, José Carlos, 553
Beckett, Samuel, 734, 800
Bécquer, Gustavo Adolfo, 355, 614
Belén, José Pedro, 811
Bellesi, Diana, 63
Belli, Carlos Germán 105–08, 649
Belli, Gioconda, 108–09, 390, 466, 590
Belmat, Daniel, 200
Belmonte Pool, Aureliano, 127
Bemberg, María Luisa, 315
Benaros, León, 61
Benavides, Washington, 811
Bendaña, Armando, 388
Bendezú, Francisco, 648
Benedetti, Giovanni, 617
Benedetti, Mario, 112–14, 450, 52–8, 671, 811
Béneke, Walter, 289
Benítez Pereira, Ovidio, 623
Benítez Rojo, Antonio, 243
Benjamin, Walter, 372, 799
Bergson, Henri, 413
Berman, Sabina, 295, 372, 553, 790
Bermúdez, María Elvira, 257
Bermúdez, Ricardo J., 617
Bernabé, Jean, 188
Bernal, Emilia, 238
Bernard, Eulalia, 10, 232
Bernard de Saint-Pierre, Jacques-Henri, 437, 727
Berrón, Linda, 232
Bertrand, Victoria, 427
Best-Sellers, 115–18, 395
Biagioni, Amelia, 63
Bianchi, Alfredo, 60
Bianco, José, 454, 467, 653
Bibliowicz, Azriel, 450
Bilac, Olavo, 119–20, 143
Bilbao, Francisco, 196
Bilbao, Manuel, 422
Bildungsroman, 120–21, 173, 192, 205, 403, 689, 744
Bins, Patricia, 147
Bioy Casares, Adolfo, 62, 121–24, 135, 257, 454, 594, 760
Birri, Fernando, 314, 316
Bivar e Velasco, Violante Atabalipa Ximenes de, 300
Blanco, Andrés Eloy, 840
Blanco, Eduardo, 839
Blanco, Guillermo, 201
Blanco, Tomás, 684
Blanco Fombona, Rufino, 839
Blest Gana, Alberto, 196, 580, 669, 792
Blonda, Máximo A., 264
Bly, Robert, 800
Boal, Augusto, 124–26, 787, 789, 858
Boedo group, 61, 70, 84, 401
Bogado Rolón, Zenón, 622
Bolet Peraza, Nicanor, 839
Bolio, Dolores, 546, 548
Bolívar, Simón, 110, 353, 354, 436, 579, 591, 615, 721, 797, 838
Bolt, Alan, 601, 859
Bombal, María Luisa, 130–32, 200, 468, 697
Bonilla, Abelardo, 232
Bonnet de Mendonça, Neida, 621
Bopp, Raúl, 11, 144, 439
Borbollo, Oscar de la, 553
Borges, Jorge Luis, 36, 60, 61, 62, 121, 133, 134–39, 163, 193, 205, 251, 257, 297, 315, 367, 370, 401, 403, 447, 454, 466, 475, 491, 510, 543, 544, 562, 594, 625, 651, 673, 674, 678, 711, 742, 760, 800, 801
Borges, Tomás, 590
Borinsky, Alicia, 449
Borja, Arturo, 281
Bórquez Solat, Antonio, 197
Bortnik, Aída, 449
Bosch, Juan, 265
Bosco, María Angélica, 62, 257
Boti, Regino, 237
Boucicault, Dion, 390
Boullosa, Carmen, 372, 554
Bradbury, Ray, 760
Brailovsky, Elio, 449
Brandão, Ignácio Loyola, 146
Brannon, Carmen, 288
Brañas, César, 386
Braque, Georges, 452
Bravo, Luis, 812
Bravo de Lagunas y Villela, Josefa, 217
Bray, Arturo, 623
Brecht, Bertolt, 125, 852
Breton, André, 187, 454, 775
Briceño Iragorry, Mario, 840
Brito, Antonio Carlos de, 146
Britto García, Luis, 760, 840
Britton, Rosa María, 618
Brontë, Emily, 732
Brown, Melvin, 10
Brown, Norman O., 452
Brull, Mariano, 93, 238
Brunet, Marta, 193, 199, 200
Bryce Echenique, Alfredo, 148–51, 649
Buarque, Chico, 787
Buenaventura, Enrique, 788
Bufano, Alfredo R., 60
Buitrago, Fanny, 151–52, 209
Bullrich, Silvina, 62
Burgos, Julia de, 308, 683, 685, 687, 688
Burgos Debray, Elizabeth, 784
Buscaglia, Horacio, 812
Bustamente, Carlos, 287
Bustamente y Montoro, Antonio Sánchez de, 238
Butazzoni, Fernando, 812
Byron, Lord, 58, 140, 515, 726, 772, 799

Caballero Calderón, Eduardo, 207, 208
Cabañas, Esteban, 622
Cabello de Carbonera, Mercedes, 646, 856
Cabezas, Omar, 590, 784
Cabral, Amilcar, 10, 12, 13
Cabral, Manuel del, 264
Cabrales, Luis Alberto, 588
Cabrera, Fernando, 812
Cabrera, Lydia, 153–55, 238, 240, 242, 452, 455, 627, 758
Cabrera, Raimundo, 238
Cabrera, Sarandy, 811
Cabrera Infante, Guillermo, 133, 155–57, 240, 294, 315, 451, 455, 475, 544, 673, 800
Cacaso, 146
Cáceres, Jorge, 199, 455
Cáceres Lara, Victor, 425
Cadenas, Rafael, 840
Cagigal, Juan Manuel, 839
Caicedo, Andrés, 208
Cairo, Humberto, 314
Calcaño, José Antonio, 839
Caldas, Francisco José de, 211
Calderón, Daniel, 792
Calderón, Fernando, 545
Calderón Badillo, Juana, 217
Calderón de la Barca, Pedro, 458
Calixto Mixco, José, 287
Callado, Antônio, 147, 439
Calvo, Lino Novás, 257
Calvo de la Riba, Andrés, 211
Calzadilla, Juan, 840
Calzadilla, Julia, 194
Camacho Ramírez, Arturo, 208
Camargo, Oswaldo, 11
Camarillo, María Enriquetta, 546
Cambacaeres, Eugenio, 59, 159–60
Caminha, Adolfo, 142, 143, 295
Camões, Luis de, 438
Campbell, Federico, 554
Campo, Ángel de, 547
Campo, Estanislao del, 57, 809
Campobello, Nellie, 161–62, 550
Campos, Augusto de, 146, 219, 220, 799
Campos, Haroldo de, 146, 219, 491, 799
Campos, Julieta, 302
Campos, Marco Antonio, 554
Campos, Rubén M., 548
Campos Cervera, Hérib, 622, 716
Camus, Albert, 283, 452, 507, 768
Canal Feijóo, Bernardo, 62
Cañas, Juan J., 287
Cancela, Arturo, 62
Candelario, Nash, 192
Candelier, Bruno Rosario, 264
Cândido, Antônio, 490, 491, 703, 729
Cane, Miguel, 59
Cane’k, Caly Domitia, 387, 389
Canese, Jorge, 622
Canon, (Latin American Literary Canon) 55, 60, 163–64, 212, 242, 302, 370, 382, 515, 528, 545, 547, 579, 595, 616, 632, 685, 708, 710, 784, 789, 809, 840, 843, 857
Cantón, Wilberto, 790
Capdevila, Arturo, 60
Carballido, Emilio, 790
Carbet, Marie-Magdeleine, 453
Carbonell, Miguel Ángel, 238
Cárcomo, Jacobo, 426
Cardenal, Ernesto, 106, 164–68, 390, 530, 583, 588, 589, 612, 759, 775, 803, 840, 859
Cardenal, Fernando, 490
Cárdenas, Esteban Luis, 241
Cárdenas Acuña, Ignacio, 257
Cárdenas Franco, Adolfo, 129
Cardi, Juan Ángel, 257
Cardona, Rafael, 231
Cardoso, Lúcio, 799
Cardoso, Onelio Jorge, 23 8
Cardoza y Aragón, Luis, 52, 297, 386
Cardozo, Efraím, 623
Carias Andino, Tiburcio, 426
Carias Reyes, Marcos, 426
Carias Zapata, Marcos, 426
Caro, Miguel Antonio, 208
Carranzas, Eduardo, 208
Carrara, Adelaide, 667
Carrasco, Josefa, 425
Carrasquilla, Tomás, 174–75, 206, 207
Carrera, Arturo, 63
Carrera, Margarita, 387
Carrera, Mario Alberto, 388
Carrera Andrade, Jorge, 175–78, 281
Carreras, Roberto de las, 419, 810
Carriego, Evaristo, 60
Carrillo, Enrique A., 646
Carrillo, Hugo, 387
Carrillo Puerto, Elvia, 301
Carrington, Leonora, 602
Carrió de la Vandera, Alonso, 217, 245
Carrión, Miguel de, 178–79, 238
Carroll, Lewis, 851
Cartagena Portalatín, Aída, 264, 265
Carvajal, Maria Isabel, 231
Carvalho, Flávio de, 786
Carvalho, Vicente de, 143
Casaccia, Gabriel, 620, 621
Casacuberta, Pablo, 812
Casal, Julián del, 180–81, 237, 287, 545, 561, 616, 763
Casal, Lourdes, 243
Casanova, Olga, 684
Casey, Calvert, 240, 452
Casola, Augusto, 621
Cassani, José, 211
Castelat, José Adán, 427
Castellanos, Francisco José, 238
Castellanos, Jesús, 238
Castellanos, Juan de, 210, 465
Castellanos, Rosario, 106, 115, 121, 181–83, 441, 542
Castellanos Moya, Horacio, 290, 426
Castelnuevo, Elías, 61
Castera, Pedro, 548
Castilla, Manuel J., 63
Castillo, Ana, 192
Castillo, Andrés, 793, 811
Castillo, Otto René, 387, 389
Castillo, Roberto, 426
Castillo y Guevara, Francisca Josefía de, 211, 223
Castro, Alfredo, 794
Castro, Diego de (Titu Cusi Yupanqui), 216, 693
Castro, Fidel, 202, 283, 316, 389, 489, 490, 722, 784, 789, 806, 833
Castro, Oscar, 200, 677
Castro Alves, Antônio de, 140, 141, 184–85, 727
Castro Madriz, José María, 229, 230
Castro Ríos, Andrés, 685
Catalá, Rafael, 243, 759
Catholic Church, 100, 223, 301, 423, 482, 497, 541, 583, 604, 679, 788, 798
Cavé, Syto, 321
Cea, Roberto, 290
Ceballos, Ciro B., 548
Celedón, Mauricio, 794
Cendrars, Blaise, 144
Centurión, Carlos R., 623
Centurión, Juan Cristóto, 620
Centurión Miranada, Roque, 623
Cepeda Samudio, Álvaro, 207
Cerda, Matha, 553
Cerezo Dardón, Hugo, 388
Cernuda, Luis, 93, 452
Cerruto, Oscar, 127
Cervantes, Lorna Dee, 192
Cervantes de Salazar, Francisco, 215
Césaire, Aimé, 158, 187–90, 221, 264, 321, 322, 373, 453, 454, 581
Césaire, Suzanne, 454
César, Ana Cristina, 146
Ceselli, Juan José, 63
Céspedes, Augusto, 128
Cetina Gutiérrez, Rita, 301
Chacal, 146
Chacón, Joaquín-Armando, 554
Chacón y Calvo, José María, 238
Chamoiseau, Patrick, 188, 322
Chandler, Raymond, 770
Chang Marín, Carlos F., 617
Chariarse, Leopoldo, 648
Chase, Alfonso, 232
Chateaubriand, François-René, vicomte de, 437, 439, 442, 541, 668, 727
Chauvet, Marie, 321
Chavarri, Jaime, 316
Chaves, Emilio Pérez, 622
Chaves, Fernando, 434
Chaves, Julio César, 623
Chaves, Osvaldo, 623
Chaves de Ferreiro, Ana Iris, 621
Chaves Neto, João Ribeiro, 787
Chávez, Denise, 794
Chaviano, Daina, 240, 760
Chihuailaf, Elicura, 199
Chilam Balam, 534, 535
Chioino, José, 648
Chocano, José Santos, 561, 646
Chocrón, Isaaz, 449
Chuez, Enrique, 618
Churata, Gamaliel, 648
Cifuentes, Edwin, 388
Cintrón, Humberto, 687
Cioppo, Atahualpa de, 793
Cisneros, Antonio, 105, 202–03, 650
Cisneros, Luis Benjamín, 646, 855
Cisneros, Sandra, 192
Civilization and Barbarism, 45, 55, 56, 57, 204–05, 339, 340, 341, 382, 436, 465, 466, 507, 809, 855
Cixous, Hélène, 295, 485
Clarke, Arthur C., 760
Claudel, Paul, 588
Clavijero, Francisco de, 214, 215
Clitandre, Pierre, 321
Cocteau, Jean, 428, 843
Coelho Neto, Henrique, 142, 143, 144
Coelho Neto, Maximiniano, 257
Cofiño, Manuel, 240
Cojulén Bedoya, Carlos, 388
Colasanti, Marina, 147
Colchic, Thomas, 801
Coll, Pedro Emilio, 839
Collazo, Miguel, 760
Collazos, Oscar, 672
Colmán, Narciso R., 622
Coloane, Francisco, 200
Colón, Jesús, 686, 687, 688
Columbus, Christopher, 33, 34, 96, 158, 169, 174, 189, 204, 216, 296, 439, 465, 669, 670, 717, 727, 758
Colunje, Gil, 615
Communist Party, 31, 70, 188, 231, 320, 391, 488, 531, 583
Comte, Auguste, 196, 668
Concepción, Catalina María de la, 211
Concolorcorvo, 245
Concrete Poetry, 145, 146, 219–20, 772, 799
Condé, Maryse, 220–22, 323
Condori, Ana María, 128
Condori Mamani, Gregorio, 694
Confiant, Raphaël, 188, 322
Congrains Martin, Enrique, 649
Conquest of America, 34
Conteras Castro, Fernando, 759
Conteris, Híber, 811
Conti, Haroldo, 62, 848
Contreras, Francisco, 197
Contreras, Gonzalo, 201
Contreras, Hilma, 265
Contreras, Raúl, 289
Cooper, James Fenimore, 437
Cordero, Luis, 279
Córdova Iturburu, Cayetano, 61
Cornejo, Gerardo, 554
Coronel Urtecho, José, 108, 588
Corpi, Lucha, 191
Correa, Arnaldo, 257
Correa, Hugo, 201, 760
Correa, Julio, 623
Correa, Pedro, 617
Correas de Zapata, Celia, 801
Correia, Raimundo, 119, 143
Corretjer, Juan Antonio, 683, 687
Corrieri, Sergio, 789
Cortázar, Julio, 62, 115, 133, 224–29, 294, 296, 315, 454, 471, 544, 554, 602, 625, 626, 627, 674, 697, 775, 776, 800, 801
Cortázar, Mercedes, 243
Cortés, Hernán, 210, 213, 296
Cortés, Hernando, 791
Corylé, Mary, 282
Cosío Villegas, Daniel, 452
Cossa, Roberto, 793
Costa du Rels, Adolfo, 129
Costantini, Humberto, 449
Cotto-Thorner, Guillermo, 687
Courtoisie, Rafael, 812
Coutinho, Sonia, 147
Couto Castillo, Bernardo, 548
Cox de Stuven, Mariana, 197
Creacionismo, 83, 428
Crespo, Luis Alberto, 840
Crespo Toral, Remigio, 280
Crevel, René, 775
Crisóstomo, Laffinur, 53
Cruchaga, Rosa, 199
Cruchaga Santa María, Ángel, 198
Cruz, María, 385
Cruz, Nicky, 687
Cruz e Sousa, João da, 143
Cruz Varela, Juan, 53
Cruz Varela, María Elena, 240, 242
Cuadra, Abelardo, 784
Cuadra, José de la, 14, 233–35, 280, 434
Cuadra, Manolo, 588
Cuadra, Pablo Antonio, 466, 588
Cuban Revolution, 96, 112, 133, 155, 156, 170, 202, 206, 301, 347, 389, 454, 497, 530, 685, 806, 833
Cubism, 84
Cuéllar, José Tomás de, 546
Cuéllar, María Petronila, 211
Cuéllar, Teófano, 465
Cuenca, Agustín F., 545
Cueva, Agustín, 281, 531
Cuevas, Adán, 425
Cunha, Euclides da, 143, 145, 713, 758, 829
Cunha, Helena Parente, 147
Curi, Jorge, 793
Curotto, Ángel, 811
Cusi Yupanqui, Titu (Diego de Castro), 216, 693
Cuti, 12
Cuza Malé, Belkis, 240, 243

Dabove, Santiago, 760
Dada, 144
Dadaism, 551
Dalton, Roque, 68, 247–51, 289, 290, 390, 775, 784
Damas, Léon-Gontran, 187, 321, 453, 581
Dámaso Martínez, Carlos, 63
Dannemann, Manuel, 199
Dante, 91, 135, 165
Darwin, Charles, 159, 758, 803
Dávalos, René, 622
Dávila, Ángela María, 685
Dávila Andrade, César, 281
Defillipis Novoa, Francesco T., 792
De Hoyos, Angela, 191
Délano, Poli, 201
Delaunay, Robert, 428
Delgado, Abelardo, 191
Delgado, Rafael, 547
Delgado, Susy, 622
Delgado, Washington, 649
Delgado Aparain, Mario, 812
Deligne, Gaston, 263
Delmonte, Domingo, 235
Denevi, Marco, 62, 257
Denis, Amelia, 615, 616
Denis, Ferdinand, 139, 141, 438, 727
Denser, Márcia, 147
Depestre, René, 255–56, 320, 321
Desleal, Menen, 290
Desnoes, Edmundo, 82
Desnos, Robert, 851
De Soto, Hernando, 359
Desquiron, Lilas, 321
Des Rosiers, Joel, 321
D’Halmar, Augusto, 197, 258–60
Díaz, Geno, 63
Díaz, Grégor, 791
Díaz, Jesús, 240, 673
Díaz, Jorge, 793
Díaz Acosta, David, 427
Díaz Alfaro, Abelardo, 684, 749, 750
Díaz Barrios, Carlos A., 241
Díaz Casanueva, Humberto, 199
Díaz Castillo, Roberto, 387
Díaz Cobarrubias, Juan, 546
Díaz de Guzmán, Ruy, 620
Díaz del Castillo, Bernal, 210, 213, 803
Díaz Dufoo, Carlos, 546, 548
Díaz Lozano, Argentina, 426
Díaz Martínez, Manuel, 240
Díaz Mirón, Salvador, 545, 560
Díaz-Pérez, Rodrigo, 621, 622
Díaz Rodríguez, Manuel, 560, 839
Díaz Rozzotto, Jaime, 387
Díaz Sánchez, Ramón, 9, 840
Díaz Valcárcel, Emilio, 684
Di Benedetto, Antonio, 62, 63
Dickinson, Emily, 21, 181, 594
Diego, Eliseo, 193, 194, 239, 240, 260–62
Diego, José de, 683
Diego Padro, J.J. de, 683
Diegués, Carlos, 312, 313
Diéguez, Juan, 385
Diez-Canseco, José, 649
Dínes, Alberto, 449
Diógenes, 620
Diop, Cheikh Anta, 9
Discépolo, Armando, 343, 792
Dobles, Fabián, 231
Dobles, Julieta, 232
Dölz, Inés, 199
Dolzani, Luis, 703
Domínguez, Delia, 199
Domínguez, Franklin, 264
Domínguez, José Antonio, 425
Domínguez, Manuel, 623
Domínguez, Oscar, 775
Domínguez, Ramiro, 623
Domínguez Alba, Bernardo, 616
Domínguez Camargo, Hernando, 211
Dominici, Pedro César, 839
Dominique, Jan J., 321
Donos, Armando, 197
Donoso, José, 133, 200, 267–70, 451, 475, 544, 625, 671, 685, 776, 801
Dorfman, Ariel, 194, 246, 270–72, 297, 449, 672, 677
Dorsinville, Roger, 321
Dos Passos, John, 133
Dostoevsky, Fyodor, 98
Dourado, Autran, 147, 273–74
Downing, Luis, 588
Dragún, Osvaldo, 449, 793, 859
Dreyfus, Mariela, 650
Drougett, Carlos, 200
Drummond, Roberto, 146
Duarte, Ricardo de Carvalho, 146
Duarte Prado, Bacón, 623
Dublé Urratia, Diego, 198
Duchamp, Marcel, 638
Dujovne-Ortiz, Alicia, 449, 450
Dumas, Alexandre, père, 422
Duncan, Quince, 10, 232, 575
Duque, Lisandro, 316
Duque, Luís Gonzaga, 143
Durand, Oswald, 274–76
Durão, José de Santa Rita, 140, 438
Durón, Rómulo E., 427
Duvalier, François, 25

Eça de Queirós, José Maria de, 142
Echegaray, Aristóbulo, 61
Echeverría, Aquileo J., 230
Echeverría, Esteban, 54, 55, 56, 277–79, 439, 515, 516, 552, 580, 792
Echeverría, Marilín, 231
Echeverría de Larraín, Inés, 197
Edelberg, Betina, 63
Edwards, Alberto, 197
Edwards, Jorge, 200, 201, 283–84, 475, 785
Edwards Bello, Joaquín, 197
Egaña, Juan, 195
Egüez, Ivan, 281
Eguiguren, Yadira, 427
Egüen, José María, 285–86, 647, 853
Eichelbaum, Samuel, 449, 793
Eielson, Jorge Eduardo, 648, 826
El Dorado, 35, 68, 506
Eliot, T.S., 146, 368, 452
Elizondo, Ricardo, 554
Elizondo, Salvador, 291–92, 452, 544, 553
Elizondo, Sergio, 191
Eltit, Diamela, 201, 293–94
Encina, Francisco A., 197
Encina Ramos, Pedro, 624
Encinas, Enrique, 128
Engels, Friedrich, 530, 724
Enríquez, Carlos, 238
Ercilla, Juan de, 465
Ercilla y Zúñiga, Alonso de, 213, 440, 579
Erro, Carlos Alberto, 62
Erro-Peralta, Nora, 801
Escalante, Manuela, 230
Escardó, Rolando, 240
Escobar Galindo, David, 290
Escobar Velado, Oswaldo, 289
Escorel, Eduardo, 313
Escotot, Julio, 426
Escudero, Gonzalo, 281
Escudos, Jacinta, 290
Eshelman, Clayton, 801
Esinola, Lourdes, 622
Espada, Martin, 688
Espejo Ayka, Elvira, 128
Espinal, Cayo Claudio, 264
Espinel, Vicente, 666
Espino, Alfredo, 287
Espino, Miguel Ángel, 288
Espinola, Francisco, 811
Espinosa, Carlos Manuel, 281
Espinosa, Tomás, 790
Espinoza, Enrique, 449
Espinoza Medrano, Juan de, 216, 217
Esquivel, Julia, 387
Esquivel, Laura, 117–18, 316, 550, 553, 673, 800, 801, 856, 857
Esteves, Carmen, 801
Esteves, Sandra María, 688
Estévez, Abilio, 241
Estorino, Abelardo, 241
Estrada, Domingo, 385
Estrada de Pérez, Lucila, 425
Estrella, Ulises, 281
Estupiñán Bass, Nelson, 9, 281, 575
Etchecopar, Dolores, 63
Etienne, Franck, 255
Etienne, Gérard, 321
Exile, 131, 133, 199, 242, 321, 436, 515, 622, 626, 644, 651, 672, 674, 680, 686, 716, 753, 761, 765, 768, 770, 771, 777, 779, 806
Existentialism, 16, 62, 63, 724
Eyherabide, Gley, 811
Facio, Justo A., 230
Falco, Ángel, 810
Falco, Líber, 811
Falcon, César, 648
Fallas, Carlos Luis, 231, 232, 531, 705
Fanon, Frantz, 10, 12, 13, 181, 188, 249, 391
Fariña Núñez, Eloy, 623
Fascism, 36, 42, 454, 499, 583, 835
Faulkner, William, 133, 207, 454, 597, 655, 684, 742
Fausto Aguilera, Julio, 387
Feierstein, Ricardo, 449
Feijoó, Samuel, 452
Feminism, I, 295, 299–301, 630, 643, 660, 797
Feria, Lina de, 240
Fermín Cevallos, Pedro, 279
Fermín de Vargas, Pedro, 211
Fernandes, Maria Dezzone Pacheco, 312
Fernández, Amando, 241
Fernández, Macedonio, 61, 62, 304–05, 452, 543, 652, 669, 760
Fernández, Mauricio, 243
Fernández, Mauro, 230
Fernández, Miguel Ángel, 622
Fernández, Pablo Armando, 240
Fernández de Castro, José Antonio, 238
Fernández de Echeverría y Veytia, Mariano, 214
Fernández de Lizardi, José Joaquín, 213, 215, 296, 305–08, 545, 547, 579
Fernández de Piedrahita, Lucas, 210
Fernández de Tinoco, María, 231
Fernández Huidobro, Eleuterio, 812
Fernández Juncos, Manuel, 682
Fernández de Madrid, José, 788
Fernández Moreno, Baldomero, 60
Fernández Moreno, César, 63
Fernández Retamar, Roberto, 158, 240, 260, 297, 450, 452, 531, 72–1
Ferré, Rosario, 302, 308–10, 671, 672, 685
Ferreiro, Alfredo Mario, 811
Ferreiro, Oscar, 622
Ferrer, René, 621
Feuillet, Tomás Martín, 615, 616
Fierro, Humberto, 281
Fignolé, Jean-Claude, 321
Figueroa, José Antonio, 687
Filho, Adonias, 311–12
Filho, Antunes, 787
Filho, Hermilo Borbo, 786
Fingueret, Manuela, 449
Finzi, Patricia, 449
Flores, Manuel M., 545
Flores, Marco Antonio, 388
Flórez de Ocáriz, Juan, 210
Floríán, Mario, 649
Florida group, 61, 84, 401, 403
Florit, Eugenio, 93, 238, 452
Fombana Pachano, Jacinto, 840
Fonseca, Rubem, 146, 257, 317–18, 679
Fontaine, Arturo, 201
Foppa, Alaíde, 387
Fores Olea, Víctor, 452
Fornoff, Frederick H., 801
Foster, Norman, 314
Foucault, Michel, 302
França Júnior, José Joaquim, 786
France, Anatole, 100, 420
Frank, Waldo, 595
Franketienne, 321
Franqui, Carlos, 784
Frantzius, Alejandro von, 230
Freidemberg, Daniel, 63
Freire, Paulo, 487, 488, 489, 490, 858
Fressia, Alfredo, 812
Freyd, Sigmund, 76, 144, 439, 569, 775
Freyre, Gilberto, 11, 27, 323–27, 559, 705
Frias, Felix, 55
Frias, Heriberto, 548
Friol, Roberto, 240
Fuenmayor, Alfonso, 207
Fuentes, José Lorenzo, 240
Fuentes, Norberto, 240, 242
Fuguet, Alberto, 201
Futoransky, Luisa, 449, 450
Futurism, 44, 144, 369, 559

Gagini, Carlos, 231
Galarza, Ernesto, 191
Galeano, Eduardo, 335–37, 450, 574, 812
Galiando, Hermila, 301
Galich, Franz, 388
Galich, Manuel, 386
Galindo, Antonia, 287
Galindo, Francisco E., 287
Gallegos, Rómulo, 204, 319, 338–41, 404, 465, 697, 704, 803, 839, 840
Gallegos Lara, Joaquín, 14, 280, 434, 705
Gallegos Valdés, Luis, 289
Galván, Manuel de Jesús, 265, 319, 422, 580, 669, 727
Galvão, Patrícia, 145
Gálvez, Manuel, 60, 103, 341–43, 507, 508
Gama, Basílio da, 140, 438
Gamarra, Albelardo, 646
Gambaro, Griselda, 62, 295, 343–45, 667, 793
Gamboa, Federico, 314, 548
Gamero, Antonio, 289
Gamero de Medina, Lucila, 425
Gana, Federico, 197
Gangotena, Alfredo, 281
Garay, Blas, 623
Garay, Nicole, 616
Garcete, Carlos, 621
García, Santiago, 788
García, Serafin J., 811
García Calderón, Ventura, 346–47, 493, 647
García Cantú, Gaston, 452
García Godoy, Federico, 265
García Marruz, Fina, 239, 240, 260, 355–57
García Monge, Joaquín, 231
García Moreno, Gabriel, 279
García Pabón, Leonardo, 129
García Ponce, Juan, 357–58, 452, 455, 553
García Ramis, Magali, 685
García Ramos, Reinaldo, 241, 243
García Saldaña, Parméndes, 744
García Vega, Lorenzo, 239, 240, 242, 243, 260
Garcilaso de la Vega, 81, 216, 359–61, 440, 579, 707
Gardea, Jesús, 554
Gardel, Carlos, 368, 770
Garmendia, Julio, 840
Garmendia, Salvador, 840
Garnica, Blanco, 129
Garro, Elena, 362–63, 551, 643, 790, 857
Gates, Henry Louis, Jr, 9, 391
Gaton Arce, Freddy, 264
Gaucho, 36, 54, 57, 58, 404, 415, 416, 417, 500, 525, 665, 666, 727, 755, 792, 795, 809, 810, 856
Gausch, Antonio, 624
Gaut, Sergio, 760
Gautier Benítez, José, 682
Gavidia, Francisco, 287, 290
Gaztelu, Ángel, 239, 260
Gelbrunk, Aída, 450
Gelman, Juan, 63, 363–66, 390, 449, 606, 775
Gelpí, Juan G., 685
Genette, Gérard, 353
Gerbasi, Vicente, 840
Gerchunoff, Alberto, 448
Getino, Octavio, 315
Ghelderode, Michel de, 768
Gianuzzi, Joaquín O., 63
Giardinelli, Mempo, 367–68, 672
Gibson Parra, Percy, 648, 791
Gide, André, 551
Gil, Lourdes, 241
Gilbert, Enrique Gil, 14, 280, 705
Gilberto, João, 564
Giménez Gómez, Félix, 622
Giorgio, Marosa di, 811
Girondo, Oliverio, 61, 62, 368–69, 401, 466, 510
Girri, Alberto, 63, 370–71, 454
Giusti, Roberto F., 60
Glantz, Jacob, 447
Glantz, Margo, 371–73, 447, 553
Glickman, Nora, 449, 450
Glissant, Edouard, 322, 373–74
Glusberg, Samuel, 449
Godoy, Juan Gualberto, 54
Godoy, Juan, 200
Goethe, J.W.von, 120, 265
Goldemberg, Isaac, 449
Goldemberg, Jorge, 449
Goligorsky, Eduardo, 760
Goloboff, Mario, 449
Gombrowicz, Witold, 651, 563
Gomes, Alfredo Dias, 786
Gomes, Carlos, 312, 318
Gómez, Ana Ilce, 589, 590
Gómez, Máximo, 264
Gómez Carrillo, Enrique, 385
Gómez Correa, Enrique, 199
Gómez de Avellaneda, Gertrudis, 236, 319, 375–76, 440, 580, 669, 726, 727, 856
Gómez Serrato, Dario, 624
Gomringer, Eugen, 219
Gonçalves Dias, Antônio, 140, 141, 377–78, 438, 439, 465, 727, 728, 729, 786
Gondra, Manuel, 623
Gonzales, “Corky”, 191
González, José, 427
González, José Luis, 297, 531, 683, 684
González, Juan Vicente, 839
González, Lourdes, 240
González, Luisa, 231
González, Natalicio, 620, 623
González, Otto Raúl, 386
González, Pedro A., 197
González Alberty, Fernando, 683
González Alsina, Ezequiel, 622, 623
González Bastías, Jorge, 198
González Bermejo, Ernesto, 812
González Dávila, Jesús, 790
González Davison, Fernando, 388
González de Eslava, Fernán, 214
González de Fanning, Teresa, 856
González Delvalle, Alcibiades, 623
González Lanuza, Eduardo, 61, 62, 510
González León, Adriano, 840
González Martínez, Enrique, 494, 546, 561
González Prada, Manuel, 285, 378–79, 493, 513, 561, 646, 748
González Suárez, Federico, 280
González Tuñón, Enrique, 61
González Zeledón, Manuel, 230
Gordillo, Fernando, 390
Gorodischer, Angélica, 257, 760
Gorostiaga, Celestino, 790
Gorostiaga, José, 84, 181, 296, 380–81, 551
Gorriti, Juana Manuela, 57, 381–83, 856
Gortari, Eli de, 531
Gosálvez Botelho, Raúl, 128
Goycochea Menéndez, Martin de, 620
Goytisolo, Juan, 801
Goytortúa, Jesús, 301
Gramuglio, Teresa, 453
Granda, Euler, 281
Gregory, Georges, 453
Grez, Vicente, 196
Grieff, Léon de, 207
Grierson, Cecilia, 300
Gris, Juan, 428
Grossman, Edith, 800
Grumberg, Carlos, 449
Guaman Poma de Ayala, Felipe, 85, 216, 383–84, 440, 579, 693, 707
Guanes, Alejandro, 623
Guarani, 619, 620, 622, 856
Guardia, Fernández, 231
Guardia, Gloria, 618
Guarnieri, Gianfrancesco, 787
Guayasamín, Oswaldo, 530
Gudiño Kieffer, Eduardo, 672
Guedes, Lino, 11
Guerra, Ruy, 315, 316, 787
Guerra, Silvia, 812
Guerra Avila, Rogelio, 618
Guerra-Trigueros, Alberto, 288
Guevara, Ernesto Che, 249, 283, 387, 389, 530
Guevara, Pablo, 649
Guido, Beatriz, 62, 315
Guido y Spano, Carlos, 58
Guillén, Nicolás, 13, 93, 238, 391–94, 453, 530, 565, 570, 600, 800
Guillén Pinto, Alfredo, 128
Guimarães, Alphonsus de, 143
Guimarães, Bernardo, 141, 319, 395–97, 703
Guimarães Rosa, João, 146, 398–401, 465, 491, 506, 560, 704, 713, 787
Güiraldes, Ricardo, 36, 60, 61, 62, 70, 205, 401–05, 510, 627, 665, 697, 704
Guirao, Ramón, 13, 84
Guivelder, Zevi, 449
Gullar, Ferreira, 146, 405–07
Guimilla, José, 211
Gunche, Ernesto, 314
Gusman, Luis, 63
Guthrie, Woody, 851
Gutiérrez, Carlos F., 425
Gutiérrez, Eduardo, 59, 792
Gutiérrez, Gustavo, 489
Gutiérrez, Ibero, 812
Gutiérrez, Joaquín, 231, 531
Gutiérrez, Juan María, 55, 57, 515
Gutiérrez, Rafael, 388
Gutiérrez, Ricardo V., 58
Gutiérrez Alea, Tomás, 316
Gutiérrez Nájera, Manuel, 408–10, 546, 560, 763
Gutiérrez Vargas, Tito, 127
Guzmán, Humberto, 554
Guzmán, Jorge, 2001
Guzmán, Martín Luis, 410–11, 550, 800
Guzmán, Nicomedes, 200

Hahn, Oscar, 199
Halac, Ricardo, 449
Halley Mora, Mario, 623
Hamsun, Knut, 732
Harris, Wilson, 575
Hauptmann, Gerhart, 732
Hebreo, León, 359
Heiremans, Luis Alberto, 793
Heliodoro Valle, Rafael, 427
Hemingway, Ernest, 148, 207, 684
Henríquez, Camilo, 195
Henríquez Carvajal, Francisco, 265
Henríquez Ureña, Camila, 264
Henríquez Ureña, Pedro, 245, 264, 297, 628, 709, 721
Henríquez Ureña, Salomé, 193, 263, 265
Heraud, Javier, 389, 650
Heredia, José María, 235, 236, 243, 422, 545, 727, 777
Hermosillo, Jaime Humberto, 316
Hernández, Ángel, 264
Hernández, Felisberto, 413–15, 467, 593, 594, 811
Hernández, Gaspar Octavio, 616
Hernández, José, 57, 58, 314, 404, 415–18, 525, 526, 580, 665, 666, 810
Hernández, Luis, 650
Hernández, Luisa Josefina, 790, 791
Hernández Aquino, Luis, 683
Hernández Catá, Alfonso, 238
Hernández Cruz, Victor, 688
Hernández D’Jesús, Enrique, 840
Hernández Franco, Tomás, 263, 264
Hernández Novás, Raúl, 240
Herrera, Darío, 616
Herrera, Demetrio, 617
Herrera, Dionisio de, 424
Herrera, Ernesto, 810
Herrera, Flavio, 386
Herrera, Manuel, 760
Herrera, Pablo, 279
Herrera y Mendoza, Juana de, 217
Herrera y Reissig, Julio, 18, 418–19, 545, 560, 616, 810
Hibbert, Fernand, 420–22, 473
Hidalgo, Alberto, 647
Hidalgo, Bartolomé, 54, 579, 809
Hidalgo, Laura, 281
Hilst, Hilda, 667
Hinojosa, Rolando, 191, 192
Hinoestroza, Rodolfó, 650
Hiriart, Hugo, 553
Hirszman, Leon, 312, 313
Hoggart, Richard, 453
Hollanda, Aurélio Buarque de, 799
Hollanda, Sérgio Buarque de, 475
Holmberg, Eduardo Ladislao, 257, 760
Homem, Francisco Sales Torres, 140
Homoerotic writing, 295, 357, 551
Homosexuality, 88, 191, 243, 259, 295, 357, 399, 401, 437, 452, 569
Horth, Roberte, 453
Hostos, Eugenio María de, 263, 296, 682
Hudson, William Henry, 526
Huerta, David, 554
Huerta, Efraín, 549
Huezo Mixco, Miguel, 290
Hughes, Langston, 391, 453, 800
Hugo, Victor, in, 437, 510, 726, 777
Huidobro, Vicente, 83, 84, 198, 428–29, 628, 723, 776, 800
Humboldt, Alexander von, 330, 668, 727, 758, 797, 803
Hunneus, Cristián, 201
Hunneus, Ester, 198
Hurtado, Gerardo César, 232
Huxley, Aldous, 841

Ibarbourou, Juana de, 193, 431–32, 466, 512, 811
Ibargüengoitia, Jorge, 257, 432–34, 550, 553, 790
Ibarzábal, Federico, 238
Icaza, Jorge, 14, 280, 282, 434–35, 440, 704
Ichaso, Francisco, 238
Illescas, Carlos, 386
Inca Empire, 35, 360
Incháustegui Cabral, Héctor, 263, 264
Inclán, Luis G., 547
Indianism, 140, 437–40
Indigenism, 65, 255, 440–41
Ingenieros, José, 60
Innocent, Antoine, 420, 473
Ipuche, Pedro Leandro, 811
Irala Burgos, Adriano, 623
Irigaray, Luce, 498
Irisarri, Antonio José de, 195, 385
Isaacs, Jorge, 206, 208, 314, 441–43, 448, 465, 669, 727, 855
Isaacson, José, 449
Islas, Arturo, 192
Istarú, Ana, 232
Iturralde, Iraida, 243
Ivo, Ledo, 146
Izaguirre, Ester de, 621

Jackson, Richard L, 9
Jacob, Max, 428
Jacobs, Barbara, 372, 553
Jaimes Freyre, Ricardo, 127, 445–46, 545, 561
Jakobson, Roman, 452, 624
James, William, 413
Jamís, Fayad, 240
Jara, Max, 198
Jaramillo Alvarado, Pío, 280, 434
Jaramillo Levi, Enrique, 617
Jardim, Rachel, 147
Jarry, Alfred, 775
Jesús, Carolina Maria de, 145, 784
Jijón y Caamaño, Jacinto, 280, 281
Jiménez, Jesús, 230
Jiménez, Juan Ramón, 21, 130, 355, 451, 452, 853
Jiménez de Quesada, Gonzalo, 209, 210
Jitrik, Noé, 449
Jobim, Antônio Carlos, 564
Jodar, Luis de, 211
John of the Cross, 93, 458
Joyce, James, 130, 333, 398, 635, 684, 799, 840
Juan de la Cruz, 93, 458
Juana Inés de la Cruz (Sor Juana), 212, 214, 223, 296, 355, 380, 447, 455–63, 551, 579, 843, 855
Juárez Toledo, Enrique, 386
Juarroz, Roberto, 63, 466
Júlia, Franscisca, 143
Jung, Carl Gustav, 76
Kafka, Franz, 74, 112, 135, 207, 283, 448, 506, 651
Kamenszain, Tamara, 63, 450
Kanalestein, Rubén, 449
Karlik, Sara, 621
Keyserling, Hermann Alexander Graf, 595
Kipling, Rudyard, 700
Korenblitt, Bernardo, 449
Korsi, Demetrio, 616
Kovadloff, Santiago, 449
Kowii, Ariruma, 694
Kozer, José, 241, 243, 447
Krauze, Enrique, 455
Krauze, Ethel, 372
Kristeva, Julia, 356
Labastida, Jaime, 531
Labrador Ruiz, Enrique, 239, 240, 260, 452
Lacan, Jacques, 753
Laferrière, Dany, 321
Lafourcade, Enrique, 201
Lafragua, José María, 546
Lagerlöf, Selma, 732
Lago, Sylvia, 811
Laguerre, Enrique A., 684
Lainéz, Daniel, 425, 426
Lam, Wilfredo, 455
Lamas de Rodríguez Alcalá, Teresa, 620
Lamborghini, Leonidas, 63
Lamboy, Reynaldo, 201
Lancelotti, Mario A., 62
Landívar, Rafael, 215
Lange, Norah, 61, 132, 369, 466–68
Langsner, Jacobo, 793
Lantieri, Julieta, 300
Lara, Jesús, 128
Lara Zavala, Hernán, 554
Larra, Raúl, 531
Larrea, Carlos Manuel, 280
Larreta, Antonio, 811
Larreta, Enrique, 60, 468–70
Lars, Claudia, 288
Las Casas, Bartolomé de, 34, 96, 296, 440
Lastarria, José Victorino, 196, 482
Latorre, Mariano, 197
Lauro, Alberto, 240
Laviera, Tato, 687
Lawrence, D.H., 549
Lazarillo de Tormes, 305
Lazo, Agustín, 569
Lazo Baeza, Olegario, 197
Leal, Rine, 241
Leão, José de Campos, 787
Ledesma, Luis Manuel, 266
Leduc, Alberto, 548
Leguizamón, Martiniano, 59, 792
Leiva, Raúl, 386
Leminski, Paulo, 147
Lemus, William, 388
Leñero, Vicente, 257, 553, 790
Lenin, V.I., 530
León, Luis de, 93
Léro, Etienne, 187
Lessa, Bia, 787
Levero, Mario, 760
Levertov, Denise, 800
Levi Calderón, Sara, 295, 667
Lévi-Strauss, Claude, 452, 574, 734, 753, 758
Levin, Harry, 452
Levine, Suzanne Jill, 800
Levins-Morales, Aurora, 688
Levrero, Mario, 811
Lewis, Oscar, 660, 680, 784
Leyes de Chaves, Concepción, 620
Leytón, Roberto, 127
Lhérisson, Justin, 420, 472–74
Liano, Dante, 449
Liano, Lázaro, 449
Liano, Dante, 388
Liberman, Arnoldo, 449
Lidio Pitti, Dimas, 617
Lienlaf, Leonel, 199
Liera, Oscar, 790
Lihn, Enrique, 198, 199, 479–81
Lillo, Baldomero, 197, 482–84, 680
Lillo, Eusebio, 196, 792
Lima, Chely, 240
Lima, Jorge de, 11, 146
Lima, Rosa de, 217
Lindo, Hugo, 289
Lindo, Luan, 424
Lindo, Ricardo, 290
Lins, Osman, 147
Lión Díaz, Luis de, 388, 389
Lipchitz, Jacques, 428
Lira, Rodrigo, 199
Liscano, Juan, 840
Lispector, Clarice, 115, 146, 147, 302, 313, 450, 484–87, 560, 782, 799
Littin, Miguel, 315, 316
Lizaso, Félix, 238
Llenera, José, 287
Lles, Fernando, 238
Llorèns Torres, Luis, 683, 685
Loaeza, Guadalupe, 553
Lobato, José Bento Monteiro, 145, 193, 799
Lobo, Tatiana, 232
Lomboy, Reinaldo, 200
Lopes Neto, João Simões, 703
López, Carlos Antonio, 620
López, César, 240
López, Elvira, 300
López, Luis Carlos, 207
López, Matilde Elena, 289
López, Nila, 622
López, Rafael, 843
López, Vicente Fidel, 57, 196, 422, 516
López Albújar, Enrique, 346, 493–94, 647, 648
López de Nelson, Ernestina, 300
López Ortega, Antonio, 841
López Portillo y Rojas, José, 547
López Sacha, Francisco, 241
López Valdizón, José María, 387
López Vallecillos, Italo, 289
López Velarde, Ramón, 380, 494–96, 549, 843
López y Planes, Vicente, 53
Lorravaquio Muñoz, María Magdalena de, 572, 573
Losada, Alejandro, 490, 491
Loubet, Jorgelina, 62
Loureiro, João de Jesus Paes, 439
Louzeiro, José, 147
Loveira, Carlos, 238, 496–97
Lowry, Malcolm, 549
Loynaz, Dulce María, 238, 240, 497–99
Loynaz, Enrique, 238
Lozano, Alfredo, 451
Lozano, Jorge Tadeo, 211
Luaces, Joaquín Lorenzo, 236
Lubitch Domecq, Alcina, 448
Luca, Esteban de, 53
Luciano, Felipe, 687
Luco Cruchaga, Germán, 792
Lucretius, 460
Ludmer, Josefina, 302,
Luft, Lya, 147
Lugo, Carmen, 308
Lugones, Leopoldo, 18, 60, 62, 403, 445, 494, 499–501, 561, 760, 777
Lukács, Georg, 286
Lussich, Antonio, 810
Luz y Caballero, José de la, 235
Lynch, Benito, 60
Lynch, Marta, 62
Lyra, Carmen, 231

Macedo, Joaquim Manuel de, 24, 141, 727, 786
Machado, Antônio de Alcântara, 386
Machado, Gilka, 144
Machado de Assis, Joaquim Maria, 98, 142, 143, 319, 503–05, 728, 782, 799, 805
Maetaa, Rebecca, 448
Macunaima (Mário de Andrade), 144, 313, 398, 439, 559, 772
Madariaga, Francisco, 63
Madre Castillo, La, 223
Mafud, Julio, 62
Magalhães, Domingos José Gonçalves de, 23, 140, 141, 438, 785
Magallanes Moure, Manuel, 198, 556
Magaña, Sergio, 790
Magdaleno, Mauricio, 531
Maggi, Carlos, 793, 811
Magical Realism, 14, 15, 68, 115, 118, 133, 145, 146, 154, 163, 171, 234, 255, 280, 321, 506–07, 550, 674, 762, 842
Maia, Circe, 811
Maidana, Juan, 622
Maitín, José Antonio, 839
Maldonado Denis, Manuel, 450
Mallarmé, Stéphane, 588, 638, 799
Mallea, Eduardo, 62, 297, 454, 507–09, 597
Maloney, Gerardo, 10
Malraux, André, 454, 507
Mañach, Jorge, 238
Mancisidor, José, 531
Manjarrez, Héctor, 554
Manns, Patricio, 201
Manrique, Manuel, 687
Mansferrer, Alberto, 230
Mansilla, Lucio Victorio, 59
Manso, Juana, 57
Manso de Noronja, Joana Paula, 300
Manzano, Juan Francisco, 708
Maples Arce, Manuel, 550, 551
Marasso, Arturo, 60
Marcelin, Frédéric, 420, 473
Marchena, Amelia Francisca de, 264
Marcos, Juan Manuel, 621, 622, 623
Marcos, Plínio, 787
Marechal, Leopoldo, 62, 227, 401, 466, 510–11
María, Alcides de, 810
Maria, Isidoro de, 810
Mariani, Roberto, 61, 62
Mariátegui, José Carlos, 84, 248, 285, 297, 318, 439, 513–14, 530, 531, 552, 647, 748
Marín, Francisco Gonzalo, 682
Marín, Juan, 200
Marín del Solar, Mercedes, 195
Marinello, Juan, 238, 531
Marinetti, Filippo Tommaso, 144
Márquez, René, 517–18, 674, 684, 685, 687, 749
Marra, Nelson, 450
Marroquín, José Manuel, 208
Marroquín Rojas, Clemente, 386
Marshall, Manuel, 266
Marsicovétere y Durán, Miguel, 386
Martel, Julián, 59
Martí, José, 193, 194, 204, 205, 230, 237, 243, 296, 297, 355, 385, 465, 519–25, 555, 560, 580, 708, 721, 758, 763
Martin, Rose, 453
Martínez, Gregorio, 649
Martínez, Juan Luis, 199
Martínez, Luis A., 280, 434
Martínez, Nela, 280
Martínez, Rubén, 192
Martínez Estrada, Ezequiel, 62, 297, 507, 508, 525–27
Martínez Gamba, Carlos, 622
Martínez Moreno, Carlos, 413, 528–29, 677, 811
Martínez Rivas, Carlos, 588
Martínez Sobral, Enrique, 385
Martínez Villena, Rubén, 238
Martini, Juan Carlos, 63
Martos, Marco, 650
Marx, Karl, 144, 530, 720, 724
Marxism, 5, 7, 248, 320, 513, 530–31, 569, 584, 783
Masciàngoli, Jorge, 62
Masferrer, Alberto, 287
Masliah, Leo, 812
Mastretta, Ángeles, 550, 553, 857
Mata, Humberto, 434, 841
Mateo, Catarino, 388
Mateos, Juan A., 423
Matheus, John, 453
Mato, G. Humberto, 281
Matos Paoli, Francisco, 683, 684
Matta, Guillermo, 196
Matta, Roberto, 638
Mattelart, Armand, 194
Matto de Turner, Clorinda, 378, 440, 532–33, 646, 669, 856
Mattos, Tomás de, 812
Maximin, Daniel, 322
McKay, Claude, 453
Mechín, T.P., 288
Medina, Enrique, 63, 667
Medinaceli, Carlos, 128, 129
Megget, Humberto, 811
Meireles, Cecilia, 11, 144, 536–37, 799
Mejía, Medardo, 425
Mejía Sánchez, Ernesto, 589
Mejía Vallejo, Manuel, 207, 679
Mella, Julio Antonio, 531
Melo, Amadeu Thiago de, 146
Melo, Juan Vicente, 553
Melo Neto, João Cabral de, 145, 219, 537–38, 560, 786
Menchú, Rigoberta, 388, 441, 601, 784
Mendes, Murilo, 146, 539–540, 559
Méndez Capote, Renée, 498
Méndez de Cuenca, Laura, 546, 548
Méndez de la Vega, Luz, 387, 388
Méndez Fleitas, Épifanio, 623
Mendonça de Spinci, Lucy, 621
Mendoza, Daniel, 839
Mendoza, Jaime, 127
Mendoza, María Luisa, 295, 667
Menéndez Leal, Álvaro, 290
Meneses, Guillermo, 840
Meneses, Vidaluz, 390
Ménil, René, 187, 453, 454
Mera, Juan León, 279, 280, 282, 434, 439, 440, 540–41, 580, 669
Merton, Thomas, 164, 589
Merwin, W.S., 800
Metafiction, 317, 534–44
Metastasio, Pietro, 195
Méteille, Jean, 321
Methol Ferré, Alberto, 811
Mexican Revolution, 89, 90, 91, 161, 301, 333, 411, 433, 542, 549, 600, 662, 704, 709, 732, 777, 790, 801, 813
Meza, Miguelángel, 622
Michelet, Jules, 332, 333
Mieses Burgos, Franklin, 264
Migdal, Alicia, 812
Miguel, María Esther de, 62
Milán, Eduardo, 812
Milanés, José Jacinto, 236
Milla y Vidaurre, José, 385
Millán, Gonzalo, 199
Miller, Jeanette, 264
Mir, Pedro, 263, 265
Miranda, Ana, 147
Miranda, César, 419
Miranda, Francisco de, 838
Miranda, Julio, 840
Miranda Archilla, Graciani, 683
Miró, Joan, 638
Miró, José, 59
Miró, Ricardo, 616
Miró, Rodrigo, 618
Mirón Álvarez, Oscar, 386
Mistral, Gabriela, 181, 193, 198, 265, 431, 512, 555–58, 678, 723
Mitre, Bartolomé, 54, 57, 58, 127, 404, 415, 422, 855
Modernism (Anglo-American), 133, 134, 146, 673
Modernismo (Brazilian), 11, 41, 42, 44, 46, 47, 94, 98, 119, 143, 144, 219, 536, 559–60, 701, 703, 772, 786, 799
Mohr, Nicolasa, 687
Molina, Enrique, 63, 775
Molina, Juan Ramón, 425
Molina, Pedro, 385
Molina, Silvia, 372, 553
Molina Virgil, Manuel, 425
Molinari, Ricardo, 61, 62
Molloy, Sylvia, 294, 295, 302
Monastarios, Rubén, 667
Mondaca, Carlos R., 198
Monnerot, Jules, 187
Monsiváis, Carlos, 553, 660
Monsreal, Agustin, 554
Montaigne, Michel de, 35, 296, 437
Montalvo, Juan, 280, 296
Monteforte Toledo, Mario, 386, 388
Monteiro, Jerônimo, 760
Montejo, Eugenio, 840
Montejo, Victor, 388
Montemayor, Carlos, 554
Montenegro, Carlos, 238
Montero, Mayra, 667
Montero, Reinaldo, 241
Monterroso, Augusto, 297, 386, 388, 562–63
Monterroso, Tito, 368
Montes, José Wolfango, 129
Montes de Oca, Marco Antonio, 553
Montoro, Rafael, 237
Montoya, José, 191
Moñvel, María, 199
Moock, Armando, 792
Mora, José Joaquín de, 195
Morábito, Fabio, 554
Moraes, Vinícius de, 564–65
Moraga, Cherrie, 192, 295, 794
Morales, Alejandro, 192
Morales, Leandro, 266
Morales, Mario Roberto, 230, 388
Morales, Rosario, 688
Morales Santos, Francisco, 387
Morán, Diana, 617
Morand, Carlos, 201
Morante, Luis Ambrosio, 792
Moratorio, Orosmán, 810
Morazán, Francisco, 424, 425
More, Sir Thomas, 437
Moreau de Justo, Alicia, 300
Morejón, Nancy, 13, 240, 392, 565–67
Moreno, Antonio, 314
Moreno, Dorinda, 191
Moreno, Fulgencio R., 620, 623
Moreno-Durán, Rafael Humberto, 209, 672
Moreta Feliz, Alttagracia, 265
Moreyra, Álvaro, 786
Morissette-Leroy, Felix, 567–68
Morles, Ricardo, 390
Moro, César, 551, 569–70, 647, 775, 853
Morosoli, Juan José, 811
Morrison, Mateo, 264
Morton, Carlos, 794
Morúa Delgado, Martin, 570
Moscona, Myriam, 553
Motta Diniz, Francisca Senhorinha da, 300
Moyano, Daniel, 62, 63
Mujica Láinez, Manuel, 62
Muñiz-Huberman, Angelina, 447, 553
Muñoz Camargo, Diego, 577
Muñoz Ríos, Gloria, 623
Murena, H.A., 62, 63, 297, 454
Murillo, Rosario, 390, 466
Musset, Alfred de, 409
Mutis, Álvaro, 571–72

Nacidit-Perdomo, Ylonka, 264
Nájera, Francisco, 388
Najlis, Michele, 589, 590
Nalé-Roxlo, Conrado, 793
Nápoles Fajardo, Juan Cristóbal, 236
Naranjo, Carmen, 232
Nardal, Paulette, 453
Nariño, Antonio, 211
Nascimento, Abdias do, 11, 786
Nationalism, 29, 42
Naturalism, 61, 87, 88, 103, 159, 178, 195, 196, 197, 232, 258, 482, 548, 682, 732, 839
Nava, Michael, 192
Nava y Saavedra, Jerónima, 211
Navarro, José Gabriel, 280
Navarro Luna, Manuel, 238
Navas de Miraldo, Paca, 426
Nazism, 128, 670, 780, 835
Nazoa, Aquiles, 840
Négritude, 11, 84, 153, 221, 255, 321, 322, 373, 394, 453, 454, 581–82, 676
Neoclassicism, 195, 235, 280, 287, 545, 579, 646, 682, 809
Neoindigenism, 65
Neruda, Pablo, 3, 6, 84, 93, 130, 198, 250, 283, 530, 582–87, 628, 678, 708, 723, 766, 767, 775, 776, 800, 803
Nerval, Gérard de, 843
Nervo, Amado, 545, 546, 548, 561, 708, 760
Niemeyer, Oscar, 530
Nieto, Juan José, 207
Nin, Anaïs, 452
Niño Jesús, Francisca María del, 211
Nissán, Rosa, 553
Nobo Caamaño, Ernesto, 281
Nogales, Lydia, 289
Nogueira, Carlos, 840
Noll, João Gilberto, 147
Nolla, Olga, 308
Noriega, Enrique, 388
Noronha, Juana Manso de, 856
Novás Calvo, Lino, 238
Novo, Salvador, 84, 549, 551, 569, 628, 790
Nunes, Jorge, 840
Núñez, Agustín, 623
Núñez, Ana Rosa, 240
Núñez, Enrique Bernardo, 840
Núñez, Estuardo, 853
Núñez, Rafael, 591–92
Núñez, Serafina, 238
Núñez Olano, Andrés, 238

Obeso, Candelario, 207
Obligado, Carlos, 60
Obligado, Rafael, 60
Obregón, Roberto, 387
Ocampo, Silvina, 62, 121, 257, 295, 454, 593–94, 602
Ocampo, Victoria, 61, 130, 297, 370, 454, 526, 593, 595–96
Ocantos, Carlos María, 60
Ochoa, Amparo, 530
Ochoa, Moravia, 617, 618
Ojeda, Alonso de, 209
Olavide, Pablo de, 217
O’Leary, Juan E., 623
Olimpia de Obaldía, María, 616
Olimpio, Domingos, 142
Oliveira, Alberto de, 119, 143
Oliveira, Eduardo de, 11
Oliveira, Hector, 770
Ollantay, 217, 534, 694
Olle, Carmen, 650
Oliver Labra, Carilda, 238
Ollivier, Emile, 321
Olmedo, José Joaquín, 279, 282, 436, 439
Olmos, Andés de, 534
Olmos, Carlos, 790
Olvero, Carlos, 760
Onda, 16, 636, 673, 744
Ondina Sabonge, Aída, 427
Onetti, Juan Carlos, 71, 133, 450, 467, 596–99, 742, 811
Onís, Harriet de, 800
Oña, Pedro de, 465
Oquendo de Amat, Carlos, 550, 647
Oraá, Francisco de, 240
Oraá, Pedro de, 240
Orantes, Alfonso, 386
Oreamuno, Yolanda, 231, 232
Orestes Nieto, Manuel, 617
Orgambide, Pedro, 449, 793
Orígenes group, 260, 355
Orozco, José Clemente, 530
Orozco, Olga, 63, 602–03, 658
Orphée, Elvira, 62
Orrego Luco, Luis, 197
Ortega, Virginia Elena, 264
Ortega y Gasset, José, 595
Ortiz, Adalberto, 9, 281
Ortiz, Fernando, 153, 238, 437, 603–05, 758, 797
Ortiz, Juan L., 63, 364, 507, 605–07
Ortiz Cofer, Judith, 687
Ortiz de Montellano, Bernardo, 84, 551
Ortiz y Ayala, Walter, 811
Orville, Xavier, 322
Osejo, Rafael Francisco, 229
Osorio, Luis Enrique, 788
Osorio Lizarazo, José A., 208
Osses, Esther María, 617
Otero, Lisandro, 240
Otero Silva, Miguel, 608–09, 840
Othón, Manuel José, 546
Ovalle López, Werner, 387
Ovando, Leonor de, 263
Ovid, 458
Oviedo, Jorge Luis, 426
Oviero, Ramón, 617
Owen, Gilberto, 551, 569
Owen, Roberto, 84
Oyarzún, Luis, 199
Ozores, Renato, 617

Pachacuti Yamqui Sallqamaygua, Joan de Santacruz, 216, 693, 707
Pacheco, Cristina, 553
Pacheco, José Emilio, 251, 257, 447, 549, 554, 611–13, 628, 635, 672, 840
Padilla, Heberto, 240
Padilla, José Gualberto, 682
Padilla, Martha, 243
Padura Fuentes, Leonardo, 241, 544
Pagaza, J. Arcadio, 545
Paiva, Manuel de Oliveira, 142
Palacio, Pablo, 281
Palacios, Arnoldo, 9
Palacios, Nicolás, 197
Palacios, Pedro Bonifacio, 60
Palencia, Oscar Arturo, 387
Palés Matos, Luis, 13, 84, 570, 683, 685
Palma, Clemente, 646
Palma, Ricardo, 287, 580, 613–15, 646, 800
Palomares, Ramón, 840
Pampillo, Gloria, 257
Papoletto Menéndez, Jesus, 687
Parades Candia, Rigoberto, 128
Paradiso (Lezama Lima), 239, 471
Pardo, Isaac, 840
Pardo, Jorge Eliécer, 208
Pardo y Aliaga, Felipe, 646
Paredes, Alberto, 793
Paredes, Rigoberto, 426
Pareja Diezcanseco, Alfred, 14, 233, 280, 434
Parnassianism, 94, 119, 143, 180, 561
Parodi, Enrique D., 620
Parra, Marco Antonio de la, 793
Parra, Nicanor, 106, 198, 199, 480, 628–29, 650, 723, 775, 776
Parra, Porfirio, 548
Parra, Teresa de la, 132, 153, 468, 627, 630–32
Parra, Violeta, 199, 600, 632–34, 666
Parra del Riego, Juan, 647, 811
Paschke, Barbara, 801
Paso, Fernando del, 423, 550, 552, 635–36
Pasos, Joaquín, 588
Pastor Benítez, Justo, 623
Paternain, Alejandro, 812
Pavlotzky, José, 448
Pavlovsky, Eduardo, 677, 793
Payada, 54
Payeras, Mario, 388, 784
Payno, Manuel, 546, 547, 726
Payró, Robert J., 60
Paz, José María, 56
Paz, Octavio, 251, 297, 315, 330, 333, 334, 452, 455, 459, 491, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 561, 600, 637–43, 674, 678, 732, 775, 777, 800
Paz, Senel, 241
Paz Castillo, Fernando, 840
Paz Soldán, Edmundo, 129
Paz y Paz, Leonor, 387
Paz y Paz, Roberto, 387
Pazo, Julio, 281
Pecar, Samuel, 449
Peden, Margaret Sayers, 800, 801
Pedreira, Antonio S., 297, 684, 685
Pedroso, Regino, 13, 238, 453
Pedrozo, Mabel, 622
Peixoto, Afrânio, 257, 703
Peixoto, Alvarenga, 140
Pellegrini, Aldo, 775
Pellicer, Carlos, 84, 551, 569
Pena, Luís Carlos Martins, 140, 785
Penrose, Valentine, 602, 658
Peralta, Alejandro, 647
Peralta, Bertalicia, 617, 618
Peralta Barnuevo, Pedro, 217, 218
Peralta Lagos, José María, 287, 288
Perdomo, José Luis, 388
Pereda Valdés, Ildefonso, 84
Pereira, Manuel, 490
Pereira dos Santos, Nelson, 313
Perera, Hilda, 240
Pérez, Andrés, 794
Pérez, Emma, 194
Pérez, José Joaquin, 263, 440
Pérez, Laura, 282
Pérez Bonalde, Juan Antonio, 839
Pérez-Maricevich, Francisco, 622, 623
Pérez Perdomo, Francisco, 840
Pérez Petit, Vicente, 59
Pérez Ramírez, Juan, 214
Pérez Rosales, Vicente, 196
Pérez Torres, Raúl, 281
Peri Rossi, Cristina, 294, 295, 302, 644–45, 667, 671, 672, 812
Pernett y Morales, Rafael, 618
Perón, Éva, 300, 595, 819
Perón, Juan Domingo, 315, 342, 454, 602, 626, 690, 743, 770, 819
Peronism, 62, 315, 342, 737
Perrea-Soto, Hilda, 194
Perrera, Victor, 448
Pesado, José Joaquín, 545
Peyrou, Manuel, 62
Pezoa Velis, Carlos, 198
Phelps, Anthony, 255, 321
Philoctète, René, 255
Piasano, 36
Picado Umaña, Mario, 232
Picasso, Pablo, 428
Picchia, Paulo Menotti del, 143, 144
Picó, Fernando, 684
Picón-Salas, Mariano, 297, 840
Pietri, Pedro, 687
Piglia, Ricardo, 63, 257, 491, 651–52, 672, 673
Pignatari, Décio, 146, 219
Pineau, Gisèle, 323
Piñeda, Cecile, 192
Piñera, Virgilio, 239, 240, 260, 452, 544, 593, 594, 653–54, 753, 789
Piñero, Dadi, 687
Piñero, Miguel, 687
Piñeyro, Enrique, 237
Piñón, Néilda, 147, 654–55
Pinto, Julieta, 232
Pires dos Santos, Gervasia Nunezia, 300
Pita, Juana Rosa, 240
Pita, Santiago, 235
Pita Rodriguez, Felix, 238
Pitol, Sergio, 553, 656–57
Pizarnik, Alejandra, 63, 295, 450, 657–59, 667
Pizarro, Pedro, 216
Pla, Josefina, 621, 622, 623, 716
Plácido, 12, 13, 236
Placoly, Vincent, 322
Plath, Sylvia, 308
Pocaterra, José Rafael, 840
Podestá family, 59, 810
Poe, Edgar Allan, 699, 760, 799
Poletti, Syria, 257
Politzer, Georges, 530
Pollarolo, Giovanni, 650
Pombo, Rafael, 208
Pompéia, Raúl, 121, 142, 143
Pompílio Llona, Numa, 280
Ponce de León, Napoleón Baccino, 812
Poniatowska, Elena, 115, 297, 302, 372, 550, 553, 554, 660–63, 671, 672, 784
Pope, Alexander, 798
Popol Vuh, 385, 534, 535, 574, 600, 601
Poppe, René, 127, 129
Portantiero, Juan Carlos, 453
Portillo, Estela, 191, 794
Portugal, Fernando José de, Marquis of Aguiar, 798
Portuondo, José Antonio, 238, 531
Porzecanski, Teresa, 812
Positivism, 81, 145, 196, 204, 230, 324, 482, 503, 530, 560, 591, 603, 604, 668–69, 758
Posse, Abel, 423, 672, 669–71
Post-Boom, 133, 148, 293, 315, 336, 388, 671–72, 673, 674, 689, 766, 801, 863
Postmodernism, 134, 138, 220, 423, 437, 672, 673–74
Pound, Ezra, 799
Poveda, José Manuel, 237
Pozas, Ricardo, 441, 783
Prada Oropeza, Renato, 129
Prado, Pedro, 197, 201, 556
Prado, Pura del, 243
Prats, Delfín, 240
Preciado, Antonio, 281
Price-Mars, Jean, 453, 675–76, 730, 731
Prida, Dolores, 243
Prieto, Guillermo, 545
Prieto, Jenaro, 197
Primitivism, 44, 45, 559
Proust, Marcel, 133, 146, 169, 283, 364, 551
Providencia, Josefa de la, 217
Puenzo, Luis, 315, 316
Puga, María Luisa, 553
Puig, Manuel, 63, 133, 295, 315, 437, 544, 625, 671, 672, 673, 677, 689–92, 801
Puig, Manuel, 63, 133, 295, 315, 437, 544, 625, 671, 672, 673, 677, 689–92, 801
Quechua, 65 128, 217, 346, 361, 345, 493, 532, 693–94, 762, 780, 797
Queiroz, Rachel de, 145, 695–96, 703, 705, 782, 786, 799
Querejeta, Alejandro, 241
Quesada, José Luis, 426, 427
Quevedo, Francisco de, 364
Quezada, Roberto, 388
Quijada Urías, Alfonso, 290
Quijano, Carlos, 450, 451
Quiñónez, Delia, 387
Quintero, Aramís, 240
Quintero Rivera, Ángela, 684
Quiroga, Horacio, 60, 62, 193, 194, 257, 419, 465, 697–700, 704, 760, 803, 810
Quiroga, Juan Facundo, 55
Quiroga Santa Cruz, Marcelo, 129
Quiteño, Serafín, 288
Rabasa, Emilio, 547
Rabassa, Gregory, 800
Rabelais, François, 635
Rabinal Achí, 534, 535, 578, 600
Rabinovich, José, 448
Radrigón, Juan, 793
Rama, Ángel, 115, 186, 245, 251, 252, 450, 451, 490, 491, 492, 523, 524, 797, 811, 840
Ramírez, Carlos María, 810
Ramírez, Ignacio, 545
Ramírez, Sergio, 230, 423, 590, 672
Ramos, Graciliano, 145, 313, 559, 701–02, 703, 705
Ramos, José Antonio, 238, 685
Ramos, Lilia, 231
Ramos, Luis Arturo, 554
Ramos, María Eugenia, 427
Ramos, Samuel, 642
Ramos Otero, Manuel, 685
Ramos Sucre, José Antonio, 839
Randall, Margaret, 784
Rangel, Carlos, 297
Rascón Banda, Victor Hugo, 790
Rausenberg, Robert, 638
Rawlings, Norberto James, 264
Rawson de Dellpiane, Elvira, 300
Raznovich, Diana, 450, 667
Real de Azúa, Carlos, 811
Realism, 60, 61, 62, 87, 98, 174, 245, 503, 547, 548, 680, 682, 683, 734, 839
Rebolledo, Efrén, 546, 548
Recabarren, Luis Emilio, 531
Rechy, John, 191
Reed, Ishmael, 392
Rego, José Lins do, 11, 145, 324, 559, 695, 703, 705–07, 799
Regules, Elías, 810
Renan, Ernest, 420
Rensoli, Lourdes, 240
Restuccia, Alberto, 812
Reverdy, Pierre, 428
Revueutas, Josè, 552, 744
Reyes, Alfonso, 74, 297, 330, 549, 709–12, 721, 800, 815, 843
Reyes, Carlos José, 788
Reyes, Edwin, 685
Reyes, Salvador, 200
Reyles, Carlos, 810
Reynaldo, Andrés, 241
Reynoso, Oswaldo, 649
Rhys, Jean, 373
Ribeiro, Darcy, 439
Ribeiro, João Ubaldo, 147, 712–14
Ribera Chevremont, Evaristo, 683
Ribeyro, Julio Ramón, 648, 649
Ricardo, Cassiano, 144
Riedman, Clemente, 200
Rilke, Rainer Maria, 843
Rimbaud, Arthur, 369, 775
Río, Ana María del, 201
Ríos, Cassandra, 667
Ríos, Isabel, 191
Ríos, Juan, 791
Ríos, Lara, 231
Ríos Rey, Juan, 648
Riquelme, Daniel, 197
Riva-Agüero, José de, 218
Riva Palacio, Vicente, 423, 545, 547
Rivarola Matto, José María, 620, 623
Rivarola Matto, Juan Bautista, 621
Rivas, Francisco Simon, 201
Rivas, Pedro Geoffroy, 289
Rivas Bonilla, Alberto, 288
Rivas Groot, José María, 208
Rivera, Diego, 428, 530, 531, 549, 777
Rivera, Edward, 687
Rivera, Francisco, 840
Rivera, José Eustasio, 102, 206, 208, 288, 319, 404, 465, 697, 714–15, 803
Rivera, Pedro, 617
Rivera, Tomás, 191
Rivera Indarte, José, 55
Rivera Saavedra, Juan, 791
Rivero, Isel, 243
Rivero, Juan, 211
Rivero, Raúl, 240
Roa Bastos, Augusto, 102, 127, 186, 315, 423, 530, 544, 574, 620, 621, 622, 716–19, 758
Robe, Stanley L., 801
Roca, Julio A., 59
Roca, Tristán, 620
Rocafuerte, Vicente, 279
Rocasolano, Alberto, 240
Rocha, Glauber, 312, 313, 506, 664, 713
Rocha Pita, Sebastião da, 465
Rodas, Abelardo, 387
Rodas, Ana María, 387
Rodó, José Enrique, 158, 205, 296, 297, 346, 560, 580, 704, 719–22, 810
Rodríguez, Glauco, 257
Rodríguez, Nelson, 145, 768, 787
Rodríguez, Cayetano, 53
Rodríguez, Emilio Gaspar, 238
Rodríguez, Luis Felipe, 238
Rodríguez, Luis, 192
Rodríguez, Reyna María, 240
Rodríguez, Richard, 192
Rodríguez, Simon, 838
Rodríguez, Víctor, 687
Rodríguez Alcalá, Guido, 621
Rodríguez-Alcalá, Hugo, 622, 623
Rodríguez Barilari, Elbio, 812
Rodríguez de Tío, Lola, 682
Rodríguez Embil, Luis, 238
Rodríguez Feo, José (Pepe), 451, 753
Rodríguez Frese, Marcos, 685
Rodríguez Freyle, Juan, 210
Rodríguez Galván, Ignacio, 545, 546
Rodríguez Juliá, Edgardo, 684, 685
Rodríguez Monegal, Emir, 413, 414, 450, 451, 722, 811
Rodríguez Nietzsche, Vicente, 685
Rodríguez Ortiz, Oscar, 840
Rodríguez Portillo, Armando, 287
Rodríguez Rivera, Guillermo, 240
Rodríguez Santos, Justo, 239, 260
Rodríguez Velasco, Luis, 197
Roffí, Reina, 295
Roffiel, Rosa María, 667
Rogelio Nogueras, Luis, 240
Rojas, Gonzalo, 199, 722–24
Rojas, Manuel, 200, 724–25
Rojas, Waldo, 199
Rojas Herazo, Héctor, 207
Rojas Sucre, Graciela, 617
Rojas y Cañas, Ramón, 646
Sábato, Ernesto, 62, 296, 737–42, 775, 776
Sábato, Hilda, 453
Sabines, Jaime, 549, 553
Saco, José Antonio, 235, 236, 604
Sada, Daniel, 554
Sáenz, Carlos Luis, 231
Saenz, Jaime, 129
Saer, Juan José, 63, 116, 606, 672, 742–43
Saguier, Raquel, 621
Sahagún, Berdardino de, 213, 534, 577
Said, Edward, 158
Saint-Simon, Claude-Henri de Rouvroy, comte de, 55
Sainz, Gustavo, 554, 636, 671, 672, 744–45
Salarrué, 69, 288, 746–47
Salaverry, Carlos Augusto, 646
Salazar Bondy, Sebastián, 297, 648, 649, 748–49, 791, 826
Salazar, Ramón A., 385
Sales Pérez, Francisco de, 839
Salinas, Raúl, 191
Sam Cop, Enrique Luis, 389
Samaniego, Filoteo, 281
Samayoa Aguilar, Carlos, 386
Samayoa Chinchilla, Carlos, 386
Samper, José María, I, 207
San José, María de, 223
Sanabria Santaliz, Edgardo, 685
Sánchez, Carmen, 264
Sánchez, Enriquillo, 264
Sánchez, Florencio, 704, 792, 810
Sánchez, José María, 617
Sánchez, Luis Rafael, 672, 673, 685, 749
Sánchez, Ricardo, 191
Sánchez León, Abelardo, 650
Sánchez Peláez, Juan, 840
Sánchez Quell, Hipólito, 623
Sandinismo, 530
Sanfuentes, Salvador, 196, 792
Sanguily, Manuel, 237
Santa Ana, María Manuela de, 217, 572, 573
Santa Inés, María Gertrudis Theresa de, 211
Santacruz Pachacuti Yamqui Sallqamaygua, Joan de, 216, 693, 707
Sant’Anna, Sérgio, 146
Santiago, Esmeralda, 687
Santiago Villarejo, José, 620
Santiván, Fernando, 197
Santos, João Caetano dos, 785
 Saravia, Juan Ramón, 427
Sarduy, Severo, 167, 240, 293, 294, 451, 452, 673, 674, 685, 753–54
 Sarlo, Beatriz, 302, 453, 492
Sarmiento, Domingo Faustino, 55, 56, 57, 71, 82, 158, 160, 186, 193, 196, 204, 205, 296, 297, 300, 415, 436, 465, 579, 580, 666, 755–56, 758, 803, 809, 865
Sartre, Jean-Paul, 103, 133, 283, 454, 507
Sastre, Marcos, 55
Satz, Mario, 449
Scalabrini Ortiz, Raúl, 62, 507
Schinca, Milton, 812
Schwartz, Roberto, 531
Schwarz, Mauricio-José, 760
Schwarz-Bart, André, 756
Schwarz-Bart, Simone, 322, 756–58
Scliar, Moacyr, 449, 450
Scorza, Manuel, 441, 649, 761–63
Scott, Lawrence, 575
Scott, Sir Walter, 422
Sebreli, Juan José, 62
Segundo, Juan, 489
Segundo Decoud, José, 620
Seligson, Esther, 447, 553
Selva, Salomón de la, 628
Semeg, Ele, 12
Sención, Viriato, 266
Senghor, Léopold Sédar, 11, 187, 321, 453, 581
Sepúlveda, Luis, 201
Sepúlveda Leyton, Carlos, 200
Serpa, Enrique, 238
Serrano, Marcela, 201
Serrano, Miguel, 200
Serret, Alberto, 240
Shakespeare, William, 45, 158, 189, 265
Sheridan, Clara, 453
Sheridan, Guillermo, 455
Shimose, Pedro, 129
Shúa, Ana María, 295, 450
Sicardi, Francisco, 60
Sierra, Stella, 617
Sierra O’Reilly, Justo, 423, 546, 547
Sigüenza y Góngora, Don Carlos de, 214
Silén, Iván, 685, 688
Silva, José Asuncion, 208, 296, 545, 560, 592, 600, 763–64
Silva, Lincoln, 621
Silva, Medardo Ángel, 281
Silva Acevedo, Manuel, 199
Silva Estrada, Alfredo, 840
Silva Valdés, Fernán, 811
Silveira, Oliveira, 12
Silveira, Valdomiro, 703
Silvestre, Francisco, 211
Simon, Pedro, 210
Simpson, Máximo, 63
Sinán, Rogelio, 616, 617
Siqueiros, David Alfaro, 530
Skármeta, Antonio, 201, 315, 671, 765–68
Slavery, 184, 396, 397, 757
Smith, Octavio, 239
Soffia, José A., 197
Sola González, Alfonso, 61
Solana, Rafael, 790
Solanas, Fernando, 315, 316
Solano López, Francisco, 620
Solar, Xul, 369
Solar Swayne, Enrique, 648
Solarte, Tristán, 617
Soler Puig, José, 240
Solís y Valenzuela, Pedro de, 210
Sollers, Philippe, 753
Sologuren, Javier, 105, 648, 826
Solórzano, Carlos, 386, 768–70
Somers, Armonía, 368, 811
Sontag, Susan, 452
Soriano, Carlos, 63
Soriano, Osvaldo, 257, 770–71
Sosa, Roberto, 426
Soto, Gary, 191
Soto, Pedro Juan, 684, 687
Soto Borda, Clímaco, 207
Soto Hall, Máximo, 230, 385
Soto Vélez, Clemente, 687
Sousa, Antônio Teixeira e, 438
Sousa, Naum Alves de, 787
Sousândrade, 438, 439, 772
Stavans, Ilan, 801
Steinberg, Alicia, 449, 450, 667
Steiner, George, 452
Sterne, Laurence, 635
Stevens, Wallace, 452
Stirner, Max, 724
Stoklos, Denise, 787
Storni, Alfonso, 60, 431, 773–74
Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 395, 532
Strand, Mark, 800
Streponi, Blanca, 840
Suárez, Clementina, 427
Suárez, Ursula, 223
Suárez Quemain, Jaime, 390
Suárez Solís, Rafael, 238
Suárez y Romero, Anselmo, 758
Suassuna, Ariano, 786
Subercaseaux, Benjamin, 200
Subiela, Eliseo, 760
Superman, 194
Supervielle, Jules, 588
Surrealism, 42, 76, 77, 79, 144, 146, 171, 198, 199, 200, 224, 260, 264, 369, 370, 454, 506, 551, 569, 637, 643, 775–76, 800
Sverdlik, Oded, 449
Symbolism, 94, 119, 143, 224, 285, 561
Szichman, Mario, 449
Szpunberg, Alberto, 63
Szyszlo, Fernando de, 826

Tablada, José Juan, 550, 777–79
Taboada Terán, Néstor, 127, 129, 779–81
Tagore, Rabindranath, 595
Talavera, Natalicio, 620
Tallet, José Z., 13
Tamayo, Franz, 128
Tapia y Rivera, Alejandro, 682
Tapies, Antoni, 638
Tarnopolsky, Samuel, 448
Tarríus López, Edith, 427
Taunay, Alfredo d’Escragnolle, Viscount of, 141, 142, 703
Távora, Franklin, 142
Taylor, Sheila Ortiz, 192
Teatro del Pueblo, 71
Teillier, Jorge, 199
Teitelboim, Volodia, 200, 531
Tejera, Isis, 618
Tejera, Gil Blas, 617
Telles, Lygia Fagundes, 147, 679, 782–83
Teodoro, Lourdes, 12
Terralla Landa, Esteban de, 217
Terrazas, Francisco de, 213
Testimonial Writing, 82, 83, 85, 96, 97, 154, 289, 290, 297, 388, 490, 595, 601, 660, 673, 677, 680, 783–85
Thais, Eva, 427
Thénon, Susana, 63
Thomas, Gerald, 787
Thomas, Piri, 687
Thompson Molinas, Roberto, 621
Tiempo, César, 449
Timmerman, Jacobo, 449
Todorov, Tzvetan, 158
Toker, Eliahu, 449
Toleda, Aída, 387
Tolstoy, Leo, 98, 100, 258, 287
Tomás, Consuelo, 617, 618
Toribio de Benavente, 213
Toribio Medina, José, 197
Torre, Guillermo de, 62
Torres, Antônio, 147
Torres, Camilo, 211
Torres, Edwin, 687
Torres, Omar, 243
Torres Bodet, Jaime, 551
Torres García, José, 811
Torri, Julio, 74
Torrientes, Alberto Pedro, 789
Toto, Fermín, 839
Transculturation, 367, 797
Traven, B., 549
Trejo, Oswaldo, 840
Trevisan, Dalton, 146, 679, 804–05
Triana, José, 241, 789, 806–08
Trinidad, Solano, 11
Trinidad Reyes, José, 424, 425
Trinidad Torres, Saúl, 618
Troche, Julio César, 622, 623
Turciós, Froylán, 425

Ultraísmo, 83, 134, 369, 510, 773
Umaña, Helen, 427
Umpierre, Luz María, 688
Unamuno, Miguel de, 768
Unanue, Hipólito, 218
Ungaretti, Giuseppe, 146
United Fruit Company, 77, 347, 386, 617
Urbaneja Achelpohl, Luis Manuel, 839
Urbina, Luis G., 546
Ureta, Alberto, 647
Ureta, Chano, 314
Urias, Roberto, 241
Uribe Arce, Armando, 199
Uribe Echevarría, Juan, 199
Urondo, Francisco (Paco), 390
Urquizo, Francisco L., 760
Urzagasti, Jesús, 129
Usigli, Rodolfo, 257, 333, 432, 550, 813–14, 843
Uslar Pietri, Arturo, 679, 815–17, 840
Uzín, Oscar, 129

Vacano, Arturo Von, 129
Valcárcel, Gustavo, 649
Valcárcel, Luis E., 648
Valdelomar, Abraham, 647
Valdés, Gabriel de la Concepción, 13, 236, 440
Valdés, Hernán, 82, 201, 784
Valdés, Zoé, 627
Valdez, Luis, 191, 680, 794
Valdés Cruz, Rosa E., 12
Valdivieso, Mercedes, 201
Valdovinos, Arnaldo, 620
Valencia, Guillermo, 561
Valenzuela, Jesús E., 708
Valenzuela, Luisa, 115, 671, 672, 819–21
Valero, Roberto, 241
Valéry, Paul, 146, 588, 843
Valiente, Lydia, 288
Valladares, Armando, 784
Valle, Ángela, 427
Valle, José Cecilio del, 385, 424, 425
Valle, Pompeyo del, 426
Valle, Rosamel del, 198
Valle y Caviedes, Juan del, 217
Valledor Sánchez, Gustavo, 197
Valle-Inclán, Ramón del, 545
Vallejo, César, 84, 250, 364, 369, 530, 627, 628, 647, 669, 708, 723, 775, 776, 800, 821–26, 853
Vallejo, José Joaquín, 196
Vallejos, Roque, 622
Vanasco, Alberto, 760
Vanguardism, 258
Varela, Alfredo, 367
Varela, Blanca, 627, 649, 826–28
Varela, Carlos Manuel, 793
Varela, Fagundes, 140
Varela, Félix, 235, 236
Varela, Florencio, 56, 515
Varela, José Pedro, 810
Vargas, Hermán, 207
Vargas, Miguel, 129
Vargas Osorio, Tomás, 207
Vargas Tejada, Luis, 788
Vargas Vicuña, Eleodoro, 649
Vargas Vila, José María, 207, 208, 555, 667
Varona, Enrique José, 237
Vasconcelos, José, 158, 193, 194, 205, 297, 434, 542, 549, 550, 556, 704, 721, 815, 834–36
Vázquez, Richard, 191
Vásquez Rial, Horacio, 771
Vasseur, Álvaro Armando, 810
Vaz Ferreira, Carlos, 413, 811
Vázquez, Miguel Ángel, 388
Véa, Alfredo, 575
Vega, Ana Lydia, 308, 672, 685, 836–38
Vega, Bernardo, 686
Vega, José Luis, 685
Vega, Julio de la, 129
Vega, Lope de, 265
Veiga, J.J., 146
Veintimilla, Marietta de, 280
Veintimilla de Galindo, Dolores, 280
Veiravé, Alfredo, 63
Vela, Arqueles, 386
Vela, David, 386
Vela, Rubén, 63
Velázquez, Alberto, 386
Vélez Ladrón de Guevara, Francisco Antonio, 211
Veloz Maggiolo, Marcio, 264, 265
Venegas, Alejandro, 197
Vera, Helio, 621
Verástegui, Enrique, 650
Verbitsky, Bernardo, 448
Vergara y Vergara, José María, 207
Vergés, Pedro, 266
Veríssimo, Érico, 147, 703, 799, 841–42
Verlaine, Paul, 588
Verne, Jules, 760
Vezzetti, Hugo, 453
Vial, Sara, 199
Vían, Enid, 194
Viana, Javier de, 810
Viana, Renata, 786
Vicens, Josefina, 553
Vicioso, Sherezada (Chiqui), 264
Victor, Gary, 473
Victoria, Carlos, 241, 243
Vicuña Cifuentes, Julio, 197, 199
Vicuña Mackenna, Benjamin, 196
Vidal, Luis, 794
Vidart, Daniel, 811
Vidarte, Santiago, 681, 682
Vieira, Antônio, 12
Vieira, Gabriel, 812
Viglietti, Daniel, 530
Vigny, Alfred de 422
Vilalt, Maruxa, 790
Vilarriño, Idea, 811
Villa-Lobos, Heitor, 143
Villagra Marsal, Carlos, 622
Villamor, Pedro Pablo de, 211
Villanueva, Alma, 191, 192
Villanueva, Tino, 191
Villanueva Collado, Alfredo, 688
Villar Buceta, María, 238
Villatoro, José Luis, 387
Villaurrutia, Xavier, 84, 93, 380, 551, 569, 666, 775, 790, 843–44
Villaverde, Cirilo, 243, 570, 669, 845–47
Villegas, Oscar, 790
Villella, Geraldo, 787
Villoro, Juan, 553
Villoro, Luís, 452,
Vinueza, Humberto, 281
Viñás, David, 62, 62, 449, 450, 531, 671, 848–50
Viñas, Ismael, 62, 449
Víquez, Pío, 230
Vitale, Ida, 811
Vitier, Cintio, 239, 240, 260, 261, 355
Vitier, Medardo, 238
Vítor, Nestor, 143
Vodanovic, Sergio, 793
Volio, Julián, 230

Vorágine, La (Rivera), 102, 206, 208, 288, 319, 404, 465, 714, 715
Vortex, The (Rivera), 102, 206, 208, 288, 319, 404, 465, 714, 715
Vulliamy, Luis, 201

Wacquez, Mauricio, 201
Wagner, Richard, 560
Wallparimachi Mayta, Juan, 694
Walsh, Maria Elena, 63, 851–53
Walsh, Rodolfo, 62, 257, 848
Warner, Jack, 601
Wast, Hugo, 60
Watanabe, Jose, 650
Weinberger, Eliot, 800
Wells, H.G., 52
Westphalen, Emilio Adolfo, 647, 826, 853–55
White, Hayden, 439
Whitman, Walt, 683, 723
Wiesse, Maria, 648
Wilbur-Cruce, Eva Antonia, 192
Wilcock, Juan Rodolfo, 61, 594
Williams, Raymond, 453
Williams, William Carlos, 800
Wilms Montt, Teresa, 199
Wilson, Carlos Guillermo, 10, 575
Wittig, Monique, 295
Wojciechowski, Gustavo, 812
Wolff, Egon, 793
Woolf, Virginia, 130, 133, 135, 182, 207, 308, 454, 595
Wright, James, 800
Wyld Ospino, Carlos, 386

Xirgu, Margarita, 811

Yáñez, Agustín, 550, 744, 861–62
Yáñez Cossío, Alicia, 600, 863–64
Yankas, Lautori, 201
Yglesias, Jorge, 240
Yiddish Literature, 447, 448
Ynsfrán, Pablo Max, 623
Yupanqui, Atahualpa, 530

Zacarías Tallet, José, 238
Zaid, Gabriel, 452, 455, 554
Zalamea Borda, Eduardo, 207, 208
Zalaquett, Mónica, 108
Zaldumbide, Gonzalo, 280, 281, 627
Zaldumbide, Julio, 280
Zambrano, Antonio, 230
Zamora, Alonso de, 210
Zamora, Bernice, 191
Zamora, Daisy, 108, 230, 590
Zapata, Luis, 295, 554
Zapata Olivella, Manuel, 9, 12, 575
Zarco, Francisco, 545
Zarratea, Tadeo, 621
Zavala, Magza, 232
Zavala, Victor, 791
Zavala Muniz, Justino, 811
Zavala Urtecho, Joaquin, 588
Zavaleta, Carlos Eduardo, 649
Zea, Francisco Antonio, 211
Zeitlin, Israel, 449
Zeller, Ludwig, 199
Zenea, Juan Clemente, 236, 243
Zeno Gandia, Manuel, 683, 684
Ziembinsky, Zbigniew, 786
Zitarrosa, Alfredo, 530, 812
Zola, Émile, 59, 87, 89, 101, 142, 159, 160, 197, 258, 482, 683
Zoot Suit Riots, 190
Zorrilla de San Martin, Juan, 163, 440, 580, 727, 810, 865–66
Zubizarreta, Carlos, 620
Zúñiga, Adolfo, 425
Zurita, Raúl, 199
NOTES ON ADVISERS AND CONTRIBUTORS

Albuquerque, Severino J. Associate Professor of Portuguese, University of Wisconsin. Author of Violent Acts: a Study of Contemporary Latin American Theater (1991); Português para principiantes (1993) and numerous articles in Latin American Theater Review, Modern Drama, etc. Member of the editorial board of Luso-Brazilian Review, Latin American Theater Review; member of Executive Committee of MLA’s Division of Luso-Brazilian Language and Literature. Essay: Theatre: Brazil.

Alverio, Carmen S., Assistant Professor at Regis University, Denver, Colorado. Author of articles on Panamanian narrative in Revista/Review Interamericana, Revista Nacional de Cultura (Panamá) and Exégesis (Puerto Rico). Editor of the last of these in 1994. Presently working on a study of contemporary Panamanian literature. Essay: Panama.

Armacanqui-Tipacti, Elia J. Formerly elementary school teacher and high school teacher in Peru. Now Assistant Professor at Lawrence University, Appleton, Wisconsin. Author of articles on Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz and Sor María Manuela de Santa Ana. Essays: Colonial Literature: Peru; Mysticism.

Arrington, Melvin S. Jr. Associate Professor of Modern Languages, University of Mississippi. Journal articles on Boom writers and contributions in several dictionaries of Latin American writers published in the 1990s. Member of the editorial board of Romance Monographs. Essays: Doña Bárbara (Gallegos); Ricardo Jaimes Freyre; Enrique Larreta; Regionalism: Spanish America; José Eustasio Rivera.

Bacarisse, Pamela. (1934–1996). Until her untimely death, Professor of Spanish, Latin American and Peninsular Portuguese Literature at Pittsburgh University. Author of several books on Manuel Puig (see main entry on this writer); she also edited the volume Carnal Knowledge. Essays on the Flesh, Sex and Sexuality in Hispanic Letters and Film (1993). Secretary-Treasurer of the Instituto Internacional de Literatura Ibero-americana; member of the editorial committee of the Revista Iberoamericana. Essays: Manuel Puig; El beso de la mujer araña (Puig).

Biriotti, Maurice. Lecturer, Department of Hispanic Studies, University of Birmingham. Specialist in critical theory and Chicano studies. Has published on Juan José Arreola and popular culture. Co-editor (with Nicola Miller) What is an Author? (1993). Essays: Juan José Arreola; José Gorostiza; Alfonso Reyes; Xavier Villaurrutia.

Boland, Roy C. (Adviser). Professor of Spanish at University of La Trobe, Melbourne, Australia. Major publications include Mario Vargas Llosa: Oedipus and the “Papa” State (1988). Editor of the journal Antipodas, and co-editor (with Alun Kenwood) of the volume War and Revolution in Hispanic Literature (1990). He is currently editing a volume of Salvadorean short fiction. Essays: Manlio Argueta; El Salvador.

Boldy, Steven. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), Department of Spanish and Portuguese, University of Cambridge. Author of The Novels of Julio Cortázar (1980) and of a critical edition of Agua quemada by Carlos Fuentes (1995). He is also the author of several articles and review articles on Fuentes, and of articles on Borges, Carpenter, Isaacs and Rulfo. Essays: Carlos Fuentes; Agua quemada (Fuentes).

Borgeson, Paul W. Jr., Associate Professor of Spanish, University of Illinois. Author of Hacia el hombre nuevo: poesía y pensamiento de Ernesto Cardenal (1984); editor of La lucha permanente: arte y sociedad en “La espiga amotinada” (1994) and of Carlos Germán Belli, Los talleres del tiempo (1992). Has now completed a critical edition of the poetry of Carlos Germán Belli. Essays: Carlos Germán Belli; “En Bética no bella” (Germán Belli); Esteban Echeverría; José Hernández; Martin Fierro (José Hernández); Horacio Quiroga; José Asuncion Silva.

Brandellero, Sara. MA in Brazilian literature, Universidade de Brasilia (1994); article in Cerrados (March 1993); chapter on “A fábula” in O imaginário nas narrativas populares. Essays: A rosa do povo (Drummond de Andrade); Vinicius de Moraes.

Brenes-García, Ana María. Research student and teaching assistant at Arizona State University. Author of an article on Lorca and Gabriela Mistral in Letras Peninsulares and of one on Montserrat Roig in Hispania. Essays: Erotic and Homoerotic Writing; Juana de Ibarbourou; Land and Literature; Marianism; Pornography.

Canaparo, Claudio. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), Department of Spanish, University of Exeter. Principal research interests are 20th century Argentine literature and literary theory, and the work of Reinaldo Arenas. Essays: El juguete rabioso and Aguafuertes porteñas (Arlt); Eugenio Cambaceres; Juan Gelman; “Asomos” (Gelman); Jorge Ibargüengoitia; El astillero (Onetti); Juan L.Ortiz; Osvaldo Soriano; Agustín Yáñez.

Colecchia, Francesca. Professor of Modern Languages and Literatures, Duquesne University, Pennsylvania. Editor of two bibliographies in book form on García Lorca (1979, 1982); co-editor (with Julio Matas) of Selected Latin American One-Act Plays (1973) and (with Luis F.González Cruz) Cuban Theater in the United States (1992); editor of “Crossroads” and Other Plays by Carlos Solórzano (1993). Assistant editor Estudios and member of the editorial board of Duqueses Hispanic Review. Essays: René Marqués; Carlos Solórzano.
Concha, Jaime. Professor of Latin American Studies, University of California at San Diego. Author of numerous monographs on Chilean poets, including those on Pablo Neruda (1972), Vicente Huidobro (1980) and Gabriela Mistral (1986). He is also the author of La sangre y las letras (1988). Essays: Marxism; Manuel Rojas.

Da Silva, Teresinha V. Zimbrão. Lecturer (Assistant Professor) at Universidade Federal do Espírito Santo, Brazil. Articles on Machado de Assis in Letras e Letras and Colôquio/Letras. Essays: Oswald de Andrade; “Manifesto antropofágico” (Andrade); Dom Casmurro (Machado de Assis); Modernismo: Brazil; Graciliano Ramos; Érico Verissimo.

Daniel, Mary L. Professor of Portuguese, University of Wisconsin. Author of João Guimarães Rosa: travessia literária (1968) and of articles in a range of important US journals. Co-editor of Luso-Brazilian Review and currently associate editor of Purdue Studies in Romance Literatures. Essays: José Pereira da Graça Aranha; João Guimarães Rosa; José Lins do Rego; Sousândrade.

Dawes, Greg. Associate Professor, Department of Foreign Languages and Literatures, North Carolina State University. Author of Aesthetics and Revolution: Nicaraguan Poetry 1979–1990 (1993), and of articles in Revista de Crítica Literaria Latinoamericana, Postmodern Culture and Nuevo Texto Crítico. Essays: Pablo Neruda; “Alturas de Macchu Picchu” (Neruda); Nicaragua.

De Costa, Elena. Associate Professor of Spanish and Chairman of the Department of Languages and Literatures, Carroll College, Wisconsin. Author of Collaborative Latin American Popular Theatre: from Theory to Form, from Text to Stage (1992). Essays: Autobiography; Caudillismo and Dictatorship; Jorge Edwards; Griselda Gambaro; Sóngoro cosongo (Guillén); Literacy Campaigns: Brazil; Mayan Literature; Náhuatl Literature; Orality; Popular Culture: Spanish America; Prison Writing; Protest Literature; Theatre: Colombia, Cuba, Mexico and Peru; Workshops.

Dedenbach-Salazar Sáenz, Sabine. Formerly Acting Director, Institute of Amerindian Studies, University of St Andrews, Scotland. Author of a considerable range of publications on the language and literature of the Quechua and Aymara peoples, and on religious discourse in colonial Peru. She is also a translator into German of the chronicles of Fray Bernardino de Sahagún (1989). Essay: Aymara Literature.

Denegri, Francesca. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), University College, London. Author of El abanico y la cigarrera (1996), a study of women’s narrative in 19th-century Argentina, Bolivia and Peru. Forthcoming is an anthology of the work of Juana Manuela Gorrití. Essays: Manuel González Prada; Juana Manuela Gorrití; Clarinda Matto de Turner; Women’s Writing: 19th Century

Dinneen, Mark. Lecturer (Assistant Professor) in Latin American Literature, University of Southampton. Author of articles on popular culture of the Brazilian northeast, and of Listening to the People’s Voice (1996), on the work of Ariano Suassuna. Essays: José Américo de Almeida; Jorge Amado; Manuel Bandeira; Augusto Boal; Gilberto Freyre; Casa grande e senzala (Freyre).

Febles, Jorge. Professor of Spanish, Western Michigan University. Author of Cuentos olvidados de Alfonso Hernández Catá (1982), and of articles in Hispania, The Americas Review, Latin American Theatre Review and Revista Chilena de Literatura. Essays: Eliseo Diego; Nuestra America (Martí); Versos sencillos (Martí).

Fernández, Salvador C. Assistant Professor, Occidental College, Los Angeles. Author of articles in Hispania, Hispanic Journal, World Literature Today and other journals. Essay: Gustavo Sainz.

Finnegan, Nuala. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), Department of Modern Languages, University of Strathclyde, Glasgow. PhD candidate with dissertation on Rosario Castellanos. Essay: Claribel Alegria.

Foster, David William (Adviser). Regents’ Professor of Spanish, Arizona State University. A prolific scholar who over the years has published several important volumes on Argentine culture, and who also pioneered the production of reliable works

Ganderton, Denise. Senior Lecturer (Associate Professor), University of North London. Author of entries on French women writers in Bloomsbury Guide to Women’s Literature (1992). Essays: Aimé Césaire; Une Tempête (Césaire).

García Chichester, Ana. Assistant Professor, Mary Washington College, Virginia. Author of articles on Virgilio Piñera, Cabrera Infante, Miguel Barnet and Mempo Giardinelli. Entry on Virgilio Piñera in Latin American Gay Literature: a Biographical and Critical Sourcebook (1994), edited by David William Foster. Essays: Miguel Barnet; Teresa de la Parra; Las memorias de Mamá Blanca (Teresa de la Parra); Positivism.

Glickman, Nora. Associate Professor, Department of Modern Languages, Queen’s College, CUNY. She has a particular interest in drama and is the author of works of fiction, of which the most recent is Mujeres-Memorias-Malogros (1991). Also co-editor (with Robert DiAntonio) of Tradition and Innovation: Reflections of Latin American Jewish Writing (1993) and, with Gloria F. Waldman, of Argentine Jewish Theatre: a Critical Anthology (1996). Essay: Jewish Writing: South America.

Goic, Cedomil. Formerly Professor of Latin American Studies at Ann Arbor, University of Michigan (returned to Chile at the end of 1994). Author of La poesía de Vicente Huidobro (1956; reprinted 1974), and of numerous volumes on Chilean literature, from Ercilla to the present. His more recent studies are the 3-volume Historia y crítica de la literatura hispanoamericana (1988–91) and Los mitos degradados: ensayos de comprensión de la literatura (1992). Essay: Chile.
Gold, Janet N. Associate Professor, Department of Spanish, University of New Hampshire. Specialist in the literature of Central America and author of Clementina Suárez: Her Life and Poetry (1995). Essays: Costa Rica; Honduras; Salarrué.

Gomes, Miguel. Assistant Professor, the University of Connecticut at Storrs. Author of El pozo de las palabras. Ensayos críticos (1990) and of Poéticas del ensayo venezolano del siglo XX (1996). He also edited the volume Estética del modernismo hispanoamericano (1996), and an anthology of the poetry of Oswald de Andrade (1988). Author of articles published in a range of specialist journals. Essay: Venezuela.

Gonzalez, Mike. Senior Lecturer (Associate Professor) of Latin American Studies, University of Glasgow. Co-author, with David Treece, of The Gathering of Voices: the Twentieth-Century Poetry of Latin America (1992). Essays: America, the Invention of; Guerrilla Poetry; José Carlos Mariátegui.

Good, Carl. Doctoral candidate, University of California at Irvine. Author of articles on Sor Juana de la Cruz, and El eterno femenino by Rosario Castellanos. Essay: Nellie Campobello.

Grant, Catherine. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), University of Strathclyde, Glasgow. Articles on Rosario Castellanos, Alejandra Pizarnik, Argentinian cinema of the 1980s, and on “Queer Theorrrhea and What It All Might Mean for Feminists.” Essays: Rosario Castellanos; Olga Orozco.

Guyer, Leland. Associate Professor of Spanish and Portuguese, Macalester College, Saint Paul, Minnesota. Author of book on the Portuguese writer, Fernando Pessoa (1982); translator of Ferreira Gullar’s Dirty Poem/Poema sujo (1990), and of short fiction by Clarice Lispector and Lygia Fagundes Telles. Essay: Ferreira Gullar.

Haberly, David T. Professor of Portuguese, University of Virginia. Author of Three Sad Races: Racial Identity and National Consciousness in Brazilian Literature (1983) and contributor to the Brazilian volume of the Cambridge History of Latin American Literature (1996). Essays: José de Alencar; Aluízio Azevedo; Olavo Bilac; Antônio de Castro Alves; Antônio Gonçalves Dias; Bernardo Guimarães; Sílvio Romero.

Hart, Stephen M. (Adviser). Professor of Latin American Studies, University of Kentucky. Author of several volumes on Spanish and Spanish American literature, including Religión, política y ciencia en la obra de César Vallejo (1987) and White Ink. Essays on Twentieth Century Feminine Fiction in Spain and Latin America (1993). Associate editor Romance Quarterly; Associate Dean, Faculty of Arts. Essays: José Joaquin Fernández de Lizardi; César Vallejo; “Trilce XIX” (Vallejo).

Higgins, James. Professor of Spanish and Chairman of the Department of Hispanic Studies, University of Liverpool. Leading authority on Peruvian literature, particularly on 20th-century poetry. Author of a study on César Vallejo and translator of his poetry. Author of several other volumes, including A History of Peruvian Literature (1987) and Hitos de la poesía peruana (1993). Essays: Peru; Sebastián Salazar Bondy.

Hoeg, Jerry. Assistant Professor of Spanish, Pennsylvania State University at Fayette. Author of article on Triana’s La noche de los asesinos (Gestos, 1993). Essays: Science; José Triana.

Hoffmann, Léon-François. Professor of French, University of Princeton, New Jersey. Author of several volumes on the literature of Haiti. Among the most recent are Haiti: couleurs, croyances, créole (1989); Haiti: lettres et l'être (1992) and Littérature d’Haïti (1995). He is also the author of an extensive bibliography on the literature of Haiti. Essays: Jacques-Stéphen Alexis; Oswald Durand; Justin Lhérisson; Felix Morisseau-Leroy.

Hood, Edward Waters. Assistant Professor of Modern Languages, University of Northern Arizona. Author of La ficción de Gabriel García Márquez: repetición e intertextualidad (1993). He also has an interest in contemporary Nicaraguan literature by women. Essay: Gioconda Belli.

Horan, Elizabeth. Associate Professor and Director of Comparative Studies in Literature, Arizona State University. Author of Gabriel Mistral. An Artist and Her People (1994). She has also translated and written the introduction to Happiness by Marjorie Agosín (1993), and contributed to the volume Into Print: American Women and Print Culture. Essay: Gabriela Mistral.

Hughes, Psiche. Teacher of Latin American Literature, City Literary Institute, London; part-time lecturer, Birkbeck College, University of London. Co-author, with Evelyn Fishburn, of A Dictionary of Borges (1990). Has also published articles in scholarly journals on the work of Borges, and is the translator of Cristina Peri Rossi’s The Ship of Fools (1989). Essays: El amor en los tiempos del cólera (García Márquez); Cristina Peri Rossi.

Johnson, Peter T. (Adviser). Bibliographer for Latin America, Spain and Portugal, and Lecturer, Program in Latin American Studies, Princeton University.

Jordan, Paul. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), University of Sheffield. PhD (Cambridge) with thesis on the work of Roberto Arlt. Article on Juan Goytisolo’s Juan sin tierra in Modern Languages Review (1989). Essays: Roberto Arlt; Rayuela (Cortázar).

Jozef, Bella. Emeritus Professor of Spanish American Literature, Federal University, Rio de Janeiro. Fulbright Scholar and Visiting Professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Centre for Studies on Rómulo Gallegos and the Universidad Complutense in Madrid. Her major studies include O jogo mágico (1980), A máscara e o enigma (1986) and Historia de la literatura hispanoamericana (Portuguese version, 1989; Spanish translation, 1991). She has been awarded several prizes and honours, both in Brazil and other countries, for her contributions to scholarship. Essays: Andrés Bello; Leopoldo Marechal; Rachel de Queiroz; João Ubaldo Ribeiro; Romanticism.

Keeth, William P. Doctoral candidate and teaching assistant, Arizona State University. Essays: José Juan Tablada; Emilio Adolfo Westphalen.

Keightley, Ron. Formerly Professor of Spanish, Monash University, Australia (1972–1992). Author of several articles on medieval and Renaissance narrative in Spanish and Catalan, and of articles on the transmission of Boethius and Eusebius. Essays: Miguel Ángel Asturias; Ricardo Palma; Ernesto Sábato; Abaddón, el exterminador (Sábato); El túnel (Sábato); Rodolfo Usigli.

Kerr, Lucille. Professor of Spanish and Comparative Literature, University of Southern California, Los Angeles. Author of Suspended Fictions: Reading Novels by Manuel Puig (1987) and Reclaiming the Author: Figures and Fictions from Spanish America (1992). Articles in a wide range of important journals, including Diacritics, Texto Crítico and Revista de Crítica Literaria Latinoamericana. Presently review editor of Latin American Literary Review and associate editor of Purdue Studies in Romance Literatures. Essays: José Donoso; Casa de campo (Donoso).

King, John. Director, School of Comparative American Studies, University of Warwick. His major publications in book form are a study of the Argentine literary journal Sur (1985) and Magical Reels: a History of Cinema in Latin America (1990). He has also edited and contributed to several important volumes on Latin American Literature and film, and is an editor of the Verso series, Critical Studies in Latin American Culture. Essays: Journals: Plural, Punto de Vista, Sur, Victoria Ocampo.

Kinsella, John Myles. Associate Professor of Spanish and Portuguese, University of Southern Maine. Author of Lo trágico y su consuelo: un estudio de la obra de Martin Adán (1989) and of Diálogo de conflito: a poesía de Carlos Drummond de Andrade (1995). Essays: Martín Adán; Carlos Drummond de Andrade.
Lewis, Tracy K. Associate Professor of Spanish and Latin American Studies, SUNY at Oswego. Areas of specialization include Paraguayan biculturality and translations from Guaraní. He has published two Castilian translations of Guaraní writers in the Paraguayan cultural magazine, Ñe ñingatu (1993, 1994). Essays: Rafael Barrett; Lo que son los yerbales (Barrett); Paraguay (with Teresa Méndez-Faith); Augusto Roa Bastos (with Teresa Méndez-Faith); Yo el Supremo (Roa Bastos; with Teresa Méndez-Faith).

Lisboa, Maria Manuel. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), St John’s College, Cambridge. Author of articles on Machado de Assis and Lygia Fagundes Telles, and of Machado de Assis and Feminism: Re-Reading the Heart of the Companion (1996) Essays: A escrava Isaura (Bernardo Guimarães); A hora da estrela (Lispector); Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis; Lygia Fagundes Telles.

Lockhart, Darrell B. Assistant Professor, Department of Foreign Languages, North Carolina A&T State University. Editor of Latin American Jewish Writers: a Critical Dictionary (1996). Essays: Augusto D’Halmar; Ricardo Güiraldes; Don Segundo Sombra (Güiraldes); Leopoldo Lugones.

Lockhart, Melissa A. Assistant Professor, University of Arizona, Tucson. Articles on Brazilian playwright Nelson Rodrigues. Essays: Cecília Meireles; Alejandra Pizarnik; Popular Culture: Brazil.

Luis, María Begoña de. Professor of Astrophysics, Department of Physics, Universidad Nacional de Educación a Distancia, Madrid. She is the co-author of a 2-volume study on general physics (1990), and of an introduction to astrophysics (1993). An area of specialization is astronomy in the context of literature. Essay: Cántico cósmico (Cardenal).

McMurray, George R. Professor Emeritus, Colorado State University. Major publications include monographs on Gabriel García Márquez (1978) and Jorge Luis Borges (1980). More recently, he has published Spanish American Writing since 1941: a Critical Survey (1987). Essays: Mariano Azuela; Los de abajo (Azuela); Martín Luis Guzmán; Ardiente paciencia (Skármeta).

McQuade, Frank. Formerly Lecturer (Assistant Professor), University of Leeds; articles on Virgilio Piñera and Sarmiento. Essays: Journals: Marcha, Mundo Nuevo, Orígenes, and Vuelta, Virgilio Piñera; Domingo Faustino Sarmiento; Trans-culturation.

Maíz-Peña, Magdalena. Assistant Professor, Spanish Department, Davidson College, North Carolina. Author of essay in Spanish American Women Writers: A Bio-Bibliographical Source Book, edited by Diane E.Marting (1990), and of articles in Revista Hispánica Moderna, Texto Crítico and other scholarly journals. Essays: Diamela Eltit; Margo Glantz.

Marbán, Jorge. Professor of Spanish, College of Charleston, South Carolina. Author of comparative study on Camus and Cela (1973), and of La Florida: cinco siglos de historia hispánica (1979). He has also published in article form on Arturo Uslar Pietri. Essay: Arturo Uslar Pietri.

Márquez, Ismael P. Assistant Professor, Department of Modern Languages, University of Oklahoma. Author of La retórica de la violencia en tres novelas peruanas (1994) and co-editor (with César Ferreira) of Los mundos de Alfredo Bryce Echenique: textos críticos (1994). Advisory editor, editorial board of The Comparatist. Essays: José María Arguedas; Ríos profundos (Arguedas); Historia de Mayta (Vargas Llosa).

Martín, Gerald (Adviser). Andrew Mellon Professor of Modern Languages and Chairman of Department of Hispanic Studies, University of Pittsburgh. Most recent major publication is Journeys through the Labyrinth: Latin American Fiction in the Twentieth Century (1989); has also contributed several chapters to Cambridge History of Latin America. Official biographer of Gabriel García Márquez. Editor, Pittsburgh University Press series of translations of Latin American literature. Member of the editorial board of Revista iberoamericana. Essays: Rafael Arévalo Martínez; Guatemala.

Martín, Mario. Assistant Professor of Spanish, Department of Literature and Languages, East Texas State University. Author of “Nineteenth Century Prose Fiction,” in Mexican Literature: a History (1994), edited by David William Foster. Essay: Mexico: 19th Century.

Martínez, Pablo A. Assistant Professor of Spanish and Latin American Literature, Trinity University, Texas. He has edited and introduced El poder del gran señor by Iván Egüez (1992), and published articles on Spanish and Spanish American writers in specialist journals in both Ecuador and the US. Essays: Jorge Enrique Adoum; Entre Marx y una mujer desnuda (Adoum); José de la Cuadra.

Martul Tobío, Luis. Associate Professor, Department of Romance Languages, University of Santiago de Compostela, Galicia. Author of critical edition of Sab by Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda (1993), and of articles on Spanish American writers in Cuadernos Hispanoamericanos and Anales de Literatura Hispanoamericana. Essays: The Historical Novel; Juan León Mera.

Masoliver, Juan Antonio. Reader (Associate Professor) and head of Spanish section in Faculty of Law, Languages and Communication, at University of Westminster, London. Author of books of poetry including En el bosque de Celia (1995) and of fiction: Beatriz Miami (1991). He is also the editor of The Origins of Desire (1993), a collection of modern Spanish short stories. Essay: Augusto Monterroso.

Méndez-Faith, Teresa. Professor of Spanish and Latin American Literature, St. Anselm’s College, New Hampshire. Publications in book form are Paraguay: novela y exilio (1985), Con-textos literarios hispanoamericanos (1986). She is also the editor of Breve antología de la literatura paraguaya (1994) and Breve diccionario de la literatura paraguaya (1994). Essays: Paraguay, with Tracy K. Lewis; Augusto Roa Bastos (with Tracy K. Lewis); Yo el Supremo (Roa Bastos), with Tracy K. Lewis.

Molina Gavilán, Yolanda. Teaching associate, Arizona State University. Author of scholarly articles, and translator of Rosa Montero’s La función delta (The Delta Function, 1992). Essay: Science Fiction.

Murphy, Marie. Associate Professor of Spanish, Loyola College, Baltimore. Author of Authorizing Fictions: José Donoso’s “Casa de campo” (1992), and of articles on Donoso and Rosario Ferré. Essay: Rosario Ferré.

Murray, Patricia. Senior Lecturer (Associate Professor), University of North London. Articles in Knives and Angels: Women Writers in Latin America, edited by Susan Bassnett (1990) and in the special issue on Wilson Harris of the Review of Contemporary Fiction. Essays: Cien años de soledad (García Márquez); Myth.

Neate, Wilson. Assistant Professor, Department of Foreign Languages, Central Michigan University. Author of articles on Chicano writing in Gender, Self and Society (1992.) and Melus (1994). His study “Contemporary Chicano/a Writing, Ethnicity and the Question of Community” will appear in 1997. Essays: Chicano Literature; Puerto Rican Writing in the United States; Theatre: Contemporary Chicano Theatre.

Negrín, María L. Teacher at University of Miami. Formerly an editor for Letras Cubanas. Essays: Reinaldo Arenas; Miguel de Carrión; Carlos Loveira.

Noble, Pat. Formerly subject librarian, and currently consultant, the Latin American Collection, University of London Library. Past president of SALAM and editor of the papers of their 38th annual meeting (published in 1995). Co-author (with Ann Wade) of The Future of Latin American Research Collections in the United Kingdom (1993), and (with Rory Miller) of Information Technology for Latin Americanists (1994). Essay: Libraries.

Oakley, R.J. Senior Lecturer (Associate Professor) in Hispanic Studies, University of Birmingham. Publications in the field of Brazilian literature include articles in Bulletin of Hispanic Studies (63, 1986) and Modern Languages Review (78, 1983). Essay: Afonso Henriques de Lima Barreto.

Odber de Baubeta, Patricia Anne. Senior Lecturer (Associate Professor) in Department of Hispanic Studies, University of Birmingham. Commissioning editor of Portuguese Plays in Translation, Edwin Mellen Press; translator of António Ferreira’s O cioso (The Jealous Man); author of articles in several journals, including Vida Hispánica and Portuguese Studies. Essays: Carlos Martínez Moreno; Short Stories (Quiroga).

Ormerod, Beverley. Associate Professor, Department of French Studies, University of Western Australia. Author of An Introduction to the French Caribbean Novel (1985) and co-author (with Jean-Marie Volet) of Romancières africaines d’expression française (1994). Essay: Francophone West Indies.

Oviedo, José Miguel. Trustee Professor, University of Pennsylvania. Among his best-known studies are monographs on Ricardo Palma (1964) and Mario Vargas Llosa (1970, 1977, 1982.); the collection of essays Narradores peruanos (1968) and many other volumes, including two on José Martí (1986, 1989). Recipient of both a Rockefeller and a Guggenheim scholarship; Visiting Professor at the University of Essex, England. Member of the editorial board of Vuelta (Mexico) and Hispanic Review. Essay: Mario Vargas Llosa.
Pagano, Adriana Silvina. Lecturer (Assistant Professor) of Translation Theory, Federal University of Minas Gerais (Brazil). Author of several articles on literary translation and translation theory, including “Blowing up Translation Theory,” “Literary Translation in Argentina” and “On Film Subtitles.” Essay: Literary Theory.

Pastor, Brigida. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), Department of Spanish, University of Edinburgh. Author of articles on Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda in Romance Quarterly, Journal of the Association for Contemporary Iberian Studies and other publications. Essay: Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda.

Peña, Luis H. Associate Professor and Chair of Spanish Department, Davidson College, North Carolina. Author of La metamorfosis del deseo: una aproximación a la narrativa mexicana contemporánea (1990), and of many articles on Mexican literature in volumes of essays and scholarly journals such as Texto Crítico, Revista de Crítica Literaria Latinoamericana and Conjunto. Essays: Ignacio Manuel Altamirano; Juan García Ponce.

Piñón, Nélida (Adviser). See her own entry.

Podalsky, Laura. Assistant Professor, Department of Foreign Languages, Bowling Green State University, Ohio. Articles in Velvet Light Trap, Studies in Latin American Popular Culture, and an essay in Mediating Two Worlds: the Americas and Europe, edited by John King, Ana Lopez and Manual Alvarado (1993). Essays: Film: Brazil; Film: Spanish America.

Rebaza-Soraluz, Luis. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), King’s College, London. Poet and literary critic. In the first category, his publications include Del reino y la frontera (1985, 1991), Síñó que en una plaza (1989) and Dos solitudes (1990). He has also published interviews with several writers, and is the author of articles on Manuel González Prada and Vargas Llosa, among others. Essays: José María Eguren; Enrique Lihn; José Emilio Pacheco; Blanca Varela.

Reis, Roberto (1949–1994). Until his premature death, Professor of Brazilian Literature and Culture, University of Minnesota. Author of literary criticism, poetry and narrative. Published collection of short stories, A dor da bruxa, in 1973 and the novel, A hora da teia, in 1982.. Editor of A permanencia do círculo (1987) and author of The Pearl Necklace (1992), a collection of essays on Brazilian literature which was awarded the Alfred Hower Prize. Past vice-president of the Brazilian Studies Association (BRASA). Former editor of Ideologies and Literature, and of the Brazilian section of Revista
Iberoamericana. Essays: Autran Dourado; Adonias Filho; Grande sertão: veredas (Guimarães Rosa); João Cabral de Melo Neto; Regionalism: Brazil

Richards, Keith J. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), University of Leeds. Specialist in Bolivian culture. Doctoral thesis on Néstor Taboada Terán (1994); article on this author in Journal of Hispanic Research. Essays: Bolivia; Felipe Guaman Poma de Ayala; Néstor Taboado Terán.

Roberts, Nicole. Teaching assistant and PhD candidate, University of Birmingham. Essays: Mulatto; Négritude.

  Robinson, Christine A.F. Visiting Lecturer (Assistant Professor), Department of French, King’s College, London (1993–1995); member of the Institute of Linguists. Essay: Jean Price-Mars.

Rodríguez, Linda M. Assistant Professor, Department of English, University of Puerto Rico. Author of articles on Sáb by Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda, Aída Cartagena Portalatín’s Escalera para Electra and one on the subject of “La novela histórica y la mujer caribeña.” Essays: Dominican Republic; Ana Lydia Vega.

Ruffinelli, Jorge. Professor in Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Stanford University, California. Editor of Texto Crítico (Veracruz) and Nuevo Texto Crítico (Stanford). Author of a considerable number of volumes on Latin American literature and cultural journals. He has published monographs on the work of Arlt, Onetti and Revueltas. Among his more recent publications in book form are El lugar de Rufio y otros ensayos (1980) and Crítica en marcha (2nd edition, 1982). Essays: Enrique Amorim; Mario Benedetti; Mempo Giardinelli; Juan Carlos Onetti; Juan Rufio.

Sabat de Rivers, Georgina. Professor of Latin American Literature, SUNY at Stony Brook. Author of Estudios de literatura hispanoamericana: Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz y otros poetas barrocos de la Colonia (1992,) and of two studies on Sor Juana (1976, on the “Sueño,” and 1982). Coeditor (with Elias L.Rivers) of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz.
Obras selectas (1976). She also edited a special number on Sor Juana of the University of Dayton Review (1983). Essays: Juana Inés de la Cruz; Divino Narciso (Juana Inés de la Cruz); Primero sueño (Juana Inés de la Cruz).

San Roman, Gustavo. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), Department of Spanish, University of St. Andrews (Scotland). Articles on Horacio Quiroga, Juan Carlos Onetti and Cristina Peri Rossi. He has also published an interview with the last of these writers. Essays: Felisberto Hernández; José Enrique Rodó; Ariel (Rodó); Juan Zorilla de San Martin.

Schade, George D. Professor of Spanish, the University of Texas at Austin. Translator of works by Juan Rulfo and J.J. Arreola; author of Costumbrismo y novela sentimental (1979) and of La segunda generación modernista (1979). Has published articles on 19th- and 20th-century Spanish American fiction, travel literature and autobiography in leading US journals of literary criticism. Essays: Jorge Isaacs; Cirilo Villaverde; Cecilia Valdés (Villaverde).

Scott, Nina M. Professor of Spanish, Amherst College, Massachusetts. Co-editor of Coded Encounters: Writing, Gender and Ethnicity in Colonial Latin America (1994). Other publications include the translation of an introduction to Gertrudis Gómez de Avellaneda’s Sab and Autobiography (1993), and articles on Latina writers and on Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Member of the Executive Board of Latin American Research Review. Essays: Conventual Writing; Respuesta a Sor Filotea (Juana Inés de la Cruz).

Scott, Renée. Associate Professor of Spanish, University of North Florida. She has published articles on the work of Rosario Castellanos and Isabel Allende and a book: Javier de Viana: un narrador del Novecientos (1986). Essays: Delmira Agustini; “Íntima” and “Otra estirpe” (Agustini).

Serna, Juan Antonio. PhD candidate, Arizona State University. Essay: José Agustín.

Shaw, Deborah A. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), School of Languages, University of Portsmouth. Co-author of article on Como agua para chocolate; author of “Gender and Class Relations in Elena Poniatowska’s De noche vienes (Bulletin of Hispanic Studies, 1995) and of “The Mexican Writer as Critical Invention” (Latin American Crosscurrents in Gender Theory, 1996). Essays: Best-Sellers: Isabel Allende; Best-Sellers: Laura Esquivel; Hasta no verte Jesús mío (Poniatowska).
Shaw, Donald L. (Adviser). Brown-Forman Professor of Latin American Literature, University of Virginia. Has published on both Peninsular and Spanish American writers. In the former category, he is the author of the volume The Nineteenth Century (1972) in the series A Literary History of Spain, and in the latter he has books on Carpentier (1985) Borges (1976, 1992), and Skármeta (1994). He is also the author of Nueva narrativa hispanoamericana (1981). Essays: Jorge Luis Borges; “Nueva refutación del tiempo” (Borges); “El jardín se senderos que se bifurcan” (Borges); Rómulo Gallegos; Modernismo: Spanish America; The Post-Boom; Antonio Skármeta.

Sibbald, K.M. Professor of Spanish, McGill University, Canada. Publications in book form include El hombre y la obra (1990); co-author (with Ilse Adriana Luraschi), María Elena Walsh o “el desafío de la limitación” (1993); co-editor (with Howard Young), T.S. Eliot and Hispanic Modernity, 1924–1993 (1994). Presently member of the advisory board of Hispanic Journal. Distinguished Woman Scholar in Residence, Queen’s University, Ontario (1988). Essays: María Luisa Bombal; Norah Lange; María Elena Walsh.

Sims, Robert L. Professor of Foreign Languages, Virginia Commonwealth University. Author of many articles on Spanish American literature, and of two works on García Márquez: one on the evolution of myth (1984) and a more recent one on Márquez’s early journalism (1991; English version, 1992). Review editor of Revista de estudios colombianos, The Comparatist and New Novel Review; contributing editor for Chasqui. Essays: Colombia; Abel Posse; David Viñas.

Slick, Sam L. Professor in Department of Foreign Languages and Literatures, University of Southern Mississippi. Author of José Revueltas (Twayne, 1983), and an editor of Historical Dictionary of the Spanish Empire, 1492–1975 (1992). Essays: Literacy Campaigns: Cuba and Nicaragua; Mestizo.

Smith, Verity. Contributing editor of this volume, for which she has also translated articles. Honorary Research Fellow, Queen Mary and Westfield College (University of London). Books on Valle-Inclán and on Carpentier’s Los pasos perdidos; Cubanist. Member of the editorial boards of Antípodas (Australia) and Journal of Hispanic Research (London). Essays: Canon; El siglo de las luces (Carpentier); Children’s Literature; “Nocturno XXXII” (Darío); Identity; Dulce María Loynaz; Metafiction (with Dermot Curley); Paris.

Sourieau, Marie-Agnès. Assistant Professor, Department of Modern Languages and Literatures, Fairfield University, Connecticut. Essays: Maryse Condé; René Depestre; Journals: La Revue du Monde Noir, Tropiques; Jacques Roumain; Simone Schwarz-Bart.

Spindler Li, William. Writer and poet. Author of articles on Latin American culture and politics published in both learned journals and newspapers. Poetry broadcast on BBC Latin America Service. Essays: Jorge Carrera Andrade; “Cada objeto es un mundo” (Carrera Andrade).

Stavans, Ilan. Associate Professor of Hispanic Studies, Amherst College, Massachusetts. Author and literary critic. Publications include Imagining Columbus: the Literary Voyage (1993), and Growing up Latino: Memoirs and Stories (1993). He has also edited Tropical Synagogues: Short Stories by Jewish Latin American Writers (1994) and is currently editing a volume of Latin American essays for Oxford University. Essays: Jewish Writing: Mexico, Central America and the Spanish-Speaking Caribbean; Fernando del Paso.

Torres Cabellero, Benjamín. Associate Professor of Spanish, Western Michigan University. Author of Gabriel García Márquez o la alquimia del incesto (1987) and Literatura e ideología (1989). He also publishes in learned journals and in the cultural supplement of the Puerto Rican newspaper El Nuevo Día. Essay: Puerto Rico.

Trigo, Abril. Associate Professor, Department of Spanish and Portuguese, Ohio State University. Author of Caudillo, estado, nación: literatura, historia e ideología en el Uruguay (1990). Essay: Uruguay.

Van Delden, Maarten. Assistant Professor of Comparative Literature, New York University. Author of many articles on Carlos Fuentes; guest editor of special issue on Latin American intellectuals for Annals of Scholarship. Essay: Essays (Paz).

Volek, Emil. Professor of Spanish, Arizona State University. Publications in book form include Cuatro claves para la modernidad (1984), Metaestructuralismo (1986), Antología del Formalismo ruso y el grupo de Bajtin (1992), Literatura hispanoamericana entre la modernidad y la postmodernidad (1994). Essays: Guillermo Cabrera Infante; El reino de este mundo (Carpentier); Aura (Fuentes); Mexico: 20th Century; El laberinto de la soledad (Paz); Elena Poniatowska; Postmodern Writing; Pedro Páramo (Rulfo); Testimonial Writing.

Waag, C. Michael. Associate Professor of Latin American Literature, Murray State University, Kentucky. Author of many articles on Ecuadorian literature which have appeared in Perspectives on Contemporary Literature, Revista Ibero-americana and other scholarly journals. Essay: Demetrio Aguilera Malta.

Weldt-Basson, Helene Carol. Assistant Professor of Spanish, Department of Modern Languages, Fordham University, New York. Author of articles on 20th-century Spanish American literature and of Augusto Roa Bastos’s “I the Supreme”: a Dialogic Perspective (1993). Essays: La muerte de Artemio Cruz (Fuentes); El general en su laberinto (García Márquez).

White, Steven F. Associate Professor of Modern Languages and Literatures, St Lawrence University, New York. Poet, translator and critic. Author of, among other volumes, From the Country of Thunder (poetry, 1990); Poets of Nicaragua: 1918–1979 (poetry in translation, 1982); Modern Nicaraguan Poetry: Dialogues with France and the United States (criticism, 1993). Awarded Academy of American Poets Prize (1975 and 1977). Essays: Ernesto Cardenal; Vicente Huidobro; Murilo Mendes; Nicanor Parra.

Williamson, Edwin (Adviser). Professor of Hispanic Studies, University of Edinburgh. Author of The Penguin History of Latin America (1992), and of studies of García Márquez and Alejo Carpentier. He is also an established authority on Cervantes, whose publications in this field include The Halfway-House of Fiction: “Don Quixote” and Arthurian Romance (1984) and, as editor, Cervantes and the Modernists: the Question of Influence (1994). He is currently completing a major biography of Jorge Luis Borges.

Wilson, Jason (Adviser). Reader (Associate Professor) in Department of Spanish, University College, London. His research interests are wide-ranging and include poetry (particularly that of the Spanish American avant-garde) and travel writing. He is also interested in literary translation and is the author of An A-Z of Modern Latin American Literature in English Translation (1989). Other publications in book form are on Octavio Paz (1979 and 1986) and the Traveller’s Literary Companion to South and Central America (1993). Essays: Oliverio Girondo; Alberto Girri; Surrealism; Travel Literature.

Wood, David. Lecturer (Assistant Professor), Department of Hispanic Studies, Sheffield University. Publications include an “Annotated Bibliography of Alfredo Bryce Echenique” (1994) and “Style indirect libre and Alienation in Un mundo para Julius” (1994). Essays: Alfredo Bryce Echenique; Un mundo para Julius (Bryce Echenique); Eduardo Galeano.

Zilberman, Regina. Professor of Theory of Literature and Brazilian Literature, at the Catholic University of Rio Grande do Sul. She has published several books on aspects of children’s literature in Brazil, together with a volume on gaúcho literature, another on reception theory, and A literatura no Rio Grande do Sul (1980). Editor of Brasil/Brazil, Brown University, where she was a Visiting Scholar in 1986–87. Essay: Brazil: 19th Century.

Translators

Beswick, Jaine. MA in Language and Linguistics, with a specialization in Spanish and Portuguese phonetics, University of Manchester. Currently undertaking research for a PhD on aspects of Galician linguistics at the University of Bristol. Associate of the Institute of Linguistics.

Craig, Ian. Graduate in Spanish and English literature, Westfield College, University of London. MA in literary translation, University of Essex. Now PhD student at Queen Mary and Westfield College, researching on censorship in relation to children’s fiction in translation during the early years of the Franco regime.

Glen, Jo. Graduate in Spanish literature, Westfield College, University of London. Has taught English to foreign students and Spanish language and literature at a London secondary school. Presently freelances as a translator.

James, Patricia. Graduate in Spanish language and literature, Westfield College, University of London.

Smith, Verity. See under Advisers and Contributors.

Tully, Carol. PhD from London University on aspects of German and Spanish Romanticism. Translator of Thomas Oberender’s play Three Days in May, performed at the Cheltenham Festival (1995), and of Taniana Tsouvelis’s In the Lemon Grove, performed at the Royal Court Theatre, London (1996).

Varea, Isabel. Graduate in Spanish with Portuguese, King’s College, London. Translator of audio material for Channel Four and BBC documentaries. Her translations in book form include volumes on the visual arts, gastronomy, film, music and complementary medicine.

Wright, Ann. Graduate in Iberian and Latin American Studies, University College, London. Specializes in translation of film subtitles. Also translator of many works of fiction and non-fiction. Among the most important are The Fragrance of Guava, I Rigoberta Menchú, Che Guevara: the motorbike diaries, a journey around South America. She has also translated Bolero by Ángeles Mastretta and Carlos Manuel Martínez’s novel El infierno. 